Their mind is misdirected into the distance you see? Off adoring dead people. Some Moses, Jesus, or Buddha, whoever. But they are ignorant of the people alive in front of them. There was this one time when I jokingly said to my birth mom after she told me to do something: “I don’t have to listen to you, the Buddha said so.” She goes back in a mad tone: “Who the hell is the Buddha, is he your mother? Did he carry you for 9 months, give you life, raise you, made sure not even a tiny ant bit you, fed you?” I said this jokingly in the same room as my grandmother. My mom knew I was kidding. But My grandmother was upset at what I had said, and she said to me: “No, unacceptable grand daughter. That’s not how we speak to our mothers. Even if you were playing around. Your mother is bigger than the Buddha. The Buddha only teaches you how to be good. Your mother gave you life. There is no person in your life higher in authority than our mothers in our culture. Your mother is your Preah. Don’t “misplace” her or speak to her that way again.” I said I was sorry, and promised not to do it again.

Authority Figure

It looks like as I write this out, it's about where we perceive authority to be as a people. Which to me in regard to things like the ONA – for me – becomes an important matter.

I asked my grandmother once when I wanted to know who or where to go to find the real true “dhamma.” If I should go to Buddhist temples and pay my respects to monks etc. In Khmer the word for Dhamma actually comes from the Sanskrit Dharma, but is truncated to “Dhar” which is pronounced as “Tor” like how you say Torah, minus the -ah, but as a Brit or Frenchman would read it. My grandmother explains to me the Tor is in none of those things I mentioned. Tor, she says, is within each of us and around us everywhere, not in a temple, a monk, or a sutra. She said there was no need for me to be at a temple, to do what? Stare at bald heads? If I had food to offer, she said, to offer/share it to my cousins. If I wanted to practice Tor, to practice it on my family and those around me. If I need to better understand things about Tor to ask my elders. You “hold/observe Tor” with those around you. Not with strange people at some temple. Not by reading books. So in my family and culture, there is no “authority” on Buddhism, besides what Tradition we have inherited from our Old People who came before us.

And so we come to the subject of the ONA and how – because of my own culture and upbringing – I see and understand the ONA to be. Or more accurately: how the ONA becomes through me. How ONA will be presented by me to others. My future children, my friends, and people I meet.

To me there is no academic, inorganic council of some ONA authority to whom we can run to for “official” bona fide ONA dogmas and Truths. Not even the Buddha according to his own words and admonishments to his original disciples claimed to be an authority on his Way. When asked, the Buddha said to use your own judgement and to question even what he teaches. And if what he taught is not congruent to how you understand the world or things inside your own mind, then he [Buddha] is wrong and his words should be dismissed for what each of us understand to be how things are. Because in essence when we speak of Dhamma – natural phenomena – we are all – Buddhas, arahatas, bodhisattas, bhikkhusangha, ariyasangha – all of us are looking and trying to understand the same body of natural phenomena. No one has it all right. The way is sambuddhi: Self-Enlightenment. Being such, the Buddha has absolutely nothing to do with your self-enlightenment.

Don't run to Anton Long for authority. He can't save you. Or give you gnosis, sinister nature, or make you an adept with authority to speak official dogmas and truths for the ONA. It's not what this thing is about. What is the ONA essentially about? Self-Becoming, the work of Self-Development. Working to become a new type of human, a new breed right? Anton Long isn't your mother. He doesn't give birth to such new types of people. It is our own effort and will and striving and Pathei-Mathos that does. Anton Long has absolutely nothing to do with the work of our own Self-Becoming.

But in the Family of the ONA, Anton Long is the Elder, the Old One. Be careful how you describe and see your elders, because the fruit never falls far from its tree right? If you understand yourself to be ONA in some way, and Anton Long is seen by you as being insane and not right in the head, you also are insane and not right in the head because like attracts like. Birds of a feather flock together. Oranges grow from orange trees. I have this thing where I affectionately tell my mom she is crazy when she says something I disagree with [a way from my grandma]. And my mom will always say back: “Fine with me. If I'm crazy, you're crazy too, because you came out of me. That's my blood in your heart.”

If you are ONA, whatever Anton Long is, you are also, because those are his ideas in your/my/our head, remember that. Anton Long in the ONA has every right as the elder to be at the center of our circle. Just like every grandfather or grandmother by right of age and act of procreation is at the center of a bloodline/family/clan. Us younger folk are the circumference of this circle. It is through each of us that the ONA will pass into whatever direction and become whatever for the next generation. In the same sense that in a family in relation to our grandparents, it is through each of us that the bloodline flows in whatever direction we take it. It is through each of us that what Family Traditions we inherited from our Old Ones is passed to the next generation in front of us. Anton Long is our Old One from whom we get our ONA Tradition. It will change with us and through us. It must, to stay alive. Blood must flow for there to be life. Money must flow for there to be an economy. Ideas must flow for it to have value and spread. Nature must flow if She is to be alive for another billion years. Everything must flow, adapt, and in time change, or die.

The concept/imperative of changing and evolving the ONA, brings us to the natural opinion based disagreements we will have with each other and also with AL. It's human to Think, and it's human to want to Believe that we are right. Because if how we think is unsound in some way, it makes us feel either unsound ourselves or we lead ourselves into believing that others may think we are of unsound mind. Nobody likes to be made a fool of in the eyes of others.

In my other culture you don't argue with the Old People. You don't assert your opinions onto them and act like you know better. Even if they are not right. Or even if their ways of doing things is actually out dated. You have to show them that there is an alternative way that works better. You make it so that through action and result on your part it is as if you were saying: "You're olds ways of doing things WERE right, but there is NOW a better way." And then you show the old ones with the results of your actions, and not with just loudly voiced asserted opinions.

In a structured environment like an army, if on the battlefield you are given an order by your senior officer, and this officer has had 39 years of results compared to your new born career as a soldier, you have no right or substance to step Out Of Line, and asset your opinions. There is very few options that you can take. You can follow orders, knowing your superior is wrong and that there is a better way. Or if you are very sure that there is a better way, and you are confident of it, you take the risk, disregard the order, and work on the field to show by Result of deeds that there is indeed a better way. Arguing and fighting and asserting opinions – no matter how many authoritative figures you drag into your argument – does very little besides upset feeling.

The old people in my culture have this saying that goes: "Crying on all four doesn't win a race."

To explain that saying, when I was just out of high school, I got into a light argument with one of my elders over politics. At the time I was at that age where I thought I knew everything. The elder in question seemed to be a rabid monarchist, feudalist, or at least not democratic like I learned in Western high school is the best way. So I blurted out my opinions and said basically: "That's not right! That's not how things are done." And I proceeded to support my opinions with things I learned in school.

Then the elder laughs with his peers and says: "It's expected for babies to cry on all four. We all have opinions grand daughter. The difference is I am 74. I have at least 50 years of RESULTS to back up my opinions. You have only more opinions and no results. Learn to walk first before you try to compete with those who've walked before you; because crying on all four doesn't win a race."

Basically he was calling me a baby or saying that what I was doing was infantile. He was older, much more experienced in life, did work in politics and public office, and more importantly he had decades of results or fruit of deed to support what ideas and opinions he had. Thus, he had legs to walk with. Whereas I had no legs to stand on as we might say in English. I was just all talk, all mouth, all opinion: a baby crying crawling on all four. I might be loud, but crying on all four doesn't win a race.

When I make an opinion about things like tribes, clans, or large functioning cooperative families, my humble opinions comes from a 1000+ years of cultural praxis of a people, that works and has worked; for my people and a majority of humans on this earth right now. When you from your nuclear family weltanschauung make an opinion to challenge my opinions of such matters, what have you as a person or Western culture to show and prove for yourself? As in results or fruit of deed. You as a people say "action speak louder than words," yet you rarely live by such words you preach. Your results which are in plain view shows me that when you make such challenging opinions, your just crying on all four. Just look at the condition on a social and familial level that you are collectively in. Over 50% of your mariages fail. What nuclear families you have are typically dysfunctional. You don't even trust your own mothers and brothers with your money, let alone do business with each other for mutual prosperity, you're absolutely dependent on the State for your very existence, you slave your lives away for corporations, banks, debt; and in your old age, you retire alone without any family by your side to care for you. And you want to tell me that clans and tribes don't work? As if you know better? The only thing not working is your entire Western civilization in its current condition, from the familial and social base on up.

As a civilization, your American “way of life” is a baby. It’s 235 years old. It doesn’t matter if you have been to the moon, have scientists, and university professors with doctorates. You’re still 235 years old, and look at the majority of what RESULTS as a civilization you have manifested. You’ve fucked up Africa, rapes it, plundered it. You’ve fucked up the Middle East since the Crusades, you’ve fucked up Russia and Asia; You’ve caused more wars than spent time living in peace; you’re wealthy as a nation at the expense of global human poverty and debt of your own citizens, you’re fucking up forests, oceans, fresh water supplies, your Christiana religion has destroyed and killed indigenous cultures, and so on. What’s these results or fruit of deed say about your “American Way of Life?” It doesn’t matter how pretty you paint it. China has been around for 4000 continuous years. Europe has been around a lot longer as well. I actually trust the collective ‘opinion’ of Europe more than an American scholar, because at least on a level of collective psyche, Europe has had 1000+ years of experience and results to back up their opinions. Your American scholars have doctorates from some university. You get you knowledge from dead books and dead people.

Like one such “collective opinion” I pay attention to made by Europe is that it thinks religion is stupid. I say “collective opinion” because Christianity is just dead there. The average person in Europe seem to have grown out of this religion stage, at least organized religion. I’m not saying they are not spiritual and emotionally dead. But you look at America’s psyche as a collective metaorganism, and you see how insane it is. There’s a bible belt? In California there is a cult of some kind on every corner. You have just as many religious fanatics here as you would find in Palestine and the Islamosphere. Every other religion in America claims to be the fastest growing religion. That’s not something to be proud of. That’s like a mental institute claiming its the fastest growing asylum. What’s that say about the mental state of your average citizen? Collectively you have no culture. Your secularism and Capitalism is your substitute culture. A culture of citizens enslaved by fat cat corporatocrats. Who’s the backwards one here? Babies cry real loud don’t they? Change your diaper at least first before you tell other peoples more ancient than you that your way is better.

This talk about age and civilization reminds me of something I read somewhere about a prophecy of the fall of one age and the dawn of a new golden age. The Prophecy was retold by the ancient Greeks when they said that when the Ouroboros is seen again in the sky biting it’s own tail, the dawn of the Golden Age will come, and the old age shall collapse in calamity. It is said that the Greeks got this from Egypt. This One Greek guy in ancient times named Salon or something like that had traveled to Great Egypt to speak with the High Priest there to learn from him. As they were rowing a boat in some subterranean watery passage to a secret place, they talked about some very distant forgotten past, of things like Atlantis, a once great global civilization that fell, the passing of ages, the fall of man, etc. The Greek guy asks the Egyptian guy: “How do you know these thing are true?” And the Priest says back to the Greek guy: “You Greeks are but babies. Your memories of a past are young. Egypt is Ancient. She has seen the full cycle of the Great Procession many times over.” Which is to say that Egypt was very old, and so what ideas and opinions the Priest was sharing were not entirely empty. It was backed up by the wisdom of what Egypt had experienced during its long aged existence.

In our sky the Milky Way can be seen which is sometimes called the Blue Nile. That Blue Nile “River” of stars spins or revolves slowly. There is a point where this River of Stars looks like a serpent’s head biting it’s own tail [so it is said by the old ones before us]. Now we’re talking about the spinning rim of a galaxy here. A galaxy is big: it takes a while for a galaxy to even make one complete round doesn’t it? This symbol of a snake or dragon biting its tail is more ubiquitous than you think. Every ancient culture the world over seems to have it. Which makes one wonder.

AL to the ONA is like an aged elder. He’s had at least 40 years of experience and results, whereas I and those of us who have just found HIS ONA are babies. It is Foolish to think that we know more about his own ideas don’t you think? We may have opinion, but that’s all that we really have. Even if we have results or fruit of living and deed to show for it, AL still trumps us all by 40 years.

I suppose its almost “natural” in a twisted or degenerate way for a Western person to want to dismiss an old person as being “not all there in the head.” AL is old you know, and might have a few screws loose. Our youthful brains are more sharp right? But we forget that the younger we are, the littler our legs and the less we have Walked.

I’m not saying that the ONA is “perfect” and AL is infallible. I’m saying there is a proper and honorable way of doing things; at least for me. You have to know your front from your back in such matters. To know your place in the order of things. There were many things about the old ONA I did not like or knew of a better idea. Now those things are gone, and what the ONA has become is harmonious to how I see things. All that change happened silently and slowly. Nobody on my side expressed an opinion that disrespected AL or the OG's. We just quietly took matters into our own hands and changed things slowly. So that the results such acts bore did the talking and convincing. Nothing ever needs to be said. Crying like a baby accomplishes very little. Getting upset over ideas and stuff does nothing. So in the end nobody got dishonoured and everybody is still in their proper place.

And if your in the "backroom" we'll see from time to time that once in a while some Drecc or Niner with the best of intentions comes out, steps out of line, and cries like a baby about how the ONA is not right or something. Like babies, after their tantrums, they usually go back to taking their naps don't they lol. And I try to tell these associates that crying and blurting out passionate opinions really does not and will not change anything. Why cry and bitch at me or some one? Wat are they going to do, hold your hand? You're not chained to the ONA. Leave if you don't like it. I try to tell everybody inside the ONA these past years that there is no leader in the ONA. Nothing says you can't change the ONA to your liking and needs. If you don't like something change it. Don't cry at me. Go cry to AL. It won't do anything, but at least you'll be crying at the right person lol. But deep down inside you know you can't put in the work to change it. Why else are you crying at me. I know what crying means. I've raised plenty of baby cousins. When a baby cries they need to be fed or have their diapers changed. I'm not going to feed you or change your diapers. I'm not your nanny. If you don't like something about the ONA change it and make it better. What's stopping you?

When outsiders and trolls cry about some aspect of the ONA it means the same thing. They are saying that they find something about the ONA that their own opinions don't agree with. That's all. And some of these trolls get very passionate about their opinions. But that's all they have. Go do something. Stop crying on all four and walk at least if you want to race with AL or ONA. ONA has been around since at least 1972. AL has continuously been giving life to the ONA for at least 39 years. It has withstood the test of time. When these outsiders bitch and complain about some aspect of the ONA or some idea AL might have; what besides opinions are these babies working with? What group have you run and operated for 40 years? Where are your credentials? Your results? Your resume? Some sort of experience and results where you can say to AL or ONA collectively: "I run my own cult; it's 50 years old, we do things this way, and it works for us, therefore you ONA are backwards and should do like us. And thus also my opinions matter and are not empty." If some outsider with more experience than AL and more results than him or us were to come and say that, I'd be all ears and honour his constructive criticism. Otherwise mind your own business. But you don't have a business of your own to mind do you? That's why you're minding ours.

They act like typical consumerists don't they? Like ONA is a Burger King and as a customer they can just get things their Magian way lol. You don't like our intoxicating Anton Long Islands? You don't like ONA's Beesty Burgers? Tough shit go across the street to McGilmore's. Get the hell out of our burger joint. The funny and bewildering things is that these outsider clowns will sometimes obsessively complain and cry about the ONA and AL, year after year. As if in their clown minds they believe that if they cry hard enough we will change things about ONA to make them happy. As if the ONA exists to try to make everyone happy and accept it. There are like random nobodies with internat access who year after year just complain and shoot off empty opinions.

The louder they cry, the more incompetent they are. For me, if as an outsider you have written some book, or maintain a body of great insights in some form of medium like a blog or website, and/or you have or help run some kind of organization of some type and you express your opinions, I consider your constructive criticism, if you are successful at what you do. But if you're some random internet user with a lot of ideas and opinions and nothing to in the form of results and experience, and you bitch about ONA; who the hell are you, that anybody should even waste their time considering your opinions and convictions. I don't care if you can cite Webster or some hot shot with a doctorate. If you want to fight, don't be Mexican Fighting. It's your opinions, you back it up your own works, accomplishments, experiences, and results. Not with the words and ideas of other men. You wanna chicken fight and battle ONA? Show me your Rooster: your 40 year organization, you're 5000 pages of idea, your body of people you have inspired and/or influenced, the organizations and groups who have been inspired or influenced by your ideas and ways, as well as academics that cite you in some. Anything that is a physical, measurable result of deeds manifested in the real world. Otherwise, you're just crying opinions and don't got shit on AL or ONA, besides ideas. Difference is AL and ONA knows how to sell their ideas to create an organization and inspire. You clowns are impotent lacking the know-how of selling yourself, your ideas, to manifest anything real. All you clowns have are opinion. You must continue to cry these opinions, because the moment you stop, you will be forgotten.

Marketing & Dissemination

I used to love reading books. I have a big personal library in our room. It used to be that when I got allowance money and got paid from working my chore jobs at family places, I divided my money in three parts: a third to buy clothes and shoes, a third to buy music CD's; and a third to buy books. I used to be at the bookstore every week. I'm the type to spend at least 3 hours in a bookstore. I'll walk around, read my fill. As I walk around and read, I stick books like like in secret sections like behind a certain set of books. Then when I am done I make up my mind which books I like most and go find them to buy. I've never taken an inventory of my books so I don't know how many I have in my personal library [as opposed to the family library downstairs]. I'd say around 900-1000, because I have stacks of books that don't fit on my shelves also.

Of all my personal books none are fiction. I dislike reading fiction. I can't sit through any type of fiction. 100% of my books are nonfiction and the informative type. Of all my books, I do not have one single one about Buddhism. I have never read a book about Buddhism. I am anal with my books. I don't know how many I have, but I know when someone has borrowed one of my books because I can feel a book is missing out of its spot. Which people in my family make fun of me for. My cousins will play jokes on me by removing a book from my shelf and hiding it somewhere without me knowing, and they'll just wait to see how long it takes for me to notice it was removed. I notice something is missing after one day, because I have my computer desk by my shelves and I stare at those books every day. I'll get a funny feeling in my gut. Like I was on a roller coaster ride going down, and there is a relentless feeling of a hunch or bothersome thought in the back of my head. Once I feel that a book of some type is missing I go into this crazy compulsive obsessive state of mind which is the part my cousins think is funny. I'll stay in the room for hours and go through each shelf and every book to figure out which exact book is missing. I won't stop [or can't] until I know the exact title of the book removed.

It gets crazier because I bought this little statue of this dragon and I did a "magic ritual" where I made an "elemental" spirit I gave a name and symbol to which "lives" in the statue. I charged my little spirit in the dragon to watch over my books and tell me if one is missing, because I get crazy attached to my books. So in my insane obsessed state I talk to my little spirit and try to listen to him or tune into him or something. I do this so often when I put get my mind into that half dazed state, I get impressions in my head of pictures, faces, and words that come up in my head. But I keep that spirit thing to myself, or my cousins will think I'm crazy. I'm perfectly functional. It's easy to figure out who took it. Once I figure out the exact book, I'll go down to where they hang out and just stand there with my arms crossed. It's always the one that is trying not to laugh and avoiding eye contact. So I'll go to the guilty one and say: "Give it back, it's not funny!" They'll laugh to themselves. So they'll say: "How do you know one's missing weirdo?! First tell us the title or what it looks like."

Each shelf in my personal library is an entire subject. I have many books and few subjects. I'll have a row of 20-30 books all of the same subject. I build up each subject one at a time. I never buy random books. Or know what books I will buy. What I do or did was I do a lot of thinking during my "me-time" I have to myself. This can be any time where I am alone. In my mind I dwell on a subject for a very long time. Then the more I hold the thought in my heart-mind, the stronger of a feeling develops over time. It feels like your heart chakra is churning or stirring. It's an uneasy feeling of restlessness, and in your gut or solar plexus area it feels like something is tugging it. I wait until that restless feeling grows stronger where it puts me into this obsessive state. Like your fiending for drugs and you're not thinking straight, and you go on a mission for your fix. It's the same thing. I'll put myself into a car and just drive fiending in a mindless state. I'll drive to some bookstore. Once I'm in the bookstore I just literally mindlessly walk around walking by every single shelf, slowly walking past and gazing at every single book in the store. Which is why it takes me hours. Random books will "popout" meaning they catch my eye or stop me. Usually these books are not overtly concerned with the subject I am dwelling on. I have to skim through it, and always the case, I'll find a single sentence or paragraph which is completely relevant to what I was dwelling on.

I have odd subjects. I have at least 100 common-rare books I "accidentally" stumbled on about nothing but Chi-Gung and things related to cultivation of jing chi, chi, and shen chi. It's sometimes called Taoism Alchemy, Taoist Yoga, or Taoist Sexual Kung Fu. I have another circa 200 book on a strange topic with no real subject word. It's that same subject people like Graham Hancock gets into. About ancient human pasts, lost civilizations, forgotten people, unsolved mysteries. I absolutely love this topic. Then I have a shelf of books on the subject of science, things like anthropology, biology, zoology, sociology, psychology, quantum mechanic etc. I have an entire 100 books related to the old New Thought genre. I have my foreign language shelf which includes a few books on ancient Hebrew, ancient Greek, Latin, Sanskrit, Italian, French, etc. Just dictionaries. I have an entire shelf dedicated to just the English language itself. I absolutely love reading about the history and development of the English language. I have an old copy of Beowulf in old English one of my friends gave to me as a gift. I love to get it so that I can see in my head English as a catapillar across time where the tail is simple Anglo-Saxon and the head is current English. I used to call this way of seeing things within a wholistic framework of time as "chronomorphosis" but I migrated that idea to the term "Aeonic Insight." I know a load of crap about some of the most useless topics and subjects ever! I don't have a shelf for occult stuff. I do have two shelves for books on mysticism, Eastern & Western esoterica. I shove my copy of the Satanic Bible in there, since it goes nowhere else. And lastly I have 3 entire shelves dedicated to nothing but things like business, marketing, advertizing, manipulation, body language, etc. I secretly am obsessed with the concept that ideas can control people. I don't have or have ever read a book on "memetics," I invent and make up what I know about memes and memetics from these books and from reflecting on real life events, etc.

But a few years ago my pasonate love for books flatlined. Before I used to love reading and rereading my books 10 times over even for 3 hours straight and I wouldn't get tired. Then a few years ago I ended up disliking to read. I couldn't sit down for 5 minutes to finish a chapter. I tried to walk around bookstores to read new books, but the feeling was totally dead. I had lost the interest for books, finally. Now I'm obsessed with PDF's and "books" in digital format. In my personal flash drive library I have 5 gigs worth of PDF's. I have another 4 gigs stored in my SD card in my Droid. I haven't read a book since. But now I've developed a new obsessive past time: Writing.

After a few years of eading the writings of people like David Myatt, I've come to really love the underlying ideas behind electronic writing, or expression via this electronic medium. Because a book is dead. Reading a book is like looking through a picture album. You only get snap shots. It's different when say you read the writings of DM, because you get to see the person, his mind, and ideas develop and take shapes and forms over time. So it's more like watching a movie in slow motion across time.

And I think that's what I love about this idea of "blogging" and reading blogs as opposed to books. You get the same ideas/meme, personality/mind, but in something like a live medium of a blog you get to see it gradually evolve and change. And so, you get the experience of this mind as it truly is: a dymanic, moving, changing, amorphous entity which metabolizes ideas and excretes waste ideas over time. Which is something I really like about the ONA. You can see it change. And you can see that the change doesn't happen from just one person. Everybody adds their own little changes which makes one big change.

So from this, I've learned to understand that something like a me, or a DM, or an ONA, in actuality are not static local one time events. Things of this sort are living and flow like a river, having a tail end and a head end, a past and a present, but the entire river is one fluid field/entity. Therefore to me, it's not acurate to state that the ONA is or was Satanic, or Nazi, or Drecc, or Niner. That it "was" one thing, and now it "changed" into an ONA v3.0. No more then it is accurate to say that I have changed from a Chloe v1.0 to a Chloe v20.something. The old Chloe as I was when I was a child and the now me, both still are alive. The ONA is "co-existently" everything it was and is. In the same way where we can say that a music piece or movie is not just one frame or one note. The Whole thing must be experienced and considered from the first note to the last. For it to truly be genuinely felt, known, and appreciated.

I actually have a much deeper and awesome respect for the English language as a memeplex more today because I know and understand its humble beginnings and the long history, fights, borrowing, changing, etc, it went through – its own pethei-mathos – to have grown to become the world's first true global language. Never in the recallable history of our species has this moment existed when we as a single species of Earthling, shared a common human Language. That in itself, I thing is a monumentous achievement on the part of the English people, boardering on the Planatary scale of achievements. English is a mega-memeplex: for good and bad. Because our language we think in defines the Cosmos we believe ourselves to exist in. My sneaky mind would have me wonder how to tap into the Success of English as a megamemeplex, in that it propogates its weltanschauung on a global scale without being challenged, so I can make the ONA work in the same way.

I find it curious that we will debate and challenge someone's weltanschauung if and when they are presented in the form of philosophy, or religion, but when a worldview is presented under the blinding vehicle of human language we are powerless to question the worldview it imposes on us. For example we can often get into debates with Hindu nondualists and Western dualists over their silly world views. But I have rarely if ever come across a person inside the English language Matrix say to themselves or others: "I say, something is not quite right with my weltanschauung, for you see, my English Language I see the world in has a word for a "Here," and a "There?" Is there truly a here and a there, out there in such a dualist manner? Or is the Cosmos a nondualistic field? If the latter than my English is playing tricks on me!"

It funny on my end and vantage point to watch people get their asses wrapped up in heated debates and fights over "Truth," religion, which god and world-model is the "real" one, semantics, whose ideology is real and whose is fake, what religions are brainwashing cults, and what are genuine spiritual religions, how religions and politics are system of control, etc, etc. But guess what? None of those things of control or worldmodels exists if you removed the Language! You wanna look for a truly brainwashing system that conditions your consciousness to perceive the world in a way that may not be real, look at your Language-World Matrix you exist in and can't get out of. I pity people that exist in a mono-lingual worldmodel. Those are the types of people akin to people who are born and raised their whole lives inside one brainwashing cult, sheltered away never to know anything of the real world beyond how they were conditioned to see things.

I meet so many smartasses who huff and puff their chest up because of their big words and diplomas argue about stuff like ideologies, cults, mind control whatever, acting like they organically know what they are talking about, and through it all they fail to realize just how mind controlling the very Language they use is. That's what I call a "pseudo-intellectual." It's like a rebel that rebels in the system being a kind of Satanist that is acceptable to society. If you act smart debating about all this stuff on ideas and mind control and Truth, etc, and you don't even realize your own Language actually does the mind control and control of your perception of reality, then you're rebelling within the acceptable limits of your own god damn Language/Weltanschauung! You're not busting out of a Matrix to free yourself. You're a pseudo-intellectual because the only shit you can be intellectual about is the shit somebody or some system taught you to work with. Your intellectualism didn't do shit. You didn't go nowhere. You aren't Free Thinking. And they even use terms like "Thinking outside the box." You ain't thinking outside shit. What language are you still thinking in? You still in the lingual worldmodel your dumb ass was born in. At least learn half another different language, and try to work put yourself into a second culture or people's worldview-model. That way you have contrast to compare the two, to come to your own realization about the illusory effect Language has on how we consciously understand reality.

A few years ago I had my mind set on being a book writer. But my choice of this hobby-career was ill founded. It was born more from a sneaky interest of mine to manipulate people with ideas. I thought I'd write one book after another, where each book was stuffed with my memes. I'd publish them and sell them and spread those memes everywhere. This was like me one day discovering that I can buy ad space in the back of certain magazines and make a few bucks. Then one day the good Lord Satan introduced me to the wonderful world of Blogs! Satan that day said to me: "Chloe, fuck the book idea, this is called a blog, use it and pimp me." "I will, thanx!" It's free to publish your ideas. It's free for people to read. I have all the room to pack as much memes as I can. And everybody who comes across it is exposed. It was Genius! Like if i were Google and one day I discovered Youtube and facebook, realizing that putting ads on those two cybermediums makes a hell a more money than a mere magazine ad!

The "not so smart" in general population in their consumerist way will believe that just because an idea or product gets mass circulation, that such product is of good quality. When it's the other way around. The more a product is mass produced to be mass consumed by general population, the more shitty the quality is. In the subcultural world of Satanism, just because LaVey's stuff get's mass consumed by general population, doesn't mean the ideas in it are of high quality. Have you ever read the Satanic Bible? It's spectacular when you read it when you were 12 or 13. But if you are 20 or 40 and you read it and think it's the greatest tome of wisdom in the world, then you really need to get out more or at least diversify your reading options. On the other hand I know people I hang out with who have great ideas and an insightful mind, who have never wanted to write, don't know how to, or never not interested in blogging.

One of my books on the subject of science is a grey one about forgotten scientists. I found it wandering a garage sale one day. It has a list of all these [mad] scientists I've never heard of. Each chapter give the story about each scientist, when they lived, what they studied, their field of work, their experimentations, their struggle to get their ideas patented and marketed, and their failure to do so because of lack of finances, and opportunistic vultures. The only scientist I knew vaguely was that guy Nikola Tesla. But I didn't know the detailing of how Tesla ended up being forgotten in history, until I bought the book and read it.

Basically Nikola was a Croatian immigrant. He came from a poor and humble family trying to find opportunity in the New World. Tesla had this active and vivid imagination where he could visualize machines in his mind and watch them work. So he'd often spend time day dreaming where he builds things in his mind and tests these imaginary machines out. Later he got a normal job and started to go to work at making some of these machines and conducting various experiments. He one day got a humble job at a place owned by this one creep named Edison who owned a lightbulb shop. It was a lowly job he started off with. But Tesla one day thought about the dangers of his boss's type of electrical current and on his free time he did these experiments and came up with a much safer electrical current, that traveled further than the type his boss was using. So Tesla pitched the idea to his boss [the Vulture Edison]. Edison tells the young and passionate starry eyed Tesla: "Good idea, I got $10,000 for you if you can make it work for us!" So Tesla trusting his boss worked on this new idea. When Tesla was able to make this idea work, he asked for his money and the vulture Edison said to Tesla: "I said I got $10,000 for you, I didn't say I'd give it to you boy. According to such and such corporate laws, what ideas you come up with in my company, by law belongs to me. Good work son."

Anyways, Tesla quit the Edison company and for a while struggled to run his own company. But during his whole life he never had the money to buy all the patents he wanted to secure all of his ideas. As time passed more vultures like Marconi & Bell came into the picture to ridicule Tesla while tweaking his ideas to patent their innovated ideas. Unfortunately Tesla died poor and alone, forgotten. Reading about his last years made me sad. He was slightly insane or "eccentric." He lived in a small apartment in a structure for his whole life. He only lived in apartments with the same number he was obsessed with. He had a phobia for pearls and said every time he sees women wear pearl necklaces it makes him feel like jumping out of his window to his death. He liked to eat dinner with two sets of each utensil. In his elder years the only friends he had were the pigeons on the roof of his high riser, which he fed and talked to daily. There was one white pigeon which the elderly Tesla had an unusual affection for. This pigeon had a name, he had a picture of her [the pigeon] in a frame, and he referred to her in his diary and to people he talked to as his "wife." He died alone forgotten in that apartment. It's only now, after so many years that the mainstream is beginning to give Tesla his due credit. If we were to remove Tesla out of the equation, most of the technological things we know of today which brought many men their fame and fortune such as the telephone, radio, wave transmission, television transmission, remote control electronics, wireless communication, all would not be possible. The unfortunate thing was that as brilliant a Mind Tesla had, he simply never had the means or social skills to market or patent his ideas and he just had far too many vultures on his back.

The point above is that just because you have a great idea, does not mean those ideas will sell itself. Just because you may be super intelligent, does not mean your thoughts and opinions will matter to others if you don't know how to market yourself and ideas. Just because you have a book filled with great ideas, does not mean those ideas will travel far. That's not how ideas work. Thinking an idea only takes one person. Spreading those ideas takes team effort. Jesus would not have made a dent in human history if he did not have his apostles and those who came after him to spread and market his ideas. Same with Buddha, Muhammad, Moses, or Donald Trump. Trump needs his Trump Organization. Aha you say, if you are clever. It's symbiosis. The members who privately invest the Trump Organization give him their money because of two things: he knows how to grow it, and he's got the selling ability with his public charisma. Trump makes the money, becomes a billionaire, gains the fame, and the investors happily make their money and become multimillionaires. Everyone in the end profits. With ideas, you need the idea maker, and the idea marketer.

I am reminded of an old movie I watch which I really liked. It was called "The Man Who Would Be King." It was about these two conmen from England stationed in Raj-India during Rudyard Kipling's era. These two conmen were friends. One of them was the quiet scheming type and the other was the socially skilled public relations type. One day the quiet schemer had the idea of the two of them traveling far off into a backwards kingdom called Kaffiristan where they'd con the natives to fight each other and end up kings of Kaffiristan! So they set off on their adventure. The whole movie is about the two of them struggling on this conartist adventure where the quiet thinker had all the ideas, and the socially skilled one did the public relations work with the various natives they encountered. Near the end of the movie they succeed in tricking the natives of Kaffiristan and the quiet one is made king. After a while the king's crown and power got to his head and ego and he put down his best friend one day by saying that he [the public relations friend] was insignificant because he had not come up with all the ideas to get them that far. The "marketer" guy is saddened that his friend did not consider all the effort and work he had given equally, and so their friendship soured. Luckily one day the natives discovered that they had been tricked and they chased the two English fellows to try and kill them. The two run away back to India, and along the way the quiet one says he was sorry for being such a dick. I think only one of them made it back alive.

Come this October, this ONANXS blog will be exactly 3 years old. 8 months before our old school WSA friends had our own private forum in which we hung out and talked about nothing important. But at that time Kayla and our friend Sinistar from New York were in the forums plotting and planing. Every week or so Sinistar would do a sweep in our private forum to delete every thread with “evidence” in case the wrong eyes read it. Later when we began this blog, I deleted the entire private forum to permanently get rid of all threads. From then on all work took place in public via these blogs.

When we started this blog about 3 years ago we wanted to keep things as controlled as possible. Control meaning everything that happens, every meme made, every meme seen spreading, and every person infected is taken note of. We tried to never put up links our selves anywhere leading people to this blog. All we did was drop memes here and wait. Like casting fishing lines out into a lake baited. You sit in your boat and patiently wait to see what happens. We also tried not to click on this post ourselves because we wanted the hit counter to be a roughly approximate as possible. This way, the more people talk about this blog, the more people use memes from here, and the more clicks we get, the more we have a positive indication that our memes are spreading. I love the graph part of these blogs. And the better tool we use is the quarterly top results wordpress gives you!

Behind the scenes it’s pretty much all scripted business. Each quarter we quickly study the top 10 read results. In the old days Kayla would write by using different styles, with different things she called “Themes,” in which she wraps her memes. When the quarterly report comes, we can tell which style of writing, which theme, caught more fish. So we discontinued the themes and styles that did not spread memes, and we worked with the theme of writing that did the work. When more of my writing picked up and when my theme style did the meme spreading. Conveniently Kayla phased herself out of the scene. So now, when Shugz has developed a public name, it’s not accidental that she now write more often using tested themes and styles. When the quarterly reports shows that her writings associated with her name does better, I’ll just working the backroom and editing.

Wrapping your memes in a thematic presentation is a marketing ploy. So is using names and people who have developed a rapport with an audience or body of people. The more rapport you have with a person, the less you consciously question what they tell you. When was the last time you stopped and questioned the news your favorite news caster gave to you? Presentation of themes with memes is like working with the idea of supply and demand. If the demand for diamonds is profitable, you sell diamonds. If diamonds goes down and people want 24K gold, you translate your capital into that gold. If iPhones sell, you translate your capital into iPhones or Apple Inc Stocks.

For the 3 years we didn’t advertise links to this blog, or ask people to please read and comment on our writings, or ask people to please join the ONA. We didn’t do shit but write and drop our memes here. Shugz and her firends in the early days were put inside our target groups to do the social part of the marketing. They never once mentioned this blog, or asked people to go here and read anything. Most of the time her team messed around, made friends, trolled people, and when need dropped memes inside articulate posts for reasons. Their friends end up reading the posts, wonder where they get their ideas from. It’s easy to guess because the only brand label they “wear” are the letters ONA. The friends they make in those groups out of curiosity – on their own accord – research the ONA. Eventually you will find this blog somehow if you look for ONA stuff. That’s when you’r technically hooked.

It’s more effective when you are lead to believe that it is your own freewill that you do things and believe in something. Shugz and none of her old friends in those forums never asked anybody to be ONA. But we made sure that we placed the bread crumbs all in the right places for you to find not just the ONA, but exactly this specific blog to expose the market to these specific memes. Why? What are memes and what are they good for? Memes are ideas. Ideas must circulate. They are good for inspiring and influencing. It’s really cool if you like memes and the science behind it. Over 3 years ago when Kayla was still in the 600 Dump, and when nobody even knew what the hell the numbers 352 was, Kayla once said to us in a post deleted in our private forum that someday “352” will be the new “666.”What’s cool is that with no advertising, asking people to come here and read, leave nice comments, etc, over the years more and more people end up knowing or being aware of what the WSA352 is. And they talk about and ONA in their respective forums, or often talk shit about ONA and/or 352. Which is very funny to me.

Because a majority of you are so clueless to the manipulative and subtle tactics of marketing. Marketing is just a nice way to say some person or company tricked you to want to buy their product and not the nearest competition.

We may not have overtly advertized ONA or 352, but we used other tricks we learned from high school. The unfortunate thing is that in high school a lot of those who find their way into subcultural freakshows like Satanism were not popular in school. You're asking: "So what? Who cares about popularity?" You don't obviously, that's why your a nobody. People like Donald Trump knows the value of popularity. Popularity is a word which simply means a person who knows how to Market themselves to a group of people. If you cannot sell yourself to even be liked by a people, how on earth do you expect them to think like you, adopt your ideas, agree with you, join your cult, give your their money, do what you say, etc? It does not matter if you got straight A's in school and now your a Satanist with a philosophy major. Your ideas will not circulate if you do not have the means to sell yourself/idea.

There is this thing we used to do in high school to get more friends and be more popular [meaning many people being aware of our existence]: we make it so that people talk behind our backs, but we tell our friends who are not our real close friends to talk about us with their friends, or we talk shit about others to get them to talk shit about us. The idea behind that is herd mentality works like a charm. If everybody important on campus is talking about you – good or bad – then surely you must be worth talking about, for some reason. And it works.

Only our friends and the OG's might know this, but for the first 2 years when 352 came into the scene we each had at least 20 fake profiles in all over the internet and we actually spent our time talking shit about the ONA to get dummies [we call them "third parties"] to talk about ONA. What happens when people talk about ONA? ONA comes into their human conscious field of awareness. We did this for two hole years. There were times when we even used our fake profiles to act like we were getting into heated debates over the ONA with each other, just so dummies with an opinion can join in and talk about ONA. So it's very funny to me when I encounter a dummy online that tries really hard to attack the ONA in these forums and hate on it: because we did that too and look where the ONA is now. Keep doing it dummy. The funny part is I don't have to pay you real haters to work for me. My efforts are duplicated, you dig?

Another thing we do is something I later called "Forced Association." That is when you are manipulated to emotionally and psychologically associate yourself with one of two parties. If done right, you have no choice but to pick the choice intended for you to pick. In practical terms on campus, when you are a new girl and you are working your stuff to get known, you first ckeck out who on campus are the popular kids. Then you figure out who on campus are the kids those popular guys do not like, cannot possibly like, pick on, hate, tease. One you locate those victimized individuals, you fake hate or fake a fight or argument with those rejects in eye and ear distance of your group of popular kids target.

So from the poplular kids point of view you see some reject you already hate emotionally and some new person/girl who is getting into minor fights with this reject. The question is: which of the two parties do you emotionally and psychologically side with? You have no real choice but to cheer for the person hating on the guy or girl you don't like in the first place.

People wonder why ONA juniors like Shugz would spend 2.5 years trolling and picking fights with a reject like Blackwood. Why was she doing it? Even if the ONA teaches culling and other extreme ideas, when you have a smart ONA person pick fight a retard of retards, who do you side with emotionally? Who do you want your peers to see you side with? The retard? Why was Shugz trolling and poking at the green slimy calimari cult for a year and a half? The question is what were the end results she was trying to make happen. Which group of people was her actual intended target audience? Which forum of people was her actual intended target?

Another thing we did internally inside the ONA was target the "popular kids" in the ONA: the shot callers. This was because we had ideas of changing and evolving the ONA. It doesn't matter how smart your ideas are. If you are an unknown nobody to a group of people, nobody is going to buy your ideas. We could have spent years tring to convince the that the "policies" we wanted to implement in ONA was “good.” This would have done nothing. Instead we just bypassed everybody on “campus” and just went for the kill. Don’t mess with the soldiers, aim for a quick decapitation strike. If you want to change things, the only way is to rub elbow grease with the boss. That takes social skills. You should have learned your social skills for life on campus in high school, and in the social structure at work. We just trolled forums to locate the ones in the ONA that actually called the shots.

It’s actually funny what we did. Three years ago when we came online we were ignorant of who was who in the ONA. We had to find the shot callers or call them out. At the time Kayla and our friend Sinistar and some others back then were really into trolling. Kayla and me come from a culture of trolling people since 2004 on Myspace. So what Kayla did was pretend to be Blackwood in all these internet forums while Sinistar pretended to be Blackwood’s friend Wynter. The only thing we knew about the ONA structure was that they really hate Blackwood. So Kayla and Sinistar as Blackwood and Wynter in these forums would put on a realistic act and talk shit about the ONA, while at the same time making the real Blackwood look like a total retard. Anyways, it came to pass that their Punch and Judy act ended drawing out somebody named “Darklogos” who joined one of these forums to defend the ONA from the insane rambling of Blackwood who was actually Kayla. Shugz was pretending to be Blackwood at the time on Usenet where she got acquainted with Kori H. Meanwhile me and another ONA associate I met were pretending to be Blackwood writing and publishing books and starting up cool new Blackwood sites.

At first we thought Darklogos was just a random ONA member, so we dismissed him and we kept up our “pa-trolling” for the right people. But a few months later we noticed that in one of our comments Thoth of THEM had left a quote where this same Darklogos was quoted saying something for some reason. But Thoth left the web address of where this quote had come from, which was a Myatt y-group: [Duh!]. So that was when we got our clews. First Darklogos was a somebody in the ONA social order if he is being quoted. Second it makes sense that we’d find the shot callers in a group entirely dedicated to David Myatt. That was when my work officially started, which was to go into this group, find Darklogos, and establish a bond, to begin inspiring and influencing change in the ONA from the top down. After a while of writing at this blog, it wasn’t hard to find the shot callers, they found us actually. Later “Audun” [Beesty] and Kayla hung out together in the emails doing a few things.

Social skills is only the initial foot in the door though. In the realm of real business social skills makes or breaks your business because it opens up doors of opportunity. But that is all it does. What you do behind that door of opportunity will either make you a million or bankrupt you. Pitching cool sounding ideas in business, politics, and warcraft does not get you far.

I love the idea of a military and war. Because out in the battle field as a general in charge of an army, if your idea sucks, it means you come back to me as empress not only losing my entire army but you lost me territories of my inherited empire. In that moment of failure there is nothing you can say to excuse yourself or cover up your reputation. You failed, and the results of your actions is the proof of the failure. You only have two choices at that moment: to maintain your honour and kill yourself in front of me, or let me execute you for violating my trust in your foolish ideas.

But outside of war, politics, and business, failure is easy to cover. Talk with big words and your ideas pass as great ideas. Most of the dimwit public don’t even need proof that those ideas are worth anything. If your ideas fail, you explain yourself, make shit up, and invent another set of ideas. Being in the business of making and spreading ideas, I know what ideas are worth and good for. Worth: shit. Good for: Manipulation, Inspiration, and Influence. If you are trying to pitch an idea to me, there are only three things you could be possibly trying to do with me: Manipulate me, Influence me, or Inspire me into a direction in your favour.

What is of more critical and practical value in war, politics, and business, are not ideas, but skillful action based on wisdom [experience] that bears skillful fruit/results. I don’t care if you were homeless and dropped out of the 6th grade, if you became a self made millionaire and you said to me: “Here, this is my methodology, take it and if applied you will get the same results I did.” I would pay my savings for that shit. If you were a general from an enemy army which I captured and admired for your skills in war, as empress I would give you rank and land and whatever you asked me for if you led my army, fuck ideas and pitching tactics to me, all I want to see is the end fruits of your wisdom.

Knowledge is meaningless if it cannot be applied via wisdom [experience] to bare fruit. I don't give a shit how much you know more than me or what college you got your papers from. It don't mean shit in the real world of human experience. Knowledge stays in the head. It's good for talking with and making you look knowledgeable. People in the business of accumulating success, wealth, prosperity, friendship, power, influence, cares more for practical wisdom that bares results.

Getting our WSA foot in the door of the shot callers in the ONA was just the initial opportunity. We threw out the small talk and idea pitching and just straight away work on putting what we knew about business, marketing, and social skills to work so that our results and fruit of our deedful cultivation does our talking and convincing. No words have to be exchanged. Just give us the opportunity to prove ourselves. Give us 3 years. If I suck and have manifested nothing, throw us away. If we succeed, let us continue our work and just support us, because we all benefit mutually. A loyal general work the battle field for the glory and fame, but also for her people, empire, and empress.

It is because of how I personally do my work to expand and evolve the ONA, that I ultimately judge others by. I never had to hold conversations with anybody to buy my ideas. I never had to attack weak spots in the ONA, I never presented myself as being better than anybody in the ONA before me. I minded my own business with my friends here and for 3 short years we quietly worked to bare results. The results do the talking and convincing. This way everyone clearly sees the results, no one is disrespected, and everybody mutually benefits.

So it is the same thing I expect of others. When you come to me to pitch and idea you have that will make the ONA better than it is, you at that moment make yourself a failure in my eyes already. If your a clown with a butt load of negative opinions the ONA, show me using results that who you are and what you have manifested in life is better than what AL has done. AL/ONA has been doing his thing for 39 years. So give me a resume of your past 39 years and list me the results of your actions. If your opinions are worth anything in the real world, it must have bore fruit. Show me the organization you created and ran for 39 or 40 years and let me see the results of your ideas applied in the causal realm of cause and fruit.

But you can ask me in return: "Well, what have you done for the past 39 years?" I did something you couldn't: change the ONA in 3 years from the top down. I know how to market myself to the right audience. I know how to sell my policies via my results, and I know how to market my ideas to generate measurable and visible results. You still impotently throw your tantrums, assert your ideas. Your impotency frustrates you. All you clowns are good for is work as third party advertising builboards by your constant incompetent yet passionate dislike of the ONA. I don't understand what the problem is? If you hate the ONA, what is stopping you from making some organization that is better than the ONA. Or what is stopping you from changing the ONA? Your incompetence.

You clowns make my job easier. Before my friends and I had to clown the ONA ourselves. We have better thing to do with our time. I actually appreciate your clowning work these days. Third party talk via word of mouth not only sells products better than ads, but it's free. Walmart doesn't really have to do many commercials. People talk about it. It's shit talk most of the time. But its also human nature to be curious. Its out of curiosity that the general public visits WalMart. Things are cheap there. People into saving money will thus end up shopping there regardless of the negative mouthing. Facebook doesn't needs to do ads. There users do it by word of mouth. Microsoft knows the power of word of mouth third party talk and constant exposure to brand label/name: Windows Live Space, and the entire Windows Live ecosystem. Google knows the power of thirst party yapping: Android Phones & G+ social network. Apple Inc knows the power of third party yapping real well: iPhones, and the whole Apple stuff ecosystem. You yapp on your iPhone to your friends all day, or actually text them, your continuously exposed to the Apple logo daily, you remain a loyal customer and make others your have raport with into loyal costomer.

You clowns are fucking ignorant to an absured level. And your incompetent. The more yapping you do about ONA, the more others will be familiar with the letters ONA. Human curiosity does the rest of the work. ONA is searchable. ONA product sells itself to its intendend market regardless of the negative yapping. Your yapping and posting, and the third party talk you generate makes sure that your blogs and forums is saturated with the brand name/logo: ONA. One of our old WSA friends 3 years ago once told us regarding clowns talking shit: "Worry when they stop talking." I remember that proverb ever since. It's the worst fear in a popular girl's campus life: when people stop giving a shit about you to talk even talk about you. The cool thing is the average human brain can only juggle around 3 things at the same time. If people are talking and thinking, worrying, hating ONA, ONA is 1 of only 3 things in there dummy heads. That's better than getting prime time ad-space.

There is this other things we use which we learned indirectly from AL. When AL writes, he usually articulate and intelligent in his ONA MSS and in those other writings under his other name. This goes along with a concept we term "resonance," or like attracts like. What happens is that it becomes visible that AL's style of writing attracts a large amount of very articulate and sharp thinking members. In the general Sunculture of Satanism its generally known that most ONA associates are intelligent and often described by both members and non-members as being a "cut above the rest."

A while ago Kayla and Shugz took this idea and turned it into an entire long term strategy they call the "Brain Drain." This strategy involves us and encouraging other ONA associates to write or presence the ONA always in an articulate and intelligent manner to draw out those who resonate with that quality. Over time, the target subculture is drained of its sharp thinkers, leaving the retarded and brain dead for the target subculture. This long term strategy of course requires the target subculture to be aware of the ONA. Which then falls back to social skills, human interaction, public relations, PR, and third party talk. Amazingly this seems to slowly be working because if you go to certain Satanic social networks and you just do a quick catalog of all of the articulate and sharp thinkers, you'll end up seeing that a good half of the people you get are either ONA or inspired and influenced by ONA. Its long term because, 10 years from now when you have the ONA side by side the remains of what was Modern Satanism, and one is chalk full of drooling autistic grown children, while the other has all the brains and thinkers that make sense, which one will you associate with?

Final Remarks

So essentially what we have learned from that last part of this essay is that ideas/opinions/thoughts or what is referred to as "knowledge" is worthless. In the same sense that money which is locked up in a bank vault is worthless to the bank and economy. It must circulate and fluctuate between debt and profit. That money must move between person to person generating measurable results: either Debt or Profit. That's how we know money is doing its job. You go to the bank for a money loan, you get the money and you also generate debt. The bank makes a profit, but the nation at the same time is affected by inflation, etc. But that money must move and generate some sort of measurable real intrinsic result.

Memes work in the exact same way. Memes must circulate – "fluidity" – and they must be able to generate real measurable results in some way: Inspiration, Influence, Control, or Manipulation. Just as we can say that $1000 is worth more than $100 because the former generates more Debt/Profit, we can also say that a meme which moves from person to person which has the power to induce Inspiration, Influence, Manipulate, and Control, has more value than a meme that can't do those things. And the more causal results a meme or memes has the power to generate the more Value it has. But that Value is rooted in or dependent on its Market Fluidity.

The functionality of a meme has nothing to do with whether the meme is "true" or "false." Nature makes no distinction between what is real and what is a mental illusion. It doesn't matter to Mother Nature if you are an atheist and believe sex is mechanical or a theist and worship some Goddess of sex. All she cares about is that you do the deed and procreate to continue Her. It is not a crime in Nature for a bug to induce illusion by using cloacking and camphlage bio-technology. What Nature gives a shit about is if such methodologies improves or induces thriving in its creatures. Thus continuing Herself. Collectively human culture does not care whether Christianity, Islam, or Buddhism is true or false. The question is does it induce a thriving of the sector or population in question? The answer is yes, Christianity and Islam do increase thriving in their respective spheres of influence. Islam took a population of sand suckers and turned them over time into a civilization that gave us out numbers, our Algebra, the names of most of the stars in the sky and a large population of rabid Jihadists. Christianity took the lost and chaotic mass of "post-Pax Romana" when the empire fell and created cultural stability, population growth, regeneration of human culture/kingdoms, etc. This has nothing to do with whether ideas that make up such memplexes are "false" or "True." What matters is that such memes – whether idea of bits of culture – DO something. What a Buddhist or Brahmanist looks for in these things is the end results. We just the end results manifested.

If you have a lot of ideas written in a book, and those memes don't circulate, or do not pass from person to person, and do not inspire shit, influence nobody, then your ideas and book is worthless, even if you came out of Cambridge.

Those humans on this earth who live more in tune to Nature – which includes all our human ancestors – valued what caused them to thrive over dead ideas. They all gave importance of their indigenous tradition and culture they inherited from their Old People. Inherited meaning getting it via example, visually, aurally, and orally. Remember for most of our human past, writing was not a big deal. If the written word were so important, our ancestors would not have come as far as they did to have made us.

Yet we in our modern society live backwards. We deify dead men, and lifeless dead idea that live in books and the dusty halls of universities, and we shun and throw out our Old People. We dismiss them out of their place in our human cultures they gave to us and say they are senile, demented, and unsound of mind and power of thinking. And so in the Occident we wonder why we do not have a culture and tradition anymore. Why our cultures are dead: because we condemn our Old People to death simply for being old. In the West we literally put them into death row. But we call it names that makes us feel better. Its still a place they are locked up away in where they will spend the rest of their life until they die.

With no Old People, we fill in that void of a living center of tradition and culture by putting priests, Joseph Smiths, Russel Tazes, Marxes, Maos, as our substitute elders, wise one, tribal chiefs. Who most often lead us to our slaughter or psychosis for their own profit and power.

We today – in the comfort of a working super power – deify ideas and big worded knowledge. Steven Hawking is a divine profit of black holes. Newton is the Imam of gravity. Einstein is the Bodhisatta of relativity. When in ancient times when our ancestors were living in forests and actuallu working in farms and fields to thrive, such lofty ideas a black holes, gravity, and quantum mechanics did shit shit feed your ass, protect you from that spear chucking tribe across the jungle, neither did they teach you how to establish a city, irrigate canals to water fields of crops, raise your children into healthy adults, or make the best out of our short and simple human existence. These theories on practical human terms are as worthless as gods. But we glorify the Fathers of our great lofty useless knowledge. And we barely have a functioning relationship with our real father who actually gave us life.

In the West we have become a people who glorify the dead and shun the living. We uplift dead ideas, and reject practical wisdom. We believe our cities and urban creation is the world, and we treat Nature as if it were something dead and not of the our human world to be exploited. In the essence of things – beneath the facade and charade of the West – everuthing about us is inhuman and lifeless. Some of us have to engage in extreme sports just to feel alive. Otherwise in our everyday mundane life we are like lifeless drift wood, drifting between our bedroom and work place. Then we die.

Then its funny because in this culture of lifeless driftwood, some of us feel as if something is wrong or not right. Some of us actually feel dead. And we don't know why. We can't figure it out. We can't get ourselves to understand that if we are human, and we are conditioned to live unhuman, we will feel that something is wrong. And yet many of us still hold onto our dehumanizing religions, our dehumanizing political systems, our imporverishing economic systems, our dead great men, and our lofty smart sounding dead ideas, that really don't do anything.

There is a way out of this end product of Magian Ethos. Not every human and people suffer from the life numbing disease of Magian Ethos. But this Western "thing" which we are in is a wall prison with no windows. The walls are psychological walls of ideology, language, worldview, dead ideas, and ignorance of the world outside beyond those walls. Even if other people don't suffer from this Occidental dis-ease, we can't see those other humans to understand what is wrong with us, or learn to fix what is wrong.

Which is why I personally like the ONA & Myattian Weltanschauung. It is not a way out of this prison, but it is a window in our prison cell. And looking through this window we realize an alternative to the "reality" of the prison we were born and conditioned inside of. Which is when it does what it is supposed to do: Inspire to act, to break free somehow to fine Liberation. Not just free from some state or money system. But Freedom from this invisible mind and heart and life numbing unhumaness of our current Western mode of existence. Free so that we can once again find our way back home where we belong: as Humans, with a living Humanness, a creature indivisible from its Mother Nature and Father Time that made it.

A GUIDE FOR THE NEOPHYTE

A Guide For The Neophyte

The Traditional Form of the ONA is divided into 7 Grades or Levels or Degrees. Each Grade has its own set of tasks, secret tasks, trials, ordeals, etc. Each Grade is fixed to an approximate amount of time. For example a task of the Second Grade requires the Initiate to undertake a six month to year long Insight Role. It takes one to two years to complete the First Grade of the Seven Fold Way. "Anton Long" is 60 years old, and he is only at the Sixth Grade, which is Grandmaster or Grandmistress. Therefore, there is no such thing in the ONA proper as a 20 year old Adept. There is also nobody Alive or Living in a mortal body that can claim to have the Seventh Grade of the 7FW of Immortal. Certain groups of people who are referred to as "Old Guards" or "OG," are at least at Grade 3 of the 7F Sinister Way who have some sort of connexion to Anton Long.

I personally like the very first task a beginner or Neophyte of the First Grade must do, as the ONA MS "A Complete Guide To The Seven-Fold Sinister Way" quickly states: "The first task of a neophyte [the word means "a beginner; a new convert"] is to obtain copies of the various Order MSS which will be needed. These include: (1) Naos – A Guide to Becoming an Adept; and (2) The Grimoire of Baphomet, Dark Goddess."

I like the First Task because it's funny to me. You see in the 80's and 90's when the Neophyte was instructed to "obtain copies of ONA MSS" that meant a handful of documents such as the Black Book of Satan, and Naos. The funny thing is "Anton Long" is a compulsive writer. He does not stop writing. So each decade that passes by adds a new pile of ONA MSS to be read. In such a way that NOW – as of 122 YF – when the task says "obtain copies of ONA MSS" you're talking about 5000-6000 pages worth of JUST Anton Long's stuff. It took me 2 whole years to find and read everything. I know it also took RA of The Temple of THEM 2 years also. So there is no way in hell that anyone can complete even the first Grade of the 7FW in a month or two, unless you're a speed reader. That's not counting the other aspects of the Neophyte Grade.

Today the term "ONA MSS" does not exclusively mean just AL's stuff. It means ALL Manuscripts associated with the Order of Nine Angles, which would include the various writings of the various ONA Nexions, I.E.: THEM, SPTO, L316, WSA352, T88, etc. To better understand something, you need to be able to see it from different angles, and that's what these nexions do. They show you their unique and different ways they see and understand the ONA. Like Attracts Like as they say. Unfortunate for the Neophyte, because Nexions like THEM and WSA352 take after Anton Long and don't stop writing. The Temple of THEM over the decade or so of their existence has amassed over 2000~3000 pages of stuff. WSA352 in three years has amassed over ~1000 pages of stuff. Looks like L316 takes after AL and Company also. THEM and 352 both have made a commitment to bury the ONA under a thick and complex blanket of ONA MSS. Personally, I want ONA to beat the 25,000 pages of the Tipitaka. I'll do it myself if I have to, but fortunately THEM will help me.

So because of the "evolutionary" or – Progressive – nature of the ONA growing and adding to itself, in the very same way Science grows and adds to itself, the modern aspiring Neophyte has a shit load of ONA MSS to read through. It may sound like a weird contradiction for a group like ONA who makes such a big butt deal out of Action and Cultivation of Deeds to the stupid and ignorant, but this can be easily explained. It's called: Orientation.

Before you know where to hike to, you first need to study the map. Before you know what direction to move into, you should try to figure out your relative position to that direction to make the necessary changes. Before you can drive to your end destination, you first need to at least look at a map. Before any war is fought, there are months and months of study, planning, intelligence gathering, and getting to know the terrain. Before you can fight people on the streets, you first need to study your Muay Thai. We all go through some kind of Orientation, Briefing, or Run Down when we become associated with some type of coherent group: corporation, CIA, Peace Corp, military, politics, family, whatever; where the customs and observances of such group are explained.

I'll give an example of an incident of Orientation in my own family. Six years ago or so, my favorite uncle who is the very religious one, asked my grandmother [his mother] for a divorce with his wife. My grandmother asked him why he wanted a divorce, because divorces ruins our family reputation, and the reputation of the elders who paired the two together. My uncle said that he wanted to divorce his wife on account that 1) She was caught cheating on him, & 2) She is medically infertile and can't give him children to pass his bloodline and family name down. That was all that was needed. The elders called his wife an infertile slut and a month later my uncle was living with my grandmother, since he gave his ex-wife the house as compensation of some type. She was happy. I never liked her anyways. After a month of his divorce my uncle disappeared into the "jungles" of Cambodia for a whole year and some month.

I thought he was on some sort of religious pilgrimage or something, but my aunt-mom told me that this uncle left to go find a better wife, one that can give him a baby. He was flying back and fourth, during which time he bought a new and bigger house to prepare for his future wife and children. While he was away I baby sat the new house and we furnished it. I don't know how this international thing works, but it was two years I think before his new wife was allowed into America.

My 80 year old grandmother had flown over seas to meet up with the family of my uncle's future wife. This uncle by the way is 53. She came back and all of us cousins and aunts were very excited and curious about this other family and what the new auntie looks like so we bombed her with many questions. Grandma looked irritated and told us to not talk about it. She said the wife looks normal, they like each other, and the family is rich and many of their family members are in high positions. After then she told us to drop the subject. We all knew something wasn't right because she didn't look personally satisfied with the wife.

Anyways my uncle finally came back with his wife, and for a month or two he tried not to tell anyone he was back or call us to visit him to check out his new wife. Our oldest aunt [his oldest sister] got very upset and disrespected because he had not called her and the rest of the family to see this new wife. It's not right to bring someone into the family and not introduce the family to the person. My uncle said in private that he was sorry, but he was nervous about introducing his new wife to her [the oldest aunt] because he was afraid that she and his other sibling would not approve of her and make him divorce her or something. The oldest aunt told him that they were siblings and so whatever makes him happy makes her happy. She asked why he would think she would not approve. He said: "Just meet her, you'll see."

So he finally invited us to his new house to have dinner with his new fresh of the boat wife. On the way there my grandmother had said to all of us cousins and her children: "I'm old. I'm going to die soon. Give me some peace please. Don't say anything to her or start trouble. As long as they are happy together. He wanted to marry her. I didn't pick her." That's when we knew something was really not right. All of us cousins started to gossip text each other. One of my cousins next to me who was still in high school gossip texted me: "I bet you he married a peasant girl!" My uncle was clever though, because he told his siblings and grandma that she was already pregnant. Which meant that even if we didn't like her, because she had uncle's baby, she was technically family.

My whole family was all speechless when we sat in his new house with the uncle's new wife. She was straight up ghetto peasant stock ethnic Cambodian. We're Ethnic Thai-Chinese. We have light skin. Our Chinese grandfathers and great grandfathers came from a genetic stock where they were built huge and tall. Some of them were 6 feet tall. They also all have tall sharp narrow noses, they also have big eyes, and brown hair. In pictures and in real life, they look like they were mixed with Caucasian, and the ones passed in their pictures, look Causasian. So all of us came out with those genes and phenotype. Our new auntie – her family nickname is auntie Ma – looked the total opposite of us. Her skin was at least 6 shades darker. Her body frame was large, not fat but big, whereas all of us girls in my family have small petite well formed frames. Her language was foul, the way she said her words and the words she used was low class, and she had zero culture or manners. Everytime she talked she yelled, like we were all in a different room away from her, even though we were on the same sofa with her.

Her lack of manners and culture showed as soon as she we walked in the door. In my family's culture and almost all people I know in our culture when we meet an elder or even someone of the same age for the first time clasp our hand and say a formal greeting to each person. This one just yelled out as we walked in: "Hey! Come on in!" And by the time we met her, she had already known most of the aunts and uncles names. So as she was yelling in her barbaric language she used people names and she used personal pronouns which are two thing nobody I have ever met form our culture and ways do. You do not use people names or pronouns. It's disrespectful.

Now my uncle had spent most of his money on the divorce, new house, and new marriage wedding, so he had no extra money left to furnish his house. Our family told him not to worry because we'll buy the furnishing and decorate his house for him. Which we did. I personally picked out a lot of stuff, and I spent my own money stocking each bedroom with at least on laptop so and desk so the new auntie can go on youtube.

The very first thing this new auntie said to us directed at nobody specifically was: "Who picked out all the furniture and decorated the house?! I don't like the colors! And I don't want laptops, I want a big desktop computer with big screens! I can't see anything with those things." I was personally shocked in an offended way. My aunts and uncles used their own money to furnish "her" house, and I used my own money to buy those laptops. I thought laptops would be best so she can bring it into the kitchen with her. I didn't say anything though, since she was older than me and since she was my uncle's wife, and also since I actually have things like culture, manners, and consideration.

Later via our international gossip network [CIA: Cambodian Intelligence Agency] the aunts and other uncles had learned that her family isn't a real rich family. They were fake rich. We found this out from one of our in law uncles who is a man of proper culture and family. This uncle had asked auntie Ma for her pedigree, Breed, and relations. He asked her to give him family names and city and province their blood and breed comes from. So auntie Ma names the province and town her grandparents came from, and said that her family was a hard working family that did not work on farms. Back at grandma's house this in law uncle told us he knew exactly the blood and breed her people come from. He said that the people of the town she named is a stock of beggars. They are known to not work and to just beg for money. The elders over seas confirmed this uncle's assessment, and said that the people of that town were descendents of a breed of beggars who sided with the Communist during the revolution. From our international gossip network we learned later that after the revolution auntie Ma's parents just found a big abandoned house of a noble family murdered and pirated it, which was how they became "rich." This was common after the revolution actually. The elders over seas had proof of this because they said they once knew the family who once built and lived in that house were of noble birth distantly related to them who were killed during the revolution or permanently missing.

For the first year we all tried to just get used to her, for the uncle's sake. The aunts and uncles just wanted this uncle to be happy. Auntie Ma had given birth to our youngest cousin who, thank the gods, came out looking Japanese like her father. This uncle looks pure Japanese, even though we have no Japanese blood in us we are aware of. Our little cousins, thank god, also came out influenced by her dad. She had proper culture and manners, and knew how to greet us right even before she could walk, by clasping her little hands together.

But Auntie Ma was on everyone's nerves and the highest authority in our side of the family [grandma] did not want to say anything about her or to her. You can tell when she comes over to grandma's house that there is friction between all of the aunts and her, and all of us girl cousins and her. We ignore her, and the aunts will say something smart at her in a smart ass way when they talk to her. The problem we all had with Auntie Ma was that she used a barbaric species of Khmer that we do not use; she habitually talks about everyone in our own family behind their backs to us [!] which we do not to; she uses people's names and pronouns, and she has no sense of paying proper respect to people older than her.

One of the aunts had an idea to fix Auntie Ma. They would introduce her and have Auntie Ma hang out with somebody in the larger family who had more authority than my grandma. This person we cousins call "Little Grandma." Little Grandma is only in her early 50's and her children are our age, so she's not a grandma in the English sense. We call her grandma because she is the daughter of our late Great Grandfather.

In our family or culture we have some person we call a "Takol" which means Pillar, whom we link ourselves to by name or associate ourselves with. This person in English terms is similar to what we might refer to as a "Pillar of the Community." He is someone who is very highly respected by said community, someone with a certain amount of influence and authority. In our culture, we can tell who you are, and how you are, what breed you are by your Takol you are related to. In the social setting of a clan, this Takol person is like the "central authority," or clan chief of all the families directly related to him. My late Great Grandfather was our Takol, and being so, his eldest daughter has a sort of authority in context to the actual "clan" than my grandmother. My grandmother is only the boss of those of us who came out of her. Little Grandma is the Boss of the bosses.

Little Grandma is very, very proper. There is a saying for her type of person where it is said she "does not break a Pali." Pali is the name of the language the Buddha is said to have spoken, but the word also means "Line, Thread, Seam, or Crease." The imagery behind this is that written Sanskrit literally looks like a String or Line or Thread of letters and words. In contemporary English we even use this same imagery with certain aspects of our language and words, where we call the responses of a forum a "Thread." That Thread in a forum has a certain thematic subject, and when we go off tangent to that subject we say we have "derailed the thread." To break a Pali means when your pants or clothing is ironed and properly pressed you mess up the crease and lines by wrinkling it. Or in English we can say that such a person "does not fall out of character." Little Grandma had her seams pressed Traditionally with her father beating the life out of her if she broke her Cultural Pali and upbringing. Interestingly she – like her late father – is a devout Christian.

So my aunts called Auntie Ma to go shopping with them and Little Grandma one day. I didn't go with them, since it was a "peer group" thing. I can imagine how it went, because I was at Little Grandma's house when Great Grandpa was still alive helping out in his back yard feeding the fish in the Koy pond, and I brought up my new baby cousin Auntie Ma gave to my oldest uncle finally. I told Little Grandma that for many years he seemed sad and depressed, and now he has completely changed as a person. Little Grandma nodded her head in agreement then looks around to make sure we were alone, and whispers very quietly in my ear so Great Grandpa can't hear and says to me: "Forgive me, I don't mean to talk about others behind their backs, but his wife is 'not like us' would you agree? I don't mean to offend you, if you like her. She is your aunt. I'm sorry." I looked around to make sure Great Grandpa was not around and whispered back in her ear: "One of the uncles and some elders over seas said that her family pirated the house they live in from a dead family related to them, and that their ancestors comes from that city of beggar breed." Her eyes goes wide and she gasps clutching her chest. But she quickly catches herself slip and says to me: "Let's talk about the fish grand daughter. I love your uncle, he is very happy, that's all that should matter right, shh."

Little Grandma is a very patient lady and is very soft spoken. She is talkative and like to laugh a lot, but is never loud or unbecoming. She also tries to see the positive side of situations and events and people. Even when her father was dying in the hospital she was trying to be positive. So I didn't hear her ever mention Auntie Ma. But my aunts kept bringing Auntie Ma to her house and to hang out with her. It was a few months after Little Grandma had been hanging out with Auntie Ma that Auntie Ma was given her Orientation by Little Grandma. I was there to watch because we were on our way to go shopping as a group way out in Palmsprings.

We were in the SUV when Auntie Ma in her loud and barbaric voice and language was commencing to talk about one of my own aunts behind her back to me and this aunt's own sisters in the SUV with us. My Little Mom was in the car with us got very offended and said in an irritated way: "Stop talking about me sister. I don't even talk about my sister behind her back about her private business!"

That's when Little Grandma pulled rank finally and said to Auntie Ma in a very angry voice: "I've had enough of you Ma. If you want to be fully accepted into MY Family as one of us, you are going to have to change as a person, because how you are now, is unacceptable! No one in my family uses the language you do, speaks in the tone of voice like you, or talks behind the backs of relatives. We all pay our proper respects to our elders, even if they are a year older than us. You have none of these things. I thank you for marrying my cousin and making him happy and giving our family a new child. But if you do not behave like us in a cultured way as we do things in My Family, I and those blood related to me will never accept you. You will always be an outsider to us." Then for the rest of the drive Auntie Ma got a very long lecture of things like culture, manners, and stuff. I had never heard anybody get their Orientation before. The shopping was awkward after that. I notice my little mom and aunts had smirks on there faces.

You're empathically retarded if you need such things explained and described to you. No in laws I have ever met, no matter what strata of society they came from ever had to be given an Orientation or lecture on how to be cultured, respectful, honorable, and mannered. They either came with it or if what they had was different from our way they naturally felt things silently and adapted to how we do things to fit right in. But Auntie Ma needed a person to lay the shit out for her. She needed to be told how to have manners, how to act and behave and carry herself in a descent and respectable manner because everything she now does and says bounces back on our family and our reputation. She needed to be told how to talk to and honour my grandmother, her husband, and anyone older than her. Auntie Ma excused herself to Little Grandma by saying that her parents were poor and could not afford a rich person's education or upbringing and that she honestly did not know that different people did things differently. She said – in a smartass way – that she thought we were all human with the same body parts, who eat and defecate like each other, so she assumed all people lived life the same way.

Auntie Ma has a very big heart and is very friendly, I love her to death. In a dialect of English the way she carries herself is said: "She keeps it real." But after that Orientation she knew what was what, and fixed herself. She actually learned to say "Ja," [yes for girls] with those older than her and clasp her hands when greeting people. Auntie Ma today isn't completely "house broken," but she fits in. And now like us, when she has the urge to talk about other people, she looks around and whispers in our ears, but she doesn't talk about related family anymore. When I act proper with her she affectionately slaps my arm and says she doesn't understand why I have to act that way with her, then she yells out in a barbaric manner to stress her point for me to eat something. I don't think she understands that after being conditioned to behave a certain way from birth, how we act is no longer an act. It's like a person who has been in the military for a very long time were to one day salute an officer he meets out and about and acts a certain proper or formal way with this officer. The officer then asks the properly trained private or soldier why he should be so inclined to act in such a formal manner. It's Culture and years of psychological conditioning.

But in no ways is Auntie Ma stupid. People who tend to "keep it real" – from my encounters – tend to be more aware and intelligent about life and how the outside world works. As an amateur anthropologist "studying" my aunts in their natural environment and culture, I would say that their culture [mine too] and sheltered way of life, makes them very, very ignorant about life and the outside world. I have had many moments where it was just me and Auntie Ma talking sans cultural upbringing, and she proves herself to be a very intelligent person. In English we would say that she is very "street smart." Especially when you consider how she came from a people who had lived thru a genocidal regime from beginning to end and not only survived, but acquired some substance to their name. She has uncles who are currently army generals. Most peasants remain poor. And if it weren't for help from our relatives in Thailand and America pulling strings, none in my family would have survived.

One of Auntie Ma's major flaws is she lacks something me and my family has which in Khmer is called "Klaj Jed." Klaj Jed is a species or type of Empathy. Klaj means to Fear, Be Afraid Of. Jed is a Khmer form of of the Sanskrit Citt [chitta] meaning your Heart-Mind, Seat of Emotion, your Feeling, and so on. It is something you learn or acquire and so when you have it they say you 'Jes Klaj Jed.' And when you lack it they say you 'Min Jes Klaj Jed.' Jes comes from the Sanskrit Jesa which means to Get, Gain, Acquire, Recieve. In Khmer Jes means to Know, to Get, Acquire, and Learn Something. Because with knowledge we gain it by acquiring it. Min Jes means to Not Know.

To explain this type of Empathy, let's say you had a best friend. You are a conservative republican and your best friend whom you really like is a liberal socialist. To preserve the Harmony of the friendship which you honestly value, Honour and cherish you must learn to Fear your friend's Feelings and Inner Being: his Jed. In such a way that even if you dislike liberal socialism and have unkind opinions about it, you refrain from saying something or creating a situation where your unkind opinions disrupts your friendship. You Fear your friends Feelings and Inner Orientation not only out of Honour and respect, but more so to actually preserve the Harmony, Coherency, Bond, of that relationship. Is a friendship or relationship worth losing over a petty opinion? Not if you truly cherish and honour it.

In English perhaps the closest word/meme which covers most of the same sematic field as Klaj Jed does, might be the word and concept of "Consideration," when we say: "Be Conciderate of others." But this don't mean the exact same thing. With Consideration you just respect another person in some way. There is no real defined end goal or Vipaka as Buddhism puts it: Causal Fruit. Klaj Jed has a defined end purpose or fruit to actualize: The Harmony or relationship between two people or a group of people, in order to preserve the Bond, Cohesion, Order, Coherency. So the old English admonishment goes: "Let not contention exist between a society of friends." In other words, I might have opinions about certain things particular to you my brother, sister, or friend, but my relationship with you is far more important to me than my petty opinions. We say that opinions are like assholes, we all have one and they all stink. Which is to say that opinions are in essence: worthless. But yet we like to wave our opinions around like a big dick in the sky as if they were heaven sent. To such an extent that sometimes we ruin family and friendships.

Klaj Jed doesn't fully mean to just be considerate. It means to adapt your self and way of doing things, or living, to the other person's Flow to preserve that Harmony and Relationship. It is said that a good wife knows how to Klaj Jed her husband and husband's parents, and that a good husband knows how to Klaj Jed his wife and wife's parents. For instance my grandmother when I was growing up, along with my aunt-mom would constantly remind me to Klaj Jed my uncle-father; since I was raised by him and my aunt-mom most of my life. Especially when I get angry with him and get into arguments during my early teen years. My grandma and aunt-mom would remind me to please learn to Klaj Jed my uncle-dad, because even though he is not my real dad or even a step dad, he does devote his time and money and emotions into me and loves me like his own natural daughter.

And so I learn to Klaj his Jed. To Fear his Feelings. You can't Fear or respect a person's feelings or chitta or inner being if you can't feel those things in the other person in the first place. So it requires empathy and inner reflection. A real example would be when I was growing up my uncle-dad, whom I call Big Dad [he's older than my step dad or bio-dad], gets irritated when I stayed up late and watch TV. When you learn to Fear/respect his Feelings you sense his irritation, and in feeling that irritation you reflect inside that you should turn off the TV so he doesn't have to tell you to turn it off and go to bed. This way it prevents a fight or argument and preserves the relationship. As Sun Tzu says: The best fight is the fight not fought.

In context to the ONA I also learn how to Klaj Jed others in the ONA, as a way to preserve things. For example I am not White, but there are ONA people who like and use German National Socialism who do not like minorities like me. Yes I do have my personal petty opinion about this. Nobody wants to be hated, especially over something I have no control over such as my skin color. I didn't asked to be born Asian. Actually I didn't ask to be born at all. If I had a real choice to determine what I could be, I'd be half Russian and half Japanese. I love Japanese culture, and I really like how many Russian girls I have met and seen in pictures look pretty even without makeup. Especially Ukranian girls. I figure to mix the Japanese blood in so that way if I were half Russian I won't grow up to be a fat babushka lol. But anyways, my relationship, friendship, Sinister Solidarity, link, bond, connexion with these people and the ONA at large means more to me than my petty opinions. Therefore I chose not to share or blurt out my petty opinions. We all have opinions about things. And so I adapt and adjust myself to try to keep the harmony of our ONA Flow by never saying or writing anything negative about Naziism or even White Supremecy. I go so far as to support it, and to uphold Reichsfolk National-Socialism and to defend the ONA's choice to use and incorporate any kind of racialism and National-Socialism.

I do this Klaj Jed thing with "AL" too. I try read all of his writings to get a feel for what direction he is going in. Then I try to feel his thoughts and feelings, by also reading his other writings under a different name. This way I know not to get in his way and to move in the same general direction he is. Do I have opinions about some things about some aspect of the ONA? Yes I do, but we all have opinions. It actually doesn't make me a big girl if I stated my opinions and pointed a contentious finger at AL for some reason. Tearing apart and destroying things is very easy and does not require intelligence. Give a hammer to a chimp and it will pound things with it. Give Christianity to a fool and he will pound others with it. It is Building, Forging, Manifesting, something that works and benefits yourself and others that is hard and requires a certain amount of intelligence. Give a hammer and chisel to an architect and he will in time turn a mountain into a cathedral. Give Christianity to a genuinely spiritual person and he will Build with it, find his own inner divinity with it, and find the same in others.

When we are Insensitive – according to the Heart/chitta – of others, their feelings, their inner orientation, we get in the way, we disrupt their flow with petty issues, and our actions becomes what in Buddhism is called Kamma Akosala which means Unconstructive Labour, or Unskillful Building. You give a perfectly drawn out blue print of a structure, a team of experience workers, to a fool and have him be the master mind and architect, and the structure will come out lopsided and fucked up. The end result or causal fruit or in putting foolish Insensitive words, opinions, actions manifest a destructive or negative end result. Give the ONA to a fool or pretentious know it all and he will pick out every minor detail about it he does not like. Give that same ONA to AL or me or any dedicated Niner and that ONA will be used to Build, Create, Manifest things with: a new culture, a new way of life, music, art, literature, etc.

Doesn't matter if you are super intelligent. Auntie Ma is very intelligent. But if the idea is to preserve family Tradition and Culture, then on a causal level of in put and out put, how Auntie Ma acts and behaves is kamma akosala. It is in the end – aeonically – destructive. She has to learn how to Klaj Jed. To be sensitive and considerate of other people's Inner Orientations. To be able to feel where my family desires to Flow, why we value culture and family Solidarity, and to move with that Flow in harmony.

And as a Novice of the ONA, like Auntie Ma you have to know when to be barbaric and foolish, and when to Empath the direction and flow of the ONA, to "fear" or respect the Inner Orientation, feelings, thoughts, chitta of others in the ONA. I know you will have your opinions about many matters you will come across. But if you actually want to be Accepted as a part of this family by those already in this family, then sometimes your petty and worthless opinions are best kept private to preserve the flow and go of the ONA. It might sound bad when I call our opinions petty and worthless. But what does it mean when we say: everybody has an opinion, and opinions are like assholes, it's looking to get butt hurt by dicks. I, like most people, have an orifice at the end of my digestive tract, but I wash it and keep it private. It takes a lot to talk me into showing it. But you'll see some real ass whores in these forums join a forum and expose their ass opinion in a thread full of "Assassins" who every body knows are dicks, and these ass clowns get butthurt. Don't be showing your ass to dicks if you don't want them poking at it!

The only time an opinion is worth something is when that opinion was made from something you can show and prove. Remember in grade school when we did show and tell? We actually had real things to show and tell with? It's the same concept. When something like America says that democracy works, we might have contentions with that or the opinion may be debatable but Amerca has had over 200 years of praxis to show and tell. When Russia makes the opinion that Communism works, we know for sure that opinion or statement or whatever is terribly full of shit, because the end results of their experimentation with Communism shows and tells something different. You can't show and prove an opinion by using some other person's opinions who has nothing to show and prove but other people's opinions. I say black holes exist because my professors is of the opinion that they exist, and anybody who disagrees is uneducated. My professor says black holes are real because Steven Hawking is of the opinion that they exist. Hawking says they are real, because he really, really likes black hole and has some sort of weird other worldly 30 year fixation on them. It's a cycle of empty opinions without anything concrete to show and tell. And we let these opinions destroy our relationships.

I can't help but feel as though a lot of Westerners that I have met for some reason value their useless opinions over communal, familial functionality. Over friendship, marriage, parent-child relationships, etc. Where they in one breath say: “Opinions are like assholes,” and in another breath blurt those same opinions and destroy their friendships, marriage, parent-child relationships, families, and communities. Like this conservative versus liberal thing in politics. Tea bagger redneck party versus the fucking ignorant librarian libertarian minority lovers. Their heated opinions go back and forth, and they each hold onto their opinions as if it were a matter of life and death. Then the end result is that we have a government that barely functions. But when it comes to giving themselves a raise, then shit, that bipartisan opinionating is worthless. Let’s put our differences aside, you hear them say, you redneck tea baggers aren’t so bad after all, we’re sorry we called Bristol Palin a slutty teenage whore of a mother. $170,000 a year for doing jack shit isn’t enough to live off of! Surely we can all agree on that?

In my own very big family opinions are also believed to be petty, but we really mean it. Therefore most of us keep our opinions to ourselves. I have never ever heard anybody related to me of the aunts and uncle peer group up say that Little Grandma and her side of the family suck because they are Christian. I’ve neverd hear the topic brought up. I’ve never hear anybody on Little Grandma’s side of the family say the Buddhist side is going to hell. They don’t even try to convert us or ask us to go to church. No one brings it up. In fact if you try to bring it up, one of the elders will tell you to shut up. But the reason why you are told to shut up is because such lack of Klaj Jed – of respect for the sake of solidarity – destroys a family. When I say family here I actually mean a “clan,” which includes your great grand parents, their siblings, their children, your grandmother’s cousins, your aunts second cousins, your fourth cousins or whatever they are called in English. All that in our culture is one Family. There is a reason why this family is held together: because you become prey to others without a family. Your family helps you out. And so the reasoning ultimately is a personal one. Personal in different ways to each generation. As an elderly family member you want to maintain that family cohesion because they will be the ones who will take care of you. As a middle ager in the family, your cousins and peers are your support and business partners. It’s from working with your cousins and peers that you have money to pay for your houses, cars, and things. As a cousin in the family, you want to preserve that family because your elders and family is your bank where you get your loans, your employer who gives you easy jobs, etc. If you value such kick backs – benefits – then there is a reason to shut the hell up when it comes to petty differences and disrespecting family members with our petty opinions.

There this saying a Great Grandpa said once I like a lot. The context it arose was when a older cousin of mine was sharing his opinions about family traditions and how this older cousin believes that it’s not right for us to disregard our own people’s religion for a “White People’s religion,” meaning Christianity. My grandma gets very upset and irritated and tells my older cousin to stop his talk and go away. One of the very old grandpas – who is my last Great Grandpa – named Great Grandpa Savudt [89 years old] was there. The great grandpa got very upset at my older cousins and he said: “You just came out of my testicles yesterday! I made this family with your grandpas. I held it together longer before your own mother was alive! Don’t tell me how to run a family. Go make your own family as big as mine, then you might have some business telling me how to do things. This is my family. I’m not dead yet. You trip over yourself walking backwards, understand?”

My older cousin said he was sorry and asked what the saying meant. Those older than you came before you, so they are “behind” you. You metaphorically have to look backwards to argue with your elders or with those people who have more experience with something than you. When you argue with someone older than you, or with someone with more experience – real physical experience and learning from trial and error – than you, you walk backwards and trip over your own stupidity, ignorance, and lack of experience.

I get a kick out of reading these thread in certain networks and forums I regularly read. Often you’ll see these new registrants try to “prove their shit,” by starting their interactions immediate with jumping into any debate or argument with people who are veterans at debate and who – so I have seen – are very intelligent, but also more experienced in life with their Satanist or just life in general. And I’ll see these fools literally trip over their own ignorance and lack of experience [Wisdom] and get their asses handed to them. They’ll run off in a cloud of asshurt. Which is the part I find amusing.

It’s like those of us in ONA who have read every page written by AL/DM, or those who have been ONA for 10 years or so versus a green slimy dick and his fat chick side kick who act like they know ONA. Even though the only thing they know about ONA is based on some non-ONA book called Liber Koth and whatnot. How do you know ONA when you have never read anything by ONA or don’t associate with anyone of the ONA? You see, each party can make opinions. One set is based on either years of experience and affiliation and/or studying the ins and outs of ONA's writings, whereas the other set of opinions has nothing to show and tell with. You trip over yourself walking backwards. Over your own ignorance and inexperience. Then make a fool of yourself to those who have walked before you.

Great Grandpa Savudt and his wife, we call Great Grandma, is the family's last people from the Great Grandparents generation. The Great Grandpa is 89 years old and he is still sharp as a nail, still walks, still drive a car. He doesn't know how to use all the GPS stuff we now have, but the man never gets lost driving. He knows the freeways of California like the back of his hand. He's been living in California with my late Great Grandfather since 1963 or so. It's because of this Great Grandpa that my whole family – grandmother and all of us – survived the revolution and found our way safely to California. He was our Sponsor into America. His story is really cool.

My Little Grandma is his niece in our culture and way of counting family. My Little Grandma reveres him because of what he went through to keep us all alive and together during and after the revolution. I asked Little Grandma once how he was related to me and why he was special or greatly respected. And she told me his little life's story.

She said that in the past Great Grandpa Savudt and his brother were two sons of a peasant lady who lived on property my own grandmother's adopted aunt-mother – the aristocrat – owned. My grandmother like me was adopted and raised by her aunt who did not have children of her own. When great Grandpa Savudt and his brother were young boys their mother died and left them as orphans. My grandmother's aunt-mom felt very bad for these boys so she took them in and adopted them also. They were older than my grandmother. Little Grandma said that they were so poor they only had two outfits to go to school with, but my grandmother's aunt-mom gave them clothing and things they needed, and urged them to stay in school and get an education. The two boys worked hard and graduated secondary school and got a scholarship from the government to study at a university here in America. Both of the brothers went to school here way back in he days and they ended up buying a house here. Both spoke fluent French.

When they graduated they returned to the country and with my grandmother's family connections Great Grandpa Savudt went on to become Head of Customs, and his older brother went on to become a Prime Minister of Cambodia. His older brother after office retired here in America. When this older brother had heard about a revolution, he fixed to go to the home country to fish his adopted mother and my grandmother out of the country, but his friends in the American government at the time and era said that he cannot go because it would be unsafe and they can't protect him. Great Grandpa Savudt asked his older brother not to go, and that he would go instead, but his older brother disregarded everybody and left. When he got off the airplane in his home country the Khmer Rouge recognized him as a past Prime Minister and shot him dead on sight at the air port.

Great Grandpa Savudt is related by virtue of adoption to my late Great Grandfather's wife who is the person actually related to me. This Great Grandma is a younger sister of my grandmother's aunt-mother. My late Great Grandpa and this Great Grandpa Savudt by blood have nothing to do with me. Both of the Great Grandpas were living here in America. They unfortunately had learned that Great Grandpa Savudt's older brother had been shot dead. There concern was now to fish everyone out somehow as fast as they could. So my Great Grandma contacted her relatives in Thailand since she is closer to them and did what she could. Meanwhile Great Grandpa Savudt left his wife here in America to go to Thailand to try and take people across the boarder to fish and smuggle our family out into Thailand. Since he used to be the Head of Customs in those old days such officers were doing "extra" work on the side to make extra money. This basically meant Great Grandpa Savudt had a lot of shady business partners in Thailand, Loas, Burma, and Vietnam, and that he knew how to smuggle things as big as tanks across the boarder.

Everybody was separated and scattered, but eventually Great Grandpa Savudt located everybody and got everybody safely into Thailand. Then our Thai side of the family gave my grandma money to buy a house in California since the family's money has been vaporized. Great Grandpa Savudt sponsored everybody. That's how our half of the family got to California in 1981. Then when the family was here, it was Great Grandpa Savudt and my late Great Grandpa who kept the family together and who taught everybody to acclimate and matriculate into general American society. I thought it was amazing when I heard the story because Great Grandpa Savudt and his late older brother literally laid their life on the line for a family they were not really related to. One of them died for it. But that's what I mean by having something to show and tell to support your opinions. We all have opinions and ideas, and thoughts about everything and anything. But when Great Grandpa Savudt gives an opinion about family matters, culture, and tradition, etc. His opinion is Law in the family. The only people who argue with him in a real way are some of the older cousins who are ignorant about what he has done. But he never talks or brags about what he has done or experienced with us. He has a humble nature to him, but he is very talkative and the type that likes to dance, sing, tell jokes, and take nothing seriously. He's the wise one with all the sayings I quote.

I had always assumed that he was "one of us." Meaning that I assumed he was noble in character because he was blood related to my grandma's family. When I learned that he was of peasant stock I was confused. So one day I tried to ask him about this matter without asking him about it directly. I had asked him one day when he came over to hang out with my grandma that if we get our "bpooj" [breed] from blood. If an aristocrat is noble because he was born noble. In other words, are we born what we are. Nature or Nurture?

He kindly in his dry humourous way explained to me that all that talk about blood is meaningless. He said: "If I put black clothing on you, did your blood give you that clothes or did I give you that outfit?" I said that he put the outfit on me. So he said: "Then that's how it is with breed. It's not the blood in our parents body that makes us who we are. It is how our parents or grandparents or guardians raises us, cultures us, nurtures us, all those years." He said that peasants are the way they are because their parents and folk just do not know any better. His late mother did not know any better, so he grew up not knowing anything about culture. But when he was adopted by an aristocratic mother, he simply had someone to follow the example of. He was exposed to something different and over time, assumed the outfit. Our parents and grandparents are indeed responsible for how we each become, but it has nothing to do with blood. He used the analogy of a Japanese Bonsai Tree. He said that those bonsai trees don't grow from the seed growing into the shapes they become. There is a caretaker who bends and twists the branches, cuts and prunes the leave, devotes time and energy into shaping that bonsai. Then in time, with that devotion given, does it become a beautiful bonsai. The only thing that matters as far as the actual seed goes is that if the seed the bonsai tree came from produced a deformed or tree with no branches, then you have nothing to shape do you?

I always thought those bonsai trees I see at China Town grew like that. In the past every time I walked past by the bonsai stand I think to myself: "Wow, the genes of those plants are superb! To have these pine trees come out so perfect! No wonder they are expensive!" Even when this Great Grandpa used this bonsai analogy for me, it didn't click, because I didn't believe people shape bonsai trees. I've never heard of shaping a tree as an art form. How do you do that? It wasn't until some of my older cousins who knew about my ignorance of bonsai trees had taken me to the Japanese Zen Graden in Burbank that I fully realized what the Great Grandpa explained to me. At the Japanese Garden I saw all of these big normal sized pine trees in the front part that were all immaculate in shape. At first I was thinking: "Shit, there's big bonsais. They get bigger like normal trees! I thought they were permanent midget trees!" Then as we walked to the back I saw these bonsai pine trees with all this bamboo sticks tied to their branches like crucifixes and stuff and I looked at my cousins confused. I was laughing at the trees, because to me they looked like one of those crippled people in the body cast at the hospital getting fixed up, with all the bamboo and wires, and after laughing at it I said: "What are all of those bamboos and wires doing on that bonsai tree what's wrong with it? Nothing looks broken on it?" Then after they laughed at me one of them said: "Stupid, you think those trees grow like that!?"

As long as the seed makes a normal tree, you do the shaping by devoting your time and energy to it, to craft it. And it is because of that time devoted and energy invested that a person becomes what they are. Therefore, whoever is doing the devotion of time and energy, shapes the tree. So then, we can ask ourselves: who devotes their time and energy into us? Our parents or the school system or the State? What culture are these things investing and instilling in us? And to what end and purpose? To whose interests? Who are you being shaped to serve? We all serve someone or something in life: our gods, our passions, our convictions, our compulsions, our beliefs, our opinions, our family, our friends, our jobs, our managers, our corporations, our banks, our universities and their ridiculous tuition fees for crap lessons, our political parties, our churches, our gangs, our politicians, our State? If we are not the type to be honest with ourselves, we won't answer that question truthfully. A better question to ask to get the honest answer is: Whom do you work for in Life? When you live your daily 24 hours, and you work your jobs, who do you work for? Who does that money go to? Follow the money trail and you'll come to a conclusion you wish to deny: you work for the banks, corporations, and the state. Your money goes to pay off debt from banks which you did not really need at all. Your labour for a company allows the manager to play golf on Mondays and to send his children to better schools than yours, and it makes Sam Walden a very rich man. Your tax money, and nearly half of the time you will spend working the best years of your human life, is for the State. To what end? What is your reward when you are too old to work? Social Security pensions? That is the End Purpose of your human Life? And you would look at me like I were some backwards demon for Living for my family. Like I'm not independent like you because I live with my parents unlike many of you who are individualized [re: independent].

Something very bad and sick happened to the West sometime during the Industrial Revolution. I can't put my finger on it and point it out exactly. All I know is that before this Revolution the West has a thriving human Culture. Many in America in fact. In every strata of class and status. From the lowly Irish immigrant to the Germans and the Jews that came here long ago. Now all that human culture is gone and in its place is some sort of unhealthy fixation on individuation and secularism. It's even so bad now that an old world mythos – the illuminati – has grown to hysterical proportions of a “cultural” idea of some group of men controlling the lives of people. It's as if the zeitgeist of the West knew it was sick and was expressing its diseased state via this mythos. If this illuminati exists, they have no influence over anything outside the West. Nations are falling apart in Northern Africa. Most of Asia is not individualized or secularized. They still live in large family groups, just like people still do in Latin America and the rest of the world. Just an interesting note, an ONA brother a month or two ago showed me a list of countries with the percentage of secularization versus tribalization, in decreasing order for, most secularized/individualized to most collective. The State of Israel top the list at 98% secularized/individualized. America was up in the top 4. Surprisingly Russia and France scored as low as Asian countries. I jokingly said to the brother that Israel scoring 98% in the world, gives a new meaning to the ONA term: “Magian Ethos,” don't you think? Things weren't even this bad in the 50's.

Recommended Reading For The Neophyte

I was going to just make a simple list of ONA MSS for Neophytes to read, but I went several pages off tangent talking about my Auntie Ma the Barbarian. I brought her up because of orientation, right!

Good for you guys that Anton Long is a compulsive writer! Because a modern neophyte of the Order of Nine Angles has his 39 years worth of writing to find and study which amounts to roughly 5000 pages. But reading those alone will never get you to get close to understanding the Mind and Jed [chitta] of the Man. You should also read his Reichsfolk and Numinous Way writing which is another circa 2000 pages. But AL is today not the only person in the ONA. There are ONA nexions and each with their own writing and slant on what the ONA is. THEM has about 2000 pages for you, and 352 has 1000. All together you as a Neophyte of the current ONA 3.0 [since we are in Phase Three of Fayen] have 10,000 pages to chase down and read, before you can open your mouth and make a substantial opinion about ONA. Keep in mind that others have walked the ONA before you and you will trip over your own ignorant ass walking backwards. I'm not talking about Nexus 352 here. The Temples of THEM and Lymphstone 316 are each around 10 years old. Magister Hagur's Sinister Pathway Triangle Order is around a decade old also. This WSA352 is merely a little sister in the family. We know our place, and give proper respect to those older and more senior than us.

The first set of books I would recommend a neophyte to chase down and go thru is the Black Book of Satan 1, Naos, and also my personal choices: the Black Book of Satan 2 by CB and the Septenary Tree of Wyrð; then also a MS called Otonen which just gives you an over view of the 7FW and the tasks and stuff, which you can find also anywhere. These books gives you a look that the Traditional Side/Form of the ONA. It gives you a look at where its Kulture and essence came from. It's roots, if you will. It is rooted in Dark Pagan soil. More in actuality than metaphorically. I say this because if you approach a book like the first Black Book of Satan, at the same time considering the original three groups that formed the ONA: Camlad, Temple of the Sun, and the Noctulians, and you think about a phenomenon called British Traditional Witchcraft, then you'll start to see things more clearly. No Mind is unconnected from the influence of its matrix of Time and Place, and Myatt's mind is no different. Growing up, even if he was not directly inspired in any way by them, Gardnarian and Alexandrian Wicca and all that Traditional Witchcraft stuff going on in the UK during that era made its mark. Makes you wonder why in those early days there was a “Grandmaster,” of a Traditional Satanism.

As it was explained in the Complete Guide to the Seven-Fold Sinister Way the Black Book of Satan is not dogma or unchangeable. It is a template or foundation of a Temple. You use that template to craft your own Black Book for your own Temple. In other words you Build your own shit on top of the templates given.

I personally like the mystical side of the ONA even though I don't speak a lot on the subject matter. MSS such as Beesty Boy's Black Book of Satan 2 and The Septenary Tree of Wyrd [The Sinister Tarot] gives me a means to stimulate that way of drawing out personal insights and "revelations" for the work of self-enlightenment. In that the poetic style of writing seems to have no overt meaning, other than what meaning you can draw out of yourself to give to them. So there is a balance between reading MSS with pre-written ideas by people and nexions curbed by the more personal work of inner alchemy of personal reflection and drawing out inner insights, which is why I personally love things like the Tree of Wyrd in Naos, pathworking, Black Book 2 and the book Tree of Wyrd.

Another set of books to find and get familiar with is Hostia 1, Hostia 2, Hostia 3, as well as Hysteron Proteron. These were written back in the pre-internet days of the 90's. They were in those days the secret side of the ONA, with all the secret tasks, and initiation ordeals. If you have read all of the above books and you understand the underlying essence and implications, than you should have come to realize that Anton Long created the ONA from the beginning to be a self replicating memplex. Hence: Self Initiation rite. Meaning that no Order actually exists or has to exist for a person to be ONA. To be ONA a person just by his or her will and choice to Live the Way of the ONA. Someone who Initiated themselves into the grades of the 7FW, who finds a partner as it is stated to perform rites with, who sets up their own Temples/nexions, or Satanic Orders as the Black Book of Satan 1 says. Who gives their private ONA Temple, Order, Nexion, whatever a name and symbol of its own, who finds their own Initiates and makes them ONA. In this way, if you really understand what you have read in those simple books, you will know that the ONA cannot die and was created to be recreatable through you as the Neophyte.

If you read those simple books, especially Naos, without even the other ONA MSS, you should know where I got my idea of Form versus Essence from because DM himself before I was even born I think uses the words Form or Causal Form and Essence. He even describes things like Traditional Satanism as Forms. And if you actually did your 6 months of Insight Rolling, you should have eventually come – via a practical method of induced gnosis – to an understanding of the difference between a Form and its Essence. Because in your Insight Roll, although you have changed as a person in every way on the outside, say from a conservative to a liberal, a slut to a frigid Christian, a nerd to a drug dealer, you should have come to realize that even when your Outer Form was different, that there was an Essence of you and in you that was Unchanged, which is doing the expressing of such Outer Forms. The Essence is not the Form. The Essence gives rise to the Form, in the very same way that Dharma gives rise to Yana, and Natural Phenomena gives rise to scientific fields. Even if a Yana or Fields of Scientific disciplines changes and new theories manifested, the Dharma or Natural Phenomena is the same. It is still science whether is it Newtonian or Einsteinian or QM. All I did was try to give what AL was already trying to say an extra twist with a Buddhist flavour according to how those ideas fizzed in my own mind and worldview.

In the old days you had to go chase all of those ONA MSS down. I had to also. I have all these PDF's. Today people have made it easier because all of those ONA MSS have been collected into compilations. So the next set of ONA MSS I would recommend any serious student of the ONA chase down and become acquainted with is: The ONA Archive, which is the whole nineangles.info archived in PDF. This houses all of the recent major MSS as well as classic older ones. Next is the Requisite ONA which houses BBS and Naos, as well as the Deofel Quintet, and some other ONA MSS. Together those two adds up to about 3000 pages. That'll keep you busy. In addition to this the Temple of THEM has collected and archived every ONA MSS written by an ONA Nexion in 4 giant volumes called the "De Requisite Exquisite Collection" [DREC]. Together they amount to over 2000 more pages for you to read as a Neophyte. These can be found at the Temple of THEM's wordpress.

But that's not all! There's more. I actually like Magister Hagur's writings. Hagur is from Belgium, he is 70 something years old, he speaks French and runs the old Sinister Pathway Triangle Order. If you are coming from a LaVey background, then I recommend Hagur's main works. Hagur is very intelligent and he came from a LaVeyan background of understanding Satanism, so his slant on the ONA is more symbolical meaning that to Hagur the Dark Gods are Archetypes of a Collective Unconscious. I love Hagur use of psychology in his writings. But he loves these Dark Gods and has produced a number of books entirely dedicated to them. The part I really like about Hagur's work is that he approaches ONA from a mystical angle or an esoteric angle. He builds on the ONA's Tree of Wyrd and gives it more meat and flavour. He gives these Dark Gods more mythos and character. Which I absolutely love.

I know I don't talk about my love for esoterica and mysticism, but I really like that stuff. Because its more "Buddhistic" in nature [sambudhi: self-enlightenment]. Because you are using all that exoteric goobledygook to stimulate your brain or heart to produce self born esoteric insight from within yourself. You basically take a drawing of 7 circles and 21 lines and create a whole universe with it and give it meaning that makes sense only to you. But like I tell my Five Percenter friends also into drawing out esoteric insights: You're only as sharp as the knife you are wielding. If you are retarded, culturally myopic, don't know shit about anything besides Satanism and death metal, and need to be told what to believe and how to think, then do yourself a favour and skip this shit and just go look for the pre-written ONA MSS. It'll do you no good. Books to look out for by Magister Hagur which I recommend and inspired me are: Becoming Another God; Dark Forces Words; and The Dark Gods In The Spheres And Pathworking.

Conclusion

Those manuscripts just orients you. They just point you as a Neophyte in the general direction. It's like if we were all on a voyage to meet up in the North Pole, and as a Neophyte you came up to me and asked me which way to walk. I'll point in a general northerly direction and say to you: "There dude, fucking North duh." How you get your ass there, what trials and pathei-mathos you will experience on the way is your own shit. Thers is only one North Pole technically. But there are an infinite ways to get there. None is the right way and none is the wrong way. The way is not the Point. The point is beneath the Way. You see it's got shit to do with the North Pole or walking somewhere for some reason. The point is the experiences, the ordeals, insights, pathei-mathos, and gnosis we each gain on our quest. And so when we meet up at our arbitrary destination we meet up as new people with stories to share, lessons to share which we have learned, insights we have collected, etc. Which is all really what the ONA was from its very beginning if you understand the Man and the Essence. It's just DM keeping a really long and bizarre journal of his personal Quest in life for 40 years. If you understand this much, then you know that this Myattian Thing we call the ONA does not stop at the ONA. It goes through Reichsfolk and The Numinous Way which is the Man's whole personal process of Self-Becoming and Self-Understanding, and that process continues through each of our own personal Quests.

It's one stream as the Buddha would put it. One organic continuous thing. Like a caterpillar, pupa, and butterfly is one single process of one single organism's self-development. In our ignorance we may see it as three different things. This thing we call the ONA is all just one Myattian Flowing. And when we resonate with that Myattian Flow, we flow with it and through us that Flowing continues. Like the Flame of the Olympic Torch is carried by one person on a quest is pasted onto another running a different quest somewhere. They are different people, on different quests, but in the same Olympics, and carrying the same Flame. Through us into each generation, step by step toward the future that Flowing changes. If the ONA thing is to ever make it into the future, its Flame will be carried there by us and those to come in front of us and it will and must change, or that flame will die of irrelevance and lack of imagination and creativity. Like the Nothing eating away fantasia.

These dummies in Mundane Satanism have a hard time understanding why their organizations are stale and dead or dying and can't draw in fresh new members. The OTO in 1905 or whenever it came out was alive, creative, vibrant with stimulating mythos, imagination, and creativity. So was the Golden Dawn in its days. Now its dragging a dead horse. It was something unorthodox forced into something dry and orthodox. Medusa staring at living people and turning them to stone. The Church of Satan in the early days when it was a dark church of the Subgenius slash circus act with its vibrant mythos, counter culture counter hippy shit rituals, back then was alive, was pregnant with life force and creativity. All that life is gone now. The Nothing crept in and killed it. It's a dead carcass with vultures around it today. The case of the Church of Satan reminds me of the Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy movie I really loved. It is as if a fun circus had been taken over by stiff neck Vogons. They just read their Vagon poetry and intellectually debate its meaning and merit. And they wonder why its dead, why it's a fucking ghost town.

I'll tell you why: same reason why everyone wants to come to America. They hate this country, but they can't keep their asses out of it. Those old world Vagon Communists in the stiff necked USSR ruled that country with a stale and dreary iron fist and their people fled for there lives to Europe and America. Have you seen any documentary on North Korea? I have. I can't remember what it was called. Such a "happy" Communist paradise, and you see old ladies, women, and children fleeing across icy rivers and into over fences of any other countries's embassies in huge crowds. Trying to leave their paradise in large crowd. Those fucking Sand Suckers pointing fingers at the Western Devil in their Islamic Shariah paradises, and their fucking people are leaving these places for Europe. It's the one thing of the West, perhaps one of the better qualities it has worth honouring: Freedom of Self-Expression, and its causal fruits. Fruits of Self-Expression being just the freedom to wear jeans, listen to whatever music or make whatever music, the freedom to love and be loved which we take for granted.

I watched a documentary that pissed me off and upset me so bad a year ago about a 15 year old girl in Iran. She was fatherless and her mother was always business working so she lacked a healthy amount of attention someone her age needs. So a 50 year old man gave her that attention. She was in the car with this 50 year old man and he pulls his thing out and tried to talk her into doing stuff with it. She says now and walks out. Her neighbors sees all of this. The man tells on the girl and says that she was soliciting sex from him and was giving him oral sex. The police interviews her neighbors and they said they saw her in the car and the man had his dick out. So the police "arrests" this girl without telling her mother, detains her for a couple days, gives her a trial with her mother still not knowing here her daughter is. They find her guilty for adultery and inciting a man to commit adultery and the judge orders her to be hung the next day. The mother did not find out until she came back from work to see her daughter dangling dead from a crane in their neighborhood since it was a public hanging.

Self-Expression is what things like America and Europe gives or has that draws people, not just the opportunities, and liberty. Self-Expression makes the internet what it is today. Its a medium of Self-expression where everything from companies to politicians to teens vlogging on youtube can just express who they are to whoever or to nobody. Just to have the freedom to express yourself. As opposed to adopting the Expression of others.

When you are such a control freak where you have to lock your memeplex down into some orthodoxy where people either have to accept your Expression or they are fakes and heathens and rejected, you kill the means for others to manifest Self-Expression; and in turn stupidly kill your own memeplex, relationships, whatever. Your control and orthodoxy keeps your fan-based market from putting into living motion their Human Creativity. Memes spread by usage: Fluidity. Think about it. I believe that all life from the lowly virus to the Living Cosmos share three basic qualities in common: Self-Expression, Self-Creation, and Self-Progression. It is through our Expression of our inner Self/Being that Creation arises, where we self-become. And it is this act of self-creation, via trials and errors, that we evolve or self-progress. In turn our progression gives rise to new Expressions of Self/Being. And the evolutionary cycle is repeated.

When I found found the ONA, I saw it with those eyes. I wanted ONA to not be a place where you just download Anton Long's ideas and talked it like a ventriloquist dummy. I wanted the ONA to be a means – a tool – for Self-Expression, Self-Creation, and Self-Progression. Where a person can use the ONA and its words or ideas to express their own self and mind. In the same exact way that I use the ONA to express my own mind, feelings, and worldviews. From that ability or freedom to use the ONA to express myself, I end up Creating myself, adding to myself. And from that self-creation, I Progress: change, grow, evolve. To me, as I used it, the ONA is a useful tool and means of my own Self-development or Self-Becoming.

And I love to see other people use ONA to express their unique self, mind, feelings, and understandings of things and the world. We do not always agree, but that's not the point. Nothing in nature is the same and fits into some orthodox mold. Uniqueness and differentiation is a praxis or condition of Life and Nature. In Biology we go so far as to say that differentiation is healthy. We say that genetic variation means a big gene pool, and the opposite means a sick gene pool. Memepool? Can we say that a memeplex with variation and differentiation has more power to stimulate, excite, inspire, and influence? Whereas a stale memeplex with a limited memepool eventually loses the ability to replicate itself and dies? This is just a goofy way to say: Creativity right? Creativity is a manifestation of Expression. You'll see that the time when something like the Church of Satan becomes a control freak with its memes and establishes some standard dogmatic belief, it got sick and started to die. And then you see the whole opposite with the ONA. The more people used ONA as a means of their own expression of Self, without fear of AL stopping them, without fear of being told they were doing it wrong, the ONA exploded, not with just new initiates, but with new ideas, now music, new writings, etc; a thriving, a multiplying. It exploded into something alive and thriving.

What's that one "axiom" in business, marketing, and dating that goes: "People love to talk about themselves. Let their love for self talk sell your stuff for you." That's like the first thing you guys should have learned from dating. The easiest way into our pants – not mine, the dumb ones – is to just let us talk about ourselves, and induce us to talk about ourselves through several beers. "Oh really, you like kittens, that's so interesting. Go on baby, me too, what color, waiter 'nother for the lady." Give people like me the freedom and ability to use that ONA to express ourselves, our minds, feelings, and random crap, and we'll write a thousand pages and talk the ears off a donkey. Then others will read what stuff I write and they'll be like: "Damn! That bitch can do all that with the ONA?! I gotta try this shit out!" But you can't do that with other thing like the Church of Satan or Islam. Only the special chosen son of Satan or self appointed Imam can use the religion to express his mind for people to accept. The minute you get inspires to do that same with these religions, they say your tampering with LaVey's stuff and Satanism doesn't need evolving because it's good already, or they kill you for being an infidel. What do you call that in business talk? Competition. What do you do with competition? Kill it. Why? Because they'll take your market. You want to monopolize your product and your market to maintain your special status as high priest, pope, imam. Because it's not about some dumb enlightenment or other people's desire to express themselves is it? It's about your status, adulations you get, love gifts, group numbers, membership dues, etc.

To me I see the ONA as being like a very long hallway with doors, the doors being different values, benefits, and things you can get out of ONA. Some of these doors are so distant away down the hallway that it would be silly to disregard the doors close to you to run down and open the doors down the hallway. The door that is the most immediate and directly close to us in this hallway to use, is that practical use of the ONA as a medium of Self-Expression and Self-Development. Don't be so far sighted that you can't see the doors just in front of you where your gaze is fixated on some distant fall of some system. But don't be so near sighted where Aeonics makes no sense to you. If you want to change the world, start with yourself, because that's literally where the "world" or society happen. When we say things like "society," or the "world," or "civilization," when we are outside around and about what we mean are those other people around us, the way those people live and do things, see things, and express themselves, in connexion and in context to and with you. The people is the foundation of what a Society or Civilization is. The rest of the stuff: the inanimate objects, the buildings, the factories, the farms, the streets, the parks, the government; these are all Expression of such people; or Causal Forms as we say in the ONA. Or as the Buddha puts it: As Within, So It Is Without. He tried to say this same thing with the Eightfold Path. That Path begins with Mind and ends with Experience. It takes 8 steps for what you entertain and give life to in your Chitta [Heart-Mind] to manifest into something you will Experience. It's like we had a box with a hole in the side. In side the box is a lantern and the hole has a sheet of red paper. That red color is projected Out onto a white wall. You do not like the red color of the wall and in your ignorance try to paint the wall with a different color. That color comes from within.

I watched this documentary about this tribe living on the island of Bali once. They weren't a tribe living naked in the bush. They were normal looking people. The documentary was about the old chief of the tribe who was preparing for his own funeral. Like many of our elders, this chief had red teeth because his mouth was filled with something we call "Malloo" which in English is Betel Nut mixed with lime powder and some type of leaf. It's a stimulant like chewing tobacco. The old ladies in my family like it. I tried it once. You take the leaf and you put chips of betel nut on in and put in a dash of that white powder and stick it in your mouth. I spat it out real quick. It tastes like bitter and tarty shit mixed with cement mix.

Anyways this chief was chewing that stuff and standing on a huge slab of stone. The stone was twice as long as he was. His whole tribe was pulling rope together to move this stone up a mountain where he was going to be buried. They used logs they place in front of the stone to roll the stone on. He was giving his people pep talks telling them they can do it since they were straining to drag that immense stone up hill. He was saying that he needs to be buried in that hill so his spirit can go back to his people's home planet. Then the documentary does a flash back to earlier moments before the stone scene were you see their village or township with all of these weird shaped houses. And you are brought into the long home of the chief's clan where there is draped two very long silk cloths that look like table runners with patterns on them. At the top of each cloth is an embroidery of a sun, and below are the patterns. The chief comes and explains what we were looking at. He said that the cloths were his tribe's family tree and that the two suns represent where his people came from. He explained that around 10,000 years ago his people came to the earth on ships from the Pleiades. They had come in ships that were shaped like their houses, so they made their houses look like their ships.

Who knows if their mythos is true or not. That's not the point. The point is that mythos is used to manifest a culture, and in that documentary you can visibly see the Outer Expression of this Inner Born mythos. In not only how they live their way of life, but in the shape of their buildings, and in them working like ants to get a huge cut stone up hills to bury their chief. You see it in their artwork, you hear it in their music, you see it expressed in their dance. Everything they do that defines them as a people and everything about their civilization, society, and city/town is an expression of an inner Essence they share. Burning their city down and throwing their sacred statues away will not do anything, because you only got rid of the outer symptom. The Cause within them, you neglected. And we see this with every people and culture. You see that Chinese architecture, art, music, society, etc, is an an outer Expression of something within. And we see it in our Vagon like cities and society in the West. In our boring rectangle shaped buildings and streets, in our long lines at the DMV, and bureaucracies.

People will use anything to express themselves. I was watching another cool documentary on a different tribe in Papua New Guinea. It was about a tribe of former head hunters who were “graciously” civilized by the White Man with their Catholic Missionaries. There were these warriors with boar tusks in their noses whining and complaining about how in the old days they used to make war with other tribes and cut their heads off and make house decor with them, but alas, those good days were over they said. All throughout the documentary the people who made the doc showed you the details of this people’s culture, their wooden art work, cultural wardrobe and costumes, and buildings. And you hear the Narrator in his English accent explain that this tribe lived in a part of New Guinea where everything was just mud and wood. There wasn’t even a big rock anywhere. All these people had to work with to build themselves a culture or a “civilization” was mud and wood and maybe some bird feather and animal bones. And it shows in their human desire to express themselves. They all wore mud on their bodies as artistic tribal markings, had wooden beads, and statues of their ancestors made of wood, fearsome spears that were just sharpened sticks, long homes made of bark and tree leaves, and their “streets” were wooden planks because everything was wet and muddy [they lived in a wet rainforest]. Their whole world was literally made of mud and sticks. But even with something so muddy and sticky as mud and sticks, these people used such worthless things to craft a culture, society, and “civilization” out of; to give their human lives meaning and worth.

Art, in all its aspects: music, stories, dance, pictures, etc; is as ancient as our species. Even older if we consider the artwork that Neanderthals left behind. It’s a medium by which we are able to try and express what is inside of us. Art has no limit. You can go into any direction with it as far as you can. There is no right way or wrong way to “do” art. With it, Chitta which remains secreted and hidden, makes itself known by using it to express its existence. I have always wondered why tropical fish have beautiful colors if they are color blind. Why flowers have a sweet smell if they have no noses. Why fruits taste sweet, if they cannot taste themselves. Why the world should even have color, or shape, but it does. It’s almost as if the cosmos were using these things as a medium to express its existence, from its hidden and secreted place. Trying to present itself to be noticed.

And so I see the most direct and immediate use and worth of the ONA in this context. It is a medium, a tool, by which and through which I can Express myself. Like poetry, where Chitta uses human language in such a way where its inner stuff is Expressed. This ONA gives you a set of words, concepts, and models, which I find helpful in conveying my otherwise wordless inner stuff. Its like being given a canvas, brush, and paint set of basic colors. In the beginning when your confidence level of self-expression is low you use the basic colors and you try to stay in the lines. But you become more creative with time. And so you end up experimenting around by mixing the colors together to get new colors and you paint outside your lines. When nobody reprimands for that creativity, your confidence build up. Which is when you go all the way and mix up your own colors and forget the lines altogether. I think it’s at that point where an artist of some type has come to realize they have no limit to how they may use their medium to express themselves, and where they are able to let their honest inner stuff flow out, that you become a genuine artist.

To me it’s the same way with the ONA. You may start off trying to stay within what you assume to be lines because that is how you were conditioned to do things. You may begin to only use what words and ideas and templates are “there.” But you will get to a moment where you may become creative and begin to experiment with mixing ideas, putting in your own ideas, and going out of the line. You’ll look around nervously to see if other ONA people will rebuke you for being creative and expressing yourself. It’s when you have gotten to that confident point where you have a masterful command of what is the ONA as a tool and medium of your own self-expression, self-creation, and self-progression that you are genuinely ONA. In the same way where we can say that a person who has learned to think and speak outside of the lines with their language, but has a masterful command of that language is creative and intelligent. You are Master of that language or ONA, and not mastered by it.

As a Neophyte taking baby steps in this ONA you have to learn that kind of Empathy known as “Klaj Jed.” To Fear or Respect other ONA people’s expression of Jed. To maintain the harmony and solidarity. If you truly like the ONA and really do understand what it is. Then you will know that disrupting its harmony and equilibrium weakens it, which is unconstructive. It works against our aims and objective. When some Niner assumes the character of a Nazi or Satanist, there are reasons why. You work against your own kind if you were to make it a personal crusade to call out such people for being racist Nazis or ignorant devil worshippers.

It requires Empathy to get a feel for the general direction other people in the ONA are going in, and to move in that general direction also. This is so that you aren't in anybody's way. You work against your own kind by getting in the way. If you don't want to help, at least get out of the way. If a certain ONA group uses Eastern stuff to express itself to move the ONA or add to it, don't get in the way by talking shit about Eastern shit. If some ONA group uses another subcultural movement to express their ONA, to build the ONA, don't get in the way and deconstruct what they are using. Shut up, in other words. Don't be looking to walk backwards and compete with those in the ONA who have been in it longer and who have lived in longer. Such behaviour is infantile. It doesn't require intelligence and creativity to get in the way and take stuff apart. It does require intelligence, empathy, and creativity to do the opposite: to move in the Way, in harmony to the general flow of other, in such a way that in the end something manifests that is fruitful for all parties involved. If you want to be accepted by your ONA peers as a full member of this Family, you must have the commonsense to get along with others and adopt the culture. Find Common Ground to stand on and let go of the petty differences. Because looking for uncommon grounds to stand on does not make something commonly shared.

I and many other do Devote a lot of ourselves, time, energy, Heart, and mind to the ONA. If you have read this essay and you understand the essence of what Great Grandpa Savudt was trying to say, then you will come to understand why I personally Devote my self, mind, and Heart to the ONA. We may indeed be naturally born "with it," with Sinister Nature. But the peculiarities of the ONA – its lexicon, its weltanschauung, its Kulture, etc – these things you grow into in time. Sometimes it is nice to have someone there to Nurture your growing into ONA Kulture. Those who care enough to Devote their time and mind to the ONA for you imbues you with their nature, spirit, and culture. But such person can only do so much. My grandma's aunt-mother could only do so much for her adopted sons Great Grandpa Savudt and his passed older brother. She can give them all the love she had, and her money, home, life, and self. But they must strive to do something with what was given, to make themselves into something more than they were. The ONA can only do so much. Your new found associates can only do so much. You must take what was given and strive in your own unique ways, to make something out of yourself and the ONA.

So that is the work of a Neophyte of the ONA. Be grown up enough to orient yourself, or someone will give you your orientation. I love seeing people find the ONA who have that ability, intelligence, and dark-empathy where they "play it by ear" in such a way that they slip right in and its like they were ONA for 10 years. Like they say: if you got it, you got it; if you don't, it'll show. Learn to get a feel for the general direction the ONA is moving in. And be considerate of other Niner's and Nexion's flow and forms. Not out of mere respect, but for the sake of a Kollektive, a Kulture, a Sinister Solidarity, the cohesion and coherency of our social Order. Why are such thing important? You say it all the time like an empty mantra don't you: "United we stand, divided we fall," and "Divide and Conquer." Put those two together and you will learn to understand why Solidarity and Cohesion of a family, culture, people, or group is important. You are individualized to be conquered and preyed upon by something. And the coherency of an Army has the power to enact change by will and force. It's all Causal Mechanics right? There is a desired end result we aeonically wish to Manifest, and Solidarity is a means to manifest it. What disrupts that Kulture works against our common flow. Samsara is a bitch. If you aren't going to swim, get the hell out of the river.

A SINISTER BREED

I know I write a lot on the metaphysical stuff. I know there is a noticeable flavour of “Buddhism” in a lot of what I write. There are reasons why I write out what I write. I don’t just randomly write out things that is currently on my mind for the hell of it. There is a reasoning for me writing a lot on the “thinking” aspect of the ONA: it’s Software.

Because the ONA has unfortunately labeled itself exoterically as a form of “Satanism,” and/or “occult.” Which is fine. I don’t put much stock into labels personally. But the ONA has been around since the early 70’s. Perhaps back then this occult and satanic shit truly went against the grain of established society. Perhaps back then, as the zeitgeist was barely growing out of its conservative 50’s era, something like “Satanism” was a cultural heresy. But what has it become today, this occult and satanic shit, when every emo kid and his grandma is into the occult, reads tarot cards, and walks around in dark decore?

To me this occult and Satanism thing is like a pond. Back then it was fine for the several cultural rebel crocodiles to live in. But now this pond is over crowded with emo-guppies and bitch ass goth-fishes. And I don’t know about the rest of you ONA, but this Croc [me] can’t stand being in this pathetic pond any more, sharing the same space with mental idiots who are a bunch of pussies in life.

Sticking around this over crowded circus of a pond these days hurts the image and OG reputation of the ONA. And I know some of you ONA people will ask something dumb like: Who cares what other people think? I care, because when these dumb ass mundanes think the ONA is some emo-satanist sect – which is one of many they are familiar with online – you get bitch ass fuckers like Blackwood thinking they can be ONA because they worship a devil.

Because when those outsiders mistake the ONA as some sect or species of a Satanism of many kinds of Satanism that litters the internet these days. People just assume that just because they worship a devil that they can just log into some site or claim the letters ONA.

So this is the first reason why I spend a lot of time writing on the software side of the ONA. This is why I try to restate certain things Anton Long wrote: To try to distinguish what the ONA is in this context from everybody else in this fucked up pond of the occult and Satanism. So people can understand that this ONA isn’t merely about adopting a new set of beliefs and opinions. Just cuz you read the Black Book of Satan or think Naos is cool, don't mean shit. It just means you can read other people's written thoughts.

I try to articulate, in an intelligent manner that this ONA isn't about reading shit, or worshipping a satan. Just cuz you believe Satan is real and worship him, don't mean you got the intellectual quality of what a Dreccian is. But I know I write so often that I only help to hinder the action oriented sinister nature of the ONA.

But how else can I do this? Like I said before, it's very easy to gangbang. Gangbanging don't require thinking or brains. It comes naturally to those who got that banging nature. Now if I were to tell you that there are people out there around the world in other cities that have this "gangbanging nature" in a dormant state, and I were to say to you: I want you to put into words your gangbang culture and nature, in such an articulate way, that if and when one of those dormant people on the other side of the world with our same gangbang nature reads it, that they will immediately awaken to that nature and causally express it thus duplicating our gang nature. Now, the question is: can you write that shit in one simple essay; or do you suppose it's gunna take volumes of written shit?

When it comes to the ONA, I suppose I would classify myself as "Old Skool." Meaning that I like and try to live the Sinister Way, as it was back before the internet. Way back even before it was called "ONA." Way back even before Beesty Boy came into the picture and made his beautiful Sinister Tarot.

I'm talking about a time when Myatt was a skinhead gangbanger in his youth. When he ran organizations like NSM, and Combat 18. When he was involved shit like C88. When he and his associates shrenched as hardcore violence prone National-Socialists. When they cloaked themselves and manipulated others to kill and bomb shit too try and start some Helter Skelter or Rahowa. I'm talking about a Myatt who writes Jihadi writings, and is respected by organizations like Hamas and Jihadists. That's what I mean by sinister nature. And that is the essence of what I get from Myatt's writings.

But this doesn't mean that I think the sinister work and business that went down in that era was constructive. I idealize that Old Skool hardcore sinister nature, but otherwise, what shit went down in that era was wyrdfully destructive. Why? Because most of those old skool cats went to prison. What good is your ass to any cause if your ass is sitting in prison on death row? It doesn't mean that you are tough if you go to prison. It just mean's your stupid for getting caught.

Maybe it's just me and the people I hang out with that makes me think this way. I hang out with OG's, "Veteranos" en espanol. All of my older boy cousins, who I look up to [some who are ONA], are OG gangbanger who are aged out cuz they in their 30. They all got into TRG way back in the 1990's when Tiny Raskal Gang was barely about 7 years old, long before it was known as 7126. This was back when it was even still called "Thea and Rith Gang," when those old skool nigs [Thea & Rith] were still banging in South Carolina and shit [they got deported]; back in the days when it was still a Cali thing; still all about Long Beach and Khmer Pride. This was even back before grey rags and blue rags. When it was still a true street culture gang of Cambodians taking care of each other and killing East Side Longos [ESL mutherfuckers, them Mexicans need ESL!]

I hung out with these Raskals back when I was 10. Back when membership lines was hard to tell because people in TRG was also claimed CWA [Cambidans With Attitude, they blue rags]. I even had bangers on my Mexican side, even more. Cholos and cholitas. Fucken primos [cousins] from gangs like Tortilla Flats [Pacoima]; FTT [Fullerton Toker Town]; CVL [Corona Vario Locos]. I got cousins and uncles tatted up with Sur 13 [Surenos 13] across their bellies and backs.

I came from a background where my cousins were going to jail left and right, and where every two weeks somebody I knew by close association or relation died from this way of life. I came from a street cultural background where it wasn't out of the ordinary to be at a house party and all of a sudden having jump behind a fridge cuz bullets are flying through the window.

You wanna know sinister nature, you hang out a while in that way of life, and watch a motherfucker get his ass beat and robbed for walking on the wrong side of the railroad tracks. You wanna know sinister nature, you watch a nigga with a red rag get shot up bleeding to death on the sidewalk for no other reason than cuz he had a red bandanna in his back pocket.

We talking about people who live and breath the streets. Who got their own culture and way of life. That needs no book or words to explain cuz its based on the kind of person they are inside. The kind of person that would cap a motherfucker for his shoes with no remorse. The kind that will enter some Vietnamese owned business in broad daylight 10 deep, beat the shit out of the shop's Shitnamese owner and employees, and pour gasoline everywhere and set the shit on fire, cuz they were delinquent on their protection taxes. The kind of people that don't give a fuck about going to jail, cuz they'll just make new business partners in there and new allies, and come out doing the same shit, with more business and back up. The kind that'll bust into your homes, cuz they know you're a dumb Asian family who doesn't trust banks, duck tape your family at gun point, rape your underage Vietnamese daughter, and take the jewelry in your closet and the money under your mattress.

Those street minded people might not have been hardcore skinhead. They might not have been going out and about expressing their sinister nature in the form of racist violence. But it's the same sinister creed. The same sinister nature and the same sinister breed.

That's what I'm talking about, inferring, and implying when I personally say and use terms like "Sinister Way," or "Dark Tradition," or "Sinister Nature." I'm not referring to a Satanic Bible or some metaphysical devil worship bullshit written somewhere by some piece of shit bald headed, circus clown with a goatee. I'm talking about Predators; Psychopaths; Gangbangers; people born with a natural inclination for criminal intent: for treason like real rebels like Hamas that take politics and peoples lives into their own hands for their own cause. People that not only says shit like "fuck the state" but blow themselves up with a state official too. People that not only says shit like "fuck authority," but shoot up their schools. People that not only say "fuck the police," but got the sinister nature to live their lives in total contradiction to the law.

I'm talking about really old skool cats like Billy the Kid, Bonny and Clyde, Capone. And fuck your popcorn killers. What you got on the 7 million Hitler killed? On the 50 million Stalin and Mao wacked? On the two million Pol Pot murdered? And fuck you popcorn rebels too all dressed in black with your piece of shit heavy metal music. What you got on real rebels like Simon Bolivar who liberated South America from Spain. What you got on Che & Castro? On Hoa Chi Minh?

The point is that the ONA proper isn't a chess club or religious community where you can just register as a user and think your ONA. If you don't know or understand what the hell Myatt is and what he's doing, then you aren't "Sinister." If you like working for the Man in his corporations cuz you get bi-weekly checks then you ain't "Sinister." If you got a problem with violence and crime, gangs and terrorist groups, guns and people getting shot up then you ain't "sinister." If you like your State and government, and pay your taxes 3 months early with a grin, then fuck you too. If you never have committed yourself to a group such as the military, a gang, a skinhead group, of such kind where you have learned to work in an organized group manner for your group's private interests, by fucking up other countries, other cities, other races to dominate and control, then fuck you cuz you ain't "sinister." Fuck you cuz you don't have that nature that the ONA is taking about. You are mundane and not of the sinister breed by nature.

It's just confusing to outsiders at times because the ONA has a few prolific writers who spend their time articulating in written format in 3 decades worth of manuscripts. It's confusing to these mundanes because when they find or discover the ONA's literature – all the thousands of it – and when they misunderstand exoteric words used like "Satanism," and "Sinister." Because these mundanes assume that the ONA must be a literature based church or religion that they can convert to and join like they join bullshit things like the Church of Satan or some devil worship website.

Ain't nobody writing all those thousands of manuscripts for your mundane asses to read and convert. Just cuz you found it, don't mean it was written for you. Put that shit down and go away. Nobody in the ONA want to waste their time with a mundane in this way. If people in the ONA do write, it's written for Our Kind, our sinister breed – those people you as a mundane shun, hate, fear, and would rather have locked up: criminals, terrorists, thieves, racketeers, black market businessmen, drug dealers, gang affiliates, people who would rather shoot up your kids at your dumbass mundane schools, rather than make friends with their mundane asses.

I certainly don't write shit for you mundanes too read and debate on. I never like you people in school. I don't give a shit enough about any of you mundanes to spend this much time writing the shit I do like I'm trying to illuminate your dumbasses. Fuck you. I write my shit for my people. Those few that got that dark essence in their nature and inner makeup. Those few who will read my writings and say to themselves: "Oh shit, I feel you girl, we the same kind: AMBK: Articulate Minded But Kriminal. I write my shit for the few who resonates with it because they already have that nature inside of them, so they can ponder on what I have written and psychologically, spiritually, emotionally, and mentally liberate themselves from mundane memes, that they might then strive for their fullest potential as predators with uncommon intelligence.

And I know Anton Long doesn't waste his time writing his shit for you mundanes either, as if he cared enough about your dumbasses to spend 3 decades writing away trying to convince you to see shit his way, so you'll go out and do something "bad" cuz it'll make you feel good. I know he writes his shit for the few out there who will find his stuff, read it and say to themselves: "You preaching to the choir nigga. Been there, done that. But we the same kind, and I dig your insights cuz you can put into words what kind of person I am inside by nature, and I agree with you that Our Kind need to stick together."

A lone predator in nature eventually goes extinct as the mindless mob of humanity oozes forth like idiot lemmings and rodents. Think of such noble predators as the Bengal Tiger, Wolverines, Panthers. How many lone predator species are not endangered these days? It doesn't matter how long your fangs and claws are, or how quick you can kill. You can't overpower a mindless mob; especially a mindless mob with the political power to make and enforce laws upon you. But what force on this earth has the means and power to destroy a collective of predators, such as the Great and Noble Army Ant?

It's silly that these mundanes and fantasy ridden retards like Blackwood can think that they got the sinister nature in their blood to pass as a Dreccian of the ONA proper. Reading shit we've written don't make you sinister. It is what you do and who you are inside as I have said over and over again. It's not a thinking, a convincing, or debating. It's a being, a nature, a way of life, a doing. If you have to ask what "sinister" means or must read a book to learn what the word means and implies, then you aren't. Like a very rich man I studied with once said to me, as a tutor would to a pupil: "If you have to ask how much a yacht costs: You don't got the money to buy one." If you think "sinister" means devil worship or being a social misfit, then you aren't sinister.

It silly when a mundane like Blackwood – the king of internet mundanes – thinks he's got what it takes to be "ONA" – as if sinister nature is somehow dependent on those three letters anyways. Who in the ONA plays these bullshit mundane religion games and calls themselves "Grand Magisters," "high priests," and "reverends?" Who in the ONA tries to make ONA an official IRS recognized non-profit 501 c incorporation? Who in the ONA acts like they got an infernal mandate from Satan to be the leader of the ONA? Not David Myatt. We all know he denies being associated with the ONA! Not Anton Long either. Anton Long writes a lot for the ONA, but he never says he is the/or a leader. In fact he says the whole opposite and states that nobody is leader. Anton Long doesn't tell ONA Initiates and Adepts that his word and his writings, and his opinions are infallible. Who in the ONA tried to clean up the "soiled" image and reputation of the ONA for being associated with human sacrifice and crime to make the ONA pretty and acceptable to mundane society? Nobody.

These are mundane things mundane people do with their make-believe internet organization. Anybody can make a website. Anybody can register and post in a forum. Anybody can dress in black and call themselves a satanist. Anybody can give themselves a title like "Supreme Dark Magister." But do you got it in your nature to gangbang? Do you got it in your nature to dedicate your life to a subversive cause? Have you even done anything "illegal" in the eyes of the state? Some of you mundane Satanists won't even jay walk out side the fucking yellow lines painted on the fucking street! If "illegal" as a word and concept exists in your vocabulary and in your mind as a real concept, then go away cuz you're not sinister.

Why can't you see that it's the same shit like it was back then during the Inquisition in Europe? If the word "heretic" exists in your fucking vocabulary and in your mind as a viable concept, then you are Christian and NOT a heretic. Heretics don't call themselves or believe themselves to be "heretics," or stress to their neighbors that they are heretics? No more than George Washington or Cromwell believed they were guilty of High Treason against the British Empire.

If you are mundane, and you try to claim ONA, you will only make yourself look like a wannabe to people who really are ONA Initiates and Adepts. And by that I don't mean they have cute red membership cards they sent $200 to Anton Long for, or they have a fucking account or profile in some website. I mean people who live the Sinister Way, who are of the sinister breed, and who have naturally express their inner nature in deeds, actions, and life style: The type of deeds, acts, and life style you as a mundane pass laws to illegalize. The type of deeds, acts, and life style you mundanes shun, fear, and bitch about. Like killing folk over skin color or rag color or letters. Like robbing you, cuz you got something we want. Like beating the shit out of your son, and burning you car cuz the punk called one of our sisters a bitch or skank. If you gotta ask and learn what the "ONA" is then you don't belong.

That's like walking into Crip turf and asking the niggas you see in blue if they can teach you to be gang member like them, so you can be their friend and hang out with them. That don't work cuz they'll first laugh at you, then second: rob you. Wannabes in my group of associates are called "Toys," cuz they just playing this shit. They're just acting it for a while. Cuz they dress like gangbangers for a while cuz it makes them feel cool. They're just dabbling. It's one of the reasons why I hate those myspace bangers that turn their profiles into these gang billboards with their street affiliations and shit.

People like that are mostly Toys that are Internet Bangers. Like those fucked up "rap artist gang members" the hip hop industry made. What the fuck is that shit? So what you claim a fucking record label or gansta rap band or something? It ain't cool to be a "groupie" in the hip hop genre? You gotta dress like your boy 50 Cent and only buy albums he drops? So what you gunna claim "Swisha House" and dress all gangbangish like your boy Paul Wall, get yourself a fucking grill, and act like you got the shit to hang with the real street shit?

Another thing I hate about cyberbangers besides them decking their profiles with their ugly faces, throwing their signs, and putting up their gang letters every fucking where on their profiles, but they gotta spell their words in that fucked up broken English. They gotta put a "K" after every "C" to mean "Crab/crip Killa" and they gotta put a "K" after "B" to mean "Blood Killa" ooh, big boy. It ain't enough their throwing signs and telling everyone on the internet their gang affiliations and where they live. They gotta spell their shit like some 12 year old illiterate inner city boy taught them grammar. Like gangbangers are supposed to be intellectually fucked up to be hard.

I mean it's cool if you talk like that with your homies, cuz you gotta talk like them if you want to be understood. It's not like I'm asking you to go to college like me or anything. But shit people try to write using what knowledge in spelling and grammar you have. Cuz no amount of grammatical rebellion is ever going to make you look hard on the internet, so why even try. It just makes you look like you smoke too much dope and fell down a flight of stairs, or like you have a brain tumor or something.

Internet and Corporate Label Bangers as opposed to the unknown niggas out on and in the street living that life not for the fame, but cuz it's just how they are by nature, gotta try and act and dress the part like they're living a costume party cuz inside, there ain't nothing hardcore or killa about them. You'll never find anybody I know who gangbangs up on the internet with facebook pages with them throwing their signs and gang affiliations like a dumb fuck. If my boyz and cousins are online, they prolly don't want their faces seen, or they'll go to jail or they got enough dignity to blend it. You can barely tell I'm gang affiliated when I'm online.

Gangbanging ain't like it used to be in the old days when your older cousins and their 30 of their homies can all walk down the street loked out in all red. Cuz these days you do that, and you'll be walking to jail. The cops these days stop you if you got letters tattooed on you just crossing the street. I heard gangbanging was illegal these days even. The gangbangers these days – those actually active in a real operating street gang – blend in with every body else. It took awhile for these Asian gang to learn this shit. MOD301 was one of the first gang to learn to blend in with everybody on the street cuz their Hmong asses kept on getting killed or thrown in jail lol.

Anyways, when ONA material and ONA Initiates are found on the internet, these internet mundanes mistake it for their internet bullshit they get themselves mixed up with. Then some fat bitch like Blackwood with his dumb fat ass comes along and thinks ONA is an internet-only organization like his Ning based Temples of Satan is. And he thinks its easy to pretend to be ONA and fool people, like he fools his idiot 5 Ning users that Satan talks to him. At least stuff that are found online like some gangs, ONA, City Chamber of Commerce, and even the Church of Satan, not only have a web presents – but they have real adherents, and members in the non-internet world too.

But you can ask me: “But why does the ONA have to be on the internet then if they don't want dumb people thinking they're just an internet group?” That's a stupid question. It's like asking me: “But why do I see so many TRG gang members on Xanga, Friendsters, and Myspace Chloe if it's a real street gang?”

First of all because there are about 50,000 Raskals world wide, and TRG isn't a single centralize institution where some federal leader controls the whole thing. It's a bunch of god damn Cambodians and their homies who share a common TRG culture divided up into independent cliques all repping “TRG.” Which means nobody controls all 50,000 members. As how the ONA is “structured” in the same way. With no central leader, being divided into independent “nexions/cliques,” all sharing the same ONA culture and Tradition.

Secondly, even though we all really want to be isolated hermits, the general fact is that unfortunately the human animal is a social organism. What's that mean? It means you ain't a fucking hermit. It means it is within your nature as a human being to COME TOGETHER and form social orders and social structures to interact and develop relationships and bonds with each other. Sometimes we call them tribes, clans, villages, towns, cities, nations, countries. If the medium of socializing is a building of some kind it can be called churches, temples, synagogues. If the medium of social interaction is a field, it can be called a zoo, a fair, a park. If the medium of social interaction is the internet, then what do you call the natural human social interactions that takes place on such a medium? Websites, forums, social networks. The only difference is the medium in which the social interactions take place. And sense actual humans compose such social orders as TRG and ONA, if such a new medium as an internet is provided for such humans to have access to, such social organisms will utilize such mediums to express their human nature in: socializing and coming together.

Third reason is, as much as we all pretend to hate the internet – as those really old people who grew up in a world with only radio, all of a sudden hearing about some new thing called television, would hate the idea and dismiss television as a fad – the internet is not going anywhere. In fact, it looks like it has become a living part of what is our contemporary “world” and “reality.”

The internet might not feel like a living part of your reality if you are old. But if you where born or grew up after the internet had already come into existence [like me], then the internet is just as much a living part of your life, world and reality as texting, cell phones, cars, microwave ovens, that lady in the gps machine, computers, Macs [I hate macs], x-ray, metal detectors, Paris Hilton, you job, your wardrobe, your friends, traffic lights, airplanes, freeways, hamburgers, the postal service, pizza, paved roads, indoor plumbing, and David Hasselhoff; which you cannot function without in this modern world. I know we all wish badly that all these things were just passing fads, and wish that they would just go away so we can devolve back to those bygone nostalgic cavemen days; but like Hasselhoff, they aren't going anywhere. So get your ass out of whatever time warp your fucking stuck in and try to stay current.

The internet isn't going anywhere, and you know you're old if you think it's a fad or not “real.” In fact it's becoming more and more a part of our social fabric, just like electricity and computers have become indispensable aspects of our lives, our world, and our human reality. Nation-States and their democratic institutions are already moving into the internet by having their Citizens actually vote for shit online – holy shit no it's not real! I wonder if 20 years from now when our whole Nation's democratic institutions and banking/money system moves online if people will start to think democracy, countries, and money is fake? When I think of this, I think of Amish people riding in their horse carts, and some guy in a car drives by, and the Amish says to his wife: “Boy what a fake; cars are a fad, just watch, besides the carbon fingerprint is staggering.”

Any organization, institution, or corporation out there that is intelligent and that has a desire to affect and influence the future, or at least exist into the future, knows that it is through the world wide web and computers. I know that idea is just terribly upsetting for you fanatic cave-people to hear. The ONA is no different. It is goal oriented and it does desire to influence the future and exist into the future. So, like it or not the ONA must learn to use the internet. Or go back to using snail mail and Morse Code clicky things. Hell, why de-evolve just there, why not use smoke signals and yodel? You'd think people would at least understand what the fuck technological advancement means.

This is what I picture in my mind pretending that the ONA is very old: So some caveman invents writing, and the ONA uses writing and everybody says: "My god look at them, they're writing, how fake." Then some guy invents the pony express, and the ONA starts using horse post, and everybody says: "Geez look at those fakes, they're using the pony express! Then somebody invents morse code, and ONA starts bleeping messages with the contraption, and everybody says: "God, what a bunch of herd conformists, they're bleeping their crazy shit in morse code." Then somebody invents telephones, and the ONA uses land line fones and everybody say: "God look at them, they got a 800 number, what a bunch of fake." Now we're using the internet, and what are those mundanes saying?

I don't even know what I'm talking about anymore. So I should conclude this before I go way of track. In conclusion, just because the ONA uses the internet, and just because it has written literature, doesn't mean that its like some mundane institution which you can just "join" one day because you like how the letters "ONA" flow when its said, or cuz you like the word "sinister." Just because you read ONA literature and even agree with some of what has been written doesn't mean or make you sinister.

It's the shit that you do in the streets. It's who you do that shit for. It's who your enemies are and how far you will go to kill an enemy. If it's not in your nature to give your life to the ONA, like you would a militia or army or gang; if the Mundanes and their States are not your enemy and if you don't have the will, heart, balls, gajones, or the whys and wherefore to kill a mundane just for being mundane. Than you're a Toy – a wannabe – when you claim ONA online. Which is fine if this is what you want to do. You're only helping spread our fame and name. But don't expect any of the Old Guards or genuine Sinister Initiates out there to recognize your internet fantasies.

In a way, it's a great compliment when people pretend and fantasize about being ONA. After all, how many people online pretend to be members of the Church of Satan, or Temple of Set, or more ridiculously, who the fuck would want to pretend to be a member of Blackwood's Temples of Satan: besides himself?

A SINISTER SPORT

Leeds, 1973

It was nothing unusual, at least for Steve and his chosen three skinheads, to loiter in the sodium-lit night, on The Headrow or the streets around, waiting for some unwary mundane to pass them by to be followed to be relieved at knifepoint, or the threat of a kicking, of whatever money or possessions they carried or held. But it was for The Plumb, the young lad of slim physique and shaven head whose new swastika tattoo, on his forehead, still itched.

Plumb was a novice at this sporting game, and, knife ready, somewhat nervously waited for the test that would – that might – begin to make his name among Steve’s crew. It was not a long wait, that early evening of light drizzle where the slight warmth of late October had given way to the dreary coldness of November, and they – at Steve’s gesture – followed the middling aged suited briefcase holding man for only some yards when Plumb’s stiletto blade stuck him in the back. He groaned, slightly, before he fell, gasping – but they wasted no time on him, for only his money, his watch, any saleable goods mattered, and he was left there where the cold wet dirty pavement became a pillow for his face as they laughing scampered back to the safety of their den.

It was a single third floor room in a block of rented office rooms whose grimy small single un-openable window gave at least some view of the Infirmary across the street, and it was there, on the bare un-carpeted floor where thieved goods lay stockpiled almost to the ceiling, waiting, that they divvied up their share. Plumb got the cash, such as it was; and Steve and his crew the rest: a watch; a gold ring; the leather briefcase; perhaps a saleable newish wallet. But their value was incidental, purely incidental – at least that time.

Later, the darkness found them mischief-heading westerly, after a bevvvy of beer had been downed at their favourite haunt where the relative wideness of Woodhouse Lane gave way to the narrower streets that north-easterly lay to sedately tumble down in terraced houses toward that tall-chimney of the quaintly-named “Leeds Corporation refuse destructor” on Meanwood Road, and where in a nearby house Steve spent the occasional night in the confines of a stuffy garret, with young shop-girl Lesley. He did not know then – and would not have cared even had he known – that centuries before, and only a gunshot away, Royalist forces had been bloodily defeated at the Battle of Meanwood Valley during his ancestors' Civil War.

So, steadily but never furtively, they – buoyed by beer, youth, hate, and pride – made their way to serried terraces southwesterly between Woodhouse Moor and Burley Road. At Steve's instigation, Plumb knocked on the door of a house, and it was not long before a skinny young man in black leather jacket, dirty T-shirt and jeans, opened it. Plumb punched him in the face, and he fell over backwards to where a discarded newspaper lay upon a lino floor near and steps led upward to dank, small, upper rooms.

"That's for grassing, you cunt!" Plumb shouted as the skinny young man tried to get to his feet.

But Plumb pushed him down before kicking his head three times, and the young man was unconscious when Steve and his crew entered.

Steve threw a leaflet over the prostrate now bloodied body before they all left, laughing. On the leaflet – only a swastika, the letters CoC, and the words: "Violence purifies and makes the man."

The stolen car took them recklessly fast out from the city of Leeds to near where the rocks of Almscliffe Crag rose beyond the Harrogate road and gave, in daylight, views toward the Vale of York. And it was there on the top of that rocky outcrop they assembled in that drizzle-filled darkness for Plumb to take his oath.

It was a simple oath – a personal pledge of loyalty to Steve, his comrades, his crew and their new Clockwork Orange Cult – and soon was over, so that they scampered, laughing, lustfully, satiated with feral life and memories of violence, down from their eerie to head back eastwards where Steve, as promised, had prepared for them a surprise.

The girls were waiting in that rented well-furnished well-cared-for Woodhouse terraced house above the fringe of Meanwood Ridge, and Mark, their pimp, greeted Steve – as the friend, and comrade, that he was – there where joss sticks perfumed the houseful-air and Slade's Look Wot You Dun played loudly, beatingly, through speakers wired to some Hi-Fi system, recently liberated from some city-centre store.

There was some dancing then – or what passed for dancing – among the crew and the girls until they paired off to upstairs rooms leaving only Steve, Mark, and Ruth. Ruth the dark haired – older than the others, whose young son was in the so-called care of Social Services; Ruth the voluptuous, who sat, skimpily if fashionably dressed, waiting curled up on a sofa; waiting, for Steve her favoured lover to take her to her bed. But it was to be nearly an hour before her desire became fulfilled, and so she sat and watched him as he and Mark schemed, plotted, and dreamed.

At first, their talk was of Eastman, the non-family traitor who had betrayed a friend to the Police. Would that warning of the evening suffice?

"If not – " Steve said harshly, and gestured death with his hand. They both knew that had Eastman been a part of their crew, or even if only the person he betrayed had been, then his fate of death would that night have been assured.

"Plumb? How'd he do tonight?" Mark asked.

"Good. He did well."

"Useful?"

"Yep. I'm going to team him up with Phil at the Depot. He starts there Monday. He'll be our runner. There's a shipment due Friday."

"Usual stuff?"

"Nope. Electrical goods, this time."

"I'll let Jamie know." Jamie was their fence, a small rather portly middle-aged man of vast experience and canny if mournful countenance who had thrived in the rationing post-war years and who, though well-known to the Police, had never ever been to Court, for although his second-hand emporium in a back-street by the Wharf regularly received visits from The Plod, they never ever found anything suspicious, or stolen. Or, at least, that they could prove was stolen.

"Usual divvy?" Mark asked.

"Yep – but small bonus for Plumb."

"Gesture?"

"Yep. He might even spend it here!" Steve laughed.

So they talked, laughed, planned, plotted, schemed, until at last Steve came to take her hand, leading her gently – almost lovingly – toward and into her room where they lay, naked, entwined for quite some time, gently touching, kissing, feeling the warmth, the soft human warmth, of each others' bodies. It was for this – for such as this – that she almost loved him. Almost: had she not by the experience of her past stopped herself. And so they lay together, warmly warm, and silent, with only the distant sound of music below; the sounds of their lips touching; their breath breathing; and his fingers feeling her moist waiting wetness.

At first, he had seemed such a contradiction to her. But she no longer cared. It was his company and his body that she craved; even needed; and she would listen to him speak, for hours, in his almost accentless voice as he spoke of his plans, his visions, his passions, his theories, his interests and his hopes. Thus did she listen to him again later that night after their passions had flowed and flowed to ebb with the passing hours of their intimate, sexual, embrace.

“It’s the essence of the sinister, you see, ” he was saying to her as she lay naked, propped up on pillows in her bed, smoking one of her small cheroots while soft light from a bedside lamp bathed them and the glow of Dusk began to dully glow, as dark retreated beyond that window of their world.

“Experience. Going to, beyond, your limits. Transgressing laws, all limits. Learning. Exulting in life, and treating the mundanes as the idiots, the expendables, the resource, they are.”

Then, quite suddenly, his tone changed. “I’d like you to leave, here, this house,” he said. “And stay with me. We’ll get somewhere.”

“Don’t be daft!” she said in her broad Yorkshire accent, and slightly laughed.

“I mean it. I want you to get more involved. Assist me.”

“You’re serious, aren’t you?”

“But I don’t know anything about the Occult and Satanism.”

“You don’t have to. They’re just words. Words which obscure the essence. Useful – sometimes. But otherwise irrelevant. Like the current name my crew use – CoC. I’ll change it; maybe soon for something maybe permanent. It was only temporary, anyways, that outer name.”

She finished her cheroot, and lit another one, and he continued.

“It’s essentially just a way of living. A way of life. It’s not really about rituals and all that crap that the mundanes think it’s about. It’s about us – individuals – excelling; enjoying. Taking risks. Changing ourselves. Evolving. Exulting. About creating a new way of life; freeing ourselves from the tyranny of laws; from the tyranny of the Police; of governments; of The State. Being ourselves.”

“And making money,” she laughed.

“Of course!”

“But -” she began to say.

“Mark agrees.”

“You what?”

“About you leaving here. He – and I – want you to take over running the girls.”

“So what’s he going to do, then?”

“He’s gonna open a new branch of our venture, in York.”

“I see.”

“Naturally, I’ll have some lads stay here to look out for the girls.”

“Naturally!” And she laughed again.

“What’d you say, then?”

Aroused, she said all that then needed to be said with her body, until satiated again, she lay beside him as, outside, the Sun rose into a strangely cloudless early Winter’s sky.

There was much that Steve wanted to do, and he had invited Plumb to join him for a drink in their favoured Pub in Woodhouse. Ruth was there, in the dimness of that traditional haunt, and Plumb could not help but ogle her breasts as he sat down beside Steve. But he knew better than to let his gaze linger or address her by name, and so he sat sipping his pint of beer.

“You’ve got someone interested, I hear?” Steve said to him.

“Yeah, mate of mine. Will.”

“Handy?”

“Shipleys skins.”

“Enough said, then.”

“You wanna meet?”

Plumb smiled. “Like mine?”

“Yep.” And both Steve and Ruth smiled. For she had come a long way in the two weeks since she and Steve had shared a house.

That day of the test was a mournful if British one – for weather. For the wind was cold; the sky overcast and dull with cloud; and the slight persistent drizzle of that middle morning lent meaning to Julius Caesar's long dead desire to live in far more sunnier healthier climes. Steve was there, with Plumb, and Will, the heavily-tattooed, waiting in the stolen car outside the shop. It was a kind of non-descript shop, selling jewellery, not quite in the city centre, and its décor and display seemed as if to say that its owner could not quite decide upon the intended clientèle. For there were some quite expensive items, among the rings and watches, and then some much cheaper tat while a middling assortment of second-hand items completed the rather mixed collection.

"Ready?" Steve asked Will, as the young skinhead of stocky build sat in the backseat of the car, clutching a sawn-off shotgun.

"Let's go!" Steve said, and he and Will were swiftly out, masks on.

Steve pushed the one male customer aside, his right hand brandishing his revolver, while smashing displays with a hammer.

"Fill it!" Steve demanded of the customer, as Will thrust a small bag at him, and – obedient, like the trained mundane he was – he obeyed, stuffing it full of rings and watches. And then they were gone, outside, to where Plumb waited, ready and revving the car.

Ruth's old haunt claimed them, after the necessary change of outfits and cars, above the fringe of Meanwood Ridge, and Will and Plumb sat on a sofa in that well-incensed house while Steve inspected the haul.

"Good," he said. Then, to Will: "You'll get your cut in a couple of days, OK?"

"Yeah, sure," Will said.

"You got a job?" Steve asked him.

"Nah, only thieving," and he laughed, showing two teeth broken from fights.

"From now on, no freelancing, understand?" Steve said.

"Sure."

"You do only the jobs we give you."

"OK"

"Got some regular work, if you're interested," Steve said. "Right up your street."

"Yeah?"

"Protecting our assets, here. Could be a rough, at times. Oh, yeah of course, you haven't met them, have you," Steve smiled. He called out, and, one by one, Ruth's girls came in, all five of

Introductions over – as was his hour with the girl of his choice – Will was taken in a convoy of three crew cars amid the light of that day, such as that light was, to the rocks of Almscliffe Crag which rose beyond that Harrogate road and which gave, in better daylight, views toward the Vale of York. And it was there, on those topmost now rain-spattered rocks, that he gave his solemn pledge of loyalty to that crew.

“You’re family now,” Steve said. “Understand?”

“Sure.” And they all knew he meant it.

“We have some simple rules. First, we don’t betray our own,” Steve said to him. “Anyone who does is killed. No questions; no quarter; no delay. You’re in this for life, and if you ever show enmity towards us, your family, we’ll hunt you down and kill you.”

Steve paused for a moment before continuing. “Second, we all have equal shares of whatever we take or whatever our enterprises earn. No favouritism. Third, we care for our family. We respect them. We look after them; look out for them. We will risk our own lives for them, if required. All of them – women, children; they’re all our comrades. If you disrespect any member of our family, our kindred, you’ll suffer – you’ll be put on trial, before us, you’ll say your piece, and be judged and, if necessary, punished.

“Fourth, it’s the mundanes and us. Our folk, our kindred, our band of comrades, our family, against the mundanes. The mundanes and their property, all they have, are our resource. Fifth, the laws of the mundanes are irrelevant to us. The government, and especially the Police, are our enemy, servants of the mundanes – we expect no favour from them, no quarter, and we give them no favours, no quarter. Understand?”

“Sure,” Will said. And they all knew he meant it.

“Also, there’s only one leader, one chief. Currently, it’s me. You got a grievance, something to say, you come to me, say it to me to my face, in full earshot of others. We don’t ever talk about one of our brothers, one of sisters, behind their backs. If you’ve got a grievance against me, you face me with it, in full earshot of others.

“If you ever have a dispute with any member of our family, our crew, you bring it out into the open. If we can’t settle among ourselves, then you’ll settle it between the two of you, by a fair fight.

“If you don’t like my leadership, challenge me for it, openly. If necessary, we’ll settle the matter by a duel with deadly weapons. So, for leadership it’s a duel; for other disputes, a fair fight, in front of comrades.

“There’s no leaving your family. You’re part of us now for life; you’re our brother, for life. If you want to settle down with someone, or get married, she has to be either one of us, or become one of us. No exceptions. Same with our women-folk, our sisters – if they are serious about someone, wanting to settle down with them, maybe even get hitched, then he has to be either one of us, or become one of us. No exceptions. Same if you move away for some reason – you’re still family; still bound by your oath; our rules; and we may ask for your help, anytime; just as you can ask for our help, anytime.”

“And one last thing,” Steve said. “We have our own, small, tattoo. Our mark.” And he smiled, saying, “although I don’t know where you’re going to put it.”

Steve laughed, Will laughed; everyone laughed, for Will’s arms, hands and neck were already covered with tattoos.

A WAY OF LIFE

A Way Of Life

There are those of us Dreccians who understand that the fundamental difference between our Kind and the Mundanes is the way of life. The way of life of Homo Hubris is one of segregation and conditioned “individualism.” By the word “individualism” I don’t mean the psychological state of being an individuated person. I mean to denote the person having been separated physically and psychologically from every other person as an individualistic unit who has no one to rely on but itself. Such a state of existence for a naturally social organism as we Humans are, not only causes stress and psychosis but it makes such segregated units easy prey for corporations and the State.

It is the same conditioned state of individualist segregation that gives a street gang power over a certain neighborhood or territory. The local residents of such neighborhood – although many in number – have not only been brainwashed into being individualized units, but they have also been conditioned – or trained – to look to some police to protect them like the hapless people they have been trained to be. Such individualize units do not have the ability to collect themselves into any kind of organized social order of mutual aid and mutual dependence.

It is this same conditioned affect that gives the State, Corporations, – the Magian and the 10 Percenters – power over an entire population of people. We have but to compare the so called developed Nation-States of Homo Hubris, with those Nation-States that are considered “developing” to see the difference.

It’s only in countries such as America, Europe, Japan and such in which most of the human population has been divided into individualized units [re: Citizens] that the countries’ government and its commercial interests wields so much control and power; which is translated as political and economic “stability.” If you’ve ever read a book called “Animal Farm” you will understand what is meant by the word “stability” here. It is the Farmer’s stable control and unchallenged exploitation of the Farm Animals.

Whereas in many countries such as most parts of Asia, Africa, and the Pacific Islands, where humans still are born into large, closely knit tribes of kinfolk and clans. A government, or political regime is not always a stable entity. In such a country where humans still naturally have a blood-based network of clanmates to depend on, many exploitative elements of Capitalism don't take hold, such as a heavy dependence on money and jobs.

So, the difference between a Dreccian and a Mundane must go much deeper than just superficial differences in philosophical idea and out looks on life and the world. The difference between us must go much deeper than just how we act and behave and what we do. The difference between us must go down to the depths of our humanness. Down to the very Foundation or Base or Fundamental of our human existence: The Family. Such that this concept of Our Family has become our most important exoteric and esoteric priority as Dreccians. As Anton Long recently states:

[Quote Anton Long]

For it is the development of our new sinister family, our new sinister kindred, which is both an exoteric and an esoteric priority, manifest as our new family is in our new tribes, and bound as our clannish family is and should be by our law of the sinister-numen.

In essence, therefore, we are – we, our kind, represent – a new culture, here on this planet we have called Earth; and it is the spread, the growth, of this new culture, of our new families, our tribes, which will begin to undermine, in a most important and a very practical way, the way of life, the societies, and the nation-States of the mundanes. This is and will continue to be a subversive revolution against the current Magian status quo and will lead, in the not too distant future in some area on this planet, to a practical armed insurrection, led by Vindex. – Prophet Of Vindex?

[End Quote]

The Mundane “Family.”

The mundane family consists of a segregated male and female pair in a secular marriage recognized by the state called a Husband and Wife. They will have children. In developed nations the number of offspring such a pair has is usually around 3. At the age of 5 the pair – by law – must send these children to State run public schools to be indoctrinated as individualized citizens. The cost of living in such developed States is increased, such that in the common Homo Hubris family both parents must work to support themselves. With the parents far too busy working to pay bills, the State has total mental and psychological control over their children from age 5 on up to train into the next generation of segregated citizens.

By the time these children reach the age of 18 they have been fully trained by the political regime to seek out their “independence” as young adults by getting a job, and find a mate. At the same time the parents of such children have been trained by the same State to force such children out of the home to live on their own. To struggle on their own in the real world, because that somehow builds strong character.

This cycle of training Homo Hubris into divided labourers is repeated with each generation. Such that each generation of Homo Hubris is literally born and bred to be mere wage earning debt ridden workers to support the children of the wealthy Magian and 10 Percenters. In affect if you understand, the relationship between the 10 Percenters and their bloodline with the common citizen, it is Parasitic.

Yet Homo Hubris never realizes that these 10 Percenters live their lives in a very different way. A 10 Percenter family is collective and not divided into independent units. Most often they are even known collectively by a collective name: The Rothschilds; The Rockefellers, and so on. Most often members of such families pool their political and financial resources together to consciously insure that their children will inherit the same power and wealth. It's that age old axiom we should all know by now: Divided And Conquer. It's the same strategy the British and other European Empires used to control and exploit other countries and other peoples. To remain united themselves as a political and economic force, while dividing the enemies they wish to conquer on a social level. By taking natural tribes and breaking such tribes down into nuclear family units who no longer trust and rely on their own next of kin. This is an assault on our very Humanness.

The Problem With Tribes

If the Drecc in such developed Nation-States continues to live their own lives in this way – divided and segregated into independent family Units, they are no better or no different from these Mundanes who are clearly being conditioned and indoctrinated to be controlled and made perpetual prey to the exploitation of the Magian 10 Percenters and their bloodlines.

The difference between us must begin at the very core of our human existence: the Family. Such that this focus on our family will determine – wyrdfully – the success of our efforts in the future: the Liberation of our own bloodlines and progeny from this invisible slavery, and this geopolitical Magian-Zionist labour camp we call the Nation-State.

The fundamental difference between a tribal clan and a nuclear family of Homo Hubris is one of Culture. The former having no Culture at all as Magian religions and ethos have replaced what was once their Numinous Ancestral Cultures with trinkets of childish beliefs and stories.

White Homo Hubris did not always live in divided family units in ancient times. There was a time when they were also tribal. There was a time when most of Europe were not divided into Nation-States, but into territories controlled by vast networks of indigenous tribes such as the Germanic Tribes and the Celtic Tribes. Each Tribe being composed of “clan” or large social orderings of mutually dependent kinfolk. This was it, to the basic fundamental of “familial” structure back then. There was no such thing back then as the concept of “family” as we know it today.

It was the fledgling Roman Empire that learned to annex new territory by setting indigenous tribe against tribe and conditioning their vanquished subjects into adopting the memetic identity of a “Roman Citizen” as opposed to their own numinous and natural tribal identity. Christianity would later take this concept further by forcing people to adopt their memetic identity while at the same time dividing what clans and tribes were left over into “families.”

You will wonder why the Roman Empire, and later Christianity, even bothered to assert so much force and energy in breaking apart tribes and clans to produce the concept of a nuclear family: Father, wife, and children. It's because tribes are organized and they come with Warriors, and those Warriors kill. You won't go anywhere as a political regime of an Empire or as the Magian Patriarchs of Christendom, if the people you wish to dominate, subjugate, and control have their own tribal culture and hordes of armed tribal warriors who would kill you in a heartbeat for even looking at them funny.

It only takes a study of New Guinea and the after effects of Christian Missionaries on the native tribes. What were once fiercely rabid head hunting self-reliant tribes were broken down by Magian Ethos into a race of poverty stricken domesticated humans.

Such people are sometimes called “Savages” in Homo Hubris lingo. You remember such murderous Savages as the tribal warriors giving Romans a hard time, like the Barbarians. Or those who gave European kingdoms a hard time like the Zulu of South Africa, The Aztec of Mexico, the Indigenous tribes and Warriors of the America's and Australia. Or our modern day Barbarians, we derogatorily call “terrorists.”

We seem to assume that because we humans live in this technologically advanced age of ours that we all have grown out of such “savage” ways. But this is not the fact. It's now been confirmed by science that those olden day tribal Warriors that gave Homo Hubris imperialists a hard time actually past what is called the “Warrior Gene” down to their modern descendants call gangbangers. Geneticists now know that the segment of modern society that are most prone to violence and joining what we today call street gangs all have this Warrior Gene in their DNA makeup. Such that, taking a quick look at your everyday gang of any kind today, you would be able to see that such gang members are indeed blood descendants of ancient Warriors and once fiercely tribal peoples.

A quick look at the gangs that plagues the streets of America will show that most gang affiliates today are of African and Latino ethnicity: descendants of African and Aztec tribal Warriors. With Asians and Whites [skin heads] coming in second: descendants of various Asian tribes, Genghis Khan and his Warriors, and the Blond Berserk Vikings [and the various other Germanic Tribes]. These people are still in-tune to their ancestral Warrior Blood which is expressed in their formations of “gangs” and in their actions and deeds often – understandably – outlawed.

And such tribal Warriors and such violence have always been outlawed since the days berserk Vikings and Germanic Barbarian Warriors threatened Pax Britanica & Pax Romana. These modern day Warriors, still in touch with their essential and primal humanness and ancestral tribal ways, are our breed – in whose blood and genes is etched our sinister creed. From whose blood shall flow forth the Warriors of the future who shall be lead by Vindex to destroy these Nation-States. But such a future war, must first begin with a struggle today. A struggle to undo what the Magian Ethos has done to us. A struggle to reclaim our humanness and tribal nature.

A Modern Tribal Family

I don't even think there is a word in Khmer which actually means what the word "family" means in English. Fortunately for me, I was raised aware of both a tribal "clannish" way and a Homo Hubris family way [from my friends]. In English when I hear the word "family" I think of a mom, a dad, and kids living in a house. In Khmer, the only word I really have ever heard used to refer to me and all of my relatives is /Crusa/ [krooh-sah] which implies something big and far reaching like an ocean. A Crusa to us means my grand mother, her husband, all of their siblings and cousins; all of their children and grand children down to the youngest.

We call everybody in our crusa around my grandmother's age or generation "grandmothers" and "grandfathers," without any distinction. We call everybody in our crusa of our parents' generation and age "aunts" and "uncles." And everyone of my generation in our crusa is a "brother" or "sister." That's all the "familial labels" we use.

These very few and simple familial labels are so important in our clan/culture that they are also used as our only proper pronouns in the register we speak. It's considered barbaric and vulgar to use pronouns [such as "I," "you," and so on] because only peasants use those words. I still don't know how to say "you," or "he," or "she," or "they," in Khmer. Using such pronouns causes an emotional and psychological separation between two people, because the two people talking automatically becomes an "I" and a "you," which implies a separation or that there is no relationship or recognition of kinship present. In this way, the tribal culture, or collective clannish way of life is actually embedded in the language itself. And those of us who are intelligent, knows that our language we speak and think with greatly influences how we see and understand the world and our reality.

For instance, if I wanted to ask my grandma to make me something to eat I would literally have to say: "Can the Grand Mother make the Grand Daughter something to eat?" Or if I wanted to say "they," or "them," I'd have to say: "pboog nu," or "pboog ghe," which means "those other people." After a lifetime of being raise hearing these familial labels used in place of pronouns, we all are drenched inside a culture and an emotional "knowing" that we are not separate individuals; but a member of a collective. I got so use to using these familial labels that when I started going to school I had a hard time figuring out how to talk to the teacher because calling my teacher a "you" when speaking to her in my mind is vulgar and disrespectful and suggests that I want nothing to do with her as a person.

It seems stupid and simple compared to English with all of its "great uncles," "second cousin twice removes" junk. I still don't even know how to go by those things and I was born and raised in America. The way English has it, people feel distant. When you talk about a cousin or great uncle you know they are distant emotionally and psychologically. But if you were born and raised calling every old person grandma, and ever male in your family uncles, and everybody your age brothers and sisters, things are much close, and you end up giving the same amount of love and respect to one uncle as to any uncle and such, because you can't tell anybody apart as far as how exactly they are associated with you.

I actually ask my mom [my biological dad does too] to explain to me in English terms how people in our crusa are related to me, and it's very difficult for her to do so because there just aren't enough of those labels to explain such distant relationships: when such distance doesn't even exist. For instance, I heard that my cousin Andy's parents are blood related. So me and Andy [and my dad] were shocked to hear this so we asked my mom to explain to us just how they were blood related. And she had to explain it this way: "Well, lets see. It's like my uncle who was born out of my grandmother: the one that gave birth to my mother, had a son and that son married Chloe. That's how they are to each other." I said: "Eewe, Andy your parents are niece and uncle! No wonder your retarded." Then my mom said: "It's not eewe. That's just our culture and tradition. What do you think my parents were: they are to each other, what you and Andy are."

My mom has 9 birth siblings. And my grand mother [my mom's mom] has 10 birth siblings and about 30 blood cousins scattered in Thailand, America, France, Australia, and Cambodia. So I remember growing up going to all these weddings ceremonies, tons of them. A traditional Khmer wedding ceremony takes 3 days: 1 day of 5 monks boringly chanting all day, 1 day for the actual ceremony, and 1 day for the party or banquet. It started when I was young, I'd notice all these hundreds of guests during those three days. And as I got older and became more aware, me and my girl cousins started wondering why we kept on seeing the same 500 guests over and over again at every weddings? And we had been to an awful lot already. So one day when one of our uncles was getting married we asked the table of aunts we were sitting with: "What's wrong? Who is the uncle marrying? Every time there's a wedding we see the same 500 faces and guests? Where's the Bride's "family" at?" Everybody just laughed and one of them said: "Those aren't guests; you're the bride's family."

There were other strange things about my family which I discovered. These were things I thought was actually "Khmer culture" as in every Khmer family just did it because it was culture or something. I knew white American families didn't do it. There's no word for it, so I call it "Kid Swapping." Even though my mom gave birth to me, I hardly lived with or was raised my birth mom. I grew up living with and being raised by a birth sister of my birth mother [an auntie] which we call a /Madai-Mieng/ which means: Mother-Aunt. A Mother-Aunt is much different from a normal other aunt, because she's your second mother, who is loved and honoured on the same sacred level as one's birth mother. My mother-aunt was Andy's birth mother, who called me daughter like my birth mother does.

And it's weird because it happened all the time and it happens very easily. If a blood aunt has a baby, and that aunt's sister says: "Oh, what a cute baby, can I have her/him" the birth aunt will just say: "Yeah here." That's it, and it's not just babysitting, we're talking about a life long "having." I was raised by my mother-aunt from birth to the age of 15. Of my 20 direct cousins, at least a quarter of them were raised like this by an aunt and not their birth mothers. My cousin Tiffany was raised her whole life by one of our aunts, and now she lives with our grandmother. Tiffany never in her 18 years of life has ever lived with or was raised by her birth mother. But her mom still loves her and gives her money.

I thought every Khmer family did this until I met an outsider [unrelated] Khmer girl in school [she had dark skin]. After making friends with her I noticed she and her parents talk Khmer really different when I was over at her house. They used words of a lower register, which we would call “barbaric” or “vulgar,” and “peasantile” in my family, which I never heard used in my family; like pronouns. So I asked her if those were her real parents, and if her family kid swaps. And she thought I was crazy? I was so shocked by the way her parents talked and how they thought kid swapping was crazy that I went to go tell my mom and mom-aunt, and they said I can’t be friends with her any more because she was a barbaric peasant who has no “Pbooj,” and that was why they don’t do things the way we do.

The Blood Of A Tribe

“Pbooj” is a weird word I hear very often, but I don’t know the exact idiomatic meaning to. Every breed of Khmer that is a barbaric peasant seems to not have “pbooj,” and every body who lives like us and has our “culture” seems to have “pbooj” – so I’m told by my elders. This concept of pbooj seems to be closely associated with our grand parents, fathers and blood, meaning that if your grand parents had “pbooj” then you did too. Luckily I have the internet and I learned that the word “pbooj” comes from the Pali word for “Seed/sperm.” Which doesn’t reveal much, other than that whatever “pbooj” is idiomatically, it is past down through the male line to their children.

The only person in my family who knows enough English words to use to intelligently explain things to me is one my “dtoodt” which means “great grand father.” I don’t know his first name, as in our family you aren’t allowed to ever use names. He’s pure ethnic Chinese but his mother tongue is Khmer, while his wife [our great grand mother] is a half Laotian half Thai aristocrat who never work once in her 90 years of existence. Even at 90 something, the great grand father can still walk and do chores in the yard, and talk up a storm about past and current politics [he’s republican]. I actually grew up not knowing the names of any body in my family, and I still don’t know most of my own 9 aunts and uncles’ names. This “dtoodt” is my birth grandmother’s birth uncle who was Cambodia’s Ambassador to the US around the early 50’s before the revolution. He was educated in France, and speaks perfect French and English; which makes talking with him easy for me.

So I asked the great grand dad what “pbooj” meant one day. And he says: “Like rice crops you see? If a rice plant has long grains that is soft when cooked, it has the “pbooj” to make long grains see? If a rice plant has short grains that makes hard rice when cooked, we know that is it’s “pbooj.” So we can tell if we plant that short grained pbooj that we will always get plants that make short grain no matter how far in the future or past you go. The pbooj of a plant, like the pbooj of a person, determines who and what things are in life. So, if a farmer has the pbooj of a farmer, and his ancestors have been illiterate and barbaric farmers for hundreds of years, so that their brains and mind has become only able to handle such tasks, what would such a pbooj only produce?” I said: “Only the same kind.” And he said: “Correct. When a crop of rice grows wild and nobody has used their intelligence to change that wild crop to make good crops with good grains that cook good, then we say it has no pbooj.” From that word [Pbooj] comes the Khmer word /Pboog/ or /Pug/ related to the Pali word “Pugala” both meaning a “Race,” “Breed,” “Tribe,” “Kind,” “People.”

The concept of “pbooj” is not one based strictly on the blood of rich aristocrats. It based more on the quality and natural character, potential, and/or essence of a person. Which quality can be pasted down by specific methods of intelligent breeding. Or deluded over time by aimlessly reproducing.

So, when you have someone like me in the family who is mixed blooded we're called a "Gone Gat." Gone meaning "Child" and "Gat" meaning "Cut," or "to be cut in pieces." In English when someone is of a "Mixed" race, that gives the idea that two or more different kinds of races came together and got "mixed" up. But in my family and culture, a mixed blooded person is said to have "Chiam Gat," meaning "Cut Blood," or the Blood has been cut into pieces, suggesting an impurity. So a mixed child isn't "mixed." It is a child whose blood has been cut up and deluded; whose "pbooj" has been contaminated by something foreign. In the same sense that a recognized pure bred dog's line can be ruined if a mut mates with it.

When it comes to mating and reproduction, in the culture/family that I was raised in, it is entirely controlled and utilizes what the Occident might sometimes call "eugenics." The marriages are predetermined. None of my aunts and uncles had the freedom to chose who they got married to. That choice was made by the old grandmothers talking amongst each other. They talk about things like what the 'soon to be married' parents are like, what those parents did for a living, if those parents have blood relatives with birth defects; if those parents have any peasant relatives; what the grand parents of the couple are like; what they looked liked and what they did in life.

Then the old ladies would go visit everyone directly or immediate related to each of the couple to inspect them for how smart everybody is, if anybody has any birth defects; how they carry themselves; what register or form of language they use; their natural demeanor, and such. Then they talk about the other stuff: things like money, does the parents and grandparents come with the ability to generate money or do they spend to much and end up poor; about land and if the boy is well bred with goals in life, manners, and respects his mother; and if the girl is pretty and would make a good mother, and if she has "family values" meaning tribal nature in this context.

Outsiders are only outsiders because they do not have or live the same culture we do. But I have plenty of cousins who are of mixed ethnicity. Usually their dads are of a different race who adopts our way of life by "going native." Like my biological dad is Mexican. He's of Portuguese and mestizo ancestry. The elders of my family put my dad through the same scrutiny to determine if he had "noble pbooj," and that nobody was deformed or crazy in his family. So it isn't really a matter of purity of race and ethnicity with pbooj. It's the purity of nobility of blood, as opposed to deluded plebeian blood.

It's about ancestry and blood, and the types of people that ancestry and blood will produce. Such that bad ancestry and bad blood, makes worthless common stock humans. There are two sayings in my family/clan that goes: "Orange trees grow orange fruit and never apples;" & "The fruit never falls far from the tree." So that when you observe say a hard working Chinese whose father also has that culture of hard working ethics, you know that the guy's offspring will come out imbued with that same quality and culture of hard work. In the same sense that if you had a woman who is disrespectful with her mother, is a slut, is not connected to her family, and her mother was a drug addict, then you know that such a woman will yield a worthless stock of offspring; because that quality, or culture is past down. As one of the meanings of Wyrd. For who we each are, and what actions we weave in life not only affects and influences our own lives, but weaves into being the lives of our progeny.

It's easy to see this when you are a member of a huge family/clan. You just look at your 100 cousin or so and always you notice that if their dads are nerdy they all come out smart and nerdy; and if their dads were delinquent in their youth, the cousins all come out gangbangers. It even goes to the point where if the uncle has tattoos, then their sons end up having tats. Cousins who have direct grandfathers that like to read and write – like me – end up liking to read and write. Cousins that have direct grandfathers that became monks, end up either becoming monks or are deeply religious.

Home Life

Our family has about 12 houses altogether. The 9 aunts and uncles and their husbands and wives own the houses respectively. But things are so weird in my family with the kid swapping and clannish stuff that there doesn't seem to be an "emotional boarder" between those houses. For instance I have my own bedroom at my birth mom's house; my own room at my mom-aunt's home; a room I share with another cousin at my birth grandma's house [which the aunts and uncles bought for her] and I have my own room at one of my uncle's house up north. It gets even weirder because some of our aunts own their own homes, but they rent those houses out and instead live with our grandma.

So at my grandma's house [who is 80], she has not only some of her children living with her, but also her grand children. In my family nobody moves out or seems to move out ever. We just literally drift from house to house forever. One of my aunties is 55 years old and she AND her son who is my age lives with my grandma. Just because you get married doesn't mean your going anywhere either. I have a girl cousin that is married and has a 2 year old daughter who lives at my grandma's house with her husband and daughter. And then my other auntie with my 9 year old girl cousin lives in the same house – even though she owns her own house in Vegas she rents outs.

My family also does something we call /Song Kun/. "Song" means to "Repay," and "Kun" means a certain kind of sacred debt or duty you owe to your mother for giving you life. I thought all Khmer families practice this too since everyone uses those words. But that's not the case. In my family/culture we are basically Brahmanistic Buddhists. The belief in gods and spirits is there. But your birth mother in our culture and tradition is the only Goddess you will ever have and know in life who is said to be more higher than the Buddha himself, because she literally gave you Life and the Buddha didn't. The Buddha is just a teacher, you mother is your god.

Making your mother cry is a real sin [bad Karma] in my family/culture. My grandma says you spend 7 years in the lowest pits of the 1st level of hell for every tear you cause to fall out of your mother's eyes. The 7th level of hell is reserved for men who kill their mothers. Every year on your mother's birthday is perhaps the Holiest day of your year. It's when you get 5 Buddhist monks to chant for 4 hours straight. Then you feed the monks and every body that came out of my grandma's womb lines up in a line [children, grandchildren, down to the little great grand children]. She sits in a chair and everybody one by one washes her feet and prostrates three times and ask her to wash your bad karma away and to bless them with health and prosperity. Then you hand her an envelope of money, or gifts of gold. This helps you pay your Kun back.

In our family the more practical aspect of "Song Kun" is when you "kick up" money to your mother every month. It's like tithing a portion of your income, but you give it to your mother. My grandma has 9 adult kids, and they all work and/or own a business. Each of my aunts and uncles kick up to her between $500-$1000 per month depending on how much they can afford that month. The husbands or wives that married my aunts and uncles have no say; if they reject the idea of giving money to my grandma, it's an automatic divorce the next day. I've seen it happen. My grandma gets retirement money for being old and she gets her monthly kick ups which is roughly $5000 per month.

Needless to say, all of the grandma and grandpas have many children. I don't know a single gramma-grampa couple related to my own grandma that has less then 5 children. If you have less then 5 children, you're considered a poor old lady. My grandma's sister [who past on] has 12 kids of her own. She died with bank! When somebody old passes away us cousins call that "cashing out," because you get "kick downs." You can live a pretty comfortable life if your aristocratic granny has 9 kids without knowing much about responsibilities. That money gives the grannies sheer power over us cousins. She'll buy you a new car if you're a grand daughter and if you promise not to get randomly pregnant and that you won't marry an outsider. I got a Lexus. The boy cousins have to go to college and actually do things for their kick downs.

Sexism and gender bias definitely exists in our family/culture. First our whole culture is matriarchal based. The old grandpas or males have their things they do or use to do for the family such as the secular stuff and the jobs and business. In the old days before the revolution this meant running the State. My grandma has brother and male cousins who were once ambassadors, prime ministers, advisers to the king, & generals. Most were killed by the Khmer Rouge. The old grandmas or ladies took care of the family and domestic stuff, which includes the finances of their families. What they use to do is collect each other into a mutual and pool their kick up money to buy businesses or loan out to borrowers on interest; then have their adult grand kids start up more businesses.

So in this culture boys have to work and build a name for themselves; if they want a reputable wife. Girls on the other hand are Social Currency for a family used to merge with other families or to climb the social rank and status. Having a well raised pretty daughter or grand daughter to these old ladies meant more money, power, and privilege in the old days. For example if in your city a boy from a different crusa [family] was the chief of police, and the grannies wanted certain privileges in that city, they would go talk to the boy's grandparents and negotiate a marriage with one of their pretty daughters or grand daughters backed up by a huge family with a good reputation which has its male tentacles in high places.

The old grannies no longer live in their old country since the communist peasant bastards killed half of their clans and chased the rest out. But they brought their way of life with them to America. And it's when you learn to compare the wyrd of such a clannish culture to the wyrd of the common way of life of an American mundane that you begin to see a great big difference. A difference as great as the difference between a colony of ants and locusts living aimlessly for the moment.

The Way Things Were

So you have a familiar situation in this old country before the revolution where the power and wealth was in the hands of the very few and where the many common citizen were kept in a state of perpetual poverty, servitude, and dependence on those that had money and power. How does a vast population of millions remain in such states of poverty, servitude, and dependence from one generation to the next? And how do those with the power and money keep what status, social rank, wealth and power from one generation to the next? The question is: Why does not Time change anything?

Us young cousins have this odd chore of giving the old grannies massages to kneed and pound their old flesh and joints during which time the grannies will talk amongst themselves while we drift off into some day dream from the sheer tedium of the chore. Usually the grannies complain, and weep, and reminisce about what they lost and what could have been. And almost always one of the grannies will say to the others: "That's what you get for educating peasants. Teach them to read and they think they own the country."

In their days, long before the revolution their crusas [clans] were connected by business and marriage with every other aristocratic crusa who collectively dominated the upper levels of the State. Everything from government offices, to offices in the military, to major industries were dominated by these handfuls of crusas; which were mostly of ancestral Thai origins since Cambodia was annex by Thailand. Thailand didn't give up Cambodia until they tried to join the UN. The UN wanted Thailand to give back Cambodia to the Cambodians. America objected to the idea of an independent country of Cambodia; but eventually the UN won and Thailand gave up most of Cambodia, keeping the provinces of Siemriep, and Battambang [my family came from both] until a boarder readjustment was made in 1960 by the UN. So we're not even Cambodian. We just speak the language.

The "middle [working] class" were the light skinned immigrant Chinese, who worked hard and most times learned the culture of the upper ranks to breed their daughters as Social Capital to marry into those upper class families. So that even in the 1960's it wasn't unusual for the upper ranks of the country to be mixed with Chinese [like my 'family'].

At the very bottom were the ethnic Khmer who are actually very dark skinned, and with them the Vietnamese immigrants. This group since feudal times had no freedom or rights. They were only allowed to work their fields as farmers. Like they always had for hundreds of years. The school systems were also run by the upper class families who had their relatives as teachers. Since it cost money to go to school, and since you past school without effort if you were related to an upper class family. The peasants who could afford to go to school were wasting their time in school anyways because you had to be related to one of the upper class families to even get a real job in the city.

So this is how the lower ranks of this society were kept in a perpetual state of servitude. First they were kept stupid and/or under educated. Second they were divided into individual small incoherent families. Third they were allowed to live out their mundane lives mindlessly breeding with other peasants aimlessly producing the next generation of prey. In a way the upper ranks learned to use Time to their advantage by coherently focusing their collective force of an old generation to help and support their younger generations. So that each generation inherited more means of money and power. Whereas the lower levels of society incoherently lived their lives out without focusing any of their force on their children.

But of course that peasant Pol Pot got educated in France and he came back learning about abominable things like plebeian freedom and communism and he thought he'd teach his fellow peasant Khmer and Vietnamese commoners about plebeian rights. So the country went to hell in bloody revolution. And it still is in hell, or what we might call Plebeian Democracy, which translated into a mob of idiot peasants and vulgar commoners trying to live their own lives and other people's lives too.

Which will only produce misery, because you're dealing with a vulgar race/breed whose line is bred to make people who can barely think for themselves, who have no aeonic hival culture. Meaning that these plebeians are Time Blind and cannot or do not have it in their nature to use time wyrdfully to produce anything constructive long term wise. It's like giving money to one of these vulgar people. What do they do with it? Oblivious to Time, they spend it all for a moment of pleasure. Give them a life and what do they do with it? Oblivious to Time, they work meaningless jobs for money to buy beer to drink and as long as they have a girlfriend or wife to have sex with, these plebeians are happy, like idiot locusts. You give these same idiot mundanes a country and what do they do with it? Oblivious to Time, they use it for fleeting pleasures and petty wars.

The Fundamental Difference

Can you discern the difference between these two groups of peoples? Between the Hive Culture of ants and bees and the locust? Between those who know how to use Time to the advantage of their progeny and those that are Time Blind? The fundamental difference is essentially Coherency and Organization; which seems to be the underlying secret of the Cosmos. Things in nature which are organized in coherent patterns behave much differently than things that are disorganized and incoherent don't they? In this light, if I were to ask you which of the two: the coherent and organized clan versus a disorganized and incoherent family unit; actually uses intelligence and the force of will to manifest their future; which of the two would you pick?

So we come to understand some important "secret" factors or ingredients of power, and wealth, haven't we: Coherency, Organization, Time/Aeonics, Intelligence, Will Power, Application. Such that we begin to realize that such a way of life is indeed a Magickal way of living in that when these factors are applied to causal reality, the collective force of the people involved changes and alters that reality to materialize and manifest certain things they may desire, and a willed future and world for their progeny.

If we now take a look back at our collective human history since the dawn of our species, and we ask ourselves what kind of humans actually pushed humanity forward as a species? The disorganized and often vanquished humans, or the organized humans? It has always been the organized humans who exist in a coherent tribe or force that has had the power to assert and exert their collective force upon the world and over those disorganized humans to gradually – over time – change the world and our species. Whereas the vanquished and conquered have remained virtually the same common stock idiot race over the thousands of years.

This essential difference adds up to wealth and power in a very short period of time. The old folks in my clan/family came to the US in the early 1980's having lost everything: their relatives, their land, their wealth; without a penny to their name. They might have lost everything, but such things are only wyrdful results of their collective culture: a culture which could not be taken away from them. The first 10 years I suppose was spent regrouping and adapting to the new environment. And back then there was very little money in the family. 10 years after that – after applying their collective culture – they remanifested everything they lost, except for political power.

The difference is one of focus. The ways of the common stock American citizen each striving to be some independent loner who ends up exploited by corporate America, and whose focus is on acquiring himself material good to indulge his brief existence with superficial things. These people will mate with the most convenient girl, mindless of ancestry and blood. They will aimlessly breed children. Kick them out when they are 18 to teach them about independence. And in old age, after a life long servitude to the State and corporations, they are forgotten in a nursing home. As the children they made take their place.

But a clan, such my family, has their focus on different things. Each generation is focused on something different. The elders focus their collective force on the young cousins, to insure that they inherit not only the clan's culture, but the collective wealth of the clan, in exchange for devoted work to get the clan to become more prosperous. The middle aged adults focus their devotion on caring for the elders. No elder family member is cast out into some nursing home ever. They are born in the clan, and they die in our homes. And the cousins work to devoting their lives to support the middle aged adults by working their businesses, going to college, and breeding the next generation.

There is a saying in my family that goes: "A mother can take care of 10 children, but her 10 children will not be able to take care of her." Which is to say that a mother can care for and provide for her children, but when she becomes an elderly woman, her grown children will find it very hard to care for her. So elders in our family, and the caring of them, is a communal effort. As everything is a communal effort – a synergy of collective will, force, and intelligence, applied to manifest results.

A Way Of Life

What is exactly meant by the phrase "a way of life" anyways? I often meet people who convert to a different religion and claim that their conversion is a change in their way of life. Or I know people who "discovered" they were gay, and so they believe living a gay life style is a change in their way of life. As if to say that Life is a momentary event that can be simply changed by adopting a different set of opinions or sexuality or friends or moving to a new city. But has anything really changed of how these people live their lives?

They will continue to go through life expressing the “culture” they were raised in, because Life isn’t a momentary event. It’s a continuous domino effect which begins with your birth and how you were raised and conditioned, and continues through the children you make. Such that how you live your life now – as you were raised – determines the wyrdful potential of your children’s lives. What you do now, will determine your offspring’s lot in life in the future. It’s easy for us to sit here and hate Magians, or 10 Percenters, or Zionists, for exploiting us. But we are in such a condition in life because of the wyrd of our ancestors. And if you don’t do anything about that condition today, you will only breed the next generation of exploited people who will do little more than complain like you once did.

If you were raised and conditioned inside a very small unorganized nuclear family, no matter what your beliefs are or what life style you live, you will always pass that culture and way of small family units down to your children, and they to their children. So that from a Chronomorphic perspective your bloodline’s entire line of existence have never changed in a thousand years. Just as your ancestors were bred to live in segregated family units to work, so will all of your descendants live that way of life to remain exploited by those more collective than you.

Independence is the mystical key word of this breed of broken down humanity, bred and conditioned for thousands of years to produce independent human drones, the better for a predatorial collective of Magians and 10 Percenters, of States and Corporations, or Religions and Priesthoods to exploit.

You were raised brainwashed into believing that humans are some kind of solitary loner animal. You were raised to strive for your independence: to be a self reliant unit. You getting your driver’s license marked the great day of your life of exploitation because you were no longer dependent on anybody to drive you places.

Your trained parents, secular schools run by corporations, and the State pushed you further and encouraged you to seek more independence: “Get a job and move out like everybody else and you’ll truly be Independent!” So you do, drifting further away from what little family you had during your college years.

So you get married with a Homo Hubris girl trained to also strive for her independence. You’ll have 3 kids and raise them to strive for their independence like you were raised by making them do things on their own for themselves. You’ll both go to work 45 hours a week, and the State will raise your 3 kids to live the way you did.

Even when you have grown old, your Hubris society teaches you to struggle to be an independent old man and old lady, and to not depend on others, except for the medical industry who will suck the living life out of you for everything you are worth until you die. That’s your way of life. That’s what is meant by a “Way” of Life.

How do you as a human who lives life that way, hope to ever change and alter society or human civilization? When you can't even come to realize that you were never able to change your own way of life? When you never realized that you, as your ancestors, were bred, trained and conditioned to see such a life of being an independent unit to be the greatest goal of your human existence, which actually made you a weak prey which becomes co-dependent on the State, and Corporations.

Adopting a new belief, out look on life, word view, religion, sexuality, life style, place of residence, wardrobe, does not change the Way you have been trained to live life. Such things only keep you from realizing that nothing about your way of life has changed.

You are human. You are a social organism. It is in your essential nature as a causal being to be dependent on something. Reptiles are born genuinely independent. They hatch from their egg and live their lives from the get go, not needing anybody. Independence is a concept alien to a social organism's natural way of existence. There is no such thing in nature as an "independent" and self sustaining primate. There is no such thing as an individual and independent baboon or chimpanzee any where in nature. There is something very wrong with something if you see a lone monkey in nature. But you can't see this same "wrongness" when you are psychologically alienated and emotionally isolated into an individualized independent human.

You were born completely helpless, and spend 18-20 years of your life dependent on others. Those early 20 years of your human life is nature's way of "teaching" you your human nature of dependence on your tribal relations. You will, as a human, live your human existence dependent on something or someone. Either your family or the State, the choice is yours. But you were never given that choice, because the State made that choice for you. It's like dogs and wolves: you are either dependent on your pack, or on your Master. A Master who has separated you from your pack and who has conditioned you to be dependent on him.

I was raised very differently. Devotion is the essence of our way of life. As Shakti manifests herself as the ground we walk on, the food we eat, the mothers that give birth to us, to Devote herself to her creatures. So to does a Mother devote herself and serve her children. Both my mothers [biological and aunt-mom] raised me understanding that we express our love and affection for one another not in words, but also in deeds: through our Devotion of Service for and to one another. We serve those we love, not because we are inferior, but out of the sacred virtue of devotion; because it is a sacred duty.

I grew up like most of my cousins not knowing what chores were because my mothers did everything for me. I grew up never having to serve myself dinner or lunch because my moms and aunts just brought me my food. I only started doing my own laundry when I moved out actually. And I reciprocate that devotion to my family.

This culture of devotion to one another does something to you. It has its practical values. It breeds generations of people who are utterly dependent on their blood relations, in such a way that they would be lost and confused in life if they/we were isolated from our clan, family, and tribe. Being completely dependent on a huge family you don't see a government or jobs or banks or the State or the police the same way as others.

I don't need a bank when got 500 people to borrow money from. I don't need to buy a car when there's 20 cars not being used or when my grandma will just buy me one. I don't need a job when I have no real bills to pay and when the family has a dozen family businesses. I don't need the police when I got 50 boy cousins with fists. I don't need a house, when there's about 12 I can live in. I'm not going to waste my time and life working for the State or some 10 Percenter corporation, when I can invest my time and energy in my own family to insure that I'll be taken care of later in life.

Dreccian Tribes

The Order of Nine Angles has been progressive in the making – evolving and shapeshifting – for at least the past 30 years. Over the decades it has picked up experiences, magick, occult insights, methodologies, its own ontology, theology, cosmology; its own science based on rational thinking and Natural Philosophy. Its Sinister Way has now developed into a Tribal Way of Life and Movement. But a Way of Life goes far deeper than just perpetrating unlawful acts. There is a difference between doing something, believing in something, and Living Life. All Sinister Initiates needs to do now is go all the way and Live that clannish Way of Life with their sworn brothers and sisters of the Sinister Way: Together, Coherently, and Organized.

You don't have to be born into a huge clannish family to know how to live in a tribal manner. Like an example I used earlier: It's like a dog. Dogs are bred for a purpose: to look certain ways and to be domestic pets. We assume that there is nothing primal and feral about these dogs. But when such dogs are abandoned or rejected onto the streets, something beautiful happens. All those centuries of breeding, and all those years of domestication crumbles away and that dog comes into its own ancestral Nature. Such that such feral street dogs needs no training to form dog packs for mutual dependency and mutual survival. Because that Pack Nature was always a part of that dog. It was just that such Primal Nature was covered up by the illusion of domestication.

My Mexican dad, and some of my cousins' white fathers came from a domesticated stock of humans who had long lost touch with their Nature Given Pack Nature. But they made a choice to "go native" and quickly came to Dis-Cover their own tribal nature. And it's the same case with such things as urban street gangs and skinhead gangs. Nobody must teach these boys how to form their gangs, what to do with their gangs, and how to be a member of those gangs. It's in their blood. All it takes is a choice and being exposed to the right conditions, and Nature literally takes her course to bring out the Pack Wolf in you. That Pack Wolf Nature which not even centuries of domestication can smother.

Just as your natural primal nature is a threat to the laws of religion in the sense that all which is natural contradicts Magian morals; so is that same natural primal nature a very real threat to the law and power of the State. It's why they work so hard to divide you into independent domesticated units. Because when you are divided, you are easier to control. When you genuinely Realize this game of divide, domesticate, and conquer; you will begin to realize that a State simply cannot exist nor would a State have any power or control over a people, if those people were collected into fierce self-sufficient, self-reliant tribes. Especially if those tribes come with armed Warriors. It is because of your willingness to be divided, domesticated, and vanquished, and because you perpetuate that plebeian – mundane – way of life they have trained you to live that causes the State to exist.

Destroying a Nation-State, and disrupting a State's monopoly on Power does not always have to be bloody revolution. There are other methods of disrupting the State's power monopoly, and all methods should be used by the Drecc. The Church cannot exist without the Sinner. The State cannot exist without the individualized citizens. And both the Church and State exist because of illusions and abstractions. The illusion of being a sinner. The illusion of domestication and independence. The illusion the abstract State paints to make it seem as though government and a police State is needed for the your safety and sheer survival. That's the same psychological bullshit a pimp tells one of his bitches. Do you realize that? Have you ever had an over powering and controlling boyfriend or husband you broke up who told you: "You're nothing without me!" You will remain in that destructive relationship as long as you believe him.

So long as you continue to play their games according to their rules, you will not only continue to be exploited, but you yourself are responsible for that exploitation. This is something we all should have learned from Satanism and the Sinister Way. Christianity has no power over you or anything if you understand that sin doesn't exist. You merely had to think for yourself and live your life in tune with your primal Nature to destroy the power monopoly Christianity had on old world Europe.

And it's no different with a State. You merely have to reconnect with that primal nature; return to your natural tribal nature, and realize that what you have been taught by the State are empty lies; to disrupt the State's power monopoly. It's not going to take a single life time. Just like it didn't take a single lifetime to destroy the power of the Catholic Church. It took certain intellectual rebels to risk their lives thinking for themselves, and it took many decades and centuries of gradually teaching those idiot plebeians about science. It will take the same effort with the State. It will not only take practical violence and revolution; but it will take each of us a conscious willed effort to return back to our natural tribal ways.

Returning back to those tribal ways begins with an understanding of why you have been conditioned by the State to strive to be an independent domesticated human and choosing to live in the opposite way of what has been established by mundanes. It begins by genuinely making the Sinister Way your Way of Life. Which involves seeking out those who have the same sinister blood and essence that resonates with your own, and to consciously – by power of will – devote ourselves to one another as a single Family; related to each other by the Natural, Feral, and Numinous sinister essence of our blood; and by the Law of the Sinister-Numen: Offspring of the same Mistress of the Earth.

Our Way of Life matures in how we will each raise our children and to whom we give our honour, loyalty, and duty to in life. Our Way of Life will bare fruit in the days of our children's children with a thriving, living tribal culture. But it all begins with the will to genuinely be different from the mundanes. If you do not have the resource of a huge family: Then forge one; with those liberated dogs who have found their feral wolf nature. That same nature you have Dis-Covered beneath your civil domestication. Because in the end, a family is nothing more than an order of people who recognize each other as kin, who are dependent on each other, and who have the culture of devoting themselves mutually to one another under the auspice of Honour, Loyalty, and Duty. The blood relations of a tribe is merely a causal result of such an ordering of loyal individuals over Time after breeding with one another to pass their essence and kind through their blood down to the next generation who will inherit that tribe and culture.

ABYSSAL DARK

I quickly wrote a very short story using ideas I had a few months ago called “Grey Moon.” It was based on a certain frustration I had with Buddhism in that it seemed to me to be circular in its world view and seemed to avoid the most obvious question: Where did it all come from?

It wasn’t a big deal anyways. Not like my life would fall apart if I didn’t know the answer to that question. But I complained about my discontent with the Buddha anyways to my bhikkhu grandpa. I was saying something like: “If the Buddha was so enlightened, why did he avoid enlightening us about where the universe comes from? Instead the Buddha seems to just ‘beat around the bush’ obsessively teaching about kamma, cause and fruit, this from that, co-dependent arising, emptiness, but nothing about how everything started. Did he not know? Were the people of that period too dumb to even understand had he tried to explain the origins of the universe?”

And my grandpa said something like: “You’re just not seeing things fully. Samma Dhitti means to See [dhitti] everything all at once, all together, completely [samma] without leaving anything out. It’s like your eyes are focused and attached to the Bo Tree the Buddha sat under and being so attached to the tree you frustrate your own self about where the tree came from because you failed to consider its roots and the earth it grows out of which feeds it. Therefore it is not the Buddha’s fault, it is the fault of your own limits of perception.” I suppose what he was trying to say was that maybe I was ‘barking up the wrong tree?’

Sunyata

So there I was staring at a picture of the Bo Tree and Buddha underneath it, with what my grandpa said in the back of my mind, which in itself was enlightening for me. Which was when I came to notice that both the tree and the Buddha have something in common: both have aspects about their “Nature” people often forget to See, without which each would not be what they are. The tree has its root system deep below the ground, and it also has the earth whose nutrients the roots draw up; such that it can be said that the tree and the earth it is rooted in are one single causal system. The tree also has its corporeal history of originating from a seed, becoming a sapling, and gradually growing into a big tree.

The Buddha also has his roots which we often forget to See: his life's history. He was born a little prince, grew up living total luxury, ignorance, and indulgence, then becoming a Buddha. Like the tree, his roots are grounded firmly in the 'world' and environment he was born and conditioned inside of [India ~500BC].

Sunyata [Emptiness] in Theravada isn't a big issue, as Mahayana [especially Zen] makes it out to be. In fact it's not even taught to anybody. If you are ever curious about it, you ask some monk, and a brief explanation is given. This is because sunyata is a modality of perception, and not a means – in and of itself – to Nirvana or Enlightenment. And therefore in Theravada it is not considered a doctrine of vital importance, where it's a matter of life and death to know. Or like it's so cool you'd base your entire religion on it like the Zen people do.

But sunyata is like a keystone modality of perception. If you take a keystone out of an arch, the whole arch falls apart, and sunyata is the same way. If you don't grasp sunyata, then most of Buddha's teachings won't make any rational sense, and you'd be prone to grasping for goofy beliefs to explain your confusion about things like the idea that all things are impermanent, "reincarnation," co-dependent arising, and anatta. Most of the time, the word Emptiness isn't used in Theravada to mean Sunyata. I've always heard the descriptor "impermanence" used in my circle.

Which is why growing up I always had the idea that Buddhism was really dreary and pessimistic, because you're told over and over again that nothing lasts forever, everything changes, and nothing that exists is permanent. But there is more to sunyata than this misunderstanding of it.

The picture of the Bodhi Tree and Buddha are good places to draw out a better understanding of sunyata. When I say "sunyata" most often I mean that "things" that exist have a Nature or inherent quality of impermanence, yet also the quality of co-dependent arising.

To illustrate we can take the flowing Ganges. On the right side of the Ganges is a Brahmin and on the left side of the river is the Buddha. The Brahmin says: "Look, it's the Ganges River. It's been here forever, and most likely it will be here for a thousand more years. It never really changes since it's always been here." And the Buddha argues and says: "Let's step inside the River shall we? Now how permanent and forever is this River? It is never the same river twice. The water that was once around our ankles has gone far down stream. It is a new river every moment. It is never the same thing." That's sunyata. It's not saying that the river is an illusion and unreal, because there is "something" there, but that "something" is amorphous who's Nature is change.

All things that exist in the physical realm of phenomena, exists in a state of sunyata. The Bo Tree once started off as a seed. Only at that moment was its Nature a seed. But when that seed became a sapling, that seed Nature no longer exists. When the sapling grows into a large tree, the essence, Nature, or Being [bhava] of that sapling no longer exists; because it has causally become [bhava] something else, with a different Nature.

When I use the word “causal” here, I would mean to suggest “Causality,” or “Causal Mechanics.” By causal mechanics I mean a “mechanical” system that works on simple <Input → Output> algorithms. A snack machine is a causal system: you put in money, it gives you a bag of chips. Nature is a causal system: it rains, and the rain feeds the plants, the plants grow and it feeds the animals, the animals grow, and it feeds people [the Buddha calls this “co-dependent arising.”] A game of checkers is a causal system; your move is the Input, the reaction is the Output.

People – like the Buddha – are good examples of sunyata. I remember someone [can't remember who] once said: “Man is a Verb,” and in saying that this person captured the very Nature and Essence of the sunyata of Man.

The Buddha started off as a baby, then grew into a 1 year old. When that happened that baby that once existed is gone, it no longer exists. When the 1 year old gradually Becomes a 5 year old, that 1 year old boy is gone. Its 1 year old body is gone. Its 1 year old mind, memories, world view, emotions, etc, are all gone. The 5 year old is a completely new causal organism. When that 5 year old Becomes a 13 year old boy; the 5 year old ceases to exist. The new 13 year old boy has its own body – with new cells and organs – its own look, its own emotions, mind, mentality, personality, etc. When that 13 year old Becomes a 30 year old Buddha, the 13 year old that once existed no longer causally exists anywhere. We can't say that the Buddha and the 13 year old boy this Being was are the “same” entity because nothing about them in body, mind, and emotion are the “same.”

But it can be said that before the 13 year old vanished out of existence, it did put into motion Acts, which causally affected or influenced the life and existence of the 30 year old Buddha. Although that 13 year old no longer exists, the Buddha's existence is co-dependent causally on that 13 year old. In the very same sense that a Bo Tree's being is dependent on a previous Bo Tree that bore its seed.

So it can be said that as far as the material universe goes, existence – or the existence of material things – is dependent on causation, where one “thing” arises from a previous “thing,” then vanishes out of existence, but causes to exist another “thing.” In other words, the whole physical cosmos is a big giant causal machine. “Cosmos” ultimately coming from the Greek word meaning “order” as in coherent organization or an orderly system of some kind. Which seems to suggest that Causation may not be chaotic but in fact orderly, in the sense that such chain reactions of causation follows simple Cosmic or universal “laws” of “causal mechanics.”

Causal Reality

Causation is a bitch, especially in regard to materialism. It gets me frustrated at times during those moments when I am thinking and meditating about life. Because: What the hell Caused the universe to exist? Why is it here? How did it get here? Where did it come from? Where or what was it before?

Both materialists and supernaturalists have their own explanations. To the materialist, generally, the universe has real measurable causes, and we can logically trace each “thing” to a cause.” People came from monkeys, monkeys came from prehistoric rodents. Prehistoric rodents came from mutant reptiles. Mutant reptiles came from fish that got tired of living in the sea. The fish came from amoebas. The amoebas came from lightning hitting a gassy swamp. The earth that made the lightning and gassy swamp came from the coagulation of space dust. The space dust came from a blown up star. And this can go on and on forever. But the supernaturalists come along and say that this sort of infinite regression is impossible and that there has to be a First Cause, therefore some sort of God is the First Cause. But then what Caused that God to come into being? Oh nothing they say, it is without cause, it has always been around forever. Infinite regressive causation is not possible but the existence of an eternal “something” is???

Which gets me to ask myself: Is the universe finite or infinite? If it is finite, then what is it “floating” in and what Caused that? I can’t get myself to rationally believe that the material universe is infinite. Not because such a notion is hard to grasp, but because the universe just does not exhibit the quality of something which was been “around” causally causing things into existence forever. But a primordial aspect of it could be infinite? Right?

So I was shopping for groceries at an Asian food store in the produce section with a few people. We had walked by these big green pomelos which are like grapefruit, but bigger and they stay green when ripe. And one of the friends I was with said: “God look at those, where did they come from?” And – being a smartass – I said: “From a tree, duh.” And one of our very smart and insightful friends said back to me: “Not from a tree, THROUGH a tree.” We go: “What do you mean?” And our friend said something like: “The fruit buds on the tree like yeast cells. It grows through the tree. The tree draws up water and nutrients from the ground, and that stuff is used to create the fruit. Therefore you are wrong. It did not originally come from the tree. It has its originations in the ground. Which is why you can influence and affect the taste and quality of the fruit by using different fertilizers and minerals.” [We’re Asian].

This reminded me of what my grandpa had said to me, that my frustration from not understanding where or how the universe came to be is due to my awareness being fixated in the wrong places. Like looking for diamonds in a coal mine, believing that diamonds come from – are caused into existed by – carbon atoms then ending up confused because you can’t find one.

Or in a different way, it is almost as if we were chess pieces on a cosmic board game that operates on simple causal rules of interaction, such that over time, simple things become complex things. So as these chess pieces on this board game, we look around at the complexities of our surroundings and ask ourselves how did it all come to be. And we can logically – if we understand the mechanics and rules of the cosmic game – trace our “moves” backwards to gain an idea of where things came from. But we end up at a point where causation seems to not be detectable. In our chess game scenario this is the beginning of the game where every piece is in its very beginning positions. In material science this may be that weird point in time just before the so called big bang, where we just can’t trace our steps back anymore rationally.

We can call that ne plus ultra point “The Threshold,” which is where causal causation just seems to hit a wall and a “prime cause” which we assume should exist is just not there. So if we represent the Causal Material Cosmos as the Chess Game Board and Pieces and Rules of the Game, and we have reached the Threshold, we ask ourselves what is beyond that point. What Caused the game board to come into existence? And the answer is very simple: The cause of the chess game has nothing to do with the chess board, chess pieces, or chess rules. The game of chess was once an IDEA in someone’s Mind. That idea manifested itself as the causal system of the chess game.

Thinking about games I naturally thought about the Star Game, which symbolically is a much better example of the complexity of causation. In the Star Game [of the ONA] each time a piece moves it changes “identity” into a completely different alchemical elemental “compound.” So the further in the game you go, the more very different pieces are caused into existence from what they originally were. Just like Nature. Hydrogen and Oxygen come together and gives rise to water which looks nothing like either its two original causal “parents.” If we were such pieces in the midst of a complex Star Game [which uses 7 boards], and we traced our steps back to the Threshold and ask ourselves: Ok, what’s the spooky stuff beyond this threshold of no causation? The answer would be very simple, but heterodox, in the sense that the answer has nothing to do with the “reality” of the Star Game, or the logic/science that we used to trace our steps back: The Star Game came out of the Mind of “Anton Long.”

Acausal Mind

I’ve always found this Myattian word [acausal] to be very useful, although I may not at times use the word with its original basic meaning. When I first encountered the word, I didn’t like it, because of its grammatical meaning. A+Causal meaning or suggesting “Without Causation.” I objected to the notion of anything “acausal” even existing because nothing in the known physical universe does not have a cause. That is until I actually looked at my own Mind and noticed that the “Mindscape” of the Mind is in essence completely acausal in nature.

To illustrate, when I think of an apple in my mind or visualize an apple, the apple which I “see” in this Mindscape came into existence essentially without any factors of causation. I did not have to plant an apple seed in my mindscape, water it, give it miracle grow, and wait for a thought-form tree to bare an apple in my mind. It literally came out of nothing. I can also “create” entire environments in this mindscape with mountains, forests, lakes, and place myself inside, and it all literally came into existence without cause. Because in this environment – the mindscape – the laws of causal mechanics are non-applicable and just do not exist. And if you deeply think about it, this is the entire reason why most of us are so clumsy in causal life. Why?

Because we are born into existence as “mind-beings” and we spend most of our first years immersed in worlds of dreams, theta and delta wave “consciousness,” with our awareness fixated in a world that is not causal in essence. Only in time, when we have learned to focus our consciousness on the causal world, do we become consciously aware of the physical world; during which time [early childhood] we grow consciously aware of ourselves as “physical beings” with bodies.

But many of us in life, exhibit the behavior of a maladjusted alien in a foreign land, in that we fail to fully grasp or understand the causal rules and mechanics of the physical world we “exist” in. And from this inability to consciously understand how the material game board works, we manifest suffering in our own lives, and in the lives of others.

Which all seems to imply something that would make a materialist feel uneasy: that perhaps like the pomelo we do not actually have our origins in this tree, by in some place else, and we have just “budded” like fruits “into here.” Like the budding of fetal flesh at the end of an umbilical cord; just passing through.

So I was doing a mental experiment, trying to figure out if the cosmos is finite or infinite. Neither makes any real sense to me really. In my mind I flew a rocket ship with me in it, and if the universe was finite, I saw myself eventually leaving it and ending up “somewhere” that is “outside” the finite universe. But what did that come from? And if the universe were infinite, I could fly my rocket ship forever and never ever leave it. But this also made no sense because maintaining a universe infinite in size, is way too much a waste of energy. Why, what for?

But then I realized something I never paid mind to before. In my mindscape as I was flying in a theoretical infinite universe, I said to myself that if I lived forever, I can actually sit here and fly my imaginary rocket ship forever in my mindscape and never see the end of it either. Why? Because the “place” I was inside was “nowhere” to begin with. The Mind is not a “where,” or a “here” or “there.” It is neither infinite nor finite. Perhaps in the same way that cyberspace is neither a where, or here, or there, or infinite, or finite; but yet it has “places” to be. Like how we have places to be in our Mindscape when we are consciously dislodged from this world and are inside a dream. And it has always perplexed me why we come into this existence dreaming [as fetuses]; and why we never really leave the world of dreams behind. We are only consciously fixated on this physical world for half a day.

That’s all interesting, but then how does a “thing” which came into existence in the Mind without causation, cause things to come into existence in the causal world of experience? Is such a concept possible? Can a car exist as an idea in someone’s mind before it causally comes into existence? I would think so, after all, cars did not always exist on earth. The causal existence of cars has a very recent acausal threshold: the Mind of Ford. There was a time when a car was a causeless idea in Ford’s Mindscape. Then there was an initiation of sequential co-dependent arisings: people liked the idea, which caused investment of money, which caused factories to be built, which caused parts to be made; and then what was once a causeless “thing” in Ford’s Mind materialized into something causal that had the power to cause into existence other things. Other kinds of cars, other engines, other vehicles, other technologies, etc.

If I were to premeditate a murder and dress in all blue, and went and killed a blood in his neighborhood, and his friends drove by the nearest crip neighborhood to retaliate, and I was taken to court as a suspect; could the courts prove that such causal events which took place in the “real world” had an “acausal” origin in my mind? I would assume so, since cases of premeditated murder happen all the time. A thought which literally came into existence in an acausal environment has the power to initiate a “chain reaction” of causal occurrences in the physical world of experience. That's bizarre if you think about it because what we are essentially saying is that very "real" things which arise from causation, can be linked to an initial cause which came into existence acausally out of nothing in a completely different world/environment that has nothing to do with the material universe.

The Nexion

There was a time when I was doing mental experiments where I was "digging deeper" into two different unrelated ideas, and I ended up in the same place. I was asking myself how far down the subatomic level I had to go before the physical universe stops being a "where," or "here," or "there." And I realized that I really did not have to go far. On a subatomic level, atoms are so far spread apart that what was once the physical universe becomes neither here nor there, but everywhere and nowhere at the same time. And on a quantum level, where things are just fluctuation of quanta, "waves," and "quantum foam," "things" don't even exist. There are no suns, no Mars, no San Diego, no Riverside County. There isn't even a real distinction between the brain and its neurons and the "world." There wasn't even a real distinction between the electricity the brain's neurons produced, and the electromagnetism that undulates in the "world" and wall sockets or the circuitry of a computer. We can say in a way that such differentiation are the results of macrophysical "illusions" in that our brain just interprets a differentiation.

And in another mind experiment I asked myself how a brain or mind exerts causal influence onto the world in the first place. Not with hands and legs, but on a deeper level. It's a kind of Buddhist meditation, where you become mindful of yourself, your environment, and everything which you are doing at the same time. Except in this case I tried to take things down as far as I can go. I was digging a hole in my garden to transplant this one potted plant into its own place, and I asked myself what was actually happening? If there was an atom watching me dig a hole and transplanting a plant, how would it see all of this from its atomic sized perspective? It would prolly see a weird anomalous "typhoon" of atoms and electricity fluctuating. But at its level the other atoms would be so far apart that the fluctuation is more like us staring into the sky and noticing the many dots of stars shifting positions; which perhaps might in not even be a big deal to the atom.

But even in such an intimate "environment" as my own body, you come to a "threshold" when you dig deep. I know my brain fires electricity to move my arms when I am digging the hole. Then all the atoms and parts that make up my body moves accordingly to "something's" will, which manipulates an entire mass of other atoms into different directions. And on the atomic level, there is no real distinction between all the atoms that is "me" and everything else. The only thing a brain can do to exert its will on the world and its own body is induce and manipulate electron flow. And from that simple ability to manipulate electrons, this brain of ours has created for itself an entire civilization and world. On a very fine atomic level, this manipulation of electrons looks odd, because you see steady "rivers" of electrons flowing in different directions from atom to atom, but no matter which atom you look behind, there doesn't seem to be an "initiator." What had the intent of manipulating the flow of those electrons? What initiated that flow? What is exerting its will on this otherwise indistinguishable sea of atoms? Where is it?

And it gets stranger because on this very real atomic and subatomic and even quantum level, we can ask ourselves: are we ever really “born” into anywhere at all? Sure, on a macrophysical level when we see a baby pop out of its mom’s birth canal we can say: “Oh well there you go, a new baby got borned into the earth, what a miracle!” But if an atom saw the birth, what would it actually see? Nothing. Nothing got born anywhere. A mess of atoms may have gradually coagulated together into a very orderly and coherent crystalline structure, but that’s it.

And now we can start to figure out why such a structuring of atoms came together from an otherwise incoherent sea of atoms: for the purpose of manipulating the flow of electrons. I would assume that electrons and energy can “flow” better in a medium that is atomically well structured and crystalline, as opposed to electrons trying to fly across a brick atom “here” to a sidewalk atom way over “there” somewhere. I don’t mean a rock crystal when I use the word crystalline. I mean when atoms are structured in coherent patterns. But again, what has brought these atoms together? Where is “it” in the coherent mess of atoms we call a baby? And where did it come from? How is it that the atoms that make up the brain of this “baby” can somehow exert its will and intent upon its quantum and atomic environment, when other atoms of the same kind not a part of this brain seems to be “dead” lacking a will, intent, and the ability to manipulate electron flow to manifest its will?

So there is a level of material reality where if you honestly look deep enough, that things become “spooky” and distasteful to a materialist. Just like how we rationalists can say that religionists hide their god in the gaps of science; we can also say that the materialist hides his materialist world views in the gaps of the same science. Because 200 years ago before all of this crazy stuff about atoms, subatomic stuff, and quantum crap came up in science, it was real easy for a materialist to walk around with his nose high in the sky acting like he understands all there is to be understood. Now that we have learned that materiality is a conscious illusion, and that it’s all just atoms, subatomic particles, and quantum wavicles the materialist has to stick his head in the sand to hold onto his world views. Where will materialism hide 100 years from now when we have better instruments, more refined technology, and a more profound grasp of our reality?

This is not to imply that I am a “supernaturalist,” meaning that I believe in things above and beyond the Natural world. Quite the opposite actually – as I have tried to express thus far – I am a “Subnaturalist.” There is a gradation to the Natural world as we have already come to understand. There is the everyday world around us which we are all familiar with. Underneath that there is the atomic level of reality. Underneath that there is a Subatomic level to reality. Beneath that there is a quantum level of reality. This is about as far as we have been able to rationally unveil the Cosmos.

I also believe that Nature or the Cosmos, or Reality is Fractal in nature. By Fractal I mean to say that if you look at a fractal pattern for its general shape, then look closely at the little patterns that makes the big pattern up that we observe that both are the same shape or pattern. Such that if we were to see a large fractal patter we can reasonably say that the smaller patterns it is made of will look similar, and vise verse. If we observe a small fractal pattern, knowing that we are looking at a fractal pattern, we can reasonably say that the “bigger” pattern may be of the same pattern, even if we have not seen such yet directly.

So if the cosmos is fractal in nature, and we observe that it has Subnatural gradation of states of existence, then we must also be able to see the same general subnatural patterns on different scales and in different parts of or aspects of the cosmos. Do we?

There is no real level of mental state above and beyond beta wave waking consciousness; as in “superconsciousness.” Our conscious mind would be like the Natural world in this sense. But there is a SUBconscious mind beneath that conscious mind. Beneath that there is the Unconscious Mind. Underneath that there is what Jung refers to as the Collective Unconscious.

It's almost as if there is a “connexion” or link between these two very different things [the Natural world and the Mindscape] which is an “abyss” of electrons or energy at the more finer levels of the physical world. Through which whatever Mind is, can intrude into or exert its will upon. And this idea is not as crazy as it sounds, because in science we already know that the Observer simply observing an experiment can influence the results.

Somewhere in that “abyss” thought energy and the waves that become particles, seem to mingle together weaving into one another as a single fabric. Almost as if the Mindscape were an ocean with its many levels, and the physical universe was an iceberg in it. That thin layer or place between the ocean and the surface of the iceberg, where dark ocean water is neither water or ice, where the particles of one becomes coherent crystalline structures of another, is that abysmal “fabric” where the weaving takes place. Where one gives rise to the other, not by any method of causal chain reactions, but by an alchemical process of the prima materia of Mind coagulating and crystallizing into matter.

It can be said: “That's impossible! The physical universe is causal! Its most fundamental law is causality. That's how it works. Therefore it can't arise from a system that doesn't follow such inherent laws of causation.” But we do know that even when the same type of atom is structured differently that such structures naturally assume different laws of behaviour.

For example water and ice. Both are H₂O molecules are made of the same “stuff.” But one is less coherent, while the other exists in a more coherent crystalline structure. And somehow, because of the coagulation of the same atoms in more crystalline structures they not only look way different, but they react and behave differently also and have their own distinct laws and properties. Coal and diamond are better examples. Same atoms, just different structures, but the carbon atoms in coal is in no particular order or structure, whereas the carbon atoms of a diamond are in a very rigid and well defined coherent ordering. And so because of that mere difference in structure, the coal and the diamond not only look completely different, but they have their own “Nature,” and properties, they react differently to things, and they have their own Natural laws.

But then every element on the periodic table would be a good example, because as different and wildly unique each element is on the periodic table, it's all basically and literally just the same 3 usual suspects in different formations and structures: electrons, protons, and neutrons.

Helium and Gold have completely different Natures, properties, and governing laws, but they are made of the same three things. You can melt gold and say that it is a “natural law” for gold to melt when heat is applied; but you can’t melt helium. You can say that it is a natural law for helium to float; but if you fill a hot air balloon with gold, it won’t float.

So in a way, saying that a causal world cannot arise from an acausal world; because whatever the causal world comes from has to obey the same natural laws of causation that governs it; is like say that whatever gold is made of, it must obey the same natural laws that gold does, otherwise it’s just illogical. But then again, logic seems to not work so well on the quantum level doesn’t it. Gold, like all things, is just an alchemical coagulation of the same quantum and subatomic stuff; and we do know that the laws that govern the material cosmos, don’t work or apply on the quantum level, and vice versa.

Acausal Origins

I suppose my problem was in trying to figure out a reasonable explanation for how the cosmos came to be was that I was too fixated on a linear method of backtrack thinking: This arose from that, and that was caused by the other thing. And I tried to think in that linear fashion as far back as I could, which took me to dead ends. Maybe life and the universe isn’t as perfectly linear as we would like it to be. I’m starting to think that the universe grows like a tree. It grows “upwards” vertically, and each point on that vertical growth branches out horizontally. And like a tree we seem to only take notice of what we can see of it: just the trunk, branches, and leaves. Forgetting that perhaps this tree has unseen roots that stretches far deep into a dark an unknown abyss that feeds this tree its vital nutrients. Or is it really unknown?

We are born into this world like a fruit grows on a tree. That fruit has its essential origins deep within the dark earth as liquid, nutrient or vital substance. That vital substance is drawn up through the roots system and up the trunk, the tree surrounds this vital substance with what material it has as a shell, and the fruit then intrudes into a world above the chthonic darkness; to fall to the fertile ground from whence it came to one day be its own tree and bare its own fruit. What if we – as beings – are not native to this causal world, but only intrusions from a much darker and deeper “world?” A world more akin to the dream world and mindscape in which we come into our existence completely immersed in, which we never really leave behind.

I was looking at the picture of the Bo Tree with the Buddha seated underneath it after all of these speculations, and I saw it differently. I thought it was funny how the unknown original artist who came up with this bit of allegory used such “esoteric” contrasting. In the background there is a tree, whose nature it is to bare leaves and fruit. It draws up vital nutrients from the unseen ground and leaves and fruit grows up high in its branches. Then in the foreground is Buddha, whose title essentially means “Mind.” He sits still and enter deep states of meditation, where his mind travels under, into lower and deeper levels of consciousness, where he finds Sambodhi [Self Realization] and from that deep dark place Emerges with Sambuddhi [Self Enlightenment] and is liberated from the illusory fetters of the material world he was born into.

If I were the Buddha, how would I teach what I have here written to a group of illiterate people, who were born and bred to believe that gods made everything? I prolly wouldn't even bother. Knowing that these people were not natives to the physical world, and are just travelers in a foreign land, unaccustomed to its laws and rules, I'd just teach them how the causal world works so they can get the best out of it.

Who knows if my insights are true, all I know is that for now, it makes sense to me. In my personal quest to try and understand the world in my own way, I have genuinely found the ONA – more specifically the many concepts David Myatt put together – to be an invaluable tool. Like a hand shovel I use to dig around for artifacts. This world view I have now, leaves room for non-corporeal beings. Not supernatural beings beyond the physical world in some spirit realm. But living “archetypes” that lurk deep in the collective uncounscious. Subnatural beings that dwell in some primeval collective psyche of the Living Cosmos. From where we may have our primal origins as well. As feral thought-forms emanating from the acausal, intruding into the causal world for awhile. Like actors all dressed up intruding onto a kabuki stage. Or as children intruding into a playground for a while to play. Now, if only I knew “where” the acausal or mind comes from.

I was surfing the net looking for those websites that try to show you what technology and computer things will look like in the “future” this week. Keyboards are going to go the way of the typewriter soon. They’ve got these gadgets that project a laser keyboard and stuff. I’ve always been a “futurist” if that word makes any sense. It’s like a feeling or yearning to want to reach into the future and experience it. You spend lots of time thinking and day dreaming about it. Watch a lot of science fictionie shows and wish it were all real. My favorite show to watch back in the old days was Star Trek The Next Generation. I grew up watching mostly only two TV shows: Sesame Street and then Star Trek TNG. I watched other things but those two had a huge affect on me. I only watched Star Trek TNG because it was my uncle-dad and cousin-brothers favorite show and they hogged the TV in the living room. Later when I grew up and watched all the episodes again, I ended up hating it, because of all these little technical bugs that scratches my gut, like warp drive, and teleportation, etc. My favorite character was Commander Riker. I had a crush on him. He was ugly without a beard. He’s one of those men that actually looks very handsome with a beard.

But anyways. Thinking about the future got me thinking about the year 2050, which is a year I have marked in the back of my head. I marked 2050 in my mind because DM has been strangely dedicated to this ONA thing for at least 39 years now. This ONA thing started off way in the past and basically through one nexion [DM] it made it into his future [our present]. And during those 39 years the entire world changed around him. I thought the essential idea behind that was fascinating. That one person can presence something in the future and influence and inspire the people and minds of that future period. So I promised myself and an OG years back that I would follow Anton Long’s footsteps and join his Relay Race.

Remember in PE in school we had these races called Relay Races? The coach would put you into teams. And you’d get put at different parts of the track. So the way it’s done is that the first person runs as fast as they can carrying a little stick with a flag tied to it. And they run to their next person waiting for them. Then the first person hands the second person the flag and the second person runs as fast as they can to the third person, and so on. Such that the first sets of people involved in the race never gets to see the finish line. It is the persons already closest to the Goal that are fated to fulfill what was set in motion.

So that's what I mean by Anton Long's Relay Race. AL ran with the ONA going into nearly 39 years. He was the first guy in the Relay Race. He will never see the end Goal unfortunately. So I've put myself on the tracks as the second person up, and hopefully others will be inspired to do the same. The objective is to just do what DM did. Run with the ONA, live it, beef it up, evolve it, for the next 40 years. As long as one person is dedicated to just run with the ONA for 40 years, the ONA will make it into the year 2050. But I also can only go so far in the Relay Race. I'd have to hand over the ONA flag to someone else or a group of somebody else's, young to carry it on for another 40 years, which would be 2090! I figured that since I will have children someday, I will raise and train them to one day run with the ONA into the future. Whatever the ONA has become in their time. If it can change so much in 4 years as we have seen. What will the ONA be like in the year 2050? But thinking about this Relay race into the future got me thinking about my most favorite subject to think about: the Sunyata of Time.

The Flow Of Time

When I say "sunyata" I just mean Impermanence according to my understandings. Impermanence isn't nothing. It's a moving process. Like wind can be said to be a process in motion. As long as that wind moves it is "something." When it stops blowing, the process is gone, and the "something" vanishes from our perception. And so it is in the movement – the process – that "nothing" appears to be something ever changing. And we call that motion, that movement, the process, "change" and what changes is Impermanent.

Time for me is a perfect example of sunyata if you have trouble grasping the idea of the moving process of impermanence. Not the the time ticking in our watches. But the ticking of the cosmos and earth. The ticking of Nature in Her process of eternal becoming. Because if you think about it, we only "see" or notice time when it ticks: when things change. Everything is in a process of change. And we give 'temporal' meaning to such changes. We call it Seasons, Age, Day, Night, Growth, Dilapidation, etc. And then if you think about it deeply, you begin to realize that change isn't a singular event happening to one "Thing." Change happens in interconnected patterns.

For example the earth moves into a spot in its orbit around the sun. That pattern causes winter. The winter causes patterns to be noticed on the earth. The temperature drops, plants are gone, the grass dies. That pattern triggers the familiar pattern of ducks and birds to fly south for the winter. That pattern of duck and birds flying south causes patterns to arise in us humans who live in that climate. We recognize those patterns, and we chop our wood, smoke our meat, store our grain, and prepare for the winter. And that human reaction on a wider scale, causes patterns to arise. The whole kingdom is in motion, reacting in patterns to the pattern of winter. Then the earth moves into a different spot and spring comes. And with that a cascade of inter-reacting patterns of events is set in collective motion. Nothing in the universe moves alone. We all move together as a single whole. It's the basic meaning of the word Universe: Uni [One] Vers/Vert [Turn].

I was driving down to San Diego with Kayla and some others to pick up my car the other night. 2 hour drive. My cousin's race car broke down and had to be taken to the shop, so he borrowed my car for work. On the way back we were driving at 1AM past Lake Elsinore and I past a field of trees and in the middle of nowhere I saw a huge ass American flag waving in the wind. I thought for a moment that it looked beautiful, since the moon was near full and it was just waving there. But seeing that flag wave in the wind was what reminded me that night of how patterns in a field move together. Like the patterns of the flag. The wave happens in different spots on the flag, but eventually, all the stars and stripes move together as a single fabric.

Yugs & Seasons

Something I hear my elders speak often of now is a little aspect of Theravada Buddhism that is not well known. I like Buddhism because it's rational and because it is a power house of practical wisdom. But it does come with stories and myths. One of those myths is an apocalyptic prediction very similar in quality to what one might expect from a group of crazy apocalyptic Christian sects.

The apocalyptic myth revolves around the idea of 5 Buddhas which is something I see everywhere in Theravada art work. In Thai and Khmer lands you'll often see not 1 but 5 Buddha statues together, Gautama Buddha being the biggest statue of the 5. It's so pervasive an icon that I had to ask my mom and aunts what those 5 Buddhas mean. They didn't know, so they told me to go ask my grandmother.

I asked my grandmother what the 5 Buddhas meant and why I haven't ever heard of the other 4. And basically my grandmother said to me that Gautama Buddha is the Fourth Buddha. There were three before him, which were the same Buddha in different "incarnations." There will be a last one after him whom she names as 'Preah Sey-Ah Mitrey.'

She goes on to explain that we'll know we are getting close to the time of Sey-Ah Mitrey's birth in the world of mankind when the prophecies of the last "Yug" has been experienced. Yug is pronounced as in the first syllable of the English word EUCalyptus and is a Khmer dialectal form of the Sanskrit word Yuga. Basically the "last Yug" from how she describes it sounds like the degenerate age we live in and unfortunately seems to get worse. She mentions the usual apocalyptic stuff and said that the end of the last Yug finishes off with fire falling from the sky. By that time the prophecy says that so many people will have died that the survivors left alive will all fit under the Shade of the Bo Tree. And then Sey-Ah Mitrey is born into the world to manifest Dhamma again for a new generation of people.

That was all great I suppose. I'm not big on crazy apocalyptic visions so I didn't listen to her much. What caught my genuine interest was the word "Yug" she used. So I sat there and waited for her to finish her insane lecture of the end of the world and the last Yug where mother sleep with sons and father with their daughters, public decency has decayed, manners have become a relic of some historic age, honour is dead, etc, etc; so I could ask her what exactly a Yug is. I have heard the word before from reading about Hinduism as in what is known as the Kali Yuga. I've read things written by a Westerner about their ideas of what a yuga is and I find it pretty imaginative and sometimes retarded. I wanted to ask a living person who was born into a living ancestral Brahmanistic-Buddhist Tradition what a Yug/yuga is.

My grandmother tried to explain it to me, but unfortunately I didn't understand a word she said, because she was using words I had not heard used before. I just picked up words like "tree" and "grow," which made no sense to me in context to Time since I assumed that Yug meant a long span of Time. So I looked around for anybody near by who could put what she had explained into English for me. Luckily my favorite uncle was sitting in the same sitting room. I have my own room in his house way up in Palmdale where he has a large track of land. He is the oldest son my grandmother had and is very religious, here meaning really into the old ways. Us cousins call him Bhoo Map. Bhoo is a familiar word meaning Uncle and Map is his family nickname which is a short form of the word for Chubby, even though he is skinny. He looks Japanese and his body is covered in yantras and magical tattoos. He's read the entire Tipitaka, all 25 thousand pages. He even has a magical tattoo of a little Buddha right in between his eyebrow which he got from a wild monk [one that lives like a hermit in the forest] when he was back visiting their home province over seas. The tattoo between his eyebrows is suppose to give him the power of insight and open his third eye. He also has a Buddha carved from a boar tusk. So Bhoo Map is really into the old Tradition and is considered by our family as an authority in Buddhist stuff. He was sitting there quietly listening to my grandmother explain things adding a "That's right," every now an then.

So I turn to Uncle Chubby looking lost and asked him to translate what grandma said a Yug was into English for me. It's not a mystical word but actually very ordinary. Like when you are asked "Ayug [age] Praman [how many]" you are being asked how old you are, or how many years you have. But without the initial "A" and in context to how the prophecy uses it, it has a different meaning. My uncle translates to me and explains that the universe is like a living tree, it has a life span the old people call a Kalapa [Khmer version of the Sanskrit Kalpa]. The universe is thus like a great big tree where in the winter season the leaves on this tree dies and the life forces goes underground, and in the spring season the life force returns and new leave emerges. And so we call the span of great time of this great tree's spring gradually leading into it winter a Kalapa. The universe in a sense borns and dies and reborns anew over and over.

So a Kalapa is much like a year. And in that year there are Four Seasons, and we call those seasons Yugs. One Yug is a cosmic season. Just as each earthly season has unique characteristics, a yug also has characteristics. For instance autumn has the characteristic of leaves falling, colors like yellow and orange are associated with that season, the feel of people preparing their harvest for the coming winter is a characteristic of that season. The rain season [in tropical areas] has it's own characteristic different from other seasons, and so on. So each Yug thus has it's own seasonal characteristics which influences people. In the same way that a natural season influences us. When summer comes that season affects and influenced all of us collectively. We use the air conditioning all day, or go out and buy fans, we change our attire, we eat different thing, drink more, we visit the beaches more often, etc. And when Spring begins this season causes us to act differently also. We begin growing our crops in our fields and so on. So each Yug is like a season which also affects and influences mankind and causes us to act according to the nature or characteristic of a Yug.

I thought it was very interesting that my grandmother and uncle equated a Yug with seasons rather than with lengths of Time. Because there is a difference between what we understand as Time, and what a Season is. Time is a process of change and a Season is a pattern of changes that happen systematically together. Time really does not have the same effect on us inside as a season does. We have forced ourselves to live in tandem with the ticking of clocks. It's an unnatural way of life where we literally live our lives according to something arbitrary and abstract as the moving of big hands and little hands on a watch. Whereas in olden days our ancestors lived in tandem to Nature, when our "watches" were the moon, the sun, the stars, and season.

In the Occident we have it where our days are all precisely and exactly 365.4 days or something and our year is divided up into 12 months etc. So we have these things called birthdays in the West where we remember the "exact" day of that calendar year we were born. Except the calendar is static, and the sun, moon, earth, and stars move in such a way that the same day 10 years ago on a calendar is not the same day in Nature today. I've always found it interesting that all of my aunts and uncles and mothers have no birthdays. They have a date of birth on their ID, but those dates were arbitrarily picked. I asked my grandmother when my aunt-mom was born once expecting her to give me a simple date. And she goes: "If I recall correctly your aunt-mother was born at night, just after the full moon, when the rainy season was ending, in the year of the Rabbit. Yes I think that was it."

Aeons

I have a younger biological sister [half sister: same mom, different dad] who is 18. I live with her and our parents now, but growing up we were raised by a different set of parents in different houses. But I helped raise her when I went to live with my real mother.

I talk a lot about aeons and the usual ONA ideas around her, since we live together, so she is a Drecc familiar with ONA. I took her camping with my friends way up in Los Osos by San Luis Obispo. My friends and I have this "tradition" of meeting up in the mountains of Los Osos every April 20th – April 22nd [we call it 420] and we camp out and smoke out to celebrate Earth Day around a big camp fire. It's a gorgeous place. The camp grounds is right next to a rocky beach and sand dunes, and down the ways a bit is the beautiful town of Morro Bay. It's something we've been doing since college, and the fun thing is each year the number of participants grows when we each make new friends and bring them along. But these hard economic times makes it so that not many people can afford to take three days off anymore.

For as long as we have been camping out there every year, none of us has ever hiked to the end of the sand dunes. I don't know if you've ever hiked on sand up and down sand hills. You get tired after the third hill you climb. Then the sand dune is so sandy there's no bushes or trees, so when you have to pee, you just squat out in the open with your ass sticking out in the middle of everywhere for everyone to see. But you know you'll eventually have to go pee because it's a damn hot desert like sand dune field and you drink a lot of water! I was peeing on the sand this one time between two sand hills and one of my friends at the top of a hill yells out to me: "Hey! It's Earth day for god's sake! You're peeing on Nature!"

Anyways, I took my little sister out to our traditional 420 spot this year. My sister and I with a couple other were already down at the foot of the mountain in Los Osos a day before 420 because I have a friend that lives out there in a little beautiful ocean side village. We crashed at his place and gorged ourselves with as much meat, real food and internet service we can handle because the 3 days was going to be all natural. My friend lives out there because of the surf. He loves surfing and the sea out there is so pristine the water is emerald green.

I have a great amount of respect for this friend. He's older than me. He went to college, and graduated then immediately got a huge paying career. He figured that in 5 years on that job he'd have enough for a house. But he got depressed and felt like he didn't have the amount of freedom he wanted and needed. He had no time to be with the people he loved like his family and friends. He worked 60 hours weeks sometimes. And he realized that he was giving that corporation the best years of his life. So one day, depressed, he drove as far as he could from the big city and ended up in Los Osos. He said he saw the big surf and jade colored water there and fell in love and never went back to his job. He instead chose to work in a flower shop part time, then rented a room in a house, and spent his free time living life and surfing. But he day trades and invests in penny stocks for his retirement.

So at camp, while we were drinking and smoking out around our fire one night some of us briefed the new comers about the Sand Dune of Doom that was impenetrable by us common mortal Asians. No living person in our group has ever hiked the full length of the dunes to see the other end because most of us are in such bad shape and have trouble urinating in public. Then one of the new ones had a great idea and said: "Dude, you're fucking fobs, what do you expect. Just fucking wake up at 5 in the morning man before the sun comes up. It won't be so hot. That way we won't have to carry as much water." So we all looked at each other and decided to do what he said. We all went to sleep early and agreed to wake up at 5 in the morning to conquer the sand dunes at last.

We woke up at 5AM and a thick fog was everywhere, you couldn't see 3 feet in front of you and it was dark. Me and the few other girls next to me had a terrified look on our faces because it was all creepy and we were all thinking that maybe we should wait and hike when the fog was gone. But then we heard the guys shout out like the apes they are: "Alright! Fucking awesome, fog!" So the hike was still on. We got our flashlights and told each other to hike in a big fucking group or we'll get lost in the fog and maybe walk off the cliff and fall into the ocean or rocks.

You couldn't see shit. At the beginning of the sand dunes there's this wooden horse fence that wiggles and widens which separates the sand area from the hard ground area which is the cliff. My group I was with who were all girls with two flashlights kept on walking into the fence. We met up with that fence 3 times and one of us said: "Ok, we aren't actually going anywhere, it's the same fucking fence. We're walking in circles guys!" Some of us said: "I'm scared." The boys were way off in the distance already laughing. And they were the ones who said to hike in a big group too. We ended up walking in zig zags and circles because we were following the boys' voices. But those fuckers sometimes thought it was funny to stay silent and turn off their flashlights when we called out to them. So we'd walk in one direction, going one way, then we'd hear their voice behind us, so we'd have to turn around. But eventually we were behind them. After an hour of climbing sand hills exhausted the boys ahead of us stopped and we heard them say: "Dude, what the fuck." We caught up to them and saw the fucking fence again. Which we knew was near the beginning part of the sand hills. The guys said they could have sworn they were walking in a straight line. And it felt like we were too, but we somehow ended walking in a big circle.

The sun was coming up and the fog was rolling out. It's absolutely fascinating to watch fog roll. Walking in thick fog is like walking through a spongy rain cloud. You get wet. It's like taking a shower because water beads on your hair and face. An the light of your flashlight shines on the think mist and you can see the mist moving by like a big cloudy slug slithering by over the mountain tops. When the sun comes out and the fog thins out then you can really see the fog moving like it's in a hurry to get somewhere. And somehow the cloudy mist somehow knows how to stay together. I like blowing and waving at the mist of the fog as the fog cloud moves, and you can see the mist you blew slowly change direction to move with the rest of the fog. And that fog while you're in it influences your perception and judgment. It's almost a feeling of vertigo where you lack reference points around you so you have no sense of direction.

Finally after about 2 hours of walking – half of which time was spent walking in circles and zig zagging – the fog had rolled out to sea clearing the sand dunes visually a bit. We were standing on the top of a very tall sand hill we climbed, which tapered off downwards into the cloud of fog that we were in. We heard the surf in the near distance in the fog hit the rocks. It was unfamiliar grounds, so we believed we had finally made it to the other side of the sand dunes! So we carefully walked toward the ocean side, knowing there are cliffs, it was still foggy, but not as foggy. We had breakfast on the rocks of the sea side watching the fog gradually vanished.

After breakfast we went exploring the tide pools in the rocks and we saw this one really strange animal in a tide pool. There were several of them. They looked like large disgusting sea cucumbers that were the size of a football and they were dark brown. They were just lumps with no heads or tails. We were all standing around the pool tide with these things in it looking at them and one of my boy cousins grabbed a big rock and said: "Ok, red blood or blue blood?" We guessed the color of the creature's blood and he dropped the rock on one of the things, and we were all wrong. It was trippy because at first the thing bled a white milk colored fluid into the water, and then the fluid turned purple in color.

So after that we started to hike back to camp proud that we finally conquered the sand dune. But as we hiked up that tall sand hill I had said that I didn't see the three red nuclear chimneys. It's not a nuclear power plant we don't think, but there is a huge structure of some type with these three giant pipes that stick in the air which can be seen from camp. It's a significant land mark because the sand dune winds lengthwise past those red chimneys and the end of the dunes is past the landmark. So we all stopped and looked at each other slowing realizing that we didn't actually pass the landmark, at least we didn't see it because of the fog. We figured that if the nuclear chimneys were to our right side, that means we made it to the end of the sand dunes, if it was to our left, then we really fucked up somewhere and spent 2 hours walking in a big circle of epic fail. When we got to the top of the first sand hill we saw the red chimneys were to our left way far away still!!! It was incredibly disappointing. And what was funny was that it only took an 45 minutes to walk back.

Walking back us girls were behind again while the boys were way ahead. As we walked up and down the sand hills we saw these little sand plants and sand lizards and come in and out of the sand near the plants. This got us talking about how cool it was that those plants and animals adapted to the sandy environment. Which led into talks about evolution. It wasn't a deep conversation, they were "normal" girls that I doubt even knew how to spell the word "science" right.

My sister and I ended up being the last two trailing behind because it was already hot and we were exhausted. The other girls conversation got me talking about the evolution of what we called civilization. Civilization as in the mode or condition in which we exist in social order context to one another. It wasn't a conversation, more like me thinking out loud. But my little sister is intelligent and is very familiar with ONA and Myattian concepts because I teach her. So I was using the word Aeonics and Aeon a lot and my sister asked me what exactly is an Aeon and how does Aeonics work. She finished her demand with the question: "Isn't an aeon just a long time?"

To me the ONA concept of an Aeon and my grandmother's concept of a Yug are the same thing. I could have explained an Aeon to my little sister in the same way a Yug was explained to me. But I wanted her to grasp the idea in context to what we call human civilization, so that she can later understand that you can seed a new aeon in such a way that a new kind of human type of 'civilization' is born in the future. So using seasons would not capture that aeonic essence of change on human terms I wanted to convey. I ended up using the fog as an analogy.

An Aeon – I explained – is like the fog we went through. Like fog, an Aeon is a "thing" that is not causal in make up. It is like an "acausal" fog that rolls over the earth. It has nothing to do with time or a span of time in and of itself. Just as fog in and of itself has nothing to do with time. But we can say that if we stood still at the beginning point of a vast cloud of fog until the end point, that a span of time would go by also. The Time and Fog are two different phenomena. Just as we are influenced and affected by the fog – in getting wet, in losing our sense of direction – an Aeon or Acausal-Fog also influences and affects those humans inside its fog. But Aeons are like fog with different flavours or themes. And so whatever that essential flavour of that Aeonic-Fog is, gradually influences the people inside of its mist to act on that theme or express that them causally. In the same way that a season like winter has a thematic essence or quality to it, which affects us and causes us to act, behave, and do thing in the spirit of winter. Like snuggle, roast chest nuts, nostalgically remember past Christmases, think of the smell of pine, stand in long lines to shop for toys, wrap gifts, hunt for holly and mistletoe, prepare feasts, and be with family.

And so in the same way the flavour of an Aeon also influences and affects the people inside it as it rolls by and across the earth like a big acausal garden slug, affecting everybody wet with its slime. So we had in our ancient history an Aeon that slowly rolled by with the Thematic Essence of cyclopean architectural construction. And we can clearly see that the epicenter of this ancient Aeon may have begun in ancient Egypt. So as it rolled by people became influenced by its Thematic Essence and as the acausal fog gets thicker the frenzy to build gigantic stone temples and structures became more fervent. Just as we in the fog got wetter the thicker the fog was. And you can see as this ancient Aeon slithered its way across the earth around the equatorial zone that every unrelated group of humans inside its mist were infected with the Thematic Essence and built what seems to be useless stone structures and pyramids. Have you ever wondered why the great pyramids and cyclopean structures are all found within the Tropics of Capricorn and Cancer, most near the Equator? From the cyclopean stone structures of Machu Pichu and Cusco, to the Pyramids of the Maya and Egyptians to the Angkor Complex in Southeast Asian, they all use the same “technology” of setting stone together, all have similar characteristics, and all are found a distance away from the Equator.

How does that happen? How do a vast group of unrelated people separated by vast amounts of land and ocean and time, all end up not only engaging in building massive stone structures, but also in the same general area around the Equator? Where did that “technology” and science of hewing stone, engineering, lifting them and stacking them come from? If it is said that such knowledge comes to random primitive scientist as an inspiration, then where did that idea come from? If it is said that such wisdom of stone craft came from refining of building stone structures then where did the art of building stone structures like that comes from in the first place? What first sparked a group of humans in different times and places to dedicate their entire empire’s wealth into a transgenerational Bridge To Nowhere that would end up bankrupting and destroying their empires? Why? Not a single one of these ancient empires lasted long in tact after the completion of their structures. The Incan empire fell. The Mayan empire fell. Ancient Egypt didn’t last. The Angkorian civilization fell because the kings spent all their money digging crazy expanses of canal systems around Tonle Sap to transport stone to the building site. It’s completely irrational that a civilization would feverishly build these things until their empires fell to bankruptcy.

Then there is the most recent Aeon that rolled over the earth. This Aeon had its epicenter somewhere Europe, around the France and British Isles region. Like a fog that slowly creeps, that Aeon crept into this area first gradually infecting people with its Thematic Essence. The Europeans in that Aeonic-Fog became restless spiritually, religiously, socially, and politically. All of a “sudden” these Protestants, Huguenots, Humanists, Deists, and political ideas like the Parliamentarians cropped up from the death grip of a cold dark age.

Then a couple hundred years later that Aeonic-Fog thickened and rolled across the Atlantic and revolution broke out. It first started with Oliver Cromwell and his fight. Then the fever spread in the colonies and George Washington and his men manifested the first republic of the New World. And that fever spread from one group of people to the next. The French became a republic, Mexico followed, Simon Bolivar and his men made republics out of South America. And that Aeonic-Fog ended up enveloping the entire earth with the Thematic Essence of self government and self determinism, and one by one every old world kingdom and theocracy fell to the Aeon of Democracy. Where did all that civil war and blood shed come from? How is it that the same humans who once were content with kings and priests could eventually gain the brain capacity to understand intuitively that they can govern themselves? We can see this 300-400 year old Acausal-Fog has changed the entire face of the earth and humanity as it rolls slowly by.

Now we’re getting to that period when the earth is nearing the tail end of this cosmic slug. The fever pitch is high. The level of irrationality is high like old days. As when empires spent all of their man power and ancestral wealth to feverishly construct pointless structures. Now our republics – the product of this Aeon – are feverishly spending money they don't have to fund pointless wars and military campaigns. The debt for some nations like the US is so ridiculous that it will never be paid off. The only way out of the Game for a future generation is Collapse. Like how the empires of an ancient Aeon collapsed at the end of their Aeon.

And these republics of ours started up so “fast” in this Aeon that they were built on faulty untested ground. The untested ground of oil and the untested ground of Capitalism. We build our republics as if believing crude oil is inexhaustible. The foundation of our republics is built on oil. Our energy, our plastics, our technology, our machines for farming, there is nothing about an aspect of our modern life that is not in some way dependent on oil. What happens to a civilization which has built itself on oil if that oil runs out?

And our Republic's economic circulatory system runs on untested Capitalist ideology and practice. This idea of capitalism for the sake of capitalism, exploitation of natural resources for the sake of corporate wealth and power, exploitation of people's lives for the sake of corporate wealth and power, lobbying and the influence of politics and government for the sake of corporate wealth and power. What happens to a civilization which has built itself on such a capitalist weltanschauung, when the people can't take any more? When the earth has no more to give? When the pointless accumulation of money has finally become evidently pointless on a collective human scale?

Yet just like the fog we may find ourselves in, the Fog of this Aeon of Democracy is so thick and pervasive that its hard for most of us to see 3 feet ahead of us. Most people today have no real intuitive sense of a future moment when their future progeny will exist. The future goes only so far as money can travel. Which means to a vast majority the future means going to the mall next week to buy the latest junk. Which means on a larger scale that colonizing the ocean, moon, and space, is not the future because it's a waste of money and manpower. Such money and manpower is better spent on wars in the Middle East. To save the dying republics from terrorism and to squander what is left of oil to prop up a behemoth of oil and capital, for the sake of making trinkets to sell to a market in need of plasma screen TV's and more asphalt for the more new car models to come out in the “real” future: the tomorrow you have to look forward to when you spend your money the corporate system gave you on crap the same corporate system made for you.

But now, there are some of us that are more intuitive, more empathetic to the pulse of Nature and the Flow of the Acausal. Such people can now begin to sense that something is not right with everything. That some sort of change is in the air. Like how some of us who love rain like me can smell rain in the air and know that it will soon rain. Some of us can feel inside that this Aeon of Democracy is near the end and that our present way of life is dying and struggling to look alive. In the distance some of us can “see” the fog of a new Aeon approaching. And those of us who have a natural ability to feel and sense the acausal with Dark-Empathy can already pick up the Thematic Essence and Nature of the next Aeon. That's what an Aeon is to me, or how I explained it. It's something that envelopes the world and influences humanity and through such humans that unseen something manifests causally for a while.

Patterns & Seeding

Picking up patterns I think is innate to animals. I think that natural selection over time “favours” the animal whose brains can pick up patterns. If a duck lacks the ability to recognize the pattern of autumn and approaching winter, they’d die. If a bug that depends on camouflage can’t recognize patterns then they’d get eaten and they wouldn’t have camouflage in the first place. If squirrels can’t learn the pattern of nuts growing and falling and trees dying seasonally, then they wouldn’t bother collecting nuts. And by patterns I mean that if you see a red stripe and then a white stripe, and then a red one, that you can predict that the next stripe may be a white one. Or if you see number sequences like 1, 3, 6, 10, 15, 21, X, you may be able to predict what X is. Natural occurring patterns also. Like if you see the fish come to eat small sea life that come out due to a full moon, that the next full moon, you can predict that the same fish will come. As when a bear eats salmon in a river in spring, when after she hibernates in winter and spring comes, she may predict that the same fish will be in the same river.

And so because I have lived through many springs, if it was winter I can with a certain amount of confidence predict or prophecy for you what the future coming spring and its patterns will look like. The land will become green again, animals will mate, fish will spawn, deserts will bloom, fields of cherry blossoms in Japan will turn a pretty pink, you’ll pack up your winter clothes, arctic snow bunnies will shed their white fur for their brown fur, and farmers will plow their fields; when you see these things, then ye shall know that spring has come. And when this all happens you’ll say to me: “Wow Chloe, that’s so magickal, how did you do that?!” No it’s not magickal. You’re just stupid because this same spring happened last year! And every spring time the same patterns occur!

It’s the same way with Aeons. I’ve never lived through the beginning and end of an Aeon, so I can’t say for sure what the next Aeon will look like as far as its patterning goes. But it’s all fractal. There are big Aeons and mini-aeons. Like big fog that envelopes a whole island, and little fog that just covers a tip of a mountain. Little Aeon-Fog comes and goes more frequently and the patterns are the same if you pay attention. For instance the miniature Aeon that enveloped China beginning in the 11th century. It was one of those old Empire Acausal-Fogs that swept across Mongolia. All of a sudden some backwards tribe just one day almost literally became an super organized military machine. Then these Mongols were infected with some bizarre Imperial Conquest fever. As the Acausal-Fog got thicker and covered more area, the Mongols got more restless of what land they had and conquered more. Until they nearly owned the entire known world at the time. Then the fog dissipated and that whole area just fell flat into chaos as fast as it all started. But when you look closely at the patterns of such empires from beginning to end, and you look back and study the fever that Alexander the Great caught and the fever that the Incas caught you begin to notice that such empires develop in the frame of time in recognizable patterns.

So the next time one of these Empire building Fogs infects and influences a group of people and you see the beginning patterns emerge, you can predict what will happen. And it’s in the ability to recognize patterns and being able to predict the interactions of patterns that allows for Seeding a new Aeon in a future time.

Seeding an Aeon is a deceptive phrase. You really can't control an Aeon or give birth to one from a seed. No more than a farmer can control or give birth to spring. No more than the science of aerodynamics has any control over air and gravity. But it's in recognizing patterns and knowing how air and gravity works that allows a farmer or NASA to work in harmony with spring and gravity. In such a way that a farmer working in harmony with spring can seed spring with his crops and allow that season to take care of the rest of the work. And from learning to make wings on crafts and packing them with rockets, we've been to the moon and back.

If we were farmers, and you one day started plowing your fields in the middle of autumn and planting your crops, you know how stupid you would look to me, and how much of your wealth you'd lose when winter came? I've always thought it was fascinating how every time Halloween comes there's always a large supply of pumpkins. And when Christmas comes around, there is always a supply of Christmas trees. I didn't know how that worked out, even during high school. I remember this one time when I was in my high school years my parents were driving us up north to visit relatives in Tacoma Washington and Vancouver Canada. And as we were driving through Northern California we in open land and to my right I saw a large field of Christmas trees in the thousand inside a fenced area that were 4 feet tall or something. It was just a farm of little Christmas trees. And I remember saying to myself in my head: "What a wack farmer, who the hell grows Christmas in the middle of summer and why!?" But I later figured out that you have to grow the trees before Christmas season. Which was a fascinating part because those farmers knew the growth pattern of those pine trees and were able to know exactly when to plant those trees to have them the right size for Christmas, to eventually financially benefit from it all.

So that's how you seed an Aeon also. You recognize patterns or emerging patterns and learn to work in harmony with the emerging patterns. For example the Seeding that took place in the early stages of this current Aeon of the Republics There was first the emerging pattern of religious unrest and a dislike for the Popes in the Vatican selling Indulgence. The general public had become disgusted with the Catholic Church, so the Protestant Reformation began to take place. Then some where and some when during that religious paradigm shift of whole nations some clever person or group of persons quietly drew in the support of kings and politicians by planting the Seeds/Memes of: "The King is also the Head of his Church." Because what king not only wants to be free from being subordinate to a Pope, but be his own Head of his own church and be king at the same time! What a deal. Then so when the northern Kingdoms of Europe solidified into protestant Kingdoms, the Seeds planted in the early stage grew so that you had kingdoms where the Monarch was also the Head of his own Church.

Or even more crazier and influential to this current Aeon happened in America. The British Colonies were already unhappy that they were getting taxed yet had no real representation back home in England. Not only did a group of people take full advantage of that emerging pattern to feed the flames for a revolution, but this group of people started planting bizarre ideological Seeds never heard of before like "Equality," "Liberty," "Rights," "Freedom of Speech," and "Freedom of Worship." back then during the revolution these Seeds may have been nothing more than rhetorical devices put together to cause people to fight for something.

Back then those Seeds may have only been speculative and ideological in essence. But 300 years later after this American species of civilization has solidified and matured, not only did those Seeds planted long ago matured into a real way of life, but those same Seeds once planted has literally become the “spirit” of this Aeon of Democracy. To such an extent that the United Nations would adopt them and now globally on a real collective level of humanity, every person on earth wants those same simple things. What may have started off as revolutionary rhetoric to inspire the mass to fight, and what were once ideological beliefs, has today become the very spirit of this current Aeon. And it all started as intangible memetic Seeds planted by opportunists who recognized the emerging patterns of a New Aeon/”Order,” as in Novus Ordo Seclorum. Novus meaning New. Ordo/Order being a coherent structure or pattern of something. Saeculorum/Seclorum meaning a “Generation,” or “Age.”

So this is how I understand what an Aeon is and how Aeons and Yugs work in influencing large groups of people. It is like my grandmother and uncle explains like a Cosmic Season. And Seasons each have their own theme, qualities, and characteristics. We cannot own or control an Aeon and we can't “give birth” to one out of some womb, no more than we can give birth to a new kind of season. But we can learn to work in harmony with the patterns of Aeons to our advantage. If we first know what we are looking at and if we have the ability to intuit with Dark-Empathy what the patterns are in the first place.

What is the general – almost universal – end pattern of our current Aeon? It doesn't matter what ancient culture you go to. You'll uncover the same answer. The Incas have the concept of the 5 Suns. The ancient Brahmans had the concept of the 4 Yugas, this being the declining and degenerate Kali Yuga. The ancient indigenous Buddhists of Southeast Asia have the concept of the 5 Buddhas. The ancient West had concepts like the Golden Age of Saturn, and the gradual degeneration of that age from gold to lesser metal. Doesn't matter what ancient culture you go to. You'll discover that this period of time we are living in is the end of some sort of Cycle which will end bad somehow. Maybe not bad as in the sun going cold, or rocks falling from space, or something. But on the level of being human and living in these things called Nation-States, things will be apocalyptic. As apocalyptic as it may have been for those olden Europeans who lived in a Catholic Christendom who witnessed the fall of their “world” tumble down around them.

If we recognize the emerging patterns now, and if we can think ahead to a near future when oil will run out and capitalism will collapse can we discern the future fall of human civilization? And if we can prophetically predict such a future pattern emerging, knowing that from the ashes of the old will emerge a new Aeon, then what Seeds do we plant today to help? Do we plant Seeds that help stabilize politics and the economy, or do we as subversive Niners, plant Seeds that will help push human civilization off the proverbial cliff, toward which it is speeding anyways. And if we can Empath the Essence of the future Aeon to slither itself over us, can we plant Seeds today like farmers sowing seeds, in such a way that what we plant today will bare constructive fruit 500-1000 years from now?

And these ancient traditions in many cultures have left us big glaring clues as to what the next “Thing” is going to look like, because as they say Kalapas are cyclical like a spinning water wheel. It's a matter of learning to recognize the miniature fractal patterns of history then bringing that pattern up to an Aeonic level. We know on a miniature scale that in the last days of the Roman Empire the ruling class spent all of their ancestral wealth. They essentially went bankrupt from over spending. Which was a big deal because not only was the empire built on slave labour, but the empire was also hugely vast. It requires money to maintain a military that can keep such a sized empire together. And it takes money to pay enforcers to keep the slaves from revolting.

The fall of Rome was slow at first. We can see from history that it starts with the disruption of Roman culture by an influx of illegal immigrants [Germanic Tribes] who really never fully matriculated as Roman citizens. So that's the pattern of the decadence or degradation of an established Culture which is now threatened by an "uncooperating" Other Culture. These Germanic illegal aliens also formed these tribal gangs which often broke Roman laws. So that was this stage of when the coherency of Roman social order began to be fractured. The Germanic gangs were breaching the Empire and not matriculating and causing problems/crime. So that is the pattern of decadence in law, meaning crime and the increase in crime. Then you had the inside aspect which is the wealth and ruling class just spending the empire's money recklessly. So that's the pattern of decadence in morals and decadence in political and economic matters.

And so the less money the Empire had, the more lawless people became and the less military force the empire had to defend its territory. Which open the door for the next stage of the fall, which was when larger bands of Germanic peoples began moving as an amassed military force into the Empire to take chunks of land out of it. Which was the period of time when hell broke loose in the Empire. The hell that broke was a slow loosening. Different sections of the former empire spiraled into chaos. Until a hundred or so years pass and the Empire was all gone. For a while Europe was a big mess. The brains and the skilled of the old empire spread and gave their knowledge and work to war lords or the new kingdoms. The artists, craftsmen, and professionals also found new patrons to work for. And such people seeded such new kingdoms with vital practical wisdom. So this is the pattern of reconfiguration or rebuilding something new. The chaos dies out though, and the new start up kingdoms prospers. People are happy and generally content. This trend peaks up and climaxes as the Renaissance which was that miniature Aeon's most fruitful point when all these new ideas, new art, new music, new sciences, new things flooded the human world. Like the miniature Aeon was a tree that had grown big and bore ripe fruit. But fruit trees die and the Seeds that fall germinate into new trees.

If we take those little patterns and look for them in this current global Aeon we are in, we'll be able to generally estimate where in the cycle of the Aeon we are in and what we can generally expect to happen in the near future. Just like the once wealthy and powerful Roman Empire, the wealthy and powerful Europe and America are being breached by an influx of illegal immigrants who come with their own Cultures and many refuse to matriculate. So that's the first pattern. Then we have the hugely obvious problem of ridiculous debt and reckless spending. The US is in debt, and the EU member nations one by one are spiraling into economic and financial crisis. That's another pattern. Yet despite the huge debt, America and Europe and other Magian states are spending huge amounts of money on pointless things like wars in the Middle East. Then in the inner home front something is happening which no politician ever talks about or recognizes: our slums and ghettos aren't going away, they are getting bigger. This has an effect on crime rate and social or civil decadence/unrest. Which is another pattern or sign.

So we can guesstimate from those signs that this Aeon of Democracy is nearing its end. This Aeon has already peaked for us when we went through that “renaissance” of technology called the Industrial Revolution and Empirical Science which constructively did change the world and our species. We can assume that at least America is spiraling downwards and will eventually fall apart. Its land taken chunk by chunk by the most organized and coherent groups of people that can defend and protect what territories they carve out. This would be the apocalyptic period of chaos we hear about. Then from there a new way of life influenced by the new Aeon will begin to emerge. And we already know what the next Aeon is: the Cosmic Season at the very beginning of the cycle. What the ancient Greeks called the Golden Age of Chronos.

In Theradava after the chaos the 5th Buddha Sey-Ah Mitrey will be born and “re-presence” Dhamma in the world. This is interesting because its considered that people don’t have Dhamma or know what Dhamma is in this current Yug. How we live now is the opposite of Dhamma, or the absence of Dhamma. Dhamma here meaning the Way/Law of Natural Phenomena. The Flow of Nature. Knowing what Dhamma is and repeating a Buddhist teaching to yourself isn’t the Natural behaviour of living in connective/empathic harmony with Dhamma.

Up north the Indigenous Chinese would call Dhamma: Tao. Tao is the Way of things. Tao is the effortless flow of things. And it is that Effortless Way which we have lost in this Yug/Aeon. Like the effortless way of natural ethics, lost to arbitrary abstract constructs of moral behaviour. It is effortless for me to want to live and devote myself to my family. It requires effort to reject my family and tell myself I am my own person and that I should live on my own and do my own thing. You see on is effortless like letting go of the side of a river and just flowing with the Tao. The other way is resisting the Tao’s flow as if one were standing firmly fixed in one spot facing the flow.

It is effortless for me to like a person after I have gotten to know them and want to hang out with them. It takes effort for me to tell myself: Oh but they are Christians and I am a whatever. Oh by he’s black and he’ll rob me in an alley. Oh but she’s white and will enslave me if given the chance. Oh but they don’t believe the same rational sets of opinions I have.

It’s effortless for a mother to love and go so far as to lay her life down for her children. It is an effort for a mother to kill and drown her 3 year old children and party the next day. It is effortless for a father or any person to be disgusted inside to think of sexually abusing children. It is a sick effort to abuse children. It is effortless to mind your own business and your own folk. It takes effort to be a shit kicker and war in the Middle East, and it takes some imagination to paint what you do in the Middle East to look pretty and nice.

It has nothing to do with what has come to be known as morals and ethics. We’ve just lost conscious touch of the Tao/Dhamma. We are out of sink with the the Way of Things. We are no longer in harmony to the Effortless Flow of the Way. No longer in that Natural state of Letting-Be. In Taoist wording we have lost awareness of our Original Nature. The Original Nature we were born with as children. As Mother nature made us. I don't here mean effortless as in the absence of force like to just give up trying to do things in life. Effortless as in that animals don't have to try to be animals. It's just how Nature made them and they flow with that Nature. Someone once said: Lest ye be as little children, ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven. Which also captures the essence. As children we have an effortless way of being. Neither moral or immoral. They aren't perfect angels, they can be little demons too. They effortless love, and effortlessly hate. But that hate is directed at real people doing real things to them to cause that hate. As grown ups we can effortfully indoctrinate ourselves to hate and kill entire races and people we have never met. As adults we don't have that natural state of amorality. We gravitate to one of two extremes. Either extreme morality or extreme immorality, which all is an effortful act.

The Greeks and ancient Romans had the idea of the Golden Age of Man. It's said that the Golden Age was the first age of our species on earth. During which time we were giants in size. Chronos or Saturn ruled the heaven as the father of the Golden Age. The old legends says that in that ages mankind did not have to work because the earth gave up her bounty to meet the needs of everyone. People at that time lived not against Nature, but in harmony to her as a living aspect of Nature. There was no war, because there was really nothing to fight for. No states, no ideological differences. Just mankind and Nature. But great Saturn was dethroned, and paradise was lost.

It was said that during that time that Saturn was the Sun to the earth. And that when Saturn was dethroned he lost his fire and became black. And so not just in Greek mythos and alchemical texts but as well as in ancient Brahminical Sanskrit Saturn is equated with the color black, with darkness, and often referred to as the Black Sun. The prophecy goes that after the fall of the last age, that the Golden Age will return, and Saturn will once again sit on the throne of heaven to be Father of a new race living at one with Nature.

I don't know if prophecies of a new age like these like those the Sybil is said to have given will ever come to pass. But a part of me that understands seasons, and Aeons, Yugs, and the longevity of ancestral oral traditions, believe that as a species we have been around on the earth for perhaps a few aeonic cycles for our ancestors to have passed legends and stories down to us today. We as a species have been around for at least 200,000 years. I cannot rationally believe that for 99% of that time our ancestors were stupid apes without language or oral traditions or culture. That they were so ignorant of the sun, moon, stars, and seasons, that they never notices anything out of the ordinary. That they never formed kingdoms buried some where in forgotten places like beneath the sands of the Sahara. That they were to ignorant to understand why their kingdoms fell.

I think it is hubris in nature to believe that we today are the only ones that "truly" have any understanding of anything and the universe. We today whose minds and awareness are so enthralled by the entertainment industry, who get so worked up about what some celebrity is wearing, that we can't even name 10 stars in the sky. The idea that such hubris modern people who can't even name 10 stars or point to three constellations, could believe ourselves to be more full of practical wisdom than a people of ancient times like the Polynesians who sailed the ocean guided only by their ancestral wisdom of stars so that they populate every island from Hawaii to New Zealand. Or better than a people who had the wisdom of erecting three great pyramids using massive blocks of stone, all without modern cranes. Or the hubris of some of our scientists who think they are so smart and know so much truth about the universe because of their math, and the black holes, and their big bang. When in many cases what we today are discovering have been known in the past somehow by a groups of people without modern technology or quantum mechanic or fancy-pantsy math.

I tend to agree with Graham Hancock when he said once that as a species, it is as if we are suffering amnesia. There is a vast expanse of our past human history that we have lost. Or at least some of us have. Others that come from living ancient culture and traditions have oral traditions passed down from one generation to the next. These oral traditions comes down to us as legends and mythos, changed over time, but the essence is still there. Think about the great amount of time it takes for a great procession of the equinoxes to happen. About 25,000 years to complete a full cycle. And amazingly, if you look hard enough in old cultures, stone monuments left behind, and pay close attention to legends and mythos of living cultures and their ancestral traditions, you'll encounter signs and clues that suggests that many people and cultures have existed in tact in some form for at least one cycle to be able to speak of this cycle in the first place. Sadly this extreme scientific rationalism of today is killing off these ancestral legends and oral traditions and replacing them with "real" knowledge like scientific crap such as time travel, worm hole technology, tachyon speed, antigravity engines, nano black holes, dark matter, dark energy, 10 or 11 dimensions, string theory, membrane theory, and the like.

Conclusion

I'm not even sure if I'm on topic anymore. When I'm in the "Zone" of inspiration, I just blank my mind in half where I'm partly aware of writing, and partly black minded, and I just type and peck away at my keyboard. It amazes me sometimes read back to notice that sometimes what I wrote all flows together.

I've always been fascinated with Time. I love to keep little gardens of fast growing plants that make seeds. I grow watermelon and my favorite plant: Red Amaranth. I love watching them grow from a seed, bare fruit or make seeds and die. Then I plant the seeds and watch the next generation go through the same cycle. Red Amaranth is great to grow because they grow like weeds. They start off small and they have these dark red leave. Then they grow into this huge red thing that taller then you. My mom makes stew from the leaves. It's just something about seeing generations pass that fascinates me. And as I get older and creep into that age where I'm starting to think about having children of my own, I am slowly starting to become my own source of fascination.

It's the idea that I will pass living people out of my body who will have their own children living in some future time and "world" that fascinates me. And the thought that I have an influence on them and those the world around them in their future time frame is even more fascinating. That's if I do this right and be conservative about culture and tradition. My own culture and tradition would not have come this far in tact if past generations were liberal and allowed their children to just live how they want and pick their own beliefs and way of life. There is a need for Order if an Aeon is to be Seeded, and if those seeds are to be nurtured right.

Think about it, Communism as a living political entity started off in the early 1800's as an idea of socialism. That idea was nurtured inside clubs and secret societies beneath the awareness of the mundane public. One generation of socialists with their vision for a future passing their culture and Seeds down to the next unmolested. Then when opportunity came, they pulled the right strings, cloaked themselves, shapeshifted right to manipulate the chaotic mass to fight their revolution. Then we have the first socialist state in 1917 was it? That took 100 years of nurturing ideas, planning, staying in secret away from the majority of mundane society, and conservative passing down of culture, mythos, and vision. 100 years from the causal birth of the ONA is 2072AD. If nurtured right by the right kinds of people, what would the ONA be able to manifest? The Old Guards in the past during the 90's like DM has already shown us that ONA sinister dialectics and strategy like Sinister Cloaking and shencing can and has worked in a limited sense in England. Limited only by the number of nexions.

I think one of the reasons why I like the ONA and the Myattian Triad so much is because it is different from most other Western systems-things. DM certainly gave his creation it uniqueness. But there are aspects of the ONA that I recognize from my own indigenous Tradition. I don't have to force my self to accept and understand what things like Wyrđ, Causal, Acausal, Causal Forms, Essence, Aeonіc Insight, Acausal Knowing, and Aeonіc Magick is. These are things with similar yet not exactly the same ideas as I would see in Theravada. But the ONA goes one step further from Buddhism. Buddhism tries to explain some of these things, but it stops short of providing you practical methodologies to apply in life to manifest results you desire. Buddhism mentions cyclical time and yugas and all that good stuff, but unlike the ONA it fails to present a practical means for the Buddhist to make use of it. You have to extrapolate the extra insights of practical use. Other wise all that dhamma of kamma and cause and effect etc, end up becoming beliefs in phenomena for the sake of believing in such phenomena.

It's like I were to say: "Buddhism is so cool, I know about causal mechanics." Then you say: "So what, what practical shit have you manifested with that knowledge?" Nothing, because Buddhism stops short of explaining the how in real world practical terms. So with the ONA and other Myattian ideas, I can look back at Buddhism and say to myself: "Oh, that's How you do it and why."

The other thing I really like about ONA is its concept of Aeonics and the fact that it gives a certain amount of importance to the idea of Time, Aeons, and utilizing the flow of Time and Aeons for an advantage of some kind. It thinks far ahead on a practical level in other words. No other institution I have personally come across has this. Not the way I've tried to describe it here. I know other traditions have ideas like kalpas and yugas and ages. But what do they do with those ideas on a practical level? Whereas the ONA has taken the idea of Aeons, causal mechanics, and sinister dialectics and turned it all into a workable science of manipulating Time and the future in a practical way. The only way I can explain this is concept is like when you have one of those spongie toys? You know what I'm talking? You get them from those 25 cent machines. They come in little pills and you put them in a 2 liter bottle of water and they slowly grow into a big animal thing. Time is like a river. I put those spongie toy pills into the river where I am standing with the intent of having those things grow into their full form way down stream which represents my future, to influence that future. That's Aeonics. At least how I understand it. You don't control anything, not the river, or the sponge toys. You just put one into the other, and the nature of Time and the nature of those sponge toys will naturally do the rest of the work.

I'll be around 90 years old in the year 2072. I think that's amazing. Even if I am the last Niner on earth, if I just kept doing what I am doing with the ONA until I am 90, the ONA would have made it through me into the future. I'd know how to shapeshift it to be relevant to the generations of that period. 2072 is only 30 years from the year 2100! My very own grandchildren will be alive in that future, and my own great grand children would be teenagers in that era. But you might ask: "Why do you want to get the ONA into the future so bad?" It's because of everything I tried to speak about in this essay. The change of Time. The direction our nation-states are going into. The fact that no institution out there presences things in a no bull shit fashion like the ONA. ONA calls things like they are. Mundanes are mundane. Magian is magian. Law is arbitrary. Culling is sometimes necessary. The sacred cow of the Nation-State is an illusion and mind-parasite. ONA is the only institution of its kind that also offers practical methods of application to its Dark Arts/Science. Its a great mixture of workable practical wisdom, mythos, and speculative reasoning.

ONA presents things in a No Bullshit manner. For example how many times have we in the Satanic Subculture and counter-culture world heard the cliché "religions are tools of control." And you'll see many mundane Satanist repeat this like it means shit to them. Like they just found buried treasure and have become enlightened. But what the fuck are you doing with your brain inside a religion called Satanism then? Why is your Satanism controlling you then? Have you seen those mundane Satanists completely under the spell of their Satanism where they dress all spooky, shave their heads like LaVey, act like a wannabe LaVey, start their online LaVey wannabe cults and prance around their 5 active user like hot shot messiah of Satanism, and act like Satanism is the only true way and answer? The fuck happened to you? Satanism didn't do shit for you. And these same idiots that parrot that cliché can't get themselves to understand how somebody like DM can be in more than one religion, doing the controlling [of the religion's memes] rather than being controlled. If religions are tools, don't you use the fucking tools?! Doesn't that make you a Tool if you are used by a religion? Especially if you parrot that cliché.

But ONA comes along and we present our shit in a No BS manner. Our Traditional Satanism isn't the answer to the cosmos, like some special locker combination that unlock the secret Truth of the universe. It's just a Causal Form we say. If you like that outer form, cool, knock your self out with it. Chant yourself into a frenzy for Satan. If not there are plenty of other forms to use: Drecc, Niner, Balobian, or make your own. They are all just Tool. We know they are Tools, and in a No BS manner we treat them as Tool.

I want my children and descendants in the future to have access to that No Bullshit way of the ONA. I want them to know what a State is minus the delusional bullshit. I want them to see law and order for what they are, minus the bullshit. I want them to understand Nature and their own human Nature minus the bullshit. That they are human and there is nothing wrong with them.

There is nothing wrong with anything that is humanly natural like killing. It happens and sometimes its necessary for protection and otherwise. That there is nothing wrong with mother Nature. She is as she should be. And because of how she is, we all are here. Nature is beyond our petty human valuations and judgments we may pass on Her. Because she was here first, and its because of how She is that we evolved into existence. There is nothing wrong with the tooth and claw, the war and bloodshed.

I want them to see Time as Time is beyond the face of a watch. So they can understand that they are not just passive passengers of the flow of causal and effect and Time. But that they can take an active part in becoming partners with the process of creation manifesting itself. Because they are that same creation in bodily form who are living parts of the greater field of creation. I want them to understand that they are a nexion or point of convergence between an unseen world [acausal] and the causal world through which the very Cosmos which they are manifests and self-creates itself. I want them to have distant goals and to learn to aeonically reach for them. I want them to understand that they have a way out of this National Prison. It's not an easy way out. But they way out can be lost in a pile of abstract bullshit. The ONA cuts through all that BS and offers practical knowledge on how to get things done by living in harmony with their folk and Nature.

I would like for my own future children to join me in this ONA Relay Race so I can pass my flag to them. I'd love to see them run with it and shapeshift it into something that is their own thing for their own Time frame. I'll never live long enough to see this Relay race end. But If I live just 90 years and have just one child in this Relay Race, I'll know that the ONA will have a nexion to manifest through in the year 2100. Which is not the goal, but certainly much closer to the end Goal. This is if technology still exists in that future. If not, if nations collapse in that time, then the ONA will have the practical means to teach them to Thernn, Tribalize, focus their energy on family, clan, and close companions, and be the cultural Seeds of a new Aeon.

AGIA H BAPHOMET

I've often wondered about the Dark Tradition and how, or thru what manner it presented itself into causal form. If it does exist; and I feel that a primal Dark Tradition does exist; then the Dark Ones themselves first presented the Dark to primal man in ancient forgotten times. How it came to be that Anton Long had the Way is irrelevant; but I wondered a while ago how it came into his hands. It is like a radio tuned into a distant frequency it resonates with. When our being is in tune to the "Dark Muses" the Primal Tradition presents itself by nature thru the mind in resonance to its Dark Current. To establish a footing or link to the causal realm, whereon each mind then expresses this Primal Dark Way in its own exoteric manner. If we resonate with the Dark Current, submerge ourselves in the Abyss, and yearn for the wisdom of the Way, it will come. As if Nature Herself whispers Her Dark Mysteries to you without need of master or prophet. And in the end, no matter who or where we are, Our Dark Tradition manifests itself in the same exoteric form. This Sinister Way of ours is a Way we learn directly from Primal Nature Herself, which is the core essence all causal life. This Sinister Way, needs no teacher or preacher; no prophet or guru; it just comes naturally to those who are Children of Primal Nature, who still dance to her wild music.

Ordo Ab Chao [Order Out Of Chaos]

Chaos is the base fundamental essence of the causal universe. It is symbolized in 352 as Azagthoth, which we esoterically name ourselves after: WSA: Waffen-Schaft Azagthoth, the Legion of Chaos. Azagthoth is the blind and idiot source at the center. It is thru Yug-Sothoth that the chaos, and idiocy of Azagthoth is brought into order and crystalized into coherency which gives form. The Chaos of the Quantum Flux coagulating into coherent structures of peons, neutrons, protons, atoms, elements, and molecules.

It is the Chaos that disrupts the coherency of order and form, bringing order back into chaos, to regenerate itself into new orders and form. Such as the death of physical life is a Disruption which causes the body to lose its order and coherency. It melts into a chaotic pool of biochemicals to be recycled and reorganized into new forms.

If we see and understand this basic process of creation and regeneration in Primal Nature, can we not also use the same process to Conquer, Destory, and Create social order?

What are the 3 required factors of distruping a social order such as a state or city? What are the steps needed to disrupt its coherency into chaos for the purpose of regenerating it into a new social order according to the will of the adept?

The First is called the "Distortion Factor." The Distortion Factor is any means, method or tool that is introduced into a coherent system to cause Disruption of that coherency. this can be illustrated by piercing a nail into a galss window. The windo is a coherent, crystalized structure. The tip of the nail is "introduced" into this structure which causes it to fracture. The fracturing affect is the Distortion where its coherency is fractured, thus making the window weak.

The Second factor is "Disruption." It is the coherency of the glass cracking. Disruption is anything which cracks the coherent bond of the target social order. Such as racial tention, or economic frustration. When done right, with enough force, Disruption annihilates social coherency and manifests chaos and instablity. This is called the Weak Point, which is the most critical period in destorying the said target social order. The Weak Point is not the end, it is only a sign post to inform you to keep going further and to keep applyng force because the end is near. Then what?

Then comes "Order." To take that chaos and regenerate it into a new order, according to the will and design of the Master Architect. This is the same basic three step process that created the civilization of the United States of America, and vertually every civilization known. What we see as revolutions and war, is only Primal Nature in physical motion.

But... says the perceptive: States and cities aren't the only social orders. Wherever there is more than one person, there is a social order. It doesn't matter what it is exoterically called, whether it is a club, web forum, political party, or religion, it is all social order, and psyt cherency. The same three step plan of attact and tactics works in all cases. So to study and come to a deep understanding of how primal nature works, we can use what we learn from Her to regenerate and establish new orders out of old ones.

Which brings me to this present writing. In previous writings we intoduces Distortion Factors into the coherent fabric of the ONA. This writing is the Disruption factor. The cracks have been made, now to pound it into piece. When working to disrupt sociey in the real world, one uses physical tools and people at your disposal. When disrupting a memetic system such as a religion, one uses new or "alien" memes. These memes infect minds that resonant with it, causing those minds to defect from the old way, and to assimilate into the new way. Thus, a new order takes form to bring the target fractured social order to its Weak Point; producing regeneration. Let the revolution then, commence.

If the ONA doesn't change, find equilibrium, and update its system to the 21st century it is doomed to die out eventually. The main problem with the ONA right now is that it is too heavily contaminated with testosterone and it lacks perspective of primal nature. What do I mean by that? I mean 99.99% of this Nine Angles Tradition is all boys.

What is a boy? A boy basically starts his life as an X chromosome egg and a Y chromosome sperm. This Y chromosome is the smallest chromosome in existence. In fact the Y chromosome only has about 75 genes in it. These 75 genes in turn are "palindromal." A palindrome is a sequence of letters, numbers, or digits which is the same backwards, as it is forwards such as the example: ABBA. If you look closely, you will notice that ABBA is actually a mirror image of only two letters: A & B. That's what the Y chromosome is. It really isn't even 75 genes, in actuality it is only about 37 puny genes that puff itself up to make it look bigger. In the same way that boys usually puff up their egos, muscles, and lie about their penis size to make them look bigger and more important. Like we care even. This Y chromosome really doesn't do anything but tell the boy's body to make testicles and manufacture a hormone called Testosterone; and it passes color blindness down to sons.

What does this mean? It means that boys live and grow up totally intoxicated with testosterone or are always under the influence of the hormone. It means everything the boy sees, he sees with boy eyes, under the influence of this hormone. It means whatever he absorbs of life and nature into his influenced mind, he interprets with a boy brain. It means that we girls aren't boys, and that we don't perceive or live life, or understand life intoxicated with testosterone. It's like a boy is always drunk on beer, and he thinks we girls see the whole world with drunk eyes like him. The nature he sees and understands is not the same nature a girl feels and understands. Baphomet thus, has two faces, one she shows to her sons, and one seen by her daughters.

Why is it even important to talk about the differences between boys and girls? Well, considering that boys and girls make up the entire human species, if we learn to understand our basic primal natures, could we not use that information to our advantage in the art of manipulation and glamour? Couldn't we learn to use that information to help disrupt social order? Couldn't we also use that information to be more successful in life and establish stronger bonds and more fulfilling relationships? Isn't that what life is essentially about? We are born into causal existence completely immersed in relationships of different kinds, and within social order.

The difference between a boy and a girl starts off as soon as we are born. Us girls while we're being breast fed or held, look at our mother's faces more often than boys, whereas boys more often look around to analyze his surroundings. This is the basic primal difference between the two genders. The girl stares at her mother's face more often because she is emotionally, hormonally, and psychologically programmed for social awareness, and social bonding. The boy looks around observing his environment more often because he is emotionally, hormonally, and psychologically programmed to be more territorially aware, and for territorial behavior.

When these boys and girls learn to walk, and we place them in a room together with toys. That primal coding affects their behavior, actions, and methods of interaction. The girls will most of the time instinctively play with the dolls. While the boys play with toy trucks or other items of private possession. Why? That doll to a girl is a surrogate "other person" with which she practices her primal coding of social bonding. While the boys take the more private possession-like toys because the accumulation of material goods and property is a fundamental aspect of territorialism. Observe closely and you will also notice all the girls tend to group closer together and end up playing with each other; while the boys independently play with their toys with a possessive nature or bond to the toy. Girls bond with each other and boys bond with their property.

Give these little girls and boys paper and crayons and let them draw and we see this basic primal nature again. Girls draw mommies, daddies, pet dogs, and horses; all having to do with emotional bonds, and relationships. While boys draw cars and trucks... things that can be possessed.

When boys and girls are older and we observe them at play on the playground, we can see a further development of these two primal natures in affect. How do little boys play? They play fight. They pick up sticks and sword fight, or they play wrestle. They become possessive of items on the play ground like the swing set or the sand box. I know, I remember. And they defend their swing set and sand box from other boys they don't like. Where are the girls on a play ground? We're somewhere in the corner with each other talking of playing with dolls.

Boys are territorial, possessive, and competitive by nature. This nature isn't girl nature. It doesn't matter where you then put a boy in life, whether he is in politics, the army, a corporation, or a religion. Boys will be boys, and they will always do boy things. If the boys are in a religion, they will use it compete with, fight with, and accumulate possessions with. Why? What has every great war from the Trojan war to the Mahabharata of ancient India ever been fought for? Women.

We see this more clearly in the baser animal kingdoms. Take a pride of lions for instance. A pride of lions consists of usually an "Alpha Male" and his harem of females lionesses. The boy lion is only concerned over his territory; defending it from competition, and expanding it for more resources. The female lions are more concerned over the social bond of the pride, maintaining the social order, and regenerating that social order by giving birth to new lions. But why does the alpha male get all the girls?

Because the primal survival instinct of a female is "Security." The feeling of being secure knowing that we are safe to continue surviving without being harmed and that our offspring will be safe also. These alpha males, because they control a given territory offers that needed Security... for a fair exchange of course.

The male's primal survival instinct is "Replication." To breed with as many healthy girls as possible to pass his Noble Genes down and to make sure those offspring are all his. it is not the land or possessions of a male, nor how he looks that primally and sexually attracts a girl to a man, it is his glamour of Confidence that he can provide and satisfy the need for Security. Boys are primally and sexually attracted to “pretty” girls because beauty is a visual signifier of biological and genetic health. When a female animal encounters a male that is alpha status, she yields and submits by her very nature to him, giving herself to him in exchange for security.

But then, why do secondary ranking guys – those who are not alpha males, choose to support and follow an alpha male? In 352 we call this the “Trickle Down Affect.” The alpha male’s glamour of confidence and “alphamaleness” trickles down to his supporters and associates, thus making them “appear” to be just as confident and attractive to the females in that group. We are essentially a reflection of who we associate with in life. The alpha males allows his associates to have the second class females that he doesn’t want, in exchange for the support.

We see this Trickle Down Affect in the world of music. Rock stars are modern ‘alpha males’ because the success in life they have achieved from a girls perspective offers much security, therefore they become very attractive. It doesn’t matter how they look to a girl. Just as a guy cannot help but be physically attracted to a girl for her looks, a girl cannot help but be attracted to a guy for the level of confidence he has. So these rock stars have girl groupies who would be more than willing to yield and submit themselves up for security. The rock star’s associates gets residual glamour from the rock star and in turn looks good.

This is the fault of satanism. It is masculinized and contaminated with testosterone. It rejects primal feminine principles of social bonding, condemning it as bad and conformity. It claims to be based on human nature, but is just as far removed from that primal nature as Christianity. This is what makes satanism a weak religion, and why Christianity has members in the billion. Because the world great religions utilizes the social drive of mankind as its central essence. What goes on in a church, a synagogue, a mosque, or a Buddhist Temple? Social interaction.

So we learn that girls are naturally attracted to a man not because he has big muscles, or even a big house, but because he “appears” (glamour) to have the confidence to make her feel secure in life. Confidence is the first and biggest turn on for a normal girl. But who cares you ask? So what? Knowing this stuff is the difference not only in you getting laid or masturbating alone; it also if you work it right, lead you you fame and fortune.

We can see this primal principle being applied in real life in the presidential race between Barack Obama and John McCain. This example will also show how stupid men confuse “ego” for confidence. What exactly first does “confidence” mean in the eyes of a girl? It is the appearance that you know what you want, how you want it, and how to get it. A quick example that any girl will understand is riding in a car with a male friend or boyfriend. If the guy is confident, he just puts the girl in the car, take control of the situation, and just drives her somewhere. That’s confidence, and its attractive. A guy who is INSECURE and lack confidence when he puts a girl in his car shows in feebleness by asking: So, where do you want to go... what do you feel like doing?

It's a simple question, and to the guy it might think he's saying: I want to make you happy, so we can do whatever you want, because I love you and just being with you makes me happy." But to a girls ears she hears: I suck. I am a loser. I am insecure. I don't even know where to take you or what to do with you.

Barack Obama knew how to work his glamour to appear completely confident. He made his statements and stuck by them. He speaks with a voice that vibrates with self confidence. He looks and uses his eyes emitting confidence from them light beams. His thinking process is determination. He knows how to take control of the situation, and never shows any signs of insecurities. His glamour is contagious and hypnotic, like the glamour of Hilter in those old days were Hitler just exuded hypnotic confidence into the German Folk to entrance them and captivate their collective attention, hearts, and minds. This is the quality of a winner or an alpha male, and the source of sheer power.

John McCain sucked. He lack any kind of confidence. Instead, he compensated his lack for a confident self image and glamour for ego. All he did was talk about himself: I was in Vietnam... I was a P.O.W.... I did this... I did that... and he said these things in a voice that showed in insecurities. his mind and thinking process was indecisive. He couldn't make up his mind about his statements and opinions. The way he stands and his body language showed his lack of confidence. He avoided eye contact. Why is eye contact important and associated with confidence? Because when two male animals face each other to fight over territory they make eye contact and the insecure one breaks that eye contact and looks away. lack of eye contact expresses a lack of confidence and insecurity.

Eye contact is the second most attractive quality in a man for a girl. The more eye contact he makes with her, the sexier he makes himself appear to her. Establishing eye contact with secondary males establishes rank and class structure, and those with confidence sheds that glamour thru their eyes to their associates. John McCain lost because he didn't understand primal human nature. Because he didn't convince men that he had the confidence of an alpha male to share with them as associates, so he lost support, and he didn't know how to make himself look attractive to women to gain their vote. If you were a secondary ranking male, who would you support a male who was confident enough to insure power for your group, or a male that is a loser? Who the hell wants to follow a loser? For what?

So we see here that Nature rewards her sons who struggles and fights to the top with the coveted gift of power, dominion, and women, which rightfully belongs to them. Their fitness to climb human order to the top of the piles makes their genes of noble quality, which Nature desires to propagate to Her next generations. Thus the Great Mother to men rightly appears as a dark, bloodthirsty Kali, who demands ruthless might and blood shed. None of the greatest men that ever walked this earth achieved that might and power with out bloodshed, spilled to the ground as an Opfer to the Dark Mother. How many men fell victim to the sword of Alexander the Great and Genghis Khan that they would be immortalized among the greatest humans to ever grace or race? How many lives did Hitler, Lenin, Maa, and Washinton Opfer up to the Dark Goddess to manifest their civilizations and receive their reward of immortal fame and supreme power?

But this same Goddess shows herself to her daughter in a different manifestation. To Her daughters, who were made in Her likeness, she is Sophia, the Mother of Wisdom. For when we girls understand the mysteries of Her Pimal Nature, we have but to yield and appear to submit and She rewards us with those same foolish men that struggled and faught for glory, and their entire estate. You see, Alexander the Great may have fought, slughtered, and struggled his way to the top, but all Roxanna had to do was yield and appear to submit to control his heart... and his entire empire.

Yielding and submition, in the mind of a man rightly is associated with weakness. Because when a man yields and sumbits, to whom does he yield to? Another man. But when a girl yields and submits, it it to the alpha male, not because she challenged his territorial authority, but because she desires security and because she has something he needs, which she will give up for a very large price – his life, devotion, and all that he has ever worked for. Baphomet favores Her Daughters.

Thus in 352 we say that Baphomet is only an outer name and form. But when you translate those letters thru the Atbash Cipher we come to a more hidded name: Sophia. Which is Wisdom, more softer, more beautiful, and yielding to Her Children. This is to say that Nature has two faces. One that is of bloodthirst might, progression and survival; but those who study Her and gains an understanding of her primal mysteries becomes Wise; and with that Wisdom procures Her coveted gifts.

This balance which we have brought in 352 to Baphomet must then in be expressed in word also. The masculinized “Agios O Baphomet” is no longer valid and the feminine form: “Agia H Baphomet” is used by us who understand Her feminine mysteries, Her Wisdom, Her undying bond to Her Children; and the Power She has over men. May She bless this Nexion of ours with abundance of sisters and brothers, an indisoluable social bond, and fruitful endeavors. Agia H Baphomet...

ANGLES OF LIFE

Angles of Life

Malibu

We got up early today just as the sun was rising to get ready. We packed our backpacks with water, strudel, dried fruits, and a lot of beef jerky for the hike we had planned. Kayla had her blue jeans, hiking boots, and her “dikadelic” tank top on, with her hair tied up. I wore jeans, my sneakers, and this forest green-tee shirt. We stopped by before we jetted at McDonalds for a quiet coffee and breakfast. I love their cheesy croissant thingies. The drive up to Topanga State Beach up in Malibu was going to take a few hours with morning traffic. But we had all day so we took the scenic route up Pacific Coast Highway.

The coastal area around Malibu is gorgeous. To your left as you’re driving up PCH is the ocean which stretches way up into the horizon. To your right are all these beautiful big houses, trees, and green fields of shrubs. And that scene just goes on and on. She had a lot on her mind today. You can tell when Kayla doesn’t want to talk and wants to think when she leans back while driving, with the music on loud, grips the wheel with her right hand, and bites nails of her left hand, with this pensive look, just staring out ahead, oblivious to the bumper to bumper traffic.

I’m used to it, so I know when to give her space. So as the traffic started making me feel anxious and restless and frustrated, I pulled out my phone to do a little reading. I have Adobe Reader on my phone [which I love!] and every ONA/Myatt related PDF in a folder all on my phone [talk about smartphone huh].

So there I was, on my way to Malibu, stuck in thick traffic, reading Hostia One. A couple days ago I was curious as to what the term “Nine Angles,” actually means. Why “nine?” Why not 7? Why “angles?” Why not spheres, or realms, or vectors? I have read Pointy’s “Ingrowing Angles,” several times and it left me more confused than when I started. I don’t think my girl brain [at my age] works good enough to decipher the way that manuscript was explaining what an “angle” was. Geometry and a girl’s brain doesn’t go together often. So I gave up and started looking in other places for other meanings and clues. But even the ideas and concepts I read in Hostia were confusing. I understood Hostia, but still, the information I got from it felt “foreign” or like I couldn’t “feel” it or relate to it emotionally. So I just gave it all up and listened to the music instead.

We weren’t moving. It was sprinkling and gloomy. Kayla was cussing and swearing because we were grid locked. Fortunately we drove past the cause of the traffic. It was a bad car accident. Maybe the road was slippery and they were going to fast? One of the two cars was upside down. The police and ambulance were obviously already there. We had just made it on time to see them push the gurney [“trolley” in British medical jargon] into the back of the ambulance which didn’t look like it was in a hurry to go any where. All we saw was sheet over a body, so we figured the poor guy must have died. “Fuuuuck,” goes Kayla. I just had my mouth open looking at her shocked. But the traffic was now moving, and I could feel the angst and frustration of traffic subside as the car was picking speed, which put a smile on my face.

I felt bad inside because I was glad we were moving. Here I was all selfish thinking about passing this stupid accident so we can get to the beach, and this guy suffered a horrible death and will never see his family again.

So Kayla spent the rest of the way talking her mind on death. Her grandfather had just recently passed away December of 2009. It was around the same time brother Frata 352 of Malta’s father had passed away too. So I guess we both had death and dying on our minds. “What happened when we die?” She asked me. I spent the rest of the day trying to explain different things to her as best as I can.

Hiking

It’s a long quiet strip of sandy beach with not many people around because it was a weekday. We had left our shoes in the car as we just wanted to talk a long quiet walk down the beach before we walked up to the hiking trail near by.

The beach feels different when you are in that reflective mood. It’s just an eye full. You can see the water go all the way back into the horizon merging with the sky. And you can’t help but wonder in awe how it all got here. Which only added to our talk about the Mystery of Life and Existence we were having.

In a way, it’s satisfying when you are reading, or in class, or on the internet, or think in your house to read about theories and explanations as to how Everything came to be. But when you put yourself out into big Nature where you feel so small and insignificant and overwhelmed by Existence, those theories seem to fade before that Mystery that surrounds us. And we are left still in awe and wonder.

Just off of Topanga Canyon Rd near by is a parking lot thingy where the hiking trail is. We decided to park our car there, and hike our way slowly up the hill to the top where there was this little bridge and a flowing brook. Last time I had been to the top we saw a cluster of orange and red salamanders mating in a big pile.

The hiking trail is beautiful. It starts off with a glen of sorts surrounded by big green trees, and there are these really small “midget building” here and there. As you make your way up there is a small dam to your right where a bee hive lives in somewhere. Then you hike up the side of the hill surrounded by the usual shrubbery and plant life native to that area.

My favorite plant I always look out for is this really cool yellow spaghetti like plant called “Witch’s Hair.” It’s a parasitic plant with these gorgeous little blood red flowers. They somehow take root in a host plant, and then strangle the host plant gradually by spreading its spaghetti like branches all over the plant.

We were still talking about Life as we hiked, relaying insights back and forth. There was this point where we stopped to look at this huge beehive way up on the side of the rocky hill. We both turned around to look at the scenic view behind up which were trees, and Kayla says: “Life’s so weird, we could not even exist, and it would still go on without us; but we do exist, why?”

That statement made me feel funny inside. We have all these questions that have no real answers. It was a wanting to know beyond “Satanism,” beyond Buddhism or some religion. Just two strange creatures who don’t know where they came from, what they are doing here, and where they are going wanting to know what “this” all means and how it all got here. Just us and Nature, with none of that bullshit religion in between.

We spent most of our time up at the top by the brook talking about everything that was on our minds. About death and Life and everything in between and beyond [the Cosmos]. Which led us into talks about science and our mutual dislike of what passes as science today.

Contentions

I hate modern mainstream science. It’s unfortunate that such a noble art could degenerate from olden day Empirical Science into some dogmatic theory thumping lifeless institution. Math has taken the place of direct experimentation. Any new hypothesis which challenges an established theory is mocked by the High Priests of Modern Science.

And this is all they have to work with: just Theories, which are just guesses. And from those scientific biased guesses there is Belief. Biased as in that modern materialist science is biased in that anthropomorphism, supernaturalism, or any –ism beyond Materialism is rejected. But these theories sprout up; one after another; which becomes a forest of theories. And it’s in this forest of theories that the Mind tends to get lost in. When the Mind is lost in a forest of theories, it is as far removed from Life as a Mind lost in religious Beliefs. In effect, these Beliefs and Opinions gets in the way between You/Us and Life. Regardless of whether you are a materialist-atheist or a superstitious religionist: your Beliefs/Opinions is a wall between you and reality.

Direct Apprehension

Vibhajjavada is perhaps the single most important tool I have. The word means the “Doctrine of Analysis.” You expose yourself Directly to a subject matter or nature; observe, and analyze closely. And from that analysis comes insight which is born from within your own Self. And from those self born insights, there is Self Illumination, where you do not depend on any other person, priest, religion, or scientist to spoon feed you ideas, beliefs, and opinions.

Pathei-Mathos is now my second most important tool in my arsenal of Self Illumination. The phrase suggests a struggle or suffering; a trial or tests which Life and Experience brings. From an intimate and Mindful Direct experience of Life and the study of our intimate experiences in Life there is an inner growth in Understanding, a Becoming, a Wisdom that blossoms in our Mind, where Life and our own Experiences is our only Teacher. There is no religion in between you and Life. No theories. No Beliefs. No words even. Because when you have touched something directly there is a wordless knowing.

Mother Nature had it all planned out from the beginning. If Nature depended on priests, scientists, gurus, and professors to teach each generation of her living organisms, causal life would not have made it this far. Even though plants and animals don't speak Greek, Pathei-Mathos is in essence, the Way Nature teaches, and the way all life learns: From their own life experiences, struggles, tests, trials, mistakes, and adaptability: or ability to change over time from such experiences. This Way requires no teacher or prophet or words. From the “pathei-mathos” of a simple culture of bacteria 3.5 billion years ago – with its suffering, struggle to adapt, etc – evolution happened, and we are a product of that evolution: 3.5 billion years of pathei-mathos.

It might be hard for current materialists to agree that the life experience of a proto-amoeba fueled evolution since it is Believed that genes are in control. But a New Biology and the new field of Epigenetics is confirming Empirically that the environment and Mind influences and affects genes. Evolution is a willed effort, not an accidental mutation. Nature doesn't play with dice. For a Living organism like Nature to exist continuously for 4 billion years, She can't afford to play chance.

This natural Way of Direct Apprehension has been lost in most members of our species. We go to everything but Life itself for answers: television, movie stars, rock stars [of all people], state controlled schools, holy books, priests, politicians [of all people], our friends, commonly accepted opinions of others: Everything and everyone but Life. All of these examples are lost in their own Beliefs and Opinions and are equally removed from Life.

The best way to illustrate the difference between wisdom gained from direct apprehension of Life versus going to others for their opinions is with Love and Sex. We can all remember a time during puberty when we were changing inside and out when we were thinking about love and sex. Our parents may have tried to shelter us from experiencing these things because we were too young. TV bombards us with images of sex and relationships. Our friends and other may have told us a few bizarre things about having boyfriends and sex. Sex Ed at school told you to stay away from it because your vagina will rot with grotesque diseases [they show pictures] and you'll get fat and pregnant; and they make you push a bag of flour [pretend baby] around for good measure too. And your local pastor at church will tell you you'll burn in hell forever if you have sex before marriage, so don't even bother getting a boyfriend.

So you end up with all of these different Opinions and Beliefs and you get lost in that forest of opinions. Until you just Try it. When you do first fall in love and try sex for the first time, there is a wordless knowing. More of an inner feeling and realization of what it means to actually fall in love and be loved, and what sex is. And it is beyond the gibberish you once heard. Which is when you realize that all of those other people's beliefs and opinions were just gibberish that had nothing to do with the wordless knowing of Love and Sex. And from years of love and heartbreak and mistakes, you grow into a wise young adult. Wise from your own personal touching of Life.

Or it is like magick. I have a boar tusk wrapped in gold. On the tusk is written magickal Pali versus by a monk, who also "woke up" the "spirit" inside of the tusk. In my culture [Thai/Khmer] these boar tusk amulets have been used for thousands of years. And those that use them – especially in battle during war – knows their value and their 'faith' in such amulets is beyond doubt. But those beliefs or faith in such amulets are born from a direct experience. Whereas those people who have never owned such an amulet or have never experienced anything concerning magick, often have many of their own theories and beliefs [disbelief] about the subject. But from where do their theories and beliefs arise? Lifeless opinions devoid of any intimate and direct experience.

Life & Death

Since I was raised in an Asian culture, I was never told that the stork brings babies. I did wonder where I came from when I was little, like around 5, so I asked my mom where I came from. She told me I came from a pet store in China Town because the Chinese people in China have so many people in their country, they have to sell their extra babies to people in America.

Of course I learned later where babies come from. As we all do at some point. We definitely know when one of your girl friends at our school gets knocked up by her stupid boyfriend. So for many of us it's Direct Exposure to pregnancy that we intimately realize how human life starts. When one of your friend or mother is pregnant, and you feel the baby kicking with your own hands, and a few months later you're holding the baby in your arms, there is a wordless knowing that goes beyond sex ed and text book pictures and the many opinions and beliefs about having babies. Direct exposure to the beginning of human life also gives you something no text book or belief or theory can ever give to you: Awe and Wonder. It's fascinating in a mysterious way to hold a new born baby in your arms, because it's born fully biologically and physiologically functioning on its own, it's alive, and it came literally from nowhere.

But death is different isn't it? We have all these beliefs and opinions about death. Some of us believe that when we die we stop existing. Some of us have this theory that when we die we are judged and based on how good or bad we were we go to heaven or hell. How many of these opinions and theories came from somebody who held death in their arms? How many of us have held a dying person? How many of us have heard with our own ears a dying person's last mortal words? How many of us have intimately experienced directly somebody we know wither away and die?

Death in the Occident is sterile and clinical. We don't ever hear the last words of the dying. The last words we ever hear is some doctor telling us our elderly loved one has passed on. Death in the West is shut off from direct experience.

The Elderly – our own grand mothers and grand fathers – are shut off in nursing homes: out of sight, out of Mind. We go on our daily lives, perhaps feeling a bit guilty, but we try not to think about it. Maybe we'll go visit these old people once in a while. Then they die far from our Mindful direct awareness. And we wonder what happens to the dead. And we make up theories to explain something we were never intimately connected with away. Everybody seems to have an opinion; yet nobody seems to have directly experienced deaths in the West.

What do I Believe happens to us when we die I was asked. I don't Believe. I believed many things about love and sex before I Experienced it. But when I did Experience it, there is nothing to Believe: there is just a Wordless Knowing. I Believed many things as a small girls about where babies come from. But when I experienced it directly, there is nothing to Believe: there is just a silent and simple – yet awe inspiring – understanding. You don't believe in something you have touched, or tasted, or seen, or heard, or smelled, or experienced. You don't believe in the color blue. You don't believe in a song you like. You don't believe anything about the taste of a watermelon. You don't believe anything about snowboarding, like you don't believe in driving cars. You don't believe in things you directly have experienced and Realized inside. You believe in things you have NOT yet experienced. You make theories up for things you have no idea of or intimate association with.

It's no wonder to me that the people who are the most far removed from life: religionists, have the most Theories about it. It doesn't surprise that people who have no real intimate personal experience of the Universe – Cosmologists – have the most Theories about it. People who have never intimately personally experienced death, often have the most opinions and ideas about death to believe in. Thankfully, there are other cultures and peoples besides the Western Human.

In most cultures and living traditions around the world a Family stays together through life and death. In such Families both the birth of a new relative and the death of a relative are directly experienced first hand by everyone. The birth is a joyous occasion. The deaths brings both sadness and relief. In such cultures the elderly are never thrown away in a nursing home. You nurse your grandmothers and grandfathers to death. You watch them wither away in a room next to you. You care for them, spend all your time you have left with them, before they go away. You watch them die in silence with your aunts and uncles. You hear their last words, and you see them take their last breath. And you see when they have died that "something" behind their eyes has left.

In cultures like the one I was born and raised in, this is a Living Tradition. It is an old one that is thousands and thousands of years old. Older than religion, because when they do die, we practice an ancient tradition wrongly called “ancestor worship” by the Occident.

One generation cares for their elders to death, and that tradition is repeated down the ages. During which time, things are learned about death from direct exposure. And that knowledge and wisdom is passed down by the living. I’ve helped take care of many of my elders and I have seen all of them die naturally. But, I’m not going to go into the details of what I have experienced and wordlessly know and what has been passed down to me by thousands of years of being so close to death. What I have experienced in my own life, has only meaning to me. And death really isn’t the central topic here. It is Mystery.

Angles to Mysteries

Everything about Life and the Cosmos is a mystery. The closer we look, the less we know and the more mysterious things get. We are a creature that doesn’t know how we got here, what we are doing here, or where we are going. It’s almost as if we are blind, or like we exist in the dark.

This reminded me of bats flying around at night. They can’t see anything so they squeak these ultrasonic echoes. And these echoes bounce off their dark environment and from that bouncing, they get an image of their surrounding in an indirect way, so that they begin to “see” in that darkness. Our talk on that hike ended up in this darkness we exist blindly in, so we were briefly talking about bats.

I went home that day feeling at peace inside. Then the word “Angle” came back on my Mind as the silence of the evening caused me to think about the ONA again. I can’t stand it when I don’t understand something even if it is explained to me. Usually I just give up and make up my own explanation. This “Nine Angles” thing was bugging me.

I went online to try and find as many archaic meanings to the word “angles” to try and create for myself a meaning of “nine angles” that is personally my own understanding that is relevant to me. Coincidentally there is an old definition of the word “angle” that is not a geometric thing or a fish hook. The word “Angle” also means: “To get at something indirectly or by artful means.”

That definition of the word Angle got me thinking about the bats again: how they piece together their dark environment by using an indirect method. Nine of course to me would be the 4 causal dimensions plus the 5 Acausal dimensions and/or the 7 spheres of the Tree of Wyrd, plus the Abyss and the Acausal: which either way is the Whole Living Cosmos.

Our total immersion into Life, and our direct apprehension of Life seems to be angles of indirectly unraveling or unlocking the mysteries of the Cosmos that surrounds us; that we exist in: that we are a living expression of. If only we each put ourselves into every aspect of Life: Birth and Death, and every human experience in between. But also being intimate, empathetic, and close to Nature, and directly analyzing it our own selves for our own answers.

In this way – with something like Pathei-Mathos – there is a Going Beyond of opinions, established theories, mundane beliefs, and the silliness of religion. Where nothing and no-one comes in between us and the great Dark Mystery of the Cosmos. Where our own Life experience, intimate apprehension, and struggles are our only teacher and doctrine which guides us Numinously to our Self Enlightenment and evolution.

In a way, Life is both the teacher doing the teaching, and the subject being taught. No book, or belief, or theory thought up by another human, can teach what Life can teach. Life and Nature have been teaching its Mysteries since before mankind. It is arrogant to believe that we know more and can do better because we have microscopes and telescopes, and can tell stories about what little we see: what little we understand.

After a long reflective day, after having gained a new understanding of the word “angle,” and after re-reading some of ONA and David Myatt’s writings, I see the ONA and what it has to offer in a new light. If only we could mature ourselves from our old aeonic reliance on religion and priests. If only we could liberate our Minds from the forest of theories and beliefs, and just plunge into Life naked. To just experience Life directly and intimately, up against our bare skin. Beyond theories and beliefs. Where there is only Experience, the Wordless Knowing, and Evolution born from such experience and knowing: Which has been the Way of Nature for aeons.

ANTON LONG AND THE ONA FAMILY

Anton Long & The ONA Family

In this Third Phase of Fayen the most immediate focus before us is to physically manifest individual ONA Initiates, Cells, Nexions, Sinister Tribes, Dreccs, Niners, and Balobians, for the long aeonic work ahead. We now have the people, the groups, the nexions, and tribes. An academician of a Norwegian Universit is now even conducting a survey and research on the ONA and its groups, temples, nexions, and tribes.

Our ONA manuscripts – in the thousands of pages – are now also publicly available. With this also our ideas spread and inspire the Left Hand Path. This is something which we have seen bare fruit in the past decade with Satanic groups such as the Joy of Satan [initially], Temple ov Blood, Temple of the Black Light, Ordo Sinistra Vivendi, Order of the Left Hand Path, etc, etc, all having been inspired into existence from being exposed to ONA MSS and ONA ideas/concepts; eventually becoming their own organizations. In this manner, the ONA and our MSS still inspires and influences even more feverishly than a decade ago. A decade ago people and organizations only borrowed from the ONA to create their own Satanic Orders – as per Codex Saerus – whereas now people and internet organizations goes so far as to try and “destroy” the ONA, or pretend to be its leader and whatever.

But now as we have entered our Third Phase of Fayen, we have before us a new focus or project which will help us aeonically get our work done: Culture & Tradition. And with this ONA Kulture, there now must exist Cultural Coherency in our awareness as associates of this ONA which Anton Long is the Father of.

The seeds of our ONA Kulture are our cells, Sevenfold Way Initiates, Nexions, and associates now scattered around the globe in different parts. Each Initiate is thus a living nexion through which in time the next generation of Initiates will come. Thru each living nexion with Time, a common Kulture and Tradition will emerge. Which Culture and Tradition is the main tool of seeding a new aeon into first Imperium and later – after we have long gone – a Galactic Imperium and a new Breed of Humans.

Anton Long

The ONA – in this Third Phase of Fayen – is still so new; being only 30 something years old; that the Founder, Source-Personality, and Father of our ONA Kulture is still alive. Anton Long still writes and shapes the ONA. He still is at the center of the ONA.

During the older phases of Fayen when people were still into the idea of initiatic orders and structured hierarchical organizations, the Old Guards of the ONA dressed the ONA up to reflect such in fashion styles of organization for certain reasons. Thus in older manuscripts dating from this phase of Fayen you'll see ONA presented as an organization with members, with a leader, and degrees, and so on.

During this Third Phase of Fayen with our focus now on Family and Kulture, the old rhetoric has been faded out. We started 4-3 years ago presencing the idea into the general public that the ONA is leaderless, without structure, etc, with success. This is so because a living culture has no structure or leader, and that Anton Long will not live forever with us.

But for those of us who were inside the ONA during both phases of Fayen – during both rhetorical periods – we should know that at no time did anything esoteric actually change. Only the Forms and Outer Presentations change. Only the superficial – exoteric – words were modified. Instead of the word “member” we say “associate;” instead of “Order” we say “social order,” or an “ordering of people.” Instead of “Grand Master” being a hierarchical title, we left it as a name for one of the higher degrees of Our Sevenfold Way. Instead of referring to “the Grand Master,” we now just say “Anton Long.”

But nothing has really changed has it? Everything for Us essentially is still in its place. Anton Long is still the center of the ONA. Although he may not now be rhetorically a leader of the ONA, Anton Long trumps us all in his Seniority simply because he Founded and Fathered the ONA, and every one of Us today who considers Ourselves to be ONA is literally fathered by his ideas. Unless you are so ungrateful, so hubris, so peasantile that you don't acknowledge and Honour the Man who gave you his thoughts and wisdom which We made our own as a foundation our private thoughts may have sprung from.

Anton Long may not be a leader rhetorically, but to those genuinely a part of his ONA, We give him his due respect and honour as the master mind and source of the ONA and Our Kulture.

I say rhetorical because whatever we call Anton Long, the ONA is still his because the man created the thing. But the word game is important, because We need to start to ween Ourselves from this old aeon idea of having leaders, and instead of respecting our Elders and Seniors with Honour. Like I pay my respect to my grandmother. She's not a or the leader of my family, but the entire family came out of her, and so we give her the proper Honour of a “progenatrix” of our family/clan. Because of that we give her a large amount of respect and honour, and recognize an important person in our family. And this is what Anton Long is to the ONA: The Progenator. Anton Long is in the ONA Kollektive and Kulture an important senior person.

By Seniority I also mean that as far as the ONA's Sevenfold Way goes, Anton Long is at this moment the only one among us to hold the degree of Grand Master which is the name of the 6th [of 7] degrees or grades. A girl or woman at this grade in the Sevenfold Way would be called a Grand Mistress or Grand Lady Master. It is the name of a grade in the Way and not that of an office or power. Each degree in the Sevefold Way takes time to go through, and each is actually is bound to a number of years. It takes a very long time to get to that grade. At least 25 years as the Old Guards say. Therefore, there is no such thing as a 6th Degree Adept who is under 50 years of age in the ONA. As ONA associates, the most senior among in pathei-mathos and degree deserved the most Honour.

Family Tree

The ONA is still so young – only 30 something – that each cell, each initiate, each nexion can or shold be able to trace their lineage back to Anton Long thru somebody. It doesn't even matter if like our WSA nexion you or your nexion developed in isolation. Eventually as you grow you will meet others and thus find your contacts and be grafted to a branch on Our Family Tree.

Which was how the ONA is and was esoterically structured then and now in cells. The basic idea is that there exists a chain-link of association which leads back to Anton Long. So Anton Long is the center and Source-Personality of the ONA. He has in his circle the Old Guard in England. He and these Old Guards spend time mentoring Cells orally/aurally. Each cell becomes an associate/initiate of the ONA and founds their own temple, nexion, or tribe, or order. Each cell orally/aurally teaches their group members the oral traditions of the ONA they got from their Old Guard mentors, who got it from Anton Long.

So even though superficially to the mundane it appears as if the ONA is not structured or organized, which may seem as nothing more than a pile of manuscripts, on the inside level as an associate of the ONA, the ONA has structure and organization which is cellular. And a common oral/aural set of teachings only passed from Initiate to Initiate binds everyone together as one Family. This set of oral/aural teachings Anton Long calls Myndsquilver.

This makes it so that pretenders can't realistically fool an actual associate of the ONA. All that an Old Guard, Adept, or Inner ONA member, or Family member has to ask is what their lineage looks like, where are they on the Family Tree, and who orally gave them their Myndsquilver. If they can't trace their connection to Anton Long, then they are in no position to claim any kind of authority to assert their ideas or will.

So there are two sides to the ONA. There is the visible side of ONA MSS, public nexions such as this, associates online mingling. Then there is the unseen side which consists of a cellular organization with aural links to Anton Long. Eventually if ONA is what you really like, you will get linked and thus have a "lineage" back to Anton Long in some way. If you are mundane steeped in magian crap, more than likely you will get lost in the many thousands of pages of manuscripts.

There is a point to being online for some ONA people. The obvious point is communication. Second point and use of the internet is spreading our ideas. The third point for being online is to locate those of Our Kind who may have germinated in isolation to Connect them to the Family Tree in some way. And the whole point to having an organized communicating cellular structure is because the ONA as an organism is still growing and ideas from Anton Long are still leaving his mind via MSS but also via the chain of Old Guards, cells, and associates of the Family.

This should be the very first thing that you ask a retard you encounter online who acts like they own the ONA. Ask them in what way they are connected to the Man himself. Ask them how many people are they away from Anton Long, and ask them who of the Old Guards, or any known ONA associate vouches for them. If they can't produce a name, then they are nobodies.

This is also the major thing mundanes on the internet do not understand. They get their information about the ONA from the internet. They get their information about DM from cyberchatter. In no way are any of these people personally connected with the DM. They fail to understand that DM is a real person who has real associates, who has real Old Guard, who have real cells they have mentored and stay in private contact with, and these cells have associates. Everyone on the inside of the ONA is connected. Thus when an outsider says this and that about how DM is not ONA or is Muslim or whatever and such people have no real causal connection to DM, then how is their mundane assumptions accurate compared to an Old Guard of ONA who may not only be connected to DM but may live in the same city? Some of these mundane outsiders can't separate the internet and cyberchatter for real life and the real world.

Closing Remarks

This is a short FYI intended to point out a few basic ideas We should all learn to keep in mind as we progress into Our Third Phase of Fayen. Culture, Tradition, and Family is the most important concepts in this Third Phase. This is not to say that the other activities ONA may have used in spirit of the Sinister Dialectic is out of style. It's just not priorities have changed. Culture, Tradition, and Family are key concepts needed in an aeonic sense if the ONA is to live long enough to do anything. Honour, Loyalty, Duty thus what binds us together.

So to recapitulate the main ideas to keep in mind during Phase Three of Fayen are: (A) A Living Culture has no leader, but is a collective of individuals sharing a common way of life consisting of a Family of nexions and cells. (B) Anton Long is not a leader, but he is the Progenator of this seed-culture we call the ONA, plus he is the most senior among us, who is the only one to have the degree of Grand Master. Thus We should respect him. (C) beneath the superficial side of the ONA – however we each explain it to be – there is an organized cellular structure of associates all linked to Old Guards who are direct associated of Anton Long; (D) The ONA is an extended Family, and thus there is a Family Tree. We each have our lineage or branch connected us back to the Source-Personality. (E) The internet is a useful tool and should only be used as such. It may be a tool of communication and data sharing. As well as a way for some of us to find our Own Kind who germinated in isolation, to link them to the Family Tree. The rest of what the ONA is and does should be kept off line. (F) ONA was born from an Aural Tradition, it still remains an aural system. On a nexion level we each teach our brothers and sisters orally/aurally. On a Kollektive level, the aural side of the Sinister Tradition is still in living praxis. The written manuscripts are not everything.

ANTON LONG ON ONA & WSA

Questions for Anton Long by WSA352

352: We're more interested in how you think: how you are in your head. What you have become since the past 30 years. If you see the world differently. What important things you have learned on your personal journey in life.

AL: Since I first became involved in "the Occult" – over forty years ago now – my fundamental aims, my perception of the causal, have remained basically the same, although the decades of my esoteric and sinister quest have enabled me to give causal forms, to assign names and terms or invent new ones, to what in the beginning was mostly personal intuition and empathy. In addition, I have learnt a lot about myself, about human beings, about esoteric matters, and our world, from having made quite a few mistakes, with these mistakes – or perhaps more correctly, these learning opportunities – mostly if not always arising because my innate curiosity, arrogance and impetuosity lead me to directly experience, experiment with, and try things and situations, rather than just study or read about them in a boring, detached, impersonal, academic way.

Thus, as a poet once wrote:

*We shall not cease from exploration
And the end of all our exploring
Will be to arrive where we started
And know the place for the first time.*

Hence, I do not – in most ways – view the world, or human beings, differently now from when I began. Rather, I just have given conscious form – achieved a conscious, and a mature esoteric, understanding – of what was hitherto mostly instinctive, or based on my own intuition (esoteric and otherwise), on my own empathy with and concerning people, Nature and the Cosmos. Basically, this is always how it should be, for our evolution, as human beings: a growth based on the synthesis of empathy (esoteric and otherwise), and intuition, with a genuine conscious apprehension, and then a move upward to that new type of being, that new type of apprehension, that allows us to fully know, experience, understand and appreciate the acausal, sans the limited, restricting, causal forms which we humans have manufactured over millennia in a rather vain attempt to “understand”.

What I have learnt are three important things. First, how magickal, esoteric, changes actually occur, or are presenced, or are or can be brought-into-being, in the causal. Second, how many causal changes, wrought through sinister acts, take a lot longer to cause noticeable effects among humans (and human constructs – such as “society”) than I originally presumed. Third, that the system of the Magian is even more tyrannical, more de-evolutionary, than I considered it to be, and that the Magian themselves, and those allied to them or influenced by them, are even more despicable, more sub-human, than I presumed them to be.

Essentially, the essence of my life, the foundation of my own individual being, has been and still is my esoteric quest: my journeyings among and exploration and experience of, the sinister way; my dark desire to find and go beyond my own limits and to not accept nor be content with the answers, the limits, set and manufactured by others, of and in whatever causal time and place.

My fundamental aims have always been to change myself, others, and our world – to presence, to revel-in, to become, to experience, the very quintessence of life itself. For I have always intuitively felt since a very early age that we human beings have immense potential; that we are and can be far more than we realize; that we need to experience and be inspired; that we need to dream great dreams; that we need to see restrictions for the impersonal tyranny they are; and that we living, human, beings are somehow and in some way a connexion to other life, to the very living beings that are Nature and the Cosmos beyond. That is, I have always felt that we, as individuals, can participate in and somehow create our own evolution; that we have the potential to consciously bring about changes within ourselves, within others, within the world, and within the Cosmos itself – to participate in the mystery and the joy of creation, exploration and evolution.

Initially, I assumed in youthful naivety that conventional “Black Magick” – the Left Hand Path and conventional Satanism – were or could and should be, a means to bring such evolution and such change, and such experiencing and transcendence of causal restrictions and limits. Then, I understood very early on that I would have to create my own Way – that the essence of magick, of the LHP, of Satanism, had been lost over the decades and centuries. However, I was fortunate to be found by a lady who had kept alive, in a wordless mostly empathic, unstructured and always directly personal way, some aspects of this almost lost esoteric and sinister essence: more a mythos and a few esoteric techniques than a working, spreading, Way, and it was these almost forgotten aspects that I combined with sinister things of my own devising in order to bring-into-being the ONA.

352: Has this difference in worldview changed your understandings of the ONA?

For a while, I was the Order of Nine Angles, although I expect few, outside of our sinister kindred, will understand what I mean here. Most – and certainly all the mundanes – will assume I mean I was the only person “involved with” some-thing called the ONA, but this is a fallacious assumption, since even from the early days there were always around a dozen or so people “involved”.

What I mean is that the ONA lived in me, or more correctly, was presented through me; through what I said, did, wrote and by what I inspired, directly – from person to person – or esoterically, through my personae as a shapeshifting player of many and varied rôles.

Now, things have changed because the ONA has become detached from me, and is now presented as a type of acausal, living, entity in our causal world. Again, I expect few, outside of our sinister kindred, to understand – intuitively or consciously – what is meant here.

Initially, the acausal (sinister) energies which are and which always have been the ONA – even before they and we were described by the term The Order of Nine Angles - were constrained and limited; more like just kept rather weakly presented, in the causal, in a very limited causal area (mostly rural South Shropshire, in England). Then, a specific causal form was constructed to temporarily contain and store and presence the more powerful acausal energies which were unleashed through various esoteric workings – through various bringings-into-being which a certain individual undertook. Later, and as planned, some of these energies were released and spread around the world as some were stored or presented in newly created causal forms in order to affect changes in the causal, esoterically and otherwise. Later still – around three decades after the initial esoteric workings – there was sufficient energy presented (living as the ONA) for the burgeoning sinister entity itself to “leave its causal home” and to “shed its temporary causal forms”.

352: What you think about how the ONA has become today, and where it is headed in the very near future? What do you honestly think of all of these new millennial Nexions such as THEM, and WSA.

What the ONA is becoming is a natural and necessary evolution of what I presented decades ago, and what I, and a few others, have nurtured since then. Thus, the ONA is now a three-fold being, although of course each of these individual aspects represent just one aspect of the triad itself – or rather, are perceived as being somehow different and distinct, when they are just different “angles” of a certain causal presencing.

One of these three aspects is manifest, now, in WSA352 – in the emerging and often urban sinister tribes that are beginning to live the essence of the sinister ethos itself, without the restrictions of older causal forms. That is, the esoteric work – the magick – of such sinister tribes is their own unique being; their own way of living; the deeds, the work, that they do, inspired by the still emerging culture of their own tribe, their own “group”. Hence, traditional magick is mostly irrelevant for them; for their own individual and shared tribal life is itself a new type of magick, a genuine and powerful presencing of sinister, acausal, energies.

The second of these aspects is manifest, now, in traditional nexions such as The Temple of Them, in Australia, and in those reclusive individuals who work either alone, or with a magickal and sinister partner. In these nexions, traditional Internal and Aeonie sinister magick – as manifest in the various esoteric MSS of the ONA – is often still undertaken as a means of presencing acausal energies. Sometimes, these more traditional nexions are the esoteric (hidden) foundation of an exoteric causal form, as, for example, Falcifer is to Vindex.

The third of these aspects is still esoteric and thus currently rather unknown, but is manifest in a new way of living by an emerging new type of human being: the sinister empath who sometimes esoterically works, and who sometimes lives, alone, but who more often than not lives in a symbiotic relationship with either other empathic humans, or with some acausal-entity that has emerged into, or been manufactured in, our own causal Space and our own causal Time. By their very nature, these still changing, still evolving, human beings, these symbiotic sinister empaths – and thus their work – are intentionally hidden, for the mundanes, and especially the Magian and their allies, would consider them extremely dangerous, given their still developing and still emerging abilities.

However, to be precise, the ONA is now a nine-fold being, with there being three aspects to its three-fold being (that is, three “angles” to each of the three aspects). In the exoteric sense, these three “angles” of the three aspects (or three causal presencings) of its three-fold living nature – of its sinister character – can be re-presented by (1) the ONA itself [what it is causally perceived to be and what it now causally inspires]; by (2) by the ethos of personal honour (the Law of the New Aeon) and that of cultural and individual excellence and evolutionary elitism [of which one outer form has recently been termed - by Chloe of WSA - as "Reichsfolk culture" and which in general is the exoteric Way of honour and individual excellence which lies behind Reichsfolk and kindred organizations]; and by (3) the emerging Sinister Numinous Way, where the faculty of empathy and the ethic of personal honour are combined with a sinister understanding in an entirely new Way guaranteed to befuddle and confuse the mundanes even more.

What should be understood – and what is now becoming understood – is that all three of these aspects are of the ONA. That is, the sinister tribes – of which the WSA352 is or could be one potential becoming – and the traditional nexions such as the Australian Temple of Them, as well as the symbiotic empaths, are all part of the living, the acausal, matrix that is the now living evolving changing ONA, presenced in the causal. They are all causing causal changes, each in their own and necessary ways. They are all an evolving; a coming-into-being of the sinister, of our human kind. They are all part of the extended and now world-wide sinister ONA family. They all share the same fundamental sinister ethos; all presence aspects of acausal energy; and all are bringing-into-being, or will or can bring-into-being, the causal changes needed for us to evolve and leave this planet which still is our childhood home. They are all inspiring others, in their own unique ways, and they are all to be admired and aided, just as each aspect of this triad – and the triad of the triad – is but one aspect, one living function, of the living sinister being which is now the ONA.

Thus, perhaps more than a few individuals will understand and appreciate one reason why the Order of Nine Angles was and is called what it is: for it is, in essence, a living ordered (acausal) being – a causal order or biological “hierarchy”; an organic order(ing) – which has nine distinct aspects, or “angles” or “perspectives” or “causal lives/functions”, to it when such a being is manifest (presenced, and perceived) through our causal Space and in our causal Time, and according to our rather limited causal perspective and causal way of thinking.

ARS SAMMADITTHI

Ars Sammaditthi

Ars is Latin for “Art [of],” & Sammaditthi is Pali for “Considering Everything.” Samma means “Whole,” “Complete,” “Total,” but is most often rendered in English as “Right,” or “Correct,” which defeats the essential native quality of Samma. To say that there is a so called Right or Correct automatically implies their must be a Wrong and Incorrect [which is to be rejected]. The idea or notion of something which is “Whole,” or “the totality” of something suggests not only the right and the wrong, but everything in between and around the corner At The Same Time. Samma is applicable to court cases. A judge who only allows the lawyer to talk and disconsiders anything the prosecutor has to say or vise versa is not doing his job right.

Ditthi in Pali means to “See,” “Perceive,” “Reflection,” also ones “Attention,” and “Consideration.” To use the court system again, the concept of “Deliberation,” where the jury is said to deliberate a case in order to come up with a verdict, here means the exact same essential thing as Sammaditthi. In plain English, sammaditthi basically means to give something in its totality your “Full Attention.” I really suggest youtubing a court case just to watch a jury deliberate a case, if you want to see samaditthi in pragmatic action. I like watching court cases because I like to see if I can come up with the same ‘verdict’ the jurors did by myself.

I recently watched a real court case on station 18.2 which took place in Japan. The case was about one of very few females who was condemned to die by a court for three counts of murder based entirely on circumstantial evidence. The show asked the viewer if this lady was wrongly convicted to die, and spent an hour giving the details of what happened, and showed a re-enactment of the “secret” or private deliberation. Except there was a cool twist. The twist is the show was not drawing your attention to the actual lady and what she allegedly did. The show was drawing your attention to what the Japanese legal system refers to as “Lay Judges.” Apparently in Japan some cases are tried by a tribunal of not professional Judges, but by common citizens picked to be the judges who hears the case, deliberates, passes the verdict, and gives the sentencing. The question proposed was if this system of Lay Judges works. Implying that common ordinary people who know next to nothing about the law system may not make the best of judges.

The lady in question was first brought to the attention of the local police when her boyfriend committed suicide in his car. The lady is around her 30-40's and her boyfriend was much older in age [70 and rich]. The boyfriend killed himself by carbon monoxide poisoning. The police found a container of coal brickets by his feet [in his car]. The police at first simply brought the girlfriend [this lady] in just to ask her questions. When they dug deeper into her past they learned that this lady had two other boyfriends also much older in age than her who died also in their cars by the same exact methods. They also discovered that the lady obtained 4 million yen from her recent boyfriend's death because he had life insurance where he named her the beneficiary. She was arrested and taken to court. The only problem the police and prosecutor had was that this was literally all they had on her.

The lady continuously plead not guilty and swore she did not murder any of her boyfriends. Her lawyer said that the men were just “sad” because in all three cases she broke up with them. So distraught, they committed suicide by burning coal brickets in their car. The Prosecuting team showed that the hands of her recent “victim” were devoid of any traces of handling coal brickets. The lawyer said that no forensics specialist was involved in the investigation, and that all the police had was a photo of the man's hands. They also demonstrated that you can handle these brickets, light them, and simply wipe your hands on your shirt or pants to clean it of residual traces of coal. The prosecuting team checked the boyfriend's emails to family and friends and showed that the man showed no signs of depression or sadness. It actually appeared he was quite happy and excited to get together with his daughter whom he had not seen in a while.

With only circumstantial evidence to work with the group of Lay Judges were locked in a room to deliberate. One of the lay judges said the case was ridiculous because there were no real physical evidence to convict the lady. Another lay judge asked rhetorically: “At what point do circumstantial evidence add up to a conviction. How much do we need?” The lay judges spent weeks talking about every possible scenario, using every circumstantial evidence they had, and tried to see things in as many different angles. In the end – amazingly – they found her guilty and sentenced her with the death penalty for three counts of murder.

At first I believed the lady to be innocent, and not lawfully guilty because nobody had any hard evidence to prove she did anything. But after watching and listening to everything the lay judges said, and how they connected everything, I ended up agreeing that she did murder those three men, but I also felt that she can't be put to death either because there were no real “lawful” evidence. By “lawful” here I mean to say that if we had an established system of law and order which states tangible evidence is needed, then shouldn't we honour that system and use tangible evidence? Is vigilante justice based on personal sentiments and belief disguised as a legal system, a system of law and order which offers “fair” trials wherewith the “Law” is “supreme” and not the sentiments and ethical beliefs of the people “judging” & sentencing?

There was a female lay judge who cried when she was interviewed for her point of view. This female lay judge said that at first she agreed and believed the lady was guilty. But a week after they gave the sentence she was privately unsure and felt very bad over the idea that she had the power to put another person to death because of her own questionable [fallible] logic. At the end of this show I thought the Lay Judge system might not be the best system of law. For the same reason why I think democracy does not work today.

In a democracy you have a “demos” [people] consisting of a majority – the average – of the most basal of humans. Not just basal in intellect, but also lacking in intuition, empathy, understanding, and emotional development. The idea of giving such a common and basal group of people power to determine the collective destiny of a nation is ludicrous. If you owned a business would you allow the majority of your employees the democratic right to rule and run your business? What would the end results be? I agree with whoever once said that “democracy would only work if the people were enlightened.” The same with a system of law. Do you take the common, average majority and give them the power to judge and convict, or give that power to a class of people who are more intelligent, with a high level of understanding? Do you give power to a people simply because they are “people,” or do we give that power to a group of people who have produced fruit and merit?

With public corporations in general, the top share holders end up running things on the executive board. To be top shareholders they need a lot of money. How did they get all this money? Chances are either they or their families worked business before to make that money. So in that specific field of business and making money, those top shareholders have “resultant merit” and have proven to be able to make money. By resultant merit I mean what worth and substance a person has is the fruit or end result of their actions and knowledge causally applied in life. It is the end fruit [in Theravada] that is evaluated, not the theories or the practice. In science you have the hypothesis and speculations, then you have the practice of applying the scientific method, then you have the end result of the experiment. You don't judge the speculations or the practice itself. You evaluate the end result of the actual experiment, in consideration of the practice, and hypothesis made.

Democracy is when you remove those with actual resultant merit and replace them with peasants because such peasants were elected by their own peasants into those executive seats. The opinions of a mass of common folk, does not equal a bequeathment of result based merit or earned fruit of action and the wyrdful application of knowledge. Just because a common mass of people opines that you are of “substance,” does not mean you have anything substantial to your name, as far as end results of applied action and the fruits of applied knowledge goes. People with “great ideas,” are just that: people with great ideas. Can you imagine the mess we'd be in if our legal and political system were based on the average citizen electing representatives because of “great ideas?” Oh wait, we're living in such a directionless mess right now. It's a peasantile world view. To be swayed by untested and untried “great ideas” and to build ones religions, philosophies, paradigms, nations, legal systems on such “great ideas.” Boy I bet you Communism was a great idea! That pointless war in Iraq & Afghanistan sure was a great idea wasn’t it? I sure love the state of our national debt. And you pay attention to the money trail and see who gets rich off these great ideas.

Individual vs Collective

The art of fully considering everything in detail helps you see and understand things from a more “noble” – arya/ariya – perspective. What’s the opposite of sammaditthi? Nasammaditthi, Myopia or Tunnel Vision. Tunnel Vision does not mean you’re blind. A Horse with those eye flaps can see, it just can see everything. You can be seeing things in great detail with tunnel vision, you’re just oblivious to the fuller Context, Environment, or “Matrix,” and therefore you do not consider such context in your deliberations.

The “Self” or “individual person” of a person is a good example of nasammaditthi. Out of Context to the matrix or Environment this self exists in, we are prone to see the self as the center of the world, which itself is rooted in how consciousness sees its world. From this myopic point of view selfishness may be glorified and thus, anything “collective” is rejected or shunned as being detrimental to this selfishness or egocentric paradigm.

Let’s take a look at a plant. Inside a tree we have many plant cells. Each plant cell realistically can be said to be more individuals than humans are because these plant cells are literally existing inside their own private boxes [its cell wall]. As this plant cell lives out its segregated existence, it does exist in a self centered or selfish manner. It consumes its own carbon dioxide, drinks its own water, releases its own oxygen, etc. And during its whole existence, it may be totally oblivious to its neighbor’s existence. But Mother Nature has played a trick on this single celled thing. Because in the act of its selfish existence, it corporately contributes to a collective entity called a Tree, which the cell may not even be aware of. In turn the fruits and oxygen this one tree makes selfishly contributes to the corporeal sustenance of fruit eating, and oxygen breathing animals around it. Because what is a fruit? It’s the tree’s way of selfishly passing its genes down.

Or some bacteria and fungus. Each bacteria is its own self centered organism, which may not even “care” for its fellow bacteria around it. Each bacteria does its own thing and dies. During its life this certain collective mass of bacteria consumes and breaks down dead biomass in a forest and produces nutrient rich biproduct, which unbeknownst to this selfish bacteria, goes to feed and give life to trees.

A human may indeed be a selfish creature by nature. A guy in a city may selfishly work a wage earning job just to have money to spend totally on himself. But his labour goes to pay his manager’s salary, and business owner’s big house and fancy cars. This same guy may selfishly desire to by beer with his money only for himself and he’s not going to share it with anybody. But when he buys the beer at a liquor store, his selfish act actually helps feed a family of Arabs and Punjabis. This same guy may selfishly look for a wife to have all to himself and he’s not going to share. But when he has sex with her, and she gives birth to a new human being, he helps continue the human species on earth. No matter how selfish he believes his act of earning money may be, every year he pays taxes. And that tax money collectively gives life to the nation he lives in and helps pay for foodstamps the lazy uses.

It is a trick Mother Nature plays on Her stupid creatures, this thing called selfishness. Bacteria are not intelligent enough to consider being altruistic to trees and humans. They are stupid creatures. It's easier for Mother Nature to just program such stupid creature to live for itself. But the biproduct of their selfish actions unknowingly goes to support larger systems beyond it. You think about it. Say hypothetically in 500 years we have fuck up this earth. So we terraform Mars to survive as a species. That in itself is a "selfish" act because we are acting from the intent of saving our "self" from extinction. So how do we terraform Mars? We take the Mother Nature with us. Meaning we take water, plants, animals, etc from Earth, and we seed Mars with it. So in the end, what we – from our point of view – see as being selfish, is also far from our self centered perception of the world, a collective act which also saves the Nature and Her species. Mother Nature does not have to teach you to be collective or to work for a group. You/we unknowingly do so. Some of us are simply too stupid to consider a collective entity – of which we are a part – beyond us.

The act of a creature losing sense of itself and actually giving up its energy to altruistically help others, on a collective level, is actually destructive. What would happen if your brain cells stopped doing what they do and started making digestive juice because your stomach was aching and wanted a break? What would happen if trees were altruistic and formed this brotherhood of plants and said: "Fuck it, lets just make carbon dioxide to care for our own plant kindred, cuz we need to love each other and care for one another?" If an organism does not live for itself, then the most basic unit of the wholer system does not work.

Like the little pieces of a computer. Each electronic piece is its own thing, doing its own thing, and not caring for its neighbor pieces. It doesn't need to care or know of a collective it is a part of. Its stupid job is to do its simple innate tasks. And because every piece performs its innate tasks, the thing called a computer ends up working. You can't have diodes and shit stop their selfish existence to help the CPU chip with its work load because the chip is over heating. The whole computer would not work. If a electronic piece burns and stops working, none of the other pieces gives a shit, it's going to be replaced. In a collective entity, a unit had better live for itself and do its job, or it is replaced.

In a city, a cop better live for itself and keep itself safe or the cop might get capped. Cops are the city's immune system cells. If the cop gets capped, the city simply replaces it. The function of that unit is what is important to the collective, not the actual unit itself. A queen bee better keep doing what she selfishly does: lay eggs to expand her hive. If she stops functioning because she has gotten too old, the bees in the hive turn on her and kill her, and one of them changes into a queen to take the "queen's function."

We are designed by nature – have evolved to be so – to be selfish and self centered. But we and our selfish actions exists inside a collective medium, or matrix. Wyrfully, every action causes a causal chain reaction which goes far beyond the initiator of the original act. Each act every thing that moves makes ripples to influence and affect the medium we exist in.

To only see life as solely a selfish act – for those of us smart humans – is myopic. Yes, we are selfish from our point of view as a creature, but we exist inside of a larger System which we are a part of. We are a self, which is a part of a family. The family is a part of a clan. The clan is a part of a community. The community is a part of a city. The city a part of a nation. The nation on a landmass. The landmass a part of the rest of Nature. Everything has been working fine as a functioning system for at least 4 billion years, regardless of how we humans see and believe things to be. It matter very little if we make a religion out of selfishness, or altruism. Nothing changes about our human nature, and such nature's Function in the Greater System.

That human physis – everything considered – is a part of a Wholer and larger System beyond each of us. And our Selfish Nature – our Self centeredness – is a pragmatic trick Mother Nature plays on us. We ask for the impossible when we demand that a muscle cell in our finger should understand the collective nature of the body it is a part. It's best to have the muscle cell just do its self centered functions. It doesn't need to know, or care. Because the body was designed and evolved to work genetically as a System before the muscle cell came into existence. The blueprint comes first, and the parts and pieces are manufactured after to fill in the designed system.

An employee at a WalMart doesn't understand or need to know how the whole Wally World corporate system [incorporation] works inside and out. That's not any of the employee's business. You're job is to shut up, open boxes, and stock shit, for your selfish paycheck, or get replaced. You are expendable to that collective, but not your niche function. The same with people. Which came first: Humans or Nature? And the more revealing question: What is our [Homo Sapiens] niche Function in the collective matrix of Nature? Why was Neanderthalis liquidated and replaced by us by Mother Nature circa 35,000 years ago?

Kosal & Akosal

Originally in the Pali, the Buddha never uses emotive descriptors such as "Good," and "Bad." The Buddha instead went so far as to make up his own words with unique meanings. Unfortunately these two words have often been translated into English – lazily – as "Good" and "Bad." The Buddha's concept of Kosal & Akosal has to be apprehended in context to the first Noble Path: Sammaditthi.

Let's take a simple "causal equation" of: Person A killed Person B. It's nasammaditthi to say that because the word/act "kill" is present in this equation that the act itself is "bad." The way to gain an understanding based on considering everything is to put that act of killing into Context and to consider everything as you would judge a whole symphony. When you evaluate a concert or symphony, you attentively listen from beginning to end, look around at all the nice instruments, take mental notes of things. Then when the concert is over, you take everything and make your judgment of whether is was to your liking or not.

So hypothetically if Person A were a known unlawful person in a township, and he killed Person B to steal his money, then – all things considered – this equation is Akosal. In Pali its Akosala, but in Khmer we drop the final "A" which is an inherent vowel sound of the "L."

Akosal means when something is wyrdfully unproductive or nonconstructive. The murderer wastes his life in prison, the victim's family is deprived of a father who earned money to feed them. The end results were unproductive.

On the other hand, if Person A were a King, and Person B were Vikings who plundered and raped the king's people, then – all things considered – the whole causal equation is Kosal. Kosal is actually a proper girl's name in Khmer. It's the opposite of akosal, meaning when something is wonderfully productive or constructive. This scenario would be Kosal because the King may have killed Vikings, but in doing so he saved his own people from a lot of misery and helped them live more at peace and free of worry. This is not to say that the King should go around murdering anyone who is a Viking. It just means that in that specific context, especially with the end results considered, the causal equation was Kosal. This scenario would explain why the Buddha never condemned any of his students who were Kings and men of the State from performing their public office, responsibilities, and duties. He also never demanded these kings who followed him to become passive monks. If the man is a king, or a soldier then he has responsibilities and duties to perform. It is their fate or destiny to be a king or soldier.

So called "ethical" problems arise when we lose perspective of the summa of the causal equation of an act, and only consider a small part or if we make an abstract notion of an event or part of an event, and then we construct our opinions off of our abstractions. Nasammaditthi is when we throw out everything in the above scenarios and say: "The issue is Killing ITSELF. Is it right or wrong to take a human life? Is human life sacred? If it is sacred then all acts of killing is bad."

If we're working with abstract notions, hypotheticals, and opinions, then we can go in all sorts of fancy and unreal directions. We can make the opinion that if human life is special, then killing is bad. Therefore it is good to kill abortion specialists because we are saving a human baby's life." Or we can take the Catholic route and "abstractively" say that: it's a sin to have premarital sex, or for priests to have sex, but it's "okay" to rub your genitals on children because (A) that is technically not sex as the word is defined in the Catholic Papal dictionary, (B) "everybody" does it anyways not just priests, and (C) so long as you don't blaspheme the Holy Ghost, Jesus will forgive you anyways; so it's "okay." Okay here meaning it's fine if it happens once or three times accidentally, as long as the public doesn't know, which would soil the saintly public image of the Church.

The problem and ignorance of nasammaditthi is the myopia of not being able to consider everything from the initial cause, to the words and ideas expressed, to the final end results all together. This is quite typical in Western pop-occulture. Where you find people who may read someone's book or ideas, and simply based on a mix of agreement and how the ideas were presented they say such books or ideas were "good" or "bad," or have substance or worth. In complete ignorance and disconsideration of the notion of testing and trying the idea and evaluating the actual end results of applying such ideas. The end result here not only meaning fruit of action, but also you yourself or your condition of being after you have applied such ideas in your life.

The idea of reincarnation for instance is a fine and comforting idea. Add the Hindu notion of Karma to this idea. Then put into that equation the caste system. So now you have a causal system that takes natural or raw human beings and recreates them or manufactures them into different kinds of people. So now, if you believe in reincarnation and karma, and desire to be reborn rich, you now have a problem as a member of the lower caste. The problem is the condition of your life, the fact that you are being oppressed and used. In this case, the whole thing – belief, practice, and end result – for the low caste member is Akosal. It is unproductive and nonconstructive. Not “bad,” or “evil,” mind you, but unproductive for you as such a member of the lower varnas.

Same thing with capitalism and feudalism. It is intrinsically neither good or bad. The feudal system is really “good” for the king, his family, and aristocracy. But on the proletarian end, it might not be kosal. If you are a serf, your support of such a system or belief in it, ends up not only causing you dukkha, but also misery, abuse, death, etc. If in a capitalist society you can't find work, and can't feed your family, then all things considered, it might not be kosal. It doesn't matter if the ideals themselves are “good,” or great ideas. The whole thing in causal motion, and what such motion manufactures, and what such motion makes of you is the samma which is to be deliberated on.

Democracy might have been wonderful and kosal in ancient times for a Greek city-state in such a small and direct size. But today, considering the size of a nation and the people involved, is this same ideal of democracy in practice kosal? It doesn't matter if the ideal itself is “good.” The sammaditthi of it is how the whole system functions in practice, and the end results the system is now producing. The theories, practice, and final end products together must be considered.

Things like mundane satanism in the 60's era might have been a great idea, and genuinely kosal in liberating the lives and minds of a generation freeing itself from the post-post-victorian era of the 50's. But today, considering the condition satanism is in, and the quality of people it now manufactures, is this satanism still kosal? It doesn't matter if the idealism, principles, and doctrine of mundane satanism is believed to be “good,” or “logical.” Not just the theories [teachings] of satanism must be evaluated as being “good” or “substantial.” But also the Practice of it [what practice], as well as the final end results. End results meaning here not just the physical – In Real Life – fruit such satanism has manifested, but also the satanist itself. Can you seriously take a random cross section of theistic satanism or modern satanism, and evaluating the people say that mundane satanism is kosal?

Conclusion

Over the years a lot of Myattian ideas have helped changed the way I see things. One Myattian concept sticks out above the rest for me, and this is the concept of “Abstraction,” as it is used in the Numinous Way, and the Way of Pathei-Mathos. In my mind I pair this Myattian concept of Abstraction with the Theravada principle of Sammaditthi. For myself, it helps me stay grounded and realistic where I don't get caught up in abstract phantoms. And so when I am able to see things more real based, I use sammaditthi to learn to see the whole thing before I make my evaluations and judgments. I use these same to concepts to gauge the mental state of development of others. I find some people wholly ignorant. Not only do they get caught up in Abstractions, but when dealing with such abstractions, they use myopic tunnel vision to see and consider only bits and pieces of things they want to see and consider; ignorant and oblivious, or disconsiderate of everything else.

These two concepts are a big deal to me because both Theravada and ONA are rooted in Natural Philosophy. And so, that Myattian concept of Abstraction [the avoidance of such] and sammaditthi are valuable tools to help one learn to see reality, Nature, and Life [and ultimately oneself] as they are; and not as they are idealized to be or desired to be. If ONA is to move forward and beyond occultism and mundane satanism, then “we” need to learn to not commit the same ignorant mistakes they do in being lost in abstractions and seeing things myopically.

This is important wyrdfully because how we see things gives rise and influences our intentions and emotions. Our emotions in turn gives rise to our behaviour and actions. If mundane satanism is in the state and condition it is in today, it is so because of the collective actions and behaviours of its adherents. So if we [ONA] commit the same mistakes, and see [believe] things as they do, and do as they do, then we will causally end up down the same path in Time. Satanism is a great tool still in the West in line with the Sinister Dialectic, but it is a Form used for an End. I would like to see – and help bring into being – ONA grow free from its attachment to Satanism, and see it develop in Time into a Western school of the Ancient and Traditional Left Hand Path. A living blend of the Occidental Left Hand Path and the Oriental Left Hand Path. A balance between West & East. A Balance in the Myattian sense, and the Eastern sense. It is an emerging niche market in which we have no realistic competition. It may be that the Roots of ONA imbibe from the old soil of dark Albion paganism and Traditional Satanism, but the tops of this ONA tree must strive to stretch upwards beyond that soil. Like a sky scraper, to which we are each fellow builders [kammika] and each other’s assistants [upasaka/upasika], adding our own things to the structure. And it will bare Fruit in its aeonic Time & Season long from now.

AURAL TRADITIONS

Aural Traditions

Avdi, Vide, Tace, si tv vis vivere in pace. I couldn't sleep last night. I was thinking about the funeral. There was a part of the burial where I had put my boom-mic down to reach for a clod of dirt to drop into the grave hole with a good bye prayer. I watched the clod hit the casket container and made a thud sound. So I picked up my boom and I stuck the mic into the grave hole and looked over to everybody, and one by one starting with his children, they came to drop their clod of grave dirt. I was just crouched there in this out of mind state watching earth pile on top of somebody I once knew and loved and hearing the earth hit the container with loud thuds since I had earphones on.

But my Mind works in a weird way. Last night the brief recalling of the Sounds of earth hitting the casket got me thinking about how we bury ourselves in words. Facta non verba. Which got me thinking how come words are living while some are dead and empty. Which got me thinking how some culture are living while others are empty. Which got me thinking about how my own culture and Buddhism is alive and in what way I regard it to be so. Which got me thinking about how living words is the base or foundation of a living culture, living tradition, and living sasana. Which got me thinking about ONA. And then it was dawn. I was as tired. I got a couple hours of shuteye, but woke back up thinking about a whole mess of thing related to the ONA. Somewhere in that process of mental rambling I was equating the ONA with a barbie doll and changing its Outfits. Which all sort of distilled into the two sides of the ONA that outsiders are unaware of; the the ONA concept of an Aural Tradition. So now – with a lot of coffee – to put into words that wordless flow that kept me up. Which perhaps will only be significant to me.

Living Words

Just a warning: I'm going to use the word "weltanschauung" a lot because I know of no other word that described that which I wish to convey: a World or Matrix in which the Mind is born, develops, and exists inside, entirely composed of Words, Ideas, and Culture; or a "Lingual-World" if you will. But Lingual-World sounds stupid. I could use "samsara" which in my mind is nearly the same idea, but people are stupid and will misunderstand the essence of that word.

My own personal brain exists in two completely different weltanschauungs, and English one, and a "Asian" one. Last night during my "insomniac" rambling I was getting a kick out of switching my brain back and forth between these two "Worlds" using two words: Good & Bad. I thought it was funny. Because when I switch into the English world, those two words are nebulous, vacuous, and empty. Meaning that the semantic field/area those two words cover is so ambiguously huge that the words are rendered meaningless: to me. But when I switch into my "Asian World," the Khmer equivalent of those two words had a focused meaning, and even beneath the focused meanings there were shades of philosophical values to each word.

For instance, I was using milk in the fridge last night to switch back and forth between my two Weltanschauungs. When the milk is drinkable in English we can say that the milk is "Good," and when it goes sour, we may say that it is "Bad." And to me, those two words are empty as they still do not capture in focus "something" real or living. Or as if those two words were bottomless.

But I can switch into my Asian Weltanschauung and things become very different. When I ask my aunt-mom if the milk is still good, she may answer: "No, the milk is Koch." "Koch" is pronounced the same as the English word "Coach," as in football coach. There is no word in English to translate Koch into but "Bad." Except in its Native weltanschauung the word Koch does not mean simply and ambiguous "bad." Koch means what something has become Rotten, Defected, Soiled, Broken, or Not Working Anymore. As when my computer screen isn't working, I tell my uncle-dad that my computer screen is Koch. Underneath that to support that meaning there is a culture based philosophical value to it. Which is if something is Koch, it means that there was a previous Original condition when it was Not-Koch. That what is Koch is not in its Original condition. And so there is an Original condition that is the "shadow" of the word Koch.

So we'll dwell on that concept for a moment. Let's say that we are witnessing a bank robber robbing a bank across the street. In English you may describe to me that this bank robber is "a Bad person," in that context, the word "Bad" has a moralistic value associated to it, which is dependent on your own moral judgment and ethical valuations. I might not think the bank robber is "Bad," especially if I am ONA.

But in Khmer you would describe the bank robber as saying: "that Manuss [human/person] is Koch." In this context, you immediately imply, infer, and suggest that what person we are seeing which we have deemed to be Rotten and broken and defected, must have had an Original state in which he was not defected. In other words: something can't be broke if this something was not Unbroke to break in the first place. If a fruit Rots, it must first have been Ripe. That this bank robber's current state of being is not his Natural state of being. That something has gone wrong which Caused him to be Koch from his Original Nature [Taoist term]: his Harmony with Dharma. Harmony with his own Original Nature.

Now if I asked my aunt-mom if the milk is "Bad," she may say: "No the milk is La'or." La'or is pronounced as a Frenchman or Brit would say it, with the R silent giving the O a sound that is slightly different from the "Oh" sound. The only two words in English to translate the word La'or into is "Good," and "Nice." Except in its Native weltanschauung La'or describes something the way it Should be and not good or nice. Like when I paint my nails and looking at it I say: "That looks La'or." It means "nice/good" but it actually means that my nails looks the way it "should" look. And the philosophical cultural value beneath La'or is that something can only look the way it "should" look Because you have Experienced this something in the past or have experienced in some way before.

For example, if I go shopping for shoes and I see a pair I have never seen before and I like the pair and say: "Those shoes are La'or." In English I mean they are nice, and look good. But in its native matrix, I actually mean that the pair of shoes I see in front of me look like they "ought" to look Because in my Mind I had envisioned a pair exactly like them. Or if I met a guy, and I say: "He is La'or," I actually mean that I have met other guys before whom I approved of for various reasons and this guy is as he "should be" as those other men were whom I emotionally favoured. But La'or isn't the opposite of Koch. It's is only one Form of an Original Essence. That concept is also Taoism: First there was the Tao [Way]. Then the Tao became the Yin and the Yang. So there are in oriental thought not two but three vectors: an Original Essence, and the two primary Forms that Original Nature becomes.

Koch is the Yang, La'or is the Yin, and the Tao is: "dhammada," which is pronounced "Tom-Madda." If I asked my aunt-mom how she is feeling today and she says back: "Dhammada," she is saying she feels "Normal," "Natural." It has the same meaning as when I ask her in French: "Common Sa Va?" And she says back: "Comme Ci, Comme Ca." Not here, not there, just "Is."

When we see a river flow as it Naturally should flow, we say that the river is flowing Dhammada: just Normal – the Way it should by Nature. That Natural Way is the Original Essence – or as the Taoists say: Prenatal Essence/Nature – of a River. And so when we have seen that Natural state of a river flowing as it should [when we feel for its "prenatal nature,"] and we see a different second river flow as it ought to based on our experience of the first river we say that the second river is "La'or," but if you see the second river not flowing right, jagged, defected, corrupted, we say that the river's flow is "Koch."

To quickly try to clarify the three vectors and how they would relate with each other: Prenatal Nature is trying to approximate a "thing's" total Potentiality before Birth or Causal manifestation right? Such as if I were to give you the seed of an orange I ate and I told you that it was sweet to the taste. Then you plant that seed. That seed has a Prenatal Nature/Essence of being Both sweet and sour in an unexpressed state of Potentiality. We know this because when your seed has become a big tree and gives you fruit, it is not guaranteed that every orange on that tree will be sweet. So here we can say that the Tao has become/manifested as Yin and Yang: sweet and sour. There is a more mystical and alchemical meaning/use of Prenatal Essence, but that's a different matter. But, which of the two – sweet or sour – is closest to the Prenatal Nature of the orange? The orange that is neither sweet or sour but a little of both would be in this case. Neither this nor that.

So if you look closely at the word Dhammada, you'll actually notice something that should be revealing. That the Root word in dhammada is actually: Dhamma which is Sanskritized as "dharma." Dhammada isn't actually an original Khmer word. It's a loan word from Pali. The “suffix” ending -da in the word is a Pali variation found in the Sanskrit word: Sunya-ta. Sunya meaning Zero. Sunyata meaning the State or Condition of being Zero. In English this morphs into the ending -ity as in “Sanity,” being the State and Condition of being Sane. Dhamma-da essentially means the State and Condition of being Natural and Normal according to the Way/Essence of Nature. So then, what does Dhamma end up originally meaning in ancient times before Sanskritization and Brahminical corruption? Tao. Which is why the Buddha – at least in Theravada – condemns his first follower in ancient times to never translate his teachings into Sanskrit and to always keep it in “our common tongue” [Pali in context], because the cultural life – the Living Essence – beneath the words is always lost in translation.

The Language that we have come to speak is a Living entity that is dynamic and changing that is a indivisible part of a living people’s culture. That Language-Culture entity has taken thousands of years of living, or trial, of error, of growth, or change on earth to be what they each are.

When we translate the words or borrow words from one language/culture to another, it is like as if you were to desire to have me, and in asking to have me, I take off my clothes and give them to you. The clothes I gave to you is not me: the Living Person. As a person, I am the convergence of a thousand years of history and living people’s dynamic and aeonic flow. The clothes are just outer dressing. The audible sounds of each word is just an outer dressing which clothes an ancient Living dynamic Essence that is entwined with Time and a people.

The common American might find it hard to understand what I am trying to get at. But we can use a different example to draw out the essential point. There are in certain very old cultures and people a class or set of Laws called “Common Law,” or “Unwritten Law.”

For example in my own culture and family/people it is “common law” that if a man and woman have cohabited each other for a “long while” that the man and woman belong to each other and are by “virtue” of that “unwritten law” husband and wife. You don’t need a ceremony, or a rite, or rings and diamonds, or government paper work, or monks consecrating some marriage. It’s common law. You can’t find that common law written out by lawyers and legislators in a file somewhere. It is law by power of the people/culture that understand such peculiarities to be Common and lawful according to either tradition or just plain old getting used to over Time.

Another Common Law that is observed in my own culture and family/people is: not to harm a kin of flesh and blood, and to feed them and shelter them when they are in need of such. That we have a certain duty born of recognition of kinship of some sort and Love to such people, be they close comrades or relations.

Another Common Law regards the heinous act of someone of our own people/family/tribe/clan who has murdered one of our own. By common law, that act of murder is understood to be what it is in such context. We need no damn layer to tell us some nut murdered our kin of flesh and blood. And per this Common Law the murderer is shunned and exiled out of the people. They are no longer recognized as “Our People,” and being not “Our People” who is Koch, they are not under our care and protection, such that if any retaliation or harm should befall on this Rotten person, that it is considered “right” or at least outside the jurisdiction of our people’s care.

Such “common laws” were never legislated by some group of elders or politicians. In fact, nobody really knows how or when such common laws started. But we know that such common laws are a living part of a living culture, in the same way that a language is a living dynamic part of a living culture.

But there are these Dead Laws. These arbitrary and abstract laws politicians may make, or that legislators will draft as a “bill” and the common mundane populous arbitrarily votes as “laws” because they like the sound of the wording, because they are on the receptive positive/beneficial end of the law, because such arbitrary and abstract laws makes them feel safe. These are dead laws because where do they exist? On paper. How did they come into being? Did they dynamically develop in close tandem to a living breathing culture over Time and develop according to such living cultures collective aeonic pathei-mathos? No, some guy in a suit and tie scribbled the law up.

But you can say: “So what. Who cares about a living law and a dead law. The law is the law.” Sure dummy. Like the law that some parliament or congress wrote up condemning Blacks as slaves in the not so distant past. Do you actually believe that if two groups of races lived along side each other for a thousand years that a common law of enslavement of the weaker race would develop Naturally? You know how many ethnic races exists in China along side each other for 4000 years? Yet I have never heard or read of how one of these races were enslaved by another, as Blacks were. I mean even during the heinous Qing Dynasty when the Manchu dominated the ethnic Hans, the Hans were not treated as inhuman slaves and livestock; as Blacks were treated by White dead laws. Dead, meaning not living, not having any living connection with the living.

Or the arbitrary and abstract laws that the fatcats of a government passes to make it okay to deforest their forests and jungles. Which is what has ravages and raped much of Africa’s rainforest, and which is happening in Southeast Asian now. Are these laws Livingly connected with the Life of the forest and its people? Who benefits from these written laws? Follow the money trail. And am I to believe that if left to themselves for a thousand years that Africans and Southeast Asians and native Brazilians would develop the cultural praxis or common law of raping their own forest and land?

So that is the difference between a “Living Law” and a “Dead Law.” One is dynamic, unwritten, and rooted deep in the Living Being of a people and their culture; whereas the other is drafted and written on paper, by politicians, legislators, lawyers, lobbyists, or “professionals” who are actually psychologically removed from the actual real world; because they live in their offices and their minds grew in law schools. And the people that vote such arbitrary dead laws into power are not doing so out of long-time pathei-mathos, but for benefits, for safety, for the condemnation and exploitation of others; or just out of being conned by hearing words they want to hear.

And so that is also the essence of Language and the words of a language. The words are culture and people rooted. The words are living dynamic entities that changes over Time in tandem with its people's gradual growth and development. Each word over such long periods of time becomes pregnant with, essence, ideations, values, qualities, and philosophical shades. Which living words need not ever be written at all. Think about it: human speech came before the alphabet.

I have never thus far seen a Khmer or Thai dictionary; and I don't carry one in my pocket; I can't even read it if I had one. My family and the living people in my culture don't walk around with a dictionary in their purse either. Like they bust it out and point to definitions of some Khmer or Pali word so I won't confuse the meaning with my own imaginative/creative personal apprehension of them. Each word I use is deeply rooted and grounded and interwoven with the people and the culture and the ancient flow of Time and History such people has passed through.

And I know that the English language has this same quality of Life to its own Native people: the British. Which brings me to the dead words. Because when "America" as a people severed itself from its British cultural-matrix after the Revolution, they cut the living tree of English at the trunk, so that what words they now use, may be the same aural sounds as a British person speaks, but beneath the aural there is emptiness. There is only Webster's definitions. There is no ancient cultural pregnancy to each word, rooted in a people's long-time pathos. It's just Webster's faces staring at you.

And you can feel it inside as an American using and speaking English. We know intellectually that each English word we use has a definition, just ask Webster. But yet we say that many English words are "nebulous," "vacuous," even "meaningless." Why? What do we mean by that, when we intellectually know that such words have a dictionary definition. Such as the word "Spiritual" when an average American user says it. Why is it that even though we know for a fact that if we open up Webster's trusty and authoritative dictionary that there will be an official written meaning; but yet some speakers end up describing that word as being "meaningless," "empty," "nebulous," etc? Or the words Good and Evil, Right and Wrong as used by and American-English user. Why is it that we can go to Webster's dictionary and for sure know that such words have written meanings given to us by the hallowed pen of Webster, but yet we seem to culturally have no living grasp of what each word means in Essence? We all seem to fight over what each word "really" means and how other users have it all wrong.

I know exactly where my Mind is "at" when I say and use the word "Koch" and "La'or," and so does every person in my own living culture. I have never met a single person who said to me: "Well, no Chloe, your grasp of our word Koch is dumb, let me bust out my Khmer dictionary because the Khmer Webster in the year 1842 defined it thusly." Or another example is the word "Preah." That word has over a dozen very different meanings. It can mean a feeling of veneration. It can mean a numinous presence. It can describe your mother. It can mean a king or queen or monk or angel or deva. And it can mean Brahma/God. I have never met any person from my own culture who was confused as to what the word meant and felt like, and I have never seen anybody debate over its semantic meaning. We all seem to use the word and just know/feel what is being meant.

I have been given definitions of words I am unfamiliar with. But living words aren't like dots and cities drawn on a map where you can just point to a dot and say, "Here it is, right there!" Each aural sound is just an aural "landmark" which denotes a general field or meaning and essence. Different people who use such living words will not always be at the same distance from this landmark. We each have our own relative grasp of the essence of each word. Collectively – the sum of all parts – is what defines the semantic field or general "meaning" or value or common understanding. No single person's relative grasp of a word is the single representative of the field of essence.

In the same sense that I can't point out a Mexican-America and tell you: "That Mexican is the standard of American culture." And I can't point out a White-American and tell you the same. No single person defines or represents the "culture" and "people" of America. Collectively – the sum of all parts – every American is the Culture and People. And each individual American thus has a individual understanding of what the Whole is. In the same sense that every Thai person who uses the word "phra" has their own individual grasp of the word as the Whole collectively has grown to understand it over time.

It's easy to look up a dead word and see what it means. Just open a dictionary. But if you were to ask me how I would come to grasp the "meaning" of the essence of a Living Word, I would say that I would have to go about doing it as I would in learning about a people's culture. By direct immersion, and by understanding and taking into consideration that each person is a part of the sum which is their culture. So that each user of a word also is a part of the sum of the word spoken and is the living essence beneath the aural sounds spoken. Like the "word" Buddhism. You can never genuinely understand what Buddhism is in essence from Webster. First of all Webster wasn't a Buddhist. Secondly there is more to Buddhism than an individual person's general definition. It's an entire living entity associated with living cultures. To understand it, one must go Native, and have an eye to see the Whole. Or like cock fighters would say: "Be the chicken."

Living Sasana

What is Buddhism? That's the same question as: What is the ONA or What is Japanese or What is Baseball? And its a simple answer really: it's everything all together as a Whole. Baseball is the damn stadium, the ball, the grass, the players, the bats, the audience, the hot dogs, the tail gating party, everything as a systematic and functioning Whole is baseball, the experience of baseball, and the culture/memeplex of baseball. No one single aspect of that whole memeplex is the whole. Four bases don't make baseball. A net doesn't make tennis. The definition of soccer doesn't make soccer. The Buddha doesn't make Buddhism. My brain doesn't make me. I am the sum total of all my parts and pieces. The "ONA" is collectively ONA. No individual part or portion or person is the ONA.

That's my easiest way to define something like Buddhism: Buddhism is just Buddhism. And if that doesn't make sense to you, then you know you aren't a Buddhist born and raised. Being Thai is just Thai. If that doesn't make sense, then you know you are not Thai. It's that simple. But if you want to know what Thai is you have to go Native. Live with the people. Learn the language. Eat the food. Go to the temples with everybody. Make friends. Get married to a Thai girl. Care for your Thai parent in laws. Have half Thai children. And 30 years later when I ask you what Thai is you will say to me: "Thai is just Thai." If you have to ask, you aren't.

Just a side step concerning being born a Natural "Buddhist," or Satanist, or being born Sinister By Nature. I wouldn't say that you come into the world with Satan, or Buddha, or DNA imprinted on your brain at birth. A person isn't born with a high IQ for example. They are born with the Potential to grow a high IQ if that potential is nurtured. Put the boy genius in front of books and toys and that will stimulate his IQ. But put a dumb kid in front of the same books and toys and the dumb kid will still be dumb; because he lacks that Potential. In the same way that if you put a normal kid in front of a musical instrument or paint that they will not end up a genius artist. But put a kid with the Natural Potential to become a genius artist and the kid will express that potential through whatever medium you give to him. Give a person born with the Natural Potential to rob people the means and he will just express his Nature. But his Potential Nature must develop over Time. Which is to say that even if a boy is born with the Natural Potential to be a Genius, that Potential does just manifest in one lump sum as a 118 IQ; it develops through expression. It does take a person a certain inner potential for Metta, Honour, Buddhi, etc to develop into a Buddhist and their Buddhist culture for them serves as a living means to nurture that Potential into ripe fruition. If you have to ask you aren't. Put a kid Genius with a natural passion for music in front of a piano, and this kid will not need to ask anybody to teach him shit. He'll figure it out on his own and grow into his Potential Nature: his Dharma.

So, the word "Sasana" is a word that has traveled a lot. It exists over several thousands of years and in several languages such as Sanskrit, Pali, and their various dialects. And so you'll find it in Khmer too. But like the living dynamic thing that it is the essence beneath the audible spoken word is culture specific. In the sense that you can't force the ancient Sanskrit meaning of sasana onto a Thai speaker who uses that word today. It's literally two different cultures and people and time frames. Like you can't force the ancient meaning of God and Religion onto its current English forms and usage. They don't mean the same things. God etymologically once meant That Which Is Invoked and was not a being but a presence that was felt, more closely related to the concept of the Numen in Latin. Religion once meant a community of people and their social order.

Sasana, in my culture – as my grandmother and her peers use it – means a religion, a way of life, a culture, a tradition, a set of customs, a system of belief, a way of thinking, and a way or method of doing things all at the same time. For example I peel my apples like a normal American person would. I hold the blade facing me with my index, and I use my thumb to guide the blade under the peel. I like to slowly peel my apples in a spiral so that the peel comes out this single long thing. My mom, and her siblings and everybody else not of my age group peel their apples the reverse. They hold the knife blade facing away from them and use the blade to skillfully scrape/cut the peel off. My grandma laughs at how I peel my apples and she once said to my aunts: "She's gone into the sasana of the White people. She peels her apples backwards just like their kind. I wonder how she learned it. It's amazing she does cut her thumb open." We know that White people have no religion based on peeling apples. My aunt-mom thinks it's funny and she'll say: "You're crazy! Nobody cuts their apples like that. Our people cut it with the blade away from us so we won't cut ourselves." And I'd have to say: "But I don't know how to cut it like 'your people.' I'll cut my four finger up." Sasana here just means a way of doing stuff according to a Sas, which means a Tribe, Folk, or People. Sas-ana would literally superficially mean a “Race-Thing” or a “Tribal-Thing.” As in this is our Tribal Thing, how our people do and believe in our mythos. Sas doesn’t mean Race; because Sas-Akiang means the American people, Sas-Angley means the British, Sas-Barang means the French people, and Sas-Alamang means the German people; and all of these people are mostly the same race: White; and some aren’t even White.

So “sasana” as my family uses it means a people’s culture, tradition, customs, beliefs, way of life, and way of doing things. And that sasana is grounded deeply in such people’s long-time aeonic existence as a people. But that sasana or Culture is also entire manifested into being by the language specific to that culture. Because the Mind of the “member” of the culture itself is the “nexion” through which the words, ideas, mythos, beliefs, ancestral common law, traditions etc, are “presenced” out into the Causal realm. Because of this, the dance between Language and Mind makes up 90% of the culture and the “member’s” human identity as a “member” of such culture.

That dance between Language and Mind thus begins as soon as you are born because at birth your brain jumps into its secondary cycle of growth; and so your brain completely develops enveloped entirely inside a sea of the sound of words and language your people speak and uses. This concept becomes very significant when we fully realize that when we absorb the world via our 5 senses, that part of the process of making “sense” of what we apprehend is “translated” into words and ideas. We see a tree outside of our eyes, but in our minds we know what we see as the “word” and “idea” of “Tree.” And so the people we see outside our eyes are not just people. Inside our Minds our language defines what those people are to us and what we are to them. And thus also, the cultural praxis and mythos we see with our eyes and hear with our ears objectively, also is a weaving of words in our Mind.

You don’t realize that you are literally inside a samsara of language until you step outside of that linguistical-matrix your brain was conditioned and developed in. Which is the hard part, because our words by our adult years is so much a part of the overall process of processing sensory data that our words and language we think in is our reality.

But if you were born and raised inside two very different samsaras of language/culture like myself; then it’s actually becomes possible to consciously step outside of one weltanschauung and go into the other. And once inside the other, you are able to objectively look back at the other samsara of language/culture and fully realize it objectively from the outside. Which is when you realize that Languages are in themselves – through Mind – entire “Worlds” each one different from the other. I’ll illustrate.

In my Buddhist-Asian World, my brain grew up and developed inside a matrix where something called a “chitta” exists. Chitta means your Heart-Mind. It is the part of us that feels and thinks and knows and understands. In my cultural matrix the Heart-Mind is the seat of our consciousness. The brain in our heads is actually culturally insignificant. In Khmer the word for “brain” is “Kuer-Khbal” or “Coure-Kapalle” which would sound like how a Frenchman would say it. Those are approximate phonetic Anglicization and francophone renditions. Khbal/Kapalle means “Head,” and Kuer/Coure means something like “Marrow,” or actually the “Core” of something. So the brain is just a fatty marrow thing in the head, which doesn’t do much. Or its not believed to do much. Your chitta does the feeling and contemplating and the basic things that gives you a persona, character, and personality [Charak in Khmer].

But this thing called a Chitta is completely non-existent in the English “World.” So when I consciously do step outside my Asian World and into my American World, I carry with me this concept of a Chitta, but I have no words in English to express the essence with. And this happens with many words and ideations, and vice versa between “Worlds.”

Or a better example to show how language defines our reality and understanding of Self and the world we live in is “registers” of Language and how the Mind has been conditions inside such registers of Language.

A “register” in a language is like a music track to a song. A track would be a single layer of musical notes, melodies, and beats. I had a computer program once which lets you make trance and techno music at home. It has all these pre-recorded sound and melodies. And you can make each melody or beat a track and stack one track over the other to end up with what should be techno music. I threw the program away because my techno “music” was shitty. But that’s what I’m trying to mean when I say “track.”

A register is a track of a language. All registers together collectively is the Language. I would consider English to be a 4 Track language. Meaning that I perceive there to be 4 different grades or levels of English. The first and lowest would be the Informal-Barbaric register which would be Street Grade English-Slang you talk with your barbaric peers. The second register would be the common casual English you talk every day. Above that is the Formal-Posh English which is the educated English with the big words and the “Yes Sir,” “Thank You Madame,” etc. Then above that is the English version of the “Sacerdotal” register which is the fancy-pantsy Lawyer talk with all their technical Latin phrases like “Habeas Corpus,” “Malum In Se,” and so forth.

So if we look at those 4 registers of the English language we’ll see that each register has its own set of vocabulary and lexicon. What register you use when speaking not only tells other people what strata of society and social class you come from; but also shows if you have culture and are well bred. If you were born in a lower class where everybody spoke the barbaric register of English, and you were incapable of switching registers in formal situations or when speaking with respectable people; then you are judged to be ignorant, barbaric, stupid, and uncultured. And if you were taken to court and you could not speak the sacerdotal gibberish they use in court and could not afford a Priest of Law to speak for you; than more than likely your society/court will throw you in prison.

This is the same condition all Southeast Asian languages exist in, except the registers are actually official and not speculative. They are actual official divisions in the structure of the language itself. Khmer and Thai would be a 7 Track Language; with 7 entire registers, each register with its own set of words and lexicon and even syntactic structure. The registers are sometime so different from each other, that they constitute a different dialect or language entirely. Or even weirder, you can have two totally different languages but one or two of their registers overlaps and is mutually intelligible. For example the Royal register of Thai is 75% Khmer mixed with Sanskrit and Pali. And the Sacerdotal register of both Khmer and Thai are 90% the same Pali and Sanskrit, which is actually mutually intelligible. Some registers have and use pronouns such as "I," "you," "she," and so on. While other registers lack pronouns and consider pronouns as vulgar words like cuss words.

So for example in the lowest register of Khmer which is the language of most uncouthed barbarians, to "Eat Food" is "Chrass [eat] By [rice/food]." Chrass being a word used only with animals and peasants as in when we would say in English the Dog Devours its Food. The Common peasant register for "To Eat Food" is See [eat] By [rice]. The same phrase with familiars such as friends and siblings is Nyam [eat] By/Mahoab [rice/food]. The same phrase in a formal register as you would say to your grandma or mom is: Pisa [eat] Mahoab [foodstuff]. The same phrase in the Sacerdotal language/register as when you speak to Monks is: Chan [eat] Preah [the venerable] Aha [foodstuff]. The same phrase in the Royal Register as when you speak to a king or his relations is: Sauy [eat] Preah [the worshipful] Charoya [food]. The more you know the top 5 registers, the more cultured you are. The more you know the bottom two the more vulgar and savage you are.

When the Communist Khmer Rouge came to power during the 70's they didn't like this register stuff. This is because Communist ideology reject classism. And the entire Khmer language was actually programmed to instill classism. So what Pol Pot and his friends did was they leveled the language by inventing their own flat dialect which everyone must speak. Which was like a universal register of the people where they invented their own words. Then they killed everybody that knew the top 5 registers, and forced the survivors to speak their people's register. So in Pol Pot's communist people's dialect to Eat Rice/Food is said: "Hoap [eat] By [rice]." Hoap sounding the same as the English word "Hope." So now you have even today where peasants and common people still use the word "Hoap" meaning to eat. You can immediately tell that such people were either party members, or indoctrinated by the party.

In the dialect/register my family and I use every day, we only have one pronoun which is "Yeung [we/us]." Otherwise we don't use pronouns with each other or others. The We pronoun acts as a substitute for the rest of the needed pronouns, depending on who is speaking to whom. For example if its me and grandma and my grandma says to me: "We are cooking for Us," she means I am cooking for you. Or if my uncle-dad says to me: "Did We do Our homework today?" He means I did my homework. Or if I say to my mom about my aunts: "Where are We going" I actually mean where are They going.

This plays a massive psychological trick in your head. Because if you are born and raised in such a worded environment where you are saturated with the idea and word "We/Us" your whole life, you do not have a sense of a separated feel for Self. You feel yourself to naturally be a part of an Us, a part of a whole. You are not a separate autonomous "individual. No word exist for you or I. There is only We. There is no such thing as the concept of "individuality" and "independence," at least not on an emotional and psychological level.

But that We pronoun is not used often. Usually in every day common talk we use what we are to the person we are talking to as a substitute pronoun. For example if I were to tell my mom I am hungry I would literally have to say: "The daughter is hungry." Or I would say my name in place of the "I" or "me." If my aunt-mom is telling me she is going somewhere she says: "Mae/My [mom] is going somewhere." If I am telling my younger cousin that I have something for her I have to say: "The big sister has something for the little sister."

The use of familial titles in place of pronouns for well bred and culture people extends beyond the family. Every old person your grandmother's age is your grandmother and grandfather, and are addressed as a such. Every person your parent's age is your aunt or uncle, and you refer to them as such. And you would use Niece/Nephew and Uncle/Aunt in place of an I and you.

That also conditions your Mind in a huge way. Because when your brain is born and develops in such a worded environment where everybody is family, distance does not exist. There is no such thing as a stranger on a psychological level. It becomes emotionally very hard to hate a person you instinctively identify as your sibling, uncle or grandmother unless they have physically harmed you. As since your culture conditions you to serve and honour family, you have a natural open feel of service and honour for people you are familiar with.

And then when I was 5 I went to school. Which was when I got mentally/emotionally lost. I spoke English back then, but only with family people and cousins. I got mentally lost because now I had a teacher who did not speak Khmer. But she was older than me. Having been born and raised in my Asian Linguistical-World, I didn't know how to call her or address her. And I also didn't emotionally and psychologically know what she was to me. Referring to her as a "You," or by her name was barbaric and vulgar, and I was raised to understand that only savages use names and say pronouns. I didn't want to be a savage and at the same time I had a natural instinct to pay my respects to her in the right way, but the English language had no means for me to do so.

So when I switch to the American-English Language-World I feel a disconnection. Like I have been unplugged from a group consciousness/identity. And the world is made up of separated people who have no connection to each other. When I switch to my Asian Language-World, the connection is there and the feel of separation does not exist.

So this whole thing I tried to describe about different Language-Worlds our Minds are born and develop inside is what is a Culture or the foundation of a Folk-Culture/Sasana. This Linguistical-World in a sense is Samsara. You are born into it, and sometimes you never get out and die in it. What keeps us flowing with the current of samsara is our own unawareness of the feel and realization that one's Mind is literally entrapped in an unreal reality made up of words and ideas. The unawareness keeps us in our respective lingual samsaras. The thought of our samsaric words and ideas influences our emotions/chitta. And those emotions governs our actions in life. So the elders say that samsara is a cycle of unawareness in which people do the same things together over and over and over again in total ignorance.

Because when as a Mind you are born and raised in a samsaric class/language where you are from the top strata of society you will mistreat peasants over and over and over again. Because that is the literal world that you were born into, which influenced your thoughts, heart, and actions. And if you are born a savage, you will continue to do stupid and simpleton things over and over and over again.

That is culture. When we knowingly or unknowingly Cultivate the same habit or ethos or “doing” over and over and over. And samsara is this same concept but doing such things repeatedly in total ignorance of what the origins of our words, ideas, thoughts, feeling, and actions are and what they are doing to us or what they are causing us to do. In such a way that we are also ignorant or unaware of our actions causal reactions in life, in our own life, and the lives of others around us. The difference between Culture/Sasana and samsara is that in one the Mind is Master and fully aware whereas in the other, the Mind is Mastered and is Unaware of it state, place [weltanschauung] and condition. And being unaware, you can’t escape the cycle of lingual-samsara. As if you were born and conditioned inside a prison cell and were completely unaware/unconscious of your state, condition, and “place” to even desire to break free. Or like a person in a deep coma, lost in a dream. You see, being unaware that they are only dreaming, they cannot come out of their coma. So Buddhism says that one must awaken and realize – Buddhi – the samsaric nature of our state of being, condition, and locality of Mind. The first step is to go beyond the forms, the words, the ideas, and to feel for the living essence: the Dhamma, the phenomena beneath.

You know that you are trapped inside a samsaric world of language when you actually see and judge the whole world, others, and the universe with your own lingual vocabulary and ideations. As when I look into the world and say to myself: “All people in the world have a chitta just like me.” Or like when you say: “This is what I believe and its true for everyone.” Because “chitta” and what you believe are just words and ideas in our respective languages. Without Language and ideas, chitta and belief does not exist. You cannot believe in something which you first cannot put into words to agree to believe in, in the first place. You can see/experience the moon, and you don’t need to believe in it. You can believe in evolution, in creationism, and the universe is cubical, but first you need the words and ideas before the belief or dis-belief can happen.

For example in my dialect there is no word or idea for the English words: Exist and God [preah technically doesn't men god]. So being a Mind which was conditioned inside a weltanschauung in which the idea and word for God and Exist is non-existent how do I believe [or not believe] in the Existence of God when I can’t even ideate the concept to believe or not believe? In the same sense that I can ask: how do you as an English speaking American believe [or not] in chitta – a Heart-Mind – when for your entire life as a Mind you were born in a language and cultural matrix which lacked the word and idea chitta, thus causing you to be completely Unaware and Unconscious of it? Before you or the English speaker were aware of the word chitta, have you as a people and culture for the thousands of years even once said: yes I believe chitta is real or no I disagree, chitta is not real? No, because the word/idea did not exist in your samsaric wetlanschauung. You cannot believe or not-believe in something which does not exist inside the Word-Soup your Mind is familiar with. If you grasp this concept you’ll be able to answer the following questions: Do animals believe or dis-believe in things? And Is belief reality?

So Culture or Sasana is very much like Language. Culture develops, changes, grows over time with its people. Living Culture starts simple as a cultural meme and gradually grows into mythos and memeplexes. For example the culture of fishing. At first it was a simple human need to eat that drove our ancestors to try to catch fish. That was the initial cultural meme. Different people will later evolve their own way of catching fish. The most effective way which feeds the most people as a memeplex will continue aeonically into the future by Nature's decree. Because as Mother Nature, any memeplex which feeds your little humans and helps them survive, thrive, and multiply is worth supporting. So that now in many parts of Southeast Asian, New Guinea, and the Pacific Islands you have this common way or sasana of fishing where the girls will stomp down stream in a river walking up stream to scare the fish up the river. While the girls do this stomping the boys will build little blockades or a damn upstream. So the sasana or culture of fishing here is to scare all the fish towards that damn and block them into a small area so that everybody can just grab them with their hands.

That's what I mean by a "Living Sasana/culture." Living in the sense that the praxis of such culture is founded on long-time experience, trial and error, or Pathei-Mathos as ONA and DM puts it. And such Living Cultures at times are not samsara, because as a people you may know where the culture of fishing came from, and you may understand that such ways of fishing is not the only way, and it is not word based, it is experience/praxis based. If a better way comes along you are able as a people to consciously adopt and adapt. Samsara is when you do such things in complete ignorance and continue to do them even if fishing poles and better mechanical means of fishing is created because you are simply unable to change and adapt. Your Mind is fixated or attached to a causal form or methodology so much that it will hold onto that causal form even if the holding on will cause mortal suffering and eventual death. Gambling, drug addiction, alcoholism, for example. Money, politics, religion, nation-states are another set of examples of samaric entities a Mind may find hard to remove itself from and do something different.

Getting Your Living Sasana

So if we were children born on a Pacific Island which practiced that culture of river fishing with rocks and how would we learn about this living culture? Not from books. We learn it orally and aurally. By our elders speaking to us, and showing us, and by us hearing and trying. We never realize it, but we acquire a host of complex human culture and cultural practices wordlessly, that if you were to put everything your culture was about and everything you know how to do inside that culture into an informative how to manual, it would fill several book shelves. How many pages would it take to describe the act of driving a car? Texting, grocery shopping, making friends, dating, etc. We are able to absorb a shit load of things simply by hearing about it, seeing it, and wordlessly experiencing what we hear and saw. That's the 'esoteric' meaning of the Latin motto: Avdi Vide Tace, I Hear, See, [be] Silent. To be silent suggesting to that what we humanly experience in life, are apprehended wordlessly and best kept silent, because how do you write about or tell about the feeling of falling in love and being loved? It's a simple experience, yet for as long as we as a species has been around, it doesn't seem as though all the poetry and epic myths like the Mahabharata and Ramayana, and all the music and songs has yet to capture the living Essence of Love and being Loved and doing things for Love. Let the recollection of the experience just resonate inside you.

And so, in the same way something like Buddhism with its 25 thousand pages of writings as a living tradition is incredibly past down orally and aurally. By hearing first, seeing it second, then experiencing it wordlessly third. You hear the Oral Tradition, you see it done, you try it and gain the living experience. Then when you wish to pass it down to other you repeat the three steps. Speak it, show it, and allow the other person to try it.

Which is how I got my Buddhism. For as long as I was growing up I never once was even aware that a Tipitaka existed. I was 18 years old and I still believed that Buddhism was the worlds only religion to not have a written text, like how Wicca was too. But then I ended up finding the text online which was a culture shock.

A living culture or sasana like Buddhism in Southeast Asia isn't taught to you in lectures. It's percolated to you little by little orally/aurally. Each trickle of insight and practical wisdom is given to you according to your age, level of understanding, and more importantly according to experienced situations.

For example I was a time when I was around 7 or 8 and my cousin-brother Andy – who is my age – we were walking out in this park by our house just on the other side of the corner. In the park were a lot of trees and bushes. And so we ended up that day finding a birds nest with little baby birds in it. The mother bird was gone. So I told my cousin-brother Andy that I wanted to keep them as a pet. I knew we weren't allowed to. But Andy said we can secretly keep them in a box in his room under his bed. All we had to do is feed them. So we ran home and we grabbed a shoe box and ran back to the park to the nest we saw in the bush. Then we put the 3 baby birds in the shoe box and ran quietly through the side fence door were Andy would secretly hand me the box through the window as I stood in his room.

So there they were under the bed. Except me and Andy were so small, we really didn't know what birds ate. But we had a whole of uncooked rice. And we saw people fed bird seeds and uncooked rice looked like they could pass as seeds. So that's what we stuffed down their throats. But they were making noise cheeping and we got scared so we put a thick blanket over the shoe box to cover their noise so our mother [my aunt-mom] would not hear them.

Anyways, we came back from school two days later and ran into Andy's room to play with our secret pet bird and found our mother waiting for us in Andy's room. She didn't look happy and the shoe box was on a lamp table. Our mother just said in an angry voice that they were dead. She asked us how we got them, and we told her that we took them out of a nest we found in the park. And she tells us that we can't take things away from their mothers like that. They don't belong to us. And now they are dead. I was crying partly because they died and partly because I thought were were in trouble. She told us to go and bury them and to ask them to forgive us for taking them away from their mother and killing them, and for their spirits to be free to come back.

Later after dinner in the evening as I was ready to go to bed, my aunt-mom comes in to tuck me in like she does. And she said something like: "Our people call it Karma. That when you do something, it makes other things happen. The Life of an animal and nature happens in its own way. And when you took those babies away from their mother, you broke that natural way of their Life. And they died. And their death caused you to be sad and unhappy inside. That's what we call Karma. We get the fruits of our actions."

That's how I got my Buddhism. In a living oral and aural manner where each teaching was given to me in context and anchored to an event or something I was experience or was doing in my own Life. What my aunt-mom was doing is call "Upaya" in Buddhism. Upaya is when you have an end goal in Mind you wish your student to adopt, then you take the essence of a dhamma of Buddhism and cleverly word it in such a way that it is meaningful to the individual and what the individual understand and has experienced. In essence you don't get some prewritten doctrine some Buddha may have said. You get the essence put into words relevant to you, your culture, state of mind, level of understanding at "that" moment.

But Upaya is a trick, which is what the word means. The trick is to trick you into being a Buddhist by "any means," which is the other meaning of Upaya. Upaya literally means a "means, or a trick to and end." Buddhism as a living culture has had 2500 years to refine it's trickery. It has had thousands of years to learn that the best way to propagate itself as a living entity into the future is by taking advantage of our most basic human methods of acquiring culture: first hearing, then seeing, then doing.

This is essentially based on how the Mind works itself regarding memory and data storage. When we are not thinking about a thought or memory they lay dormant somewhere. When we call up a thought or memory it is drawn up to our conscious awareness. But because of the nature of how ideas, thoughts, and memories are memetically linked to each other, as soon as you draw up a memory, you also get the other memes linked to the focal memory.

It's like google search. You type in a key word, and you get pages and pages of everything remotely related to that key word. So that we'll end up understanding that what thoughts most often are entertained in our Minds, those memes linked to such thoughts will also be up in conscious visibility often.

For example Sex. As humans we think of Sex all the time, very often. As an Upaya, if I wanted to trick you to being Christian, I anchor a Christian meme to that thought of Sex. Such that every time you think of Sex and feel guilty, the meme I pegged to that thought of Sex is consciously visible: Sin, Jesus Forgives Sin. Doesn't matter of my memes of Original Sin is not even biblical. As long as you ass ends up being Christian. So if you peg cultural or mythos memes to ideas or thoughts a person hardly ever thinks about, those pegged memes would never be drawn up to the conscious field.

So when my aunt-mom that evening told me about Karma, she pegged it cleverly to an significant emotional experience I had, and explained it a way that I would be able to remember it every time I experienced a similar event. She said karma is when one thing causes another thing. So now every time I experience the littlest event where I consciously see an act cause a result I draw up that meme of karma pegged to causality. That's how I got my Buddhism. And that is how I orally and orally/aurally teach my cousins about Buddhist and ONA as well as firmly ground them in our culture.

For example I have a cousin named Mac who is a couple years younger than me. This boy loves cars. He is a car freak like his crazy dad. His crazy dad has a new car every three months because he's constantly trading cars. My cousin Mac does the same thing. He'll buy a car [used], fix it up, sell it, and buy a new one and repeat the process. Except Mac is still young and actually doesn't know how to fix a car engine. He messes up half his cars. Mac is not the religious type. Certainly not the type to read about Buddhism.

So as he was "fixing" his car in the front of our grandma's house I went out to watch him "fix" his car with the intent of seeing if I can find an opportunity to teach him with an Upaya. I pretended not to know anything about a car [which I don't] and I asked him to briefly explain to me the important parts of a car, how they relate to each other and what they do. This was because I obviously knew he really likes cars and so I know the meme of a car is always up in his conscious awareness. If I peg a meme to that car meme, it insures to a certain large extent that he will recall my memes I pegged. Mac took the bait and just went on and on about how a car work with excitement.

I honestly didn't give a shit. I don't know any real girl that wants to even know what a car engine is. The technical stuff he was yapping about was actually giving me a headache. I just needed him to consciously be aware of how the car parts are interconnected and work together for a reason. As soon as he was done, I said: "Oh yeah, I get it, it's like what the Buddha said how everything around us is interconnected and causally interdependent with everything." In English that dhamma is sometimes rendered Co-Dependent Arising, or as Interdependent Co-Arising. Its slightly different from the idea of linear causality of this causes that causing this. It's more systematic and holistic. But I slipped in the word "causality" as something I call a Gateway meme [for ONA usage]. Which is a meme you can use to link other memes to. So now every time Mac fixes his car and he thinks of how the car parts he is working on are interconnected and work together, he may better of a chance recall that Buddhist dhamma I Upayaed. So he Heard the message. Then he saw it superimposed the dhamma of interdependent co-arising with the system of his car. Then the silent part part in this case is Mac experiencing the real world and wordlessly realizing that all things are indeed interconnected and interdependent.

After over 2000 years, Buddhism has had the time to figure out the best way to configure itself in the most aurally transmittable way. So instead of ever seeing the thousands of pages of some Tipitaka, Buddhism structures itself in numerical power-point keywords. First the 3 Jewels; then the 4 Noble Truths; then the 8 Fold Path; and so on. Each keyword is a Seed which is accompanied by a verbal breakdown or explanation. But the explanations, like I said above is given to you in context to your experiences or what you are experiencing that may correlate to one of these key-ideas. For example the Buddha as the first Jewel is ubiquitous. You are born seeing pictures of Buddha. You wear Buddha pendants, you see Buddha statues. Dhamma as the second Jewel is disseminated to you in trickles, one teaching at a time as you are ready. Sangha as the third Jewel is the bhikkhusangha who are the monks you see every week at the wat, and the ariyasangha which is your family and close friends through which and for whom you apply your Buddhist praxis for, compassion, and all that jazz.

So this is how Buddhism has been pasted down from one generation to the next in at least Southeast Asia. Although Buddhism does have a textual or written side, its active-living side is actually a Living Aural Tradition, past down from mouth to ear. There is no reading involved. Just Hearing, Seeing, and Doing.

This is how you go into any culture or subculture. Like in high school when I was tagging. There was no reading or lecturing involved. I just heard my friends talk about it; saw them do it since I hung out with them, and then physically experienced it myself. Of course I started sucking at it, but with Time I got better. And with that Time, my association and identification with that tagging subculture solidified. It's the same way with gangbanging when you are a new junior. You first have friends that gangbang; you Hear them talk about their gang culture; in hanging out with them you See they do their banging; and you naturally flow into the act of doing and trying yourself. And with Time, your association and self identification with your gang solidifies. No reading. No writing. No studying shit. Just Hearing, Seeing, and Experiencing. And if you consider that people kill and die and go to prison for their gang affiliations, then you'll begin to realize just how powerful and influential on a Mind the simple steps of Hearing, Seeing, and Doing is. You can't book-teach a nigga into being a gangbanger to the point where after he has studied his lessons he's ready to pick up a gun and kill another human being for 3 stupid letters. Life does happen like that. Life does not spring off of letters and written text. We are Off-Spring of Nature, not letters. A Living Culture Springs Off of Nature: the human nature of hearing, seeing, and doing. Study has shit to do with anything. Study comes later in life.

Life unfolds right? Your Mind unfolds. You can't force a 10 year old Mind to understand what sex is. Life and Mind unfolds with time, and we come to understand things in conjunction to Time. During our childhood our Minds are most receptive magically to language and culture. We hear and we see during that whole childhood. Then in our teen years Nature gives us a hormonal boost and we get restless and rowdy and wild. This is when we do what we heard and saw. We put what we heard and saw into motion, we try it, we do it. Then when we mature into our 20's we become the tribal warriors, the national soldiers; etc. And from all that experience, we enter our 30's when we have our own children. We mellow out. With our experiences we cultivated we now have the means to teach our own children what wisdom we have collected, which helps them succeed and survive and thrive.

Then in our 40's and up we become the elders of the tribe, our children are taking care of themselves, we have free time, our minds have further developed, and thus we study the words and the doctrines and join the monetary or priesthood if we are so inclined. So with Life, there is a season and a time for everything. Or to put it simply if we take a 13 year old, a 22 year old, and 36 year old, and a 60 year old and we gave each of them the same body of written lessons, they would each do different things with those lessons, and what they do will bear very different fruit. As a tribe, if you had to choose between those fruit to productively add to your tribe, would you choose the fruit the 13 year old manifests from written lessons, or from the 50 year old? If you pick the 50 year old, then don't be giving 25,000 pages of the Tipitaka to the 13 year old to read and study, because he isn't going to understand it or do anything beneficial to the tribe with it. That 13 year old has his natural stuff to do. Work with his nature, not against it. Flow with dharma, not against it.

Aural Sects of ONA

By the word “sect” we mean a distinct tradition, culture, praxis, with distinct ideological belief patterns or approaches. This same concept with Buddhism is usually referred to as a “school” of Buddhism. Or more accurately a Yana [Vehicle]. Regarding Buddhism, the vehicle is not the Essence. The Essence is Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha. Everything else beyond those three Jewels are literally Upaya to get people to understand, and manifest or take refuge in the Jewels. The Buddha even said that with Upaya, even amoral heterodox means are permitted so long as the End is met. Besides those 3 Jewels, Buddhism has a distant End Goal each Buddhist works towards, which Upaya must also be created to get people to work towards. The End Goal being: Nibbana or Liberation; at least in Theravada. It doesn't matter how you get from point A to Point B. Just get there. Upaya if your have to. Make Vehicles if you need to.

Although it may also be that Forms/Vehicles are not equally as effective in relation to the End Goal. For example the certain subschools of Mahayana that are heavily theistic may actually help cause an adherent of this form to lose itself in a maze of gods and superstitious worship. But at the same time some forms of minimalistic Zen, may lack the power of creative inspiration that would stimulate a mind more receptive to mythos of gods and such. Theravada may in writing be too complicated and actually disorienting. People may be drawn to Vajrayana and be lost in [fixated on] the occult aspects to even pay mind to Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha, and Nibbana. In other words, the Forms are not perfect and are not equal in an egalitarian sense. The Form/Vehicle essentially has the basic use of carrying/guiding the Rider of the Yana to their own personal direct experience of the Essence eventually.

So with Buddhism you have three major Forms called Theravada, Mahayana, and Vajrayana. These three Forms are not the essence. They are Vehicles – Yana – which conveys the Essence to you. All three Forms together belongs to the essence of Buddhism. Or we can say that all three Forms collectively is Buddhism. Although the Essence is the same, each Form is different. So if you were the type to be inclined toward mysticism and magic you might go with Vajrayana. If you were theistic and believed in supernatural entities you might go with a sub-form of Mahayana that uses theistic paradigms. If you were more into a non-theistic psychology styled Buddhism, you might adopt Theravada. If you were a minimalist and don't like any ideology, you might adopt a sub-form of Mahayana call Zen, or some kinds of Zen. Regardless of which Vehicle you adopt, you are still a Buddhist by virtue of the Essence: Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha, and the Goal of Nibbana.

There is thus – if you understand the difference between Essence and Form – no such thing as a “fake” or “wannabe” Buddhist in Asian Buddhism. You cannot as a Theravadin say that Soto Zen Buddhist are fake and not Buddhists because they do things and believe different than your Yana. It doesn't work that way, because the Essence the Yana is convey is the SAME. Yana literally meaning a cart or wagon. The wagon is not the load it is carrying. The wagon is not the destination it is taking you to. This stupid idea that one can be a fake or a real adherent of a memplex is a Christian-Western world view which is heavily influenced by Capitalist-Consumerist weltanschauung. Consumerism as in when the consumerist market is programmed by marketers to buy “official” brand name products and reject generic brands, even though both may be identical. In such consumerist context, whom does this mentality serve and benefit in the end? The corporation that owns the Brand name product who payed the marketers to convince you to arbitrarily avoid market Competing products.

The Order of Nine Angles works in the same or similar way. It has an Essence and Forms. The Essence is like a barbie doll. The Forms are like her Outfits that come with her when you by her. If you don't like one Outfit, you simply take it off and put a new one on. At no time in the changing of Outfits is the actual barbie changed or transmuted into anything different. But Mundanes – being mundane – cannot understand this with the ONA or with real life. For instance when a mundane sees a Police Officer they see the Outfit the cop wears and will react to the cop in some way, like hate cops. Yet they fail to ever realize that that cop Outfit is not the Human Being underneath who has feeling like then, fears like them, may be a great father like them, etc. Mundanes are superficial and judge what they see on the surface of things. They take things at face value and are incapable of looking deeper – Dark-Empathy – to feel and know the Essence beneath the Outer Form of things and people.

The ONA currently has 2 main Forms or Outfits. Neither Outfits is The ONA. All Outfits are The ONA. All Outfits equally belong to the ONA as a Form or Means or Methodology of conveying its Essence and getting it's work done.

The first Outfit is the most familiar and most often is associated with the ONA or misunderstood to be the whole ONA. It is Traditional Satanism, or the Traditional Form. This Form basically uses the Black Book of Satan, all of Naos, utilizes the Mythos of the Dark Gods, has the sinister chants, is based on Satanism, and uses the Sevenfold Sinister Way.

The second form is the Way of the Drecc or the Dreccian Way. This Outfit has absolutely nothing to do with the Traditional Form. It does not use Satanism, or the Black Book. It may use the Sevenfold Sinister Way minus the Satanic and Traditional parts. But it does not have to. This way is based on the Law of the Sinister Numen, the Sinister Dielectric, and Sinister Tribes. Some Dreccs – like myself – will also heavily incorporate Reichsfolk and the Numinous Way into the mix. The Dreccian Way is not religion or philosophy fixed. Meaning you will encounter Dreccs such as myself who are Buddhist, those who are atheists, those who are mystics, those who are Muslim, etc.

Both Outfits of the ONA can and do utilize a number of other elements such as Nazism and/or Reichsfolk National Socialism, or whatever the individual Initiate/Associate or Nexion/Temple personally choses to incorporate. Many Caucasian ONA associates will use and incorporate Nazism, and Aryanism. And this is perfectly fine and they are still ONA. But many ethnic ONA associates will reject Nazism for obvious reasons, and instead may – such as myself – use Reichsfolk National-Socialism. It is inaccurate to say that ONA is a Nazi institution, because nazism is not the Essence of the ONA. It is just a tool used to get a job done, such as Radial Islam or Fundamental Christianity are tools an ONA Initiate will use to get the job done. But it is also inaccurate to say that ONA is not a Nazi or National-Socialist institution because such things are a part of the ONA's various Outfits.

These Outfits, or Forms, or Sects, or Schools of ONA begin first Aurally, than as a praxis. And then someone may write and present their insights with others in written format. Which is what Anton Long has been continuously doing for a steady 30 years or so. Today Anton Long has produced over 5000 pages of ONA MSS. Born from his experiences over the several decades. He is not the only ONA person and can and should write. But it must be understood that the writing comes after the praxis and experience in the real world, and that such writing is an individual's worded approximation of their Sinister experiences, written as a means to share their practical wisdom with their own Sinister Kind. But Essentially the ONA began as an Aural Tradition, and it largely remains an Aural Kulture. Aural meaning you gradually get your ONA from someone's mouth to your Ear, and not by text. The texts and manuscripts are not the way to Germinate ONA Kulture. They are only insightful Guides. As a map should and can only guide you in the Experiencing of a Terrain. What your Experience immersed in that Terrain, and what you teach others Aurally from your learnings of such Experiencing of such Terrain is the Kulture. Hear, See, Experience Silently, then teach.

This is another thing that mundanes can't seem to understand, because they are mundane and superficial organisms. Most often they only see the written elements of the ONA, which we all understand to be the Byproduct of somebodies practical experience who got their ONA Aurally. These mundanes seeing only the written texts, thus judged ONA according to what they read. And worse yet, these mundanes read manuscripts and are inconsiderate of Time, failing to realize that what they are reading are still snap shots and photographs of an individual Minds expression of their experiences and insights and practical wisdom. It as like you were to have come across somebodies Diary which belonged to a John Doe, and having read such diary you assume that John Doe must be exactly as his diary describes him forever; and that what is not written in the diary John Doe never did. The writings is not the living individual. ONA MSS is not The ONA.

But the mundane can ask: "Well if you don't read shit to be ONA then how do you become ONA to later write stuff in the first place?" If you have to ask, then you done have IT in the first place to be ONA. The Sinister Way is a Way of Life of those with a Sinister Nature. If you are Naturally Born Sinister, you don't need to read shit to be sinister. You just do your shit. The ONA MSS are written for this type only as a guide to orientate them. It's like people who have a natural love for long distance travel will travel by themselves. Allegorically ONA MSS to such natural travelers is a pocket compass. The compass needle with the little red tip pointing North Orientates the Travelers all into a common direction: the North Pole which is the allegorical End Goal they will work at reaching. How they get there and what they will experience on the Way thru the Terrain is and individual matter.

A person can be completely ignorant of the ONA ever existing and if the are Naturally Born Sinister, they will have the inner Ethos and inner Nature/Dharma of being Sinister. Such people when and if they should ever encounter ONA writings will Resonate with what they read. Resonate meaning they don't adopt shit. They just ring at the same frequency and octave as what they read. Then they put the shit down and just continue doing what sinister shit they were doing before, but maybe with new ideas and tools to work with. If you need to be told how to be Sinister, don't bother applying for "membership," because there is nothing to be a member of. ONA should Describe you as a person you already are, not force you to be something you were not or cannot be.

Aural Transmission of ONA

Is it possible to Orally and Aurally transmit without using letters and books an entire culture and religion? It should be. I assume so because people came before books and writing. So I would ask myself: "How the hell did humans 100,000 years ago pass their people's culture and tribal practices, and spiritual ways of life to the next generation if books and writing did not exist yet?" It should be a simple answer: By word of mouth and example. But you can't expect a mundane who believes the internet to be the source of human wisdom and religion to understand this. These mundanes today just can't picture a world without a computer screen and wikipedia. I can hear them asking each other: "How did those cavemen get their Hinduism without wikipedia. That's how I learned about them when I did my school report on them?"

I was watching this great show on the discovery channel about an Orangutang Rehabilitation center in Indonesia. This documentary was one of those really good ones I love where the camera is right on location for months and years, and the narrator is most often silent to allow the scenery to just tell its own story. Occasionally native people who worked in the rehab center would talk and explain things, otherwise, it was a silent film of orangutangs doing what they do semi-naturally in this rehab center.

The documentary was about orphaned orangutang babies whose mothers were killed. People at the rehab center would take these orphaned orangutang babies and raise them to a young age and then let them try to live as natural a feral life as possible the rehab center, which was actually a huge section of the forest. But the director had a sense of subtle humour. Because of the semi-feral way of life the cameras were showing the Orangutangs were living. There was one quiet scene where a native girl was at the bank of a river inside the rehab center who was a worker there caring for the orphans. The girl was washing her clothes the old school way by beating her clothes onto a rock. Then the camera slowly shifts to her right and you see this big orangutang come by and quietly pick up a shirt, sit at the bank of the river near the girl, and commenced to beat the shirt on the rock like the girl.

There was this other amusing quiet scene when the camera was taking shots of a beautiful river in the rehab center and capturing all these mangroves, and birds, and fish. The camera goes into the water, and slowly focuses up at the bottom of a little row boat. Then the camera comes up the surface and just watches up close the little row boat pass by. As the little boat moves further away from the camera, an orangutang was on the boat using his hands to paddle the boat. I just thought that was incredible and funny at the same time. But the whole point is that if a monkey [a great ape actually] can learn Human Culture just by seeing and doing/experiencing, and you have to get that shit from a book, then you are stupid. You don't have to teach those apes how to do Human things. They just watch, observe, follow example, then try, mess up, try again, then adopt the cultural-bit.

But Humans are slightly more sophisticated than apes, and so Nature has given us an extra tool to use to instill culture into our next generation and progeny: Language, as in spoken Language. We come out of our mothers womb instinctively "programmed" by Nature to acquire Language magically by the age of 1 sometimes. So not only does a human person have the ability to acquire culture by seeing and trying, but also via Language. And so that is how ancient human culture and sasana was and still is passed down across the flow of aeons.

Being born and raised inside an ancient Living Culture, which has a sasan with a huge corpus of written text [Buddhism] I can say that it is entirely possible to Aurally, Visually, and Physically acquire such a huge load of culture and sasana without ever seeing a single letter or book. If you are fortunate to be someone born with a culture, then you'll understand what I mean. But such Living Cultures has had a thousand years to refine its ability to pass onto the next generation. It's an amazing feat if you really think about it. A culture and people randomly such as the Chinese, the Hindu, have had a coherent culture and collective identity for over 4000 years in tact. People and cultures like the Khmer, Thai, Lao, and English have had a coherent culture and collective identity since 800-1200AD. All that time that has pasted on the people's group identity and culture has not dissipated; although like any living entity, such cultures do change and evolve over time. By dissipate here I would mean a cultural dissipation of a people into nothing, or absorbed/lost in another culture to be forever lost. Such as the Maya, the Ancient Egyptians, or Blacks of America who have completely lost their ancestral culture and identity. How do some cultures and peoples maintain aeonic continuity over thousands of years?

But you might say: "Who cares about cultural continuity. The human being itself is still there reproducing?" Culture is Nature's way of insuring Her humans survives, but also Her way of guiding humanity forward. Each culture is like an ape in a troop. In a troop of apes the boss ape [alpha] inseminates all the females with his seed to sire the next generation. Only the proven seeds spawns the next batch for the next cycle. It works the same way with culture. The culture which has proven itself in the world of experience inseminates a very large population of humans with their cultural memes. Think English as a amazing example. It was an insignificant dialect of a Germanic language family spoken by an insignificant people long ago. But aeonically they played their game well and the little island of Great Britain ended up at one point in time being the worlds largest empire. With that proven Imperium there is influence of humans on a massive scale. Such that today, English is the de facto global language of the planet earth.

And if we actually understand that our Language we think in and speak is the wordful foundation of what we interpret as "reality" than the accomplishments of the once insignificant Anglo-Saxons long ago really is an aeonic accomplishment on a planetary scale. But language is not the only cultural meme that can be transmitted by an alpha culture. The culture's philosophy [such as the Greeks and Chines]; a culture's letters, laws, architectural style, and political concepts [Romans]; a culture's minor cultural memes such as wearing silk [from China transmitted to India and Southeast Asia; a culture's science [Europe to the rest of the world]; a culture's technology [America, Japan, S. Korea to the rest of the world]; a culture's religion [India's Brahmanism/Hinduism; Christianity; Buddhism]; a culture's genes [Caucasian & Mongol via empire and war]; etc. This is how I see and understand aeonics, culture, Imperium, and such other ONA/Myattian concept. Which is why I consider one's culture to be of prime importance to the individual to consider maintaining, should such people genuinely be into this aeonic game of influencing and progressing humanity. The games we [ONA] play stretches vast spans of causal Time. But all this has to begin somewhere. How does a culture maintain its aeonic continuity? Not by making websites.

It's really, really simple if we breakdown aeonics into its two most basic constitutional components and strive to genuinely understand everything we can about these two basic components of aeonics: 1) Time & 2) Humans.

The most basic unit of a culture, or nation, is the single human being. These organisms come in male and female. They breed and have offspring over Time. Their offspring come out instinctively programmed to absorb every sound and word they hear, everything they see, and they do everything they hear and see. And then one generation grows old and dies, thus the new generation populates the surface of the earth. So the question then simply becomes: how does one generation pass its culture down to its younger generation before it dies of old age? By taking advantage of the most basic human functions: Hearing, Seeing, Doing.

I learned how to transmit culture from two practical sources: my own culture, and from my high school years in tagger crews and affiliated with Asian gangs. Then there are the minor sources of sights from going to church. But you have to be extremely analytical about every detail about how everything and everyone works. Which is just a personal way my mind works. Maybe it's a Buddhist thing to just look for causal connections?

The first step of cultural transmission is: Acquisition. In an actual living culture Acquisition is when you acquire a baby somehow, usually a girl makes a baby. So if you are a man, you would actually need to acquire a girl. In gang culture Acquisition is when I meet you, assess your quality and character type and if I think you have the Nature to gangbang, I say: "Hey, my name's Chloe, got some boys throwing a party, you wanna kick it or what?" And the reason why this is the first step is because nobody can hear what the hell you have to say or see what you do, if they are not in close association with you. The second reason why is because close or intimate association build rapport and relation between the two parties. And with rapport and relation, the communication link opens for influence and inspiration.

So with ONA, when I work on "turning" one of my cousins or friends I meet in real life, the first thing I do is assess my target's character type and quality as a person to see if this person has something that leads me to believe that they will take root in ONA Kulture. It has nothing to do with if they will accept it or not. They will accept it if you Upaya your shit right. None of my younger cousins I helped raised in our culture and in Buddhism had a choice and I didn't give them a choice, nor did I consider if they would be accepting of it or receptive to it. You have no choice. You can never close your Mind up to outside insemination and pressure. The trick is to locate in this person's Mindscape memories, thoughts, interests, emotional experiences to Peg your cultural memes to. Which is why it is easier to Turn people you intimately know and hang out with.

To illustrate Pegging, I Turned an older cousin of mine [she's 25] ONA not to long ago. I didn't have to acquire her because she was already my cousin. But she was initially a challenge. The challenge was she is fully Asian, hates Satanism, hates Hitler, hates Nazis, hates terrorism, and hates the thought of killing people; and I had to figure out a way to subvert her inner orientation, to make her like ONA, like Hitler, like Satanism, like Nazis and be a Nazi, like terrorism, and agree that killing is doable. This cousin isn't stupid either. She's college educated, which was also a big problem because the Magians got to her first. So the next step from acquisition is intimate association which means constantly hanging out together. This way you can begin the Hearing stage of cultural insemination.

As I hung out with her I am looking inside and outside of her for anything I can use to peg some ONA related meme, to hook her. She has a White boyfriend. So that was what I was looking for. I used her White boyfriend to Peg a hook. I asked her while hanging out with her once about her future children she would have. Except I asked her in such a way that I gave her an answer I wanted her to give me. I asked her: "I think mixed babies come out pretty do you? When you have a mixed baby will it be with your current boyfriend?"

That Peg leads to a long conversation we had. My cousin did agree that people who are mixed half Asian and half White come out very attractive. This conversation opened the door for me to peg other hooks. One hook was Eugenics or intelligently designing your children; the other was Eurasianism as a geopolitical ideology. She is big on geopolitical ideologies. So there we were talk how smart it was to consciously design our babies, and how I heard from so and so that there was a thing called Eurasianism that was around not too long ago that believed in the SAME thing WE did. I said WE to her, not I know of this Eurasianism which believed in the same thing YOU do. It's WE, I don't want her to be a YOU anymore. I want her to believe what "WE" believe. After our hang out, my cousin went home and she and her boyfriend researched on Eurasianism. And I wait for a predictable reaction.

My cousin a week later while we were hanging out says to me: "So my boyfriend and I were researching about Eurasianism and mixed Asian-Caucasian people. I didn't realize there was an old ideology about that? I was thinking about reviving something like that but with Buddhism mixed into it?" Once I see that my Eurasianism hook stuck, I used it as a link-meme to peg more memes to. The new meme I linked to the Eurasian hook was when I said in one of our conversations that next week: "Yeah, there's some guy named Karl Haushofer..." And I proceeded to give her a quick mythos briefing of Karl Haushofer who was associated with the idea of a Eurasian Imperium back in the day. I used Hasshofer as a link-meme because he is intimately associated with the Nazi Party of WWII Germany. So you can now see the gradual process of leading a person's inner orientation in a direction you want. My cousin has no choice because she is completely unaware that anything out of the norm is going on. And I waited, for a predictable reaction.

A few days later my cousin comes back. We hang out and she brings up Karl Haushofer and asks me what he had to do with the National Socialist party and why she had never heard of him in school. This opened the door for an entire load of link-memes I have. I introduced her to the idea/meme of Magians and how what she knows about National-Socialism may not be accurate because history is written by the victor. I then memedrop that there is a thing called Reichsfolk National Socialism which is not racist, and I mention that she just randomly youtube "Asian Nazis" and see what she finds. And I waited. The introduction of Reichsfolk is the big meme-link which will allow me to Turn her ONA.

A few days later my cousins tells me that she is in a state of shock because she has realized – on her own – that everything she once was taught about nazis was all wrong, and that as much as she hates to admit it, much of her own beliefs seems to be shared in common with National Socialism and Reichsfolk. This would be the stage of Resonance, when you have induced resonance.

Reichsfolk, on a practical level of real life, is my most powerful tool in Turning people I know ONA. Because it gives me the window to constantly use the word "Us/We" and to speak about things like Our People, Our Kind, Our Breed, Our Culture, and how "They" are taking that Culture away. This is the Second Step in Cultural Transmission: Severance.

The Severance Step is when you begin to sever or cut this person off from the entire world/population in such a way that your cultural identity or gang identity becomes their identity. This stage is the stage when the Us and Them rhetoric is picked up. Because you want your person to see the world in an Us verses Them. In an Our Way verses Their Way.

In the setting of being raised inside a culture this stage is when I hear the rhetoric of how Our People are noble, aristocratic, and how Those others are peasants and savage. This is usually Pegged to visual stimuli. For example when I watch television and the news comes on and shows crime scenes and such, that's when you hear all the elders and you mom flood you with the Us and Them rhetoric. In gang culture this is when after hanging out with Us, we take you out to hang out in places where you are We will be physically confronted by rival gang members. We want you you visual and physically experience Us verses Them, For you to realize on your own that there is indeed an Us and a Them in your Mind. And it's all the same intent, to make you see that you and the group you associate with has another group that is threatening. It's a self preservation thing. It plays on your most basic tribal human instincts. You want to survive, you have found an accepting group of people to help you survive, and this group has an Enemy. If you're in a church, this Severance stage is when they draw you in deeper and encircle you with "happy friends" who invite you to a flood of hang outs, and they constantly remind you that people who aren't members of your church or religion is bad.

The third step in cultural transmission is: Investure. As in your ancestral culture Invests on you a ceremony of recognition or initiation where the rest of the culture's mythos and memes are openly invested on you. In my own culture there is no significant rite of passage. You just get your last birthday party at 14 as you enter your first year of high school. My parents welcomes me to young adulthood personally, and then begins to invest me with my Duties and Responsibilities or in other word, the family gives me my Rules & Regulations which I now must follow as a full fledged "member" of the family and culture. Such as I cannot have boyfriends, can't talk to boys, can't phone boys, can't wrote letters to boys, can't hang out after school with boys, can't bring boys over to hang out, obey my elders, don't do drugs, get straight A's, etc. I olden day tribes this is when the rites of manhood and rites of passage are given.

In gang culture the Investure step is when your new street brothers whom you have been hanging out with for a while and whom you now identify with asks you formally: "So do you want in or what?" You will say yes, and they will initiate you with a "Jump In," which is when they beat the shit out of you to draw blood: Blood In, Blood Out. Parts of the initiation stage may also include acts you must perform to prove your loyalty such as criminal acts and/or getting burns if its a Asian Gang. Girls in gangs get in a gang differently, depending on your status. If you are a girl and you have no relatives in the gang, usually its drinking, smoking dope, and getting sexed in. If you are a girl and you have a relative in a high rank, your status saves you from the sex part, but you may still have to prove your loyalty in some way.

With my cousin, her Investure was a month after I primed her for ONA with all of the above. She had been hanging out with me and my other cousins and friends who are ONA oriented constantly flooding her Ears and Eye. Then since we are Dreccs her Investure was technically us giving her the Rules and Regulations which included the Law of the Sinister Numen and the Oath. The causal ceremony ended with us eating at a fancy Chinese restaurant together GQ [all dressed up] with the exchange of gifts to mark her "First Birthday" into Our Drecc Family.

Once you have reached this stage of Cultural Transmission, you are considered "Germinated." To illustrate, if a culture or tradition, or gang, or ONA were a field, your new pledge to your group is like a seed cast into that field's surface. At such early stages, a slight wind can blow that seed away. But once that seed breaks and it's roots dig deeper, so that a little green shoot comes out of the ground, the seed has germinated and will not go anywhere. A person who has Germinated into a culture, religion, or tradition is a sapling in that culture, who will not stray from the group. But this sapling needs to be nurtured into a big plant. Which is the final step of Cultural Transmission: Nurture.

The Nurture step is the last and longest step which may last a good part of the person's adult years. In a culture like my own, the Nurture part is when I get my lessons from my elders, continuously participate in traditional observances, take care of younger cousins, care for elders, help out with family businesses, and just daily be exposed to the actual doings of the culture, and flowing into the daily praxis of the culture. In gang culture the Nurture stage uses simple "cultural observances" such as daily hanging out together, drinking together, smoking pot together, working the streets together, etc.

With my cousin and the others we've turned this is the longest stage and most difficult. Just because a plant germinates does not mean that the sapling can't wither. Nurturing is a constant deed. First thing I do in Nurturing one of my Germinated people is to divide them into two groups based on their inner character: Drecc Way or Sevenfold Way. Usually girls I know are more inclined to take deeper root in the Drecc Way. We use the Sevenfold Way in the same way as Buddhism would use the Sangha, or in how a gang has a class of OG's. We make it so that in our little Drecc Kulture, as a boy if you want to impress a Drecc girl, your ass needs to climb the Sevenfold Way degrees, to prove your shit. The Drecc girls they hang out with us and do what we do. This is the first part of Nurturing a Drecc. The second part is the Aural Transmission of the ONA.

None of the people I Germinated or Nurture gets their ONA from letters or documents. They get it Orally and Aurally in life oriented situations and real world environment. They can, if they choose, do their own study of ONA MSS on the side. But study is irrelevant. You can't depend on study to Nurture a person. Any one who has been to school knows study don't do shit, because a year after you leave, you forget everything. If Mother Nature depended on humans culture to be passed down via study, we'd be extinct as a species. How is a sapling nurtured? It gets 12 hours of constant sunlight, and constant watering and pruning. Consistency.

Nurturing a Germinated person means 12 hours of bombarding their ears and eyes with culture and mythos; the other 12 hours is them sleeping.

To Aurally transmit ONA to my Germins [one who has been Germinated] I break down everything I know about the ONA into bits and pieces into keywords, like Buddhism does it. Each keyword I peg to a letter of the Alphabet: A means Acausal; A means Aeonics; A means Alchemy; B means Baleful; B means Baphomet; C means causal; C means Casuality; D means Drecc; E means Exeatics; F means Feral, and so on, with my Z meaning Zeal for passion and Zealot for a person with passion for their Tribe. This way when the time arises, I can inseminate my Germin I am talking to with one of these keywords and breakdown what it means to me. This is the important part, because I Upaya what I breakdown, meaning I put it into my own words, but in such a way that the specific Germin I am talking to accepts it and understands it and usually pegged to a daily experience.

For example I have cousin who are still in high school and they brought their teenage friends over to meet me. I Germinated them into ONA over time. So, when one day one of my teenage Germins ditches school to hang out with us, I take advantage of what he did – ditching – and quickly inseminate him by saying: “What you did WE call Exeatics, which means such and such, because those Magins so and so.” And I’ll use his school system and his ditching school as an example he experienced to peg that concept of Exeatics in his Mind. Other times well just teach them the keywords and their meanings from A-Z, and randomly as we hang out we’ll ask them: “What R mean?” They’ll say “Reichsfolk,” and we’ll ask: “What’s Reichsfolk teach Our People?” And they will give the answer in their own words.

This stage of Nurturing is also when repetitive observances are crucial. Culture is a collective/common Cultivation of habit and ethos. In my own culture this deals with burning incense to the Buddha ever full moon; going to the wat every holiday; helping out at family businesses, etc. In gang culture this is the simple drinking together, banging together, smoking out together. Anything that you can do as a group together over and over again induces group culture and group identification. Gang culture is so simple compared to Buddhism with its 25,000 pages of holy writing. But a gangbanger fully Nurtured in his gang will murder for his gang, get shot up for his gang, go to prison for his gang. Repetative cultivation of praxis is some powerful shit. This is the shit that solidifies an ancient tribe together into a band of Warriors who scalped enemies and head hunted neighboring tribes in our human past. Doing shit repetitively over and over again – anything – especially in the same place [sacred grounds] is the most humanly powerful way to induce cultural coherency. And we should know this same method or repetitive Nurturing makes a random man a killer of an army. Repetitive salutes, repetitive drills, repetitive minor observances such as everyone getting up at the same 3AM, everyone getting the same hair cut, everyone wearing the same camo, everyone doing the same things over and everyone looking and feeling the same. And you get killers from that.

Doing and dressing the same way doesn’t have to be a daily thing in a Living Culture. We don’t look like retarded clones in my family and culture. But our year has lots of holidays. During those traditional days in my own culture we all either go to the temple together or bring monks over to one of our houses and hold the ceremony observing the special day that day. But in my culture, during such special days, you have to dress traditionally in a silk sarong [girls] and a traditional top. Each day of the week is associated with an actual color. So that if a holiday fall on a Friday, Everyone wears the traditional colors that day. The men just wear suits with their ties of the day's color. Unless they are risqué and come to the temple in a big purple suit.

The trick to it is repetition, doing things together as a group, and learning how to teach Aurally. You can't just sit a person down and just start yapping your mythos away. It has to be fluid and natural. You have to know your other person and be able to on the spot reword any part of the ONA memplex to reflect what your other person is doing, has done, has seen, or has experienced. If your new Germin is even drinking a coke and chewing on his, you have to have the skills to breakdown ONA and anchor a bit of the ONA Kulture to his eating the ice. The ice is the Form, the H2O is the Essence, that Essence takes many Forms or whatever.

The other style of teaching is to wait for the other person to ask the question. This is how my Buddhist elders do their teaching. This is because they understand that a person's Mind develops and has levels of understanding. You can't teach a 5 year old to understand what Sunyata is even if you have a doctorate in Buddhism. It will not work. If you try, you are a stupid teach. The whole point to teaching is to get the other person to Understand the Essence of something. So from a Buddhist point of view, the only way to teach a person the deeper stuff of Buddhism is to just wait for the other person to ask. Because in their asking, they express that their Minds is at a level which may be able to understand the thoughts and concepts they are curious about in the first place. But you have to learn to dress your words and ideas up in ideas and words native to the other persons vocabulary and thought process and interests. If my cousin Mac were to try to teach me about Buddhism using car concepts, it wouldn't work with me, because I don't a single thing about cars, I don't care about them, and so the teaching won't stick.

I have been asked plenty of times by new Dreccs I make about whatever ONA MSS they may have read online. They usually ask in a confused manner suggesting unacceptance. This is why written texts are a bad idea and should only serve as a rough guide. From experience, a Germin expresses confusion only because words and outer ideas he read did not resonate or match up to words and ideas he or she uses. So I usually just tell them to forget what they read, and then Upaya what they read using their own weltanschauung, words, idea, and frame of reference to things and subjects. But this is only possible if you know the insides and outs of the ONA, its Essence, and the person you are teaching.

End Remarks

So from my own experiences, transmitting culture orally and aurally is very possible and still is the major means to transfer human culture from one generation to the next. As I have said some where up there, I deem Culture to be of great importance, if we Dreccs genuinely into aeonics. This ONA must gradually learn how to transmit itself as a Living Culture: Aurally; as some Dreccs still do. If it is to continue for a long time as a coherent organism. But in our current age of the internet, believing that posts and cybertransmission of ONA stuff is Living or has any long term benefits of Kultural longevity is dangerous to believe in. I have seen many memplexes develop online or were caught up in the online medium which for a few years seemed to be productive and growing, but they have all dies out. The internet and the written text should never be a substitute for what is Human, and our Human way of giving culture to those who will comes after us. I wish I can wake mundane Satanism up from its enthrallment of cyberspace. I see it increasing moving away from the real world "out there" and into the PC screen. If this continues, it will not last. It's not in my place to tell Satanism what to do with itself. But I can share ideas with the ONA, in hopes that those Sinister Initiates who have found there way into the Kulture today, may learn to transmit their Kulture in a Living way as an Aural Tradition. You may have to cut corners and mickeymouse my few steps, and you will make mistakes as you learn to make them work. But the Essence of Human Culture and Living Tradition is there.

BARBIE & BUSINESS

Yes indeed... Trailer Trash Barbie. What a concept!

I was walking down the barbie doll aisle in a local Target just checking out all of the new types of barbies coming out with a smile on my face knowing that what I was looking at weren't the dolls my mom or grandma played with. I was thinking about how barbie evolved over time, and I opened up my trusty business and marketing book "Brand Hijack; marketing without marketing” by Alex Wipperfurth and read a chapter on the stupidity of Mattel Incorporated in not being able to see a good thing when something good and revolutionary comes its way. It made me think about this cesspool we are in called Satanism, and all the “big corporations” involved. When I say big corporations I mean the big original three that started all this shit way back before I was born, to which everything that came afterwards are mimicks: 1) the Church of Satan; 2) the Order of Nine Angles; & 3) the Temple of Set. When I say cesspool, I mean to say that today’s Satanism is like a big swimming pool party, and a lot of geeks and wimps have come in and took shits in the pool, and I’m getting the fuck out and taking my Satanism with me... to a cleaner water hole... like the spa across the street in the business or commercial district. If you guys wanna come – come; if you like being knee high in crap, stay. All I know is I’m leaving for cleaner pastures, and I’m taking my entire Nexion with me.

So lets talk some business about Mattel. I’m going to teach or present my perspective on things by using not another occult book, but a real book on real subjects, then translate it into Satanic shit for those who can’t see the Light themselves- Brand Hijack; chapter 3, pg. 32 (‘A marketers guide to serendipitous Hijack’):

“” About a decade ago, the powers-that-be at Mattel got all bent out of shape. Consumers had started interpreting the world of Barbie to their own liking rather than following the company’s operating instructions.

“” Across the globe, adult fans of the cultural icon began to do what little girls had done for ages: play with her. They gave Barbie an updated look. They fashioned her new clothes, created accessories, cut her hair, and applied make-up. They threw Barbie-themed parties and formed Barbie clubs. They read Barbie magazines and catalogs. They spent thousands of dollars collecting versions of the little plastic doll and every product associated with her. For a while, fashion show parties were all the rage. Guests would design an outfit for Barbie and make a duplicate for themselves. Then they’d walk the catwalk with their creation.

“” Mattel must have been thrilled. Or so you think. “”

SLAPPING a Hijack:

“” Sadly, the folks at Mattel provided a textbook example of how not to handle a serendipitous hijack. You see, they couldn’t resist the urge to control the Barbie world. The company launched one of the most aggressive, ill-conceived, and largely unsuccessful campaigns against copyright and trademark infringement to date. In so doing, it passed up the opportunity to let some of Barbie’s most loyal consumers direct the evolution of the blonde bombshell into the next millennium.

“” One of the company’s target was Paul Hanson, a San Francisco artist who exhibited his own sub-genre version of Barbie at a Castro street store. When Mattel executives learned about Trailer Trash Barbie and Big Dyke Barbie, they were not excited or even amused. Instead of celebrating this risqué artist for reclaiming Barbie in a tongue-in-cheek, au courant way for a very specific audience, they sued him. [...]

“” And Hanson was only one of thousands of Barbie fans to be affected by Mattel’s attempt to put a stop to the fun.

“” Shockingly, the company went after its most devoted consumers. It stopped fan clubs from using the Barbie name in charity events. It also tried to put the leading collector’s publication out of business. [...]

“” Mattel’s copyright crusade has won it nothing but bad press, courtroom humiliations, and a “Pink Anger” rebellion from Barbie’s alienated fan base. In one trademark infringement case that went all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court, an appellate judge labeled Mattel “Speech-zilla.” Anti-Mattel websites still litter the internet. Mattel is identified as one of the most flagrant abusers of SLAPP (Strategic Lawsuits Against Public Participation), which has been outlawed in several states. [...]

“” Mattel simply did not understand the power and inherent value of a consumer takeover. Instead of trying to stop Hanson, David, and others from adapting the brand to fit their worldviews, the company should have embraced its new market of devoted brand enthusiasts. In their misguided attempt to exert control over a forty-something-year-old cultural icon, Mattel missed the boat entirely. “”

Lets ask a few dumb questions first after reading this:

- 1) What happens to a company that fights and sues its fan base? – it starts losing its market.
- 2) What happens when a company loses it’s market? – new companies which are perceptive to that market’s desires will come in and offer the desired product.
- 3) What happens when a new company which is empathetic to its fan base, which feeds the passion of the evolving market, steps in and corners the market? – the old company eventually will go bankrupt.

This is how business works. Its a delicate balance between a conservative/traditional executive board and a progressive/evolving fan base. When that balance is disrupted, business goes to shit. This balance is lost in some of the three big companies of Satanism. Lets take the Church of Satan for example because it is the best known.

Back when the Church of Satan came out with its satanism, it had a wild fire fan base. As the organization of the CoS began to grow selling its satanism and books, it’s fan base also gradually began to progress and evolve. What happened to the evolving wants of it’s fan base? The developing unique worldviews of it’s fan base was interpreted as a challenge to it’s product (its satanism), and its authority. Instead of feeding the flame of passion, the CoS ridiculed its most creative fans in hopes to maintain a monopoly on satanism. This unintelligent action causes schisms and division.

It’s alienated market began to form their own churches and satanic organizations with new idea to cater to a new generation. This is the state satanism as a sub-culture is in right now.

Many different “denominations” and sects, each with a unique perspective and approach to Satanism. Because of this the Church of Satan is becoming increasingly more alienated from the new emerging market and it’s product is become more and more irrelevant. Like AIG, bankruptcy is in the near future for the Church of Satan (like it hasn’t already come). Schisms and independent mimick institutions are not a sign of enthusiasm. It is a sign of dissatisfaction, and most times it is competition.

There still is a large untapped market for Satanism. There are still a billion people lost in Christianity, and another billion lost in Islam. As science and secularism grows more ubiquitous, these people, or their children will need a tool to divest their minds and emotions of the contamination of their past irrational Magian religion.

How about the Order of Nine Angles? Nexion like this one (352) may not be traditional and may not follow the company’s instruction manual exactly; but why do Nexions like 352 come into being? Is it a schism or a sign of dissatisfaction? No, it isn’t. It’s a passion and enthusiasm. Like the creative fan base that took an old idea of Barbie and innovated her to fit their own personal modern worldviews.

The question then becomes: How will the O9A as a ‘whole’ deal with such a creative and innovative passionate and loyal fan base? More will emerge. Will it be like Mattel and the Church of Satan and go SLAPP happy attempting to control its product. Or will it feed the fire of enthusiasm and creativity? From a business point of view the choices the O9A as a ‘whole’ will make is a matter of life and death – and future relevancy. It’s a matter of becoming an institution which burns with a large creative loyal fan base, or fracturing from dissatisfaction – eventual bankruptcy – meaning the shareholders (membership) of this company of ours will liquidate their assets and investments.

Fortunately for the O9A, the “founder” of this company (Anton Long) built in a few mechanisms which insures a continual evolution, creativity, and progressive innovation happens to the O9A. As the O9A progresses in time towards Imperium, so will its outer – exoteric form – progress and evolve to adapt to and meet the times, needs, and conditions of each era, generation, and worldview. The O9A of 1970 C.E. and the O9A of 2300 C.E. will, and must look outwardly very – extremely – different; but beneath the outer form is the same Dark Essence, the same acausal life, through which the same Dark Ones manifest.

Esoteric Tradition – Synistry

Dark Gods:

These are ‘living’ entities which exist in an acausal space-time. They may be likened to “anti-matter” as against the “matter” which exists in our causal space-time – thus, their intrusion into the causal, disrupts. This disruption is primarily psychic because the psyche of an individual by its nature intrudes or is a part of the acausal. The entities can assume physical forms, but only briefly ~ and then only when a nexion is fully opened. And where the causal and acausal intersect on Earth.*

The Dark Gods do not have 'forms' as understood causally ~ because a physical form is a causal thing, and they are beyond the causal. Neither do they possess 'feelings' etc. as we understand the terms. They are on the edge of even an Adept's comprehension [in terms of understanding them].

They can act [i.e. have effects in the causal] via individuals who can access them – or 'Presence' them.

It should be understood that the Dark Gods are not 'the acausal' itself. They exist in a part [or one realm] of the acausal – that is, they exist, have life or being according to the nature of the acausal. The acausal is 'beyond causal time' and does not have a spatial 3D geometry. Other beings probably exist in other acausal dimensions – but of them there is no knowledge.

When an Initiate accesses the acausal – increases the acausal aspect of their consciousness – they are extending the range of their being: i.e. evolving, creating new aspects of consciousness. This is one of the aims of the seven-fold Way – and of all real magick. A part of this, may involve confrontation with some of the 'Dark Gods'.

In conventional terms, the Dark Gods are evil, sinister.

*Such as 'magickal centres' associated with an Aeon – or the finding of such places. It is possible to create such a place – and this is one meaning of such rituals as the Ceremony of Recalling with Sacrificial Conclusion.

The Western Aeon:

As far as Adepts of the sinister tradition are concerned, there are only two realistic options: the creation of Imperium [the fulfilment of Western wyrd via a practical form], or disruption of existing forms with the aim of undermining and destroying Nazarene/ Magian influence, leading to chaos from which a New Aeon will emerge, this Aeon being Satanic. The latter involves the 'pruning' of unnecessary elements on a large scale – the creation of an elite capable of making the Aeon a reality. The first involves the creation/aiding of a practical form – and presencing magickal energy into it. It also involves creating the right psychic conditions – within and external to individuals. Some of this is directly magickal, involving magickal energy accessed via rituals etc.; some of it is providing/creating/making available the information and forms of the sinister. The practical form is either directly political, or 'religious'.

Both involve a more widespread dissemination of the sinister tradition and creation of new forms for its energies.

Traditions and New Forms:

As mentioned elsewhere, maintaining the tradition (as explicated in such works as The Black Book of Satan, Naos, The Deofel Quartet and Hostia) and making it more widely available, is important – and indeed essential. This is because the use of the tradition, in whole or in part [e.g. rituals from the Black Book] by others outside of it being drawn into the tradition, makes those others 'channels' for the sinister energy the tradition represents. That is, they 'presence' sinister energies in a precise and particular way and thus fulfil sinister strategy. The tradition has been given its present form [as explicated in the various books and MSS to achieve just this (as well as other things)].

However, the creation of new forms is important and indeed vital - there must be a continuing evolution. These forms will further access the sinister, and presence it-The tradition itself serves as a Way - both for individuals, and aeonically: it enables the achievement of individual Adeptship, as well as the fulfilment of the sinister dialectic of history. This will be so for the next few centuries - until the New Aeon becomes a reality. That is, its methods and techniques should not be changed (at least not intentionally by those of the tradition for the next few decades) or 'superseded' - as a way of creating Adepts etc. This is not a question of 'dogma' but rather strategy, as mentioned above. It is vital that this and the reasons for and beyond it are understood by those of the tradition. The external forms [such as arise prior to and during the Aeon] will only arise from an initial coherence of magickal energies and intent – and it is and will be the unchanging form of the 'Way' [techniques, rituals etc.] which will enable this. The new forms created/evolved will add to rather than undermine what already is. Anything else is simply individuals playing at magick (and particularly playing at Aeonics) without achieving anything and indeed without understanding what they are doing. Initiation and Beyond:

The quest of an individual can only and ever be individual; that is, unique. The quest, made possible and aided by the tradition, develops the individual, enabling individual wyrd to be understood, and lived. It is also makes possible Immortality (qv. Acausal Existence – The Secret Revealed).

Beyond a certain level, Initiates guide themselves – learning from their own real-life experiences. That is, they have acquired sufficient self insight and honesty to enable them to do this. When this stage is reached [toward the end of External Adept for some; during and beyond Internal Adept for others] there should be still a following of the ultimate goal – a striving for the Abyss and beyond, although this 'striving' will be more balanced than hitherto. This does not mean the individuals become or develop their own ways of achieving that goal ~ that is, not undergoing the Grade Rituals of Internal Adept and beyond according to tradition because they believe they are not necessary or that they have/can create (d) other means. Should they do this, they will not achieve the specific goal of the sinister way – but rather something else entirely, or else nothing. The reasons should be obvious from the above (Traditions ...).

The Aim:

Wisdom. And its living, enabling the last stage (into the acausal...). This means self-understanding and supra-personal understanding. An apprehension of the world and its forms as they are ~ a rational knowing: and what is necessary for change, aeonic and otherwise. This knowledge is sometimes sad, and often born from ordeals and having lived the Abyss. It never confers wealth nor privilege, and seldom imbues one with 'happiness'. It is beyond words, but can sometimes be transmuted into a form enabling some others to apprehend if only in part its essence. This aim takes causal time – usually c. 20 years from Initiation (if the Way is followed) – and lies beyond the Abyss. It is balance, beyond opposites;

a new way of being.

RETURN TO THE DARK:

Esoteric Notes XVII

The Sinister, Archetypes, Forms and Aeons:

All genuine Adepts understand the simple truth that all causal forms – propounded/described by whatever esoteric Order or group, or manifest by the creativity/discovery of whomsoever – are but intimations, and that this especially true of attempts to define/understand The Sinister/The Acausal/The Dark Gods, all of which are but terms which attempt to describe Some-thing beyond the four-dimensional matrix.

Magick, the Occult, and especially a genuine Sinister Way, are a means to move toward experience of this Some-thing, and this experience – which alone is the basis for a true Knowing – is only and ever individual: that is, unique to the individual, with such a Knowing being the essence of the stage beyond what has been called Internal Adept.

Thus, even such things as archetypes, and the division of our outward and inner Change into Aeons, are such an intimation, such a symbol or symbols, which attempt to make accessible to our consciousness what was not accessible (and thus not-knowable) before. That is, such intimations, such symbols, are useful and indeed still necessary – until the stage of Adept is reached. There is then a moving-away from such things toward an experiencing of the essence. Of course there may (and should) arise a time when such things are not required, when the Seventh Way of Five-Dimensional Magick is understood and practised by many – but that is indeed many centuries from now, given the rather low level of the majority in terms of genuine understanding and the lack of use, lack of control and lack of development, of their faculties. In the meanwhile, genuine esoteric Orders will continue to guide the few of promise, the few who can be bothered to change and master themselves, breeding thus an evolved type.

Learning by Experience:

As has been stressed again and again in Order MSS, the only way to evolve is to experience: to strive forth and undertake practical magick, practical deeds. To experience magickal energies, and to have a plethora of both Light and Dark practical experiences.

All words, whether written or spoken – indeed, all forms presented in the causal – are only guides; intimations; inspiration, and this applies to all Order MSS. Some-things have not been said or written about; some other-things have only been hinted at, while other-things have been described or symbolized in detail. There is intent here, which those of genuine insight and genuine magickal skill will perceive or come to perceive, just as the genuine ones – who do strive forth via practical experience of the “two worlds” – will be able to work out certain things for themselves, and thus correct the few “mistakes” or “omissions” they may/will find in some ONA MSS. If they are not able to do this, then they have not advanced far enough; or they are among the failures.

Hence, there will always be some things left unsaid, left unwritten about, in “public” – and some-things which will only ever be revealed from individual to individual, or experienced/discovered anew by each genuine new Adept and each new genuine Master/Mistress.

Beyond the ONA:

Twenty or so years after the ONA first came to “public attention” by the decision to distribute various Order MSS, there are now several Sinister/Occult organizations and groups who have derived their inspiration, their knowledge, and such like, from the ONA, even though some of these organizations and groups may not publicly acknowledge this, and even may, sometimes, attempt to distance themselves from their source by such things as criticising the ONA, or what they see/mis-understand as its “teachings”. Of course, this applies just as much to those individuals inspired or otherwise guided by the outer, publicly-known, ONA.

This is a natural and expected process, for – as several ONA MSS have stated – the ONA is in some ways akin to a living-being, in the causal, imbued as it is with aspects of the acausal (Adepts and even some gifted Initiates will understand what is meant here). It was given its current form (and even its name) to be this, among other things.

From these and other emanations, from such other often unacknowledged presencings of the ONA, there will be new understandings born, new changes wrought – that is, new causal presencings of the acausal, of The Sinister, which is all as it should and must be, for the ONA has indeed opened certain nexions, which openings The Dark Gods have been waiting for...

Even my own life – rich, diverse, sinister, of both Light and Dark and thus perplexing to others – is only some new guide, one inspiration, one intimation of what all genuine Adepts should be. It, like that outer ONA which is now “known”, can and should be surpassed, by others.

The ONA will continue, evolving, changing, in its own way, for the stage has now been reached when the life that is the sinister presencing manifest in the outer ONA is a life of-itself, and can thus be left (exoterically/publicly) without any new writings or any open guidance being provided, for the “public/exoteric” work has been done. Thus there will be soon, a return to the dark, to the secrecy of the past – to that which is the slow, genuine, hidden, and individual, guidance there has been, for thousands of years. All that needs to be known, for others to continue along the Way, has now been made accessible, known – and there are hints enough, especially in some of the more recent Order MSS, for the gifted to go beyond what-is-publicly-known to what-must-be. Thus, it is natural and necessary that others are inspired by the ONA – and natural and necessary that they try to surpass it; that they strive to create some-thing of their own inspired by the ONA.

Of course, we can expect some, or many, to try and appropriate exoterically and in public (and probably even in secret) the name of the ONA, but those of insight, those of genuine magickal ability, will see them for the impostors, the liars, the weaklings, that they are, just as the genuine Adepts will – if they have the genius – create some-thing unique, and perchance describe it by some new name.

As for the inner essence, manifest in the inner, hidden, ONA, it will continue – reached, accessed, by the very few who have the ability, the desire, to find it, despite the obstacles they will encounter.

ONA Esoteric Notes XXI

(Note: This MS was written for those approaching the stage of Internal Adept.)

Beyond the Individual, Toward the Abyss:

In a somewhat simplified sense, before the Adept there is a concentration on the self: on the desire, the will, the personality, the skill, the Destiny, of the individual. After the synthesis that creates the Adept, there is an increasing awareness of the acausal – of how each individual relates to the acausal.

Part of this acausal awareness is some understanding, and experience, of Aeonics – of Aeonic Magick, and thus of the symbolism, the forms, of such things as Aeons (1). Another part is some understanding of the Nine Angles, of The Star Game, and of what has been symbolized by the mythos of The Dark Gods.

The ONA has stressed again and again – both exoterically and esoterically – that the Adept is only a stage; that what has been called “individuation” is only another beginning; that there is more to genuine magick, to the Seven-Fold Way, than the lower, exoteric magick of individual desire and Destiny; that there is more to existence than the exultation of the “individual”. However, this does not mean some kind of denial of life, of the kind often associated with “white light” groups, organizations and dogma. Rather, it means an expansion of the individual – an awareness, a practical understanding, of the potential that we, as individuals possess. This is a new alchemy – indeed, it is the essence of what genuine alchemy is, and one of the tasks of a genuine esoteric Order such as the ONA is to teach this alchemy, to guide others so that they have the possibility of becoming part of an altogether different species of life than that evident in most who mistakenly dignify themselves as “human”.

In effect, the individual, as existing now – up to and including the Adept – is still bound to the causal, and to the re-presentations, the forms, of the causal, as well as to those symbols and forms which often can presence the acausal, the sinister, in the causal. That is, their perception, for the most part, is still of the flow of cause-effect, of causal time, with all that this implies in terms of “results” and “desire” and “individuality”. Beyond Adept there arises an empathy with the acausal, and thus a knowledge of how the acausal transforms as the acausal transforms, beyond symbolism, forms, names, abstractions, and such things as mythos.

What such things are, beyond, have not been written about, nor will be they written about – they are experienced by the Adept who is moving toward and beyond the Abyss: to and into the experiencing, the knowing, of the acausal devoid of causal “forms”. At best, someone who has gone that way before may guide, or may hint at some things, and that is all. For it is the experience, the knowing, that is important – not the words, of others.

For the Adept, there is an increasing appreciation of the acausal, and one practical aspect of this is the knowledge of how Change occurs, through nexions (2) – and what, in the practical sense, nexions actually are.

That is, there is some understanding of how, sometimes (depending on the nexion and on the particular presencing of acausal energy) such changes as are esoteric are slow, by causal standards, as measured by the causal life-span of individuals. Thus, in the particular case of some Aeonic Magick, the Adept learns how it takes decades, and often a century or more, for the effects of that magick to be “visible” on a scale large enough to produce certain causal, and affective, changes. There arises, thus, the apprehension of the Master and the Mistress – of those who, being beyond the Adept, re-present almost another form of living.

Thus, the Adept also comes to understand how certain causal forms, chosen to effect Aeonic Magick, are only causal forms – that they are not the essence; that they are only like exoteric shells which shells non-Adepts see and which such non-Adepts often confuse for the essence, and indeed often confuse for the aims of a group, an Order, a sinister presencing such as the ONA is. Thus do such non-Adepts mis-understand not only such groups, Orders, but also Aeonic Magick itself, confused as such non-Adepts are by the appearance of the individual, of their self, and mistaking, as they often do, the sinister for such a self, for the desires, the joys, of such a self. In one symbolic sense, Aeonic Magick – and its causal effects – are but an extension of the causal-living which is an individual.

In the personal sense, the Adept is drawn toward the understanding that the sinister itself is supra-personal – not some causal abstraction which they as mere Adepts, can totally “control”. Hence are they moved toward a genuine knowing of the sinister, toward a genuine experience of what is hidden behind such things as The Mythos of the Dark Gods, and thus are they conveyed toward an experiencing of those shadowscapes where such “things” dwell and have Their being.

The Knowing of Forms:

As has been mentioned above, and elsewhere, many times: many non-Adepts, and even some Adepts, sometimes confuse a tactic, a form, for the essence. That is, they fail to appreciate what is being done, and why it is being done. Sometimes, non-Adepts even mistake an Insight Role – undertaken by an Initiate or even an Adept – for the “views”, or whatever, of that Initiate or Adept, and thus castigate that individual! Consider, also, the incitement to action, to disruption, to practical change, which occurs in many of the exoteric (3) ONA MSS, and which sometimes might take place in some Temple (Nexion) or some Sunedrion by such a thing as an individual giving an emotive speech. This individual may even be regarded, in the conventional sense, as “advanced” (that is, beyond Adeptship) and thus may not be “expected” (by non-Adepts) to still use such emotive rhetoric or such forms.

There is, in such circumstances, a rather conventional, non-Initiated projectionism at work here by those who mis-understand such things. That is, a failure to go beyond appearance, and forms, to the sinister essence. A failure to understand that a tactic is just a tactic, which may or may not be useful, and which may be abandoned if it proves to be unsuccessful, or used again if it proves of some value. A failure to understand that such things may be some form of sinister manipulation, or some effect of Aeonick Magick, or even some form of Aeonick Magick itself.

One mark of a genuine Adept is their ability to see beyond such forms, such tactics, to the essence – to the sinister magick often at work in such things. Another mark of a true Adept (and those beyond) – as has been written many times – is the ability to appear as different things: to be a shapeshifter, a chameleon. One mark of a non-Adept is their sometimes willful refusal, or their lack of ability, to distance themselves from their own prejudices, their own views, their own opinions, and from the abstractions they have come to depend on and which they use to “interpret” the world and individuals. Often, such abstractions are inherited from the “society” they live-in, or from some dogma they have accepted, or from some ethos or form which, often without their knowing, holds them in thrall. However, such is the rather low state of most “human beings” that this wallowing in such things – this reliance on such things, this inability to strive toward Adeptship, this lack of perception of the essence, and this lack of knowing the sinister – will continue for some causal time; many centuries, in fact. It is one of the aims of all genuine esoteric Orders and groups to be there to guide, and aid, those who are ready: those who desire to move-on toward the next stage in our development, as beings. Genuine Magick is the means by which they can do this.

REDUCTIO AD ABSURDUM:

Historical Addendum: reductio ad absurdum:

The individual responsible for the present codification of ONA (in the form of the seven-fold way, Star Game etc.) does not claim any supra-personal authority for that codification (in the form of Satan/Set or an extra-terrestrial intelligence) or indeed for the creativity, which was its essence. Neither does he claim any authority via having belonged to some ancient and mysterious group whose “Master” taught and Initiated him.

The truth is simple, and a little ordinary. He was fortunate perhaps in spending most of his childhood and early youth in Africa and the Far East where, in the former, he grew up among people who believed in pagan practices and witchcraft, and, in the latter, he came in contact with many and various traditions including LHP Taoist magic and Martial Arts. All this formed a somewhat unusual education (there is no claim to being “Initiated” into any form) and provided a continuing interest in esoteric arts. This curiosity, interest together with his keen intellect, enthusiasm and zest for danger let him to, in later youth, to not only seek out LHP groups in Europe but also into many interesting and diverse experiences, and in the late sixties he was Initiated into some LHP groups/underground Satanic Temples. His diverse experiences then and later (some dangerous, some at variance with prevailing social dogma, many dark, some heretical) provided useful background for an Occult and personal synthesis and led to him taking responsibility for a small LHP group. The teaching of this group were rather garbled, full of mystifications and occasional insights, but they did provide some basis for creative extension. Thus, the new synthesis that was the seven-fold way was created. The original LHP group had no historical significance and did not claim among its former members any person of significance on any level – it was simply a reclusive circle of a few individuals oriented toward the Black Arts whose teachings (such as they were) centred around a septenary approach to magickal alchemy and a “mythology” about the Dark Gods. (It should be noted that the other LHP groups he joined derived their magic from a mixture of Crowley/Golden Dawn/demonism or were rather boring, lacking Satanic zest).

In the early years of the eighth decade of the present century a decision was made to publish the tradition of this small group (the ONA – as it came to be called some decades earlier) together with the new codification. Some of the traditional material concerned Sacrifice and some related to the Dark Gods mythos.

No one within this group believes these traditions and methods are unalterable or invested with “supernatural” authority. As expressed in such published works as “Naos” and “The Black Book” they are a practical method of achieving magickal Adeptship and extending consciousness into the next stage of its development.

Thus the ONA has no structure because no structure is needed – its members may guide others if those others wish, such guidance occurring because those members have themselves undergone (to a greater or lesser extent depending on their own personal development) the tasks of the seven-fold way and can thus offer advise from experience.

It is as absurdly simple as that.

Nexion WSA352, Order of Nine Angles

BENEATH THE WRITING

Beneath The Writing

I tried last month to take WSA's "oral teachings," or "aural lessons" and transcribe them into step by step instructional writing to share with everybody, but it was just too much to write down, and none of it flowed together, and it revealed too much. I ended up with 50 pages of crap that I trashed.

When I say "oral teachings," I don't mean anything secret, silly, or mystical. I simply mean that me and all my friends have been alive for a while and as we live we each learn stuff, so when we are doing our WSA stuff we orally teach each other stuff we know. Zero percent of it has anything to do with the occult. It has 100% to do with Business & Marketing. In a metaphorical and literal sense. Literal because many of the Asians in our WSA majored in Business. Metaphorical because most of the guys "majored" in business on the streets. Marketing also has its own metaphorical meaning to us.

We kind of like to see our WSA nexion as the business and marketing think tank of the ONA. A part of the ONA Kollektive that collectively has a lot of wisdom and understanding with different notions of "business and marketing."

It's hard to put all those aural lessons into writing. It's like learning to drive a car. Once you get the hang of it, you do it automatically. Putting all that know how of driving a car into writing is the hard part. Even then I would never completely trust a "how to" manual. You're stupid if you read a book on how to pilot an airplane, then hop into one to fly a plane, just based on what you have read.

Our normal oral history divides our group's [WSA] development into two sides: 1) the Business side & 2) the Marketing side. But those words means completely different things. If you've ever read an ONA writing by "Steve Brown" called A Sinister Sport, you'll know what those words might possibly metaphorically mean.

Business & Marketing

Business here means gang banging or doing shit on the streets and hustling. All the guys in WSA are either ex-gang members or aged out of gangs. Most came from Asian gangs/families. Historically this side of the WSA did not call itself WSA back in the day. They called themselves DMA for Delinquent Minded Artists, which was a “tag bang” crew. A tag bang crew is just a hybrid between a fun loving tagger crew and a street gang that uses violence, guns, etc. There is an unwritten rule in the city the boyz came from that says your stupid if you are 18 and are tagging, because going to jail as an adult for that shit is stupid. So the unwritten rule was that you age out of that stupid shit when you are 18. Because of this, the guys back then just called their circle of aged out members in DMA by a different name “NXS” or the “Nexus.” The Black guys in DMA back then were members of the 5% Nation of Islam and they eventually influenced the aged out guys to become 5%ers also. In 5%er alphabet, “NXS” actually stands for Nation [of] Unknown Saviours.”

The word “Saviour” – spelled like that – has a specific meaning in the Nation of Islam per Minister Farrakhan. It used to be that in the old days The Honorable Elijah Muhammad set aside a special day to honour Master Fard Muhammad, and this day was called “Savior’s Day.” When Minister Farrakhan came into the scene he changed the meaning and understanding of the word “savior” and to reflect that change he used a different spelling of it, so the new and the old can’t be confused. Now Minister Farrakhan taught the Black people that they themselves were each their own Saviours. Only you can Save your own Self from your poverty, your social inequality, and your oppression, and your drug addictions. Once you have Saved your own Self from such poverty, such ghettos, and made something out of your Self, will you have the Knowledge, Wisdom, and Understanding to be a Saviour to your people and community. And so he changed the name of the day to be “Saviours’ Day” to remind us all that we are each responsible for Saving our own Self, and then once we have done that we help Save each other and our communities with our individual know-how and experiences we have learned and gained.

So historically the guys in DMA/NXS used a lot of race based rhetoric to draw in new members. But it was just rhetoric used as a means to get something else done. This is one reason why I would suggest anybody in ONA to at least go join a gang or start one from scratch. That way you learn from direct experience the difference between a Rhetorical Device USED as an Expedient Methods [Upaya] to manifest an objective. As opposed to a Beliefset or ideology that is actually believed in as some infallible truth.

The difference in the written format is near impossible to see. For example if we go to a KKK group we see that they have racist ideologies. That racism/ideology is used to magnetize people who resonate with that racist belief. What you want to look for is then where or how the group uses its established collected force, effort, or man power. In the KKK it is actually used and directed at hating colored people. So you can go to such a KKK person and try to debate them and talk some sense in them to convince them from being racist. But with something like the NXS guys who used reverse racist Rhetoric, its literally just bullshit to draw in people who initially resonate with such rhetoric. What you look for is what the group does with its collected man power. Something like NXS doesn't funnel its force into hating White people. It's funneled into getting its members to commit crime, sell dope, be a "family," and just do street business together. Thus, you can't really go up to one of the NXS guys and debate how their racist talk is not right or fair. Because they know it's BS and they'll just look at you like a stupid nerd because you're too stupid to understand that they are using that rhetoric to actualize an end objective.

This is a real live Theravada Buddhist practice called upaya. The word is present in Mahayana, but I don't know exactly how those guys use the term. I can only speak for the species of Khmer/Thai Theravada I get from my elders. One of my grandmother's uncles was the Supreme Patriarch of Thailand till his passing. So technically if anybody is wondering what sect or style or "lineage" of Buddhism my family is rooted in its whatever that Supreme Patriarch taught and past down. The Supreme Patriarch is like – not exactly the same – as a Dalai Lama for Tibetan Buddhism. Except the King of Thailand appoints the Supreme Patriarch who is then the "Preah Samdach Sang[ha]" [the Holy Monarch of the Sangha] of Thailand's Theravada Buddhism. If I recall right, he was of the Tammayud school, which is my phonetic spelling of how the word sounds.

So in our Buddhism it's called upaya. In normal nonreligious terms upaya just means to use whatever means needed to make people Buddhists. To make a fucker into a Buddhist by any tricks [what the word literally means] you can devise. In this case, the end justifies the means. The end being that they become Buddhist. It is said that the Buddha had a different teaching for each person he spoke to, and often he contradicted himself. With upaya you can even use heterodox methods so long as your end objective is met. Its the same idea as teaching a child they can engorge themselves with ice cream. The child will do so until he barfs. When he does barf, he learns from his own experience [vibhajjavada] that moderation might be a better way to go. Teaching the child this way prevents him from arguing and debating. Because if you tell that child that he can only eat a little of the ice cream at a time, he'll throw a tantrum wanting his way. So go ahead, eat ice cream till you puke.

There is a quick story my bhikkhu grandfather once told me and my little mom about upaya when he was explaining to us how you use it. There was once a farmer who had gone to consult a monk about a serious problem that was causing him major dukkha [worry]. The farmer goes up to the monk and says: "Venerable One, I've been losing sleep over something that has caused me dukkha. I am really in love with a concubine of the king's. I want her bad! What should I do?" The monk says to the farmer after thinking: "Hmm, go ahead, sleep with her. Have fun. That'll stop your dukkha." The farmer shouted in excitement: "Wow, thank you! I didn't expect a monk to tell me something like that." A week later or so the farmer came back to the monk angry, yelling profanities at the monk. The monk asked: "Why are you angry with me?" The farmer goes: "I did like you told me to! The king found out and castrated me! Now I don't have a penis any more!" The monk says back: "Well there you go. Now you're free from your dukkha." The serious moral of the story is some guys will understand when you tell to be wise with their sex stuff as Buddhists. Then there are those that will argue and debate your wisdom. And so the only way to teach them is the Hard way. But there is more to upaya.

The thing to pay attention to is the essence of the story. The monk told the farmer to do something that superficially contradicts Buddhist wisdom. The farmer was told to go ahead and indulge in his uncontrollable passion. The question is then: Is what the monk said an ideological beliefset or a mere rhetorical device he is using to upaya an end understanding in the farmer? The latter is the answer. Therefore it make no real sense to debate and argue with the monk about his superficial teaching because its actually bullshit said to manifest an end objective. In this case the end objective is the wisdom gained by the farmer from his personal experience.

If you are fortunate to have a monk for a grandpa, and you dig deep by asking many questions you will eventually learn that Buddhism [Theravada at least] has 3 layers. The outer layer is the yana or form or vehicle. The middle layer is the upaya which gives rise to such forms. Both of these layers is like the swirling cloud of a tornado. You can see it and say that something is there. Go beyond the swirling of outer forms and upaya and you find the eye of the tornado which is: Nothing, Impermanence, Stillness, Silence. It's all like a slight of hand game. Everybody is busy gazing at the dharma and teachings. Many fail to see the upaya. Those who see the upaya fail to see the Objective or Goal such upaya was intended to manifest.

You can ask: "Well what is it all trying to make happen?" We can look at any gang or crew or army or religion or the old NXS group to figure out the answer. What's all that patriotic BS for in an army? To get 18-20 year old kids to fight and kill. What's all the blood and crips rhetoric gangs use? To induce solidarity in themselves and get kids to kill. What's all that racial rhetoric the old NXS used for? To draw in people who resonate with that shit, to make a common street gang. What's all that religious BS in church for? To collect church membership who donate and tithe. But your anariya or mundane can't understand this way of thinking. They will get caught up in the superficial words, and teachings, and forms, oblivious to the end objective. Which might not always be "linearly" in the line of sight. Meaning that an upaya stated as one thing can be used to actualize something far different than what would be expected. Teachings about Jesus and heaven at first may make you think that the direct linear goal is to have you be good to get to heaven. When in fact it is to just make money off of you and control your life. The end objective/manifestation of Democracy's concept of Liberty might not linearly be to give you freedom. It might be something unexpected.

So that's the oral history of the business side of what later became what our WSA is today. The "Marketing" side has it's own more colorful history. Marketing here means something metaphorical. Something like doing what it takes to trick somebody to do something or buy into something. Which is also upaya.

Kayla 352 is the top girl on our historical "marketing" side. No girl has yet beat her. It is Kayla that came up with the entire concept of the "WSA" by herself. In the beginning the "WSA" was actually a device Kayla invented to play practical jokes on people. Except Kayla's jokes aren't jokes. She has a personality glitch where if she finds a sucker she can pick on, she'll victimize and abuse the sucker until his life is ruined. Kayla took jokes to a bizarre level that lasts a year or more. The longest joke she played on someone took 2 entire years. All of her jokes end up transpiring in the real world fucking up people's lives. One of her victims lost his girlfriend and daughter, had to leave the state, and almost committed suicide. She has a sadistic personality.

If you know her, you'll know she normally has a fun and silly personality where she laughs at everything and cracks witty jokes. Those who know Kayla knows that when she is quiet and serious, it means she's fucking up somebodies life somehow. You can never trust her if she is serious with you.

Historically the "WSA" was born in 2004 on Myspace of all places. At the time we were all still in high school. I was going to my second high school, but all of my friends from both my schools I went to "hung out" on Myspace which was brand new at the time. Before Myspace we were all on Friendsters. So to set the background, back then Kayla and her friends at her school were on Myspace to simply troll people. They were pretending to be school staff members on Myspace. They made Nazi groups to troll colored people. They made colored groups to troll white people. They just trolled people. But Kayla's jokes or trolling kept getting more and more sophisticated.

One of the signs that Kayla's tricks were getting more sophisticated was that she was starting to create her own form of religious Nazism which at the time she called "Esoteric National Socialism." It was all BS. She also started her own type of Satanism she called "Progressive Satanism." That was also BS. It was all BS because most of the teachings of her Satanism she got from books she read on Sufism and other "white light" religions. She intentionally named it "Progressive Satanism" because she hates Satanism and had the idea of following the example of an old sect of Islam called the Roshaniya. The Roshaniya had different grades of teachings they taught "Progressively" in increments. It started out as normal Quranic Islam, then became Ishmaelitish, then taught of a hidden imam, then the hidden imam was said to have the only true understanding of the Quran. Progressively the imam would gradually teach [manipulate] his followers to be atheist materialist. Kayla had the idea of doing the same, but progressively leading Satanists to be something she mixed together which is a mix of Sufism, Ismaelism, and what she calls Esoteric Nazism. Her cults never took off because she got sidetracked.

Back then my older cousins and their NXS friends had made a fake OTO group on Myspace to meet girls that were into tantric sex and sex magic. This was a group both me and Kayla once hung out together in. But back then me and Kayla spent most of our time together in a group called the SubGenius Group which was started by our good friend that passed away a couple years ago who was a Mason, tattoo artist, and SubGenius from cancer. We love you Ryan. We also hung out together with Ryan in a group called the Knights Templar group. Me and Lynzie [Shugz] are or were members of certain auxiliary groups for girls related to Freemasons and we were and are very active in the Masonic community. Back then me and Lynzie started a group called Rainbows & Jobies, which if you are on the Square you'll recognize. But all of our friends from that group all hung out in the Knights Templar group with the Masons. Usually in the group we all debated and got into fights with these retards that think they are the descendent of Jesus, the Templars [since Templar movies came out then] or those nut cases that believed the Masons were part of some illuminati conspiracy. Kayla back then made a lot of allies with the Myspace Masons. One small group was a small group of Masons who were cops by profession. These cops will later get involved with Kayla's practical joke.

The WSA was born in our fake OTO group. Back then Kayla was doing this creative writing in her own thread where she was mixing her Esoteric Nazism with some secret form of Aryan tantra she called "Opus Vrilis." There is a whole mythos she was writing that went with Opus Vrilis which in her high school Latin is supposed to mean Work of Vril. Basically the bizarre mythos said that Hitler and an inner circle traveled to an underground city in Antarctica where they met the Queen of the Vril-ja who asked Hitler to re-establish on the surface a global matriarchal empire for her. Hitler agreed and in exchange the Queen gave Hitler something called Opus Vrilis by which the Aryan race can become super beings like the Vril-ja. After a while of her writing weird stories, Kayla said that a guy in the group named James had sent her a PM saying that he would be willing to do anything to learn this Opus Vrilis. This is when Kayla said she started her year long troll campaign that would end up fucking this guy's life to pieces.

James was a member of the real OTO and had a girlfriend [mother to his child] who was at the time a "master" of their OTO lodge. Conveniently for Kayla, James lived only a few minutes from her. Kayla's stories weren't written as fiction. She mixed it with bits of history she learned in class, mixed it also with the illuminati and conspiracy theories she hated, and said that her friend's grandfather was in this inner circle and knew Opus Vrilis. She wrote her stuff in such a way that can be believed in and this guy James believed the whole thing. She said during one of their conversations he had asked her if this inner circle had a name. She answered that it was called the "White Star Acception."

There are simple reasons why she named it this, but in time Kayla would make it sound better. The simple story is that me and Kayla actually have mutual friends who take us hiking at night to a canyon called Black Star canyon. The rumor is that in this canyon there is a satanic coven that rapes women and murders strange people in the area. Our friends thought of hiking to Black Star canyon to find this Satanic coven to join since they sound really cool. We never did find any coven because it's all stories the local resident make up because they get annoyed with people hiking in their back yard. But we ended up making a couple older friends up there who were into a dark kind of paganism. Kayla just took the name 'Black Star' and called it White Star and she added the word "Acception" to it because at the time she said she thought it was a real word.

Kayla at this time also invented a person she named "Caligula," who is said to be the old spiritual leader of this WSA inner Nazi group. Caligula is said to be a son of an actual inner circle member who was a biker gangster in prison for life for murder. He supposedly teaches Opus Vrilis to his biker gang members who are Hell's Angels. She said that her best friend's father is one such biker who learned Opus Vrilis from his father who was a "high ranking" Nazi official, which is where she got it from. Of course none of this was true. She said she was making up everything literally as she went along. Later she told us that she picked the name Caligula because in history class that name was the sole thing she was able to remember about the Roman Empire.

Loosely inspired by our NXS group she was now a member of, Kayla went to work on structuring her WSA to troll James. What Kayla basically did was invent an entire system of "Aryan Tantra" off the top of her head to give life to her Opus Vrilis which was just an idea at the time. What she then did was divide her crazy Aryan Tantra into levels beginning from easy mystical exercises to hard ones. To get to the next level James would have to prove his loyalty by doing tests. He was also required to write reports of his practices and experiences and turn them in along with photographs in a brown envelope. James was instructed later by “high ranking” biker – who was Kayla using a fake profiles with a random picture – to leave these envelopes in secret places around the city. Remember, they lived only a few minutes from each other. Kayla would pick up these envelopes and leave the next set of practices for James in “secret” locations. Each level took one month.

As James was practicing his secret Nazi tantra Kayla made at least 20 fake profile who were supposed to be WSA members to psychologically surround James. She also made a gmail account for Caligula which she used very sparingly to give James kudos with. With some of her sock puppets, Kayla became close friends with this James guy. She took advantage of that closeness by tricking James into gradually giving her all of his private information.

Within a few months Kayla knew everything about James. Where he lived, where he and his girlfriend worked, what school his little daughter went to, what kind of cars they drive. And Kayla went a step further and stocked James by taking pictures of his apartment, work place, girlfriend, daughter, him picking her up. Later she would go so far as to follow him around places to take pictures. All this Kayla said was to blackmail him in the future, with what pictures he left for her in those envelopes. From the very beginning Kayla said she had a goal in mind which was to blackmail him to do things to make his girlfriend leave him and send him to prison for the crimes he committed. To make it more real to James, she left “gifts” at his door or on his car as the many members of this WSA. But she was so convincing that James completely believed that at least there was a group of people in his area who had something interesting called Opus Vrilis he seemingly enjoyed learning.

Each test of loyalty sometimes was subtle and other times overtly criminal. To help her out, what she did with her 20 fake profiles was constantly talk about Caligula as somebody worth talking about. With her 20 profiles, she would refer to Caligula as “Herr Caligula” to get James to call “him” that too, which she thought was funny. Caligula says that when he is good they let him have internet access. She invented a code writing system she uses as Herr Caligula to send James private messages to do “favours” for “him.”

Some of the tests were simple, such as randomly beat people up, and he was supposed to take pictures of these things as proof. Other tests were things like him buying a knife and keeping it in a black box. Buying a gun, and getting rid of its serial number and filing down its hammer. He was never explained why he had to buy such things. James was a Nazi and Kayla used that to her advantage by making an entire religion out of Nazism, which she called Esoteric Nazism. At one point after he was months into this whole thing, as Caligula, Kayla accused James of being more loyal to his girlfriend than to Hitler and his “Dream.” To prove he was solely loyal to Hitler “Caligula” instructed James to cheat on his girlfriend with a random girl from a bar, and to send him picture, or else. To play her games she used her many profiles to play good cop and bad cop. Kayla said that whenever James was scared to do something he was told, her good cop profiles would be very nice to him and plead with him to just go with it or the “other” members will do “bad things” to him. By that times, James was already aware that the “WSA” and Caligula had all of his information and Kayla as these WSA members had already blackmailed him with threats stated vaguely at first she said. If the vague threats did not work, she would overtly tell him “they” would kill his “loved ones.” But Kayla used her coded system of writing and used coded words to mean Kill and such which James was familiar with, just in case her games went too far and she got busted. She was also smart enough to send all “questionable” instructions and threats with computers at the city library or at a college campus near her house.

After 6 months into the game, Kayla said that James had been privately sending emails to one of her fake profiles with which she was posing as a close friend of James whom he trusted. James by this time had been making complaints about how Caligula is instructing him to do more and more illegal things which he does not want to do but does not know how to get out of the WSA. He believed in his mind that if he did not do what Caligula was told that “they” would seriously harm his girlfriend and daughter. He was instructed by Kayla to buy a gun, and he did which he sent the photos of in his brown envelop to Caligula’s people. He was during this time worried very badly that Caligula may want him to kill somebody. Kayla said that one of her goals was to see if she could actually manipulate James to at least do a drive by in his car to shoot somebody.

During the 9th month Kayla said that as Caligula she gave James the instructions to prove his loyalty to Hitler and his Race by “getting rid” of a colored person. James was given the suggestion that a drive by at night along certain freeways may be a good method.

Kayla said that the same day he got his instructions to kill, he had written a message to his confidant – Kayla’s sockpuppet – shitting bricks. She said that James said that he was instructed to kill and that he can’t do it and wanted out and needed advice. He didn’t want his family hurt. As this confidant Kayla told him that she would help talk Caligula to let him leave the WSA if he promised not to rat. James said that he can’t rat on anybody because Caligula’s people had criminal evidence, and begged his confidant to help him leave the WSA. Kayla said as this confidant she manipulated him to push his life into fuck up mode himself. She told him that he needs to tell his girlfriend everything and come clean with her, then tell her to take his daughter and go hide out at her mothers or something. In a state of panic James said that this was a good idea and he did it. A couple days later James had written to his confidant saying that he was extremely sad because he had told his girlfriend everything and she had called him crazy but that she left with his daughter and at least she was safe. Kayla said that she was working on Caligula, and that Caligula said that he was worried that James would tell. Then without warning Kayla pulls the plug and deletes all of her fake profiles. Leaving James hanging.

To “end” her game what Kayla did was first send James’ girlfriend an envelop at her work place which had inside pix of a girl James had met. Along with it was a written account by James describing in detail what he did with her. Next Kayla scanned every picture James sent to her and went to her cop friend she had made on myspace. Then Kayla turned the entire thing around and made it look like she was a victim and that James was a member of some sick Nazi cult which was trying to make her do illegal stuff and they threatened to kill her. She had told her cop friends that he sent her weird pix of odd and scary things he does, then gave her cop friend many of the pix and his information. She then deleted herself from myspace and went quiet from everybody for a month to wait to see what happens. She was still on Myspace under a different profile. All hell broke loose on Myspace at this time in our OTO group.

Kayla's cop friends had come to our OTO group looking for James and they said they know everything and said they had sent his pix to the department in his city. They also asked where Kayla was. We were asked by Kayla to say we did not know of her whereabouts, but that she left Myspace in fear.

Shortly after that Kayla and her friends drove by James's apartment and noticed that he was gone. They had checked his work place for the week and noticed that he was also gone from work. During this time Kayla had another profile she used which had nothing to do with her WSA. With this profile she had cultivated friendships with everybody James knew who was on Myspace as a means to collect second hand information about James. Later with this profile Kayla learned from his close friends that James had relocated out of the state and was feeling suicidal when he left.

That was the first birth of the WSA and the "marketing" Kayla used and learned to make James buy into the idea. The second birth of the WSA was born just a few months after this during another practical joke Kayla played on another person which would last 2 entire years. The unfortunate victim was her own best friend at the time.

This second one was more funny and light hearted, if that term can be used. Her best friend was never hurt in any way and although after the 2 year practical joke they stopped being friends for a while, they are today still close friends, and he is a member of our WSA. We'll call the victim best friend "Paul" to protect his identity. Kayla said that two things triggered this practical joke. The first was that she had just watched the old Wickerman with her parents, and two she had a big argument with her friend Paul.

Paul used to go to the same school with her and used to be a Nazi. But he dropped out, got into speed and became a communist. At the time Kayla was into National Socialism and did not like communists, so she said that she resented Paul for betraying National Socialism. She said she wanted to punish him for betraying Hitler somehow to teach him a lesson for being a stupid communist. So she had the bizarre idea to play a joke on Paul to get him to visit Scotland so that she can pretend to be a Satanic cult trying to lure him there to sacrifice him to Satan. By now all of us learned that Kayla played these long jokes on people and we were interested in these jokes. So this was when Kayla invented what we today called a "portal account" which is when she gave us all the passwords to her fake account so we can read the conversations going on to laugh. It was from this actual joke that Kayla and the rest of us would later learn our "marketing" skills. This is after we refined everything much later in our college years.

So Kayla had an Objective she wanted to actualize: To get her best friend to somehow go to Scotland in real life. Kayla needed to figure out a way to make this happen. Paul by the way is a year older than Kayla [18 at this time], and he also had certain personality glitches Kayla knew of. Kayla is the first person to use the term "glitch" to mean anomalous and recognizable traits in a person's personality or character. His glitch was that he was chubby and had grown a lot of zits, which told Kayla that he may be suffering from low self esteem and that he may be lonely for a girlfriend. He also was a romantic type personality. Not in the dating and love sense, but as in the type to mentally wander in day dreams far from the real world. She said she knew this glitch because Paul had a home library made up of nothing but books on poetry, philosophy, and art. Paul was also a musician and played the guitar and painted. He was also a self described bohemian who often complained to Kayla that he was born in the wrong time and should have been born in Paris in the past when Bohemians were revolutionizing France. Kayla learned to use and abuse all of these glitches to get Paul to go to Scotland.

Kayla first “invented” something she called “Backmasking” which was to set an Objective you wish to actualize and in your mind work backwards to see how this Objective can be made real. She called each step of this Backmasking process a “Move.” Kayla said that each Move must be like a chess move where you have the end goal of killing the king, but your Moves must be changeable on the playing field in real time. She also invented something she called “Glamour Magick,” at this time to describe a psychological process of brainwashing where you trick your victim to believe what you want them to believe. In grown up talk we sometimes call this “Propaganda,” but back then the term Glamour was all Kayla had to use. So Kayla’s “Theme” of her Moves must be Glamour Magick, meaning that she must brainwash Paul in some way to have him end up going to Scotland. She called her first Move “Priming,” like before you paint your room purple you have to put a primer on it or something.

Kayla spent a few months Priming Paul for her Glamour Magick by first pretending to also give up National Socialism and becoming a Communist. She had bought a copy of the Communist Manifesto and read it, then asked Paul to teach her about Communism. Kayla then did something she ended up calling “Mirroring and Reflecting.” Mirroring was when Kayla mirrored Paul’s beliefs, ideology, and views. What we today call a Paradigm. Reflecting was when Kayla adopted every word and idea Paul used. While she was “shapeshifting” into a Communist and mirroring and reflecting Paul, Kayla did something she calls “Separating.”

Separating was when Kayla literally divided reality into two false parts to produce contrast in Paul’s mind. On the one hand what Kayla did was have conversations with Paul where she started talking shit about the conditions of America and Capitalism and induced him to talk about how bad things are with America. Then she contrasted that by idealizing Communism’s beliefs and visions of a better world. This is where her Glamouring began, in a process she called “Entrapment.” Entrapment was when Kayla began narrating “what if” scenes and narrated day dreams of different idealized communist world and future events. You in essence create a fantasy world and draw the victim inside it and trap that victim inside that created world, keeping him as far away from the negatively talked about real world.

Kayla said she simply initiated her entrapment Move by starting her conversations with a dreamy look and saying: “Gosh, can you imagine...” or she’d ask him: “In 10 years where do you see yourself, how do you see your life.” And so when he plays along and narrates his day dream, Kayla pushes him further into that day dream world as long as she can by taking him deeper into it just like a meditation instructor guides you in visualizations.

She said after 3 months of priming him up like this she made her second Move which she calls "Convincing." This basically means you now; after your victim had been immersed in those pseudo hypnotic day dreams sessions or fantasies; you now work to convince the victim that it's all entirely possible be Realized. How she started this Move was Kayla had gone to the book store to look for a travel book about Scotland. She was looking for a certain type that had information she can use to Convince Paul that Scotland was a key to Realizing that hypnotic world she trapped him in. She actually found a travel guide book which had information in it that talked about how the Parliament of Scotland takes an interest in artists by having these programs or some sort. This book also talked about artists colonies and lofts.

Kayla said she used the book to "anchor" their day dream talks in the "real world." What Kayla basically did was give Paul the book and the two of them talked about how Scotland was a "perfect" place for "someone like him," a bohemian! Why the socialist government there even helps authors publish books and artists have lofts they can live in together! This Kayla said made even more day dream sessions. This time Kayla was entrapping Paul in a Glamour of living in Scotland. To help push him closer to Scotland Kayla said that she will go to Scotland with him and that they can bring their other friends along too. She did this for a month or two.

Meanwhile, as she was Glamouring Paul in a day dream world, Kayla was watching a movie called Train Spotting and she rewatched the old Wickerman. This was so she can acquire their vocabulary and words. Kayla also went so far as to buy a dictionary of Scottish words and idioms. On myspace she made friends in a group about Scotland for people from it, to find friends from there. This was all for her next Move.

Knowing that Paul had low self esteem and wanted a girlfriend, Kayla took advantage of that in her next Move by creating an entire nonexistent Scottish girl from Scotland with "whom" she would develop a long distance love relationship with Paul. She would spend up to 6 full months with this Glamour, further entrapping him in a now emotionalized fantasy world of living in Scotland.

Kayla's girlfriend for Paul had an entire "history" all prewritten. Her name was "Jessica McCahey" which she told us she got from reading one of her romance novels. Jessica was born and raised in Aberdeen Scotland and so Kayla at the time had collected words the dialect of Aberdeen Scottish English used, so she can use them. Jessica also went to the University of Aberdeen to be a marine biologist, that way she can study Loch Ness to find the Loch Ness monster. Her father was a fisherman since on a map Kayla said Aberdeen seemed near the sea. Her mom was a baker at a small shop. Later she told us that she picked these two professions because she actually did not know what kind of jobs people in Scotland did at the time. She also told us later that she picked the city of Aberdeen because at the time it was the only city with a dot on her map she could find in Scotland. With her new found friends from Scotland in the myspace group she would both learn their lexicon by being friends with them and she would test her vocabulary and believability, since she had two profiles in that group. One as herself, and one a person supposedly from Scotland. At the time her fake profile blended in because she [Kayla] had absorbed street grade Scottish English and slang via her real profile learning from these people.

To start Paul's relationship with "Jessica McCahey" Kayla one day said that she had put in an ad online in a Scottish website looking for contacts and that she had left Paul's email in the ad. She informed Paul that he would have to go to Scotland first to find a place and get a job and thus he would need a real contact from Scotland. She would stay behind to send him money to help him get by until he finds a job. She convinced Paul to agree by making this Move look like an "escape" from the tyranny of Capitalist America. Paul agreed and told Kayla that he was serious of moving to Scotland and that he will talk with any contacts that writes him and make it all work out for them and their mutual friend who also wanted to go along.

A few days after that Kayla said she began her long distance relationship with Paul as Jessica, by first emailing him. But Kayla had experience from her first joke in making things seem real. There relationship started off email based just sending letters back and forth. By this time Kayla had made a real friend from Aberdeen she found on Myspace. What she did to make this Glamour real to Paul was she would write hand written letters, send it to her friend in Aberdeen Scotland, who would then send these letters to Paul's house. This Jessica had pictures which were pic of Kayla's Scottish contacts sister, and amazingly, Jessica was given a real Aberdeen voice when Kayla convinced her friend's sister to call Paul every once in a while. Each of her contacts had access to her Jessica email accounts to read about the relationship and what to generally talk about. Meanwhile in real life in front of Paul, Kayla would at times act happy for Paul that he found someone interested in him, and at time Kayla would act jealous because Paul would constantly talk about Jessica and not her.

Six month of this and Paul was in love with Jessica. Kayla was then ready to make her next Move. She did this by changing Jessica's conversations with Paul to induce him into day dream worlds of him living with her in Scotland. She did this by narrating life in Scotland talking about how the two of them can live together. Even though Kayla doesn't know anything about life in Scotland. She was making everything all up to entrap him. She knew he was lazy, so Paul was told that you can ride a bus to Loch Ness and fish for fish and sell them in the city and make $50 a day, which in Kayla's Scotland was far more than enough to live off of. It was a communist paradise after all for bohemians. Or so she made it sound to Paul. After a month of this, as Jessica, Kayla asked Paul to move to Scotland with her. He can stay at her dorm since it was co-ed until he found a job. She told Paul he can be a fisherman with "her father." When he comes. Paul agreed.

During this whole time Paul's mother knew Kayla was playing some sort of joke on Paul and she never ruined the joke. Paul's mother was a nurse and was worried about Paul's use of speed. So she told him to quit speed and in return she would give him Vicodin and Codeine which were at least "better" than speed. This was the type of mom she was. So she wanted Paul to get out of the house and actually experience the world. Paul had told his mom, Kayla, and their mutual friend that he was moving to Scotland and he showed them his passport to prove it. Paul said that his savings only covered half the plane ticket and his mother agreed to pay for the other half just to get him out of the house. A few days after this Kayla said they was in his mom's car off to the airport! Kayla said that at the airport when she finally fully realized that Paul was seriously going to Scotland to look for a nonexistent girl that she felt kinda bad or guilty or something. So she sent Paul off with $200 of spending cash, which she said made her feel better about the whole thing. She said on the way back home, his mom asked her what she was going to do when Paul figures out Jessica is not real. Kayla said she said she told Paul's mom she had watched the Wickerman and that she has a story all written out in her head. Paul's mom just told Kayla not to kill her son.

Kayla said that on the drive home that day she realized that she had accomplished her Mission and Objective, which took a year to make happen. She really got Paul to go to Scotland, by making small moves. She also realized the power of Glamour – or Propaganda or whatever – which she would later refine by studying psychology, reading up on behavioural science, and then also the marketing industry. The key factor Kayla later learned is to have complete control of the stream of information going into the other person's brain. The funny stuff – which we still talk and laugh about – happens when Paul returns from his trip. It may sound like Paul is dumb the way I cast him here, but he's not. He actually is a very well read and an articulate intellectual. But everyone has their weak spots.

The very next day Kayla said she got a call from Paul's mom telling her Paul is back and she thought Kayla might be interested in how his visit to Scotland was. Kayla said she hauled ass to Paul's place as fast as she could, and on the way there she laughed harder than she ever had all the way to his house.

She said Paul had just woken up from his long plane trip home. She can keep a straight face. She asked Paul; pretending to be confused; what happened and why he was back only after a day?!

Paul said that his plane had to stop in London, whereupon at the London airport he was pulled aside by the customs agents. Paul said that the agents were looking at him suspiciously and they asked him what he was doing in the UK. So Paul told him that he had a girlfriend in Scotland and was going to relocate up there and live with her. Then Paul said they asked him an odd question about how much money he had. Paul told them he had $200. He said the agents then said to him something like: "Okay, let's get this right. You are going to relocate to Scotland and you have only $200 to your name?" Paul said: "Yeah. Was I speaking a different language?" Thing about Paul is he has an arrogant smartassie mouth.

He said that the agents then asked him for information about his "girlfriend" and so he gave them the address and name of the University of Aberdeen. Kayla's cohorts in Aberdeen when resending her hand written letters always used this University's address and not their real home address. This university was the only place Paul knew Jessica existed at. He said he was kept to the side for a couple minutes and the agent who said he was going to call the university came back and told Paul that the university said no such girl named Jessica McCahey went to their school. And then he said the agents took him into a jail cell or holding unit to be placed on the next flight back to California.

In the holding cell Paul was confused. He worked things out in his mind by telling himself that the agents were dicks and hated Americans so they did not actually call the university. They only lied saying they did. In Paul's mind, Jessica McCahey for sure was real. He communicates with her, has seen her, gets hand written letters from her and gifts, and has spoken with her numerous times. Kayla asked him if he had asked Jessica what was up? He said that he just got done writing to her about his ordeal and is waiting for her reply. Kayla said she then slipped and cracked up over him being deported back in 24 hours. But she made it sound like she was cracking up over the actual deporting. Paul laughed too and after cussing out the agents said that at least he got to see London through his window.

Kayla said she flew back home to check her email, laughing all the way back home. In Paul's email to Jessica he retells his ordeal to Jessica but states that the agents only pretended to call her university and told him that the university denied she went to that school. Kayla wrote back as Jessica only with this: "Wicker Man." And with that an entire year of practical jokes ensued, during which time Kayla's "WSA" idea solidified.

Back over at Paul's he had asked his mom what "Wicker Man" meant since that was all Jessica wrote back to him. He was told it was an old movie. Kayla was called over by Paul to watch the movie after being told Jessica simply gave him its title. Over at his house was their mutual friend Carlos who was a crazy pot head. The Wicker Man is a movie about some Scottish people who lures an Englishman over to their island, plays games with him, then puts him in a tall wooden wicker man and burns him as a sacrifice. Kayla said she was biting her nail waiting for Paul's reaction. She bases her next Move on how Paul reacts to things. She didn't have to set the next move because Carlos set it for her by blurting out: "Dude, she was going to sacrifice you!" Kayla said Paul had a look of disbelief on his face and said: "What the fuck?!" Paul had written a letter to Jessica asking her why she recommended this movie. As Jessica, Kayla calmly told Paul that she was just trying to lure him to Scotland so her Satanic coven can Sacrifice him to Satan. But the customs agent apparently ruined things. She stops communicating with him for a month.

After a month of silence, as Jessica, Paul was informed that she had gotten a transfer to UCI which is a university in his area. Jessica told Paul that she had to come to America to kill Paul with an Orange County branch of her Satanic Coven called the White Star Acceptation. He was informed that he will shortly be contacted for further details. Later, Kayla had slipped a envelope with a hand written love letter from Jessica into his car. The letter tried to make Jessica seem like the crazy obsessive type. Paul was told that she [Jessica McCahey] loved Paul very much and that she only wanted to kill the both of them so nobody can separate the two of them. He was asked to consummate their love by letting her kill him for Satan.

After he got the initial stage setting letter, Paul referred to Jessica as a "crazy bitch." He believed what he was reading because of a glitch in his personality. Paul did a lot of drugs and already had a paranoid personality which Kayla took full advantage of. During the following few months Kayla would take pictures of his house and car and put these pictures in his mail box. She and her friends in the area also dressed up one evening in black robes and took group pix around his place. Kayla was also harassing Paul now with random phone calls at night where she would speak in a whisper but fake a Scottish accent. Kayla said she tried to sound as freaky and crazy as possible but in a calm manner. Usually she'd just ask him to meet her out by the railroad tracks he lives right next to so they can "be together forever." There were also times when Kayla and her friends in the area followed him around and car chased him at night.

As the months pass by, Paul becomes increasingly convinced that there was a Satanic coven called the White Star Acceptance led by a crazy Scottish girl who was crazy enough to fly to California to try and sacrifice him and his dog to Satan. He now talked about it with Kayla and his other friends telling them he was being stalked by a crazy Scottish bitch and a coven of crazy bitches. He couldn't go to the cops because "Jessica" threatened to kill his black dog if he did. To make him even more paranoid Kayla had written a note as Jessica informing Paul that she was in the house for him, but he wasn't home. She hid this letter in his place and as Jessica told him she had left him something in his house. Paul said he tore apart everything until he found the scary letter. Kayla said one of the most funniest moments for her was when Paul was on the sofa holding this letter saying to Kayla and his mom: "They were in here. In the house looking for me. If I was home I probably would be dead. Stupid dog. You're worthless. He didn't even bark. I asked the neighbors if they heard any barking."

Kayla said his mom was chuckling at him about how serious he took the letter and she had told him that nobody was in the house and that he was worried over nothing. They argued for a bit and Kayla added something like: "Paul, I find it hard to believe that some girl would go out of her way to stalk you. You're not that important. Besides it's a coven of girls? Whats the worst that can happen? They rape you?"

Six month into the second year Paul was complaining to Kayla that he can't take it anymore. He was losing sleep. He said that he hadn't had a good night sleep in 6 month. He slept with his useless watchdog, a sword, and a knife, and wakes up thinking he is going to be sacrificed at every sound outside his window. Kayla asked what Paul was going to do. Paul told Kayla that he was secretly going to hide out in Georgia with his uncle for a few month. This way Jessica and her WSA sisters will lose interest in him after he is gone for many months and they'd go back to Scotland. Kayla was asked not to tell anybody that he was in Georgia or Jessica will find out. Kayla swore that she would keep this a secret, even though all of her friends later knew about it. We laughed. He actually left to Georgia a week later, which is clear across the country from California.

Kayla said she was now worried. Not for Paul, but for her practical joke. She wasn't expecting him to move clear across the country. Now Paul was too far away from her for her to do anything convincing. She said she switched Objectives. The Objective now was to learn as much as she can about the city Paul was in and to scare him back to California.

To do this she first called Paul regularly and slyly got him to describe everything about his new city and surrounding. She had told us that she needed help in finding a person on Myspace from the same city in Georgia Paul was staying in. Her next Move was to find a person from the same city, forge a friendship with them, and manipulate them to help her play her tricks on Paul. It took us a couple months of joining groups and starting groups about Georgia to locate some prospects. Kayla develops a friendship with these prospects to get a feel for their personality type. She has a natural talent for being able to feel around by asking question for your "psychology" to figure out if you have buttons she can push to manipulate and control you. She picked the easiest one to work with by faking a long distance relationship with this guy.

To make everything consistent and flowing, Kayla had manipulated Paul to frequently send his mom post cards and letters. Which he did. Using the address on these letters Kayla now wrote a letter and sent it to her new contact in Georgia who was told to give it in person to Paul and tell Paul that “a friend had told him to give it to him, and they ‘they’ were watching.” Kayla’s contact did his part good and gave the letter to Paul. In the letter “Jessica” briefly informs Paul that she stole his mail and learned where he was hiding.

Paul had called Kayla in shock and disbelief telling her that the crazy Scottish bitch found him and that her WSA had members in his new city too and they were preparing to sacrifice him there during the next pagan holiday. He said that what shocked him the most was that a person he never met before handed him Jessica’s letter. Kayla suggests that Paul quietly drive his car as soon as possible back to California to evade Jessica who might already be in his town. He agreed and a few days later was back at his mom’s place.

Nearing the end of two years and with nowhere to hide, Paul was at the ends of his rope. He had become hopeless and kept telling people he was going to die. With no other option Paul told Kayla that he was thinking about now going to the police since he had all this evidence. Kayla steers him away from that option by telling him that Jessica was Scottish and thus out of local police jurisdiction. And going to the cops would only make them even more angry. She told him that he should call a Private Investigator instead. Paul took the bait and the two of them looked in the yellow pages for a PI. His mom was in the room with them shaking her head and laughing. Kayla said that Paul got offended and told his mom she was being insensitive because he can be killed by Jessica at any moment. She said Paul called the PI and said: “Yeah hi. I have a problem but I’m not sure how to describe it. There is a Satanic cult stalking me trying to kill me. They followed me from Scotland to California and followed me to Georgia. I can’t sleep at night. Can you help?” Paul was told by the PI that he can’t help and that a psychiatrist may be a better option for him.

During the last year, Paul was so worried that he stopped doing speed. This was something his mom liked. After the phone call to the PI Paul’s mom looked at Kayla and told her that maybe it was time to tell Paul. Kayla did as she was told and ended her 2 year game. She told Paul that she was behind everything and that she was Jessica and the entire WSA cult. She said Paul had a look of confusion and disbelief, mostly because he still believed Jessica was a real person. He had asked Kayla who he was talking to on the phone in Scotland and who was sending him hand written letters from Aberdeen? Kayla had to explain in detail how she pulled everything off by using Myspace. His mom had to help unbrainwash him and yank him out of the world he had been living in for 2 years by telling him that she knew about it from the beginning and thought it was harmless fun Kayla was having with him. Besides, it got him off speed.

He sat there in silence for a while and his last words in the game was: “So Jessica is not real? Nobody is trying to kill me?” She said that after he was assured that everything was fake, he got angry and told Kayla that she had made a fool of him. He asked her if anybody else knew about this. All of us – her friends – knew about it and logged into her portal accounts regularly to tune in to what was like a reality show Kayla was producing for us. But Kayla told him that nobody else knows about this. Paul in his anger and realization that he was made a total fool told Kayla that they can’t be friends anymore. Kayla at the moment tried to save their friendship by saying: "It's just a joke Paul." She said he yelled out: "Just a joke!? Two fucking years? You had me running half way around the world! To Scotland for a girl that doesn't exist! To Georgia to hide out from a cult that is fake! I haven't had a good night sleep in a year. I lost weight over this. You call that a fucking joke! You made a complete fool out of me!"

Kayla gradually stopped playing these games with people. But she never stopped using what she learned from these games to get what she wants out of people. Shortly after this Paul joke, Kayla was able to sell her WSA name to the old DMA/NXS group she had now become a member of through me. She basically used the fame her 2 year joke gave to the name "WSA" to help sell it to the shot callers in NXS. Eventually DMA/NXS and WSA just merged becoming something much different over the years.

While Kayla spent her high school years playing these elaborate jokes on people and learning her 'marketing' skills from them. I was over at my high school doing my own thing and learning my 'marketing' skills from my own experiences. My experiences were different than Kayla's.

All of my guy cousins are or were in some way associated or affiliated with Asian gangs. Not all Asian gangs are dirty like your common Black or Mexican street gangs. For fun them and their friends tagged DMA which broke off of an old skool tag bang crew way back in the 90's called EK [Evil Kidz]. I got into DMA in junior high. So when I later relocated to my new high school my older cousins and friends asked me to start it [DMA] up at my school. The thing is DMA is a hybrid group that is a tagger crew, but uses Asian family/gang style bonds, and does business like many street gangs such as deal things in the underground market. All the guys in DMA doubled as members of other gangs so our crew had the connections to get pretty much whatever you from computers, software, to dope and weapons, to spray cans, to back up.

So my challenge was being a new unknown student at a new school and trying to start up a local clique of DMA so the guys back in my original city can expend their territory into the new city I was now living in. The bigger challenge was that DMA wasn't just a fun tagger crew, you had to bang it like a gang. So put together the challenge I was working with was that I was an unknown student and my objective was to make people into criminals. Not just criminals that vandalized walls, but the type that sell dope, carry guns, and shoot at people. In simple English, I had to basically somehow get people to tag, bang, deal, and shoot at people by myself at first. It's not like playing games like Kayla did, and it's not selling people ideology. You're basically selling people a ticket to juvenile hall, selling them a criminal record, and possibly selling them life in prison if they actually kill someone while they shoot at people. That's the challenge.

The thing with your knowledge base about gangs, how gangs work, and how to recruit new members are things are not written down in some articulate format that is studied like a college course. It's letterless learning from your experience and associations. It's also partly based on instinct. So at the time, I would not have been able to intellectualize how I did my thing in an articulate manner in writing.

All I know was that I was young when my older cousins and their friends recruited me into their crew. I also knew that if I did something like tag up DMA I was praised for it, which I liked. I also knew that I had a lot of interest or admiration, or respect in certain cousins and their friends who were from certain gangs that I knew about. I knew to myself that it was getting attention and praise specifically from the guys from those “prestigious” gangs I looked up to or had an admiration for that effected me, more than getting random attention from the generic membership of DMA. I knew I liked getting attention for being related to the top OG’s from DMA. And so the more I got praised for all this from certain types of OG’s, the more I tried to do things to impress them. The more I did things to impress them, and the more attention I got, the more of a different type of attention I got from the general DMA membership. Meaning that if I got kudos from these OG’s in DMA from hardcore gangs everyone in DMA respects and admire, the general membership gave me that adulation type of attention. As if I were a celebrity in DMA. I knew that this was also something I liked which influenced me to do more for DMA. Knowing myself in this way was all I needed to start a branch of DMA in my new city.

In the very beginning, the easiest way for me to approach this challenge was to use race. So I tried to make friends with all the Asians with the criminal element I was looking for. From here its just basic social skills and information gathering. The trick is to collect the right type of information to use to manipulate them towards your Objective. You need an Objective, and just like in Kayla’s case, you need to break your Objective’s actualization into bite sized Moves. But these Moves must be grounded in the real world where they can be adapted to circumstances. All I knew was that the more friendlier I was to my new guy friends, the more information I can get out of them. The more I talked like them and made my world look like theirs the more they trusted me. The main information I was instinctively digging for was what Asian gangs these guys admired or respected or thought was hardcore, or wanted to emulate. Once I get that information, and the gang they admired had members in DMA, I have them in my hold.

I first went after the ninth graders of my new school since they were the youngest in my reach. I met one prospect named Nick. In high school we write letters to friends as an extra way to be friends, which I also did with my new friends here at this new school. From his letters I learned that Nick was tagging, and that he really likes a certain Asian gang which had membership in DMA. In real life he was the type to brag about how hardcore he was. I cultivated my friendship with him by first giving him a baggy of weed and I told him about my party crews and that I had friends that were OG’s from this gang he admired. I told Nick I’d hook him up next time they were going to party. That was all I needed to make Nick DMA.

I called my older cousins a few days later and told them that I found Nick and told them what type of person he was, what crews he tagged with, and what gang he admires. The older guys said they were gunna hang out during the weekend and for me to hook them up with Nick. At the time my little mom had it so that I couldn’t hang out with anybody after school, so I wasn’t able to hang out with anybody. I told Nick that I had talked to my guy friends and they were having a party that weekend and said that they wanted to hang out with him if he was down. To entice him further I told Nick I had a lot of girl cousins and a lot of girl friends in our crew I can hook him up with. Nick got excited and said: “Hell yeah.” So Nick ended up partying with my DMA friends during the weekend.

At the party the guys do their part. They just casually bring up DMA as a crew they all were with. Asked him about the crews in the area. While they talk to him everybody is instinctively checking out who Nick is looking up to or giving more respect to or thinks is the coolest in the crowd. It's these people – the ones he thinks is coolest – who casually suggested to Nick that he start up DMA with me in our city. It's not really peer pressure. It's pecking order pressure. You don't care what your peers think. You care what the guys or girls you look up to think. It's your own weakness for admiring or looking up to a certain set of people in any given social order. To help emotionally convince him to start DMA in his city the popular girls in DMA at the party do their job by chiming in and verbally agree with the suggestion and tell him that it would be cool if he did start DMA up.

A month after I met Nick, he was DMA and was out tagging our letters in the area. Then he had a few friends at the school who were "cool" whom he suggested to me to get them into DMA. I agreed and a month later we had ourselves a little branch of DMA, as well as our own more fun styled tagger crews.

Meanwhile I was trying to feel my way around the social structure of the new school to figure out who the popular kids were so I can make my way into their group. The quickest way for me as a girl to do this is by locating the set of popular guys, then after gathering information about them, pick out the ones who smoked weed or did drugs. This way I had an excuse to talk with them and thus forge a friendship. It's harder to climb rank if you are a girl and you try to make friends with the popular girls cuz it's just how things happen. They look down on you as a new comer to their group. It's like when you are a guy new to a school and you try to be friendly to the popular jocks and racers. Most often they just think your a geek or they put up a defensive wall. If you try to get popular by working people of your same gender you have to start from the very bottom of their pecking order. Meaning for me, I would have to try and make friends with the least popular of the popular girls. Same with if you are a guy. You have to somehow make friends with the least popular of the popular guys and slowly work your way up. It's easier for girls with the right social skills to climb rank by working with the guys. But you still have to first make friends with the least popular girl of the group of girls you want to be a part of and work up. The easiest way for me to do this is my feeling out which girl in my target popular girl group liked the popular guy I was forging a social bond with. She'll only like me to get closer to this guy. And I'll only like her to get closer to the more popular friends she has just above her in social rank. During this whole process all the top popular girls will still look down on you, but the popular guys you talk to gives you your needed social support.

The whole reason why I was working to climb this new schools social ladder was "political" and for DMA future ability to expand. There is no point for you to start up a crew of any kind if you are a nerd or a geek. People will just laugh at you. It's different when you have "social creds." Social Credit or Social Capital works a lot like credit cards in the business world. The more credit you have, the more corporations trust you. The more they trust you the more you can buy big things. The more you buy, the more valuable you are to the credit card people and corporations. I had no words or means to describe any of this back in those days thought besides "social creds." So this is the expansion part of spreading DMA. The other part is to influence your people to be criminals.

Influencing them to actually do your dirty work is also a style of manipulation, but a different type. You manipulate them to be in situations you need them to be in to actualize your goals or objectives. You let the situation and events do your converting. In the case with DMA the end goal was to make each kid in it not only into petty vandals, but dope dealers, and soldiers to protect turf. How do you make that happen? Just like you teach a person how to swim: you push them into the pool and let the situation and event make them learn to swim, at the same time cheering them on and supporting them to encourage them to swim.

An example would be many month later me and Nick were running a small DMA branch and we were recruiting kids from the 9th grade. There were some kids who were really good writers [tagging] but who were scared to fight, and DMA was supposed to be a tag bang crew. So me and Nick had to manipulate or influence or inspire these kids to fight. What we did with this one kid was I went around quietly starting rumors that our target kid was talking shit about a certain guy's girlfriend. Me and Nick picked a guy who we knew our target kid can fight. So we spent some time spreading these rumors and feeding the kid [our new recruit] ideas like how he needs to be tough and deal with the situation and not back down. So what me and Nick were doing was act like bad cops behind his back and good cops in front of his face. Eventually things got heated and our kid and the guy I picked out confronted each other off campus. That's when the cheering and support starts where you tell him verbally to kick the guy's ass and that we'll jump in if his friends jump in. Then what I did was I physically pushed our kid's back as hard as a I could into the other guy and they fought each other. Our kid ended up winning the fight and making us proud. After that what I did was I talked about my kid and his fight with my new found popular friends to get them to talk about him in a good way. This way I can use their praises and social creds to help build his confidence. Our kid ended up being a fighter and foot soldier. After the first fight, you aren't so scared anymore of getting hurt.

It's the same basic stuff with getting a new recruit to eventually use violence and force or "gang bang." You take your young recruit and hook things up so he is hanging out with older guys he looks up to. The guys will take the new recruit to a place where they know a confrontation with a rival crew or gang may take place. Sometimes you have to start shit to manipulate the situation to spark a big fight. Once a fight breaks out your new recruit has zero options to chose from. He has no choice but to fight because the rival crew thinks he is a part of your crew so they will go after him. If he runs away he loses the friendship and respect of the guys he looks up to and the top girls who shower him with attention. He has to fight, and when he does, the situation is what makes your recruit a banger and seals his identity with your crew. The more of an enemy you have defined, the more solid or bonded, or coherent your own crew or group identity will be.

This is a basic method of starting any crew or gang. You pick a per-existing crew and cross them out making them an enemy and pick up on the "us and them" rhetoric. That's one of the very first things me and Nick did to start up DMA in our school and city. I asked Nick to give me a list of tagger crews in the area and to give me the name of the crew which nobody at our school liked. Nick picked out a crew he knew many guys at our school did not like. So what we did was we one night [we both sneak out of our house] crossed out this crew's tag in our city to start a rivalry and to make them an enemy. I called up my older friends in DMA the very next day and told them we cross a small crew out and might need back up if a battle breaks out.

They were ready to back us up. We did battle them and made the condition that the loser give the winner spray cans and weed. We didn't want to absorb them or dissolve them, because the OG's knew that our little branch needed a rival. And so what we did after this was use that rivalry as a means to call out new members who did not like that crew.

In the bigger DMA we use manipulative social methods. The more experienced guys teaches new recruits by example out in the streets and by hanging out with them. The most popular guys and OG's do the praising. Then the most popular girls work our stuff by showering the new recruits with attention if they did something "tough." The attention given by the top ranking girls is a very important element. It plays on the new guy recruits guy nature where an unspoken rivalry for the top girls' attention comes into being. They are friends, but they try to out do each other in "toughness" as soldiers, or whatever for more and more attention from the top ranking girls. This makes it so that other new recruits don't really have to be told what to do to get praise and attention.

This is the same shit they use in a Mormon ward [church] of all places. I "insight rolled" as a Mormon for a while at a local ward once. At a typical ward your Sunday meeting are split into the parents and married couples and the younger unmarried couples. Being from a crew and gang background, I recognized the same methods I used to recruit being used and played out by these Mormons.

In your ward of young people you have a social order. Instead of guys using violence or tagging to make a name for themselves, the guys in a ward go on their missionary service. The popular girls in the ward then give their attention and constantly talk about the boys that come back from their missionary work. It turns out also that only the boys who come back from their missionary work get dates with the top girls. This makes something special happen. As a new guy joining the ward you now don't have to be told or convinced what you must do. You will eventually realize that if you want a date, or to get married, or to even get attention from any girl from top ranks – who happen to also be the prettiest – your ass will have to "hear the call" and go on a mission. But this game works both ways unfortunately. You see for a girl to climb social rank you can't just date any random guy in your ward. It has to be a boy who came back from his mission or you aren't climbing rank and earning status points.

Same thing goes with crews and gangs. As a guy, you have certain methods of doing stuff to earn support and social ties with the top ranking guys and girls. As a girl if you aren't related to a top ranking guy, you have to date only the guys that prove themselves to be the toughest, or that have earned their social creds from the top guys. Because if you date just any old pussy new recruits, it makes you look bad and you lose your social creds and status. So with real world based things such as crews, gangs, and some organized religions, and also political parties, not everything is about doctrines, ideology, and indoctrination. Social order, human nature, has a great deal to do with everything. There is a cliché saying that goes: "It's not what you know, it's who you know," and even though it's cheesy, it's also very true. You can't trump human nature. Those that know and understand that human nature more and have the ability to manipulate your human nature, will have the means to push your buttons.

Aural Lessons

So This is what we mean by Oral Teachings in our WSA. It when we retell each other the oral history of our WSA/NXS crew as well as when we retell our own individual experiences in life. Then from such retellings we learn to figure out what we exactly did to make things work for us. It's from these oral lessons we get and share with each other face to face that we learn the bulk of our know-how, wisdom, and ideas in what we called Business and Marketing. It was only much later that we read real books on legit topics about Marketing and Advertising that we learned to isolate working variables and give them names. Otherwise, the many stuff we know originate from Pathei-Mathos of our past real world based experiences. With something like real world experiences, every type of experience can yield very useful information. For example Kayla's mind games she once played may not have yielded for her money, status, soldiers, or whatever, but the wisdom and understanding she gained from her experiences to us are immensely valuable.

If you take a closer look at something like our 352 Nexion – keeping all this in mind – you'll come to understand that first there is the individual person's experience or Pathei-Mathos. Second such experiences become oral teachings born from an understanding or buddhi of such experiences. Only later – if ever – do some of the oral teachings get articulated into written format. What is written to be shared by the ONA Kollektive is not everything.

We've used this blog to write at least 1000 pages worth of stuff, and even that does not express all of our oral teachings or aural lessons. There are many things which we have not written that may be considered "too much" to say, which some of our oral history might imply. For example Kayla today can sit you down and by word of mouth explain and teach you step by step how to brainwash the living shit out of somebody. Lynzie with her past experiences refined to methodologies can sit you down and explain and share with you how to emotionally manipulate young recruits to kill and go to jail for life and never appear to have anything to do with what happened. Lynzie has her own people manipulating experiences that's worth retelling with names and certain things changed to keep things safe.

Back when Shugz was a ninth grader at a high school she went to she exclusively hung out with Asian and a specific Vietnamese gang local to the area. Shugz's mother is Vietnamese and in real life she ethnically identifies with Vietnamese people and Vietnamese gangs, back during her high school years at least. She was extremely racist back then, meaning if you weren't Vietnamese, she hated you and thought you were stupid, this includes all other Asian ethnicity. Her two big influences are her own older brother who is a OG in DMA and a Vietnamese gang, and her father's friend who was a Viet Cong soldier.

At the school the school was divided into Mexican and Asian gangs, with Black gangs being a minority. There was a huge Mexican gang with little satellite Mexican gangs at this school. Then on the Asian side the Vietnamese gang she hung out with was the biggest gang in her city. The other Asian gangs at her school were allies of the gang she hung out with. Shugz was also stuck up. Her older brother, and older guy friends were all old timers in this Vietnamese gang, so she had a certain amount of status in their social order. She used her rank and status well by not ever mixing or getting too involved with low ranking members. The only reason why she would come and talk to you as a low ranking member was either to carry out something she was asked to do, or to just manipulate you to do something for her.

During one of the classes she had Shugz said there was a stupid Mexican girl who kept on looking at her funny. She never confronted this Mexican girl for looking at her funny. She instead picked out the brother of this girl whom we'll call "Roscoe." Roscoe was in the tenth grade at the time and was a member of one of those small satellite Mexican gangs at the school. In the silence of her mind Shugz said that she had set for herself an objective, which was to have Roscoe dead before the school year was over. To teach the Mexican bitch [his sister] not to look at her funny anymore.

Half the school year passes by until an opportunity arose in the form of a new recruit we'll call "Jimmy." Jimmy had a glitch in his personality Shugz would dig into. His glitch was that he was a wordy show off always talking shit about other people and always mouthing off about how tough he was.

Using normal manipulative high school stuff Shugz allegedly spent the rest of the school year spreading rumors through her network of friends so that Roscoe and Jimmy would end up hating each other. One basic thing she did was simply tell a friend she had that the new guy Jimmy liked Roscoe's girlfriend. This friend she allegedly told this to of course was a friend or a friend of Roscoe's girlfriend. Another basic and normal thing she did was allegedly start rumors by lying to her Asian girl friends that Roscoe and his friends were talking shit about Jimmy. She did this kind of stuff for the rest of the school year. From being popular in the school social order, she knew that being a new student at the school and not really knowing anybody, Jimmy is trying to figure out ways to establish himself and gain respect from his Asian friends, and the rest of campus in general.

Predictably, Jimmy started to talk shit about Roscoe; which then of course made Roscoe talk shit about Jimmy. And accordingly – to his personality glitch – Jimmy also started to talk a whole lot of shit about teaching Roscoe a lesson for talking shit about him and disrespecting him. Once Jimmy started talking this stuff, Shugz allegedly made her Move by leaving her "lofty" rank and status to develop a close bond with Jimmy. But she did it so that the most respected OG of the Vietnamese gang they were both affiliated with was in the middle of their friendship. Meaning that she introduced Jimmy to her friend who had a huge amount of social creds Jimmy looked up to. She only talked to Jimmy when he hung out with her OG friend. So it was a three way bond. The reason was because being a girl, Shugz has a natural know-how of manipulating people. She knew Jimmy looked up to her OG friend, she knew Jimmy was a show off, she knew Jimmy wanted to do something to impress her OG friend. So she used her OG friend to push Jimmy into a direction she wanted him to go. She did this by bringing up Roscoe and his shit talking of Jimmy in front of her OG friend, and telling Jimmy in front of this OG friend that he had to do something about that shit talker or he'll make the other guys [their gang's clique] look like pussies to these Mexicans. Her OG friend and his friends agreed with Shugz and just suggested that Jimmy "handle business." That suggestion from an OG Jimmy looked up to was all Shugz needed to push Jimmy.

She dropped more suggestive ideas and manipulated his feelings for a few more weeks. Until Jimmy was walking around campus talking about how he was going to "teach" Roscoe "a lesson." In front of his OG friends at their lunch breaks Jimmy would just say over and over again so he can be heard that he was going to teach Roscoe a lesson real soon. Shugz said every time he shot his mouth off like this, she would taunt him by saying: "You ain't gunna do shit Jimmy," and she and her other top ranking friends laughed at him.

One month before the school year was over Shugz said she, her OG friend, his other friend, Jimmy and one of her top ranking girl friends ate lunch together at a McDonald's across the street from the school. Roscoe and his couple of friends walked in to the McDonald's. Shugz said as soon as she saw Roscoe, she said out loud so Jimmy and Roscoe can both hear [to her Jimmy]: "There's your shit talker." Jimmy looked at Roscoe. And just like two normal low ranking guys, they verbally confront each other by yelling at each other. The manager of the McDonald's asked them to leave. So the two boys went outside to continue their verbal altercation. Shugz said that her OG friend and his friend had left to go outside to back up Jimmy from his friend because it looked like the two boys were gunna fight. Shugz and her street sister said they stayed inside eating their lunch and giggling to themselves as they watched through the window. The two boys were said to go face to face and nose to nose pushing each other. She said her their two OG friends were telling Jimmy to kick Roscoe's ass and that they'll back him up if his friends jump in. But Jimmy didn't fight Roscoe.

Shugz said that instead of fighting, Jimmy screamed out loud at Roscoe saying: "I'm gunna fucking kill you bitch! Watch! You're fucking dead punk!" She said he walked off and was not seen for the remainder of the school day. He was missing for two school days before Jimmy came back to school. By then people were saying that Jimmy was a bitch for walking away from a fight. Shugz in front of her OG friend confronted Jimmy quietly pushing and taunting him telling him that he shouldn't have stayed away from school and walked away from the fight cuz everybody was calling him a pussy and he's making their friends in their gang look bad. Her OG friend just said it's his problem and he needs to be man enough to handle business. Shugz said that Jimmy quietly explained to the OG and her why he was missing for two days. He explained that he was going to "take out" Roscoe and needed to get hold of a gun and steal a van. He opened his back pack to show the OG and Shugz a gun, and quietly said that he and one of the other guys were going to "take care of business" after school. He storms off.

Shugz said that she was partly very scared, but partly numb at the time. She said the others at break looked their way to find out what was wrong with Jimmy and what he showed them. They shook their head and said it was nothing and the OG said something in Vietnamese which Shugz doesn't understand. She said everybody went quiet and the OG just told Shugz and everybody to stay away from Jimmy for the week and not be seen with him or shit's gunna go down big time. The OG told Shugz to call her mom to make sure she comes to pick up Shugz that day after school and that she is seen by somebody at all times and not to say shit about Jimmy or anybody.

Shugz said that on the way home in the car she was quiet and had the window down to listen. She said she didn't hear nothing and thought Jimmy pussied out.

The next day at school Shugz said that the cops were all over campus and the Mexicans all looked extremely angry at all the Asians walking by, and many of their girls were crying. Shugz was told by her friends not to look at them and to just go to class and shut up. On the school loud speakers in the morning she said the principle came on and asked everybody to have a moment of silence. The principle quickly explained that Roscoe died yesterday and that councilors were up at the office for anybody who needs to talk and the police officers were just present to keep people safe at school. In the school's past a big gang war sparked on campus between the big Mexican gang and the big Asian gangs, which spilled into the surrounding area for a few days.

She tells us that the cops were on campus for the entire week to keep the Mexican and Asians from starting a gang war on campus. The tension she said was very high, and many times the Mexican side yelled out cuss words at the OG friend of Shugz. Her OG friend a few times had to yell back at them: "I didn't do shit. I already got questioned by the cops alright!" She said that many Mexican girls were crying and that the Mexican girls vented their shit at her and her friends but she said that she didn't know what had happened. During the week the cops were calling up every Asian and Mexican connected to both Roscoe and Jimmy to ask them questions. Thing with Shugz is that she actually is the type to look and act like an angel. She's very petite in size and looks like a big dork. So it's a stretch of one's imagination to connect someone like her to something like this that happened.

She said her heart was beating so bad it felt like it was going to fly out of her mouth when she was called up to the principle's office. She was already prepped by her OG friend and her other friends what questions they might ask. Her OG friend also informed Shugz his version of events which did not include Jimmy showing him his back pack. She was told to not say anything, to say she doesn't know anything, and only mention the McDonald's incident if they [the cops] bring it up. Otherwise she is not to say any names and just act stupid. Shugz knew the cops prime suspect was Jimmy since he was missing from school all week and since a lot of people knew Jimmy and Roscoe did not like each other. So at the office she said she just acted like she didn't know anything, and that when the cops pressed her to talk about the McDonald's incident that she down played it and tried to make it sound like a petty argument, but that she tried not to use people's names. When she was asked to identify who the two kids in the McDonald's incident were, she said she told them that she only knows Jimmy by his street name, and that they hung out in the same area on campus but were only acquaintances. The cops asked Shugz if she was gang affiliated and she told them that they were just her friends on campus but otherwise she was normal. That was it.

Just as the school year was coming to an end things had died down and the cops were gone. Everybody on campus knew now who done it and what had happened since the police and caught the suspect. What had happened that day after school as Jimmy and a friend of his from their same gang had stolen a van. Jimmy's friend had the van and was waiting. Jimmy knew that Roscoe walked home down a certain street past a certain structure with a large yard. This was where the van was parked. That day Jimmy had ditched his last period and was waiting at this structure for Roscoe. Jimmy and his friend pulled Roscoe into the yard and one of them shot Roscoe in the back and head with two and took off in the van. The van was found partly burned on a freeway shoulder all the way out in Washington D.C. Where Jimmy had relatives.

We asked Lynzie – after all these years that past – if she feels guilty or responsible for what happened. Usually she just shrugs and says: "I don't know," fast, then changes the subject.

She won't talk about this experience unless you press her to talk about it. But she'll share with you what she learned from her experience. What she learned is nothing moral or spiritual. She'll most likely tell you she learned that when you manipulate people, it's easier to find the "right" kind of people who "already are affected" and that you just push them further in a direction they are already naturally going in. What she means is that you don't manipulate any random people. You have to pick those already with a personality trait you need in the person. Jimmy was already that "type" or right type of person because he was a loud mouth and bragged a lot, and was a show off who had the need to impress people. Roscoe was already the confrontational type who was already the type to make boulders out of stones with things just to make himself look cool to his friends and girlfriend. These boys were just pushed into the direction they were already moving into anyways. All Shugz may have done was help them "get to know" each other. She'll also teaches us orally from her own experiences that social status and social creds is very useful as a tool to get things done.

So this is oral teachings or aural lessons. As you can see they are just narrated stories based on individual experience. Each individual learns things from such experience and may in time study their experiences and refine their methods. The teachings and lessons are the methods that can be extrapolated out of these past Pathei-Mathos. I tried to break some of our stories down into each functioning variable and then articulate in an intelligent manner how each method of manipulation and influence worked and how to apply them, but it ended up being 50 pages long and a little too revealing in certain respects.

Too revealing in this sense just means that how our WSA works when we write and do things for the ONA happens inside a cloud of Glamour. And that even if it is known that what we may say and do or reproduce is Glamour, we still have to keep that Glamour up anyways. But I try and drop hints all over the place when I use words like "upaya" and when I try to explain that sometime "Rhetorical Devices" are used to actualize something completely different then what you would expect from thinking in linear terms. That is all I will say. If you "get it" then you will understand that it is pointless to argue and debate what the ONA – and we – may say and write, believing that what is written in public is "ideology" or "teachings." It's like a stage Magician where that when he is on stage doing his ticks he uses misdirection to keep the audience attention pointed in one direction so his hands can be doing something else.

The unfortunate thing with mundanes and a lot of ONA people is that they tend to be more of the type that reads and collects their knowledge from written material. And so the written word is as deep as they will bother looking and thinking in terms of. Such types will often pick a written statement the ONA may have said or written and debate or argue in an intellectual and rational sense the "merits" of what they see written. For example if I you were a child playing with a toy I thought was dangerous for you to play with, what I can do is upaya the situation and point to the moon to distract your attention and say: "Did you see that! Did you see that UFO fly around the moon to the dark side! Damn, I believe in UFO's too." As such mundanes it is as if they are distracted by the finger pointing to this moon and caught up in the word or statement they commence to debate the merit and validity of UFO and secret lunar bases on the dark side of the moon. Never realizing that it could all very well be a means to simply distract you so this toy can be hidden. And a quick example which I won't go into any detailing is when the ONA or more specifically us here pushes the anti-state rhetoric. All I can say is that to me, it's funny when people pick at such statements pushed. A clue is that in my past I used a lot of pro-Asian racial rhetoric and anti other race rhetoric. Do I believe those statements? No. Then why make such statements? To manifest an a group to tag and sell dope. Using the race rhetoric makes my job a lot easier because it draws in those that resonates with my rhetoric. But once the group is formed, we have more "important" things to do than talk shit about race.

I've also dropped plenty of hints here about how our WSA Nexion works. I've tried to show you that in our experiences in the real world, things work better if you first start out with an end Objective then come up with small bite sized Moves to take you closer to actualizing your Objectives. Such Moves must be adaptable to circumstances.

I tried once to explain this method of using Moves to materialize end goals and I shared with my mundane friend that he needs to learn to take small subtle steps towards his end goals. And partly confused and partly argumentative my mundane friend said that my way didn't sound right. He asked me: "Why not just make a single huge big move and get thing over and done with?" A little irritated I asked my mundane friend where he got this idea he just blurted out at me. From a persona experience of his where such single huge moves were successful, or did he just say it to say it because that was his reasonable opinion. He said it was his opinion, and I told him I don't wish to speak any further with him about this topic, if we were just going to play some "toss the old opinion" around.

How do you go up to a 15 year old kid and make one huge move and say: "Here's a spray can, vandalize a wall boy." Or: "Here's a gun. Go shoot somebody and spend the rest of your life in prison boy. Do something." Or: "Here sell this bag of weed. Make your self useful." How do you go up to a random girl or guy and say: "Yeah, quick sleep with me before I change my mind." You take little bite sized steps in dating towards a clearly defined desired Objective: to score. War works in the same way. You don't make a single big move to get things over with? You first have to collect as much intelligence as possible about your enemy. Then send in covert agents to work the field. When the war starts you make bite size moves and work to take out the infrastructure, freeze their economy, get allies to stop shipping goods to them, take out major factories, energy grids, etc. Then you do the ground battle.

We have in mind an end Objective for the ONA within different frame works of time, when our nexion does things. We ask ourselves, where and what do we want the ONA to be 3 years from now, 5 years from now, 10 years from now. Then we take each time frame and its Objective and we break it down into barely noticeable steps. If you notice it, then we're doing something wrong. You only notice it when the objective comes into actualization. Or you notice what we are doing if you are an associate and think like us. AL and the OG's knows where our nexion wants the ONA to be and what it should look like 10 years from now, since we're on the same page and mindframe. Each group just does their own thing to Move the ONA to that 10 year Objective. In plane English, relocation out of its current market and Expansion into a completely new and bigger market is the 10 year Objective. There are little bitty Moves that must be taken to make that Objective real. All I'll say is that I couldn't care any less than I do if every living human being in the West hates and dislikes the ONA. The West is just a place for us to find Associates – meaning Business Partners – for a future Move.

So this essay was just a way for me to show the ONA Kollektive that there is Something beneath the written words. Like something we in the ONA call various things like "Pathei-Mathos," and "Aural Traditions." Our personal experiences happens first. The gnosis – Buddhi – of our personal experiences and struggles happens second. From that gnosis or wisdom and understanding gained from our Pathei-Mathos we will then have a small corpus of unwritten know-how and wisdom which we each either use in our own lives and/or teach our close friends and associates by spoken word of mouth and example. Only later; as a means to communicating to the larger Kollektive; does the written stuff come. But that written stuff is mixed with gravy and rhetorical devices. Most of what we write and do is in tune to the ONA's Sinister Dialectic.

These mundanes will come by any of our blogs and seeing written junk, they will be oblivious or just simply unable to understand that there could be real people behind such written junk which real people could be learning their shit from doing stuff in the real world. In their oblivious ignorance or arrogance they believe the ONA is the written junk they see. Or actually they believe the ONA to be the 30 pages or few essays they have read "this one time." They never ask themselves where the ideas beneath some of the written junk comes from, and what other written junk might be trying to actualize. From my own experience in life and based on my state of mind, when AL or DM writes something, my first thought isn't: "Cool, more ideology!" The very first thought that comes to my mind in such cases is: "Okay, what is this rascal trying to do? Where is he going with this?" I don't even consider what has been written yet. I wait for him to write two or three more stuff. This way I get a rough picture of what direction he is Moving into and perhaps a rough reason. Then I come behind and do my part of the business however I can. It's like the graphs you work with in geometry and such types of math where your figuring out lines and slopes etc. One dot on a graph does not give you a sense of direction. I wait for a few more dots to show up. Then I can trace a line to connect the dots to give me a rough feel of a direction. Once I know which direction to Move into, then I'll Upaya the hell out of everything to help make things happen.

Based on me knowing myself, and knowing the cousins, and friends I associate with who are now WSA, I know that we have more to our stuff than what we write. So because of this when AL and company talks about Aural Traditions and Pathei-Mathos, I can fully appreciate these things for what they are. So with this frame of mind, when I meet another ONA person or ONA nexion I know or assume that such persons and nexion have more substance to them than the written letter. That they have a large amount of personal learning in unwritten format, which to me may be the more valuable stuff of the ONA. My friends and I try to use our unwritten stuff we have accumulated to Move the ONA. I've shared some stories grounded in things the major personalities of our nexion have done or allegedly may have done to infer what we may have learned and may be using.

Actually we've been using these oral teachings of ours from the beginning and we even tell the Kollektive quite openly. I've stated frequently that I came to change and alter the ONA to help it become something new. To this, I've further stated that I went looking for the shot callers and "popular kids" in the ONA social structure to develop a bond and Rapport with them. This is all simple stuff my friends and I learned from our past experiences. If you want to influence a social order, get to those at the top of the social order. I would have gotten nowhere if I tried to sell my crazy ideas by debating and arguing with every little ONA member and considering their individual opinions. We all have opinions about everything. Most have no foundation or substance to show and prove with. But this is just how I personally work based on what worked for me in my past. After you've tried to make a crew or gang from scratch where you try to sell people ideas of vandalizing walls, selling dope, and fighting people, and going to juvenile hall and jail, selling memes like ONA memes is easy. It's not like I have to put in the effort to convince people to commit crimes. Chances are – as Lynzie would say – you're already the type. The ONA is just pushing you in that direction. That's all. You're already a Lion with your Nature. All we are doing is giving you some meat to whet your pallet, and pointing at a big crowd of gazelles. Some of you ONA Lions will pick things up real quick and let your Sinister Instincts guide you. Some of you might need a friendly nudge in the "right" direction. Then some of you need "stronger medicine." Don't be so near sighted where you stumble on written letters like the mundanes do. Look in the distance for the end Prize and make your Moves.

We each in our own hearts and mind, know that there is more to us than what we may write and share in written format. We each know that we each have a huge body of wisdom and know-how we have amassed over the many years we have been alive. The ONA is just a collection of the amoral, sinister, and antinomian kind who have come together to share ideas, share oral traditions, trade secret recipes, with each other so that we each will have more wisdom and know-how to get our respective work done. It's just that with an Ordering of associates scattered around the world, the internet is a useful tool to transmit ideas. And so, since writing letters is one of few means to transmit ideas across the medium of cyberspace, our amassed oral lessons must in most cases be written down to be shared. As ONA we understand there is a source for what we write, which is our individual Pathei-Mathos. And considering the type and kind of people attracted to the ONA, our Pathei-Mathos may not always be cute and nice or acceptable to mundanes. It just might be experiences with mindfucking people for a year and ruining their life, or starting crews and gangs, or Sinister Cloaking to get people to kill.

Sometimes what we teach as the ONA Kollektive is the kind of stuff that must be put into motion in the real world to actually Learn something. Reading about the aural past history Kayla had or I had or Lynzie had does nothing to teach you in a practical way. You have to take the working variables or methods of each story shared and experiment with things in your own lives to actually personally Reap your Lessons. Therefore, it has nothing to do with what is written. Like a cookbook. You don't learn Practical Wisdom from memorizing and agreeing with the written recipes. It's in the attempt at putting those recipes in causal motion [praxis] that the real learning and gnosis is borne. Don't be like these mundanes and believe that you are ONA because you've read a few or a thousand pages of stuff. You [and I] are ONA because of what we first learn from each other, then second from what we put into causal motion in each of our lives.

Like many of our Kollektive say: "It is a Doing." The Pathei-Mathos is born from our Doings. Our Gnosis is born from our Doings. Our aural lessons are born from our Doings. What we share and teach is born from our Doings. And all that we take and add to our Doings.

They can ask: "But what are you doing?" The simple answer for me is that I have been "Doing" shit since junior high. A certain type of shit most people might not agree with. I can say that the type of shit my friends and I do in life for the most part, is not the usual stuff an average person does in life. My friends and I never grew out of our Nature, we grew From it. Kayla never stopped mindfucking people. 10 years from now you'll get the punch line. I've never stopped making crews that attract those with an amoral criminal element. I am helping make the ONA. But at the same time as adults, we have other interests such as legit business, our families and clans, that we now think about and Do also. Then there is the future progeny my friends and I will have and we are now concerned with what culture and tradition will be their doings. I learn new ways of Doing things from the rest of the ONA. I add this to my already present repertoire. And I keep doing what I have been doing, just with more techniques, methods, and ways of seeing certain problems. But at the same time I choreograph what I do in my personal life to help in some way the Sinister Dialectic and to help actualize an ONA 10 years from now.

Basically the general rule of thumb is to Do the opposite of what those mundanes do. If they live as individualized prey, you tribalize as predators to take advantage of what them. If they are dependent on the State, you work at achieving genuine independence or self reliance and communal cooperation in some way. But all that we do should be Aeonically rooted for those next in line [our progeny] who will come after we are gone. Like bees working collectively for Our Unborn. We are each cells of an Order. Each like bees tending our own receptive Cells which is our own personal sphere of life and our field of influence. Together – Kollektively – every Cell makes a Hive. Then when we die, our progeny will inherit this Hive or Order, which will be their means to live, do, and make thing happen in their time and world. If you think about it, a hive of bees in a natural environment does not "take over" or "rule" their environment. They are just a Collective of things that cooperatively work and live with and for each other. But it's the very little and most often unnoticeable things each little bees does that ends up in time having a huge influence on their environment. What I speak of is that bees fly around collecting nectar and pollen, and in doing so they fertilize or pollinate each flower, which causes a causal chain reaction of fruits growing, animals benefiting from these fruits, and seed developing to seed the next generation of crops. The bees themselves are a tiny part of a causal chain with a niche in this causal chain. By themselves they are just a hive of bees. In this causal chain they help set in motion – with Time – they influence their entire environment.

All this talk of bees reminds me of a documentary I watched last month. I was bored and had an hour or so to kill so I was surfing for a cool documentary to watch. I found one that was oddly titled "The History of Cold." I was wondering to myself how can anybody talk about the temperature cold of for an hour and a half?! Those English people will make a documentary out of anything! So I had to watch this doc out of curiosity, not for the history of the cold, but for the poor English guy who had nothing else better to do but talk about the cold for an hour. The doc turned out to be very fascinating on many levels.

It started off way back in time – like the 1700?s – where in England some guy with a barrel of water one winter walked outside and noticed that his barrel of water had frozen and busted his barrel into pieces again just like last winter and the winter before. And so he wondered what cold was and how the cold was busting up his barrels. Back then the doc said the English people believed that whatever cold was it was something like a fog of stuff that crept its way into water turned it to ice and the stuff of coldness added more stuff to the water which makes the ice expand and crack barrels apart. It turns out that this particular Englishman was a scientist. So he started to work with water and ice and scales and barrels to figure out if the cold was actually some fluid added to the water. If so he posited that he would detect a difference in weight. So he filled a barrel with water and weighed it, then took it outside and waited for it to freeze and crack the barrel. Then he brought in the ice and cracked barrel and weighed everything. What he discovered would revolutionize how Europe understood cold and started a race of causal connection and time of the first human to get to Absolute Zero! What this first cold scientist discovered was that there was no change in weight! Which means the cold wasn't something from the outside, but something happening in whatever makes up water itself! The doc was so interesting I recommended it to all my friends.

The cold itself and the science of cold wasn't the part that fascinated me. What fascinated me was what the doc was not even talking about: Time & Causal Connections. The doc talked about everything from the past to the present understanding of Absolute Zero in such a way where you can see that one event caused and influenced a future one like a domino effect of cause across Time. But the doc did this in such a way where you wonder how what they were talking about is connected to the previous situation they talked about. Only after while did the reveal by implication the connections, or sometimes by just overtly showing you how they were connected.

My favourite part started off with two broke young Americans living in the Southwest of America. They were two brothers who were sitting in their back yard one winter trying to figure out what stuff in their large property they had which they could sell to make some money. Only problem was they had only two things: Rock and a huge frozen lake. They figured that everybody had rocks, so they had the genius idea of cutting the ice on the lake in their property up into chunks and sell them to people without ice.

The two brothers got so successful they sold ice to their whole city. And so they had the idea of expanding their business into a global enterprise to sell ice to places like India and Africa. They knew from their Pathei-Mathos of delivering ice that it takes more energy to melt ice than to make ice. Which meant to them that if the chunks of ice were big enough, you can ship them overseas and still make a killer profit even if the ice melted some. So they tried to pitch their crazy idea of shipping ice blocks over seas to every ship guy they could find, and they were laughed at. So what the two brothers did was they worked their ice business and saved up money to buy their own ship. They did so and a few years later they had their global ice shipping business, which grew to have a fleet of ships. And they became very wealthy revolutionizing how people of their time stored food.

The doc switches to some random guy hiking on ice in Alaska or somewhere in a different Time. This guy was a White guy who lived with the Eskimos and learned how to live off the fat of the land like them. He had learned how to ice fish from his Eskimo friends and so one day as he was hiking he went ice fishing. He caught some fish, ate them, and caught so much he brought them back home with him. Then he hung these frozen fish with other fish he had frozen. Later he took his more recent batch of fish to cook and he noticed that these fish he caught did not have a bad taste. They tasted fresh unlike the many fish he ate before which he caught and froze. So he wondered to himself why they tasted fresh.

After staring at fish freeze on his front door post real closely, he noticed something. He could see that ice crystals were forming in the fish in big crystals. He then theorized to himself that when you slowly freeze meat, large ice crystals form in the cells and busts open the cells causing damage to the meat which made that bad taste. But when meat is rapidly frozen in temperatures 40 below like the ice fish he had caught, the freezing is so cold and rapid that the ice crystals forms very small in size and did not cause cellular damage. From this theory this guy made a company that rapidly froze meat in special freezing units. By himself this guy gave birth to the entire industry of frozen food and TV Dinners, becoming very rich of course.

You're left wondering how this guys discovery was connected to the two brother's story. The causal connection is that the frozen food guys industry killed the ice shipping industry and put it to death. Then later a guy inspired by Michael Faraday's experiments with the cold invented the refrigerator, which was causally connected to the frozen meat guy, because now regular families can store his frozen meats inside their home refrigerators for long periods of time. In Turn this caused an urban boom in big cities like New York.

The only thing I got out of this doc was that Time happens in successions of causal chain events that are interconnected to each other where that each era or time period is literally built onto of or springs into existence from the Time+Causality of a previous era or Time period. And the whole process happened from there one era on top of another's causal events. It's almost like watching animals evolve into more sophisticated creatures, except in this case the "animals" are Frames of Time+Causation.

Because of this way of seeing things, I reflected back in my own life, and the world around me and I realized that very little causal inputs considered over successions of Time build up to help cause more bigger and sophisticated stuff. Or in a different way, little things inside the Flow of Time+causation had big influences. Just like how little bees doing their individual little and seemingly insignificant things, in the unfoldment of Time and Causation adds up to huge influences. The Influence comes from little causes that causes other causes to arise. Like a domino effect across Time.

This was also how people like Lynzie "works" with people to influence them over time to end up doing something like fulfilling an Objective she had set. She manipulates little changes, but makes it so that each change and manipulation she inputted helps cause something slightly bigger in Time. And she keeps doing this until the "energy" or momentum heats up and bursts. This is also how Kayla did her work with people. She makes little Moves and pushes these people in small directions. But in such a way that each Move she makes causes something a little bigger to happen until she manifest her Objective. Then this is also how I worked with people. I used to use small Moves to move new recruits into small situations or circumstances which causes new occurrences to arise in Time, which progressively build up over Time and Casual unfoldment into something big. But this happens with many things in the real world such as college. You put in small efforts initially, and in the process of the unfoldment of Time+Causal chain reactions, it builds up into life changing events of new careers, extra money, a wife or husband, a nice house, children, money to raise them well, money to give them a proper education later in life, retirement money, and so on. Small inputs in a stream of moving Time and Causation gradually builds up into big things. Conveniently for us in the ONA there is the word Aeonics which for me catches this concept I'm trying to talk about into a single word to use. When I use this word Aeonics, most of the Time, this is what I mean.

It can be stated within reason that the ONA is very small and insignificant and thus has no influence. This in a myopic near sighted understanding of Time and Causation is logical and even accurate. Lynzie is not even a hundred pounds. She is also small and compared to millions of people in her city is also pretty insignificant. But when in the past she inputs the "right" causal input to give rise to chains of events over long periods of Time, she was able to force herself [influence] onto others in such a way that over time she serious fucked up a lot of human lives and ruined many families. Same thing with Kayla. At face value Kayla look retarded because she is blonde and giggles at everything. But when she gets serious and puts her mind to it, and inputs the right causal inputs which sets into motion a Causal chain reaction over Time, she was able to ruin people's entire life. But they aren't anything to others like say Buzz Aldrin who started as a crawling baby and ended up to walking on the moon. Or a Marx or Hitler who were just one man or two men with an idea. It's not the one man or idea. It's what they do with such ideas and how they make such ideas set into motion a Causal chain reaction over the flow of Time.

If a very small Lynzie or a very overlookable Kayla can in Time and Causality have so much influence on other people's lives; and if a single Marx or Hitler can in Time and Causality set into motion all they did: Then what about a Collective of many people in the ONA? It can be dismissively said by those myopic mundanes who do not understand Time and Causation and their interconnected dance for them to say that the ONA is small, and insignificant to them, and has no visible influence. This is true in a snap shot still framed way of seeing Time and Causation. But it's not the size that counts. It's what you do in Time and Causation. Or how you do what little you can do that build up causally over Time. One DM with a hand full of ideas over the flow of 39 years influenced and inspired – and still does – the minds of many people in his Future, which is us in the present. Today when we seriously consider the number of people who are inspired or influenced by DM in some way, along with all the causal events that he caused, which caused more and bigger events to arise, we can't say that he has no influence without being dismissive.

Closing Remarks

Our oral history to us is colorful. There is nothing inherently spiritual or mystical about where we came from. But to us its a rich history. Rich in our individual experiences and the many things we each learned from our Pathei-Mathos: our experiences, tribulations, struggles, suffering, and experimentation. All together, counting all our friends and relatives in WSA, our oral teachings would add up to many, many books. Most of these remain unwritten but we use these oral lessons to teach each other how to do our work better. What I end up writing is only a small fraction of what is unwritten. The source of my knowledge base is this large body of spoken teachings, which are born from our own experiences in life.

Sometime around the year 2007 Kayla took her manipulation skills to make her WSA real. What she did was virtually annex the old DMA/NXS group by manipulating the right people. At first through people like me to get to my cousins and their friends. With the guys she basically sold them the idea of using the letters "WSA" but gave it a couple different, more street oriented meanings, to make it appealing to her target audience. DMA was just old and had no more meaning because most of its membership were aged out and not tagging anymore. So the guys ended up dropping that name and using NXS/WSA. The next thing Kayla did was gradually collect all the girls in our group and sell her ideas to us by making us think about the future and the condition of life our future children will be living. The idea was to basically establish a sisterhood as a coherent vehicle and means to impart unto our future children the wisdom and knowledge base we each gather, so that our future children may have the tools needed to live comfortably. The vehicle was also to be a tribe in time and its main objective is to work together to start up legit businesses to be more financially independent. Kayla sold her idea and what happened was all the girls in our group came together and spent some time manipulating the right guys in our group to change the rest of the group to fit the vision Kayla had. And the rest is history.

Our little nexion was never really about ideology and writing. It was pretty much just a group of people who did various things together. Then from what things we did – as in our experiences – we ended up learning a lot of things. And not every thing we did was scribbling on walls and criminal. A lot of the stuff we do are things like pool our money and start up Mutuals. We have brothers in our group that learn or have known how to invest in the stock market. So these brothers are put in charge of what mutual accounts we set up to grow that money. We also help each other start up local businesses. Everything from pool cleaning services to dry walling to home maintenance to computer and electronics repair shops. We get our collective work ethics from our Asian aunts and uncles we learn by example from and we teach by example the non-Asian brothers and sisters in our group to do things in this collective way. And so, the verbal or oral stuff that we have to teach each other with is a huge and diverse body of information that really has absolutely nothing to do with the occult. It's only the juveniles in our group – our younger cousins and their friends – that go out and tag for fun, and we encourage them to get their ABC's out of their system at that age. But when you turn 18 you are expected to age out and act like an adult. But their juvenile delinquent play teaches them skills that we value. The skill of being able to be a part of a collective and work for that collective to help each other live well and prosper.

And so it came to pass that in the year 2008 Kayla brought the top people in the NXS/WSA and ask them the question: How do you guys Duplicate what you have here? How do you replicate this ethos, this cooperative work ethics, this tribalism that you guys have here, out there for the rest of the ONA. Since by this time our group had annex the ONA as an additional means to help us form out tribe. So that was the challenge that she unofficially gave for us to try and do. The challenge is that the ONA is first scattered around the world. So how do you teach these other people in writing how to duplicate and replicate what we have? The second challenge is that those other ONA people might not be Asian where they have been exposed to a collective [clan] way of life and work ethics of self reliance and financial independence. How do we via the medium of writing and the internet duplicate this abroad? That's the challenge. And we know actualizing this challenge will take Time. We're talking decades of Causal chain reactions. But the way that we have learned to make such Causal chain reactions happen is by making small Moves. And with each small Move we use a heavy dose of "Glamour" in a non-linear way to help materialize this duplication effort. To help forge in Time a functioning Kollektive out of what is the "ONA" abroad. Rhetorical Devices will have to be used.

From our past experiences our focus of where we are applying pressure to make Causal things happen in Time has shifted. Over the past years we have learned from failure, trial, and error, that you can't take a 30 year old know it all Homo Hubris and change him to see and do what we see and do. In our past with recruiting young cousins and people we've learned that it's much easier to work with the young. From what little I have learned on the streets, if you give me a 13 year old, 14, or 15, year old, and I feel that juvenile; in one year I can turn him into a tagger, a banger, a dealer, a Buddhist, a Satanist, a college student, a whatever. Our refocus is based on what we have come to know of cultural liquidation. To liquidate the faux culture of those mundanes and their Western Homo Hubris subspecies, you have to own the youth. You have to transmit your social information to the most receptive. Each young generation absorbs a little more social information, and in Time, that faux culture is chipped away bit by bit. We no longer give a shit about what a 30 or 40 year old mundane thinks of the ONA. They will die in Time and take their lofty opinions with them. As Hitler says: He who owns the youth, owns the Future. Our focus on Expanding the ONA is two fold. First to Expand it abroad into Asia which has more people, and which region we have a natural understanding of since most of us are Asian. Second is to slowly hit up each emerging young generation in the West. Upaya, slight of hand Rhetoric will have to be used. If you can't see past the Glamour, you weren't meant to be in the eye of the storm, to see things from that inside point of view.

That last sentence will make no sense unless you are intimately familiar with Theravada Buddhism. There is an Outer Shell visible to Theravada. This can be seen in the cultural customs of our people and in the various mythos and beliefs. Beneath that culture and dhamma, is Upaya and those that weave that upaya like many of the elders and monks. Most don't every penetrate the Outer shell to ever come to realize that the shell is all an upaya to make things happen. If you have the monks to pick at and the mind to look deeper beyond the upaya you end up in the eye of the storm. Which is Nothing. If and when you have found that nothing and really understand [buddhi] everything, you leave the Core back to the Outer Shell. And in knowing the Game, you Upaya with the elders and monks. It's something you don't have to communicate. It's a self realization [sambodhi]. If you are genuinely Ariya – of a Noble Mind and Character – you will in Time Realize the Game. You will Realize that you must help keep the storm Moving to influence each new generation of people in your field of influence to be the right type of person you need to maintain your social order, culture, ancestral identity, roots, and so on. In other words, it's all bullshit.

We come into this world with very few thing: with Nothing and Life, inside the matrix of what we call our world. Everything else beyond those few things is bullshit. But like the old people say, you need that bullshit as fertilizer for your crops to grow strong and healthy. Where each crop is each generation. They'll remind you not to pay mind to the cow shit, but to consider the fruit such crops yield. This is a concept of state of mind, or way of seeing things your generic common Westerner just doesn't not have nor understand. They literally lose themselves neck deep in bullshit, with their intellectualization of bullshit, their philosophizations of it, their debating of it, etc. They are oblivious the plants that grow from it, and never consider the fruit each plant in Time bares. I know my Buddhism is all bullshit. I am not attached or clingy to the bullshit. Being unattached and unclingly to things is actually a Buddhist practice. But I value it as fertilizer because I consider the Fruit the crops which grow from it bares to be of value. The crops being my old people, aunts and uncles, and cousins. The Fruit being everything that have manifested from our working big family, to our businesses, to the preservation of our roots and culture, etc. In that, the bullshit has value: because of what it Causally Yields as Fruit in Time. Therefore, when we each come to our own understanding of the value of the bullshit, we use it to fertilize the next batch of crops with.

The word for clingy or attachment is Tanha in Pali. But that doesn't really mean to be clingy or attached to things the way English defines these words. Tanha is like when you really like collecting Hot Wheels toy cars with a passion. Then one day WalMart has a special sale on rare Hot Wheels. So you and other passionate collectors pitch your tents outside of WalMart so you can get to these rare toy car models. When you finally make it inside, there is none left. Because of this you blow a fuse and get all enraged, and upset, and angry. The veins around your forehead is bulging and look like their gunna pop. That's Tanha. And so the Buddha comes along to you and says to you in that state: "Chill man. You're getting upset over small shit. Smoke a blunt and calm down. It's not the end of the world. Wait a month or so and try again. Don't be so fixated and myopic and attached to this shit." So with Tanha, that clingy or fixation on things ends up making you worried and upset and asshurt [dukkha]. It is your own fault for being stupid where that you have no real mastery or control over your own emotions, mind, actions, behaviour, and Self. Where that you allow things like toys, ideologies, words, stuff, anything, to manipulate you into a mess. There are people out there with some serious Tanha for the ONA. These people who blow a fuse and get all asshurt over ONA or what ONA says or teaches. Get the fuck over it.

When you're a Buddhist and you have the resource of elders and monks your Buddhism comes with what are call ancestral traditions which are oral teachings our past old people have accumulated over time. And so in this regard, our Buddhism does come with what the ONA calls "Aural Traditions." So when you have access to such living oral traditions, your elders can verbally break things down for you so that you better understand things in Buddhism. For instance you may ask you elders why can't you be attached to things. They will tell you that it's a choice and that you can if you want, but you'll end up getting asshurt over things. Then they lay the aural traditional teachings on you. They'll explain to you to be unattached to things causes indifference. When you are indifferent to what you are looking at or involved with you then are able to see such things with objective clarity. When you can see things with objective clarity you can then use samadhi [concentration] to learn how such things function and work, When you have samadhied such things so that you objectively know how they work, you then have the Pan~n~a [cunning wisdom] to Control and Manipulate such things to produce other stuff in your favour and so on. So even with something like Buddhism there exist a whole body of oral/aural wisdom that is taught from generation to generation by word of mouth. And as a person without a living Sangha [Order or Community] you are cut off from this vital ancestral oral wisdom. Which is why the Buddha went so far as to say that you are NOT a Buddhist if you do NOT have all three jewels: Buddha, Dhamma, SANGHA.

There is a buddha, but there is more to that. There is dhamma, but then there is more to that to Buddhism. There is also the Sangha and its old growth living oral knowings, wisdom, and understandings such Community have collected and accumulated over the hundreds and hundreds of years. Which is as a part of Buddhism as the Buddha and the Dhamma. But your generic Westerner can't get themselves to understand this shit unfortunately. They read a few pages on the teachings of a Buddha by some English translator, and they think what they have read is Buddhism and the full breadth, width, and DEPTH of Buddhism. When in fact there is a 2500 year old Oral Body of Wisdom unaccounted for and unconsidered by these people. Then added to that each culture and people in Asia have their own ancestral oral teachings to go with that. And nobody ever bother to try and consider this vast body of wisdom in the West, because perhaps such people have become so engrossed or fixated or dependent on the written word, that what they cannot read and interpret and play word games with is not real and does not exist? Is this right? Am I being fair in my ascertainment of these hubris anariya Western mundanes? The only way for a person to get access to such bodies of oral lessons in Buddhism is for them to plug themselves into a Sangha and get to know other Buddhists in that Sangha. Then you put yourself in the right place and develop associations [sangha] with people who can pass that oral teaching to you.

Anyways, when you look closely at how we each do things in life to make things in a near future happen we will learn that making small Moves over Time and causal events, builds up to become big things. But you need some sort of know-how from practice and skill. You need to make mistakes, fail, and learn from these stumblings. A quick example to use is Shugz. Today, she likes to troll people for fun on the internet. She is everywhere online trolling people, from random yahoo news threads to places you would never expect to see her. We can look at what she does in a myopic fashion and think to ourselves that she is wasting her time just being a bug to people. But then you pay closer attention to what she is doing and things become more clearer. Most of the time when Shugz trolls people she gets her targets alone so that it's a one on one exchange. Once she gets this she turns the trolling into a battle of wits where she says things to get the other person to react, then she quickly blurts out something witty, and repeats this for an hour sometimes. If you ask her why she is doing this she'll tell you she is "sharpening her wits."

Then if you understand her cultural background things about her sharpening of wits begins to make more sense. In the Buddhist Khmer way of thinking there is Chlat meaning Smarts or Intelligent. Then there is something our elders and monks called Panya or Chna which in English should mean something like Cunningness, Cleverness, Foxy, Rascally, Crafty, and Manipulative. Those two words comes from the Pali "Pan~n~a" and its Sanskrit source "Prajna." Panya is usually for rascally boys that get into trouble and pick on others to get things their way. Chna usually is used to describe girls that have an attitude problem, are wordy, manipulative, and crafty where they will push people buttons and put people down or praise people, talk back, until they get things their way. Unfortunately religion has obscured the practical meanings of these words into goofy meanings. In our culture, our old people do not consider Intelligent people to be actually intelligent. It is the witty and cunning ones that have the brains to get things done in life. A highly educated nerd for example to a monk has a very weak point which is that the nerd is weak in wits and because of that the monk can out smart them.

I don't really mean wits. There is no real word in English for this function of Mind. It's the same mental function as when you get two Black guys who do battle each other with "Your Mama" put downs. One guy will say, your mama is so cross eyed she dropped a dime and picked up two nickles. Then the other guy off the top of his head has to make up an even better one. Or it's the part of the Mind being used when you get a group of Black guys and they are freestyling a rap and battling each other. Each person makes up a rap, then the next guy makes his rap to out do the previous guy. If you look closely, this has nothing to do with the function of memorizing ideas and recalling ideas. You make stuff up off the top of your head. This is also the same mental function that deals with problem solving. You go outside and see your frozen barrel of ice crack and wonder how this happen. You is no fucking ideas memorized or recollected. You have to figure that shit out one your own.

Your generic Intelligent Intellectual uses a different part of his brain. A stupid and primitive part that deals with memorization and recollection. You fill his piece of shit head with ideas. He memorized those ideas and big words. He recalls that and recollets them. He looks smart and intelligent. He react to stimuli by recalling what he remembered. You give him a stimulus like "Bats" and he'll draw out things he memorized about bats by telling you stuff like Mammal, Winged, Insectivore, duhduhduh. If you present information about bats that contradicts what information he was taught, he gets asshurt. You tell him that a bat is a reptile and he shits his pants. That isn't fucking THINKING. It's RECOLLECTION of implanted prewritten ideas. You're not thinking for yourself. Those intelligent ideas were put into your brain. If he is given a stimulus he is not familiar with, he will not be able to do anything with it, but perhaps shoot blanks by offering his opinions. We need this part of our brain, and its a useful part to use. But there is also that witty or cunning, or problem solving part that can also be used. And you can see that in may animals, they use this witty or clever part of their brains to solve problems. Have you ever seen army ants build boats with leave to migrate across a river?

In our culture wits is valued over intellectualism. One is practical, the other is a set of things you recall. It's what Shugz does with her wits that most of us don't see. She takes what she sharpens and uses her wits in real life to manipulate and abuse people to get everything her way and to also influence a lot of people in her life. Another thing she does when she trolls is practice setting small goals to make her trolls do, then she works small moves until she gets them to do what she wants. She also takes this into the real world to manipulate and abuse people.

One reason why what we call wits in English is more valued then intellectualism in our culture is that with rascally wisdom [Prajna] a monk can trick you and stop you from thinking. How they do this is by using their wits to figure out the causal chain of thinking which looks like this: Seed – Belief – Think – Do. Your actions are influenced by how you think. How you think is influenced by your beliefs. There is a reason or cause to why you believe the things you do. In time people change their minds or thoughts and opinion; but we do not change the Seed cause from which our beliefs and thinking arises. So with wits or cunningness you can figure out that our line of thought is a symptom of a Cause. If you do not like how a person thinks you therefore manipulate the Cause to change.

Changing the way a person thinks by debating them or convincing them to think differently requires hard work and is often futile. The harder you push, the more they fight. If you end up forcing your opponent to change his line of thinking, you have only temporarily fixed a problem because you neglected the deep seed as to why he thinks such thoughts in the first place. Why do theists or atheist think a god exists or does not exist? Because of their beliefset of paradigm. Why does a theist have the need to believe that a god exists? What is the emotional or psychological Cause? If you do not like a person being a theist, you change the cause, and therefore in Time stop him from thinking theistic beliefs. The only way you can do this is by out witting your target in such a way that you are able to gather information about what his mind and paradigm looks like and what elements might cause the emotional or psychological need to have such beliefs.

On a practical level with my past, to make new recruits I target young kids in between 13-15. Why do some people Do crime? Because they Think criminal thoughts. Why do they think such thoughts? Because of deep seated Beliefs patterns. Why do they have the need to have such beliefs? If I can figure out the Why or Seed cause, I can manipulate the kid to bang. To do this I have to develop a relationship with him. This opens the Rapport channel. If I dig around and I find out the kid comes from a broken home with no father figure I can theorize gangs gives him a sense of family structure he needs. Thus I introduce the kid to an older OG to give him a substitute father. If digging around I find out that perhaps he or his friend were picked on by a gang or that he may have lost family and friends to gangs, I use that to manipulate him to bang by making it look like I understand his hatred and that our crew hates those gangs he hates also. You pick up the rhetoric to manipulate the Seed cause, until he Believes. Hitler tells us: Lie to people long enough and they will Believe. The Thinking and Actions followed causally in due process. How did Shugz have an influence over her friend Jimmy? By out witting him and learning that how he acts and thinks had a deep cause. The cause which is a "glitch" where he needs the approval of others because he was physically abused by his father and feels less of a man. So he puffs himself up verbally and shows off. Once she figured this she pushed that button and made it so that he had an OG to impress.

How do you trick a Muslim into a terrorist? Your actions are influenced by your thinking. Your thinking is influenced by your emotional beliefs. There is a cause for such need to believe such things. You put the act and thinking to the side and figure out how to plant a Seed-Cause to induce a belief. This may be done by gaining an understanding of the guy's personal, sexual, and family life. Plant Seeds of how America is sticking its nose in his business. Tell him if the West can recognize Palestine as Israel, then what land will they take next from Muslims? Whatever make him feel differently until he believes. Once he believes the "Glamour" or Propaganda, you push him further and further little by little until you radicalize him. The thought process and actions naturally follows. As long as he has the Means to carry out [vent] that causal chain. Like sex, there is no point in building up heat if you don't get a "release" button. Doesn't matter how intelligent or educated or well read this person was. You can stop all the intellectual bullshit by attacking or manipulating the root Cause to change it or dismantle it.

There is another style of manipulation and mind game Shugz knows, practices and taught us called "Storming The Gates." It's something she learned from an Asian friend of hers who is really into psychological warfare. Storming the Gates is an old ninja psychological warfare technique they adapted from much older Chinese methods of ground warfare. Basically in the ancient days when you wanted to take over China you had to breach the Great Wall. It would make no practical sense in this case to focus your army's force on attacking thick stone walls. The easiest way to breach the wall is to Storm the Gates which was the wall's weakest points.

So later the Japanese ninjas took that idea and innovated it. The Nine Gates correspond to the 9 orifices a guy has. Girls don't count since we have a tenth hole somewhere. You figure that one out. 2 Eye gates, 2 nose gates, 2 ear gates, 1 mouth gate, 1 urethra gate, and 1 anus gate. Those 9 gates are metaphorically a person's weakest spots. The Western idea of attack the idea and not the person is non applicable here. If you don't like your enemy shooting at you, you don't attack his cannon balls you kill him to get rid of the problem. If a person is strong in intellect, got around that by either using force to breach his 9 gates or subtly manipulate a break in his 9 gates.

Eye gates is when you manipulate the way a person Sees things. Ear gates is when you manipulate what a person hears or you flood his ears with information you want him to hear, or you gain a control of what information goes into his ears/mind. Nose gate is harder to explain. When you smell something you briefly forget the real world and go into a day dream world where you enjoy a reliving of what you are smelling. Kayla for example is very good at storming a person's nose gates by doing what she calls Separating where she cleaves or divides a person's reality into a real world to reject and entraps them in a fantasy world of her making and narration. Breaching the mouth gate can either mean playing word games with a person so that he no longer know what he means when he talks, or it can mean to put words into the enemy's mouth in such a way that your enemy believes he could have said it.

The urethra gate is the sexual stuff of your enemy. James Bond is good at this. Or actually his enemies [the bad girls] are good at trying to storm his urethra gate to collect information. Breaching this gate can also mean to simply manipulate him sexually or to attack his insecurities. For example with Lynzie if she is trolling you and she detects the slightest effeminate character from you she will relentlessly pick on your for being a faggot and try to make you feel bad about being gay. Your anus gate represents either your secret matters or humiliation. Think spread some person's ass cheeks in public. It's humiliating. Doesn't matter how smart a politician is or how well he debates. You can take him out if you can find out ways to humiliate him: in the eyes of his powerbase [people]. The famous Pastor Haggard was taken out of business by having these two gates breached. He had a thing for doing speed and having gay sex with gay hookers, and this was used to humiliate him.

Somebody like Shugz in real life from trial and error figure out that if you can't attack an enemy's nine gates, you attack and manipulate the gates of everybody around him. This is something extra Shugz added to it after many failed attempts to take people down by this method. She said she was reading about how the Mongols when they went to Beijing to attack it, they first weakened Beijing by surrounding it and cutting off the city's supplies of food, water, and materials. Only when Beijing was weakened, did they try to storm Beijing's vulnerable gates. Basically what Shugz does is slowly storm everybody's gates around her victim to strangle his support and supply lines, by using what might be called propaganda. The objective is to induce isolation in her victim, then she works on storming his gates. Cults will use this same method to brainwash you by working to cut you off from the real world and your old friends and surrounding you with their people.

All this manipulation stuff takes long periods of time and a lot of energy. It's not something you can do in a day of debate, breaching, and trolling. It takes months and sometimes years. If you are going to dedicate so much time to manipulate someone like this, there must be a significant end goal worth working for. Shugz will dedicate 3 year to storm the right people or the powerbase. In any type of social order of social structure whether it's high school, the work place, or politics, the most popular people have the most friends and their rapport channels with all these friends means the top ranking people of any social order owns the power of influence. If you want to wield influence over an entire group of people, you pick these top people of your target social group and storm them. If you influence them, you own their entire "fanbase." If she does not like you she will work to storm people around you to dislike you, which in time strangles you and removes your market and powerbase. Many of us might not think having others dislike us and hate us means anything. But in terms of meme fluidity and channels of rapport and influence, you have with any audience or market, if those channels are cut off and your memes and social assets are frozen you have zero influence over anybody to be a challenge. Meaning that your thoughts and ideas becomes worthless to any market or group of people.

These are all examples of unwritten stuff our nexion has which we use and work with in life or otherwise. You really can't learn this from a book or by reading. The way we did it was that we studied what we did in our past to try and figure out the effective methods. Then later we each actually joined Christian churches or actual cults like the Self Realization Fellowship to compare how they do things. This helped us isolate the effective methods we may have used. Then much later we studied the advertizing and marketing industry, which further helped us understand what we were half conscious of. Stuff like this can't be written down because it would take too long. I can share the stories, but you have to extract the methods. Then beneath this unwritten oral teachings we have and teach each other with, are the "sensitive information."

Now, if you think about it, when AL and the Old Guard around him talk about how their group have aural traditions of their own, it just might be an honest statements. We all in life have our experiences from which we learn things. Most often we don't write such learnings down. We share it verbally with others and show by example. If we each write things down to try and teach others, we each understand that what has been written is not all and everything we have learned and know from life and our experiences. This is a notion that apparently is hard for a mundane to come to understand about something like the collective association of the ONA. They read a few pages and believe that what they have read is the ONA and that there cannot possibly be any more to it beneath the writings and letters. It doesn't cross their mind that what they have read will often fit into two categories in ONA. The first category are stuff written rooted in someone experiences, Pathei-Mathos, and Practical Wisdom. The second rhetorical devices used to either make things happen, get work done, or just confuse and mislead people. The only way to know you way around the maze is by having the witty ability to think like a trickster, or to be very cautiously smart about what you are reading and constantly ask yourself what such writings were meant to get done, or to know other ONA people who know their way around the maze.

I basically wrote this for a number of reasons. The first is that manipulation is a tool and art with a place in the ONA. There are actually old writings on this subject from back in the old ONA days. Influence is a basic end result of manipulation. If ONA as a collective Order is to seed and cultivate influence, it's going to basically need to have a number of members who are pretty good at manipulation or "People Skills" if we want to sound friendly. There can be no Nazi or Communist party without their respective Propaganda machines. Ultimately to an group of non-average people, the average mundane people are your worst enemy. It is they who fill the pews, vote the people in power, give religious beliefs life, fill up armies, become the police force, and make the laws. You either learn to influence them, or they will as a collective mundane mob influence you and your children. Empathy is the most important means to get this type of work done. This type of work also does not work from a distance. Meaning that to be able to manipulate and empath your way around them, you have to establish some type of relationship with your target for the sake of opening a channel of Rapport. Resonance opens that channel, and it is through that channel that information flows. Which is why the general case is that girls are more "better" at "People Skills." Or at least it comes naturally to some of us.

Writing things and hoping your memes just spread doesn't do anything. A great idea or invention without a means to market it makes no money. We have to learn to manipulate these people and to share our experiences in such matters. Not to make them "ONA." There are other reasons – hundreds of reasons – to use, abuse, and manipulate people that can end up benefiting you and/or the ONA. But to have influence you need a working knowledge in social skills and how people's brains work. Then to have a big influence you then need to have a deep understanding of Aeonics or how causal events come into existence within the Flow of Time. Little Moves in Time causes a rippling effect where with Time the influence grows. But if we are going to work with Aeonics then we need to learn to set goals and objective and then learn to make our Moves to actualize such objectives in Time. There are plenty of objectives to work at in the ONA, long term ones and short term ones. For example Clans and Tribes. How do you actualize those objectives in Time. What causal inputs do you need to put into now to set a causal chain of events into motion to make this goal real in Time later? Something way, way in the distance is Galactic Imperium. What Moves are needed to Aeonically manifest that in Time? A living ONA Kulture in the near future. How do you Aeonically make that real in Time?

Second reason I wrote this is to try and show people that when we are dealing with real people, what we have is a person who has been alive on the earth for a long period of time. This means that during such time they may have experienced life somehow. This means that from such experiences of life, they may have learned something. Not everyone write stuff, and those that do, do not write out their entire lives and every bit of knowledge they have learned from life. This in turn means that we each have things we know that are unwritten, that may be the source or resource of what we write and share. This would be what's called Oral or Aural Tradition in the ONA. Then such oral stuff has it implications. It implies that such writings rooted in oral or unwritten practical wisdom is grounded in real world based activities and experiences. This causes to arise two species of "knowledge" or things we can hold in our heads and "know." There is the stuff we "know" which are stuff born from random opinions, other people thoughts they may have just put together; ideas that sound great, logical, or reasonable, ideas that are acceptable to people. And then there are the stuff we “know” from our experiences, from other people experiences, from our mistakes, from other people’s mistakes; and from such things we or they may have shared with us in written or spoken format. Which type of body of knowledge do you value? If you have to prioritize these two types of information which is the most and then the least important to you. The random opinionations or the Practical Wisdom? The doctrine aka ideology or the oral traditions?

There is more to the ONA as a collective Order of associates than what we have all written. It is what is beneath the writings, from where our written attempts to share our unwritten practical wisdom, borne from our Pathei-Mathos, that what many of us have written is rooted. I personally find these types of practical wisdom to be more valuable and meaningful than intellectual gibberish and philosophical shenanigans. I know the ONA is young being only around 39 years old. It’s body of oral wisdom it has may not be enormous yet. But I know that by myself in my circa 2 decades of existence, I have accumulated many experiences and from such experiences – Pathei-Mathos – I know for sure that I learned many things which I have houses in my Heart and mind. I know that if I were to try and articulately write down all that unwritten stuff that it would fill several volumes. And I am only one ONA person. There are many ONA people in this Kollektive of ours. Each with their own Pathei-Mathos and unwritten wisdom gained from such Pathei-Mathos. So you can’t tell me that there is no oral wisdom or aural tradition floating around the ONA. I am plugged into the Kollektive, where I have connexions or channels of communications with many of us. So I get a lot of the unwritten oral and aural stuff. So I know it’s there, and I know there is a lot of it, which has not found its way into circulation yet.

But then again I come from an old culture with its own body of ancestral oral teachings. So I just know where to look for these things. And because I was born and raised in this type of culture or environment which values the Aural Wisdom of our elders and our past ancestors, I can appreciate or have a deeper appreciation for the unwritten practical wisdom over and above the superficial yappings and trappings of the written letter. Actually I have little respect for what is written, which includes what I also have written. It’s all bullshit fertilizer. The business I am in is not to ponder, fixate, and get asshurt over fertilizer. My business is growing the crops and the Fruit such crops will yield many years from now. And because of my culture, I know there is more to what is or has been written. That there are many things Beneath the Writing that many of us in the West are oblivious to, or simply refuse to see. Because if the Homo Hubris acknowledges that there is more than what written letters he has read, it implies that he does not Know as much as he wishes to believe he Knows. We’re dealing with a hubris breed and type where if they have read a Wikipedia and a book on Buddhism, that they believe themselves to be experts on it. As if their opinions and thoughts were infallible truths of reason and supreme intellect. When in truth they haven’t even scratched the surface. They are in essence: Superficial. And that is as deep as they get. Learn to Understand that there is Depth in the ONA and in each of us Dreccs and Niners. That there is something living and unwritten beneath the writing.

"BUSINESS AS USUAL"

Business As Usual Or, Bohemian Pursuits

It's raining outside. I've always loved the rain. With the rain drops comes an inner assurance that the world is still natural. It rained all night last night. The thunder and lightning woke me and Chloe up to the sounds of rain hitting the roof and window. You've never lived Life yet until you have awoken up one night to the flash of lighting, the rolling of thunder, the feel of warm skin pressed up against your own... when your mind just wanders up and down with her soft breathing... in silence.

So it's a wet and raining morning. I got a hot cup of coffee and Chloe curled up in my lap with her blanket. Surfing the net for chatter.

People out there just don't get it. Those socially challenged people... who were once nobodies in school... who are nobodies now. They used to talk about us popular girls back then and we'd used to hang out over at one of our houses and actually review who was talking about us, how many, and what they were saying about us... and giggle to ourselves... pleased inside because everyone was talking about us.

Pleased because we were immortal... because we still existed way after school in other peoples minds who kept on talking about us. Did we talk about them? Did we make them a part of our lives? Like they made us a part of theirs? It was even more nice to have and to know that everybody was talking about us... whether good or bad... and not those bitches we disliked... our rivals and competition.

So as I surf the internet to secretly research what the market is chattering about to prepare our next move, I see something very pleasing to me... the ONA is the talk of my target market. I see in every major Satanic forum or something that the ONA is one of their top subjects to talk about.

I hear Blackwood and his legion of sockpuppets commencing a smear campaign against the ONA. The best part is I see third part talking done by people not even associated with the ONA talking about the ONA and WSA.

They give their worthless opinions... some of their talk is negative banterings. Most are based on misunderstandings and allegations, rumors, ego jerk off talks... an occasional "those idiot Dreccs..." here, and a "morons..." there... the usual empty cyber posturing... but everybody is talking... ABOUT US – ONA.

Whose talking about the Temple of Set these days? Whose gossiping and speculating about Michael Aquino like they are doing with David Myatt? Who out there in Mundaneville is talking about some Cthulhu Cult or any of those other groups? Nobody, cuz everybody is busy talking about ONA. I want more of this third party talk and gossip. It doesn't matter if the talk is good or bad. Let them talk about us. Because as long as they talk about us, they aren't talking about our rivals and competition... those we classify as such.

In the business of marketing and advertising there are three methods of getting your product known to the market.

First you can spend your time talking shit about your competitions product. This is about as lame and ineffective as Coka-Cola spending it's time talking shit about how Pepsi sucks... rather than concentrate on actually making your product better for the market. Which is the tactic somebody like Blackwood is very good at... which is the only tactic he knows. It's like a used car salesman (which Blackwood was) talking shit about Hummers and Hybrids to his customer who wandered on his used car lot, all the while his used jalopy cars suck ass.

Or you can spend your time bullshitting about your own product to others. This strategy of marketing is called the "OMG Try This!" info-mercial tactics. It's like watching an hour long guy with a British accent in a goofy sweater talk about the wonders of a fucking sponge-towel with these dumb bitches with their mouths all open doing their prompted "ooh," "wow," and "amazing!" With their Consumerist tactical motto – "Don't be fooled by imitations!" This tactic is something Gilmore Girl and the Church of Satan uses and is really good at. No doubt they can make a religion of an info-mercial selling an outdated 50 year old book written in the 60's when tv's were black and white. "Order now and you'll get a fully laminated red membership card... how much do you think it's worth... no not 1 million dollars, not 1000 dollars... 200 dollars!" "$200, is that all?" "Indeed, but wait, there's more! Act now and you'll get a life time supply of empty arrogance and big titles!"

Then there is the other... more practical method. The method mom and pop business use. Where the people involved in making the product could care less about the shit talking and the info-mercial bullshit... and they just focus their time, energy, into something they truly love. The word "product" might not be the best word to use.

It's like an artist genuinely dedicated to art, just painting his pictures and taking his black and whites as a means of self expression. It's like the musician who has a genuine passion for music and just spends his making his music. Like a writer who has a passion for poetry and the finer art of literary expression just devotes her time writing her mind and heart in prose and stanzas. These people do what they do out of a passion and genuine love for what they genuinely are into their Bohemian interests with an inner drive and passion...and they share their creations with only those who likewise share the same passion... those who can appreciate the time and energy put into such hand crafted things, and who can appreciate the deeper meanings of such things.

It could very well be that people will from time to time find such works... such creations... and from their lack of passion and love for such things; or from their inner prejudice or inability to appreciate such things – will make negative comments, snicker, and be arrogantly dismissive about what they see. Do these random negative comments really damages the passion of an artist? The passion of a writer?

This is how we are to the ONA... and how the ONA is to us. It's our thing... a thing which we have a genuine love and passion for. When we do write and create our Bohemian memplex and share our insights, we do it not to sell anything, or to convince anybody. We do it ultimately for our own selves and for those that share these same passions and interests.

As the ONA states very nicely-

We Are As We Are

“” The Esoteric Philosophy of the ONA is simply a means; an effective and practical means to change, to evolve, ourselves and our societies; to manifest, to present, our wyrd – that is, to know, to accept, to live, our correct and natural relationship with the Cosmos, with both the causal Universe and the acausal Universe, and the living beings that exist in both. This wyrd of ours is most obviously manifest, in a practical way, through our sinister tribes and our Law of The Sinister Numen.

The ONA is not interested in proselytizing, in converting others, or in trying to persuade others – through argument or debate or by countering distortions and lies about us – to adopt our sinister Way of Life. We are as we are, representing as we do a specific new type, a new breed, of human being, a specific new and expanding tribal family of human beings. Our Way is the practical way of deeds, of living our darkly-numinous Way of Life; of increasing our numbers through the success of our tribes, though drawing others of our kind to us, and through others being personally inspired by our example, by our success. “” – A Brief Guide To The Esoteric Philosophy Of The ONA

So there is no need or desire for any of us of the ONA to play those first two ineffective marketing tactics. We aren't trying to sell our Way of Life to outsiders. We aren't trying to convince outsiders to see things our way. There is not even a desire to correct their misconceptions about us. Because none of this matters to us – who genuinely live the Bohemian Sinister Way of Life as a passionate artistic expression of who we are and our relations to the Living Cosmos. What insights we might write we only do so out of this genuine passion to share with our own Kind who have a taste for such things.

Those of us of the ONA are truly involved in an uncommon modern-day Bohemian Way of Life and style of Self expression. There are among us Writers, Artists, Musicians, Painters, Poets, Dreamers, Visionaries, Thespians (insight roling), Myth Makers and Story Tellers, and those Connoisseur of the Dark and Primal side of Humanity... and what pleasures, lust, and inspiration comes from the living and experiencing of such a depraved and uncommon existence. For we genuinely are of a Bohemian Culture and Kind, and we cannot expect those common mundanes who live above ground in the light of accepted society to understand us or what art and writings we create.

For these mundanes, as the Great Zarathustra put it only care to see their "rope dancers." For these mundanes and their plebeian attention is only drawn to the latest snake oil salesman in town or a product which ever body else is using. For these mundanes will only be awed and captivated by such things that tickles their empty narcissism... in doctrines and such that drives them further into their illusions of self worth or self deification... in doctrines and such things that validates their own opinions and convictions. What has the ONA to do with such so very common people and their endless need for self validation?

So let those outsiders talk and gossip. Let them spread the letters ONA far with their insignificant chatterings. Just them doing so means that what we have going amongst our selves is worth talking about, complaining about, crying and whining about... and as long as they do so, the ONA will remain the most popular memplex of this new decade. Let the bitches talk shit, as long as they talk about us. Worry when they stop talking about us... like how everybody stopped talking about the Temple of Set.

Lets continue to do what we having been doing. Evolving and Living this ONA and its memplex. Imbuing this sinister memplex of ours with what passion and determination... with what dreams and visions we each may have that binds us to the Order of Nine Angles and one another... and continue to write for those Tabula Rasa – those emerging generations – who will come after we today are long gone. That our Sinister Way of Life and Culture will live thru our Blood and what we Presence far into the future toward that Myattian Vision of Imperium Galactica.

BY THEIR FRUITS

“Now the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field which the LORD God had made. And he said unto the woman...” Genesis 3:1 (www.skepticsannotatedbible.com/gen/3.html)

“Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep’s clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. Ye shall know them by their fruits. [...] Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them.” J of N – Matthew 7: 15, 16 & 20

“And the devil, taking him [Jesus] up into an high mountain, shewed unto him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time. And the devil said unto him, All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them: for that is delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will I give it." Luke 4:5-6 ...

"And it came to pass that when Chloe had hiked up the same high mountain with a 30 pound backpack, as the good Ordeal instructed thereof, didst she stumble upon their conversation. Her hands resting upon her nubile hips with a slightly quimsical look. Wherefore she even heard the devil speak of the many kingdoms. Yea even of the power and glory didst she hear thereof. Wherefore Chloe walked up to them and said unto the Jew: Move ye over to the side Jesus, these kingdoms be mine." – Chloenomicon 3:52

But seriously folks. We are all Wolves by nature. Some of us are ashamed of this nature and hypocritically walk in sheeps clothing. While some Others, like those of us of the Order of Nine Angles, utilize what "fangs and claws" nature has given to us without shame. Walking and talking in sheeps clothing in itself is not a problem. It is when the unthinking mass believes what they see and hear from these sheeple that problems arise.

Remember those ancient days when fearless Wolves like the Vikings and their Valhala, the Great Ancient Greeks and their Gods, and Imperial Rome and their pantheon took the world; plundered, pilfered, raped, raided, divided, destroyed, and conquered? Shaping the world to their will and steering human civilization forward.

Have you ever imagined what the world today would be like, or where we would be today, if such fearless Wolves and their creed of strength, might, and valour continued to progress human civilization forward nonstop? We would already be an interstellar civilization. Something happened that retarded the growth of humanity, preventing it from reaching its full stellar potential. That retardation is Christianity.

Normally I wouldn't waste my time talking about Christianity. But I was inspired by the recent "hoedown" over at the Christian Coalition of America and some of their hillbillies talk ing about how witty and intelligent in a worldly way the ONA is. It's strange to these hillbilly Christian Republicans when they encounter girls that can read and write in a witty and intelligent manner. They explain it off as demon possession, or like Satan himself has his hand up our asses as if we were puppets of the Prince of Darkness. Of course, to the rest of the sane world at large, it's called "Education."

Or at least education explains the ONA's intelligence. Wit can't be learned. Either you got it or your don't. Wit is the works of a quick and creative sharp shooting mind. When wit is formally articulated with big words and a strong education in the arts and sciences, it becomes what us sane people call: Genius. In the words of the immortal Chloe (me): "Like Admires Like." Geniuses look up to men of great lofty minds (other geniuses). Dumb people look up to imaginary things (like Jesus).

So when, how, and what is Christianity. What is it, and why does it exist? Christianity came into existence during a time when the Roman Empire was declining and begining to fall apart. The falling apart came from the common folk being very divided in culture, ethnicities, and 'religions'. Add to this the Emperor's mistrust of a very strong, very coherent military which was becoming increasingly unhappy with things, and we've set the stage for Christianity's debut.

"Religions" back in those days did not look like what we would consider religions today. They were something often called "Mystery Cults." The easiest way to explain a Mystery Cult is to compare it with modern day Freemasonry and the Wicca of Gardner and Alex Sander or the Rosicrucian Order AMORC. These examples have initiation degrees, secret teachings, an inner and outer doctrine, collects it's initiates into a fraternal bond, and each had a central Mythos of a dying and resurecting cult hero, who represented either the Sun or Nature. One Mystery Cult popular back then were the Dionysian Artificers, another was Cultus Sol Invictus to which Emperor Constintine himself was an initiate of. The only problem was, almost all of these Mystery Cults were selective in membership and were only opened to the bourgeois. The peasants had to make due with the outer or exoteric worship of State Gods.

At the time, the largest and most influential Mystery Cult was the Cult of Mithra, which was only open to members of the Roman militry. It's central cult "Hero" was Mithra, who shares a lot in common with Christianity's Jesus which was to come later.

Constintine needed to somehow strengthen the cohesion of his Empire, or it would fall, and he also needed to weaken the military Cult of Mithra. He did this by borrowing a little know Athenasian-Jewish Mystery Cult and merged it with Mithraism and his own Cultus Sol Invictus. The name of the central "hero" would be a nameof Dionysus: IHS (YES) plus the VS ending rendering IESVS. He then gave this new cult to the peasants, made it the religion of the Empire, and then outlaws all others.

Now that the peasants had a single religion to belong to and other religions were outlawed they could run amok and slaughter anybody the Emperor didn't like. Thus, Christianity, in its beginning days was a mere political tool of an emperor to bring more coherency to his civilization, and to irradicate threats to his dominion.

Unfortunately Rome eventually fell anyways. Unfortunate because now Christianity had no political force to check it or keep it from going crazy. This is where Christianity began its 1000 year long display of what kinds of "Fruits," influences, and real world results it had on Humanity and human civilization. Remember the old says: Talk is cheap... & Actions speak louder than words? Lets forget about the flowery gospel for a moment and assess the damage.

What was the height of unchecked Christian civilization? The Dark Ages! It's that period in time when all of Europe went brain dead en mass. Reading and writing was a crime punishable by death, books were burned, and anyone thinking different from what was acceptable was murdered for heresy. The majority of Europe's people at this time were slaves, serfs, and peasants without liberty. Then we have the hundreds of years of the Inquisition, all of the witch hunts... the world was flat with four corners, and the rest of the "biblical sciences."

That is the gift of Christianity to Humanity. That is Christianity's Fruit of the loom. It's something that they cannot hide or mask, because it its forever etched in 2000 years of human history. They can talk the hot air all they want about how sweet their teachings and slavation is, but the fruits which Christianity bares in the real world is obvious to any intelligent and rational person of the 21st century. If it weren't for the men who dared to reject Christianity who gave birth to the Age of Enlightenment, we'd all still be enslaved serfs groveling at the feet of priests.

Wherever Christianity went, it ended up producing the same catastrophic real world results. Whether in Europe, new world territories like the Americas or Africa, it retarded humanity to a most base and vile state, annihilated folk culture, halted the progression of folk civilizations, and killed our most human quality which nature had worked so hard to refine and give to us: our creativity, our vision of a better self, and our dreams of better worlds. Christianity still has negative results in our modern world thru the politics it influences. I don't need to go into details about their conservative Nazarene politics during the past eight Bush years which manifested this economic crisis America and most of the world is in at th emoment. This is Christian Salvation. It's death of our Humanity, death of our Humanness, and death of our Human civilizations. Rightly symbolized by a Human hung dead. And they dare call us the "Living Dead." We? Who adores life and lives it to the fullest without restraint?

It's Christian ethics not only retards our human behavior with morals. It also retards the very progression of Humanity. Every newly discovered applicable scientific theory, such as stemcell research, cloning, genetic engineering is "playing god" to them and "ethically wrong." What kind of god do they worship if an ape with a needle and microscope can do what their god does and be his equal?

In lew of modern science and critical thinking they offer Creationism in which the earth was created in a mere 6000 years. In lew of real policies and concern for real global issues they give us the concern of gay marriage and abortion. So long as Christianity shall continue to exist, it will always be an anchor to the ship of Humanity, which will prevent us from progressing and moving forward. You don't have to take my word for it. All you have to do is open a history book and observe.

Those other satanismisms that exist are merely reactionary mechanisms which evolved during the Enlightenment when Christianity lost its power over state and politics. Back then it was useful and served to help divorce a man's mind and emotions from the defilement of Christianity. But these reactionary satanismisms have long out lived their usefulness, and in this day and age are no longer a topic worthy of further discussion.

The Order of Nine Angles is at the very opposite end of Christianity. We are Christianity's opposite polarity. When Christianity's fruits is the control and exploitation of a dead nature. The ONA seeks to harmonize it's initiates to a living Cosmos. When the fruits of Christianity is the "enviling" and defilement of Humanity, Our first fundamental principle of the ONA is the Progression of Humanity towards our highest potential. When Christianity's fruits is the retardation and annihilation of civilization, Our second fundamental principle of the ONA is the Progression of Human Civilization towards its highest concievable potential. The ONA is a progressive art and science of Being and Evolving. Whatever else is of the ONA is just a means to those two ends. Period.

In this context, the Order of Nine Angles is not a common or regular occult organization; neither is it devil worship or a cheap justification to indulge. These are all but means to an end, and if a better means should be discovered, old useless ones are discarded. The Order of Nine Angles isn't a belief system in which one just carries a handful of beliefs and theories in one's head. It is a becoming, a process, a working, a doing, where theories are applied and transmuted in the real world to produce real world results. The Way of the ONA isn't the following of a master, nor a denial of life. It is the art and science of Master of Life, with which each Initiate strives to not only be the creator of his/her own reality in word and theory, but thru actions and deeds, to bring life and all people and things within one's field of influence under one's will. It is a way of life that embraces the Vitality of Existence. It is a Way that Ennobles Humanity, sets our collective eyes towards the star decked heavens, and envelops us in a deep innate yearning to reach for the stars and take hold of our destiny.

What fruits do we bare? It is too early to tell. This ONA Tree of ours is young. There is a drought, and the other trees in this forest are withering away. If our ONA is to bare fruit, we must first nurture it through this drought. But so far we our own selves to judge, compared to the rest of mankind. What dreams do we have? What visions do we work towards? What have we become?

CALADRIUS

He trembles with a sad sickness.

Go away, he said weakly; let me be, bird.

The king has lost his nightingale.

She once sang her sirenic song to me,
by the ledge upon which you perch, bird;
Your kingdom is failing, like you, king...

What inspiration have I, without her;

What is there left but these falling ruins?

Do you assume you would ever take her place, bird?

To enchant my heart and mind as she once did – Leave bird!

What makes you think we have come to replace you singer;

so dependent on the musick of your nightingale, that you become sickly and lost without her;

Do you not know Caladrius when you see Her, you fool?

What are you but a pale imitation, do you believe you fool me; Go!

We have not come to sing for you, king.

We looked upon the king's sickly face, and flew away.

CRYSTALS, A THEORY

I believe in the theory of evolution, to a certain extent, in that life naturally changes and evolves to adapt to the change in environment. It's easy for me to see how fish and amphibians can progressively change into reptile-like things; or how some dinosaurs can gradually turn into proto-birds. It's easy because we are dealing with living organisms already in the state of causal existence. What I have always wondered was how life first began, how it all started, or what the very first "living" things were. I would sit there in a contemplative state of mind (meditative) and work backwards to isolate the most primitive organism I can think of – which was a Bacterium. Then I would ask myself if I can go back even further and "locate" anything even more primitive than a Bacterium. I thought of a Virus, and that led me to my "Virus Theory" of life.

A virus was a perfect candidate for the first kind of "organism" because it's "pseudo-alive," like it's not dead matter nor living matter. It has a simple outer shell, and a simple string of RNA. Since I wasn't a scientist, my Virus Theory of Life went something like this – "Hmm, I guess viruses were the first 'living' things." That was it. I was satisfied at that moment, and was pretty proud of myself. Then I just tossed the theory somewhere in the back of my mind where other perplexing questions I have “conquered” were kept and never thought about it again.

One day as I walk walking around campus I walked past a group of these Asian nerd boys gathered around the quad together with a mason jar of water which they were shacking and they had electrode and batteries. They caught my interest so I stopped to ask them what they were doing.

One of the boys said – “We’re seeing if we can get these droplets of fat in this jar to life with electricity.”

“That’s dumb,” I said back, “Those droplets are dead, besides, how would you know if one of them came to life?”

This other boys says – “Well this is pork fat... aren’t your lipid molecules dead?”

I walked away to the library, angry because he was being a smartass, and I hate that; plus they were wrong. As I was sitting there in the library waiting for Chloe a Question came to my mind – What is the missing link between dead matter and living matter? I hate questions like these because I don’t have an answer for them, I’m the type of person that needs to have answers, and these questions sets me on a wild goose chase. I wrote the Question down and saved it for later.

That same day I went into one of my old internet stomping grounds to do some work. It was a Satanic forum and this crazy wiccan was talking about how much he loved crystals and stuff. I hate crystals because of its over exposure in the wachy new age movement, and this guy was getting on my nerves, so I attacked him for being an idiot. I got reprimanded by one of the smart users there for being a bitch and he started to give me some cool information about crystals. Which I didn’t care for, so I walked off to smoke a cigarette outside to cool down.

I think a lot when I smoke, which is good, because that means the more I smoke – the smarter I get. I had just gotten over a heated debate with friends at school that day about gravity and how its the central force that made the universe, it makes black holes... the big bang... all this silly crap. So that’s what I was thinking about while I was smoking. My friends don’t seem to realize that speculative mathematics which uses imaginary numbers to represent abstractions have nothing to do whatsoever with the real world we live in. Speculative mathematics cannot be a subsitute for the Scientific Method, which stresses testing of theories via real world experimentation. Any theory based on speculative mathematics is a lame theory which exists only in formula format until it is processed thru the scientific method. My friends asked me if I didn’t accept the Big Bang and gravity what I believed. I tent to go with the current heresy in science called “Plasma Cosmology,” which presents an electrical universe model. That is, a dynamic universe that had no real begining where electricity and plasma plays the utmost crucial role in every part and piece of the cosmos down to the living cell.

I was thinking about how electricity was like this giant cosmic web, or electric grid which connected everything together while I was smoking, and wondering what the source of all that electricity was. I was so deep in the thought, I didn't even realize I was staring at my rose bush. I faded out and became aware of the rose bush and noticed all the damn aphids eating it alive!

So I thought about aphids for a while. They're weird bugs. The females are born pregnant because they're parthenogenic. They don't even need males to reproduce, but all the offspring are clones of the parent. I thought – wouldn't it be great if we humans were like that? If we were parthenogenic, we could just cull off all the men... sign a girl can dream. Anyways, I was looking close at one sticking its tubular sucker into the green skin just under the rose hip with its spidery legs and that image reminded me of a virus that eats bacteria called "T4 Bacteriophage." In my mind I was thinking – "God, those T4 viruses are so weird, they have spider legs, a skinny stalk, and a crystal for a head..." When I thought about it's crystal head, I thought about this one time when I rubbed two quartz crystals in a dark closet, which made these "electrical" sparks of light. That's when I had my "Holy Shit!" moment.

It was like everything just fell together into a neat theory based on all I had studied so far – Crystals are the missing link between dead matter and living matter... viruses are crystalline structures! COHERENCY! Coherency is the secret to what is dead matter and what could become "alive." Crystals are molecular structures in coherent formation, as opposed to a rock. If crystals have stored energy in it, then there is a connection to crystalline matter and the electric cosmos. Outer space is where those crystalline things first formed via an electrical process which would become the first pseudo-living organisms, and these fall from space into planets with liquid water in them. Which means that this whole universe is teeming with life, assuming that there are other planets out there conducive to "life." Which means that the electric cosmos is a massive factory of life.

I stepped on my cigarette and ran inside, jumping right onto the computer to do research, looking for anything that would back up my theory – if crystals can form in space... if amino acids can form in space... if molecular RNA/DNA is crystalline in nature... and the world wide web didn't disappoint me. It was like I got tripple 7?s at Vegas and a jack pot of supporting scientific research that was already done fell into my lap. It took me only 10 minutes of typing the right key words to locate enough information to make my theory a viable one. Here's my thinking process and important links. All but one link is still live, so I'll search for new ones to replace the dead one. I just want to share it & archive it here:

Dead matter = incoherent

Living mater = coherent link between dead and living matter = crystals link between crystals and living organisms = virus

Theory = Basic building blocks of coherent crystalline structures needed for primitive life is manufactured every where in Space.

Corollary = Life on other planets exists.

Most things that exist in the cosmos are inanimate organic and inorganic things (like rocks & metal)...

But then we come to crystals?

What exactly is a crystal?

To me, I understand a crystal like this: a crystal is to a lazer as a rock is to a flashlight.

By this I mean that both the light of a flash light, and the composition of a rock are scattered about, and in no particular order... like random electrical sequences...

But a lazer is COHERENT light (meaning that the light waves are focused tightly... just as the composition of a crystal is structured in a COHERENT form... just like the 1?s and 0?s on our harddrives are sequenced in a COHERENT structure?

Viruses, pretty much are just a crystalline shell, with a "crystalline" strip of genetic material.

Based on how I understand what a "crystal" is, I would have to say that the DNA molecule is a crystal, being a mass of unalive elements and molecules structured in a coherent manner... and it can be used technologically like crystals, as Microcomputer chips in DNA computaion.

Based on how I myself understand what a crystal is, I would say that many things about us use a crystalline structure on the molecular level: like calcium; cholesterol; sugars; sodium; hemoglobin... plus carbon is a frequent component in many crystals: diamonds.

Crystalline structures means that electrons would flow better through it. Some crystals produce vibrations, while others produce light. Light, as in the next step in computation technology and devices: Photonics. Some university students figured out that our electron based microchips are as small as they will get, and made photon crystals, which can use photons to store coherent information.

I can name two things that seem to be alive, but don't seem to have DNA or RNA: our Red Blood cells, and those nanobacteria.

All these above things have two things in common – Coherency and Electricity. Maybe I'm using the word coherency wrong. By coherency I mean something highly structured and organized – like digital information, or the streams of radio and television frequencies, as opposed to random clicks and bleeps.

Space radiation may select amino acids for life:

My Commentary: Cellular membrane like things form in space.

<http://science.howstuffworks.com/framed.htm?parent=weird-life.htm&url=http://www.iop.org/EJ/abstract/1367-2630/9/8/263>

My Commentary: Crystals are the highest form of inorganic matter, which isn't very far from a unicellular bit of protoplasm. The gap between the two is small. This site suggests sperm or its crystal shell as a gap filler of sorts. This site, and the living plasma crystal site implies something... an "evolutionary" process of dead inorganic matter to living organic matter.

Living Plasma [Crystals]:

<http://www.unexplained-mysteries.com/column.php?id=111062>

My commentary: Plasma (the fourth state of matter) exhibits a "living" quality. Plasma crystals form in space which exhibits characteristics of living things.

^^^

Anyways. After understanding the theory, and reading the links, it can be seen that life is a natural process in outer space. Or that the germ of life is constantly being manufactured in space via natural means. That there needs not be a creator god or an intelligence which put these little pieces together. With the right ingredients, under the right conditions, life forms as naturally as water vapor forms in its right conditions. Crystals are the missing link between dead matter and living matter. This adds a new beautiful perspective of Crystals, if you work with them, as many do in the ONA. We could say that Crystals are, in a way, actual "nexions" of life, which quite literally is our connection between this causal world we exist in, and our 'ancestral' acausal world.

DARK GODS & DARK TRADITIONS

Dark Gods And Dark Traditions

We hardly ever talk about if these Dark Gods are real or if we have ever experienced encounters with one. Or at least I don't talk about such things much. Do I believe in them? No and Yes.

No I don't believe in Them because you believe in ideas and experience real things. Yes I do assume that such creatures or entities do exist based on stories I hear from family members of mine who have directly experienced such entities. I guess it's a matter of semantics?

I'll give some example of non-physical things people in my family have experienced and seen and 'believe' in. But we have to remember that I come from a Thai-Khmer culture, so I'll be using "Western/ONA" terms to describe some of these things.

Mythos

The first species of these things I hear my family talk a lot about are the "Niag" Race. Niag is the Khmer form of "Naga." In Thai and Cambodian and Lao culture and tradition, a Naga doesn't really mean a Dragon, as the word actually means in Sanskrit.

A Naga/Niag is a seaserpent creature that lives in the ocean. Except they aren't physical like us. I guess they are spirit things [acausal?]. But they can shapeshift into human form and be physical like us. When they shapeshift into human form they often take on the form of sea nymphs or water nymph or "mermaids." These Niag People also have an entire realm of their own described in the Tipitakas.

The most famous of these Niag People is a Princess named "Mera." Her father is the King of the Realm of the Naga, which is said to be at the bottom of the ocean. In her Naga form she has 7 snake-like heads like most of them do.

The story goes that Mera likes to shapeshift into physical form and bathe in the mouth of the Mekong River. So one day a Prince named Kambu from a kingdom in India was walking along the shores of Indochina and saw what looked like a beautiful girl bathing just off shore.

Kambu fell in love and went to ask her to marry him. She said that she would but she's not human so she can't because she can't live outside water and she doesn't have feet because her bottom half is a seaserpent.

So Kambu said that he'll get his men to build a Great Temple by a lake called Tonle Sap [which means Freshwater Lake] and that he'll make for her in this temple a giant room with a large swimming pool in it so she can live with him. Mera said ok. That temple was one of the first temples at the Angkor Wat complex.

There is actually a temple in the Angkor Wat complex which is a huge round room with a swimming pool in it which is sometimes called the "Bridal Chamber." Legend says that in ancient times on a certain day of the year Kambu would carry Mera out of the ocean and bring her into this Bridal Chamber to sleep with her to make children. Those children came to be known as "Kamera" which is the ancient form of Khmer, which is a combo of Kam[bu]+Mera. And their civilization came to be known as "Kambujadesa." Kambu meaning the name of that prince; Ja meaning "descendants of," and Desa is the Sanskrit word for a country.

This legend reminds me of the mythos of the origins of the Merovingians [French] or Europe, whose line started from a female bathing in the ocean who was raped by a merman of some type. The coincidental thing is – and it may not mean anything – the "word" Mero and Mera are associated with both similar legends.

The word "Mer" itself etymologically can be traced to other languages which means "sea" or "ocean." Such as Mare, Mari, or Marus in Latin, and MR in ancient Egyptian which means sea and sexual affection [A.E.Waites].

Magic

There are everyday "eye witness" testimonies of family members seeing shapeshifting spirits. One I often hear about which my mother has seen, and which many other people in my family and culture have seen are these things we call "Marey Komvil?" That's my best Anglicization.

Marey Komvils are these spirits that solidify into things that look like children dressed in red wardrobe, usually with red scarves. My mother and grandmother and everybody says that if you see them around a certain house, that means somebody in the house is going to die soon. They usually are seen in cemeteries, hospitals, and nursing homes. Or they can be seen in forests or special area or fields as guardians of that place.

Another thing my mother saw are these things called “Ap.” My mother explains that Aps are people – “witches” – who know “black magic” and at night they have to feed off of people’s blood or life force to keep their magic powerful. So she says at night these people pull off their heads and guts and fly around in the night sky. And they look like hazy balls of glowing light and you can see the head and entrails in the ball of light. She – and everybody else – says that if you see one hovering above you you’re going to die.

My mother said that during the Khmer Rouge revolution she was sleeping in a big shelter near the forest with a female friend of hers and another person. She said that she and her friend woke up at night and both saw an Ap hovering by the ceiling. They freaked out and prayed. In the morning my mother said that the other lady sleeping with them had died during the night.

There are these things my aunt-mom [who is older than my mother] and the grandparents talk about that aren’t people but they look like people and often live with people like a real person, but these “people” things have magical or supernatural powers. There is no single word for these types of entities that shapeshift into human form. Most of them are just called “Tmup” if they are female, which is a generic word meaning a “witch.” Or if they are males they are often called “Nik Ta.” Sometimes they are referred to as a “kru gamnat” which means a “Birth [gamnat] Teacher/guru [kru].” The word kru is more related to the term “medicine man” or “shaman.”

Usually these entities take on the form of a human lady and they usually live with people and get married. My aunt-mom was telling us a story of how during the Khmer Rouge era after everybody had been chased out of cities to live in the forests, that there was one such Tmup lady living in the camp/village she was living in at the time.

My aunt-mom said that everybody in that village, even the Khmer Rouge knew she wasn’t human and gave her a certain amount of respect and stayed away from her. But my aunt-mom didn’t believe this. The villager said that at night this lady takes on her spirit form and feeds off of the dead, and that if you are giving birth that you have to call her to act as your midwife because she feeds off of the after-birth or she will kill you with a curse if you don’t call her. But my aunt-mom didn’t believe this.

So my aunt-mom said that she got pregnant and went into labour while living in that village/camp. Everybody in the camp had told her to call that Tmup over to midwife the baby, but my aunt-mom said she did not believe in such ridiculous things.

She said that she was in labour for a whole day and part of the night and the baby would not come out and that she was in terrible pain. Her husband and his mother and relatives begged her to go and just get that Tmup or she and the baby would die if the baby did not come out soon, so my aunt-mom agreed and told the people to call the Tmup over in the middle of the night.

My aunt-mom said that as soon as the Tmup lady came she just touched her old finger to my aunt-mom’s abdomen and said to her: “This baby belong to me; every child you bare for the rest of your life belongs to me. Every child that suckles on your breasts for the rest of your life belongs to me. I will take them when I want, and bless them if I want.” After she finished whispering that, she said the baby gushed out painlessly into the Tmup’s arms. The Tmup handed my aunt-mom the baby and said: “Here, you may take care of my daughter [my late cousin],” and then she collected the after birth in a bag and went to her home. This is why these types of entities are called “Birth Krus,” in a sense, they are like what you might call “god mothers,” in the Western understanding of that term.

The elders in my culture say that if you have a Birth Kru that they know you and follow you during your life and that it’s wise to pay your respects and honour to them by calling them in your mind [praying to them] to acknowledge them, so they will take care of you, otherwise they curse your life. My aunt-mom raised me since I was a baby and she breast fed me till I was 3, so I was raised knowing that I have a “kru gamnat” and I was raised to quiet my mind and “pray” to her before going to bed and on the full moon to ask her to take care of me and to not take me away so soon.

The reason why I brought up this type of entity that takes on the form of a human person and lives among people, and that has a “not so human appetite,” for blood and people’s “life force,” is because they actually do remind me of certain types of “Dark Gods,” we read about in the ONA’s Mythos. If you are familiar with the Mythos of the ONA, then you’ll know what I am talking about. And these are things I don’t make up. You can go find a person from my culture who is well informed of these olden aspects and ask them about these things I share here. And if you look closely at other such ancient and indigenous cultures around the world, with open eyes and opened minds, you also begin to notice that all such cultures and primal traditions have similar “beliefs.”

There are good “spirit” things too that shapeshift. One type is called “Nik Ta.” I don’t know what the words Nik Ta together actually means, but as two words, Nik means “Person,” and “Ta” means “Granmpa,” or “oldman.” Together a Nik Ta is a Nature Spirit that guards a village or forest. People in Cambodia who believe in Nik Tas swear by them and these Nik Tas even are a part of the much older and ancient pre-buddhist and pre-hindu indigenous animist culture and tradition of the Khmer and Thai and Lao.

My mother says that in Cambodia, if you walk into the forest and you don’t ask the Nik Ta of some forests for permission to enter their forest they harm you by making you fall over on the spot from a terrible stomach ache. And if you take a tree, pick a fruit, or kill an animal near certain forests with a Nik Ta guarding it, the Nik Ta will kill you.

So in the old days, and still today, if you enter a forest to go hunting, you ask the Nik Ta for permission to enter and for him or her to guide you and keep you safe, and you leave offering like incense and gifts by a tree.

There are even Nik Tas in America. I was hiking once with my mother and some cousins in an average place in Southern California here this one time, and for some bizarre reason at one spot on this hiking trail was an apple tree with ripe apples on it! So me and my cousins ran to go pick the apples to eat. But my mother screams out: “Hey, hey, you guys can’t just take those apples! That tree doesn’t belong you, it belongs to somebody else! It’s barbaric to take things that don't belong to you! You have to ask owner for the apples first!"

We looked around for this "owner" she was referring to, because we were all born and raised here in California, and we didn't see anyone but us, so one of us asked my mother: "There's nobody else here?" And my mother says: "That tree still doesn't belong to you, or its fruits. Some Nik Ta takes care of the tree, you have to pay your respects and honour to the spirit that guards and cares for that tree, and ask the Nik Ta for some some apples." So basically you just turn to the tree and you say or pray to the tree, in English [since we only speak English]: "May we please have some of your apples Nik Ta."

So from this simple belief that things in Nature don't belong to you and that spirits or living entities care for things in Nature, and that one must pay one's respect and honour to nature, trees, and such nature spirits, there is born an "ethos" of respecting and honouring Nature as a living entity that is not yours to be conquered or abused.

Nik Tas also are like Voodoo Loas. We have these traditional "shamans" [I don't know any other English term for them: mediums?] who can call these Nik Tas into their bodies and the Nik Tas will cure the peoples illnesses and stuff.

Nik Tas, if they like you they give you gifts [jewelry or other stuff]. My mother and grandmother says that sometimes the gifts just materialize out of nothing and you find it. Or sometimes they give you things called "Nieng Boohn." These gifts have "magical" powers to protect you.

I have a Nieng Boohn. "Nieng" means a "Maiden," or "Young Girl," and "Boohn" means "hidden," or "to hide." A Nieng Boohn is when an animal that lives in a forest protected by a Nik Ta runs into a tree or rubs its horns or tusk into a tree and the tusk breaks off and gets buried in the tree [hence the "Boohn" meaning "Hidden," or "Hiding" in the name]. Wild Boars tusks and teeth, and elephant tusks are said to be the most powerful. Tiger claws and tiger teeth are the second most powerful. Nieng Boohns don't have any magic if you kill an animal and cut off their teeth and tusks. Actually the Nik Tas will kill you.

Only people with "Wisna" will find a Nieng Boohn. "Wisna" means Fate or Destiny. So you take the Nieng Boohn to a shaman or a monk. In Cambodia and Thailand and Laos, some monks are also shamans. They wake up the spirit inside the tusk or teeth, and you take care of the tusk by putting oil on it, spraying it with perfume, and on every full moon you burn incense for it and give ask it to take care of you. You make a necklace out of it.

Nieng Boohns don't do anything magical on a normal day. They only work during moments when you are in danger to protect you from all harm. The most stories you hear from people who have Nieng Boohns is that Nieng Boohns keeps you from being cut and makes you bullet proof; but only in times when you are in danger. If you have a Nieng Boohn and you asked your friend to shoot you, the bullet will kill you like normal. Nieng Boohns – if you buy one – costs around $1000 dollars just for the tooth or tusk, excluding the gold wrapping and gold necklace. And if you buy one, it doesn't work anyways because it wasn't given to you by a Nik Ta. Genuine Nieng Boohns are passed down from generation to generation. I got mine from my stepdad.

I have an uncle who has a Nieng Boohn and one day he was in North Carolina walking home at night when a group of black guys tried to rob him at gun point. He called his Nieng Boohn to help him and fought the guys [he knows kung fu] while he was being shot at. The black guys ran away eventually. My uncle walked home and when he got home the relatives he was living with got scared because he had blood on him and there were hole in his shirt. My uncle got scared because he thought a bullet had hit him, so he checked himself. No bullets had hit him, but he and the relatives said that the shirt he was wearing had bullet holes in it.

In America, if your age my age [or around my age, or ten years older than me] and you are Khmer or Thai or Lao and you are sporting a Nieng Boohn around your neck, it means you gangbang, and that you're most often OG or got status in a gang; and that you got a "kru." And it means your hardcore or fearless [since you think your invincible], and usually, nobody fucks with you. Or it just means that your family was so scared for your life they just found you a kru to give you a Nieng Boohn [like with me] but nobody has to know. A Kru [Guru] is a teacher of a magical or religious nature [shamans or monks that know magic]. Gangbangers [southeast Asians] will go out of their way to find a kru and they will worship their krus religiously for Nieng Boohns.

There is something else in my culture similar to these Nieng Boohns called a "Goan Krok." Goan means "Child," or "Baby," and I don't know what "Krok" literally means, but it describes what type of baby these things are. Goan Kroks are more powerful then Nieng Boohns, more versatile, but much more harder to find and take care of. My aunt-mother and grandparents tell me about these Goan Kroks since one of my late great uncles had one.

A Goan Krok is also something you chance upon. In ancient times before hospitals and in door plumbing, when you had to go to the restroom, you went into the woods to do your business. Sometimes if you are a woman and you are pregnant you will have miscarriages. So if you are out peeing in the woods and you have a miscarriage your fetus will fall out. That discarded fetus is where a Goan Krok comes from. A Goan Krok begins as a three month old developed fetus that has been miscarried and left behind.

If you walk by one of these discarded fetuses it's said that you here a baby's voice calling you. One of my grampas was telling us about his late brother who had one of these Goan Kroks. He said that this late grandpa when he was a young man went hunting in the woods and that when he walked by a bush he heard the voice of a child crying. He called out to the crying voice and asked if the child was lost. And the child said no it wasn't lost but that it has been abandoned by its mother and did not have a home to live in or any parents to care for it.

This grandpa said out to the voice that he would take care of it because he didn't have any children of his own, and he asked the child where it was hiding. The voice guided him behind a bush but this grandpa couldn't find a child. So the grandpa asked: "Where? I don't see you?" And the child said: "Here, on the ground." To this grandpas horror, it was a tiny human fetus. So you take the fetus to an elder or a shaman and the fetus is baked in a fire to harden and dry its body, and it's put in a protective cloth like a pouch. Then you make or buy a doll house with a bed, and you let this Goan Krok live in the house. And you offer it food and water every day.

My grandpa [great uncle] said that a Goan Krok talks to you as a voice and sits on your head when you walk around. It knows if people are talking behind your back and will tell you who is talking about you, and if you ask the Goan Krok to go and hurt or harm this person, the Goan Krok will do it with its magic. The Goan Krok also keeps you safe and protected in every way. But you can't sleep with it at night because it's a child spirit and like to talk and play so it wakes you up at night and doesn't stop talking to you.

I guess in Western terms things like Goan Kroks are called "fetish items." Goan Krok reminds me of other such fetish items in other primal traditions. Like in Voodoo, there are these special jars you keep the spirits of the dead in which you command and which takes care of you. Or in Palo Mayombe and the indigenous traditions of the Congo they have these things called "Nga Ngas" which are also "babies" you take care of that have magical powers. Except a Nga Nga lives in a pot or bag in which you have human skulls and other magical items which you sacrifice animals to. As a side note: in Khmer for some odd reason a "Goan Nga" means a "baby child," or new born baby.

Sacrifice

The elders in my family do also talk about sacrifice. In Khmer it's called "Bojia," which is a form of the Sanskrit "Puja." A Puja/Bojia basically means an "offering," which – if you are ONA, – you will get why I am bringing this up. When specifically referring to blood sacrifice it's often called "Bojia-yay [yay rhymes with the English word "my"]. I don't know what the extra "-Yay" means, but I speculate it may be a form of a Sanskrit or Pali word "Jay" which means "High," or "Mighty." So Bojia-yay could possibly mean a "High Sacrifice," or "Great Offering."

My elders say that in olden times; they use the term "Samay [Period, Era] Boran [Antiquity, Ancient];" long before Buddhism came to the area and the people, before great events such as a war or battle, or on the new year festival, a Bojia-yay is held to bless and magically empower the war, battle, great act, or to bless the new year with prosperity for the empire. The king would gather these traditional "shamans" and the people would bring their large animals to be sacrificed to the spirits and Nik Tas that guard the kingdom and land. The king provides slaves and prisoners which are also offered as Human Sacrifices to these spirits and Nik Tas that are guardians of the kingdom and land. They would then bathe their weapons, or even farm tools and farm land with the blood. Or if you were a soldier you bathe a piece of clothe with this blood and you wear it and go to war.

My elders say that in this way, the ancient Khmer Empire grew to control most of the Indochinese peninsula. They say [they are Buddhists outwardly] that it is because of this crazy Buddhist Religion that foreigners brought into the Empire that cause it to shrink into an insignificant pathetic State. Because when the kings and the people became Buddhists, they believed that it was wrong and bad karma to hold Bojia-yays and to sacrifice animals and people and the ancestors [spirits] and Nik Tas of the kingdom and land were disrespected for being ignored; and the people were even afraid to war because war kills people. But old habits – old traditions – are hard to break. Although humans are no longer offered, Bojia-yays still go on in rural areas with animals are still offered.

Animal and some form of human sacrifice is a common reoccurring tradition in primal indigenous cultures around the world [see Mayans for one example]. Such as the Native American belief of killing an enemy to honour one's warrior ancestors. The head hunting that went on in Indonesia and New Guinea up until recently. Certain indigenous tribes in the Amazon bury children alive to appease "evil spirits." And the animal sacrifices that are living aspects of indigenous traditions in Africa; and even in pre-Christian Europe. There are evidence of Human Sacrifice in areas in Scotland where mummified bodies in bogs have been found with nooses around their necks, hands tied, and a stab wound in their chest. The Roman Empire outlawed "Druidism" even, on account that they allegedly practiced Human Sacrifice.

Spirits

Back to shapeshifting entities: All Devatas, prets, and yaks can also shapeshift. Devatas are sometimes called devas. They're basically godlike beings, "angels," or those spirits people that live in the upper realms. Prets [preta in sanskrit] are demons things. They live in the forest. Yaks [yaka in sanskrit?] are things like monsters or giants?

Then there is another class or species of entities that are remnants of animistic beliefs that have no names. They are just called "Vinyin," which is the Khmer form of the Pali word for "Consciousness." Generally the word Vinyin also means a spirit person.

This class of entities take on physical form and always wear black. They are benevolent, and you usually see them just as you die. Or they usually come to talk to you as you drift off to sleep. These entities are said to escort you when you die to the other places. Or it is said that they come to you to tell you important things.

There is a real famous story that happened not to long ago that had something to do with these Vinyins. A few decades or so before the Khmer Rouge revolution there was this one monk everybody called "The Crazy Monk."

This Crazy Monk had been living in the forest as a hermit doing his Forest Tradition meditations. One day he said that three spirits people [these vinyins] materialized right in front of him and had said to him that he needs to leave the forest and begin to tell people to leave the country because before he grows old and dies [he was already old] a horde of men in black shirts will come out of the forests and they will burn the cities, murder many people, and the kingdom will fall into ruin.

The monk did what he was told and he spent the rest of his life walking the streets and telling people to leave the country because men in blackshirts would come and kill everybody and destroy the kingdom. Back then Cambodia was in pretty good economic shape so everybody thought he was crazy. That's why they called him The Crazy Monk. Nobody believed him. My grandmother and all of her sibling were alive to hear the Crazy Monk go crazy on the streets warning people to leave the country. Anyways, we all know what happened in 1975.

The other story concerning this species of entities is more personal. I have an auntie who had a baby just before the Khmer Rouge took over the country. When her baby was 2 years old she died because she got very sick and there was no doctors in the country. But before she died my auntie was holding my 2 year old late cousin and my auntie said that the 2 year old cousin started saying that men in black outfits had come to take her "home" and that it was her time to go and she won't be coming back, and she died after she said her good byes.

I've always found this story very significant because it happened to somebody I know intimately, and because it's very hard for me to believe that a 2 year old baby who had barely learned to speak would even know what death and dying is to be making stories up.

Ritus Antiquusque Humanae

I thought I'd share some these things, just to show that what the ONA has as far as its aural traditions of "Dark Gods," and shapeshifting acausal beings; it's Dark Tradition; and Sinister Seven-Fold Way; is not entirely made up or the fanciful creative imaginings of Anton Long.

There are many, many cultures and living traditions the world over – those more closer and in harmony with life and Nature – that also share these same "beliefs" and practices/traditions. The names and mythos might be different from indigenous people to indigenous people; but the essence of it is as old as humanity.

The oldest forms of "religion" [I use that word loosely here] is "animism," and what is referred to by people like Joseph Campbell as "shamanism" in which entities and spirits can materialize and where magic is an aspect of such "religions," which would include "ancestor worship."

I believe that – even if it's not on a conscious level – the ONA's Dark Tradition is an example of the West reverting back to this more ancient and Natural Way of Life, that was and is more Human. And if we pay close attention to the time and condition of the West's slow "awakening" - and Liberation – to its more ancient and Natural Way, we can see that such things as the ONA, and those new revivalist religions referred to as "Neo-Paganism," began to surface circa 1960's in the West, which was a time when that magian ethos and religion had finally lost its thousand year grip on the Western Mind. Such that, such Minds gradually begin to revert back to what is more alive, more in tune with the way of Primal Nature and Life, as their feral and tribal ancestors once knew.

If we each try to be more open minded with other cultures that the West has typecasted as being "primitive" and "savage," we just might see that our ONA's Dark Traditions has more in common with such numinous and tribal ways of life and "religions" [I use the term very loosely] then we realize.

I personally take the time to study some of these "animistic" traditions: one being that ancestral indigenous tradition of my own culture beneath our Theravada Buddhism: as Bon Po is to Tibetan Buddhism; as indigenous Taoism is to Chan Buddhism.

If you want to rediscover what is Human, what is Primal, and what gods and practices existed in mankind's primeval past, all you have to really do is enter Africa. It doesn't matter who you are, what skin color you are, what culture or tradition you come from: we all – as a species – came out of Africa. You got to the indigenous traditions of the Yaruba or the people of the Congo and you will see they have a list of dark primal gods, each with names and “sigils.” You will see the magic and supernaturalism. You will see the sacrifice and dark rites. And in seeing such things for yourself you know and feel that the ONA does share things in common with such very ancient primal [Dark] traditions.

Urban Cults

By the word “Urban” I mean here that sometime in our species’ history not too long ago some group of hunter-gatherers, began to settle one place and farm, and from that farming an agrarian social order formed which became a “city-state.”

Most of us unconsciously assume that when our species came into existence, that we came into such existence inside a metropolis, with streets, and politicians, kings, and priests already pre-fabricated to rule and govern us.

We know so far that the oldest such prehistoric “city” or first urban settlement is Jericho which dates back to 9,000B.C. this means that for at least ~11,000 years some members of our species have been living in urban conditions; and not as feral hunters and gatherers.

But our species has been around for 200,000 years at least. So if we minus 11,000 from 200,000 we are left with: 189,000 years of humans living in other Ways besides an urban way. The question thus is: how were our ancestors living and what were their beliefs and practices, for all of those 189,000 years before urban life? Obviously, this city-state way of life is new compared to the much Older and Ancient Way of Life. The answer to this question will be both revealing and enlightening for those of us in the ONA.

With an urban settlement a new “species” of social ordering comes into being. One whose functionality, mechanics, and equilibrium depends on the social coherency and specialization of its members. This means that one of the first aspects of urban settlement to come into being is class/status differentiation and division of labour: Priests and Kings at the top; Warriors in the middle; Commoners below warriors, and slaves at the bottom. We see this same tendency for humans to form these same divisions in other modern social orders such as corporations and religious institutions: CEOs and High Priests at the top; Executives and Priests in the middle; employees and believers at the bottom. This in Vedic Hinduism is called the “Caste System” isn’t it?

With such differentiation and division of class, status, and labour, there thus arises Policies to maintain such divisions. These policies in ancient times were the laws of the city-state cult. There is nothing divine or authoritative about urban religious policies. It’s abstract and arbitrary. It’s invented with the end purpose of maintaining the overall functionality, mechanics, and equilibrium of the city-state and caste system. It’s not natural. It’s a restrictive perception forced onto a population. It is forced cosmology, forced ontology, forced morality, and forced arbitrary laws. The priestcraft that spoke Sanskrit gibberish of “yestorage” which the commoner doesn’t understand, is the lawyercraft that speak legal gibberish of today which the commoner does not understand. Modern politics is just a refined evolution of ancient urban priestcraft.

What do I mean by “restrictive perception?” I mean when a priestcraft says: “Thou shalt have no other gods,” that that ontology condemns the city-cultist into a perception in which he cannot legally/religiously “see” other gods outside those gods endorsed by the city-state’s ruling class. Why not? Because your ruling class power and city’s coherency depends on your make believe authority vested on you by a defined set of gods; and if your citizens go off worshiping other gods, then what authority do you have to maintain your status and your city’s coherency? If everybody in your city had different gods, the city’s equilibrium and coherency is disrupted.

In such an urban system of life that where class status and division of labour is needed to maintain the life of the city-state and thus the power and privilege of the ruling class, the city-cult’s religious law of: “Thou shalt not commit adultery” is a crime to break. Why? Because if your citizens were all reproducing arbitrarily without regard for class and caste then what social group and labour function is your off spring born into? If your mother was a daughter of a priest and your father was a handsome slave, then what are you? Such reproductive disregard for class and caste disrupts the city-states system. Castes aren’t big deals to us in the West during our modern age, but in ancient times, in the various civilizations that occupied India and else where social class and labour caste were very important and legally pervasive.

There is nothing natural, divinely moral, or cosmically authoritative about: “Thou shalt not kill.” It is an urban policy. As the ruling class whose job it is to maintain the functionality of your settlement, you simply can’t have people killing anybody they want, or even themselves. Why? Obviously if everybody is dead or ran away from fear of being murdered for no reason, what settlement/city/social order do you have? Killing and murder happens all the time in nature. If you can defend your off spring or don’t have claws or venom or camouflage to protect yourself, then tough.

Same things goes with: “Thou shalt not steal.” There is nothings divine or morally authoritative or natural about stealing or not stealing. It happened all the time in nature. If you are a tree and you forgot to evolve thorn to protect your fruit, then some monkey will come by and steal you fruit. Stealing ruins the game of a city. You can’t have your citizens just taking houses and possessions that don’t belong to them. They need to work for make believe things called money or work for pieces of metal and stone with some arbitrary value ascribed to them. You save that money up and buy what you want. Out beyond the walls of the city-state, if you are a feral tribe and you lack the means to defend your territory from another tribe, then they will kill you and take you land. Such ways are neither “good” or “bad,” it is beyond urban conceptualizations of legal and illegal. It is just natural.

The belief system, theology, ontology, and cosmology of an urban cultus is restrictive, arbitrary, unnatural, and forced. The idea that an urban city-state god created the world has nothing to do with life and nature outside the walls of that urban settlement. It’s just myth that backs up and props up the priestcraft policies of the city-state. What’s even more revealing is that not only is this creator god the maker of the world, but he also has a chosen group of humans he favor over others who he is more closer to [Jews, Brahmins, priests, rabbis, imams, pastors, whatever].

The belief of a heaven and a hell also has nothing to do with life and nature outside the walls of a city. Neither does the arbitrary religious notion of “believe,” “worship,” and “heretic” have anything to do with life and nature beyond the conditioned mentality of the city-state. It’s all smoke and mirrors to enthrall the urbanite for the end purpose of maintaining the urban settlement’s social order and coherency.

These city-states eventually evolved into our modern Nation-State. Our modern secular Nation-States don’t have “state-religions” any more. But in America there is secular “Americanism,” Patriotism, etc. There are no more priests, but there are lawyers and law makers. There are no more phony divine commandments authorized by some god in the sky. We now have laws that are authorized by some other abstraction called “The People.” There are no more 10 commandments, they are now called Amendments. You can worship whatever cult god you want today, but defy “The People,” and tell the Oligarchy you do not recognize the power and validity of their law and court and you become a State-Heretic, i.e.: a “Criminal.”

Where the olden urbanites of Christendom were conditioned to believe that Christianity and Christendom was “everywhere” and that you were born Christian. These Nation-State have conditioned their people to believe and perceive that their “Statism” is everywhere and that you are a citizen of whatever state you are born in, and thus subject by birth to such State laws and State taxation [tithes].

We never ask or meditate on how this is so. Point a finger for me to “the State” that I was born in. If you point to my mother: she isn’t a state; she is Human, and as a Human, her species has existed for 200,000 years. What State was around 200,000 years ago? If you point to the ground or land I was born on and live in: this is also not a State. This ground, like most land on earth has existed in some form or other for about a good 4 billion years. Show me what State existed 4 billion years ago.

Has our species always lived as domesticated apes under the power of some State or Religion for all 200,000 years of our existence? Have our ancestors always seen the world from a city-state religious paradigm? Has our ancestors always had unnatural, forced, restrictive perceptions and beliefs for all 200,000 years? What was life like for those 189,000 years before urban social orders? How did people live during those hundreds of thousands of years? What did they believe and practice?

Before urban settlement people lived in and with Nature; as many still do today. In clans and tribes consisting of bands of kinfolk and blood relations. There was no need for a forced and arbitrary division of labour. No caste system of slaves, peasants, or priests. There were no kings, just tribal elders who were honoured for their wisdom rather than some authority. All you really have to do is take the time to find and study such groups of people who still live in such tribal ways in any part of the earth. Or you can just find a living culture today whose indigenous and ancestral traditions are still past down and maintained by aural transmission: of living person to living person.

Where state-religions are based on written laws in some holy books. The more natural and ancient Human Way which existed long before the invention of writing was based on the living of life, on the intimacy and harmony with Nature, and on what one learned directly from life, nature, and one's elders, who learned directly from life and nature themselves.

Where state-religions have some set of authority giving gods or some exalted abstract god to be worshiped and tithed to. The more natural and Human Way is the way in which everything is Life Force [spirit(s)]; where ancestors who have died are still honoured, called on, and believed to be still a part of the family. Where after living at-one with Nature and feeling the life force that inhabits all of Nature there evolves naturally a respect and honour for Nature, and Nature spirits.

Where the beliefs of a state-religion is arbitrary, restrictive, forced, and unnatural; such that if you desired to learn more about such religion, you had to go learn it from a qualified priest with city-state stamp of approval. The more ancient and Human Way of belief is one based on personal experience, direct apprehension of Life and nature, and one's own effort to be more empathetically in communion with Life and Nature.

An example of this difference can be found in India. The Vedas are some of the oldest urban cult religious writings in the world. Its urban conditioning comes complete with forced cosmology, forced arbitrary laws and beliefs, and a caste system. But there exists in the same area a separate and independent Way and Tradition called Shramana [Sanskrit] or Samana [Pali]. This word is related to the word "Shaman."

In Vedic India, a Shramana is a person who leaves the city behind [renunciation] to live in the forest. The shramana rejects everything Vedic, including the belief in gods and their Brahmin Priests. These shramana will meditate in nature and along the banks of the Ganges, and from removing themselves from the conditioning of the city, from the urban religion of the Veda, from the caste and status system, and from their own struggle to dis-cover what is Natural and Real beyond that urban conditioned delusion, they obtain something referred to as "Sambuddhi" or Self-Realization, or Self-Enlightenment. Jainism and Buddhism are both descendants of this Shramana Tradition. A Jain monk is called a Samana; while a Buddhist monk under the age of 20 is called a Samanera meaning Little Shramana. The Greeks once knew the Buddhists as "Samanos."

Shamanism

What is known loosely as "shamanism" is so ancient, and so old, and so ubiquitous, that even the word "shaman" is nearly universal; or at least one of its variants is used to refer to the same essential thing by indigenous people. Even some Taoism Adepts in China have certain medicine men that are called Sha Min or some form of that. I use the word and term "shamanism" in its anthropological sense, meanings "a range of beliefs and practices that regards communication with the spirit and supernatural world." "Supernatural" meaning what is beyond our causal, natural perception and understanding of causal reality.

Being American, the best example I can give of a “shamanic” tradition besides my own indigenous tradition is the tradition of Native Americans. These Native Americans were animistic like my own culture still is. I dislike the way the West academically teaches what “animism” is. From such a dismissive scholastic perspective and etic understanding – laden with a superiority complex – animists seem like primitive stupid unscientific people that superstitiously believe that rocks, rivers, and inanimate object have souls and personalities or something.

If you were born and raised in an indigenous tradition that is “animistic” you just believe that Nature is alive. You’ve have to be dead inside if you walk through a forest and not see and feel life. Not everything of Nature is a living being. Rocks aren’t alive nor do they have souls to an animist. I have never heard anyone say that trees and rocks have “Prolung” which is the word for “soul-spirit.” But I was taught that trees have “jivit” [life] and that trees and animals and people have “vinyin” [consciousness/Life Force]. And sometimes some non-physical entity can inhabit rocks and trees. Or things like a place, or temple, or mountain, or forest, or object can have a sacred or supernaturally “special” quality inhabiting them, or imbued in them that is honoured, and held in high regard.

To us, Life Force survives bodily death. So that in my culture [Thai, Khmer, and Lao] there is something odd that can be observed. Even though we are “Buddhists” who are supposed to believe in some sort of idea of rebirth or reincarnation, we have this more ancient animistic belief that our ancestors are still a part of our family and clan and that they remain bound to us, so we still pay our respects and honour to them. Usually we have these home altars with their picture, and we burn incense and offer food to them. This is wrongly called ancestor worship.

In such indigenous cultures, there really is no such word for “god” or “worship,” what words we do use to refer to a god is borrowed from Sanskrit or Pali. Ask any missionary who has every tried to convert an indigenous population of animists in any part of the world about this and they will tell you that such cultures all lack a word for “god” and “worship” and that it was quite hard to translate the bible into their indigenous languages without having to be creative with words. No such concepts exists in Nature. Only spirit, Life Force, and Honour exists to a person or culture at-one with Life and Nature.

The olden Native Americans once also had these same animistic beliefs, and once also had a strong honour for their non-physical ancestors as well. Ways of Life and Natural ways of belief are often simple and uncomplicated. These Native Americans also had a belief and faith in “magic” and supernatural phenomena. These Native Americans – and all ancient Natural Ways of Life – also have Rites of Passage: where people go through trial and ordeals in some form or manner to become Initiates of Life, which transforms them inside into a new person.

Then there were those Medicine Men and Women – shamans – who went a step further beyond their tribesmates who struggled to live closer to nature, sometimes alone isolated in a forest. They would gradually learn about plants and what each plant did as far as curing sickness, and they would practice a certain form of magic where they would “meditate” to the beating of a drum or humming or chanting, sometimes intoxicated with hallucinogenic plants, enter a trance state where they speak with their totems, animal brothers, spirits, and ancestors; who teach them things in that state.

My own culture has a very similar practice. There is a certain kind of kru [shamanic teacher] that are not physical beings. You learn to meditate to “call” one of these krus to you. After you learn to go into a trance state from meditation, you can speak to this kru who teaches you things. Having one of these “spirit entity” krus is more powerful than having a human kru. Most people with this type of kru ask their krus to teach them magic. Many end up learning what’s generically called “black magic.”

But this “shamanic” aspect of ancient indigenous traditions also reminds me of something an ONA Initiate should be familiar with: Pathworking the Tree of Wyrd. It’s when you basically mediate on one of the sinister tarots, gradually enter a trance state, and in such a state certain entities and beings come to life and teach you things. If you’ve actually every diligently practiced this, then you will know what I mean by “come to life.”

So when we look closer at the ONA, its Dark Gods, Dark Traditions, and Sinister Seven-Fold Way, and we compare it to the more ancient and Natural Ways and Traditions that are older than state-religions; we dis-cover that the ONA shares a lot in common with such primal traditions. There is the almost animistic belief that Life Energy [Acausal] animates all living beings, and that the Cosmos, the Earth, and Nature, are Living Being themselves which should be honoured and respected. There are those aspects of ONA magic and tradition which is similar to “shamanic” practices the world over. We also have our own Rites of Passage which also incorporates trials and ordeals. We also incorporate sacrifice, just like many of these ancient and Natural Ways.

You see, from a perspective of frightened city citizens who are mental adherents of some restrictive forced belief system that live in the protected walls [physical or psychological] of some city/state; feral indigenous tribes that sacrifice animals and humans, head hunt, honour strange dark spirits, practice magic, etc, are “evil,” “savage,” and “sinister,” because such Natural Ways that are so much more older and Primal, threaten in a very real way the “sanctimonious” coherency and mechanic of that city/state, because if their citizens reverted to such ways of life, the city/state would stop working as a system.

And when I say “revert” I mean it in a very real sense, unlike Islam. I think it’s silly to believe that we are all born Muslim. As if we are born with the name “Allah” etched in mind and genes in us; as if we are born with these arbitrary random stories of Moses and Ishmael; as if we are born facing Mecca, with some instinct to pilgrimage to some arbitrary city in Arabia. And that we somehow lose our natural Muslimness when we convert to other religions, so it is said we “revert” back to being Muslim when we convert to Islam.

But you look at the human species as a whole; and you consider the vast amount of time and mileage between illiterate ancient indigenous cultures, and you examine all the Natural similarities that such primal cultures share in common with each other: you will begin to realize that such Natural Ways of reverence and Honour for Nature, belief in “supernatural” phenomena, magic and mystery, rites of passage, sacrifice, gods and spirits, etc, are so common, and so essentially the same, that it's just Natural and Human. So that when we each become tired of the forced and arbitrary belief system of the City/State, and we abandon that conditioned urban weltanschauung, and we let ourselves go to flow with Nature, we realize that we gradually to go back to a more Natural Way of Life: a Reversion to what is and was ancient, Natural, and Human.

Quod Erat Demonstrandum

On a personal level, I "know" and feel that the essence of the ONA and the essence of its Dark Tradition are as old a humanity. But I can't give that "knowing," and feeling to you. It's something that each of us must dis-cover on our own. It's only in our own ignorance and cultural myopia, that when we look at something such as the ONA that we grasp for the nearest "occult" thing we know of in the West to measure and compare the ONA with. And in doing so we miss the mark; we restrict our understanding of the ONA inside the State Cultus of the Occidental Urbanite Paradigm, Weltanschauung, and Cosmology: which we already know is delusional, restrictive, arbitrary, out of touch with Time, Nature and our own Humanness in the first place.

So we grasp for things like some necronomicon or some pseudo-mythology of some Western writer and we use those things to explain and dismiss the ONA with. Never realizing that nearly all of the fundamental "components" that makes up the ONA, its anti-statism, its Dark Gods, its Dark Tradition, its Sinister Way, and its Seven-Fold Way, all have very real mirror images in nearly every ancient "primitive," "savage," living indigenous primal culture and traditions. Which we never noticed before, because our Westernized eyes have been hoodwinked or misdirected by our Western priests, politicians, teacher, Mundanity, and conditioned mundane perception to only see what is Western and Materialistic, and to dismiss anything else as being stupid and backwards. And by "indigenous culture" I also mean the pre-christian indigenous cultures of pagan Europe.

We can understand that urban cults and magian paradigms are delusional, but yet some of us have a hard time removing the ONA out of that matrix, so that it might be seen in a much different light. So this writing is just my attempt at trying to yank the ONA out of that delusional and arbitrary magian paradigm and urban cult matrix, so that some of us may see the ONA in a much different way. And even perhaps gain a much deeper appreciation for it: when we understand that this way – that which is dialectically and diametrically opposed to the paradigm of magian "city-state cultism" – is more ancient, more natural, and more Human, than urban conditioning of mind or any urban religion.

This is one of the reasons why I – being who I am: one born into an ancient and still living indigenous culture – like the ONA so much and hold onto it and dedicate so much time to it. From my ancestral and cultural perspective, the ONA feels "close to home" such that I can honestly say that the only real difference between my own indigenous way – that Way which pre-dates Buddhism – is the superficial names of these primal beings [Dark Gods]; otherwise, the essence and methodology are the same; but with an added and relevant evolutionary addition: the great objective of inhabiting space and other galaxies.

I wish I knew where David Myatt got the core or “seed” that grew into the ONA from. It could have been from a Lady who had an ancient tradition pasted to her. Or this Dark Tradition could have past through David Myatt like he were a nexion or bridge. Or perhaps it is both, a Lady may have had an old animistic, shamanic, pagan tradition she got from her ancestors; and DM got this and evolved it. Either way, based on what I intimately know and feel, and based on what I have studied: wherever the ONA’s Dark Tradition comes from, it shares so much in common with these ancient animistic and shamanic traditions, that beneath the superficial differences, it’s virtually the same “creature” just re-presented. It’s not important to me where and how DM got it anyways. To me, its similarities and shared commonalities with very real ancient ways of life and ancient traditions our species have used for ages, is its own testimony. I just hope that in time, I won’t be the only one in the ONA that can appreciate this.

Hopefully this writing has added a new perspective, angle, and dimension of Time to our understanding of the ONA, Humanity, Ancient Primal Traditions, and Nature. We sometimes forget that we are dealing with great spans of Time. That our Humanness and intelligence, ability to honour and live at-one with Nature goes far beyond a mere several thousand years of urban-agrarian “religionism.” There is 189,000 years of Humanity living ferally in tune with Nature left unaccounted for, left often unspoken of, and unconsidered.

When I say “ancient,” “Natural,” and “primal” I mean those lost years of our species that the religions, priests, and politicians of these Nations-States would rather have you forget and dismiss. How were our Human ancestors living back then? What did they believe? What did they practice? What were their world views? How did they see Nature and their place in Nature, so long ago before cities, settlements, Nation-States, political ideologies, and urban belief systems corrupted and defiled our Humanness? Is there a Way back to that primeval Humanness we have lost and left behind somewhere, deep within us?

DHAMMA & THE SINISTER WAY

Dhamma And The Sinister Way

This essay is a slight departure from what I usually write about [ONA] in that it will be a comparative break down of Buddhadhamma and parallels I personally see in the Sinister Way of the ONA. The initial reason for initiating a topic like this was because I figured that some people here and there may have some confusion as to how a person can be a Dreccian and be into Buddhadhamma at the same time.

There is a very simple answer and very long answer which I'll go into. The very simple answer is that I am not my beliefs, religion, or ideologies. I am my own person, with my own autonomous and sovereign sense of Self. And this Self is on a quest of Self-Evolution and Self-Enlightenment. Being on such a quest, I understand that everything outside of myself – religions, philosophies, ideas, people, money, cars, hammers, wrenches – are TOOLS that may or may not help me in some way on this quest. So for me personally I use ideas, Buddhadhamma, and the Sinister Way as a MEANS to an END. The end being my own Sambuddhi: Self-Awakening, Self-Enlightenment, Self-Realization. I am not my religion, in the same way that I am not the nail file I use to fix my nails up with.

There is something very wrong with your Self-Identity if you lose your autonomous and sovereign sense of Self inside some man-made religion or if you confuse your Self for a outside tool you use. How do you give up your autonomous sense of Self and say to yourself: "I am this cluster of opinions and beliefs that some guy came up with." This is essentially what happens in the West – due to its language structure – when a Westerner says: "I am a Christian;" "I am a Buddhist," "I am American." The "I am" part – To Be/Is – automatically causes the Mind to identify itself with whatever follows.

This oddness – deceptive nature – of language doesn't exist in the language I was raised drenched inside. There is no such thing as the suffix "-ian," "-ist," or "-ism," in Khmer or Thai. There is no such thing as a single word for "Christianity," or "Buddhism." If you wanted to say "Christianity," you have to say: "Sasana Christ," or "Sasana preah jesuchris." Buddhism is: "Sasana preahput," or "preahput Sasana."

The word "Sasana" is usually translated as meaning "religion" in English, but this is a misunderstanding of the word. It ultimately comes from the Sanskrit root word meaning "Wise." "Sasati" means to give an "Order," or "Command." "Sasana" actually means a "Government," or set of rules to be followed that Governs something; or "Orders," or "Instructions," to be followed. The US Constitution, Magna Carta are "Sasana" in that they actually are sets of rules, instructions, and orders that are to be followed, which Governs or maintains the way something functions and works: For an End Purpose.

So when you want to say that you are a Buddhist you have to use the words: Jol [Go into] Sasana Peahput [Buddha]. And when you want to say that you are a naturalized citizen of France you use the words: Jol [Go into] Sas [People/Tribe] Barang [French]. In essence, you don't become something [to be/is], you go into it. As you would go into a store. When you go into a store you don't become the store, you maintain your Self-Identity and Self-Autonomy, it's just that you are inside something for some reason, and you can leave [go outside] and still be the same person that walked in. There is an inner feeling or knowing that who you are and what you have gone into are two different phenomena; whereas with English, the words "I am a Buddhist" appears to only express one phenomenon: the "I" being [existing as] something called a "Buddhist."

This deceptive nature of the English language in this context causes certain psychological reactions or problems to arise. For example when a Westerner says: "I am a Satanist," the Mind assumes that it ["I"] exists in a state of being called "Satanist." The inner question then comes up: Well what is a Satanist, in essence: "What then am I if I am a Satanist." So along comes a goon who says: "I know what a Satanist is, Satanists – as I define it – is a person/entity that worships another entity named Satan." Or whatever definition. When you hear this the Mind ["I"] says to itself: "Well, if that is what a Satanist is, then that must be what I am also: an entity that worships another entity named Satan. I am an entity that worships another entity specifically named Satan, therefore if "I" do not worship this specific Satan, that I am no longer my Self, since my existence is founded on the worship of some arbitrary Satan.”

Since we don't use pronounce in my family or specific culture, if I wanted to say the equivalent of “I am a Buddhist” I have to say: “Chloe Jol Sasana Preahput” which literally means Chloe [me, as I know myself to already be] is inside the sasana of Buddha. Instead of becoming something, I am just inside it to shop for things. Like I was at a flea market or the swap meet looking around for things that I myself might find useful that may help me progress on my quest to Knowledge of Self, and Self-Enlightenment.

This way of perceiving oneself in context to things such as religions allows for the freedom of choice because my identity is not in anyway dependent on what I am inside. So if a monk or teacher were to come along while I am inside sasana preahbut and say to me: “I got an idea/meme to sell to you: Buddha is God, interested?” Because my Self-Identity is not founded on sasana preahput I can say: “Nah, I'm not interested in that idea, I don't think the idea of the Buddha being God will help me progress on my quest in anyway, but thank you for offering the idea.” Which now brings us to the long version of my answer.

Comparative Studies

On an average day I personally go inside many different places. I can be at my friend's house one moment, inside the mall, inside a grocery store, inside a bookstore, or whatever. No matter what I am inside, I'm still me: Chloe. It's not like if I went into a outlet in the mall called “Forever 21” that I magically shapeship into a creature called Forever 21, and then when I go inside the Cheesecake Factory to eat dinner, I suddently morph into a being called The Cheesecake Factory. When people ask me: “How can you be a Buddhist and the ONA at the same time?” In my mind it's like them asking me: “Chloe, I'm really confused, how do you go shopping at WalMart and Nordstroms in the same day and still maintain your Self-Identity, which one are you Nordstroms or WalMart?”

It actually makes no sense to me, because who I am has nothing to do with what I go into to shop. WalMart has cheap food and great deals on hair care products, but I'm not gunna walk around in public with a WalMart pair of shoes or clothes: I have an Image to maintain .

I do like this thing the West calls the “Occult,” but to me this Occult is like a 24 hour WalMart, it's pact with cheap stuff – many of which are practical and useful – but 90% of the stuff in this Occult store is junk. I'm not gunna walk around in public with a generic Wally World Satanism shoes, McChaos Magic tee-shirt, and outdated LaVeyan accessories! I'm classy. Have you ever done a demographical study on the types of people and their state of mind that populates the colon of the Occult called Satanism online? They actually look like the types of people you would see at WalMart. Weirdos with hillbilly genes, ugly faces, fat girls, nuts – genetic bottom of the barrel of society/humanity – and they are either illiterate, their thought-process is either wack, or they lack the ability to express their mind and articulate thoughts in writing, so they use blog radios and youtube videos to yap their degenerate peasant mouths off about their Wally World memplex.

This is not to say that Satanism is useless. It's got some great ideas/memes. And it's those memes that will help me on my personal quest for sambuddhi that I look for. But, most of the ideas, or memes, I find very useful in something like Satanism have parallels in Buddhadhamma, just restated in Western terms, thru a current and modern Occidental subculture. So because I do live in the West [California], because I was born and raised in this Western matrix, and because I am bombarded with Western memes and thoughts, I find certain memes in Satanism very useful as a means to shield me from being lost – losing myself – in the maze of what is the Western Paradigm and Weltanschauung of the world and reality; so that I can maintain my own Self-Autonomy and Self-Sovereignty. So before we can understand the parallels of Buddhadhamma and the ONA, we first must understand what Buddhadhamma is.

Buddhadhamma

Most people in the West apprehend Buddhism in a very lifeless manner which is how Buddhism was never intended to spread. The root of this problem was initially political. It has a lot to do with Communist China's invasion of Tibet, the Dali Lama seeking international help, the CIA once helping the Dali Lama, so in the mix of political junk, the mundane public is today more aware of the spiritual leader of a school of Buddhism with only about 7 million adherent – via his fame and books – but they cannot name or identify the Supreme Patriarch of Thailand who is the spiritual head of a school of Buddhism with 75 million adherent. This in not to say that Buddhism spread into the West entirely because of Tibetan Buddhism streams. Their key problem is: Books. Buddhism was never intended to spread from people to people via the medium of written words. Theories and ideas written on paper or in texts have no real causal connection to the living and ever changing dynamic world of experience.

You might ask: "Well so what? What's the big deal about learning about Buddhism from a book?" Nothing really. I once took Driver's Ed in school. In class we spent an entire semester reading drivers manuals, studying the rule of driving, and the laws associated with driving. But passing Driver's Ed with an A+ grade and actually driving a car on a public street and freeway are two very different things. You can be an expert in one, and know nothing practical and real about the other.

A book or class can't teach you the finer details of driving safely, nor can it teach you the extra details one learns from experience via direct experience of driving. Or to put it in another way: reading and studying about motherhood has nothing to do with actually being a mother; reading about the military has absolutely nothing to do with the life, the thoughts, the emotions, and the experiences a real soldier lives and knows as a soldier in the battlefield.

You can learn so much more about being a mother or soldier from someone who has lived, experienced, made mistakes, learned from the experience of being a mother or soldier, than from a book. My dad taught me how to actually drive the first time when I was 15 by making me drive him all the way to Las Vegas from Orange County and then back. I barely passed Driver's Ed. I also learned how to swim from being tossed into the pool directly and being instructed by people who already knew how to swim. I've never read anything about swimming. And it's the same way with Buddhism.

Buddhism began as an oral tradition, where the Buddha broke down his teachings into key words and fundamental thoughts – like “power points” in a way – which his monks and students memorized and added their own understandings to. A living Buddhist Culture has had 2500 years to refine and work out the bugs of its Buddhism, and a living person who has lived and applied Buddhadhamma in life has cultivated from direct experience the unwritten lessons that they learn from the praxis of dhamma in the real world. Such living cultures and living people pass their living tradition and living knowledge and wisdom down to each new generation. The Buddha during his time actually wanted to name his Way “Vibhajjavada,” meaning the “Principle/Doctrine of Direct Experience,” and those who walked the Way “Vibhajjavadin.

When you learn about Buddhism out of a dead book, you do gain mechanical knowledge about what Buddhism is, but you are subject to intellectualizations, misunderstandings, misinterpretations of ideas, and assumptions, such that the end product of your grasping of Buddhism ends up looking nothing like what lives in living cultures in the East. I’ve never gotten into any kind of argument or debate with another Asian Buddhist, even if they do come from Mahayana [I’m Theravada]; but I have had many arguments and debates with Western people who learned about their Buddhism from a book, the internet, or from somebody who learned of it from books or wikipedia.

When the Buddha was asked how a person follows his Way, the Buddha said that taking refuge in the Three Jewels was the core requisite for being considered one who follows Buddhadhamma. The Three Jewels are: 1) Buddha; 2) Dhamma & 3) Sangha. All three are required to be a “Buddhist.”

The Three Jewels

Each of the words of the Three Jewels have two distinct meanings. And depending on your own inner nature as a person, your own level of understanding and state of mind, your own level of Self-Progression, you will understand each word/concept of the Three Jewels as you need them to mean.

Buddha can either mean “The Buddha” as in Gautama Buddha or it can mean the actually basic meaning of the word “Buddha” which is “Mind.” For those who need a teacher, a guide, a person to hold their hand and lead them, “Buddha” is the teacher. For those who have progress on their way of Self-Evolution, such people seek and take Refuge in their own Mind. Meaning that they have come to the Realization that it is their own Mind, their own faculty of Reason, their own understanding of things that will ultimately Enlighten them, and not the thoughts and words of others.

Dhamma [Dharma in Sanskrit] can either mean the teaching of Gautama Buddha which leads one to Self-Realization and Self-Enlightenment [Sambuddhi]. Or Dhamma can mean the constitutional or constituent factor or aspects of the natural world of experience. In the regard to the second meaning Dhamma roughly means the same thing as the ancient Greek “Logos,” and the Chinese “Tao.” It is the Way of Things and the aspects of the world that makes things work. For those underdeveloped people who need to be told what to do, how to think, where to go, and what to believe, Dhamma is the doctrines and teachings of the Buddha. For those who have progressed in Mind and self development where they are able to read the living book of nature, Dhamma is the laws of nature, what we today science, natural philosophy, and learning from direct experience.

Sangha can either mean “Bhikkhusangha” which is the Order or body of Monks. Or it can mean “Ariyasangha.” Ariyasangha is a general term meaning the “Noble Order,” or “Elite Association,” which is what the body of all followers of Buddhadhamma are collectively called. In the East, because of close clan and family social structures, one’s ariyasangha is one kinfolk and close associates. So, for the underdeveloped Mind which needs to be told and guided, Sangha is the order of monks who teach and interpret Buddhism and Life for them because they have not yet developed their own ability to do so themselves. To those Minds more developed, Sangha is the living source of knowledge and wisdom: your own living culture and living people who have walked the Way and have learned from direct experience.

So, to be a Buddhist – as per the Buddha – one needs to take Refuge in all three Jewels. Although a book may contain some of the teachings of the Buddha [dhamma], a Book is not Buddha or Sangha. Learning the teachings of the Buddha in writing and agreeing with them does not make you a Buddhist.

As an underdeveloped Mind you need to acknowledge that the Buddha – real or mythos – is your primary source and guide. You need to apply the Buddha’s teachings in your own life. And you need to be connected to monks in your community, by doing binbats [giving alms of food] and going to them for answers to questions you might have. As a developed Mind, your own Mind itself is the Buddha: your teacher. Nature, its laws, the way it works is your book of wisdom and doctrine. And your own living culture and associates are your source of living wisdom.

For me, I see parallels with here with certain concepts in the ONA. One is “Pathe-Mathos,” and the other is where Reason and Natural Philosophy are very important concepts to the ONA. I also see the ONA’s “Nietzschean” concept of Self-Surmounting or Self-Evolution of the Ubermensch in Buddhism. The very word “Ubermensch” even has a literal translation in Buddhism [Pali]: “Uttama-Puriso” which basically means “Superman,” which was a title of the Buddha; or those who become Buddhas. “Uttama” meaning “Highest,” “Super,” think “Ultimate.” And “Puriso” meaning “Man,” or “Person.”

To fully appreciate this specific parallel between the Buddha as Uttamapuriso, Nietzsche’s concept of the Ubermensch, and the ONA concept of Self-Evolution, we first need to reacquaint ourselves with the basic mythos of the Buddha’s life.

The Buddha

Not all Buddhists believe – need to believe – that the Buddha was a real person. I personally do not believe or have a need to believe that he was a real historical person. I also don’t interpret the Buddha to be an archetype of spirit person. He is symbol of the Mind, and his life’s story a mythos which reflects the Mind’s progress to developed Selfhood.

First I should briefly retell Plato's parable of the cave, as this parable and the Buddha's story are the same in essence. In the cave allegory you basically have a cave in which dwells a tribe of people who were all born and raised in this cave. Every evening shadows dance on the walls of this cave. The elders interpret the dancing shadows for everybody. One day somebody ventures outside the cave to figure out directly for himself what the actual cause of the shadows are. He learns from direct experience the source and cause, and realizes that everything he knew – his state of mind in the cave – was unreal, or the stories that old men make up to explain the nature of things they have no real experience of.

So in the Buddha's story you have a kingdom. The queen is pregnant and one night she dreams of a white elephant giving her a lotus. She and her husband the king go to see an astrologer or psychic. The psychic tells the king and queen that they will have a son and that this son has two different destinies, each will be fulfilled depending on how the son is raised. The fortuneteller says that if the king locks his son up behind the walls of the kingdom, and keeps his interests in state affairs that the prince will grow to the emperor of all the known world. But if this son is exposed to the outside world and its suffering he will become a homeless beggar.

Naturally the king wanted his son to be the ruler of the world, and no mother wants their son growing up to be a bum. So the king orders a tall wall to be the palace grounds and kicks out every old person, sickly person, ugly person, so that young Buddha Boy is not exposed to such conditions of human life.

Young Buddha Boy spends 29 years of his life content and very happy inside those walls. His dad showers him with harems of the most beautiful girls in India. Besides a pile of girls to keep him special company, Buddha Boy gets whatever he wants, lots of gold jewelry, lots of expensive food stuff. But he is an idiot. He has never seen old people, sick people, or people die. He's never even seen the outside world. He believes that the whole world is like his world and that everybody lives like him. His father is the only source he has to know about the world beyond the walls. When asked his father just quickly and dismissively says to Buddha Boy something like: "Oh, the world out there, pssh, nothing interesting really, would you like another girl in your harem son?"

But one day, after spending 29 years in the lap of luxury and a make believe world, Buddha Boy – now a young man – gets really curious about what is on the other side of his palace walls. So he sneaks out one night wearing a disguise and jumps the wall. Which is when he is exposed to the reality of reality. Not so much as him learning that humans grow old, die, suffer, or whatever; but he realizes that the world he once knew and believed to be real was not real, or was not the whole of what reality is. He runs away from home to join different sects in India in a quest to now find the answers to questions he has about life.

After a couple of years joining different sects and debating with Brahmins, he figures out that those priests and religions just don't satisfy his curiosity about how reality really works. Because when they are asked, those priests answers with make believe stories of gods and miraculous powers. Slightly defeated the young Buddha retreats into the forest to meditate.

While meditating, the Buddha recalled the only time his father took him outside the walls of his palace when he was a small boy. He recalled watching under a tree a young man using a cow to pull a plough. The plough was breaking the ground. And at one point when a spot in the ground had been broken, he recalled noticing a little worm get unearthed which wiggled out of the ground. He then recalled a little bird that was perched on a tree fly to eat the worm. This was the point in the Buddha's young life when he was Enlightened. He was 30 something. He has realized from that simple recollection that everything about reality and nature is interconnected, as if a single thing in fluid motion. That things in life arise from a cause. The worm was unearthed be-Cause of the breaking of the field. The worm being exposed fed the bird's babies, and so on. This is the foundation of every other concept the Buddha had.

Such as the Four Noble Truths, or the 8 Fold Path are actually just a chain of events that are the cause and fruit of each other. Thus, the Buddha also realized that Self-Awakening [Sambuddhi] works on the same cause and fruit principle. What one has directly experienced in the past, through rational analysis of such experiences and observations, gives rise to insights born from within such that you do not have to go to Brahmins and others for wisdom and knowledge. This idea of a man having the power to enlighten himself without the middle man of Brahmins was heretical during the Buddha's times.

This story of the Buddha is a common mythos that most people raised Buddhist will often hear. But what most Buddhists fail to consider after learning the nature of the Buddha's enlightenment being based on the chain reaction of cause and fruition, that they completely disregard the Buddha's first 29 years of living a sensual, amoral, hedonistic life of indulgence. You see because things have their nature of differentiation in Contrast. We know that black is black because it is not white. We know that form is form because it is not the formless background. The Buddha's state of enlightenment, could not have come into being without the contrast of his past experiences in that palace.

Back to the cave allegory: the boy who ventured out of the cave would not have realized anything spectacular had he not first experienced life inside the cave to give contrast and the state of being enlightened. In other words, life must be apprehended as a whole single stream of events of cause and fruition. This stream of experience itself is the Self/Mind on its own natural state of self-evolution. Gautama was only called the Buddha after he had been Awakened which took place after he had experience all those years of life, both the pleasure and the suffering. The Buddha is the Mind.

This mythos is a way of telling the story of the Mind gradually awakening from direct experience, reflection of past experiences, and direct observation of life sans the middlemen. So here is where I see the parallel between the ONA's concept of Self-Evolution and Buddhadhamma. There is in both cases a rejection of mundane established truths, facts, and beliefs. The Buddha rejected the ideas and established norms of the Brahmanism of his era. In the same sense that the Dreccian of the Sinister Way rejects the established weltanschauung, materialism, beliefs, and ideas of mundanity. There is even a word in Buddhism parallel to the ONA's word "Mundane" which is "Anariya," meaning the "Worldly," the "Un-Ariya." "Ariya," basically meaning "Excellent," "Noble," "Honourable."

The Middle Way

In the same sutta where the Buddha teaches about the Four Noble Truths, the Buddha actually first teaches his monks about the Middle Way. This is important because the Buddha here and elsewhere defines his way as being the Middle Way. Middle Way meaning both the Way between extreme opposites, and in between Dakshina Marga [Right Hand Path] and Vama Marga [Left Hand Path]. I use the Eastern understandings of “Right Hand,” and “Left Hand” paths here. To the Brahmins and the Vedic Traditions, Buddhism was defined as “Nastika” which basically means “heterodox,” and “heretical,” which also is the same word used by the Vedic Traditions to describe Vama Marga and the sramana tradition. This brief Middle Way discourse the Buddha give although it defines what Buddhism is, is most often not even paid any attention to by Westerners and even many Asian Buddhists. As the sutta goes:

“This is what I have heard. At one time the World Honored One was staying near Varanasi at Isipatana in the Deer Park. At that time the World Honored One addressed the group of five monks, saying, “Bhikkhus, there are two extremes that a monk should avoid. What are those two?”

“The first is the devotion to sensual desire and pleasure resulting from sensual desire. Such devotion is base, pedestrian, worldly, ignoble, and unbeneficial. The second is devotion to harsh austerity. Such devotion is painful, ignoble, and unbeneficial. By not following either of these extremes, the Tathagata has realized the Middle Way that gives rise to seeing and understanding.” – Dhamma chakka pavattana sutta

The Buddha goes to say elsewhere that his Middle Way is the path of mindfulness, reason, and moderation. In that the Mind is not lost in, attached to, clinging to, devoted to identified with extremes of any kind. Not only in action and deeds but also in beliefs. There is in this same sutta where the Buddha explains that the Middle Way differs from the established way of the Brahmins in that it does not reject this world as being illusory and some other world beyond as being the only reality. The middle way is to rationally come to understand that both this world and the supramundane exists as reality.

This is another instance where I see a parallel between Buddhadhamma and the ONA. The ONA tries to rationally understand this causal realm or world of experience, and a supramundane one referred to as the Acausal. It does not reject either one as being more real or illusory than the other, but instead tries to rationally apprehend the nature and reality of both.

But I bring up this Middle Way between extremes for another reason: The Five Virtues – Pancha Sila – most often translated as the Five Precepts. Besides the 3 Jewels, the Buddha states that if a follower of the dhamma wants to express his following of dhamma in a deeper and more practical way, then he should take an oath to uphold the 5 virtues: 1) Not to kill; 2) Not to steal; 3) Not to practice sexual misconduct; 4) No false speech; and 5) Stay away from intoxicants.

Outside of a living Buddhist Culture such as Southeast Asia, and shared in written format, these 5 precepts look to the Western mind like the 10 commandment. In that it is assumed that if a Buddhist breaks one of these precepts that they are no longer a real Buddhist or that they are going to hell. This is a misconception, because religious and moralistic commandments don't fit into Buddhism which is a rational way of life. The very essence of Buddhism is both the Middle Way, and the concept of Cause and Fruit.

These 5 precepts are basically only guides given to be followed under oath/vow due to their Cause and Fruit nature. Running around killing random people in public is unproductive and causes misery in you and others. You go to jail for life if you are caught in this modern world. In the Buddha's time when clans and tribes were the norm, killing somebody from a different clan meant you start a clan feud and war. It's like a dumb Blood killing a Crip for no reason. It's stupid and it causes a gang war where a lot of people die for no productive reason. Thus if you are the type of rational person who desires to avoid such a life of gang wars, clan wars, prison time, it's obvious that you should not be a serial killer.

But people in the West who learn about Buddhism from a book, and a lot of wackos in the East often forget to consider what the Middle Way means in regards to these 5 precepts and they will drift into the extreme. For example some Buddhists sects take the precept of not killing to mean to be vegetarians so as to avoid harming animals. These people forget that the Buddha died eating meat, and that Buddhism became the world religion that it is today because of the efforts of kings like Ashoka. The Buddha never gave a command to any of his royal students or military students to give up their secular responsibilities for a life of a passive beggar. In fact, like any religion, Buddhism in its early era was asserted down the throats of the ignorant anariya with force [for their own good of course].

Not to engage in sexual misconduct should also be self explanatory but it isn't to the anariya. Running around ass raping people in public, holding bukkake parties with HIV infested transsexual Thai hookers, is not smart. I mean sure you have the freedom to do so if you want, but whose fault is it when your ass gets taken to jail and you get ass raped in turn by a black guy with a really big penis, or if you get AIDS? It's your own damn fault. And it's this cause and fruit chain reaction that is essence of these precepts. An intelligent and rational individual will produce productive End Results in whatever she or he does. And idiot will reap idiotic results.

For example my mom last week just told me news about this one bhikkhu [monk]. For several years he had been making "holy water" to cleanse his followers with. This is not out of the ordinary. Different people at different stages of their Self-Evolution will need different things such as the mental crutch of holy water. But this one monk asked his students to wash themselves in his bathtub. Well, one day a girl was online and she saw videos of herself naked washing herself. She realized it was at this one monk's house and reported him to the cops. The cops finds out that this one monk had installed a very small hidden camera in his restroom and had been recording girls bathing and washing themselves with his "holy water" for many years. They found a stash of home made porn, and I don't even wanna know what he was doing with himself when he watched it with his fellow monks. He got taken to jail. This happened in a different country.

Now this monk has what you call “Dukkha,” which in English is mistranslated as “suffering.” Dukkha is the etymological opposite of Suddha [related to the word Sugar meaning sweet] which means “Pleasant,” “Joy,” “Happy,” “at peace,” and “Content.” Dukkha just means you are unhappy, experiencing something unpleasant. Which is what this so called monk is now experience, and it is his own fault. If he was a genuine Ariya – Noble and Honourable – he would have been intelligent enough to avoid the causal fruit of his actions.

This is not to say that what he did was “bad.” Buddhism is not concerned with “bad,” and “good.” The Buddha never used words meaning bad or good in the original Pali. The essence of Buddhism is Self-Progression, Self-Evolution, and Reason, such that as a rational individual who is serious about your quest to become more than what you are, taking a side step from your quest of Self Mastery in life to have decadent sex with zoo animals and masturbating to videos of girls whipping their asses in your restroom is not only unproductive and not only has nothing to do with your quest, but it makes your quest all the more harder to accomplish.

The Precept of False Speech is most often put into English as not lying. This is a simplification that generates a lot of misunderstanding. If you are a monk or Buddhist and a known house robber came up to you and asked where you live, you as someone in a way of life dedicated to the ideal of Enlightenment, should be smart enough to know that telling the robber the truth will cause you a lot of dukkha. False Speech here would be like if I were to put ads in the news paper introducing people to my new company and I went around telling people about it and selling those interested shares and stocks in this non-existent company. Doing this is not “bad” it just has the potential to be very unproductive and counterproductive when I get caught. Especially if I have a family to support. My getting caught for such False Speech would cause dukkha in my whole family.

Not to use intoxicant drinks should also be self explanatory to anybody with have a brain in regard to its abuse and causal results of such abuse. But the dumb people have a difficult time with this one too. They tend to just take the easy mental route of less rational thinking and to just say that this precept says that all Buddhists cannot drink beer or alcohol. Which is not true, nor true to the essence of rational moderation and the Middle Way. Drinking three 40 ouncers of Old English and driving isn’t very smart. Doing anything intoxicated with cars and machinery isn’t really smart. If you are in the business of avoiding dukkha, then you should understand when to drink and when not to drink and the potential causal results of abusing alcohol. I didn’t talk about stealing things because that is obvious.

Most Westerners who learn Buddhism from books or the internet also think that all Buddhists follow these 5 precepts, or that it is required that a person follow these to be a real Buddhist. This is a Christian mentality. In my culture nobody even talks about or mentions the 5 precepts but old people and the really religious.

In my culture [Khmer/Thai] taking your oath/vow to observe the Five Precepts is a religious/cultural rite that takes place at the temple or in front of a Buddha statue or monk, where you take your oath as a way of showing a deeper religious devotion to dhamma. This is called “Gan Sel,” Gan means to “Hold,” or “Keep,” and “Sel,” is our form of the word “Sila.” And you don’t Gan Sel every day. You only observe these 5 Precepts every Fridays [I think], during the Full Moon, and on certain religious days. These days are called “Ngay Sel,” which just means “Day of Sila.” If you are old [with your hair all grey] then you can sel every day. So basically in a living Buddhist Culture, most people do not obligate themselves to uphold the five precepts. Only those who are deeply religious do.

I brought up the 5 Precepts because of the ONA’s definition of the Left Hand Path being “Amoral,” and because the concept of Culling which is an essential part of the ONA. Morality is relative. Whose morals are we talking about when we say “Amoral?” The ONA is not strictly Amoral. It does have its own ethics and morals or codes of conduct and behaviour. Are we talking about Christian Moralism? Or the Morals and Ethics of mundane social order? If so then being “amoral” in this context is not “unbuddhistic.” Because Buddhism is essentially a Way of Reason and a Middle Way where nothing is condemned, but where you should – as a self proclaimed intelligent person – indulge in Life with reason understanding that your actions wrydrfully generates causal fruit. There is nothing rational about mundane or Christian ethics or morals.

It’s bad and evil for Muslims to kill Americans, but it’s heroic and patriotic for Americans to kill Muslims? That’s not rational. It’s bad and evil to kill an unborn baby, but it’s holy and good to kill an abortion specialist? That’s not rational. It’s good and religious and ethical to practice ahimsa and to be passive as a Tibetan Buddhist to avoid causing dukkha in people? Then when Communist China subjugates your country and gradually kills your customs, ways of life, traditions, people, culture causing mass dukkha in your people, it’s good? That’s not rational.

Being passive and avoiding violence because you believe in the principle of Non-Violence is one thing. Not doing anything when somebody uses Violence to harm people around you is not following the principle of Non-Violence because you still allowed it to take place. In this regard I have more respect for Chinese and Japanese Buddhists in that they practice martial arts, and for the Theravada Sri Lankans who are using force against the oppressive Hindus for their future peace and security as a people.

As an intelligent person, you should be able to know when to use force or to cull and for what reasons and end results. The war, murder, and violence of the American and French Revolutions at the moment they were happening may be described as immoral and violent; but the causal results we now enjoy – our freedom, liberty, and self determination – is a direct fruit of such acts taken back then. The essence is Reason, and understanding aionics and causality. Culling with the ONA does not always mean killing though. There are different forms of culling such as war, or long term selective breeding.

Brahmavihara

The Brahmavihara or the Four Sublime States of Mind are the most over looked and neglected aspects of Buddhism. A Westerner who learns about Buddhism from a dead source usually doesn’t learn about the brahmavihara because the books they read don’t talk about them. Some suttas describes the Four Sublime States as the state of Mind needed for a person to evolve or become Brahma [the ideation of a God], or the the state of Mind cultivated which results in Enlightenment.

Without considering the Four Sublime States, to a Westerner, Buddhism seems pessimistic and almost “anti-life-ish.” Like a bunch of beggars and suicidal people who thinks life is full of suffering and that it’s best to just die and not bother living life. This is because the common Westerner gets their Buddhism from a dead source which does not include or present every aspect of Buddhism.

Brahmavihara is made up of two words: “Brahma” here not meaning a literal God-Being, but the ideation of a state of godhood or supreme state of existence; and the word “Vihara” means “Abode,” “Place,” but here it means a psychological “place” or State of Mind.

The first state of Mind is Metta. This word when put into English is usually mistranslated as “Kindness,” or “Love,” or “Loving Kindness.” This really misses the essence of the word. Metta is the Pali form of the Sanskrit word “Maitri,” [which is related to the word “Mithras,”] meaning “Friendship,” “Companionship,” “Intimate Association.” It is actually a relative of the British and Commonwealth word/concept: “Mate,” meaning a friend. A better English word to capture the essence of Metta is “Fraternity,” or “Brotherly Love,” “Sisterly Love.” It describes the enduring and unconditional love and relationship between two loyal friends in life. Metta in essence is that which exists in an unspeakable way between a dog and its human companion. The word “Maitri,” by the way also shares the same root word as the word “Maituna” which means to Copulate, to Have Sex, so in this sense, Maitri is also related to the English word “to Mate.”

The second state of Mind is Karuna. In English this word is translated as “Compassion.” Which is nice and flowery, but not quite the essence of the original word. Karuna in Pali [not in Sankrit] has the quality of “Affection,” and “Tenderness,” for someone. As in the tender affection a mother has for her baby. Or the tender affection between two lovers. Or the affection between very close friends. This word is a distant relative of the English word to “Care.” When you Care for someone, you take Care of them and provide for or relieve their needs.

The third state of Mind is Mudita. In English this is rendered as “Joy.” Which is fine and generalistic, but it doesn’t quite capture the essence. Mudita is the same in Sanskrit as it is in Pali. It means “Delight,” “Pleasure,” “A Sexual Embrace.” This doesn’t mean that Mudita means Buddhist monks and nuns should go around sexually embracing people naked to be reborn as Brahma. It describes a state of Mind or attitude in life where you as a person experiences life in such a way that it gives you Mudita.

These first three together – as with the very essence of Buddhism – incorporates the concept of cause and fruit. Close companionship [maitri] gives rise to Intimate Affection [karuna] which give rise to mudita, in context to two lovers, mudita would be the sex part. These first three also goes with the rest of Buddhism in that Buddhism is essentially a communitarian way of life. You can’t be a Buddhist without the Third Jewel: Sangha.

So if you desire to put your Buddhism into practice and manifest a strong sangha – community – you learn to understand that such manifestation works causally in steps just like a relationship between lovers. It begins first as a state of Mind. It moves to established fellowship. It gets more intimate and becomes affection and the caring and providing for one another's needs. And it consummates in close intimacy of lives where each member of the community has their needs met, are provided for so that they have no worries – dukkha – and are sukkha and thus Life becomes delightful, pleasurable, and an exultation of being, which is the Supreme Abode of Brahma.

When we understand this concept of causal effect we can then come to understand that cultivating a different state of Mind, in that you either reject others, or set yourself off as not needing others, that this state of mind thus wyrdfully gives rise to chain reactions of effects. It manifests no quality or sense of fellowship with people around you and in the West even with your own family and blood relations. There is no affection between people, or between families. Nobody cares about anybody else. Everybody is busy caring about themselves. This manifests a state of social existence when there is no community. Where a city is just a loose mixture of single cells out fending for themselves. This state of existence in turn gives rise to Dukkha: stress, worry, loneliness, sorrow, depression, distrust, antisocial behaviour, and so on. Such kinds of dukkha such as high stress – as we are now beginning to learn – kills. In essence, you have the power to kill your own self by a simple state of mind.

The forth state of Mind is one that I see a parallel in the ONA. It is Upekkha in Pali or Upaksha in Sanskrit. This word has a mess of mistranslations and different means do to mistranslations. It is sometimes translated into English as “Renunciation,” and this concept, Upekkha comes to mean the Buddhist should reject the world and be a reclusive hermit living in a cave somewhere alone. Or most of the other time this word is put into English as “Equanimity,” which is a more sensible and realistic translation more closer to the original essence of the Pali and Sanskrit, but still greatly misses the mark. Equanimity in this sense here meaning a state of Mind where you are not affected in anyway by outside circumstances and events.

Upekkha having the meaning of Equanimity is due in part to a misunderstanding of the original quality and essence of the Sanskrit word Upaksha, which has the superficial meaning of “Neglect,” or to be “Indifferent” to something. The word itself comes from two different words put together, and its when you extract the quality of these two words and put them together that you begin to get the actual essence of the word. “Upa” means “Up,” “Above,” or “Beyond.” “Aksha” means to “Look.” Together you get the concept of “Looking Beyond.” In the West, the closest word or idea to this concept of Looking Beyond is the word “Aeonics” the ONA uses. Especially in the ONA phrase “Aeonic Insight.”

To give a pragmatic example of Upekkha in this sense lets take the Great Barrier Reef in Australia. There is a group of people – mostly marine biologists – who are trying to figure out a way to kill off a species of purple star fish from the Great Reef. So, if you were to ask a mundane without the ability to sense of look beyond, they will cry out in protest and say that such an act of trying to kill off a species is not nice. If you were to ask me, I would say: “Meh, go for it, why not.” To a mundane my response seems indifferent, as if I neglect to understand that killing a species of star fish is wrong.

But from my perspective I watched an entire documentary on PBS about the threat a species of very fast breeding star fish are posing to the Great Barrier Reef and its entire ecosystem, and if something is not done about these star fish, this priceless ecosystem will die out. So I can Look Beyond the present mundane moment, input into my biological super computer the factor of killing off this species, or curbing their reproductive capabilities, then come out with a theoretical future where the Earth's largest natural structure and its precious ecosystem is safe. Thus with my aeonic insight in this regard, I can afford to appear indifferent and not react as a mundane would react.

If you are a person seeking a Life of delight and pleasurable experience, then Upekkha is the supreme state of mind to cultivate. This is because the average Mind of the mundane/anariya is very open and prone to ideas and worrying over unsubstantiated hysteria, which is a state of dukkha. For example for thousands of years you have a race of mental idiots in Christianity worrying over the end of the world being just around the corner. Or you have these same people giving into their physical desires as a natural organism would, and then they feel guilty for fornicating and fret about going to hell.

With Upekkha, if somebody were to come up to me and say: "Ooh your going to hell, the end of the world is coming." I would say: "So?" Or more realistically you have real people out there worried about immigration or whether or not rich people should be taxed. With Upekkha I can afford to say: "I don't give a shit really. You'll learn the hard way, I'm not gunna waste my breath explaining shit to you."

Being able to see beyond current causal events and to see the future end results give you the advantage of putting things into proper aeonic perspective in such a way that the goings on and events that may arise and happen does not influence or effect your thoughts, emotions, or actions. Thus you are Master of your own Mind. Whereas with a mundane/anariya his/her thoughts, emotions, and actions are influence by outside influences: the news, urban legend, myths, hysteria, political propaganda, sectarian propoganda, spin doctors, etc. Not being Master of your own Mind – your own thoughts, and emotions – is very dangerous. How do you think people in the Middle East can be talked into strapping a bomb to themselves and blowing themselves up? How do you think concepts like racism and apartheid exists and is perpetuated where the lives of a whole race suffers dukkha, because the idiots of another race are mentally weak enough to believe the crap outside influences feeds them?

The Core Concept

The original core concept of Buddhism, or the fundamental idea of Buddhism is based on oral tradition and oral transmission. 500BC was a time when your average Punjabi [or whatever people lived in India at the time] were illiterate. The Buddha was asked by many people if they could put his teaching into Sanskrit. The Buddha always objected to the idea stating that his teaching must be transmitted in "our common language" which at the time was Pali.

At the time Sanskrit was a language jealously horded by the Brahmin elite, in the same way that the Catholic elite horded and jealously guarded Ecclesiastical Latin from the common people. You had to be a Brahmin or related to a Brahmin to be able to learn Sanskrit. At the time if you were of a lower cast and you knew Sanskrit, or learned it, you would be punished with death. Pali was the common vernacular tongue spoken by the common mass during that time. These common people who spoke Pali were illiterate. Pali actually does not have its own system of writing. That's how illiterate they were. You used whatever alphabet you knew to write your common Pali. Pali is to Sanskrit by the way is what street grade Ebonics is to Shakespearian English. For example in vernacular Ebonics the phrase: "Wat it do ma niggas, you niggas down ta gets yo grub on?" in Ecclesiastical English is: "How art thou mine goodly gentlemen, I say, art thou interested in dining with me?"

Not having a means to transmit information in the form of writing to share dhamma to the common mass, the Buddha had to innovate the means and method of teaching his dhamma to these illiterate people. During the Buddha's time, the dominate religion was Brahmanism, which was already at the time written down in volumes of very well written Vedas and Upanashads. Such well written books had written in them precise myths, teachings, lessons, beliefs, and so on. This format would not work with an oral transmission because the average common illiterate just does not have a photographic memory where they can memorize 24,000 pages of the Tipitakas.

To solve this problem the Buddha used two methods. The first method was to strip his teachings down to key concepts and key words, then list them numerically. This is why in Buddhism, you have things like the 2 Truths, 3 Jewels, the 4 Noble Truths, the 4 Supreme States, the 5 Aggregates, the 7 Branches, 8 Fold Way, etc. So then it becomes easy to orally teach somebody by saying to them: "Alright the 3 Jewels are: Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha, got it?" Then for each key word the Buddha build around it a simple explanation. Like this: "Ok, Buddha, that's me or Mind; Dhamma that means what I teach you, or the teachings of Nature; Sangha that's those guys in the orange robes or our kinfolk, got it?"

So from with this first method, something cool happens. The object is Vibhajjavada – to directly experience life – and then use what you experience to learn to apprehend a deeper understanding of each of those key words and simple explanations, so that you add your own insights and understandings – born from your own Mind, Self-Evolution, and Experiences – to those key words. So in this way, nothing needs to be written down, and everything is self-evolutionary and highly personalized. The core teachings of the Buddha serves only as sign posts to show you the Middle Path to Sambuddhi [Self-Enlightenment]. In other words, if you are truly intelligent, and truly understand something, you will be able to put it into your own words and express it through your own Mind.

The second method the Buddha utilized was to incorporate brainiacs with no life called monks and nuns [bhikkhus and bhikkhunis]. In the Buddha's times, these monks and nuns were people who actually left their homes to be bums. They wore rag, which they got from cemeteries that are discarded peaces of clothing they patched together. They would use a generic dye they made from commonly available plants and crushed rocks, which turned the rags into a muddy orange color. They hung out together and begged for food. Then they spent their whole day memorizing – word for word – the teachings of the Buddha as he taught it to them. These monks and nuns originally served the purpose as living, breathing, walking, begging references. Like wikipedia with two legs.

So if you were into the Buddha's dhamma back then during 500BC and you were walking around memorizing your 2 Truths, 3 Jewels, and the simple meanings of the 8 Fold Path, and you could not remember what 8 Fold Path number 6, 7, and 8 were and what they meant, you walk yourself to where these monks and nuns hung out and asked them, and they would find one among them who specialized in memorizing the bit of dhamma you were asking about to recite it for you.

And this is all that these monks today actually still recite. It sounds all mystical and magical today when you hear a group of monks chant Pali stuff in these ceremonies, but if you were to actually translate what they were chanting, they would be some rather unexciting and nonmystical stuff, like a group of people with photographic memory reciting a cook book in a dead language.

So the very basic and fundamental idea in the Buddha's method is not the making of certain classes of people [the monks] into priests or religious authorities, as Westerners would assume they were, being that they are so used to such ideas and structures in their indigenous religions. These monks serve only as an ancient kind of reference source of key words and core teachings the Buddha put together. The genuine objective is for you – the Buddhist – who is on a path to Self-Enlightenment to use those key concepts as sign posts and guides, but to add to them – build onto them – insights you yourself draw out from within and from your own direct experiences in Life. In this way, the memplex of Buddhism originally was intended to be “open source,” like remembering HTML coding so that you can design your own myspace page unique to who you are as a person, imbued with your own ideas. Self-Enlightenment by the very meaning of the term means that you yourself, by your own efforts are your own Enlightener, not a Buddha or some religion a Buddha invented.

In principle, Buddhadhamma is a cluster of concepts and ideas that helps you find your way in the Middle Path to Self-Enlightenment. In praxis – the application of the 4 Noble Truths, the procession of the 8 Fold Path, and the expression of the Four Supreme States of Mind, is a communitarian Way of Life, in which each person strives to learn to understand how the physical world works causally so that each person and the collective as a whole can use what knowledge they learn to manifest for each other and themselves a life rich with Sukkha.

So it is here that I also see several similarities with Buddhadhamma and the Sinister Way of the ONA. The ONA is Open Source and it began as an oral tradition. It comes with key concepts, and specific methodologies to be applied in the real world, like “The Seven Fold Way,” “The Sinister Dialectic,” “The Sinister Method,” “The Star Game,” “The Tree of Wyrd,” “The Law of the Sinister-Numen,” and so on. You as a Dreccian must live life directly and cultivate Pathe-Mathos, and use your own experiences, insights, and wisdom you gain from Life to evolve the Sinister Way for the next generation using those core concepts as sign posts. And this next generation learns the Sinister Way through you – a living person – and via the Kulture of the ONA.

Buddha The Adversary

There is no historical or archeological evidence that a Gautama Buddha ever existed. I personally believe the Buddha was not a real person but only a central Icon of a mythos.

Unlike other religions, sasana preahput doesn't change, doesn't devalue in nature without a Buddha, or doesn't it need a Buddha. People can ask: "Well, how can a religion be real or valid without its religious founder?" Because the sasana – instructions – have already been written down, or put into practice. In the very same way that the Founding Fathers of America could not have existed as real people at all and could have been the made up imaginary people of a historian, because the Constitution is already written and followed. Those founding fathers are practically irrelevant to the functionality of the Constitution.

We're not dealing with any real dogma and myth with Buddhism that is depended on the existence of a Buddha. With something like Christianity things are different due to its nature as a dogmatic religion based on myths that are taught as literal fact. For example Jesus is the saviour of Humanity who died on the cross to wash us with his blood. If he did not exist, then the fundamental concept of salvation doesn't make any sense. The bible also gives a lineage of Jesus where he is a direct descendant of a whole host of weird biblical characters, a King Solomon, a King David, all the way to Adam. Which means also that if Solomon and David are not historical people – there is no evidence they ever existed – then how can Jesus also exist, and in turn, how can the concept of salvation make sense?

People who are anti-christian like to spend their time attacking, debating, the existence of Jesus, of God, of Noah's Ark, etc. because the absence of such things actually devalues Christianity and its dogmas and myths. But the same debates don't work with Buddhism. You can't debate that a god does not exist, because Buddhadhamma doesn't really give two shits on the idea of a god in the first place. You can try and prove that the Buddha is fake, but it doesn't matter because the principles have already been implanted in peoples minds who express it and live it. There is no creation story in Buddhadhamma to debate and attack. The most you can do is attack your own assumptions of your own Western apprehension of Buddhadhamma. Which does very little to the Buddhism practiced by living cultures in Asia.

Historically the first Buddhism monks were Greeks from Northern India. The first writings associated with a Buddhism were written by these monks of Greek extract. The first statues of the Buddha were based on Greek statues of Apollo. The iconic hair bun on the Buddha's head can be found on Apollo's head. The robe the Buddha wore and what monks wear is a Greek Toga. The concept of Dhamma in Buddhism corresponds ver closely to ancient Greek concepts of the "Logos."

These first "Buddhists" or the engineers of "Buddhism" merged the idea of Apollo which is a god associated with Light [the Sun] with an antinomian and amoral god from the Vedas named Rudra-Shivaya. Before Gautama Buddha, Shiva as Mahayogi [Lord of Magic and Meditation] was depicted in the Lotus Asana and was even referred to as the Buddha meaning the Enlightened One. So the basic idea behind an Apollo-Shivaya cult icon is "Enlightenment and Liberation via the Adversarial and Antinomian opposition to the established order and standard norm."

Rudra-Shivaya was as adversarial and antinomian as you can get in the Vedic Traditions. You have to remember that the Vedas and its mythos existed for literal aeons before Christianity, so they didn't have Christian concepts and god-forms to work with. Rudra essentially means “Feral,” “Wild,” and “Untamed,” and was the God of the Hunt. In his aspect as Shiva, he was the Lord of the Asuras, which are the bad guys in Vedic mythology who populated the underworld, like demons in Christianity. His color was orange.

There are stories in the Vedic mythos of Shiva raping under aged girls, masturbating in public, having sex with other male gods, killing people, smoking bhang [cannabis], drinking concoctions made of his other sacred plant Angle Trumpet, burning cities with his third eye, etc. Shiva dislikes human arrogance and the façade of civility and civil society and its law and order we humans hide ourselves inside. He essentially destroys every source of human arrogance, vanity, and self-righteousness to Liberate such Humans from their self-imposed limitations to the greater reality that exists outside the walls of their cities and religions.

We can ask ourselves: If these engineers of Buddhism picked the closest thing to a “devil,” or adversarial archetype from the Vedas, did they then oppose the Vedic-Brahmanic Tradition? The answer is yes. Buddhism in 500BC stood in direct dialectical opposition to Brahmanism and Vedic dogma and teachings.

Nearly ever core teaching of Buddhism was a dialectically counter-teaching to the dogma and teaching of Brahmanism. Back during this time Brahmanism ruled most of India with an iron sectarian fist. Every body lives in strict castes. You were born into your caste and if you did something not associated with your caste Brahmins punished you with death. Like ancient Israel, the Brahmins taught that the only way to be saved was to sacrifice animals at temples to the gods; which the Brahmins supplied for donations. Buddhism on the other hand taught that the god does not exist, and that killing animals to invisible gods was useless and unproductive.

Brahmanism taught that each person had an “Atma,” which was this invisible spirit Self that lives somewhere inside your body. This atma was immortal and that when you die, this atma – which is the real you – leaves the dead body and goes to inhabit one of the abodes of the gods, and later it is said that this atma reincarnates in other bodies. Buddhism on the other hand says that such a concept is ridiculous. The Buddhist doctrine of “Anatta/Anatma” basically says that the atma or some invisible spirit self does not exist. That our sense of self is the end product of our mind and 5 sense.

When Brahmanism taught that Brahmin priests were essential to people’s spiritual salvation, Buddhism taught that priests are scoundrels and liars. When Brahmanism taught that religious rites and ceremonies were essential, Buddhism taught that rites, and religions altogether were deceptive, enslaving, and useless. When Brahmanism taught that the Vedic scriptures was essential to your spiritual salvation, Buddhism taught that the Vedas were a pile of useless stories that did not enlighten a person, but just filled their minds with irrational fiction.

Of course, the Brahmins and the world order of India at the time did not like Buddhism, calling it nastika – a heathen cult – and for several centuries there were mass slaughtering of Buddhists. The Vedic Tradition’s war against Buddhism went on for so long and was actually so successful that Buddhism does not exist as a major religion in its own native soil: India. It actually did not exist in India up until recently. But during this war, Buddhism did leave a victorious mark. It killed Brahmanism and forced it to evolve into what is today called “Hinduism,” which is a mixture of Vedic Tradition and restated Buddhist concepts. No Hindu is going to acknowledge this though.

When Buddhism made a sectarian exodus out of India, the first places it took root in was Sri Lanka and the Southeast Asian peninsula. At the time the native there in each respective place were Shivites and Shaktas. When Buddhism came to Southeast Asia, the Mon and Khmer there were originally devotees of Shiva and Shakti called Preah Siva and Preahme Uma. These people eventually merges their ancestral Shaivism and Shaktism with Buddhism, in the same way that the Chinese merged Buddhism with their indigenous Taoism, how Buddhism in Japan was merged with their indigenous Shintoism, and how the Tibetans merged Buddhism with their indigenous Bon.

So if you look at the temple complex at Angkor in Cambodia, you will see that it is built with both Shaivic and Buddhist elements. There are Shiva Lingas [phalluses] and Buddhas present, there are even Buddhas etched into the side of Lingas. This is also why when you go to a Khmer or Thai or Lao Buddhist wat [temple] you will most often see a Buddha seated on a tripled coiled Naga with seven heads. It is a synchronistic icon which also represents the much older Shiva [Buddha] and Shakti-Kundalini as the coiled seven headed Naga.

This ancient aspect of Buddhism is an obvious place where I see many parallels between what we now called Buddhism – more specifically Khmer/Thai Theravada Buddhism – and the ONA’s Sinister Way. The ONA has its own Mythos where it uses the adversarial archetype named “Satan,” who is also identified as Lucifer: Satan corresponding to Shivaya, and Lucifer corresponding with Apollo. The ONA refers to its archetype of the Sinister and Primal Nature as “Baphomet,” which of course corresponds to Uma-Shakti that Naga.

The ONA’s concept of the “Sinister” also has parallels with this historic aspect of Buddhism. “Sinister” here meaning the Latin for “Left” as in that which is not Right. The Right side referring to the dominant Judeo-Christian Ethos that plagues present Western matrix, in the same way that Brahmanism’s Ethos oppressed and ruled over the social order of India circa 500BC. In the very same exact sense that Buddhism dialectically taught ideas and principles adversarial to the establish Right Hand Path of Vedic Brahmanism as a means of Liberation and Enlightenment, I also believe that the Sinister Way of opposing the establish mundane order and Christian Ethos of the West is a means to Liberation and Enlightenment.

I can go on for days and pages about Buddhism, and perhaps one day I will produce a book on this subject which means a lot to me, as one thing my culture and my Buddhism teaches is that one cannot forget one’s ancestral roots. A Tree needs its roots to grow and bare fruit. One aspect of Occidental social order and Western people which I greatly dislike is that they have no sense or respect of roots, ancestry, culture, blood, and community. In this regard I also appreciate the ONA and David Myatt is trying to remedy this lack of root and foundation by reintroducing concepts of a Kollektive, a Kulture, and Traditions, Tribalism, and Clans. There are many other parallels between the two Ways, if we go down to a finer level, but I am already at page 21. I think I have explained enough to get a point across.

The point is the ONA is new compared to an ancient 2500 year old Buddhism. Buddhism began simple and modest, and adversarial as an aural tradition, in the same way the ONA began. Buddhism was not very significant and was greatly looked down upon and reject by the social order of its beginning moments; but over time – as it was allowed to freely evolve – its living cultures and people produces a world religion that has inspired many countless Minds to seek self illumination. In time, if the ONA is allowed the freedom to evolve and grow through each of us Dreccians, as we pass it down to each successive generation, a new culture will emerge and one can only imagine what its Galactic Imperative will one day give birth to a thousand years from now.

DICHOTOMIZED THINKING

Dichotomized Thinking

This article will just answer a couple questions which have recently been suggested in the stats section of this blog or question I have seen asked around cyberspace associated with the subject of “dichotomized thinking” and Buddhism, and ONA. I’ll turn the questions or implied questions into formal questions and then try to provide an honest answer. Or I’ll just stick a question mark after a search term phrase I saw.

Q1. Buddhist Satanist?

A1. There is no such thing, but depending on the upaya, it is justifiable and permissible at least with the fundamentals of Theravada Buddhism and the Dhamma of Upaya [Expedient Method]. I’ll try and explain in normal English sans the spiritual talk.

Upaya technically means a “Trick.” If a Trick [Upaya] is devised where that a person or group of people are resultantly Tricked to be “Buddhists,” then the means [upaya] is justified and acceptable. But here, the term “Buddhist” must be properly understood so we can determine if a person is “Buddhist” or not. But the term must be understood within its Native Weltanschauung, and not with an English or Europeanized Weltanschauung.

In Southern Buddhism [Theravada] the Pali term for Buddhism is Sasana Preahput [Khmer] or Sasana Phraputa [Thai/Lao]; or Preahput Sas’na, or Phraputa Sasana. The prefix “Preah/Phra” means “that which is scared and venerable.” Sasana here – properly used – does not mean a “religion,” it simply means a “set of Traditions & Instructions to be followed for the end results.” A good and easy example in the West for a living Sasana is the US Constitution. This constitution is not truly a religion, or philosophy, it’s simply a set of instructions left behind which is to be followed for the end results, which is freedom and liberty in this case. If you want a working government system and personal freedom, you follow the damn instructions. If you don’t want those things, then don’t follow the instructions. A recipe in a cook book is a sasana. If you want the end result of a good dish, you follow the damn instructions. Over time these instructions generates what is called a “Tradition,” or a “Custom,” which is basically adapted, adopted, by many people. So we have things like Italian Cuisine, Chinese Cuisine, the American way of life.

So in it’s native weltanschauung there is no such word as a “Buddhist,” there are just people who try to manifest the sasana [instructions] left behind for them by the Buddha. They don't have to call themselves anything, by any label. Just like in America you can label yourself a Mexican, European, African, Anarchist, Sexist, whatever, and you still go with the flow of the US Constitution. You still practice and demand your Constitutional rights, regardless of what you call yourself. Is an Anarchist and Murderer still "American?" Yes they are, because they express that Anarchy and Kill within the matrix or environment of the conditions created by the Constitution. The Anarchist would not be what he is if he did not have the Constitutional right to actually express his thoughts. The Murderer broke a law of said nation, but he is still Protected by the Constitution and is theoretically guaranteed a just and fair trial. Asking if a "Buddhist" can be a "Satanist," or practice the Left Hand Path, is the same as asking if an "American" can be a Satanist or practice the Left Hand Path. Or if a Scientist can be a Christian or Muslim. You are free to do so, but others around you might not agree with such practices and beliefs.

In its native weltanschauung there are 6 technical "landmarks" which "defines" one who follows the sasana of the Buddha; three Jewels and two goals or aims or objectives; and one Concept. The three jewels are Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha. The two aims or objectives are Buddhi [Understanding born from experience and intuition] and Nibbana [here meaning Liberation from the samsara of psychological illusions and mental delusions]. The Concept is Kamma [action/building] and Vipaka [fruit/result], or together called Causation or Causality in English. Any human who has these 6 things is a "Buddhist," whether they use that label or not. So, the sly Trick is to make others follow these 6 things without them knowing it. The superficial label of "Buddhist," is meaningless. The monk or adept Buddhist devises upayas designed to trick others to follow those 6 "landmarks." If the upaya – Trick, Expedient Method – works, then the upaya is acceptable and may develop into a Yana [wagon/vehicle/form].

Mahayana is the first good example of an upaya which has developed into its own Form or Vehicle. In the past for centuries Theravada and Mahayana had these sectarian feuds. Mostly because the early Mahayanas wrote new sutras and used Sanskrit instead of Pali. Eventually what helped end the feud was that Mahayana was a big fat Trick. It was using all of these indigenous Chinese deities, and Sanskrit which is considered to be "holier" by these natives to Trick them all to take the 3 jewels, work for the two aims, and understand the concept of Causality. But to be fair, in Mahayana they add an extra aim or objective which is the quest to become a Bodhisattva. The elaborate scam which Mahayana was explained to be, was acceptable, for the End Result justifies the means and methods [upaya].

The phenomenon of Vajrayana Buddhism as a general institution is an even better example which the Western occultist may better relate to. Vajrayana developed as a "offshot" of Mahayana, but it is heavily influenced by Brahminical tantrikas and the indigenous animism of its natives. They take the use of upaya to a whole different level. Basically the Buddha said that with upaya, one can use whatever methods possible to get the end job done. EVEN if the methods used contradicts the Buddha's own teachings and is heterodox, antinomian, and outright vile and violent.

So inside the weird world of Vajrayana are many different "sects," each using a different upaya. There are actually some sects in this version of Buddhism which uses Vamachara [left handed practice] as a Means and Method [upaya]. One quick sect which uses left hand practice that comes to mind are the Drugpa. If the Vamachara or Vama Marga as an Upaya works in eventually tricking its adherents to follow those aforementioned 6 “landmarks,” then the upaya – no matter how crazy it seems to be – is a useful and acceptable Method which works.

I was actually researching about these Buddhist sects that uses vamachara and they explain that all the sexual rites, and dark sorcery they use eventually leads the adherent into the Buddhi [understanding] that such occult practices are first meaningless, and second a delusional manifestation of the power of Mind [Buddha in esoteric Buddhism]. It’s the same idea as if you were to give a stubborn fat lady a shopping spree credit card to all the chocolate and cheese cake stores in her town. Yes it’s “bad” for her health, but sometimes you have no choice but to let the fat bitch overdose herself and get a health problems before she Buddhis [intuitively realizes] that the shit is actually bad for her.

So for me, as a Buddhist who regularly uses upaya to trick people into being Buddhists, if you as a person want to practice sex magic, I’d say go for it! In fact I’d suggest practicing your sex magic in the red light district in Thailand or Africa where AIDS is catchable. Why would I want you to get AIDS? Because it is a Buddhist Dhamma that we do things reasonably within the limits of moderation. Buddhism proper does not condemn anything, it only suggests Reason and Moderation. And if you need to first get AIDS before you understand to have sex reasonably and moderately, then that is just the way you learn things.

It must be kept in mind that the Means and the End are not the same thing. The freeway you take to get to the end Destination are two different things. There is more than one freeway you can take to the same Destination. In the West you pay 99% of your awareness on the details of the vehicle you are driving and the freeway you are taking. Christianity or Satanism? Materialism or Spirituality; etc. In Buddhism proper, it don’t fucking matter, as long as I can trick your ass to the Destination. If you’re acting like a dumb baby and need some Satanism or occult shit to get you to move, then that’s what you’ll get. The Buddhism as a sasana and the vamachara some sects uses are two different things. One is used as a tool or device to lead into the other. Which is why such devices are called Yana meaning Wagon or Cart. You sit on the cart and it actually gradually leads you somewhere.

I have this book I stumbled upon in a book store about this topic. The book was written by a hiker from England who was hiking around Tibet way back before China took it over, when Tibet was closed to tourists. This hiker ended up staying in Tibet for 7-8 years wandering about and learning about Tibet’s colorful Buddhism. I can’t remember the name of the old book, and I have too many books to look through them all.

This hiker in his book shares how the Buddhism he encountered is rippled with occult practices and magic, many of which are from the native Bon religion. Eventually over the years he became “academic” in his knowledge of Tibetan Buddhism and learned a lot of things about the general outsider never sees. There was a part in the book where a monk was explaining to him that in Tibet some lama have the power to teach their students from a distance without words. In English we call this “telepathy.” The hiker explains how these lama do this. He goes into a lot of detail as to how occult things are done. In another part of the book he explains how he has heard rumors that things like the Yeti, and other snow monsters seen around the icy boundaries of Tibet are magical manifestations monks create to guard and scare outsiders away. Similar to the Jewish occult concept of "Golem" I would say.

At one point he is able to ask a lama why or how their Buddhism can teach such bizarre magic and dark sorcery and still believe it to be Buddhism? The lama explains to the curious Englishman that all of the magic and occultism first trains the adept to tap into latent powers of the mind, which the Buddha himself said were possible. The occult power of manifesting such things as deities and demons is an upaya with an end purpose. For, once the adept personally experiences the ability to manifest deities and demons in front of himself, the adept then intimately comes to an intuitive realization [Buddhi] that such entities are actually nothing more than manifestations of the power of Mind [Buddha]. Then, when the adept understand this, he comes to the realization that the world itself is samsara, and thus, he quests for his Liberation and is unattached to the world. So in the end as you can see, the magic and occult powers of materializing deities and demons is an elaborate upaya – Trick – to lead the student in a big ass circle back to the basic 4 Noble Truths. That's an Upaya that works. To know something is different from realizing the same thing from personal experience. Like studying a map and then actually doing the hiking of the terrain. Knowledge results in the potential for the student to be attached to such superficial abstractions. Personal experiential Realization has the potential to Liberate the student where that he is able to let go of such conditions and develop into something more: Self Surmounting.

So the original question is: Buddhist Satanist? Is there such a concept? No. Buddhism is not "compatible" with Satanism technically, but if formed right, a Satanism can be a proper upaya, and a proper Form [vehicle]. The upaya must lead the adherent to those 6 aforementioned "landmarks." An example is what I do with the ONA. It doesn't matter if you are at the moment attached to labels and like Satanism or the occult. I'll use what you are dependent on. You may look around the 1500 pages I have so far written and ask where the 3 jewels and other stuff are at? They are everywhere, broken down into things the Western mind [their Weltanschauung] can digest without much fuss. If you look closely, I break the jewel of Buddha down into Mind, Awareness. I break Dhamma down into "Natural Phenomena." Sangha I am still slowly working on, which is being broken down into concepts like an "Order," a "Kollective," a "Peer Group," etc. Buddhi I have already broken down into the western meme of "Understanding," and "Gnosis." Samsara I have already broken down into a fixation on ideas or an imprisonment within abstractions. Causality the ONA does a great job with already in notions such as Causal, Aeonics, Wyrd, etc.

It doesn't matter what you superficially call yourself now in the ONA, cuz its now an upaya or vehicle which ultimately leads you to seek refuge in the three jewels: in your own Mind [Buddha] in Natural Phenomena or Natural Philosophy [Dhamma] and in sharing Insights for each other's own Development [Sangha]; quest for your own Enlightenment [Buddhi] and Liberation [Nibbana] and come to pragmatically understand the flowing of Causality of which you and I are a part of [Kamma-Vipaka]. Don't get so caught up in the superficial wording and labels. Like I intimated elsewhere, if a people are fixated on words, then those words can be used to trick such people. Because they only see the outer exoteric superficial meanings of such words, and fail to realize the esoteric essence. Gnosis or Buddhi? Doesn't matter, same.

Self-Enlightenment/Development or Sambuddhi? Doesn't matter, same shit. Causality, Wyrd or Kamma and Vipaka? Doesn't matter, same shit. Dhamma or Natural Phenomena? Doesn't matter, same shit. Dhamma is and extrapolation of dhamma: the Teaching is an extrapolation of Natural Phenomana. The dhamma to be smart about what you do in life is an extrapolation of the understanding of the Natural Phenomena of Causality, cause and effect. Nibbana or Self-Liberation from the ideas and idealisms that imprisons you? Doesn't matter, same shit.

Q2: Gods or No Gods? Materialism or Spirituality?

A2: It's a matter of perspective and where your eyes are focused. Take the color spectrum for instance. If your attention is focused within the details of the spectrum you see 7 different colors. Surely it's inaccurate to say that Red and Blue are the same things, cuz they are not. But you take a step back and you realize that the 7 colors are part of a Unity whose different aspects Flows together, like the currents of a single river. Mind or Matter? Spirit or Stone? Left or Right? Up or Down? Ice or Steam? Boy or Girl? Potential Energy or Kinetic Energy? These are all spectral aspects of a a greater Unity. They are all little currents that makes up a river. The currents of a river are not different individual things separated from each other or the river itself. What does the word "Universe" mean? It means to Turn [Versus/Vert] As One [Uni]. A river flows as One Thing, and the Universe Turns As One Thing. Like a bike wheel turns, and all the little spokes of that wheel turns together As One with the wheel it is a part of.

If you step back and see things from a wholistic manner [non-dualized] then all is One Thing. If so then there are no deities or gods outside of this Unity. These gods can't even be called archetypes of some subjective unconscious, because in such a non-dualized condition, there is no false dichotomy of "Objective" or "Subjective" loci. It's all just one potential mess. If you exist and if gods exist, neither are "somethings" different or separate from the Whole, which wholeness is you/us. So there is no need for deities. Only with a mind focused – attached, clingy – onto reified details does the concept of theism [and atheism] seem to arise. Small minds perceive/understand small things. This is not an absolutism. Meaning that if you lose perspective of the finer detail and just see a big blob you are intelligent. You would be equally dumb.

It's like looking at a car. You can not only see the car as a Unity but you also realize the finer parts: the four wheels, the doors, the trunk, etc. When you look at a tree you can see Both the tree as a Unity AND as compartmentalized pieces: leaves, bark, flower, fruit, branches, trunk, etc. Both perspectives at the same time gives the most clearest picture and insight. Can you see a person's feet and head as being parts of a wholer Unity? If not then you are missing an entire Middle part which connects the feet to the head: everything between the ankles and neck! Can you understand that Red and Violet are connected as a single Unity? If not your missing the entire Middle part: Orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo. Can you see Matter and Mind as being indivisible and actual non-separated parts of a wholer Unity? If not then you are missing an entire Middle. How about Spirit and Stone? One thing or two things? If you say two things you are missing an entire Middle.

So sometimes Buddhism is explained by the Buddha as being the Middle way between two extremes. This does not suggest a neutral middle ground. It suggests the Middle parts which makes two extremes a Wholistic Whole Unity. Gay or Straight? The Wholistic Unity is that each are aspects of the spectrum of human sexual expression. The quest of the Buddhist seeking so called Self-Enlightenment of the World and Natural Phenomena is the same quest the Natural Scientist is on: to Dis-Cover first the individual nature of things, and then to Dis-Cover how all such things are connected to each other to give the Wholer Picture. If connections cannot be seen, then pieces to the greater puzzle are missing and have yet to be uncovered. The point is to not Believe or hold onto any one perspective as being “better” than any other.

In fact, the word “Buddhist,” and the word “Scientist,” means the exact same things. A Scientist is an “-ist” on a quest for Knowledge [Scientia]. A Buddhist is an “-ist” on a quest for Knowledge/Understanding [Buddhi]. Both the scientist and Buddhist empirically study the same “thing,” which is Natural Phenomena [dhamma]. Both utilize reason, logic, and intuition to gain an understanding of Natural Phenomena. So it can be loosely stated that any person who follows the Sasana [instructions] of the Scientific Method, uses Empiricism, and has the End Goal of Sambuddhi [Self-Enlightenment] and an Awakened [Buddha] Understanding [Buddhi] of the world, who process his or her theories via a peer review process [Sangha] is a “Scientist” whether they use that label or not. The work of both the Buddhist and Scientist is to dis-cover and know the many hidden parts of Nature, and then to dis-cover how it all fits together. The point is not to deify theories or beliefs.

The point is to put the pieces consciousness has divided together to form the greater understanding [Buddhi] of things. The clearer the Unity is realized, the more crisp Self-Realization [Sambuddhi or Sambodhi] will be. In Taoism there is the saying that goes: “Heaven, Man, and Earth are One. To know one is to know the others.” If self knowledge or self understanding is hard to approach, the try to gain an understanding of Nature [Earth]. If Earth is too hard to understand, then try to gain an understanding of Heaven [Cosmic Flow, Cosmic Principles/Laws]. Both an understanding of Heaven and Earth will lead to an understanding of Self [Man] and vice versa. Self-Knowledge; meaning a genuine knowing of the Nature of Man; leads to the understanding of Heaven and Earth.

Man is at times a heartless and cruel creature, and so we see the same Nature in Earth [Nature]. Mother Nature is at times violent and cruel where a single monsoon can kill 100,000 lives in one day. Although Heaven is mostly dark, it is speckled with Beauty. And so too are Man and Earthly Nature speckled with its own Beauty. The Earth thrives with life, just as we [Mankind] are “alive.” And so as our science and understanding of space grows, we will one day dis-cover that space is conducive to life, or at least that life arises from space and the organic chemistry it contains. But these three things; Heaven, Earth, Man; are a Unity. If you can’t see the Unity, then you/we are missing the Middle parts which connects them. Natural Philosophy is the Quest to first know such parts of Nature, and then to dis-cover how all parts are related and connected as a whole. You do yourself a gross injustice when you hold onto one piece of the puzzle and proclaim such piece to be the Only Truth. Nature, Reality, cannot be so simple as to fit into a single simplified perspective. The Path to Understanding begins first with letting that false notion go: that one single perspective is right and all others is wrong. This is what I mean by “dichotomized thinking.”

The Art Of Teaching

It is in the nature of the conscious apparatus to divide the quiddity of things into little manageable parts. The left brain also is wired to do this. There is nothing wrong with this. It is the nature of Intuition – what the ancients actually called Intellect/Nous – and the right brain to see things in a wholistic and interconnected way. The trick is to bridge these two perspectives and functions of Mind. The Buddha both pondered on the individual things in nature [a forest] and he went into deep meditation in the Unity of inner silence to intuitively feel the Wholeness or interconnectivity of things. Which in esoteric Buddhism is to say that an Awaken Mind [Buddha] is able to Perceive things both ways, and is able to seek out the Middle parts to connect the divided parts on it's own [sambuddhi]. The quest is hard, but just as hard is the way of teaching the Blind to see and the Heartless [without chitta] to feel.

One thing that bugs me greatly in the bowels and colon of the Western Occult Tradition we call Satanism is the way many of these mundane satanists teach their peers. They completely disregard an individual's uniqueness and individual condition and state of inner development and level of understanding. Yet they insist that they are "individuals." If you are an individualized being, don't you know that others have their own individual state of mind, and level of understanding different from you? It's the same method of "teaching" as if a 6th grader were to walking into a grade school cafeteria and proclaim out loud: "Okay everybody, my dad just told me Santa Claus is fucking fake! All you 3rd graders and such who believes in him are stupid!"

What they do is they take an idea or ideal and turn such things into a big blanket. Then they assert this blanket on everyone around them indiscriminately. Or another things they do is you see the ones with a big vocabulary actually suggest to others that if others want to understand them, they have to reach their lofty level word usage. In other words, the proper concept of pedagogy is non-existent in the Satanism subculture. They seem to confuse assertion and grade school ridicule to be methods of teaching Satanism. And so if you want others to recognize you as a Satanist or like you, you give in to their assertions.

I learned how to teach from two people. The first person is my grandma. What happens is that I don't speak fluent Khmer and I only understand primitive words. So my grandma when explaining things to me patiently tries to paint pictures for me with examples rather than use big words. If the object of teaching is to get your pupil to have the same understanding of things you do, you use methods conducive to that objective. Using big words to make you appear smart to a pupil does not do anything. You don't have to make yourself look smart if a pupil comes to ask you a question anyways. My grandma uses something called "Empathy" to feel out my level of understanding in a given subject. Then she humbles herself to my level of understanding in order to Elevate me to her level gradually. The other person that taught me how to teach is my Bhikkhu grandpa. What he does is paint pictures for me also, then asks me if I understand certain Pali words related to what we are talking about. Usually when he is done explaining things to me he'll ask me if I understand. If I say yes he'll tell me to re-state what I understand about what he explained to me in my English to my aunt-mom who is instructed to translate what I said in English back to him in sophisticated Khmer. He'll listen to what my aunt-mom translates and nods if I got it right. In the case of my Bhikkhu grandpa you see that he is looking for the Essence of what he teaches, and not the superficial wordings or semantics. If you genuinely grasp the Essence of something, you should be able to convey that essence in a multitude of different ways and languages and still retain the Essence. But my Bhikkhu also humbles himself to my level, in order to elevate me to his level gradually.

It's like the beautiful symbolism you find in Christianity: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. [John 3:16]" That God lowered himself, humbled himself from his "lofty" place, to become a Man in the flesh, born of a woman, in order to Elevate humanity to his level. Like a mother and father humbles themselves in order to gradually elevate and nurture their children gradually to their level of understanding. The words, ideas, language, picturing used is put together in context to the child's own progressive Time and Season of development. If the child has the nature of being imaginative and works best believing in Santa Claus and Easter Bunnies, then you allow them to have those things and use such things to elevate them in different ways. The silly thing I see sometimes is that some Satanists will say that they will teach their children to not believe in a Santa Claus and not to participate in Christmas, which is just as stupid and silly as a Jehovah's Witness saying the same things for a slightly different reason. And these Satanists insist that their Satanism is not a religion and that it does not control them.

If a person has theistic tendencies, then allow them to have it and use that to help elevate them in other ways. If they are materialists then allow them to have that, and use that to elevate them in different ways. In time – it its proper time and season – they will grow a larger perspective and level of understanding. If the Teacher understands that no single perspective is the single right one, if the Teacher understands the Unity, if the Teacher understands that our beliefs do not in any way alter the actual fabric of our reality; then this Teacher should understand to let people be, and to work with their pupils with empathy and understanding, and to use what each pupil has to elevate them towards the Destination of Self-Enlightenment and Liberation. A good Teacher lets the pupil be as they are and just shows them to the path. The student then is left to walk the path on their own, to come to their own understandings of things in the proper time and season of each persons individual process of development.

So, is the ONA theistic or atheistic? Is ONA materialistic or Spiritual? It cannot be any of these things exclusively if we understand the nature of humanity, heaven, and earth. It should be open to all Forms each Niner gravitates to. Open to all forms that is more conducive to Self-Enlightenment, Self-Development, and Liberation to each Niner respectively. If a Sinister Initiate is empowered by Traditional Satanism, then use that form. If a Sinister Initiate is more creative and productive with the Magical and mystical system of the ONA, then use that form. If the Sinister Initiate works better at their self-development with a Symbolical form of Satanism, then let them work with that. If a Niner doesn't like Satanism and is more empowered by the Eastern Left Hand Path, then allow them to use or develop that Form. If a Niner is less spiritual, then let them take the materialist route and allow them to get good at material science. If a Niner is drawn to the spiritual side of ONA, let them be so. All we each are to each other is a peer with a different perspective to offer. All we can shed on others or impart to other is what Insights we each gain from our individual state of mind, level of understanding, and state of being.

ONA sells itself short if it limits itself to some supposed single Truth. The end Goal is Self-Development, as opposed to playing musical chairs with ideals and beliefs. Have you ever noticed that? How people – especially in the Occult sector – play musical chairs with their gods and beliefs and points of view. It becomes that each time they change their mind, they drop out of one belief system and adopt another. And they translate this as progress or development. When in fact all that is happening is the person is substituting one paradigm for another. Substitution does not mean self-development and self-enlightenment or Liberation. It just means a circular game of rejection and substitution. Long term wise, an institution built on a single “right” perspective, and single Truth will have a high turn over rate, and thus a low Social Capital value. Low social capital value means its worthless a system to be of benefit to anyone. The thing is a Vehicle gets you to a Destination and is not something to live in. People in the West seem to be happy dwelling in their stationary wagons and changing vehicles when one gets old. In a sense: they end up going nowhere.

DISTURBING NOTES II

Disturbing Notes II

I. Children

I've always wondered if what we describe as being "human" is innate or original and unique to our species. The more I look at animal behaviour, the less I believe there is anything unique about us. Especially when I study the behaviour of animals that live with people or are exposed to humans. Like the fascinating case of Koko the gorilla who can communicate in sign language. Or talking parrots and crows. Cats and dogs also. These animals seem to be able to pick up or mimic things which we would consider to be "human." Then opposite to that are the fascinating cases of feral children. Especially the children who are disconnected from other humans below the age of 5 or so.

I've been fascinated with the feral children phenomenon for a long time. One of the first things I read about this subject was a book I can't remember the title of since I read it over a decade ago. The book wasn't about feral children. It was a book on mysticism and the ancient quest for the first human language. The book said that for a very long time people believed that Hebrew was the divine and first human language. At least in Europe. The book told of the only known case of when children were used to conduct an experiment to see if Hebrew was a divine language. What happened was a real king – I can't recall what country he ruled – got into an argument with a few religious people who claimed that Hebrew was the Original human language. But this king believed that the language of his people was the Original human tongue. I want to say that the king believed Greek was the first human language, but I don't think I'm recalling it right. So the king set out to prove himself right by conducting an actual experiment using real children. What the king did was take very young children of peasants away from their parents and he raised them up isolated from all human language. He had instructed the nurses who would care for these children to never ever utter a single word to them. The king hypothesized that since his people's language was the first and original language, then these children isolated from all human language will grow up naturally speaking his people's language and not Hebrew. Strangely the children did grow up to spontaneously speak a language, but it was neither Hebrew nor the language of the king. It was Phrygian of all things! I'm not really sure I can believe this historical incident.

I watched a documentary on feral children and the several scientists in the doc said that there is a short window of opportunity for a human child to acquire language which is between the moment of birth to around the age of 6. This is because the language center in the child's head is barely developing, and its synaptic networks forming. So whatever language of means of communication it is exposed to during those crucial years is what the child ends up speaking and using. After the threshold age, a human becomes incapable of learning language. The longer this child is isolated from human contact or language, the less likely the child will use, learn, and comprehend language. Not to mention the less "human" in Nature and behaviour they will become. The doc spent a lot of time on a particular feral child sometimes called the Dog Girl who is from Russia or one of those countries near Russia. She was in her teens when they found her, so she was well past the threshold to be humanized. Since she was raised by dogs, she even walked on all four like one, slept on the ground like one, and ate like one. The only thing human about the unfortunate girl was her human body. Otherwise she was very, "not-human-like," is a nice way to put it.

After many years of thinking about this subject, and how even our so called "humanness" is an acquired mode of behaviour, I learned to see and appreciate Culture more. I use 'Culture' in an Eastern sense and a European sense. I didn't think there was a difference until I was having a conversation with a friend of mine once. He was a normal White America. I brought up the topic of culture and to continue our conversation, my friend jumps on the subject and said in a deep and thoughtful way: "You know, I never liked the opera. I mean no offense to you. I just never got into it. The plot is boring, the singing is obnoxious and in a different language, and the audience are usually senior citizens." I didn't have the heart to argue with my friend or inform him that he was a retard, so I just nodded my head, and went along with the opera tangent. But in my mind to myself I was like: "What the fuck. I said Culture and he talks about opera. Are we talking the same language?"

Culture is any social meme -idea, act, behaviour, music, etc – which you Cultivate; you can see the same root word in those two words. This correlation between Culture and Cultivation of plants may be "universal." In Khmer we have an indigenous term [sans Pali or Sanskrit] meaning a people's Culture, Customs, and Ways which is "T'nam T'lop," which is pronounced here as "Tuh-nee-uhm Tuh-lawp." If you take those two words apart from each other and pronounce them as they are spelt in Khmer, then you can decipher the essence of what a Culture is in this oriental world-view. The word T'nam [Tuh-nam] means Plant, Vegetation, and edible crops you grow and cultivate on a farm. It doesn't mean any old plant or bush, it strictly means cultivated and grown produce that people eat like tomatoes and herbs. T'lop [Tlawp] is the word for Habit, or an act one is acCUSTOM to doing over and over again, or to have done something before. Like if I say: "I t'lop go to Mexico," it means that I have been to Mexico before and I imply that I might go again. Or the idiom "Tlop Dai [hand]" means a habit you Do which is hard to break, literally meaning a Habit of the Hand. I would translate that term as "Habitual Cultivation," or "Cultivated Habit," in English. When one person does something over and over again, it is called a Habit. When two or more people do the same thing together over and over again it is called a Culture, Custom, or Way. But this is how I understand the word coming from my cultural background. I honestly don't know what the word "culture" means in American English as it is used by a cultureless breed of White people here. For example if I study every day at school for an hour before lunch, it is a personal or private Habit of mine which I just cultivate or am in the habit of doing. But if all of my Asian friends also studies at the same time everyday, and we do it all together in the same place, then it is a Culture a group of students Share. So that's what a Culture is when I use the word. This then would include such things as dance style, music style, art style, structural architecture, traditional wardrobe, dialect of language, etc. The key point here is a Sharing of acts and behaviour. That Sharing together of habitual cultivation of acts and behaviour over time induces a strong group identification in each group member, and it induces cohesion and solidarity. Think the military. You collect the most random young people from all walks of life who have nothing in common, force them to share a habitually cultivated routine for a few months, and they come out Cultured, structured, Disciplined, with a group identity, group solidarity, and out in the battlefield, they are prepared to fight and die for each other.

This is where things like sasana, rites, rituals, ceremonies, observances, and Traditions in a Culture comes into important play. Growing up as a child my aunt-mom when she tucked me in at night would teach me a simple, but repetitive little rite before going to bed. She'd teach me to pray to my dead blood grandfather – her father – by calling his name and asking him to follow me and keep me safe and bless me with peace and happiness. After I said my prayer, she'd remind me that our spirit doesn't die, and that our ancestors are always with us, watching over us. I also was taught the cultural upper class habit of clasping my hands to my aunt-mom every morning when she dropped me off at school to ask her for permission to leave her to go to class, and I wasn't allowed to leave the car until she dismissed me with permission. These are little rites, but they are cultivated habitually over and over, year after year. Not only in and by me due to my upbringings, but also in every other child of my culture and class. Such that it becomes a Cultural practice of a people, which has been observed and practiced for many centuries. This simple rites breeds in you the knowing of respect for your ancestors and the inner – empathic – understanding of what Honour is and means. After doing that morning rite of properly asking for permission to leave for school with clasped hands from grade school to junior high, I know what Honour and honouring your mother and parents means inside. Any soldier who has been habitually cultivating that military life knows – from cultivated experience – what Honour and respect means. The minute an American open his mouth and questions in a smart ass way what Honour means and what the value of respect is, he gives his cultureless and rootless Nature and upbringings away.

Like any farmer will tell you, it is the Fruit which comes out of one's hard labour that speaks and is a testimony for the value and worth of the labour wrought. If a farmer brings to his farmer's market huge and healthy fruits and vegetables, as a neighbor farmer who wants to grow the same kind of fruits and vegetables you ask him what he did to grow such. Then you take the technique he shared with you and duplicate it. Or if you ate a great tasting dish at a friend's house and you want to learn to cook the same dinner with the same great taste, you ask your friend for her secret family recipe. In Pali we have a word for that sharing of technique or secret recipe, it's is: Sasana. Sasana is basically a methodology shared to you by someone in order that you causally manifest an end result. Do you like the dinner I cooked? If so here are the step by step methods and ingredients I use. If you follow it, you will end up with the same end results.

So just like we can say that a soldier in the military is the end result of his military culture and training, we can say that you and I and our children we may have or will have are products and the end result of a culture shared by a group of people [folk, family]. Now, just like we look at and evaluate fruits and vegetables at a farmer's market, we look at me and you, or pick a handful of people from different places around the world. Then ask yourself what type of person you want to be, and more importantly, what kind of children/humans, do you wish to populate your country with in future.

Do you want yourself and children to be like the generic White Hubris American Mundane? Like them who are sell outs. Who uprooted themselves and sold out their ancestral culture for the faux culture of Consumerism, and democratic or republican policies? What do these Homo Hubris actually live for. Think about it. I can say I live for a big family. Meaning how I act and live goes to benefit my family. Meaning that my efforts ultimately goes to benefit my family. Meaning that everything I do, goes to benefit my family and friends. I am not independent of my family. Now you look at these White Hubris American Mundanes who stress that they are "individuals," free from religion, culture, social restraint, who have no real family. Who are they living out their human lives for? For employers, for banks, for car lots, for politicians. In essence for people out to make a lot of money and power off of them. The more individualized you are, and the less of a people or family you have to live for, the more dependent you are on the fat cats for handouts. Do you want your children like them? Cuz if you do, all you have to do is be liberal and let your kids just be "raised" like they were raised. If you don't want your children like them, then you're gonna have to be a little more conservative and traditionalistic with your ancestral Culture, heritage, folk or family identity, etc. But it goes beyond just having kids. A nation or civilization is nothing more than the collective habitual way of life a mass of people share. So it is actually about how your country, nation, or civilization will be like far in the future. Can you see that far? And then can you plan ahead and begin to causally act to produce end results that far? The average mundane human can't, and I doubt they care either.

It's like the old story of the ant and grasshopper we've all heard. Unfortunately the story is misunderstood, or people don't get the deeper meaning. You have ant busy working, and a grasshopper hanging around and eating leaves. That grasshopper will mate and the female grasshopper will lay her eggs in the ground. Then she dies. The ants work themselves until they die. Both the grasshopper and the ants will meet the same end fate: death. But they each lived their lives for something different. The ants lived their lived to build up their nest or colony for their Unborn. The grasshopper lived for himself. The difference is that the progeny of the ants will inherit a big colony and a means to a prosperous life. Whereas the grasshopper children will come out individualized with nothing. You look at any given nation and you'll see these same two ant and grasshopper culture. The majority of a population are the ignorant grasshoppers, who are born poor, wage earners, dependent on a system. The few are the ant who inherit what their family left for them. These usually end up running the system and corporations. It's not about money. It's about the Quality of life. Or Dukkha as we call it in Buddhism. It is your duty as a Buddhist to try to relieve the Dukkha of your family and kin. To try and some how give your family and sangha a peaceful life without much worry. It all goes back to Culture and Traditionalism or Conservatism if you understand it all. Your children are borne literally blank slated, even without their humanness. These things are learned and acquired by them following and mimicking your acts and examples. Culture is the medium by which our humanness, language, worldview, mode of behaviour, are cultivated in the next generation. In life – in any race and country – there are Noble high quality humans, and there are the many generic common peasantry. Which type our own children will be depends on us and the culture we instill in them or lack thereof.

II. Prisons

I think prison is a place where we hide and dismiss what Jung calls the Shadow self. We know that we are human, and we know that people in prison are human, but it becomes very hard for many of us to admit that what prison folk have done is human. We fear such Shadow nature enough to lock them up in prisons: out of sight, out of mind. Or as they say in Spanish: Ojos que no ven, Corazon que no siente; what the eyes do not see, the heart-mind/chitta does not sense. We fear that Shadow nature enough to lock it up in hell in our myths and religious beliefs. If not fear, then we are at least in denial of such Shadow aspect of our human Nature.

War is another place to see this Shadow nature. Not the silly romantic idealisms pushed by people who have never seen a war or experienced a war physically. But real war out in the battlefield. The visuals of dead bodies, the act of slaughtering people, the women raped, the people uprooted from their land and homes, the orphaned children crying and dying, the helplessness of innocent lives caught up in a war they did not want. I have never seen or experienced a war directly, but my family has been through a genocidal revolution. It's not pretty, heroic, or romantics. My grandmother is tough. While fleeing the country during the revolution to Thailand, she experienced the full effect of the revolution. She and her older children has see the many corpses, the decomposed bodies, the fields of bones, the slaughtering of their own family members. I consider that a valuable experience. So I once asked my grandmother what her impression of humans were based on what she had seen during that revolution. She shook her head and just said: "It's as if they [the Khmer Rouge] weren't human, but animals." She then added: "Which is why the ancestors admonished us to know Sasana, any Sasana, and to believe in God and Metta. Because even though we as humans can commit such deplorable acts, we as humans also have a softer, more caring nature as well."

The idea is to not deny or dismiss that Shadow nature of our humanness, but to understand it. And you can't understand something without a direct experience. That Shadow self must somehow be experienced, where that we come to realize – empathically – that we each have both a Light side and a Shadow side. The trick then is to integrate the Light and the Shadow, and fade them into Grey. Integration doesn't mean to beat your wife with your left hand and give to charity with your right. It means to merge the two into one new holistic wholeness, samma, wholesome Nature.

This subject of denial of the Shadow self reminds me of the Jewish mythos regarding YHWH. There was a point in time when God [yhvh] vowed that he would never be wrathful to his people again. And so God removed that wrathful part of himself, and he cast that wrathful part down into the dark sea of the earth. That wrathful part was called Leviathan. Levi meaning 'Curved' or 'crooked' as in a Curved shepherds staff; Than meaning serpent or dragon. I've always found it funny how these mundane satanists act like the Jew God when they deny and dismiss their Shadow nature. When they ethically bleat out things like: "A true satanists isn't racist. Racism is wrong!" And things of that sort. They try hard to dismiss that unethical or socially unacceptable aspects of human nature, rather than come to intimately understand that nature. And in doing so, they become a house divided, where they themselves – as a being of human nature – are divided, cleaved, halved. And you look closely at who is dictating what is socially ethical and socially acceptable which they dismiss. It's the generic unthinking mass that simply fears such Shadow nature. We fear that which we do not understand. Locking what we don't understand up in a prison or whatever does not lead to a gnosis or understanding. Neither does denying and dismissing such Shadow nature. But again, this has nothing to do with picking sides. It has to do with being mature enough to understand our own human nature in a wholistic and objective manner so that we can integrate ourselves into a Whole person sans the childish denial, and sans the idealistic or ideological blinders.

III. ONA

I think it was common practice in the past during phase 2 of feyan for different Satanic organizations to liberally borrow from ONA to add to their institutions. And then we have some ONA groups which took what they needed of ONA and then slowly drifted away from ONA to be their own thing. Usually so the founder can be their own grandmaster with their own following. And there is nothing wrong with this, if we really understand the meaning of the word "influence" and "inspire."

When the WSA352 came into the scene we were entirely ignorant of how past ONA influenced groups did things. So we ended up doing the entire opposite. Instead of beefing up the Satanism and weird demon mythos, we faded that out and just talked about Buddhism and other forms of Oriental mysticism. Instead of trying to separate from ONA, we tried to get closer in different ways. One way was over the years we dismantled our WSA "memplex" into all of its itty-bitty memes, and then very slowly, gradually grafted each of those memes into the ONA. So if anybody ever wondered what ever happened to WSA's stuff and why all we talk about is ONA, it's because the two have long since been merged. I'll give a quick example of how I dismantle a WSA meme and graft it into the ONA.

For instance in the old days WSA had something called Opus Vrilis which is our collection of writings. The idea or concept behind Opus Vrilis originally was to get all of our friends 3 years ago to each add their own thoughts to Opus Vrilis in such a way where that "our" Satanism Progress as a peer based project. So instead of consuming a Satanism some other person created, we as peers produce a Satanism we need and want. Unfortunately the peer based idea didn't work for Opus Vrilis because nobody wanted to write or produce ideas. They were more willing to consume ideas. So what we did was we took that same peer based development meme and we silently grafted it into the ONA. Which was easy to do because DM & RM in the old days left instructions in their old writings that the ONA needs to evolve and be developed. All we did was peg our peer group memes onto that imperative.

So now instead of just one Anton Long as the sole executive producer of ONA memes, we each as fellows of the ONA help produce, develop, and evolve the ONA. This peer based approach has its pros and cons. A pro is that with all of us building onto the ONA, we ween ourselves off of a reliance on Anton Long's ideas and leadership. This fixes a big problem: the problem of people saying shit like: "Oh David Myatt has gone to better things, he left ONA, therefore its dead." Those mundane satanists can have a satanism without a leader, but they won't allow us to have an ONA without a leader, even when AL has over and over again for the past 3 years stated that ONA is now peer based. If it is peer based, who the hell cares if one person of many [DM] left or not? Like the Gods said in a video: "Bury the man, and continue the plan." Not that they have any real proof to support their assertions that DM has left. Which I think is funny. All they have are their personal extrapolations based on internet chatter. No mundane satanist who asserts that DM has left ONA actually has any real communication connection with DM, or RM, or anybody in their 'inner circle.' There are plenty of us who have been communicating with the Usual Suspects for at least 5 years like the Temple of THEM, those balobians who talk to RM, etc.

The important concept to keep in mind is that if we as an ONA are dependent on one person [DM] or whoever to give us our ideas and our ONA, then when DM passes away, then yes, ONA will be dead. It boggles my mind how Science as an institution and memplex can stay in tact since the 1600's and also evolve and remain rational without a leader, and how living cultures the world over can exist in tact memetically for thousands of years without a sole meme provider, but yet this same concept cannot apply to ONA? At least in the minds of these mundanes. How is it that Muhammad was able to presence Islam, die, and the culture, tradition, customs, and way of life, remain alive and in tact after he is long dead? Islamic culture exists today independent of the person Muhammad, who doesn't even exist anymore. How does that work?! Can we figure this shit out so we can make it work for ONA? How is it that science today is independent of the olden day Royal Society which was the first institution of science, but ONA can't be independent of its original nexion? How is it that those mundanes' satanism can have no leader, but ONA can't?

So lets look at this issue more closer, cuz it bugs me to bits. You got these fucktard mundane satanists who in their early teens came to know of satanism from The Satanic Bible of Anton LaVey's. They liked what they read which was created by LaVey. They identified themselves as satanists. Then as they get older, they proceed to steal that satanism which they did not invent themselves and they dismiss LaVey. Then you see them adding their own ideas into their stolen satanism, you see them trying to make their own satanic churches, they own true satanisms, and so forth.

Has any person who identifies themselves as ONA ever done that shit? Has any ONA person ever stolen ONA from DM or even from RM? NO. Do we add our own ideas into the mix? Yes, but after the original creators of the ONA gave the thumbs up. In fact we do the whole opposite to our own aeonic detriment. We still sentimentally look toward AL and the Shropsire crew to give us our ONA. None of those mundane satanists invented their satanism. They were consumers of a commercialized satanism sold by Avon of all book publishers which also sell fat bitch romance novels. Nobody in ONA outside of DM invented our ONA either. But we give credit to where it should be, and we keep ONA associated with its founder. DM will say what he needs to say in public, and those mundanes will believe what they read n public. But those of us on the actual inside know things differently. How is it that these mundane fucks can steal Satanism from LaVey, make their satanism leaderless, but they can't allow ONA the same line of development where we actually are doing things in the Legit manner and getting DM/AL to make ONA into a peer based leaderless institution. Do we have to do shit in a dishonourable way like them and steal ONA from its maker for it to be Legit in their dumb fuck eyes?

The con to having a peer based institution is that if there are no safety guards put into place, then things can get diluted and watered down into stupidity. For example Science has safety guards in place which makes sure science stays rational. Some of these safety guards is the use of the scientific method, which basically says that if you want your shit to be science, it's first gotta be tested and then it must be replicable by others. You have the peer review process where the old timers who are respected in the scientific community looks over and gives you their critique of your theories and experimentation and conclusions. This way not any insane person with an over active imagination can introduce his beliefs and speculations as valid science.

The ONA as a peer based institution must have the same safety guards. It already does. We have the 5 Core Principles which gives us five simple things that makes ONA genuinely ONA. Those are 5 big landmarks which defines the psychological territory of ONA. What happens if you cross the defined boundaries? You're no longer in the territory. It's simple. We have the Sinister Dialectics, which essentially keeps retarded ONA people from making ONA into a socially – mundanely – acceptable institution, like those dummies in mundane satanism is trying to make their satanism. They work hard at trying to make their LaVey rip off satanism socially acceptable by the generic average idiot [fellow citizen] of their society so their rip off shit is Legit or something. Fuck the generic public and their opinions or acceptance. Be above that generic mass. Don't seek to be of it. The Seven Fold Way is the measuring stick of ONA. The Traditions, Rites, Ceremonies, Mythos, established in the Black Book of Satan and Naos are the Foundation of what ONA is. What do you do with a Foundation? After a construction team build a foundation, what the hell do you do with the shit? You fucking Build shit on top of it: the actual Structure. The foundation has been set by DM and you/we build our respective Temples and Cathedrals or Pagodas on top of it. That Traditional foundation stays in place, but add to it. Like the 16th Satanic Point said once: "Strive not only forwards, but upwards for greatness lies in the highest." On a fundamental level ONA will always be a dark pagan and Traditional Satanism institution. Traditional as in there has been established a set of traditions. Satanism according to the ONA has different extrapolations. You have what is expounded in the old Ms., "What is Satanism," you have the spiritual tangent where Satan is the name given to a real being. You have the symbolic Satanism as expounded by the "Geryne of Satan." Then you have my personal favourite where the word Satanist in ONA is another way to say an anti-Jew, since Satan is the enemy of the Jew or their God. Most outsider mundanes don't know that the ONA word "Magian" is a term for Jews and their Jew memes, religions, political ideologies, world view, way of life, etc.

For the past three years what I have personally been doing is migrating DM concepts and ideas from his Numinous Way, and the Traditionalist stuff from Reichsfolk over into ONA, to make ONA more Myattian. Others are doing this too such as AL, where you see AL use Myattian terms like "Pathei-Mathos." And now you have things like the concept of the Sinisterly-Numinous, which is the integrated synthesis or Balance of the Sinister [dark/primal/Shadow] with the Numinous [light/divine].

As the years pass by, I would like to see the ONA develop into a means and medium of manifesting in the West a more Natural, Wholistic, way of Life based on Traditionalism, our respective Cultures, Clan family structures, Conservatism, ancestral pathei-mathos, and living aural traditions. So that the next generation in the West can have a way, a means, to revert back to their Natural Humanness. This way, in Time – wyrdwilling [as AL coined] – the West is given something it needs and is missing. But the ONA as a means to make adepts who are “sinisterly” [of the Left Hand] Enlightened must remain in place. The so called magian right handed religions have had 2000 years to show and prove themselves. Their end results we are experiencing today tells us that humanity and the human world in the hands and spirit of these magian religions, ethos, and methods of living are destructive to the species or at least devolutionary. There is a need and use of the Shadow Left Hand.

Parable Of The Orange

One day a young acausal being smelling a grove of orange trees on a world in the causal realm contemplated on what an Orange tasted like. It entered a state of mindful concentration and alone it began to speculate on the possible taste, until it had become frustrated and dissatisfied with its mindful contemplations. Thus it journeyed to an Ancient acausal being who had live many lives in the causal plane to ask what an Orange tasted like.

Now the Ancient one was in deep reflection inside itself when the young acausal being approached it and asked: "I understand the Ancient one has been to the causal realm, and have lived many causal lives. Tell me Ancient one: What does an Orange taste like?"

The Ancient one replied: "Ah yes, Oranges. I was awfully fond of them. I've tasted many in my various causal forms. Sweet is its pulp, and bitter is the sheath around the pulp young one. An Orange thus tastes both bitter and sweet."

The young acausal being looking confused asked the Ancient being: "Could you possibly explain to me what exactly Bitter and Sweet is like, since I have not lived a causal life?"

The Ancient one replied: "Bitter is a bad taste which makes your causal face contort slightly, and sweet is a good taste that makes you smile young one."

Confused the young being asked: "But why should a fruit even bother to taste both good and bad? Why not just good?"

The Ancient one replied: "Without contrast, there is no differentiation in the causal. Without differentiation there would be nothing to experience in the causal. Without experience, there is no realization. Without realization, there is no Enlightenment. Without Enlightenment, there is no progression. Thus without bitterness young one, there is no sweetness. Both must be experienced together. They are both the taste of an Orange. Why, even if a fruit such as a strawberry which tastes entirely sweet, it is often times dipped in salt to give its sweetness contrast young one.”

Confused the young beings said: “Yes that’s good and all, but your discourse isn’t explaining to me what an Orange actually tastes like Ancient one. You have failed to Enlighten me.”

The Ancient one replied: “How can any being describe in words or discourse that which must be experienced young one? You must taste an Orange yourself directly. And when that Orange touches your tongue, there is an understanding of an Orange and its taste that needs no word, discourse, or explanation. You fail yourself when you come to me for answers young one.”

Understanding the Ancient acausal being’s admonishment, the young acausal being went down into the causal realm to become human to taste an Orange.

The Fruits Of Life

We are, you see, that young acausal being who has become a causal creature to Experience the taste of the fruit of causal life. Like an orange, Life tastes both bitter and sweet. Life comes with its ups and downs. It twists and turns unexpectedly like a river. It is both joyful and woeful. And like that inexperienced young acausal being, we often ask why Life should even bother to be both “good” and “bad.” Why can’t Life just be good. Why can’t Life just be ups with no downs. Why can’t Life be like a straight gently flowing river where everything is predictable and expected?

If there was a huge tent at theme park and you heard a lot of hype about a great ride inside that tent and you paid $200 for a ticket to experience this hyped ride. Then you sit in your cart which rolls on a track. And as you ride this hyped ride, the conductor at the front calmly tells you as you are moving, in a soothing and monotoned voice of Bob Ross: “And here we are ladies and gentlemen on the Heavenly Tedious Express. Expect us to go no faster then a safe 3 miles an hour. This ride is terribly safe and predictable unexciting. Please don’t get excited and expect any surprises, twists and turns, because there are none. The tracks of this ride are perfectly straight and leveled. We’re just going to move right straight to the exist as can be expected; safe and sound; without anyone’s heart rate affected. And here we are, wasn’t that an awfully tranquil experience? Thank you, come again.”

Would you come back for a second go, excited, thinking it was the best ride in the theme park or would you think it sucked and was a total rip off? Generally, the most exciting and popular rides in a theme park would kill a senior citizen with heart failure. The more ups and downs a roller coaster has – the higher the ups, and the steeper the downs – the more pukingly exciting the ride is. A great roller coaster ride not only causes you to scream during the ride, but it causes you to scream with your friends after the ride’s over from the sheer craziness of the ride. And then you get in line for a second round.

The entire roller coaster ride itself, with all of its twists and turns, and ups and downs, is One single whole ride/experience. In the same way that the bitter and sweet taste of an orange are not truly two different things but One Thing/experience. Thus, in Life, there are experiences that produces in us happiness and excitement; and there are experiences that produces in us pain and sorrow. The blissfulness of Love, and the hellish pain of heartbreak are two contrasting aspects of the same single Experience. Such as the joy of birth a new addition to a family/clan brings, and the sorrow and tears the death of a loved one brings; are both contrasting aspects of the same single Experience: Life.

So we come to our First Dreccian principle or doctrine: Life is both bitter and sweet.

Consciousness

We are born into this causal existence as if we had a magnifying glass pressed up against our face and eyes. Everything at such an early stage is an amorphous blur of indistinguishable form. Consciousness – the mental state of conscious awareness – is this magnifying glass. Numinous Self – individuated Life Force – is that which perceives and observes from behind this lens.

Our consciousness is a focusing of this lens. In otherwords, we do not become Aware our “Self” if the self has not been differentiated from everything that is “not Self.” Thus, when the magnifying lens is brought further away from the eyes, form is perceived by Mind in that lens. There is a focusing, a clear image of forms in the lens, while the images outside of the lens is faded and burry. This is consciousness: a focusing of the Mind’s Awareness onto material reality and aspects of material reality.

Thus, in a forest, should that lens focus on a tree, this tree comes into sharp focus and the Mind is able to see the details of this tree. The Mind says to itself: “This tree is not me; therefore I am that which is not the tree.” Thus from such unattached observation of Mind on form, there arises differentiation. In which state the Mind gradually becomes Aware of itself from becoming Aware of Contrast.

Consciousness is an essential tool needed in this causal realm. But total dependence and misuse of this tool of mental focus causes certain problems of perception to arise. In focusing on a tree, this magnifying lens only brings into sharp detail what is directly in front of it. Thus the Mind observing this tree through this looking glass, becomes only Aware of the tree, and cannot “see” the forest. This tunnel vision state of consciousness gives birth to mental illusions and distortions of genuine Natural Numinous Reality. For in reality the tree is one of many trees in a forest; and the forest itself is a One Thing.

Thus our Second Dreccian doctrine: Fixation of Consciousness on causal forms distorts reality and causes illusions. How so?

It is out of the habit of mundane awareness to rather than see the “bigger picture” to fixate one’s consciousness onto aspects of Life such as the pain and sorrows of mortal existence. From such fixation – focus of that magnifying glass – only the pain and sorrow of mortal existence is seen in detail, whereas the rest of Life is a blur. And from that fixation of Mind on pain and sorrow, there is born illusion, delusion, dualism, and materialism: ignorance or a faulty apprehension of Life. Such as the ignorance and delusion that Life is evil or full of suffering. This delusional apprehension of Life itself generates mental and emotional anguish which is the Wyrdful fruit of such an ignorant apprehension of Life.

Thus that which is perceived to be suffering, and the mental and emotional distress and anguish that such perception generates are two very different phenomena. For example, let us take a boy and say that he likes a girl. The boy goes to the girl and asks her on a date and she rejects him. His feelings are hurt. This objective experience the boy had he interprets to be painful. But such painful rejection is just a part of Life and an aspect of the game of Love. The actual pain is brief and fleeting.

It is the mental and emotional anguish and worry that a fixation on that rejection that Lingers and Wyrdfully manifests stress, distress, and negative effects on the boy and his Life. He dwells on the idea of being rejected. He is fixated on the mental and emotional worry and anguish. Our thoughts influences our Emotions, and our Emotions governs our Actions and Behaviour in Life. Such that now the boy's lingering mental and emotional anguish causes him to reject others, become antisocial, and from that behaviour he places himself into a lonely and depressing cocoon to protect himself from his delusions of rejection.

You see, the initial objective act of a girl rejecting him itself was causally brief and insignificantly petty which can hardly be said to be lethal. But the depression and emotional stress of loneliness can drive a delusional Mind to commit suicide.

That mental and emotional anguish was a delusion caused by the boy's fixation of consciousness on a causal event is potentially and wyrdfully destructive and lethal. He could have just let it go, picked himself up, dusted himself off, and Let Go of the experience – Unattached: consciousness not fixated – and asked another girl, and another, and another, with determination, until one accepts. And from this determination, this unattachment of consciousness to causal forms and experiences, there is movement, growth, becoming, evolution, and Self Progression.

Thus we come to our Third Dreccian principle of Life: Unattachment of Consciousness to causal forms gives rise to esoteric understandings of Life, and personal progression in Life.

The Flow of Physis

[Quote Ancient Hymn About Physis]

Orphic Hymn 10 to Physis (Greek hymns C3rd B.C. to 2nd A.D.):

“To Physis (Nature), Fumigation from Aromatics. Physis, all-parent, ancient and divine, o much mechanic mother, art is thine; heavenly, abundant, venerable queen, in every part of thy dominions seen.

Untamed, all taming, ever splendid light, all ruling, honoured, and supremely bright. Immortal, Protogeneia (First-Born), ever still the same, nocturnal, starry, shining, powerful dame. Thy feet's still traces in a circling course, by thee are turned, with unremitting force.

Pure ornament of all the powers divine, finite and infinite alike you shine; to all things common, and in all things known, yet incommunicable and alone. Without a father of thy wondrous frame, thyself the father whence thy essence came; mingling, all-flourishing, supremely wise, and bond connective of the earth and skies.

Leader, life-bearing queen, all various named, and for commanding grace and beauty famed. Justice, supreme in might, whose general sway the waters of the restless deep obey.

Ethereal, earthly, for the pious glad, sweet to the good, but bitter to the bad: all-wise, all-bounteous, provident, divine, a rich increase of nutriment is thine; and to maturity whatever may spring, you to decay and dissolution bring. Father of all, great nurse, and mother kind, abundant, blessed, all-spermatic mind: mature, impetuous, from whose fertile seeds and plastic hand this changing scene proceeds.

All-parent power, in vital impulse seen, eternal, moving, all-sagacious queen. By thee the world, whose parts in rapid flow, like swift descending streams, no respite know, on an eternal hinge, with steady course, is whirled with matchless, unremitting force.

Throned on a circling car, thy mighty hand holds and directs the reins of wide command: various thy essence, honoured, and the best, of judgement too, the general end and test. Intrepid, fatal, all-subduing dame, life everlasting, fate (aisa), breathing flame. Immortal providence, the world is thine, and thou art all things, architect divine.

O, blessed Goddess, hear thy suppliants' prayer, and make their future life thy constant care; give plenteous seasons and sufficient wealth, and crown our days with lasting peace and health."

[End Quote]

When we have disciplined our Minds to use Consciousness correctly, and we have learned to Mindfully become Aware of not just one focal point, but of Everything – becoming Mindful of the Forest as opposed to a single tree – we come to “feel” all of Nature as it genuinely is.

There is an effortless Flow to the Way of Nature like the effortless Flow of a river such as the Amazon River. The Amazon River begins effortlessly as snow and rain on the tops of the Andean Mountains. The snow melts and rain falls dripping effortlessly down forming streams. And all these streams converge into one single river eventually becoming the Amazon River.

Causal Life is very much like us coming together on a planned river rafting trip. We companions in Life start off our river rafting experience way off somewhere in the foothills of Peru. Our river will effortlessly bring us from this beginning point to the mouth of the Amazon River thousands of miles away opening into the Atlantic.

But this effortless Flow of Nature shouldn't be envisioned as a peaceful and tranquil Flow, as a leaf gently is carried on a current. The effortless Flow of Nature is one beset with struggle, strife, and danger. It is more like the wild flowing of white rapids.

Of course our River is not entirely white rapids and dangerous. This River is nicely balanced. There are parts of it that are indeed tranquil. There are some parts where the Flowing is fast. Some parts are rocky and dangerous. And sometimes this River breaks and becomes a waterfall.

Our River's Flow carries us effortlessly through a thick jungle of Experience and captivating sights. Every turn and twist brings something new and unpredictable. Our strength and will is tested and challenged at times. Intelligence, strategy, and creativity is demanded at other times if we are to finish the experience triumphantly.

From this effortless Flow which takes each of us into our Life's experiences and forces us to strive and struggle at times, there is inside of us a Natural inner alchemical change. And from this inner change and growth, we surmount our default nature and become better and wiser. More insightful and more capable as we are carried further down this River.

Our Minds in Life is like a rudder and anchor at the same time. As this river of Life Flows, it is with our Mind that we steer our raft in tune to the River's movement, as we are carried by its effortless Flow. This state of being – of being carried to our experiences in Life by Life's effortless Flow – is called Nonattachment To Causal Forms. For we allow this river to carry us into our Experiences, which slowly passes by us as our raft moves. We enjoy the scenery as it passes or learn from our Experiences as the events passes.

But when our Minds are Fixated on a causal form there arises problems. There is born a fight against the Flow of Life. As if our minds were Fixated on a large tree in the Amazon jungle near the bank of the Flowing River, and we fight to keep our raft fixated – attached, focused – at that point. Such an unnatural struggle manifests no inner growth or unfoldment of inner insight.

Thus our Fourth Dreccian doctrine and discipline: Letting Go and living with the effortless Flow of Nature manifests inner and outer growth. Struggling against Nature's current manifests mental and emotional stress, distress, and anguish.

Flowing with Nature does not exclusively mean to allow it to take you places. As you drift down this River of Life and are brought to new sights and experiences, we each become more Aware and Mindful of the Forest around us in an intimate and direct way.

From that Mindfulness of all of Nature as a whole, we come to feel and realize the Oneness and interconnectivity of Life and Nature. We come to understand that we ourselves as a species and as an individual are a living aspect and part of Nature. We we come to dis-cover and understand the Way of Nature and Laws of Nature – how Nature works.

It's from this state of greater Awareness of Nature that we dis-cover that Nature is in essence a single living being with its own Time tested "Way of Life." We dis-cover that our actions we commit as causal parts of this living being ripples out to affect other parts because of the interconnectivity and oneness.

From contemplation of Nature and realizing its Coherency, Symbiosis, and interconnectivity, we gain a very valuable insight pertaining to a Way of Life more in-tune to Nature: the Communitarian way of clans.

In olden days the Jain community in India were the wealthiest portion of India's society. This wealth and power was the manifestation of a very coherent communitarian clannish way of life. The community as a whole strove collectively to be self-reliant by having each clan in the Jain community striving to prosper in life. When a family became poor or lost their home and live stock for some reason, each member of the community gave the troubled family one brick and the equivalent of one dollar to rebuild themselves their home and wealth again. Over time, the coherency and symbiosis of their community died and this practice discontinued resulting in wide spread poverty, famine, abuse, and exploitation under Hindu domination.

Other social orders practice this natural communitarian ethos such as the Amish. When a new home or barn needs to be built, members of the community come together to build the house and barn. Thus the coherency gives rise to self reliance. My own clan/family practices this communitarian culture. When my uncle lost his house and business six months ago due to the economy, the 500 or so members of our clan/family gave the uncle and his wife [he has 4 kids] what they could – which was between $100-$1000 each, to rebuild their wealth.

So from understanding how Nature works, and from applying the Way of Nature in one's Life and clan, there is an effortless gradual growth of power, wealth, and prosperity: the reward of communal physis. It is when we live out of tune with Nature, because we do not understand the Way of Nature, or because we go against its Flow, that we encounter devastating problems in Life.

It is from a misuse of consciousness, when we fixate our minds on singled out parts of Nature – when we cannot see the forest because we are fixated on one tree – that mental, emotional, and physical distress and disorder manifests. Such a fixation of consciousness causes us to fall into the delusion that Nature is a dead thing composed of many independent parts all taking advantage of Nature and each other for their individual survival. From such an ignorant and delusional state of mundane awareness are our unnuminous acts born: the act and state of abuse and rape of Nature.

It is like a group of people living on a tropical island you see. One day these islanders not being able to see Nature – their islands forests and life – as it is; they go about exploiting it oblivious to the Wyrđ – end result – of their collective actions over Time. Such nonempathetic acts born from a misunderstanding of the oneness of Nature disrupts the ecosystem of this island's forest. Over time, when every tree has been cut, the island is barren and can no longer even support its human population.

So we symbolize Physis – Nature – as Baphomet, our Mistress of Earth and Mother of Blood. As Dreccians we are rewarded and cared for by our Mother if we strive to understand Her and Live according to Her Law of Nature and Her effortless Flow. But this Mistress turns bloody and cuts you down when you abuse Her and dare stand against Her Law and Flow.

Inner Physis

As Within, So Without. As Without, So it is Within.

If there is an outer Physis – external Nature – there is also an internal Nature. As outer Nature has its own essence and Flow, so too does this inner nature have its own essence and rhythm.

We each come into causal existence imbued by Nature with our own unique Natural Essence or Inner Physis. Each of us has inside our own Natural essence, quality, inclinations, character, traits, and potential that is Natural to each of us.

For instance one boy may have the Inner Physis of mechanical curiosity and technical creativity while another boy may have an Inner Physis of competing and fighting. Thus if the two boys Lets Go and Flows with their inner nature – the unfoldment of inner physis – the first boy will naturally become an engineer which he would excel at; while the second boy will naturally develop – via physis – into a warrior which he would excel at.

In ancient times when humans lived in tribes and clans, such natural Inner Physis was a matter of life, death, and aeonic continuity. It is how the acausal entity of the tribe manifests causal parts imbued with qualities it needs to causally evolve. So thus, in a tribe or clan, the Inner Physis of the first boy causally adds and progresses the tribe mechanically and technologically while the Inner Physis of the second boy in becoming a Warrior protects the tribes members, territory, and expands such territories. Thus it can be seen that a tribe is a symbiotic super organism, in which each part – person/member – by nature has a unique potential which contributes to the tribe. In the same way that each cell and organ in your body has its own nature and potential to contribute to the body.

In such a tribal context, forcing the first boy to become a warrior and forcing the second boy to become an engineer is detrimental to the Life of the Tribe, because it goes against the inner nature of each boy and undermine each boy's inner potential, which weakens each boy capabilities. We are in essence better and good at what we are born naturally good at doing in otherwords. To go against that Flow of Inner Physis is to weaken oneself and one's potential. In the very same way that a person who struggles to better himself through the process of Physis via its practical methods and applications is must stronger and capable a person compared to one who does not put himself through the boot camp of Physis.

It is only in this modern mundane social order, contaminated with Magian Ethos, wherein there are no tribes and clans, and wherein each family and person is a segregated independent unit that each person can neglect their Inner Physis. In fact, mundane society tries very hard to weaken its citizens by telling them what to become, what to study in school to make the most money, and such, rather than teach each person to simply look inwards for their natural inner potential. Thus a Nation-State of weakened and frustrated humans drones is produced. Frustrated because of the neglect of one's inner potential left unactualized.

Thus our Fifth Dreccian doctrine and discipline: Actualizing one's Inner Physis manifests one's numinous inner Nature whereby one achieves one's fullest human potential.

Cause And Fruit

Our Thoughts gives rise to our Emotions. Our Emotions governs and influences our Actions. The actions that we commit in life are like threads which are woven together. These acts of ours and the acts of others intertwine and together creates a fabric. This fabric is the fabric of our future experiences, our future fate, or destiny.

In simple terms: what we do today, bears fruit tomorrow. If we understand Wyrd – which is the fundamental essence of Causal Reality – we will know that ignorant thoughts, ignorant emotions, and ignorant actions manifests a future fate and life beset with physical, mental, and emotional anguish and distress.

Being Mindful and in control of our thoughts, emotions, and actions, will thus make us Masters of our own Life and Destiny.

Thus our Sixth Dreccian doctrine and discipline: Master oneself and Master Life.

If you do not strive to master yourself – your own thoughts, emotions, and actions – and allow others and random circumstances to manipulate and master you, then these other people and external circumstances are Master of you. Thus you are a slave to others and to external circumstances. If you are a slave, then you are not Liberated: you are not a free person. Genuine Liberation and Freedom is born from the Physis of Self Progression: that art and science of intelligently and willfully governing your thoughts, emotions, and actions as a king governs his people and domain. Not just to become a better person but also to learn to materialize a desired future Life and existence.

If we desire to be rich reasonably in 25 years we work Mindfully toward that goal by planting the Causal Seeds which will grow into such fate Now. Every future Result has its Causal Seeds which bears such fruit. If we desire to manifest a better Civilization 300 years from now, the Causal Seeds are wyrdfully sown today.

We symbolize the essence and nature of Wyrd with Satan. The word satan coming from the Greek "Aitian" – as Anton Long says – which means Cause, source, or the initial cause or source. Cause and Effect is the fundamental essence of Causal Reality. It can be said then that Satan is the very essence of Causal phenomena. He who understands what Satan is and His secrets is amply rewarded in Life. He who is ignorant of Him, ultimately condemns himself to his own destruction.

From the union or marriage and dance of Wyrd and Physis – Satan and Baphomet – is the Living Cosmos born. There is a Nature of subatomic particles, and from the expression and actualization of such nature such subatomic particles act. The actions of which wyrdfully manifests into atoms. There is a Nature and Way of atoms, and when each atom effortlessly follows its natural way it acts in-tune to such with other atoms. And from such acts, elements

Wyrdfullly form. Each element has its own nature and quality, and when such nature is actualized through action with other elements, molecules and compounds Wyrdfullly manifest. Everything in Nature is a Cosmic dancing of Wyrd and Physis. Every particle and Thing with its own essence and potential which it strives to express and manifest. The actions and behaviour of each particle and thing Wyrdfullly influencing and becoming.

Even in the arena of Macro Nature, Wyrd and Physis are still united in a dance of creation and becoming if we would just loosen our conscious fixation on mundane things and become meditatively Mindful and Aware of everything around us as they are. Heat and water each have their own nature and potential which they each express. The expression of which acts on each other, Wyrdfullly manifesting as vapour which become clouds, and rain. That rain and the light of the sun which the heat came from each have their own nature and potential which feeds plants.

From that feeding each plant Wyrdfullly grows fulfilling its own nature and potential baring fruit and harvest. Such fruit and harvest in turn have their own nature and potential. And so they are eaten by animals, which we in turn consume. The consumption of which Wyrdfullly sustains us and thru our Living of Life and what actions we have set into motion as a Livings species, the present world we today exist in is manifest. There is thus only one Nature, and all Things are interconnected.

Experience And Numinous Illumination

If we are to live Life to the fullest and reap its full benefit, then we must each dis-cover what Life actually is. We will never know what Life and Nature is genuinely if we fixate our consciousness and attach it to single temporal things. Staring at a tree does not teach us of the numinous Nature of a Forest. Staring at a star in the sky does not unravel the mysteries of the cosmos. It is only when we have learned to control and use consciousness correctly – as a tool – and we expand that consciousness so that it has the ability to become Mindful and Aware of everything around us do the mysteries of the Cosmos being to unfold.

With Reason, Natural Philosophy, and Meditative Concentration: a silencing of the chattering of the conscious mind, become aware of the slow and natural movement of one's breath. Breath deeply so that the air tickles the very top of the nasal cavity. The tongue touching the roof of the mouth, and the Mind seated between the eyebrows. From that state of Mind, one's Awareness is expanded to feel and become Mindful of everything around you as they are in their undefiled state, and thus the nature of Self, Life, Nature, and the Cosmos are Rationally apprehended.

This is like slowing the Mind down on a hiking trail, so that rather than be fixated on one point or on the destination, the Mind becomes Aware on every little leaf and flower and detail of things you pass by. So that what would have been overlooked, comes into realization. From such Mindfulness of Thing that passes by, the contemplative mind is able to draw from within Esoteric Insight the better to apprehend Life with.

Thus in our Dreccian Way of Life, there are fundamentally two sources of Illumination: Outer Physis and Inner Physis. It is by directly experiencing outer Nature that we progressively grow wiser. But also it is from the ability to mindfully meditate on such experiences and on other aspects of outer Nature, which draws up from inside Esoteric Insights.

Thus our Seventh Dreccian doctrine and discipline: From direct experience and inner contemplation, arises Numinous Illumination.

Software Of Causal Life

By the word "Doctrine" as used here we mean to denote a codified body of teachings, principles, and instructions. We do not mean to imply dogma. These Seven Principles are not truths but only guidelines and instructions on a different modality of Mindfulness and Perception. As a body of teachings, principles, and instructions, they have been codified as software to teach and guide a Dreccian and their off spring to live a Way of Life.

As causal organisms that lives in a causal reality, not having the right software in your Mind as an Operating System is the difference between losing and winning this Game of Life. It is the difference between Mastering Life, and being Mastered by Life.

These Seven Principles are only guides which teaches and conditions the Mind of each Dreccian to see things differently and it is hoped that more are added in time. How we see or perceive things influences how we think. And we should know by now that what we think influences how we feel, and our feelings govern our actions.

These Seven Principles are in essence merely an attempt to describe and explain that which is best Experienced directly. This is not a spiritual discourse. It is just a feeble attempt to help other Initiates of the Sinister Way use and evolve the most powerful weapon in their Sinister Arsenal: their Mind, so that they can obtain and manifest not only the best condition in Life, but also so that they can gain a more clearer and Numinous apprehension of the Living Cosmos. These Seven Doctrines only become worth anything when they are applied with Discipline.

It is easy and pointless to speak and debate on principles, as our Parable of the Orange has tried to explain. These Seven Principles of Life are best tasted by yourself directly. If it works for you, as it has worked for me, then it is something worth teaching to our own Drecclings as well, so that rather than experience Life aimlessly without a functioning software, they will at least have this to help them evolve themselves, and manifest the lives they desire to experience and live.

DUPLICATION OF EFFORT

Duplication Of Effort

I learned the term “Duplication Of Effort” from business. Except the business I learned my early practical experience from is the type that is looked down upon. It’s something called MLM or multi-level marketing, you know, things like Avon, Amway, Marry Kay, and so on. Except the type of MLM I was a functioning part of for many years is the type most people don’t like and try to stay away from: the scam type. Except the specific entourage of conmen and scam artists I was associated with followed the Kingpen of MLM scam artist whom in the early 2000?s was actually sued by the government and its guber-posse for $40,000,000. The conditions set by the courts with the ring leader – we’ll call him BG – was that he was not allowed to create any kind of MLM company and profit from them. You think that stopped BG? Hell no, he has a wife and trusted associates that follow him around like a band of merry men. What BG did was play musical chairs with the US Governments and its posse by setting up MLM businesses under his wife’s name, then under the name of a close associate of his, and so on. It’s funny cuz while he and his associates do their business, I just recently read something BG wrote where he issues a public statement of apology. In the statement he asks people to forgive him for having trusted bad friends basically who ripped people off, and he said he learned his lesson.

I was too young to get into BG’s first MLM company which hit it’s peek during the late 90?s. We’ll call this first company Eqx. At it’s peek Eqx was the fastest growing and one of the biggest companies in America. The reason I know about it is because I have a older cousin and her friend – both charter members of NXS/WSA – who got into Eqx and used its products religiously and they’d share it with all of us and brainwash us younger cousins.

Before this stupid green revolution, Eqx was into the whole ‘all naturale’ concept, which was the foundation of their business ‘praxis,’ or their ‘schtick.’ 100% of their product line were all natural and sold to paranoid hipsters, health freaks, hippies, and anybody else their Reps can scare. Eqx had a line of make up made from Mica and not Talc, because BG and his profits of doom said that talc causes cancer. Except mica is more harder to make so the makeup was a bit more pricy. To get people to buy, BG and his Reps would ask you things like: “Go with the cheap stuff and get cancer or spend a little more money for your own health, how much are you worth to yourself?"

Eqx also had this line of hair care products – shampoo and stuff – which were all made from 100% natural stuff. BG's hell fire preachers said that other shampoos had toxic chemicals in them and that your scalp is the most absorbent part of your body. The guy even attacked milk and sold soy milk saying milk has all of these chemicals in it from the cows and that these chemicals are linked to things like conditions like ADD, etc. To back up his claims BG and his friends found scientists, doctors, etc, to support their ideas and they'd make videos to show people.

But the core product of Eqx – which later would get BG in trouble with the government – were water filters. Sounds harmless. It's not the water filter, but BG and how he sold it. You see BG had a huge dislike of the government. His founding story was that as a young man he worked MLM companies selling water filters, but none of them filtered out chlorine. And so he made a simple water filter which took out the chlorine. Then to sell his filters he used a very anti-government rhetoric about how chlorine was unhealthy for you, and that the government knows this. Later BG ended up making water filters which removed everything including Fluoride and he attacked the government for poisoning its own citizens with toxic fluoride.

Anyways. Things happened. The government accused BG of abusing or stretching the legal limits of what a "corporation" was and what "business" means, saying that BG was abusing people by telling lies to sell stuff. The government's departments figured out Eqx was a huge multimillion dollar con game and they went after BG and finally shut down Eqx. BG said to his people – the guy filled up entire convention centers – that the government was after him because he was telling folks the truth and giving people the power to take their lives back. BG, his wife, and a horde of his associates from Eqx after that would morph into a handful of MLM companies selling a whole list of different products. But no matter what company it was, or what they were selling, its always the same faces running the show.

By "associates" in MLM, I mean that such a business is structured or has a hierarchy. BG is at the core and he surrounds himself with his trusted associates. These trusted associates have what's called their "Downlinks" who are their trusted associated. Then these associates have their Downlinks who are their trusted associates. So in any company, BG is always surrounded with 3 layers of insulation made up of an association of trusted individuals who knows the ins and outs of the game and business. You have to earn your place and trust in that structure by personally knowing the right people.

Fortunately for me – many years after the demise of Eqx – my older cousin, and her older friend were friend with a pair of BG's associates from the third outer layer. The guy was named Victor who was only 2 people away from BG. His girlfriend Ruby was his downlink who was the personal friend of my cousin's older friend. So that's how my cousin and her friend got involved in the snake oil business. Both Vic and Ruby are light skinned Mexicans. Vic always wears a suit and tie, is GQ, clean shaven, hair slicked back, wears glasses, and can rip you off with a genuine friendly smile. Ruby was the one with people skills.

I met Vic and Ruby when I was a senior in high school through my older cousin, who invited me to a get together at Vic's house. People like this who have been into whatever they are into talk about their mlm business like it were a religion. It somehow comes up everywhere. So after the get together Vic and everybody had talked me into stopping by "The Office," to sign up with the current – at the time – outer manifestation of their enterprise. Vic was the head of an Office in Orange County. My cousin says he's been running offices since the Eqx days.

I got into the mlm business Vic was at that time involved with through the back door. So I wasn't conned into buying any stuff or spending a thousand dollars on useless business stuff. What happened was after I got my briefing about the company and signing up, Vic said he'd hook me up with some old and new videos of BG so I can study and learn things. Some of these videos were made way back in the late 90's when Eqx was alive, and when BG was huge and at the height of his "career." But they weren't cheesy videos. BG has a ton of money, and he spends a lot of it on PR and production of good teaching videos. Typically BG's videos starts off with music and all these scenes of him and his friends in giant houses, driving Lambos and stuff, yachting. Then the scene pans in and around a huge convention center filled with people in business suits. There is a stage.

Then every body goes quiet, the spot light goes on BG. And BG works his magic for an hour. Interestingly BG hardly talks about the actual company. Instead he actually preaches or teaches like a holy roller about there being two types of people in life: those that use people, and those that will be used. That's the game he says. Doesn't matter what the ball looks like, because its always the same two teams on the field. Like Attracts Like, he said. That's where I got that phrase from. BG once said in one of his speeches that he knows what type of person he is, and he knows he knows how to make money, and so he knows the people drawn to him are his kind and type. All he is doing is providing a Way or Means for his type to do what he does and succeed like he did. Those who get it will get it. Those who don't, can buy something and leave.

So this is the background or back story. Once you understand what I learned from this background story, you'll see that what I do with the ONA, and how I 'work' it like a business, comes from my experience with this type of company. And from what I learned from Vic and BG.

Cattle Calls

Vic called them Cattle Calls. Cattle Calls are the business's first and most important work. It's how the business as an entity metabolizes and grows. It is constant. A cattle call is just an ad put in somewhere, or any means to fill the Office with as many people as possible. In real ranching, when you do a cattle call, what we mean is we collect or gather a loose group of random cows in a field slowly into a fenced place so we can hand pick the cows for our purposes. For meat, for branding, for leather, for studing, for breeding, and so on. It doesn't matter how you collect the cattle. In the Business when you do a cattle call what you look for are 4 basic types of people. You want to gradually separate these 4 types and process them accordingly. The first type are those that are interested in making money and will sign up and do the work. Vic and my older friends calls this types "Field Nigger." It's okay, my friends who are associate of Vic's are Black guys. Your field nigger is the type to goes out and actually sells product people to people, door to door, whatever.

Second type of person you want to pick out are the "House Niggers." These are the useless types that for some numerous reasons can't work the field. All they are good for is their money. They are interested in your product. They believe your rhetoric and preaching. So you slowly leech them for their money. And they support your business verbally because they simply believe your schtick. You tell a good House Nigger: "The government is chlorinating and fluoridating your water to hurt you!" And they will say: "Yesum massa. Whatever you say massa. I believe it. Ima tell my friends and buy stuff." Not only do they buy your stuff, but their value is in the after fact that they spread your ideas and helps create or warms up a market for your future use when they talk about stuff.

Third type and just as important are what we call "Rats." In the other mlm companies this type is call a Cold Lead. These people are totally worthless as field niggers or house niggers. They don't buy shit. They don't want to put in any work. But they sympathize with the aura or preaching of the Business. All Rats are good for are their friends and associates they can lead you to. You take rats into a room by themselves and work on drawing out as much personal information about their family and friends and get numbers and contact information, then hit up these people. Rats are just as important as the first two to this type of Business, because they help you find more fresh blood.

Fourth type are the ones we call "Cats." These are the rare types that are "one of us." You can feel out your own kind. And in the beginning of meeting an alike – a person like you – you don't trust them and put them to little tests. You don't trust them because you know yourself to be a scam artist that tricks people and uses and manipulates people. If like attracts like, then you can't immediate trust your own alikes. You put them to the test slowly. Each test leads them slowly into the 'inner circle' of the business. This is a vital process because it is how the Business "replicates or breeds." This here is where the term "Duplication Of Effort" applies. A Business or religion or political entity can't sexually breed. It needs to somehow replicate its inner part and outer part. In a religion the outer part is usually the Believers and the inner part is the Priesthood. Without both parts replicating, the institution dies. Therefore, all 4 types of people are vital to the continual sustenance of your business.

BG taught us that when he was a field nigger [he didn't use that term] running his own business he was successful at it. But that there came a time when he realized that no matter how good he was at selling and making money, there is a limit to how much he can grow and acquire because he is only one person with the effort of one person. It is out of the desire for More, that he learned he needed to Duplicate his Efforts. To Clone himself and his capabilities in others of the right type. You have no choice but to work at making other your equal, your peer, your associate. This way whatever these people do, you benefit a little from them, and the entire business also benefits. In this Business you call this benefit "Residual Income," or "Cash Flow." This is when you have worked hard to become Number 1 in your business, and now you have Duplicated your efforts by making a group of other Number 1's. You yourself get a percentage of what your Number 1's makes. This is the residual or flow of cash and income. The better you make your associates, the more you actually benefit. It's not altruism.

And BG tells you that it's not by telling you the fastest way to being successful or rich in life is by 1) Other people's efforts, & 2) Other people's resources [money/time].

So after I had watched all of these videos, and after Vic gave me free tickets to these massive seminars with BG, Vic put me to my first test. He asked me to volunteer [work for free] in his office and help him out by working with the crowd. I did, and Vic told me to just stick close to Ruby and learn to do what she does, but to keep an eye on him for later.

What happens at a cattle call is that after the office room is full of people Vic comes up and gives a 30 minute talk on the company, its history, then product line. Then a 15 minute video of the guru BG is played. After Vic's presentation, Ruby and the other girls associated with Ruby begin to mingle and work the crowd during refreshments. Ruby and her group separates the crowd into the fourth types. In the office are Vic's other associates who have their desks and cubical. Each of these men specializes in working with one of the four types of people. When Ruby – and later me – learns what type of person they are from talking with them, we send them to the right guys in the offices to process our hand picked people.

For example if I am talking with a girl and I know she won't work the field or can't be milked for her money, then she is a Rat and I'll send her to Vic by telling the Rat that I'd like to introduce her to a friend of mine [Vic]. Vic knows that if any of his associates introduces somebody to him, that they are Rats and he goes right off into Cat mode. The Rat girl will be removed and isolated from the crowd by being taken to Vic's office desk. Once isolated Vic will do something called "Dropping The Bomb." This is when Vic bombards the Rat with all sorts of talk on the business in a incoherent and hard to follow manner fast. This causes the Rat to become confused and disoriented inside. While he is dropping bombs he hands you a piece of paper and interrogates you for your personal information on friends, family members, and leads. He wants names and phone numbers. He keeps you from thinking by telling trivial stories as he is tapping the paper reminding you to write down names and numbers.

Or if I talk to a person and they are enthusiastic about the products and rhetoric, and I see she has nice shoes and jewelry and nice hair, I classify the lady as a potential house nigger and introduce her to a friend of mine – who specializes in milking house niggers. In light conversations with people Ruby and her girls [which included me] actually ask questions about what these people do, if they go to school, what kind of cars they like, what kind of car they drive, if they rent or own a house, if they have a big family and lots of friends, and so. But we graft these questions into what seems like trivial friendly conversation. What we are actually feeling around for is how much you are worth, how much cash you have to spend or if we can use you in some way.

The associates that work the desks don't wait to be introduced to people. They mingle too, and they come into your conversations as a third party. We have ways of "telling" these associates if the person we are talking to is one the associate knows how to work with. If the associate comes and asks me who I'm talking to and I introduce the two in a normal boring way, it means the person is not the associate's type. But if I open my eyes wide, look excited, and introduce the associate to my person and touch his or her shoulder and lightly pushed them to the person, it means for the associate to go in for the kill.

I ended up volunteering 5 days a week during my college years to help out at the office for free for about 4-5 hours a day, all for free. In exchange for that Vic, Ruby, and the office associates gave me downlinks. This is another interesting and fun thing to watch. It's after office hours when the several cattle calls are done and we're calling the leads, the guys go thru their paper work of new sign ups and trades people back and forth like they were playing poker or just trading stuff. This is because the contract and way the business is legally instituted, you get a percentage of whatever your downlink makes or spends, and you also get a percentage of whatever your downlinks's own downlinks makes or spends. They call the downlinks that generates the most income "Big Fish." Your fishing for fish, and the big ones are highly prized. And you can make a ton of money. I've seen Vic and his associates pull in college students my age at the time who were talked into spending credit on products and business packages that amounted to $2000. And that's from one person. Vic get's $200 from that. In one week, he can easily make past $1000; which doesn't include his kick-ups from his network of downlinks. So that's what the guys did for me, after I past my 'dedication' test of spending 5 days a week to work for free for them. They build up my downlinks, and my downlinks did end up making money for me.

I also past my "Ruby" test where Ruby was training me to work crowds, separate people into their types and stuff, which I aced right away. If you ace this test, it indirectly tells the office associates that you actually know what is going on – the game/scam/business – and want in, and can work the game without anybody sitting you down like a retard and telling you point blank: "Okay, here's the deal, we're scamming people, you want in or what?" You just have to be clever enough to feel it, and go with it wordlessly. After I got good at doing what Ruby did Vic noticed that I was good at talking and twisting information to manipulate people to move in directions I want, so he told me to pay close attention to how he gives presentations because he wants me up in front to give presentations later.

The way Vic gave his cattle call presentations is all systematic. There is an objective: to make money and sell the business, idea, concepts, and product to people. Before each session or Vic's speeches is a initial refreshment time when we wait for everybody to come in. In the room there is soda, coffee, and snacks. During this time me and Ruby and the others will mingle and get a feel for what type of people we are dealing with. Vic will quietly pull us into a different room from time to time to ask us to brief him what kind of people we have. He needs information. Anything that he can use to craft his presentation to target and hit the audience. He has his objective, and he divides the actualizing of that objective into "power points" and moves. So what he does with the information we give to him is that he crafts a presentation that is tailored to hit the audience in front of him.

For example I may tell Vic that there is a man who is married with children. He works as a manager of his own business, and has a friend who is signed up with the company. Said that he was interested. So from this what Vic will do is during his presentation he will drop specific example about how the business can help a person who is married with children and a mortgage to make extra cash flow to give them financial independence. You can have 5 cattle calls a day, and each time, Vic's presentations is slightly different. The trick is that during the 30 minutes of talking you want to dynamically or organically bring down the scripted info-speech and get as personal as you can with the people in front of you, so as to develop a rapport with them. You know your crowd is growing a rapport channel with you when you see them nod their head in silent agreement. Once you see heads nodding, you use what you said to make those heads nod as a clue to say the next things to make more heads nod.

Eventually Vic put me in the front to do presentations. You dress up real nice and professional, but try to look as appealing and pretty as you can. Put what you learned from our company Holy Bibles into practice. Our company holy bibles are two books called "Think And Grow Rich," & "How To Win Friends And Influence People." Those are the two books they make you read when you sign up, and they will talk about their teachings religiously. BG says the best way to sell yourself or your stuff to people that insures success is to learn to smile with your mouth and eyes and to make eye contact with people in a special way. Instead of quickly glancing back and forth around the crowd, you use the "Sticky Eye Contact" method. You talk and learn to hold your gaze and look deeply into people's eyes with smiling eyes where the hold lasts for 5 seconds or more, and you reluctantly move that deep stare from one person to the next.

This 5 second or more stare triggers ancient physiological unconscious responds in all animals. It triggers our Fight or Flight mechanism as well as our sexual mechanism. When you're staring down an animal or person, it is threatening and it will either make the animal or person act up and be hostile to you or submit and try to run away. But if you stare at them and present yourself in a nonthreatening manner, then they don't fight and go into their Flight mode state of mind, where it becomes a cat and mouse game of body language and sexual responses. The easiest way to make a girl fall in love with you is to induce her pupils to open wide and hold your stare. My aunts and uncles that run jewelry shops will tell you that they can tell if a person likes something when the customer's pupils widens. It's an unconscious response. But in dating this can be manipulated by taking the girl or guy to a evening meal where it is dim, which will obviously cause their pupils to get big. You want to avoid initially taking your dates to bright places. This is also a very effective ploy Hitler used, if you recall all of his parades and speeches he held in the evening or at night in dim torch light. In this condition, when you sticky stare at your audience's eyes, they "fall in love" with you or grow a liking for you inside, which induces Trust and Rapport. You can tell you when you are publicly speaking whom you have mesmerized just by how they look trancefixed at you with a goofy or lost smile just nodding like an idiot.

It took me several months to a year to learn how to give presentations right. At first I just stuck to the prewritten script and added my own ideas to my talks. But gradually I learned to do with Vic did where I crafted my talks tailored to the group of people I was talking to. I eventually threw out the script and just went off in my own direction where I tore the business apart and got very personal with the group of people, used sticky eye contact to induce that trancefixed feedback stare, and sell the torn up business I dismantled bit by bit to each person in different ways to make them nod. My talks became less technical and mechanical and more personal and conversational. Interestingly, I have Black friends I look up to who look up to Minister Farrakhan. So during those times when I was learning how to give speeches I watched nearly every video I could find on Minister Farrakhan giving his speeches. He is actually one of few people who have a massive influence on me. Not so much what he preaches, but other types of influences. But, I mean I didn't act like some girl Farrakhan selling stuff. I mean the way, style, and methods used to deliver and convey a message to work up a crowd.

Then of course my other person I look up to in the presentation department is Hitler, who was an emotional bard who knew how to emotionalize his crowd. You use sticky eyes and personalized talks to personal with your crowd in order to emotionalize them. The intellectual ideas themselves do not sell anything, the emotions do. You can't intellectually debate a stray cat to like you. You manipulate its feelings somehow to induce trust and rapport. You aren't really selling ideas or products, that follows secondly. You are selling emotions, stimuli, trust. You aren't targeting their intellectual side. You are targeting their Primal side. Because a person can consciously manipulate their own intellectual thought processes, but you cannot change the wiring of your ancient primal programming. If you can get at a person's primal side, his intellectualism and thinking will change. And such things do change. We say we have "changed our minds/opinions/thoughts" about something. A persons thoughts, line of thinking, and intellectualism, is transitory [aniccha] and impermanent. Doesn't matter if at one moment they disagree with you. Get to their primal side and their minds will change.

Giving your talks or presentations at the Office is actually like taking the popularity game on a high school campus and shrinking it down into 30 minutes. You have 30-45 minutes to make as many people in your crowd like you. Because what in essence is any body in life really selling? Themselves. You sell yourself, and your friends or people you have a rapport with opens up to your political theories, religious views, ideas, thoughts, business, and products. If you have any practical experience in this line of business of selling stuff – outside of retail stores – you will know that forcing views, ideas, and items down people's throats don't work. You sell yourself, and everything else falls into place.

Just like in the movie Braveheart, which is one of my favourite ones. You have two characters you want to watch closely: Robert the Bruce and William Wallace. At one point in the movie Robert The Bruce gives it away when he tells his father in the tower how much he envies William's connection to the people. And Wallace did have a rapport with the people. So much so that Wallace is able to talk to the people, give his presentation of a war – considering the risks of war – and excite a people to fight and die for him. This was something the articulate and intellectual Robert The Bruce just did not have. Which in the end – in the movie – made him pretty incompetent or impotent and useless.

You aren't really selling anything but your Self, and the only methods you use are basic social skills to get at a person's primal side. Once they like you, they naturally put their guard down and open up to your political views, ideas, religious notions, world views, and products. This is something you should be able to deduce from closely watching presidential debates and presidential campaigns. None of those guys are actually selling their political ideas. It all goes back to: "Like me." John McCain when he was running tried so hard to get people to like him impotently and you can see this in the latter moments of his campaign when he was loosing. You see him start off every other sentences with things like: "I was this;" "I did that;" "I was a POW in Nam;" "I took one for the team." And it didn't work. John McCain's methods of selling himself doesn't work in high school or any social setting, and it did not work for him in his race.

You know what a geek is? In my parts a Nerd and a Geek are the same, just that a Nerd wears glasses and a Geek doesn't. That's the difference. A geek/nerd is a person who lacks social skills so much, and lacks the ability to empath social dynamics, social groups, social ranking system, that they can't function productively in that environment. They think that you make friends by actually going up to people and asking people to be their friends. You know how stupid and laughable that is for a kid on campus to come up to you and say: "I won chess in my chess club, wanna be my friend?" And this is the same way McCain was doing: "I was in Nam, please be my friend;" "I did this and that, please like me." It doesn't work because you just make yourself look like a loser, and nobody wants to be friends with a loser.

Books like Think & Grow Rich and How To Win Friends and Influencing People, and BG says when selling yourself to others, you want to act like you are already a winner, already a leader, already in power, already rich, already liked by many, and do this with total confidence; even if it's a front. Kayla calls this method "Glamour." It comes from how when you're a girl and you're going out to hit the clubs on a mission for a date, you dress up, put on your makeup, wear perfume, put on a push-up bra, fix your hair up, etc. In essence you make yourself look prettier than you actually are to trick the other person or manipulate them to think you're/we're super hot. We all know it ain't like that the morning after. Not only does all the glamouring make you look hotter than you are, but your target market is drinking beer and not seeing you sober. But the Confidence, in presenting a Glamour of yourself is the most vital aspect of selling yourself. If you flinch and your confidence wavers and shakes, you lose the game.

In pragmatic terms Vic used a trick to glamourize his office. He and his friends actually put a pool table in the back of a room in the office. Then he and his group would just have their Asian associated – like my cousin, me and our friends – just hang out and play pool. The trick is they have to park their cars in the front of the Office. This way, the Office parking lot was packed with top end cars and fixed up cars and classy car brands. So during cattle calls on some days as you walk up to a nice office building you see a grip of Mercedes, BMW's, tricked out Hondas, Jaguars, and Lexuses all in the lot. That way, you walk in that office with the idea that people in the office either have money or is making money.

On a campus, confidence is social money that buys you friends, influence, popularity, and power. Guys that have what it takes to climb the social ladder don't ask people to be their friends. They confidently act and talk in such a way that magnetizes them to attract or command attention. People want to be associated with you by themselves in some way. Either directly or via proxy. Same thing with a girl who has what it takes to climb social rank. You speak and act, and carry yourself with confidence. Not all stuck up like you were the hottest bitch on campus, cuz that's different. That's just called being conceited in high school talk. Nobody likes you for it. I don't even know how to explain what confidence is in words or where its at. It's something inside you have and you project it out for people to feel and see. It influences the way you behave and carry yourself, and how you act and interact with others.

The other difference between a person with the ability to climb social rank from a nerd is that the popular types on a campus – or any human social group – don't sell themselves or talk about themselves or sell their ideas. Jesus doesn't personally sell himself or his ideas and neither does the Buddha or Muhammad. They are all dead or fictitious characters. They have other people talking about them, selling them, pushing the brands they wear, the cars brands they drive, the ideas and views they have. A popular person does not have to personally talk and yap about themselves and their ideas. Others do it. Whereas nobody talks about a nerd. Cuz there is nothing about you to talk about, and worse, people might not even know you exist to talk about you. The geek or nerd must do their own talking, their own selling of Self. They have no social support or network of supporters. This goes back to our primate packs and troops where the alpha male must have a support group. The out cast of such primate and monkey groups who has no support will not ever climb social rank. Every political leader, pope, or popular kid, and CEO like the late Steve Jobs, has their partyliners and supporters.

That's the sign to tell who is who apart. If you are a person that has to constantly sell yourself, yap about yourself, to be known and heard, then you are a nobody geek. Because the minute you stop your drama and yapping everybody will forget you even exist. And you know this. If you are somebody who is barely around, hardly if ever has to talk about yourself, and third party people still talk about you, talk about your ideas, then you know you are the popular type with a party and supporters. The difference is Power and Influence. You don't have to ask people to like to, be your friend, support you, and so on. People either on their own accord want to be associated with you directly or via proxy. Via proxy here meaning say you have a celebrity. That celebrity is only one person with a huge fanbase. Obviously not everyone is going to be able to be associated with that celeb directly. So we associate ourselves with such people we are drawn to via proxy where we use symbols they use [Hitler/Swastika]; wear what they wear; listen to whatever music they listen to; use whatever words they use, and so on.

If you can sell yourself, everything else follows. Most people when they hear the phrase "sell themselves" may think it means to relentlessly talk about your ideas, assert your opinions down people's throats until someone somewhere hears you and gives in. This isn't power or influence. It's virtually bitching and complaining. And it get's nothing done in real life. You can be a Robert The Bruce type of person in life and articulately bitch and complain about the plight and woes of Scotland, but you ain't getting shit done. Nobody will listen to you. If they do it's to argue and debate. It's the popular William Wallace type with a connection and rapport with the people that influences in real life. Remember in the movie how in the beginning the movie showed rumors spreading about how William was 10 feet tall, killed 50 men with his bare hands, etc. The point is he didn't have to do his own selling of Self to a his market. No product that is worth anything needs to sell its Self like a geek. We as people give the products we like our third party talk and support and by word of mouth we warm up the market so such products can sell.

Because of this, when presenting a product, ideology, service, political views, or whatever, you have to use the stuff and actually like it or love it enough to constantly talk about it. Not because you are on a mission to talk people to buy the shit. But because you really do like the stuff. I actually spent time using the product our mlm company at the time was selling and really did like it. This gave me the ability to personalize my presentations by talking about how I use the stuff to my audience. This in turn allows your audience to be able to relate with you or to you. You need that relation to generate trust and rapport. You need trust and rapport to be liked and to generate influence. That's the causal mechanics of influence. With something like power you add the extra ingredient of being able to build up a party or network of supporters.

From my own direct experiences, when I was in high school I was into Satanism. I loved it genuinely so much I constantly talked about it and my views. In conjunction with my social skills, it became that everyone I personally associated with later became Satanists too. During my college years I went back to my roots and genuinely loved Buddhism so much that it was all I talked about. In conjunction with selling my Self, it became that eventually everybody I associated with became some type of Buddhist. Now I genuinely love the ONA and its potential so much that it's all I talk about. It's all I've been writing about for the past 3 years. People can see the causal effects or Vipaka now. Causal effects as in I don't have a direct connection to every ONA event or new Niner or to every change in the ONA. I cannot claim to have that. But the world runs on Causation where one thing gives rise and inspires another thing into being.

Tricks Of The Trade

You're probably wondering how all this ties into the ONA. It doesn't actually so don't look for connections. It only relates to the ONA through myself in the way I do things and have been doing things in context to the ONA. The trick or challenge for me was: How do I take what I've learned up in that office and use it to sell memes and the ONA via cyberspace?

I didn't actually know what an internet was or what you do with on until 2003. And I only got online because of social media where my friends told me they were on something called "Friendsters." So that's how I started the internet. Later when I got much smarter I realized that the internet put a huge amount of people at your finger tips literally. To me this was significant because working in our office doing cattle calls, we really had to put in the work of placing ads, calling cold leads and scheduling appointments, talking to random people out and about and telling them about the business to get them in the office. With the internet, all that work is nullified. Everyone you need is "right there." The only problem was for me I didn't know how to take the next step to make the internet useful. That changed with me setting specific goals and objectives. You seriously need those things, just so you'll know what exactly you are working towards.

I'll show you how I brainstorm a map to your objective that my friends and I use which works well for us. Take a piece of paper and draw a big circle in the middle. Then write your End Objective in the circle. For instance write down "Manager of a Franchise." Then you ask yourself: "What do I need to do to get to be a Manager of a Franchise?" For every possible answer you have, put each in little bubbles around your big circle. For example two answers can be: 1) Get a job at the Franchise, then 2) You will need a college diploma. Go to your "get a job at the franchise" bubble and ask yourself what you must do to get this job, then put the answer into a bubble just behind it and trace a line connecting them. Go to your "get a diploma" bubble and ask yourself how you get a diploma, and place the answer in a bubble behind the "get a diploma" bubble and connect it.

Now you have your road map. Each little bubble is a Sign Post or Land Mark which you must Move towards. It doesn't matter what direction you take, or if you fail a few times. Just get to each sign post, one at a time. Choreograph each of your little Moves so that each Move somehow takes you one step closer to each land mark. That's how I think out my steps and Objectives. You cannot ever allow others to stop you from getting to your next sign post, because you know if you don't get to your next sign post, the End Objective will never be materialized for you. Only you are aware of what your Goal Map looks like, while others don't. Because they can't see, they will talk shit about the little steps you are taking which to them don't seem to be Causal Steps.

So to give some real examples with me and the ONA. Objective One, 3 years ago was to: Influence change in the ONA. How do I do that? I listed every reasonable answer: a) Take out all old school ONA intellectuals one by one; b) compete with established ONA groups; c) manufacture better memes; d) attack people ONA hates; e) establish friendships with the shot callers and popular kids in ONA social order; f) remove the old leadership post; g) make ONA peer based; h) create a new market niche; & i) establish a party or network of support. Those were my sign posts, and each had their own Moves. One by one over the course of 2 straight years I did whatever it took to work towards each sign post. Or little goal. There was a reason why I spent 2 years fighting the ONA and attacking certain people left over from 2.0 ONA. To get rid of any intellectual that will block me from spreading my meme flow. There is a reason why I competed with some people. And a reason why I and my friends spent 2 years publicly attacking Blackwood. A reason why we worked on making new friends in many Satanic forums. A reason why we encouraged others to make blogs, make nexions, take the ONA into their own direction. It's a causal process. No intellectual rivals from the old school, means my memes won't be challenged. Unchallenged memes with new friends means I have a new market for these memes. A new market means new ONA people into ONA 3.0. New ONA people into 3.0 means the End Objective of evolving ONA will get done without a challenge since there is now a network of peers duplicating our efforts.

Another minor Objective is: How do I make ONA via the cyber medium? I work the internet and ONA like we did the Office. First get people turned on about ONA by cattle calls. I do this by writing things like essays that say anybody can be ONA. That brings in those that have a basic interest. Next step is once the interested are called, my friends and I begin the process of separating each person we met or found who read such essays into 4 types of people: 1) Field Niggers; 2) House Niggers; 3) Rats; & 4) Cats. All four types are needed. I need a field nigger to do the work out and about. I need the house nigger to be my yes men and just talk good about ONA. I need the useless and stupid Rat because although they themselves are worthless, they can lead me to their network of friends. I look for the Cats who are my type and kind. When we find Cats we watch each one closely and see if they pick up on the game. If they do we become associates and help them set up shop, support them, and do what needs to be done to get them started with their shit. Usually a field nigger ends up being a worthy Cat when they know the game.

Another minor Objective is how do I make people we find from generalized cattle call essays into ONA in the first place? Easy. One step at a time. The process is to take them from that mentality of anybody can be ONA, to the state of mind where they are aware that ONA Describes a certain type of person. Describe meaning there are traits and ways we do things naturally as a kind, such as Honour and Loyalty. To an outsider where such terms do not Describe them, these terms look like things they must follow or obey. If that is their mentality, where ONA stuff does not Describe them, we treat them like house niggers and rats and use them accordingly. Sometimes all a person is good for is third party talking.

In regards to making Presentations to a crowd of people. This blog is my podium, and everything I have ever written are my Presentations. Each essay I write is fixed to a specific time, and most often directed at an actual person in one of my subtarget groups. I use a way of making presentations my old Office associates call "Big Fishing." In the Office, you notice certain people of value you want to try and fish. Vic will send us to "mingle" with these big fish so we can collect everything we can on them. Vic used the information we give to him to craft his presentation is such a way where that he is actually speaking to only his big fish he want, but using information he knows about them to say what needs to be said to reel them in. In some cases you can point out one of the hundreds of essays I have written and ask me who my big fish was, and I can give you a name, tell you what they look like, what forum they hang out in, point you to every post they made, break you down their psychological traits and point out their glitches, tell you if they are married or not, have children or not, etc.

I'd rather spend 3 years trying to find the few Cats and catch 1 Big Fish, then catch 100 house niggers and rats for the ONA. Why? Have you seen those nature shows where they take you into the ocean and show you huge whales and sharks? What do you see around them? Little fish. Don't waste time with the little fish, they depend on the Big Fish. Catch the big fish and you own his entire network and support group. The little fish, house niggers and rats and even field nigger will come and go. It's just in their nature to go for the next nouveau shiny thing that comes along. Its the few cats and big fish you make friends with who really are into the game that will stick with you in the long run. Through thick and thin. But this is only possible if you make them. If you make them peers and let them know that you are on equal terms and grounds with each other. This is called DOE or Duplication of Effort. It's when you teach and make the other person equal to you, able to do what you do, and perhaps out do you even. Teach them the tricks of the trade.

It sounds like I cheapen the ONA by making it sound like something to be sold and tricked into others. If you see it this way, you ain't a Cat. To any real scam or con artist, what they do is their Nature and Way of Life. It's how they are. A group of conartists by their very inner Nature will share many traits in common. What they do with that Nature and with others is the game and means of getting things done for them. ONA is the same way. It should describe you as a person you already are naturally. Nobody has to sell you or trick you into being who and what you are as a person. But to influence, inspire, spread ideas, change things in people and society aeonically, we need those other people. And we need to know how to work them for different reasons.

Speaking of cats. Shugz uses a special method of turning people ONA and spreading memes she innovated called the "Stray Cat Ploy." She keeps stray cats as pets, and from learning how to trick them to be her friends/pets, she learned how to use the same approach with people. Her stray cat ploy is based on the primal fight or flight mechanism all animals [humans too] have. Basic concepts is if you present a cage to a stray cat or feral animal is will, due to fear, or resentment or a desire to remain free, resist you, growl and try and fight. It will not let you put it into a cage.

People are the same way, but with humans that cage is psychological. When you as a stranger presents a religion, worldview, political ideology to a stray person [one not familiar with you and does not belong to a group] they will react and resist and growl, because you've triggered their fight mechanism. Shugz taught us that when you make a post in a forum and those stray people react with their fight mode, they primally react to your post like a trap. What they do is piss and defecate all over your post with their attacks and debates as a way of warning other stray people not to trust it, believe it, or touch it.

So what Shugz does to catch a stray cat is to use the slow approach. She'll set food out in the yard for the cat to eat regularly and leave so she can't be seen. After a while she leaves food and watches so the cat can see her. A couple weeks later she puts the food closer and she now crouches down to appear smaller and non threatening but she stays visible. A few weeks after that she puts the food much closer and then she leaves her hand palm faced down touching the ground near the food, but not moving her hand. When the cat stops reacting to her hand she then offers the stray cat the food right out of her hand. At first the cat will knock the food out of her hand. If it hisses or scratches her, she knows she moved to fast and stays with the hands on the ground technique a while longer. When the cat eats out of her hand she tries to pet its chin and head. Once the stray cat learns to trust her, a channel of rapport exists between her and the cat. The cat lets her pet her, and in time lets her pick them up, follows her around, and even lets her put them in cages to take them places.

She uses the exact same methods with people, and she is really, really good at what she does. Shugz teaches us that if a stray person hisses by arguing and debating, it means you did something wrong and you have to step back and work from a distance. Do this by "dropping memes" for them to read on their own time. BUT not in a forum because you do not want other stray people to piss and defecate on your writings or it will cause an alarm. You want to isolate that stray person away from his friends mentally. A blog that has the comments off does this. When you read a blog on your own time, you are by yourself, not "hanging out" with friends in a forum. You are mentally isolated and if others hiss at your writings, it does not stain your writings. So in that isolated state of mind, they are purely exposed to the memes you drop without other people's influence.

Once Shugz notices a stray person using one of her memes she dropped she then makes the next slow move by getting closer to you. She'll move in and make a profile in the forum you hang out in to try and develop a rapport with you and get you familiar with her presence. She'll test your receptivity out by writing a few test posts. If you react negatively with an argument or debate, she deletes her profile and waits. She'll tell you that this is because you shouldn't even be resisting in anyway. An intellectual argument or philosophical debate is an outer manifestation of a deep seeded primal resistance; which is something we do as a way to keep our minds from being "captured."

Once she sees you warming up to her memes and her test posts don't trigger a negative response or you support her posts, she moves in for the next Move. What she will then do is use the PM system and make specially crafted posts entirely based on information she knows. The objective is to directly generate an emotional bond or rapport with you and to drop ONA memes inside posts that is written in such a way that they appear to mirror and reflect your own mindspace and views and words.

Once she has developed a rapport with you, Shugz does what she calls “Dismantling and Reconfiguring.” This means what she does is because she knows a whole lot about the ONA inside and out, she takes apart the ONA into bits and pieces of its core memetic components. Then based on what type of person you are she reconfigures all of these memes so that what is up “front” are things you will like or be interested in or agree with, and the memes in the back end will be ideas that will take some smooth talking.

So depending on who you are and your paradigm topography she picks up, how she presents the ONA to you can be drastically different from person to person. For example if you are a nut case that believes in fairies and she wants you to be ONA for whatever reason, she’ll reconfigure the whole ONA so that memes at the front she gives to you are about fairies and vampires, etc. She’ll do this by parsing and bending things around. For example Faye comes from the old English Faye meaning an “sprite,” “spirit” or entity or fairy, but of a more primal and dark kind. So she’ll use this as a hook. Or if you are a materialist atheist, she’ll completely reconfigure ONA so that all the rational and logically materialist stuff are in the front, and the other stuff in the back. Then she’ll tone down the back end stuff into “mythos,” with symbolical meanings. Or if you have a criminal element, the ONA Shugz gives you in private PM conversations will have all of the sinister elements up front and the rest in the back. But before she ever gives you the back end you may react to, she makes it so that once you have the basics, you go off and help evolve the ONA in your own direction. This prevents you from ever even considering the other stuff. If you do, she’ll explain to you that causal forms are just outer trappings.

People can wonder to themselves how ONA can possibly mean anything if anybody can just go off on their own tangent and make their own forms. The Essence is what matters. Here essence meaning that when you have a body of cells and a virus has tapped the cell the RNA of the virus has been grafted into the nucleus of the cell. The mess of DNA of the cell is the stuff ONA people write. Inside are grafted the viral RNA, which are the small random memes that are specific to the Core of the ONA. It doesn’t matter if this virus RNA is grafted inside an eye cell or gut cell or brain cell or toe cell. The outer form of each cell is a mere outer form of its essential coding in its nucleus which is infected with the viral RNA. Whatever form you make or ONA takes, will always carry most or a majority of the core RNA memes. And the other answer to the question is that core concepts of the ONA is your very own Nature. It does not matter how you express yourself in life, because it’s an expression of that inner Nature.

Books of The Trade

There are a handful of books that influenced me in different ways. I’ve spoken about two of them already. There are two others that I would suggest or recommend. The first is a classic called “How To Win Friends And Influence People.” The title says it all. It’s an old book written back in the old days, so superficially it may be “cheesy” to some; but the underlying information is worth it. That is if influence is a tool you wish to cultivate. You’ll need influence if you are going to help change ONA, sell yourself, get your ideas accepted without resistance.

Other book is a great book called "The Leader Without A Title." The title should also give its game away. Once you read that book, you will not even care who in any social group, company, or institution is the entitled leader or boss, or hot shot. The book teaches you step by step ways of basically establishing yourself as the Leader in your target setting in the people's eyes. Once you own the people, whoever is the CEO, boss or leader, is only so in name and title.

That book has obvious uses, especially in a peer group like the ONA where there are no titles or leadership roles. You don't need no stinking badge; no titles; no structure; no hierarchy. The powerbase of any human grouping of people is: People. Where there is a social group of people there are social skills involved. You establish a friendship and rapport with that powerbase or group of people, and with a little leadership traits and a lot of confidence, you can effectively gain the power of influence and inspiration. All with "soft power." Nothing overt or assertive. No need to swing your dick and tits around like a bad ass destined to be a leader or superhero come to save the ONA from doom, or to restore it to its glorious pristine days like a Joseph Smith. The more force you apply, the more people will resist. It's nonnewtonian physics with people. The more you assert force on a nonnewtonian fluid, the more it hardens and resists. To penetrate it, the less force you assert, the deeper you can get. Who knew cornstarch was so fascinating and insightful!

Conclusion

So that's it. Some tricks of the game shared in order to duplicate the efforts 352 set into motion. It's not everything and you may already know of better skills. The important thing is that they be removed from the realm of theory and writing and applied to engineer some kind of results, whether for your own self or for the ONA's evolution, or both.

Your Moves should be small and unnoticeable, or you are doing it wrong. Set Objectives and Goals or Aims to be actualized, and make your Maps. Then do whatever it takes to get to your next sign post. Be determined and don't let anybody misdirect your attention from your goals and aims. You know what you must do to make your ends meet not me or others.

Influence and manipulative social skills and social responses in people sounds "bad," but it works and is human. It makes the marketing and advertizing industry a grip of money. It's used by corporations and businesses. Politicians use it, and so do high school students, your mom uses it, and so did you when you were 5 when we all emotionally manipulated our parents to buy us toys. You either learn these skills in life and use them, or be used by them. BG once said in life there are only two types of people, those that use, and those who are used. You'll never get anywhere as a nerd or geek nobody forcing your ideas and thoughts and interpretations of the world down other people's throats. Nothing in real life works like that besides totalitarian governments, which don't ever last long. In life, it's all soft power, people power, and influence. This is one of those cases where if you knew what you are talking about, something about your ability to wield influence should show in the form of measurable results somehow. Let the results do the talking in this case. And let your most passionate customer, supporter, associate, or whatever sell your stuff for you. Just like I have a personal passion for the ONA and sell it for AL, and the rest of the ONA abroad.

ONA isn't perfect. It can't be. There are just too many people in the world, and each have their own conception of what perfection is. ONA will never be perfect and it will never be pleasing to everyone. Its ideas and teachings and mythos will never be accepted and liked or agreed on by everyone. But if – and it does – have weak spots and areas where it can be better, take the initiative to try and make the changes so as to help ONA slowly evolve in Time and Causation. The weakness in having only one mind create an ONA is that the ONA inherits both the one mind's strengths and weaknesses. The positive side of having a peer group is that we each can pick out the others weaknesses and thus make our individual alterations to give strength to where such strength is needed in the memplex.

From my own personal experiences having some random religion or belief system just because you like it and agree with it is impermanent and fleeting. This is because our minds changes and grows in Time and Understanding. I once was a LaVeyan Satanist. But I only liked it because at the time, with my high school mentality I agreed with what I had read. In Time, I changed and so I lost the desire to be a LaVeyan Satanist. Feeling back, that Satanism never took real root in me. It never had a useful meaning in my life. It was just something I nodded to and waved around for the moment.

With Buddhism and ONA for me it feels different. I don't always agree with what is said and taught. But they feel more alive to me because each is rooted in grounded real things. With my Buddhism it's just something rooted in my family and our culture. It's how we live life rather than a belief system. With ONA for me it's similar. It's not a belief system you nod to. For me, it's rooted in what or how I do things. All that belief is a distant second, as it should be. Our minds change, but we each know that habits are hard to break. Smoking or brushing your teeth after every meal is not a belief system to those who do it. You don't nod to it, and you may not like it all the way. But you do it, over and over again. And that habit of doing/practice is hard to break. A people's culture simplistically is just an over grown habit that refuses to break over a thousand years.

ONA describes a way my friends and I just simply do things, put into words. We do, behave, and treat certain types of people in a certain way. ONA gives words to these things by calling one type mundanes and the other Dreccs or Niners, and says mundanes are good for being used and abused. It's not a belief I nod to and agree with for the time being. It's rooted in a bad habit, or sinister habit. I'll step on everybody in life to be successful in life. But I also know when to form cooperative groups like crews and street tribes or peer groups, to work together collectively to get things down. ONA takes this way of doing and living and describes it in words. So for me, ONA isn't something I nod to. It can't be or it will not last long in the mind. Beliefs, thought processes, opinions, and worldviews change. It's just the nature of Mind to do so.

Anything rooted in such a transitory element will not last long. Habits and our ways of living and just doing life is hard to break, and with living cultures, does not change in the course of a thousand years. If the ONA is to have a future – from my perspective – it has to be grounded or rooted in things less ethereal and transitory than Mindstuff, thoughts, opinions, ideas, and beliefs. There is nothing “wrong” with such things. It's just that they are phantoms and defuses over time like a puff of smoke. One thing which will never ever change as long as we humans exist: Human Nature. The ONA as I see how I use it is like a tree. There are roots which stays put in a ground. This is Human Nature and Kulture. Up top are the leaves which changes with the movement of the season. In spring it blossoms white flowers. In summer it bares fruit. In fall the leave turn yellow and orange and fall. In winter the branches are bare. But through all that change the truck and root remains the same.

And so I see ONA in the same way. There is a core of it based on Human Nature and the way we do life as a breed of people. These are the trunk and roots. Up top are the causal forms, which changes along with our growth and mental seasons in life. As maidens and young boys we understand life in that youngish way and so in that age ONA's leaves will change to reflect that mental season. As grown men, fathers, and mothers, we understand life in a much different way, and so ONA's leaves will change to reflect that season of our mind. In our elderly years as old man and crone we understand life in our own ways ripened with the wisdom and understanding of a life long pathei-mathos. And so in that time and season ONA's leaves will reflect that elderly season and ripening. The leaves of this tree must be allowed to change with its season, side by side in tandem to each of our individual and personal growth and development. But the truck and roots stay the same.

One of my most favourite parables from the Holy Bible is when Jesus is telling people of how there was once a farmer casting seeds in the wind. Some seeds fell on rock. Some on dry cracked ground. And some fell on fertile ground. Those that fell on the rock and dry ground did not germinate. But the few that fell on fertile ground grew to grow their own ear of corn. One grain of wheat can make a plant that grows many shafts of wheat, each teaming with seeds. You spend your time and life casting seeds in the wind, and if just one tiny seed falls in the right fertile soil, that one tiny seed bares for you its fruit and many more seeds. If just one Mind "gets" the ONA, and bares fruit and seeds, all the effort DM put in would be worth it. Because that one Mind will casts the many seeds it now bares.

We have DM's whole life to read in the ONA which finely reflect the changing of tree tops according to season in mind and life. In DM's youth we see he produced a more virile and violent ONA mixed with ethnic hopes, pride for his race, as any youth that age would have. In his manhood, he produces a more intellectual ONA and cast his seeds. Some seeds fell on fertile ground and made us Dreccs and Niners today. And so we bare our fruit and cast our seeds into the wind as DM once did, and showcase our leaves each according to our mental season in life. In his ripened years, the leaves have fallen in his winter season and the bare Numinous branches beneath the past flowers, fruits, and colorful foliage are now exposed covered in white snow. And it's beautiful, if you can appreciate such things.

[And Stuff, Or Something]

An interview with Kayla, because we care.

Chloe interviews The First Sister Kayla -the mastermind of WSA352- with many questions, concerning various topic of interest to very few people, like the ONA and stuff, or something.

Chloe: What's your ethnic make up?

Kayla- White/Italian and Mexican.

Chloe: Good genes?

Kayla- Acceptional genes. Nonpeasantile blood. Both my parents ancestral background are noble.

Chloe: How can you tell, beside from hearsay?

Kayla- From the quality of the flesh. From observing your grandparents and cousins. Gauging their level of intelligence, their accomplishments in life... the measure of their worth... the nobility always have it in them to seek their own level, and the peasants most often will end up as employees.

Chloe: Do you have any respect for peasant stock humans?

Kayla- None whatsoever. Doesn't matter what color their skin is.

Chloe: How do you feel personally about illegal immigration; Mexicans coming into America illegally to be specific?

Kayla- That's a tough question. I have contradicting feelings, which I am both comfortable with. I think we are all people... regardless of what we look like or where we originally came from. We all want the same basic creature comforts and necessities in life. As parents we would also want our children to have a better opportunity in life than we had, wouldn't you say? We all have a right to be human. Unfortunately there is more to life than just simply being human. We ourselves have complicated life with the invention of Nation-States. This country [USA] was built on immigration... but, if we are going to play the charades of Nation-Statehood, then there are rules to playing the game right. Obedience to these established rules makes the system... the Nation-State... work for its citizens and their progeny. If we aren't going to play by the rules and keep the system working, then why have a State at all? Within this context, I do not like Mexicans crossing the boarder into this country illegally. There are so many reasons why besides the financial affects. Althoe the money is a big deal. 11 million nontax paying illegal immigrants in this country siphoning American dollars into Mexico means my grand children will be eating shit when they inherit America. 11 million illegals not complying with common vaccination laws, means we're wasting out time and money vaccinating our kids because there is an open wound of 11 million thru which any sickness and disease can pass thru. Illegal immigration is a great fix for Capitalistic profiteering. Check out the real estate cycle of California for example and measure it up to large waves of illegal immigration. You'll notice a connection. Sales of real estate jumps a few years after the illegal wave from Mexico. The banks go into a frenzy and rip these people off with loans they can never pay back... people that aren't tied down to this country... who can leave at any moment. Then we crack down on illegal immigration and chase them out, and they take their money and relatives with them. This causes a vicious economic chain reaction... which has grown into this bull shit economic crisis we are in.

Chloe: But whose fault is it then? The bank's fault? Capitalism? Immigrants? The government?

Kayla- It's Stupidity's fault. It's everyone trying to get a quick fix, and not understanding that what they do today, affects what will happen tomorrow. It's simple cause and effect. Peasants are just inherently stupid like that. You stick a peasant behind the desk of a bank, and he'll try to get a quick fix for himself. Put one of them in capitalism or communism, and they'll do the same. The system isn't the problem. The government isn't the problem. the political or economic regime isn't the problem. The issue is that we have stupid peasants running around unchecked. There was a reason why in every Kingdom around the world, for thousands of years these peasants had limited rights. Do you think for all those thousands of years when our ancestors were intelligent enough to engineer weapons of war, profound philosophical systems, and engineer immortal structures like the Giza Pyramids, that our ancestors actually forgot to contemplate on the rights of the peasants, because they were "human too?"

Chloe: You sound like either a Monarchist or Fascist? Care to elaborate?

Kayla- All I know is that I am not a “Democratic-Republican,” meaning I don’t believe a Nation-State based on the rule of the illiterate peasant mob is beneficial to human progression. The Mob doesn’t progress. It’s against their very nature to work against the comfort of their inertia. Progression has always been either forced or tricked onto the Mob. With war, or with incentives, i.e. Money and Consumerable Goods. I don’t have all the answers, so I can’t really give an honest alternative. Does it really matter? Their always the same money changers, no matter what National-Regime. When I say “illiterate” I mean mental illiteracy, when you can’t read life, nature, the world around you, and the cause and effect law..

Chloe: What do you mean when you say “Their always the same money changers, no matter what National-Regime?”

Kayla- I mean if you look closely at the last 500 years of history, and the changes Europe experienced, you will see magicians at work, working their slight of hand. Take the time when the Catholic Church ruled Europe, and owned it... its money and wealth. If you were a sinister “magian” who wanted that wealth, how would you Disrupt Catholic Europe? You play with a monarch’s ego and give him Protestantism and tell him God made him not only King, but Head of his own Church. Qui Bono? The Bankers... the money changers. When those Kings bought the idea and warred with Catholic Europe, who truly benefited? The money changers did. After a hundred to 2 hundred years past and these Kings became to powerful and wealthy... competition to your sinister Magian wealth... how would you Disrupt a kingdom’s coherency? By playing with the People’s egos. You tell them that God made them free and that they have some divine right to rule themselves. When the People bought the idea and fought with kingdoms for their divine right to democracy, Qui Bono? Who truly profited? The money changers did. This isn’t even a democracy anymore. It’s a Corporate-Banking Hegemony. This economic crisis did one good thing. It lifted the veil for those of us who has an eye to see, to witness that this shit isn’t a democracy, but a gambit run but international corporations and big banks; what are we, but pawns? Have we been anything more during the past 500 years?

Chloe: Do you believe in a Magian New World Order conspiracy?

Kayla- No I don’t. I believe in a global conspiracy of stupidity and private greed. Stupid peasants People being fooled by stupid peasant bankers looking for a quick fix. I’m not dumb. I know enough to understand that a bank is a public corporation, meaning that their stocks and corporate shares are owned by your average citizen. I own some bank stocks myself. On a personal, individual level, I put in my hard earned money into a share of the bank, and I expect my dividend to be paid, because a share of that bank is rightfully mine. Multiply that individualistic expectation by tens of thousands who all want their share of the profit and you have a monster that can’t help but do what it does to make the money it needs to make to satisfy its shareholders. Some of those who own large shares of these banks, which has been passed down to them from ages past, are just very, very good at their business – Disruption for profit. It takes someone with a sinister quality mind to recognize those of like minds, don’t you think?

Chloe: I thought private greed was a good thing to a Satanist?

Kayla- So believes the Profane satanist, who can't see past his own fucking nose to understand the impact his personal greed has causally. If so, then we all deserve the hell hole we live in... so don't complain when banks fuck you over because people like me and these Profane satanists want their dividend checks.

Chloe: Then what do you think about the idea of a "one world government?"

Kayla- By the time such an institution has been implemented, and the average peasant welcomes the concept, the earth will be half dead. Don't you think if these conspirators were smart enough to think about world domination, that they would also be smart enough to work in the factors of global warming, climate change, desertification of Africa, decline of fresh drinking water in the Middle East... which means future mass migrations, competition for resources, racial wars and genocide... not to mention pollution, and over population. It's like a group of conspirators conspiring to take over the Titanic when we all know its sinking anyways. Why? Go ahead, own this fucked up planet and exploit its people, see if I care. How long will it last? I want out. I want Mars. There will come a time, perhaps 300-500 years from now, when this whole planet will be one planetary concentration camp which will take every living thing in it. If you were intelligent enough to plan world domination, wouldn't you instead try to leave it instead?

Chloe: But what about some ONA MSS in which these conspiracies are talked about?

Kayla- We're dealing with the ONA and a man that says and writes things which are directed at a specific audience to accomplish his will. David Myatt is no dummy. Neither is Pat Robertson thoe. They both used this New World Order mythos during the same era, for different reasons. It benefited them both in the end, but does that mean it is factual? This NWO mythos back in the 80's has a vicious potency to provoke peoples emotions and imagination. You talking about a guy (David Myatt) who knows how to manipulate people... an audience. you have to ask yourself- Who was he directing what he said or wrote to... what was he trying to covertly accomplish or manifest aeonically... and does it truly have any relevance to YOU? You really cannot take what was said and written by Myatt (or any person and culture) out side of its contextual time, conditions, motives, and parties involved. The conditions of the 80's is very different than today. We cannot truly say that we know Myat'ts real motives and intentions for saying and writing such things. The parties involves... Myatt and his intended audience have changed and moved on. If this mythos still works to induce disruption, then use it. If not, let it go and find a more potent one.

Chloe: Myatt, how do you make sense of him? Is he a Nazi, a Satanist, a Muslim?

Kayla- Can't he just be David Myatt? Do I change as a living person every time I change my mind? Am I truly a different person when I insight role as someone else? No, I'm still Kayla. It looks confusing from a localized perspective. Lets take a Fijian for example. This Fijian was condition mentally to bind his self identity with the single island he was born into... Fiji. Now he looks and observes an American. This American was born in Japan, works and lives part of his year in New York, has relatives in London, and relaxes for several month in a home in Vegas. From our Fijian's localized perspective which he was mentally conditioned to see, this American is confusing... is he Japanese, a New Yorker... a Londoner... or a Nevadite (or whatever they are called in Nevada)? Do you suppose our American is confused about what he is? No, to him he is just a person, maybe an American that travels into different places in search for things. The same with Myatt. You are not the label you wear, nor the beliefs you assume; you are a person experiencing these labels and beliefs. We should have all learned this from insight roling. Myatt is just a man on a personal quest for personal enlightenment. He may have stepped into National Socialism to extract some insights he wanted, and when he got it, he moved on. He may have assumed Satanic beliefs for a while to extract what insights he saw value in, and then moved on, to a new system with new insights, adding to his collection, which pushes him forwards on his own personal quest; which really has nothing to do with me or you or anyone. It's his thing, his life. The questions is- Can we learn from that? Doesn't Myatt/Long offer us the same methodology he uses? It's what makes the ONA such a practical and beautiful system of apprehension. It's not a religion, a box, or closed dogma. It's a collection of practical methodologies, which when applied in life/nature may be used to extract insight to aid our own personal quest. In the same way that Science is not a religion or dogmatic belief system, but a practical methodology... the Scientific Method... which when applied to life/nature may be used to extract/apprehend insight and understanding to aid in advancement. Just because a scientist who lives by the scientific method is a Nazi or a Muslim, does not mean that his methodology has changed or was given up. They are two very different things. In the same way that an Anthropologist who immerses himself in a tribal culture and "goes native" to extract and apprehend a personal, intimate understanding of the tribe, is still and anthropologist using the methodology of science. You can't use minimal reduction and simply say Myatt was a Satanist and now he's a Muslim.

Chloe: Then, besides the ONA, what other institution would you say you gained a lot of insight from?

Kayla- Honestly, Buddhism. I like Zen, Chan, and Theravada Buddhism. As I see it, Buddhism is just a collection of insights the Buddha shared, which he asks each of his disciples to question. Then he offers his disciples a Way, or method which he used personally to come to such insights. In this way, as I explained it just now, it has many qualities in common with science and the ONA. All three... science, the ONA, and Buddhism... offers a different practical method of extracting insights, from the same Great Book of Eternal Wisdom – Nature. It's a shame that many people not intimately associated with Buddhism like us, don't understand it... believing to be a religion. I can personally appreciate the aesthetics of the statues and temples because they do stir inside me a sense of awe. That evocation of feeling and imagination is what gives birth to inspiration and insightful revelation. If Myatt/Long can find inspiration and insightful revelation inside a Christian Monastery; can I not find the same in a Pagoda?

Chloe: Who did you vote for during the elections?

Kayla- I voted for Rudy Giuliani of New York; Come sta paisano! I still would too, us Italians stick together. I love what he did with New York. It was broke and he brought it back to life and luster. He saw the problem and he cut the problem out... the sleezy sex industry, and strip clubs. Sorry Sinistar.

Chloe: So, your political inclination?

Kayla- Conservative Republican. I don't vote any other way. I hate liberals, and democrats. I don't care what anybody says about G.W.Bush... I personally liked Bush and personally believe he was a great man, and great President. He's a man of his word... Wyrld. He, NSA, and PNAC set out a strategy, and stuck by it. I'm referring to the National Security New Grand Strategy. People don't seem to read shit these days. If you study PNAC (Project for a New American Century), and NS-NGS, you'll know why we went kicking shit around in the middle east. It's basically about securing a unilateral global American hegemony, before China becomes a serious threat to US global domination. Nobody seems to notice, but ever since the Cold War, we (US) has been slowly and strategically surrounding China, literally. We have our allies Japan, and the Philippines to the east of China... Australia-NZ to the south... now Afghanistan and Iraq to the west of China. Why? The real reason why we went into Afghanistan? Because it's mountains got a shit load of uranium... more nukes. It's why Russia tried to take Afghanistan during the 70's... why we (US) originally sent CIA to train those natives to fight them off. Now its ours. Those Russians didn't have the shit to extract stuff out of those mountains anyways. The reason why we took Iraq? Oil and pipelines. Without an massive influx of energy, China can't grow into a megasuperpower. China's rise from a backwards piece of shit nation to a threatening industrialized nation is literally being done on 80% fucking coal. Coal isn't going to sustain China's size and further growth. Like I said, I don't care what those peasants say about George W. Bush. Sure he spent a Trillion or so trying to secure a future for America, so we won't be eating shit later; but what has Obama done? He's only been in office for 100 days and how many Trillions has he given to the same stupid fuck banks and corporations that got us into this mess in the first fucking place?! And what did these banks and corporations do with all that money? Did I see a dividend increase? No, they ass spanked each other with the money. That's a fucking liberal for you. Rush is always right. You hear me?

Chloe: LOL. This is a stupid question, but do you see any conflict between you being a Satanist of the ONA, and being a Conservative who hates liberal agenda? To those without insight, a Satanist of any stripe would more than favor liberal agenda, if not libertine objectives?

Kayla- I see no conflict. Like I teach our younger Disciples, rejection of mass conformity and upholding sinister heresy in these liberal days doesn't mean mooing with mass. If every satanist is "anarchist," libertine, or liberal, and you follow them and become liberal... is that nonconforming, and heretical? If every person in our age group is so liberal and indulgent where they lack any concept of self worth, manners, morals... then wouldn't being a Conservative be a modern heresy? I'm not asking the profane satanists to do what I do and be Conservative. Don't, keep doing what you do, and let me be what I want to be in return. Anyways, anarchy is stupid, have you seen the demographics of your typical anarchist protest... fucking pothead 20 year old, it's a joke. So is the Green Party.

Chloe: Here's a great question for you then; since you are both gay and conservative: Gay marriage, your thoughts.

Kayla- Gay marriage is like prostitution, is like segregation, is like mix race marriage and prohibition. It's not a question of whether it is right or wrong, if it should be allowed or outlawed. The question is are the People READY for it? Can you force a people who sees nothing wrong with drinking booze to adopt prohibition? Can you go into the 1930-40 and tell the Public during that time-era-mindset, that black people are people to and force the white people to not live in segregation? Can you force your view points and opinions about anything... the legality of prostitution... on a People/Populous which is not yet willing or does not want to adopt such opinions? Is it Satanic for me to force you or anyone to accept my opinions and worldviews and make you live your life according to what I believe? If it is unsatanic and wrong; then how is it right for a State or Government to force the idea that gay people can, will, and have the right to get married onto millions of people who do not agree with the concept??? Are the People... the Mass... the unthinking Mob mentally and emotionally ready? How do you think the Public is ready for it if gay people are still being murders in hate crimes just for being gay? You cannot force the Mass/People to accept an opinion, ideal, or concept it is not ready and evolved enough to accept. Do I even give a shit about getting married in a Christian church, or having the secular state marry me? No, we can put our own ritual and ceremony together. The answer is NO, I do not agree with gay marriage. I am against it. I know gay people have rights, like black people, women, and prostitutes do. I know they wish they we're free to just be... like black people once wished and dreamed for the same... but these things can't be forced on people. The people must be allowed to grow in acceptance of such things on their own time. Protect gay people's rights to a certain extent, but understand that the majority trumps the minority, and that the majority must be at liberty to emotionally, mentally, and socially come into natural acceptance of the idea of gay marriage, like they grew to accept mixed marriage and the equality of black people. So, we learn from the ONA how this is to be aeonically done. By seeding people's minds with the idea that gay people are normal people too and deserve to just love each other. You can't force it on them. It takes time.

Chloe: Magic, or magick. Do you believe in it?

Kayla- If by magick you mean that if I burn black candles, point a sword at a geometric shape and vocalize arbitrary sounds, and this is supposed to do something causally... then no. I don't believe in magick. I think it is bullshit. If by magic you mean that there is more mystery to existence than what our puny 3 pound brain can apprehend, and that Providence cushions my every step in life, and provides me all that I have ever needed, wanted, asked for, then yes, magic is universal and happens everywhere at all times. Everything about the Cosmos and us inside is magical and mysterious. We don't truly know where it all came from, what it is all doing here, and where we are going. All we have are feeble conjectures. We don't know what force holds atoms together, or what things forms ever form in nature and the Cosmos so perfect with accurate precision and regularity. Despite what we think we know about our own body, nothing about it is really understood. It's not hard to look up at something so simple as the moon, and realize that we really know nothing about what holds it in place. We are surrounded by magic and mystery; we are born from it; we exist in it, and it haunts us all inside... to not know, not be able to see, or understand. It makes us chase after it, seek it, find it. We die in it. It is just a matter of becoming mindful of life before you begin to see “something.” All you have to do is write a log of your waking thoughts hourly for a week, and watch mindfully. You will begin to see that your every waking thought manifests as experience whether you like it or not. If you worry about money, life will give you a situation in which you will worry about money. If you think about nothing but girls and sex, life will manifest situations in which you will encounter them. If you spend your waking hours thinking about making money and becoming rich, the situations will come, one after another, with the right people, in the right places to materialize your thoughts. Anyone in our 352 who has ever done our simple Ordeal of Manifestation will know this intuitively. We write out and think about a desire, then go out and collect 100 business cards from people by directly talking to people and going thru the motions... causal input... we all know that after the 20th card, that there are way to many coincidences, and serendipitous situations for it to all just be “just a coincidence.” These Ordeals of ours, and those ritual forms of magic and chants are only a means... a way to condition the mind to understand that it and the Cosmos are partners in a dance, and that what thoughts we put into motion, we must eventually experience. Once the mind knows that it and Dark Providence are a dynamic-duo of active creation, then these rituals and outer forms are no longer of any importance.

Chloe: God, what is it to you?

Kayla- Everything. If an Absolute is all and absolute, then what does it matter what you call or name it? Allah, Shiva, Satan, God, It... whatever. It is the essence that exists when everything is gone. Can I see it? No... but neither can I see my subconscious mind. Even if I were to cut myself open, that subconscious mind would still be not there... but I know it is there because of what it does – things which I can observe. My heart beating on its own. My guts digesting without and conscious effort. Every trillion of my body’s cells working and operating in an impossible symphonic unison to ME possible, tells me there is a mind beyond my conscious mind that regulates my body, that is far beyond me to understand. If we could just silence our minds, and tune into the Cosmos, live life a little carefree, and call upon Dark Providence to cushion our brief walk here on earth, and just take notice... of what we can observe – the unfathomable mysteries of the universe; the millions of galaxies swirling in the Cosmos; our very existence; and how this Great Something so far beyond our apprehension and understanding takes the time to provide us our every little need and want... it is hard to deny that there is nothing out there. That we are alone and on our own... that this is all meaningless and accidental. To my own Self, I know I am a Daughter of this Dark Cosmos, embraced in Her Mystery, and Her Dark Providence is closer to me than my own Mind. Agia H Baphomet.

Chloe: Who would you rather sleep with: David Hasselhoff or Chuck Norris?

Kayla- God... Chuck Norris. There’s no way I’m sleeping or making out with Hasselhoff. He needs to make like David Myatt and leave! At least Chuck was a cowboy park ranger, or something in that TV show... Texas Park Ranger. I have a thing for shiny badges and denim jeans.

Chloe: Who would you rather sleep with: David Hasselhoff or a Joe Liberman – that Liberal.

Kayla- That doesn't work Chloe because just because I sleep with a liberal, doesn't mean I support his agenda. So I would have to go with Joe Liberman.

Chloe: Who would you rather sleep with David Hasselhoff, or that Tammy Fey lady from TBN?

Kayla- Tammy, she looks like she's crazy in bed... she looks crazy period.

Chloe: Ok, who would you sleep with: David Hasselhoff or Janet Reno; I think she's even a republican?

Kayla- No! Dammit! Hasselhoff... but I'm not gunna like it one bit.

GANGS, THE ESSENCE

I once thought street gangs were stupid, this was back in junior high. I have cousins on both my paternal and maternal side that are into their respective gangs. Sometime during high school I went in to see what the big deal was about. Why people would waste their lives, risk going to prison, and kill people for what looks like a flag (a rag – colors) and three letters.

I went the easy way and went into TRG's girl division called LRG [Lady Raskal Gang] because my cousins and their close friends ran a set [branch] and they just let me in without having to go through all that sexing or jumping in or doing something to prove your loyalty.

Tiny Raskal Gang was started way back in the 80's in Long beach by two Khmer boys named Thea and Rith. These two were getting picked on by Mexicans and blacks back in those days and they started a little clique to defend themselves. Way back then it was just called Thea and Rith Gang, thus the TRG, but that evolved to mean "Tiny Rascals Gang" soon afterwards. Then they added their numbers 7126 at a later date. The numbers 7126 means the same thing as the letters: the 7=T, the 12=R, and the 6=G.

Twenty years later and 712 Gang has grown to become the largest Asian gang in America. Today it's mixed, meaning it's open to any race down with the gang. It's nation wide, from Fresno to the east coast.

The OG's Thea and Rith got deported a while back back to Cambodia, which was a stupid move on America's part. Other 7126 members in Long Beach got deported too. This is an example of short sighted, immediate gratification. The stupid authorities here thinks deporting members out of the US is going to reduce crime rate in inner cities. Sure, it does, for a while. Until the people you deport regenerate their gangs in their home countries. Then what you have isn't just a nation wide criminal organization – but an international one. This is the state most evolved gangs have taken; for example La Mara Salvatrucha Trese [MS13]. These newly evolved international gangs are now becoming the new problem – internationa drug, arms, and people traffic.

These stupid people running America just don't learn from past mistakes. Prohibition gave birth to the Mob; drug prohibition gave birth to gangs. The stupidity comes from law makers who sit in their office, totally oblivious to the problem and its cause – completely removed from the reality of these cities – who just pass laws to cover symptoms to get paid and re-elected. If anything, these law makers are the other side of the crime coin, who actually help create the crime, the gangs, the prison over population, the deaths, and the lose of millions of tax payers money. Lao Tzu once said: The more laws you pass, the more crime your create.

Since I got to see my set working and operatng from the top down, or inside out, I have a different perspective on gangs, then the average gang member.

From my “insider” perspective gangs are unincorporated corporations. This unincorporated corporation has its “CEO’s,” called Heads; “Managers,” called OG’s and dispensible “Employees,” called Juniors or Foot Soldiers.

Like any corporation, gangs Capitalize off of a comodity. By Capitalize I mean the use of Calipatistic exchange of a product from the manufacturing source to the Market for a profit, called “Capital.” The “product” these gangs sell is one legally incorporated corporations cannot touch or sell: Drugs.

To sell drugs, you need a market: a certain section of a city, where there exists consumers for the product – dope heads in our case. This produces two problems: Competition, and safely selling the product without risking management’s asses – otherwise, there would be no business. This problem is taken care of by one agent: Juniors or foot soldiers.

Usually a junior is a punk ass teenager between 13-17. This is where the magic or real power of a gang comes into play. How do you, as management of a corporation instill or induce these teenagers to dedicate their lives to serving the gang, by selling dope, securing territory, risk their lives and freedom by killing competition? The answer is simple: Emotional and Ego manipulation. You spark their passion and manupilate their perception of reality. Don’t ever underestimate the power of burning passion. It’s what made all nation-states possible.

Boyz are by nature usually naturally group oriented and competitive anyways. Generally you take a new junior and let him hang out with you (the gang). The more he hangs out with you, the more he realizes their is a heirarchy, and eventually this young boy will want to begin to impress the right people up in the heirarchy. You straight aways introduce him to your enemies, phisically – usually in a club or at a house party. Your enemies makes your gang members.

Putting that junior into a situation where he physically experiences “the enemy (rival gang members) as he is accompanied by people he phychologically assumes are his associates – with which he has attached his identity with, makes the gang member. Nothing binds a group together like war and shared struggle – even a manufactured one. This shit is the same shit you do with a skinhead gang. A few skinheads takes a new junior and exposes him to “the enemy.” The act of the new junior skinhead being exposed to an angry black guy or whatever causes him to emotionally severe his identity with these people and he binds that identity tight with those assocites he hangs out with. It’s the same thing you do when you are conditioning a new recruit of a political party (Democrat or Republicans). You hang out with him, bond with him, make him feel a part of the party, then expose him to the enemy – the rival party; their ideology; their agenda – Us versus Them. It's just a psychological method of tapping into that ancestral tribal nature ingrained in us. If the new recruit wants to continue being accepted by the party, he will reject anything associated with the enemy. If he wants to impress his superiors, he will act and do things for recognition – Purple Hearts, patches, kudos, being called OG – arbitrary, meaningless trinkets of recognition.

No person, group, party, or nation, will ever get anywhere or achieve anything great with our a rival or enemy. The rivalry between America and Communist Russia made America what it is today. The newly manufactured rivalry between Communist China, and the US will make America what it will be tomorrow.

Germany once made Europe. It once made England and its European allies the most powerful force in the world. What happened to the British Empire, England, and its European allies, once Germany was crushed, and no real rival existed anymore? Sure there was Russia. But Germany actually invaded and killed; thus generating a deep emotional rivalry. Russia was never more than an intellectual rivalry. Think about it for a while.

Back to our gangs. So you have these foot soldiers working the streets, recruiting their friends, selling product, and securing turf. This opens the door for management to start up a new business. These juniors will form sets [branches]. These sets will then need arms – which the OG's will sell to them. In every case, it becomes apparent that one class of members has apprehended and is exploiting another for personal gain and profit.

In this way, what we call a gang is very similar to a "Temple" as described in the Black Book of Satan – being an organization put together by a Master and/or Mistress who know how to manipulate people to exploit them for their own pleasures, and personal gain. Not only are gangs like Temples. Gangs actually cull people and are proud of it. When a gang says it culls people, it's not just talk to look hardcore. We all know gangs are violent and kill people.

Girls in these gangs are a very important factor. Usually in gangs, the boy that acts and does the most – who is "hardcore" – gets the most attention. In gangs the girls that don't do anything and get the most attention from Seniors (OG/Management) becomes the object of attention to the juniors.

It's a like a pecking order of girls. There are girls at the bottom of the food chain, and those at the top. Why waste your time trying to impress a bottom girl, when you can impress a top girl and rub shoulders with the OG's? This causes the boys to compete with one another – the top dog, gets the top girls. It's primal human nature at play. This happens in any group, be they gangs, churches, or nation.

I once insight roled as a Mormon. I don't know if you've ever been to a youth ward (church meeting for young Mormons). Those Mormons are very clever! "Church" meetings are separated into age groups – all the parents and married people meet at their own time; and the young unmarried members meet up together during their own time.

All the girls [at least in our ward] are well dressed and pretty. Not church wear either. More like cute dresses, and skirts; thongs and g-strings; and heels. I wasn't the only one that dressed like that. Every other top girl at our ward did to. We usually stick together at the ward and sit together through service. And we talk about the boys. The boys that are talked about the most – who get the most dates – are those that have spent tens of thousands of dollars and years as a Missionary. The other boys are rejects. As soon as a boys returns to his home ward from his "Call" [as a Missionary] he's already the talk of the ward among us girls, and he'll already (unbeknownst to him) have a handful of very attractive girls who want to date him. And those other boys knew it. They know they were nobodies. What does this do? It exploits primal human nature, and causes these other boys to beg their parents to spend money on them so they can go out and do their missions for the Church – to whose real benefit?

Same shit goes down in political parties. If you ever go to meetings and associate in their group activities. The girls will date those guys that work to rise up above the other guys. That's really attractive to us girls for some reason. It like you have your shit together and you can dominate other guys – alpha male status.

Me and Kayla once had an intellectual debate about gangs and crime. She thought gangs were stupid, and that crime was not genuine human nature.

True, from a foot soldier's perspective, or from a local citizen's perspective, gangs are stupid. But from the perspective of management, gangs means power, money, and girls. What else is their to live for in life. What has every hero ever risen to the top of the man pile for but for the glory of power, wealth, and sex?

Kayla once thought that genuine human nature was like pre-columbian native Americans or wild wolves as opposed to modern humans, and modern dogs. She said that crime was a side affect of city life, and therefore, it was unnatural.

True. This is so, many thousands of years ago. And it is still true in some primitive areas. But 6000 years ago a faction of the human race invented something called: civilization, where we took ourselves out of feral nature, and made cities to live it.

Kayla once said that true primal nature was like the nature of a wild wolf; whereas the pathological nature of something like a rottweiler or pitbull is a conditioning or manifestation of being locked up in a cage.

It's true, from a localized point of view. But if we were to step back and see the bigger picture – seeing all time frames as one holistic entity – then the wolf and pitbul are the same entity in different causal time frames.

I asked Kayla to imagine a boxing ring and a boxer inside it. If she were to remove the boxer out of the ring, he would no longer be a boxer, but a normal person who just knows boxing. The ring and the boxer are in fact the same single "entity." The ring makes the boxer, and the boxer makes the ring. the pitbull and his cage, are the same single "entity." The environment or ecosystem and the animals in it are not separate phenomena, but the same holistic entity – the same integral system.

The city makes the citizens, and the citizens make the city. Yes, we once lived in jungles and hunted. But as we evolved we created these cities out of our own minds and creativity. These cities are an evolutionary manifestation of our primal environment. We and the city are a single integral ecosystem system.

When a certain part of this ecosystem is deprived of money, and its units (citizens) can't buy food, and goods, the city itself creates the criminals. These criminals are nothing more than a product of the city surviving. We are a product of the city, and in turn, the city is a product of us. If crime is unnatural, then this city is unnatural. If civilization is unnatural, then the evolved – civilized human – is unnatural.

What's a gang anyways but a group of young men out to get some glory? Isn't this who all nations and empires started out? As a gang of young men out for glory. The incoherent crime and violence, matures into organized actions and maneuvers. These organized criminal organizations then evolve into political forces – forces that make and execute policies. These inturn become nations and empires.

What has the capitalist hooligans of the Hudson Bay Company or West Indies Company turned into? And the Columbian drug cartel? The opium slinging, arms buying Taliban – what are they becoming? What is the drug cartel destroying Mexico quickly becoming before our eyes? Nothing strikes fear in a nation-state most, then that which threatens it's own existence. These gangs are rival nations in seed form. These cartels are saplings. Crime and criminal organization is the foundation of every empire and nation on earth.

Crime is not only natural, its altogether human, and the bedrock of human civilization. Why else would it have followed us across time, and evolved along with us – like a dark shadow we are ashamed of. We've long left our "animal nature" behind. It's evolved – into something much more criminal.

GIRL TALK

“All I need to know about life I learned from my girlfriends.” – Anonymous Smart Girl

True dat, true dat girlfriend!

Sugar & Spice, Variety & Everything Nice:

No two girls are ever the same, if they were, they'd be cat-fighting. I'll be damned if I go to a party and some girl has the same outfit I have one. That's just tacky. If that happened (and it did once to me) one of us is going home to change, or they're will be mad dog stares and dirty looks exchanged escalating into a girl fight, name calling, and hair pulling. Us girls take out time (sometimes 5 hours) to make ourselves look presentable. Five hours goes by really fast in girl time; but only when your doing something that totally involves you yourself; otherwise it drags – that's the girl version of the “Theory of Relativity.” Like you can talk your girlfriends' ears off about yourself and your own problems and not know where all the time went, but when they they start talking about their issues, the clock starts tick-tocking. We can get philosophize later about that.

And when we get the chance to run our own Satanic cult or something, we can't help but bring that girlness desire for differentiation, variety, and a touch of spice into our cult or nexion. People often ask me: Chloe why is the WSA so weird and different from those other Satanism? Well, shit, cuz a boy's not dressing it up.

If you've ever looked at things a boy dresses up like his Car, His Trophy Girlfriend, Political Parties, Religions, you'll notice those boys don't even care if those things look and feel the same as what the other boys got, as long as its BIG, as long as he's WORKING it, and as long as it makes other people worship him or envy him. You get it? These things are a subconscious extention of their penis. Big means better, penis envy means alpha male status.

And what do they do with whatever they use as an extention of their penis? They cock fight with it. If it's Cars, they'll race it. They'll cock fight and cock block for girls. If it's religion, they use it to beat each other off and kill each other. States and Nations are the same.

They don't care what they look like or what they make look like, if it looks the same. As long as they are in control and it makes them feel big. Is there a real difference in appearance between the Catholic Church, the Anglican Church, the Methodists or Baptists? Not really. Between Mahayana, Theravada, and Chan Buddhism? Not really. Hinduism is a joke. They got 300 million different gods, each with it's own gurus and "traditions," and the whole fucking things looks like one same religion.

Case in point: all those copy cat churches of satans, and all those look alike Anton LaVeys that have come and gone for the past 40 years. It's a good thing we don't know what Anton Long looks like, or if he's even a real person. I mean, not many Satanists can grow a bushy beard and were glasses to look like David Myatt, and if we're copy catting David Myatt, whose really certain that he is Anton Long? In a way, I guess it's a good thing Anton Long is "away" from the ONA. This allows the actual teachings themselves to take central stage.

I want this WSA to be different. To have its own unique look. We try really hard to dress it up to be pretty, in that one of a kind way. Like you just walked into a speakeasy and the elegant red headed Jessica Rabbit among a see of look-a-like slutty Playmates catches your eye and titilates you.

We know we are slightly, or very, different from the ONA. And at times we even say we are not the "ONA" for this reason. That we are a nexion of it so far as the meaning of the word "nexion" goes. A "nexion" in plain English is like a glory-hole between two restroom stalls through which "things" pass – gayboys will know what I am esoterically alluding to. That's what the WSA is – a glory hole. We Presence the Dark, and through us passes the Dark Tradition and the Seven Fold Sinister Way. Are we ONA though? No we're not, and yes we are, at the same time.

Those people with small minds will ask: But Chloe, that's dumb, it's a contradiction, how can you be both at the same time; apples aren't oranges? We're not talking about produce.

We're talking about a living, self propagating memeplex. Take me for example. The 22 year old Chloe that I am at this moment, and the 15 year old Chloe that I was, many years ago, can not by definition be the same person. Each Chloe looks different, acts different, thought differently, and sees the world very differently. Why are they different? Because we fail to "see" or fail to incorporate into the picture a very crucial factor: TIME. It is only from a localized – tick tock time perspective that 15 year old Chloe and 22 year old Chloe appears to be two different people. But, when you step back, and try to see the "bigger" picture in 4D – you suddenly realize that the two Chloes are in fact ONE PROGRESSIVE being in continual growth. And that progression is interpreted as different outer expressions. It is the essence of life itself and a living entity that grows and progresses to appear different within the context of TIME. This is called Evolution in some cases. The Earth that "once" existed during the age of the dinosaurs, is very different than the Earth we "now" exist in. But from a "4D" or as we say in WSA: Chronomorphic perspective; it is the same Living, Evolving, Progressing Earth.

The ONA that we understand from the many manuscripts and several books is an memetic entity that existed, or "came into being" 30-40 years ago. TIME has since past; and what cannot evolve and keep up with time, loses the game of life. All of these current, different, Nexions of the Dark Tradition that today exists, looking different and not appearing "ONA-ish" attests to the living and progressive quality of what was "once " the "ONA." Does that 30 year old "ONA" exist anymore? It shouldn't, lest it be static and inert. It now exists only on paper. But this "thing" – this Dark Tradition – has a living quality to it which attaches "itself" to the minds/nexions that acts as its Host; and through its living nexions, it progresses with time; it propagates itself; it shapeshifts; it struggles for its own survival. Such a living essence cannot remain the same after 30 years.

Such a living, progressive essence produces dynamic initiates who change and adapts as it's parent changes and adapts. Each generation of Initiates from decade to decade look, act, behave, and re-presents the Dark Tradition in accordance to their time frame, and conditions. Those inert institutions only manufacture the same drones with the same thoughts and worldview across time. And as time moves ever forward, these inert, stagnant products of static institutions grows less associated with the real world. Less relevant to the changes and movement of time. Until they become so removed from reality that they become fixated on; or lost inside a maze of; dead ideologies, magic, gods, and abstractions (Maya), rather than being lost – or immersed – in real world physical existence (the One Supreme Reality).

Meeting in the Lady's Room:

I don't ever see boys do it, but when we girls go to the restroom, we use the buddy system and drag along a few other girls. It's not like we all have to pee at the same time, but it's a girl thing. We do something guys don't usually do in the restroom (and everywhere else): Exchange Insights. We trade shopping tips; makeup tips; dressup tips; talk about our love problems; our other problems and how we deal with them. It's neither a lecture, or a discourse. Just girls trading ideas and insights. And girls have a way of tuning into relevant exchanges of insights and tips, and tuning out the ones that aren't relevant to their lives and situations.

Then, most of the time when we are talking about something, instead of directly talking about it, we go off tangent and usually talk about something completely unrelated, but us girls know – somehow- exactly what it is we are talking about, which we are not directly talking about. It's like code girl talk, and it's something we do naturally because that's the way our brains are wired to work. It generates something important to human social order: Bonding. Guys are different. With them it's a direct kind of a talk. Like when you ask him about a car, and he says, it's got four cool rims, 300 horse power, cool mufflers... and he stays on the subject, like we girls actually care. When you ask one of us about a car, we'll start off briefly talking about the car, then go into the color of the seats, then we'll somehow morph the topic to make it be about us or our feelings. Or if guys talk, it's a dictation of opinions, which quickly turns into a cock fight.

A lot of people ask me: Chloe, why do you girls post things in your wordpress that seem like they have absolutely nothing about Satanism? Well, shit, that's cuz we aren't boys. Our posts are not dictations or lectures, or authoritative edicts. They are just an exchange of insights and tips. That's just how girls talk and trade information. If what you read has no relevance to you, tune it out. If what you read tickles your brain cells, then good. It would be nice if other people learned how to trade tips and insights.

This is a major difference I notice in our wordpress and the other wordpresses of other nexions run by boys. It's beautiful to see many ONA minds express themselves on a medium like wordpress. One of the most attractive qualities of a wordpress is it is dynamic and incorporates the factor of time. You can click on a past month and actually see the personal and private growth of each mind behind each wordpress... if only they expressed their minds. But they rarely do. It's like they are afraid to just talk what's on their minds on their wordpresses, to show how an "ONA Mind" functions and works and thinks. Instead some do the guy thing and just post a direct manuscript, without ever processing the essence of each manuscript through their own unique minds.

This is all in reality what the WSA is. Just a group of people who came together to share and trade insights and tips about their personal experiences in life which are relevant to each of our own unique progression towards personal illumination. Some tips and insights might not mean anything to you, and that's fine. Some might be useful in helping you understand things better, if so, take it and use it. It's no big deal, it's just talking and bonding. It's like a slumber party of sorts. I think that's how "Satanism" should be – like real life. Real life just happens, and we talk about it, not in some mystical spooky way. We talk about life as it happens, as we experience it, and we talk about it with our girlfriends to gain an understanding of what is going on. If Satanism is a way of life, if it is an experience, that happens day to day; then why do we talk about it like it were a college course, complete with lectures?

Saying the essence of something in your own words, with your own emotions, adds a poetic vitality to that something said. Even though there is only one Sun, I have read many beautiful poems about that same Sun, and none were ever the same, but they each captured a poetic, lively Sun in their writings. Even though there is one chemically induced feeling of Love, I have heard many beautiful music, melodies, and lyrics sung about this same emotion, and none were – are – ever the same; but yet they were all about the same Essential thing. If only we could just “sing” or “poetize” what we each understand to be the “ONA” in our own words, impregnated by our own feelings, hopes, visions, and dreams. It would add so much more life to what we are each giving birth to.

Rebelling and Growing Up:

There's that time in a girl's life; and a boy's; where we enter our teens years and we think we are all grown up. These our our stupid, yet essential years were we think we know better than our parents and begin to rebel to find our own separate identity. This stage in life is like the final psychological severance of that “umbilical cord” that tied us to our parents which makes us “our own person.”

Typically for most of us this stage lasts into our early college years where we think freedom means indulgence and excess. All the parties, drinking, and sex we experience during these ‘growing up’ years are believed to be “adult” things real adults do. They are fun for awhile, but then something happened to some of us inside. All that indulgence grows old and tiresome, and we suddenly realize that this way of living is not genuine adulthood. Thus, some of us turn inwards. We realize our Self and a journey of self improvement and progression begins. It is a journey which gradually with work and experience transforms us into a new person. It is here, that we realize that Adulthood is something we progress towards through personal inspection, personal improvement, and is not something which automatically comes after being freed from parental guidance/control. The various forms of Satanism in a way reflect this rebellious time, the freedom gained, the realization of Self, and the labour of Self progression to Adeptness.

The early satanism as presented in the Satanic Bible, reflects the immaturity of our rebellious teenage era. The essential mentality in the Satanic Bible was a reactionary rebellion against the conservatism of the 1950's. You can easily see this in the central importance “Indulgence” and “living life to the fullest” takes with this brand.

But, as with a growing person, Some Satanists come to a point in the gradual growth where the Satanist realizes indulgence and doing whatever one wants is not the meaning of life – it is recreation at best. We then look inwards and realize our Self, and thus look elsewhere for self improvement. The Way of the ONA being a highly individualistic labour of personal progression to Adept/Adulthood, is thus a major step away from the immaturity of other brands of satanism.

Self progression is a highly personal endeavour. Churches, Satanic priesthoods, indulgence, pretentious titles, and some external satanism somewhere outside yourself no longer has any importance or potential as a means of personal improvement. What is required is direct experience, self reflection, the setting of goals, and the working towards those goals. There comes a point on this path to self progression where we learn that even ideology, thoughts, and intellectualism, act as a barrier between our Self and the living world of experience. At this point the young Adept learns that words and thoughts are meaningless, and that action is all that matters. The action needed to master your own body and make it look and feel better. The action needed to materialize personal goals we have set for ourselves. The action that brings us to Mastery of Life.

GLAMOUR

What we learned from applying the ONA's art of "Insight Role" and manipulation, we turned into a science called "Glamour Magic." Its a dumb name, but its an accurate descriptor. Glamour Magic is basically the art and science of pretending to be something so well, other people believe, and through their belief, an end result can be manifested. The quickest and most modern example of a person well adept in the science of glamour is Bernard Madoff and his ponzi scheme. This guy put up his glamour so well, it convinced billionaires, and he got away with $50 Billion! How much money is $50 billion? Lets see the average person begins work at around 18 and retires at say 60. That's 42 years or 52, 416 hours; but the average person only works 8 hours and not 24 hours, so divide that by 3: that's 17,472 wage earning hours per lifetime, give or take, my math might be off. Lets multiply that by a slightly above average wage like $10 an hour. That adds up to $174,720. That's not even a million. For our average wage earning dork to make a million dollars he would have to live and work 10 lifetimes, or 1000 years, and that's only a million. We're talking about 50 Billion. That's magic, the magic to generate the money an average wage earner would make in 100,000 years in a decade. Again, my math is off, since I'm just estimating, but you get the picture. All he did was pretend to be something he wasn't. That's glamour.

The science of Glamour in 352 begins with a skill called "Empathetic Shapeshifting" or we shorten it to just "Emshifting." What that means is you pick a character or person, and learn to empathize with that character or person obsessively, with intense focus, until you become that charatcer or person. It sounds crazy, and it is. Most lunatic are natural emshifters, think of all those crazy people that thought they were Napoleon. Some of those insane people who believed themselves to be Napoleon, empathized with the real Napoleon so well, the glamour napoleon thought, acted, and spoke like the real think. Good detectives on a police force are also very good natural emshifters. They obsessively, with focused intent, put themselves into the mind of a suspect so well, the detective becomes the suspect, and "knows" what the suspect did just by standing at a crime scene.

Practicing your emshifting skills begins with a lot of intentional daydreaming, in a meditative state of mind. At first you pick a dead person with a lot of things written about the person. Such as President Lincoln, Hitler, or just anybody that you can recreate in a daydream. In the beginning you just daydream a conversation or interaction with you and the target character. When you mentally animate your target character, you have to concentrate on the persons identifying traits, mannerisms, gestures, etc. The more daydream sessions you have with this target character the more you will notice something unusual happen. The target character begins to slowly and gradually animate itself. This isn't impossible, because when you are asleep and dreaming, your subconscious mind animate every character in your dream.

It's startling at first. You'll begin to notice that the character says or does things without you making them say it or do it. This in itself is a valuable research subject. We spend our waking conscious day never really asking ourselves where our words and thoughts come. It isn't like we plan ahead of time what to say or think when we are interacting with someone. The words and thoughts, just seem to flow out from some mysterious source, as if you were only a speaker or a mere observer through which the words and thoughts pass through.

Within 3-6 months, depending on how intense your concentration and how long your daydreaming is, your subconscious mind will "tap" into the essence of that person and take over the character for you. This is a stage where new agers would identify with "contacting" their spirit guides or whatever, which isn't something we are concerned with. We want to learn to "tap" into living people, so we can emshift into them.

It's easier for a girl to tap into a living person I think, because some of us have other girls we idolize and what to look and be like, and we are open to the idea. So we use the same makeup they use, watch all their movies, talk like them, act like them, and daydream about being them, and when you take this to an obsessive level, you tap into that person. So with a living person you would pick someone that is easy to pretend to be like. Someone with easily replicatable mannerisms, and personality quirks. I used Cher from that movie Clueless to practice, which unfortunately is my favorite movie of all time. So in a way, the character Cher is my spirit guide, I guess. I actually have her self animated deep inside. All it takes is going into a meditative state of mind, and "calling" her out, and I have an instant best friend, but anyways. Then I picked someone I know very well – Chloe and practiced tapping into her. I have to stress that the feeling, desire, or will behind this is one that feels like an obsession. You have to obsessively empathize and be the person.

When you learn to emshift into your best friend, weird things happen. You finish each other's sentences, or you know what their next word is going to be, and more of those deja vu things start happening where you swear you knew what that she was going to do or say what she did and said? I can't explain it. What do you get out of learning to emshift into your best friend? Nothing. Emshifting is a skill, which means, the more practice you do, the better you get at it.

The power or benefit to emshifting is tapping into a successful person, such as a multimillionaire, an influential politician, or someone that live a life which you desire. How does walking around obsessively thinking, feeling, and acting like someone else do any good in your own life? The answer becomes clear when you understand that our thoughts generate our emotions; and those emotions governs our actions, and our actions affects the real world which generates physical results. If a millionaire can manifest the amount of money you would make in 10 lifetimes in a decade of his time, then you know three things: 1) you suck, 2) he's doing something right, and 3) whatever he's doing is not what your doing. What if you were intelligent enough to come to the conclusion that if you thought how he thought, felt the emotions and passions he felt, and acted out the same determinations and acts he did, maybe you would manifest similar results in life also? With emshifting, not only do you become that target person, but you have already tapped into his essence, so you have that person self animated in your mind as a guide and tutor.

A more advanced form of tapping for ideas and resources is my forming something called a Mind Group. This is when you just go gung ho crazy and instead of having one imaginary friend, you have an entire council in your head. The process is similiar. You organize a council of people, dead or alive, with traits and characteristics you want or admire; or organize a group of your heroes. At first you will need to animate each character as best as you can to resemble how they are, and gradually your subconscious mind will take over. This sounds like a waste of time, but after around 4-5 months of intense focus, your entire council comes to life, and this gives you "direct" access to people you look up to for their guidance, and knowledge.

The second part of glamour is convincing others to "plug into" your make believe reality, just like Madoff convinced those around him that he was making them a lot of money. This requires absolute confidence in yourself, image control, associates in the loop, and reverse order thinking. Confidence in yourself means that you have to be so good that you convince yourself. For example me friend insight role as an aryan racist with Naional Socialistic beliefs. Is he racist? No. Does he think white people are supreme? No, he actually thinks Asia was and will be supreme. It's glamour, and all of his white boys believe the glamour. He even speak some German, and he's not even German or really white even. He's half White half Mexican. Image control means using anything and everything that will help build your target image to make it believable to others and to yourself, and blacking out anything that might thwart your glamour. My friend's real associates aren't even white, so he keep his little nazi group in a different city. Associates in the loop means you have friends who know its just all glamour and contributes to giving that glamour life. Every white person in 352 supports my friend's glamour as a racist pig.

Reverse order thinking (we call it "backmasking") is a skill to be practiced in itself. It's crucial if you want to be able to control a group of people subltely and make them manifest certain desires. If you want to backmask, you need to first understand that thought give birth to emotions. So when my friend goes up to a white boy and give him the thought: you're aryan, you're special, the white race is dying because of outbreeding with those subhumans, and the mexicans are taking over- this produces target feeling in the white boy he's trying to generate. The feeling of self worth, that he is special, the fear that what he now sees as being special is endanger because of Mexican. Emotions governs our actions. Think of a boxing match when the coach and crowd works up his guys emotions to a fever and lets him lose in the ring. In such a drunken state when a person is raging with powerful emotions his actions are out of the control of reason and mind. For example, if I wanted a guy physically assaulted for any reason, all I would have to do, with my associates in the loop is pick the dumbest boy my friend's white boy crew and have him work the dumb boy's fear and anger to a fever about how my target victim is a dirty Mexican and how he did something wrong to one of us. The result would be the dumb white boy acts on his emotions and physically assaults my intended target.

The same tactics, more skillful and refined, is used to make terrorists. Think about it. Do terrorist makers target random healthy Muslims of the street? No, they target those with some kind of emotional defect; in the same way a pimp picks a girl with an emotional defect, like a chubby girl with insecurities. How does a person become emotionally defected? They have a weak mind and allow negative thoughts about themselves and or thoughts about them others say take root. In turn these thoughts produce the emotional defects and insecurities. The target is either a loner who is a loser in life, or is very delusional in his Islamic beliefs. Why do you think Israel is so important to radical Islam- in the same way Satan is important to Christianity. Israel is used, along with America and the mythos of a "Jew World Order" is used to provoke emotions. Take those emotions to a feverish level, and overload his mind with religious bullshit about how he will be a martyr for Allah, and his nation; and you have a terrorist. Of course, it's not as simple as I described it, but you get the idea. It's basically manipulation, or, "brainwashing" if you want to call it that. The target's mind is weak, plus his emotional defects, makes him easy prey.

When you understand the science of how thoughts and ideas progressively transmutes into objective phenomena, you can then think backwards. Beginning with the intended end desire, think backwards about what emotions need to be provoked to manifest the actions required to materialize the end desire. Once you have the required emotions to be provoked, think of what thoughts and idea is needed to manifest and provoke those feelings. When you understand the science of mass manipulation of a crowd of people with backmasking you will begin to see that what we call politics is a professional form of backmasking, where adepts of the science uses words, and thoughts, to tap into a receptive population for an end result.

For those of us plugged into the Satanic matrix, there are a few examples we can bring up to illustrate glamour and lack thereof. Anton LaVey. It doesn't matter if he was Howard or if he actually traveled to the middle east to have his head shaved by Yezidis with a razor dipped in the Zamzam. He worked his glamour of a Satanic Religious Leader, had the charisma and confidence to convince his followers and the general public, and gained himself a successful life for a while, and influence over a good sized population of people. Versus Lord Egan, or better yet Grand Magister Blackwood. Blackwood has no glamour, nor charisma. He doesn't have the confidence in himself to project his identity upon others. He has no associates in the loop, because nobody likes him. And he can't backmask to produce anything, because the guy can barely think right forward. So he ends up the laughing stock of the internet. What power does Blackwood have to influence anybody? What power does he have to materialize results? Has he actualized anything in real life during his career as a "leader of Satanism?" No one buys into his glamour because he is weak. Weak minded, and weak willed. It takes will power to tap into a crowd of people. How can a man who lacks the will power to manifest weight loss, influence and teach anybody anything productive?

Anton Long and the ONA: It doesn't matter if he was David Myatt, or if the ONA once existed only in his mind or just on paper only. The glamour techniques placed into the ONA system insures that anyone who adopts the Tradition of the Nine Angles with bring it to life anyways. Which is the state its in now. People follow it and give it life, and other who don't follow it believes that it exists. If it didn't exist before, it certainly exists now, and will continue to exist into the future. It exists in the minds of its present initiates as a living tradition, and that's all that matters. What difference does it make really? America didn't exist before 1776, but it does now, and there's no stopping it. Christianity didn't exist before circa 100 c.e. but it exists now, and it gave birth to some of the world's greatest empires. Islam didn't exist before circa 600 c.e., but its here now, and were getting our asses kicked by it in real life. The ONA exists in its ititiates, in the form it was designed to existed in: in each of its individual initiates practicing and applying its tradition in their own indedependent lives.

The successful glamour is dependent on the basics of social skills. The social skill we pick up during childhood when we learn to attract the attention of our parents. The social skills we refine during high school to climb the social strata to the top of the popularity totem pole. It doesn't matter if what you are interested in is civilization, corporation, or religion, because all three have the same common denominator: people. Without social skills, you can't maneuver yourself within society, let a lone control or influence them. Whether if politics, business, or priestcraft, the name of the game is the same: popularity contest. We would like to deny it and pretend that we left it in high school, but the truth is it is ingrained in our humanity and genetic make up. In the past, it was a matter of survival as a primal human animal male to follow the most vital and charismatic male; and it was vital that every primale human female offers herself up to the most vital and charismatic male. We see this even in our ancient ancestors: the great apes and monkeys.

Social science is something ingrained in our species since before the dawn of the human race. How is it than that a religion which supposedly embraces human nature, like those other Satanisms, could condemn the very essence and nature of the human animal and preach antisocial doctrines. How do you succeed in life, when your religion has divorced you from the very source of that success, and has taught you that having bad social skills as a social reject is good? These outsider Satanists confuse the concept of mass conformity to socialization, and working the crowd for personal gain. It's gotten to the point where these outsider Satanists shreek in horror when they witness two Satanists hanging out together, and god forbid an organized group of Satanists. It only makes sense that our Satanism which has mastery of life as its disciple's personal objective for us to embrace social skills and reject antisocial behavior and mentality.

There is a power to glamour. Without it men like Alexander the Great and Napoleon could not have convinced a group of men to fight for them or recognize them as there imperial leader. Without it no millionaire, advertising company would have the money they make. Think about it. How did Donald Trump go bankrupt with negative 1 billion dollars, make it back, and then some to be a billionaire again in a single lifetime? By applying the science of glamour and the principles of OPP on a large group of rich idiots. OPP: Other People's Property. Other people's money; other people's labour; other people time; other people's energy; other people's lives; and other people's women. Where would politics and civilization be without glamour?

HOHES OPFER

Hohes Opfer

This ritual is performed at the end of the causal life of the Satanist, and is a sinister variation on the solo nine angles rite which marks the last stage of the way (qv. Acausal Existence MSS).

The rite exists in two sections: the Ritual of Sealing and the Hohes Opfer itself.

Ritual of Sealing:

This is undertaken following Initiation, and requires the candidate to first carve an obsidian blade. This blade is carved over three consecutive months on the nights of the New Moon, in the hour before dawn. The knife may feature suitable inscriptions, such as an inverted septagon, or a phrase pertaining to the Temple group of the Initiate, written in a script such as 'Dark Immortal'. During this carving incense combining the elements of Mars and Saturn may be burned.

The candidate then finds a suitable outdoor location for the ritual. This must be an isolated area close to a river, and somewhere the candidate judges will remain untouched and undeveloped for at least a century.

The ritual is undertaken again on a night of the New Moon in the month following the completion of the carving, in the hour before dawn. [The ritual may be enhanced by the candidate timing it to occur during certain stellar/planetary alignments.]

The candidate first bathes in the river, and then changes into suitable black clothing, or robe. S/he kneels with the knife placed before them on a black cloth.

The knife is first consecrated to Baphomet by either performing the Baphomet chant, or simply vibrating 'Agios o Baphomet' or the feminine form: "Agia H Baphomet." The candidate traces an inverted pentagram over the knife.

Then the Diabolus is chanted three times, after which the s/he sits and visualizes a nebulous chaos streaming from a nexion in the sky to first envelope the knife and then spread outwards to engulf the candidate.

Once complete, the candidate vibrates 'Ad Satanus qui laetificat juventutem meam' and departs from the area.

The knife is then wrapped in the black cloth and stored safely in a locked box in the candidate's keeping.

Hohes Opfer:

At the conclusion of the Satanist's causal life, s/he writes a full account of their experiences of the Seven Fold Way. This is written in code, in a variant of the 'Dark Immortal', and then entrusted to either their heir and/or their Temple.

The Satanist then chooses an offer as their final victim, applying the usual guidelines. It is ideal that the Satanist undertakes the sacrifice themselves using the obsidian blade, and this may be done ceremonially with the full participation of the Temple, or swiftly in circumstances of the Satanist's own contriving. [Or the Satanist may instead opt for an assassination, by proxy, of some significant world figure.]

Once this is successfully complete, the Satanist withdraws to the place where the Ritual of Sealing was conducted and undertakes the form of the solo nine angles rite suitable to that final stage. Their causal life is ended at the ritual's conclusion, using the knife. They may opt for a trusted comrade to accompany them, who will then arrange suitable and respectful disposal of the empty vessel (see Black Book of Satan for funereal rite). The knife then passes into their keeping.

ILLUSIONS OF THE STATE

Illusions Of The State

It's raining outside right now, so I was just thinking about walking in the rain. Which got me thinking about things concerning the illusions of "law and order" so I thought I'd write what comes to mind before I lose the thought which is flowing. The only time I can writing is when I get that flowing of inspiration when the thoughts and words just seem to want to burst out.

I remember once when I was a little girl and it was raining lightly. I was looking out the window and I saw the neighbor boy playing out in the rain. So I ran to get my rain coat to go play out in the rain to. I was over at my real parent's home at the time, so I went to ask my mom if I can go play in the rain with the neighbor boy. She told me I couldn't because I'd get sick. So I asked her: "Why does that boy get to play in the rain?" And my mom said: "Because he's not my child and you are, now go play inside the house somewhere."

So I just went back into my room really angry wishing my mom would die for a while and thinking about how mean she was for not being as nice as the neighbor boy's mom who let him play outside in the rain. So I just sat there in my room staring at and hating the boy but at the same time wondering what it would be like to live with his parents and not my mom, because I never get to do anything.

Or this one time much later when I was around 12 or something I would sleep over at my real parents house on the weekends and every Sunday my dad would have a Jehovah's Witness study buddy come over and sit me down to teach me there religion. My mom and her family raised me Buddhist like them, but my dad tried to raise me Christian.

So anyways one day my study buddy was teaching me about Judgment Day from a red book. Before that I thought nothing of this Jehovah's Witness thing my dad and his family were into since the idea of living forever in some paradise sounded really cool to me.

My study buddy had me read a few things out of the book about the resurrection, and then he read thing out of the bible that were about the resurrection, and he asked me if I had any questions because I had a confused look. I said: "I thought you go to heaven when or die or reincarnate into new people?" And he goes something like: "No, that's a lie the Israelites picked up from the Babylonians, you see in the book of genesis duh duh duh, it says when Jehovah made Adam, he made Adam a 'Living Soul,' the bible doesn't say he gave Adam a Living Soul. So when you die you just sleep in the ground, and if you aren't a Jehovah's Witness Jehovah will not resurrect you."

I thought that was the dumbest thing I ever heard and I told my study buddy: "That's just silly, we have souls, my moms and grandmas say so. I believe we have souls, I have cousins that remember their past lives." So he tried to argue and I just kept on telling him that I don't have to believe the bible because I was raised Buddhist; but he kept on saying that I had to because it was the "truth." But anyways, I told my grandma to tell my dad to stop making me a Jehovah's Witness, and I never went to my parents house Sundays again.

In remember in school we were learning about American history about how the pilgrims came from England and colonized the east coast and how the native Indians came share their food with the pilgrims. Then how the early Americans went around with guns shooting and killing Indians because they were savages.

So in those three stories and examples I gave there exists three objective groups or sets of people in each group: 1) A Law maker; 2) The Law follower; & 3) The ones outside the Law.

In my first example my mom made the laws which I had to follow, and that neighbor boy was the person outside my mom's laws. Why didn't that boy have to follow my mom's rules and I did? Was that boy breaking any rules?

In my second example the religion of the Jehovah's Witness made the Law, my study buddy was the Follower, and I was the person who existed outside the Law of his religion. Was I breaking the laws of his religion?

In my third example the Lord of a colonial township made the Law, the "Citizens" or Members of those colonial towns Followed those Laws. And the Indians existed outside those Laws. Were those Indians criminals?

Law & Order Is Relative

Essentially I follow my mom's rules because I was Conditioned to do so from birth and that neighbor boy has nothing to do with my mom so even if my mom tried to make him follow her rules, he wouldn't.

Essentially we are Conditioned, Trained, inside a religion. In the old days, the Church had you believe that what religion you were born into was your religion. And it is from this BELIEF and Conditioning that empowers the Church to have power over you. But yet those same laws has no affect on someone who does not BELIEVE in that religion.

In those old days, if the Church Patriarchs wanted more power, they waged war on a "heathen" tribe and converted them to the religion, thus those Vanquished tribes ended up within the Jurisdiction of that religion.

Were those native and feral Indian tribes outlaws and criminals? No they were not, because they simply had their own society, their own Way and their own rules. Just like the colonialists had their own society and rules. We're dealing with two sets of autonomous groups of people.

But what happened to that autonomy? What happened was the group with the largest army who killed the most people Vanquished the weaker group and forced them to follow their laws. Notice now that the colonialists and the Vanquished equally are subject to the same Law & Order. Such that it becomes clear that being forced or conditioned to follow other people rules is not Freedom, because the Native Indians were once Free weren't they?

A State Of Mind

It was during the Western Expansion, when Washington DC believed it had some divine destiny to control all of the land from "sea to shining sea" that the "Law & Order" of the white man spread to the West. That law & Order spread with guns, it was established with the mass rape and genocide of a free and feral people, whose only crime was that they did not accept the Law & Order of this foreign people. Because those Native Tribes had their own Culture, their own Ways, their own identities, their own Laws. The only reason why those ways and laws of those native tribes did not matter was because they lost their battles.

So here we are us modern people living in the 21st century living in our developed Nation-State. We are each born on a plot of dirt and we are lied to, like religion once lied to us that we belong to the State we were born in. Did I have a choice? Did you have a choice? It's not like we can walk into some Department of State Membership and say to them: "Oh I'm sorry, I'm going to have to decline membership in your Nation-State. I just don't agree with your foreign policies you know. It just clashes with my personal beliefs; you guys understand right? But thanks for letting me be borned in the land you control."

If you were to ask one of these plebeian mundanes to draw a picture of their State for you, you know what you can expect? 100% of the time they will draw you the outline of the continent or landmass they were born on or a national flag.

If you asked these same idiot breed mundanes to draw you their Religion, you know what you would get? A look of confusion and maybe the symbol of their religion if they belong to one.

This is because your mundane human whose ancestors were line bred to produce idiot farmer and peasants whose brain capacity was bred to only deal with such feeble tasks is bred to believe what they are told by their Masters [authority figures].

They never come to realize that during circa the 1300's and so that if you were to go up to one of their mundane ancestors and ask them to draw you a map of Christianity that they'd draw the outline of Europe. Why? Because back then the Catholic Church controlled Christendom territorially just like modern secular States do today. Just like certain kinds of Islamic Sects controls a territory today. In such a way that if you did not follow their laws, pay your tithes, and did not recognize their authority they would kill you. Just like in a modern secular State, if a peasant was born on territory controlled by the Church you were "born" Catholic.

The question is: Why can we today see and understand that “religion” is an ethereal “thing” which was a lie used by a certain class of organized people to control and exploit “the faithful,” but most of us cannot see and understand that the “State” is the exact same thing? The same breed of mundanes that believed wholeheartedly in the illusion of Christendom also believes in the illusion of the State in an equally sacred manner of fear and reverence. The only difference is that in the past the mundane feared an abstraction called “God,” and the power of God’s Priests and today the mundane fears an abstraction called “the People” and the power of the People’s priests called: Lawyers, Politicians, Judges, and Law Makers. It’s the same bullshit just in a different toilet. And the same domesticated individualized mundanes end up being manipulated and exploited, by the same certain class of organized manipulative people. And they don’t get it, even after a thousand years. “Make the lie big, make it simple, keep saying it, and eventually they will believe it.” – Adolf Hilter

The Name Of The Game

Some of my uncles, my step dad, and some of my cousins own their own independent contracting construction business, which me and my cousin Tiffany help out with from time to time. Me and Tiffany basically are like the boys’ agents, we find them work.

So there was this one time when me and Tiff were up at Big Bear and we bumped into a family friend of my step dad’s who had seen him and the boys lay tiles for one of a mutual friend of their’s. This family friend asked me and Tiff if the boys would be available next month because he had a project in mind. So we told him yeah sure, what’s the project? And he said: “Well, I got some land up near by here and I was thinking of building a cabin, do they have any experience in building cabin?”

I was going to be honest and say something like: “No way, they tried to build my grandma a patio and extra rooms and it came out lopsided and wack and they used glue half the time; they’re Cambodians,” since he was a family friend. But Tiff quickly interjected and said: “Pssh, yeah, they built a three bedroom one last year.” So they guy says: “Great, I’m an architect so I have the blueprints and paperwork all done. I just need people who can read blueprints and know what they’re doing. What’s the labour gunna cost you think, because I can buy the supply?” And Tiff says: “They’ll do it for around $5000.”

Well, me and Tiff really didn’t know what the labour for building a cabin actually costs. The guy was really happy and eventually signed the contract. And the guys did not actually know kee-rap about reading blueprints or building cabins. But they are quick learners and ended up doing a great job and making money and the family friend never knew a thing! The point to this little story is some guy needed something and we lied to him, and he believed it, and we made money off of him. That’s called business.

Here’s another few more illustrations before we get to the main point. Let’s say we were in the 1960’s and that there were two companies: Sony and Hitachi. Now these two companies make television sets which were all black and white back then.

So one day some engineer invents a way to make color television, which excites certain sectors in the market. Now the Sony CEO has a meeting and say with his board and says: "So yeah, it looks like this new colored TV thing is exciting the market. I think we should risk invest all our money into this new industry to keep the market in our hands."

Then the Hitachi CEO holds a meeting with his board and says: "You guys hear about that crazy colored TV doohickey? What a joke. What next, plasma screens? I hear Sony is going to invest all their capital on this crazy idea because a little group of kids are getting stoked over it. We're not gonna get into this crazy fad because we know fads are crazy. And we're gonna keep making traditional black and white TV sets because that's what people are use to buying and that's what TV sets have been for hundreds of years, hence "traditional!" Sony's market will be ours when they capsize, yes!"

Based on their ability to feel the movement and trends of the market, which one of these companies would you say will own the market 20 years after the meeting? The key phrase to pay attention to is "Own The Market." Sony will most likely own the market. Notice that Sony as a company did not change essentially nor did the market essentially change, nor did the "relationship" between the Sony and the Market change. The only thing that changed was the Product which is manufactured and tailored to meet the Market or their interests. Take note of what type of "relationship" Sony and the Market has.

So with the above examples in mind, let's take a quick look at Europe's history. There was a time when what is today Europe was owned and occupied by an Empire [Rome]. There was in the Empire a social structure meaning that there were slaves at the very bottom, common citizens in the middle, and the Emperor at the top. But a political regime needs money, so there was a class of wealthy noble families who had the money the Roman Imperial regime needed to sustain it's empire.

Then Rome fell, meaning that the political regime or entity no longer had any power to sustain itself or to control its citizens and its realm. After a certain amount of chaos, we will observe that wealthy land owners began either giving land to knights or paying them to protect their families and assets. What did these wealthy land owner eventually evolved into? What happened after this?

What happened was that there was a group of people who were in tune to the "trend" of the "Market." This group sensed the chaos of that Market and offered something the Market needed: a sense of security and stability, in the form of Religion. This was when the Catholic Church began growing in power. Meanwhile the wealthy land owners evolved into "Catholic kingdoms." A kingdom is just a miniature empire. It also has a social structure and it also needs gold/capital to sustain its interests. Which means that somewhere unseen are wealthy families who have the capital a kingdom needs.

It's during these times that we can begin to see the sneaky operations of some of these wealthy families. Like the Medicis who not only were land owners, lords, dukes, but they also sent their relatives into the Vatican to be Popes. Why? Was it because they were really religious and wanted one of their blood relatives as Pope to please God?

Then we fast forward to a time when the Pope and the Catholic Church has too much Power. So what happened next? The Protestant Reformation conveniently happened. From a mundane commoner's perspective the Reformation was a protest against the religious corruption of the Catholic Church. What do you think the "Reformation" was to wealthy families who thought the Church had too much power? Who felt the needs of the Market?

A number of kings were convinced that the Catholic was corrupted and that they were ordained by God himself to be king which meant they did not need a Pope, and they were told they could have even more power being the head of their own churches. Qui Bono? Who profited from the civil wars between Catholic and Protestant kingdoms and from the decrease in power of the Pope? War costs money.

When Protestant kingdoms became a norm we end up with the same social structuring: serfs at the very bottom, the same commoners being exploited, a king at the top, and a class of wealthy noble families.

What do you suppose happened when these Protestant kings got too powerful? And when the market was moving towards a new kind of system of government from all that chatter of the Age of Enlightenment?

Conveniently the common plebeians were offered the idea of Democracy and were told that they did not need kings to rule them at all because they have the power to govern themselves. Who benefited from the civil wars between Republicans and Royalists? Wars cost money.

You will notice that in each of these different forms of Nation-States that the social structure remains the same. The disorganized plebeian mob remains exploited by those in the upper class who are more collective and wealthier than them. You will notice that the relationship between these two groups never changes. The only thing that changes is the Product: Emperor, Catholic King, Protestant King, Prime Minister, or President. Everything and everyone involved has virtually remained unchanged such that only the Name of the Game has been changed. In every case the "Market" remains owned and in the same hands. In each transitioning period the idiot mundane mob is always manipulated and instigated by unseen manipulators.

I'm not saying there is a conspiracy. What I am saying is that the relationship between the Collective Manipulators and the Individualized Manipulated is the same today as it was 2000 years ago. I can see this, or understand this because I come from a slightly different background and stand point. Understanding what I am trying to get at will be hard for a mundane who has been born, conditioned, and bred to be stupid individualized workers. If you have that Sinister Nature in you, you will see the game being played because as they say: It takes a crook to know another.

I'm not writing this in hopes that I will awaken or enlighten those plebeian mundanes. I was raised hating them. I was raised to see them as animals to be bred, cultivated, and used like live stock. Enlightening and awakening these mundanes is furthest from my intentions as it works against my own desires and nature. I couldn't care less if those outsiders who are not of our Kind disagree with me or can't see the nature of things beneath the illusions and propped up lies.

I write these things for some of you who are of my own Sinister Breed who are lost in that Illusion of the State, and for my own future children to some day read. So that our own Sinister Kind can see that this “thing” called the “State” is the same “thing” as what Christendom was 500 years ago.

These mundanes just can't see it. Those mundanes with their silly religions and atheism can today shake their fists at “religion” and break the laws of Christianity by having their premarital sex, worshiping the devil, and they can even ridicule “religion.” But when it comes to the sanctity of the secular State, the self appointed political regimes, and their sanctimonious “Law & Order,” those mundanes are still religiously devout sheep. Domesticated breeds of people bred and trained to fear authority and follow devoutly the law, order, and policies of such authorities who disguise themselves in the guise of abstractions, and illusions. As their sheepish mundane ancestors did in the exact same way 500 years ago in Christendom.

Those mundanes do not recognize genuine heresy when they see it. They believe that heresy is still a 600 year old concept that has something to do with “religion.” But when the ONA urges its Initiates to go beyond their State limits to find Liberation from the illusion of the State, these mundanes cry about such secular heretical acts as being “illegal,” and “criminal.”

The Enemy Is The State

When something like the ONA and David Myatt believes in the destruction of the State, those mundanes bitch and cry about such things being “terrorism.” “Terrorism” is to the modern Nation-State of today what the Germanic Barbarians were to the Roman Empire, and what Heretics were to Christendom.

When someone like me says that the State is an enemy of humanity, these mundanes will say things like: “Well then you hate Americans so what are you doing living in America?” That is like me saying I hate Prisons and Schools, and mundanes responding with a: “Well that means you hate prisoners and students.” Is that the case though. What if I hate prisons because of how they treat the prisoners? Because of the condition prisoners live in? What if I hate schools because I dislike the crap they are teaching us because I know we as students and humans are so much capable of more? What if I hate the State because I know our species has so much more potential than this and that we can become so much more if we were given the Freedom?

But tampering with the orthodoxy of the State to try and change the way our current civilization is at the moment is a challenge to the political regimes that run the State and is called treason. If you assume that the powers that be are more than happy to support the advancement of the human race by colonizing space, then you haven't learned much about the relationship between the Oligarchy and the Market.

Nothing reveals this grip or hold the Oligarchy of a State has on their Market better then civil wars. When I say “Oligarchy” I mean to say a handful of wealthy and powerful families. Such as the Civil War of America.

On a more understandable level, civil war is like the street a street gang controls, in which the residents have become used to paying protection taxes and are buying dope from the gang. Then one day a group of residents of that street says: "So yeah, we've had it guys, I think we can take it from here and try to be our own gang too. We've been living under your domination for a long time and we've learned the skills, wish us luck. Every house and people south of 18th street now belongs to us ok?"

Do you actually think the original dominating gang will say: "Why of course. Nothing pleases us more then to see our street citizens learn the game and become independent! Why, if you guys have any questions or need any pointers just come ask us cuz we've been doing this for a while."

It's the same thing with a civil war like the one America experienced, just on a larger scale. What did the North do when the Confederate State of America came together wanting to be independent and to make and follow their own rules? If Parliamentary democracy is so great for humanity, then why did the King of England and his Loyalists make such a big fuss out of Oliver Cromwell wanting to implement such an advancement in the science of governance?

Why has the State crushed any and every potential secessionist movement that crops up? Why couldn't the Native Americans be their own people? Why can't Quebec be its own Nation? There are groups of Native Americans in Canada who want to secede from Canada and be their own people again. Will the State let them? It's like you were living in Christendom 600 years ago and you told the Church that you no longer wanted to be Catholic and that you wanted to be Hindu instead.

Do you think the power elite of old world Europe actually sent out their scientists to discover the New World in the name of scientific advancement and for the greater good of the human race? Colonizing the New World was a commercial interest of certain wealthy and powerful families in Europe. These New World colonies began as Companies, companies which these families invested a lot of their money into. What did those European Kingdoms do when their colonies in the New World wanted to be their own people, free to rule and govern themselves?

Do you believe that the political regimes of our modern Nation-States will invest their money and energy in helping their citizens colonize space because such an idea is good for the human species? Not only would it take trillions of dollars for States to colonize space, the moon, and Mars, but in the end what do you suppose will happen? The same thing that happened in history. The human desire to be Free will drive those colonies to be their own people. Do you really think modern political regimes will put up that much money to have their citizens Free from their power grip?

If you understand the mechanics and anatomy of Power, of the wealth and privilege these Oligarchies enjoy from the exploitation of their individualized plebeian units, you will gradually realize that those families will only in time become closer and more interconnected and cooperative with each other. You will gradually see that as time passes this world we live in will slowly become a single tool or means for such a amalgamation of Oligarchies to more easily profit from all of humanity. You will begin to realize that we will not be leaving this earth to fulfill our human potential and next stage of evolution as a Stellar Species without a fight.

The Sinister Nature Of The ONA

So along comes this Order of Nine Angles which urges its Initiates to go beyond the limits of society and which sees no wrong in culling [killing]. Which has its own Way, Culture, and Laws, and which sees the State as its enemy. And these mundanes bitch and cry about the ONA being “illegal,” and “criminal.” They cry about how killing is bad. Because as far as mundanes go, you can be a Satanist, as long as you are a good law abiding citizen.

These mundanes are hypocritically stupid to a ludicrous extent. They can be Christians and Buddhist and believe that killing is so bad, but at the same time they join their State's armies and kill people. Buddhists are more hypocritically stupid in their own Buddhist countries. Because they believe in ahimsa and they try to not even step on bugs, but they eat meat and have slaughterhouses.

But as far as murder goes, you don't even have to have committed the act of killing a person to be convicted of murder in America. It's called being “guilty by association.” If America as a whole actually followed their own rules it makes, then all American Citizens are guilty of murder by direct association with America. Every American is guilty of every life killed in the Middle East right now. Not just in Afghanistan and Iraq; but also in Palestine with all the murders and deaths committed since the beginning of Zionist Occupation. Who supports the Zionist government of Israel?

But the murder doesn't stop there. Who supported and trained Osama bin Laden in the 70's? It's not like he came out of no where. America and it's CIA did because Osama and his people at that time wanted the Russians out of Afghanistan, so America supported and trained Osama because he benefits America's foreign policies. Same thing with Sadam Hussein of Iraq. Same thing with every murderous dictator in Central America and Africa and Asia. Even when he knew about the murders the Khmer Rouge committed, Jimmy Carter still supported their bid and claim for seats in the UN, and the democratic party of America still financially supported the Khmer Rouge.

The only difference in a murder is whose interests it serves. The ONA states unashamedly that not only is killing people natural, but it's even good in certain contexts. And those mundanes cry about it, biting their fingernails, and pointing fingers acting like they are stainless angles when they are citizens of and support one of the most draconian and murderous political regimes on Earth.

The ONA unashamedly gets itself involved in so called “illegal” activities and these mundanes run around like frightful jittery meerkats calling us “criminals.” But yet they support a political regime that passes thousands of laws each year, with each new law creating a new crimes. Such that with every year that passes by, you mundanes don't even have to do anything to be “criminals” like us. The only difference between those of us of the ONA and you Mundanes in this case is that We consciously choose to make “crime” work for our interests, whereas the State makes you Mundanes criminals to in their best of interests.

What does that say about your political regime? Even around 500BC Lao Tzu warned of this. He once said: The more laws a government passes, the more it incriminates its own people. What kind of a political regime are you so blindly supporting which doesn't have your best interests in their hearts, doesn't want you to reach for your full human potential, and instead spends their time taxing you and gradually incriminates you? How can you be “patriotic” and loyal to something that sees you as a criminal? How much worth and potential can you see and feel within yourself? That it becomes ok and wonderful to be treated like a criminal and exploited like farm animals?

And when someone like I myself, and other of my sinister breed sees a value, a worth, and latent potential in me and in the rest of humankind. And when someone as criminally genius as David Myatt comes along as gives such sinister breeds a means and method to reach for that potential we are the bad guys and villains? But what the ONA is in essence to those of us that can grasp its Esoteric Philosophy, is beyond this petty issue of crime and legality of conduct. What the ONA is goes much deeper than this. It is ridiculously simplistic and dismissive to think that 30 years of writing and pondering on the part of Anton Long is a mere excuse to perpetrate criminal deeds.

To whom or what do you ultimately owe your loyalty to: a political regime, or humanity? That's what it boils down to. Who are you serving in the end: The State or Mankind? Is this all that Mankind is worth to you in your eyes? A miserable creature to be abused, incriminated, and exploited by the rich and powerful? Have you lost the ability to dream and reach for those dreams? Have you become so mundane – so worldly – that any vision beyond the hum-drum of mundane life is a fantasy beyond reach and not worth striving for?

Has it come to the point where a people who wishes to be Free to live their lives their own Way is an outlaw? Has it really come to the point where the idea that we have more worth and potential inside of us is criminal? Has it come to the point where the idea that there could be a better kind of civilization with which Mankind can better express his innate Cosmic nature is a crime?

Why can't we return to our tribal nature and be our own people, with our own Way of Life, to follow our own Laws? What essentially makes the Laws of the State divine and the only laws to be followed? These mundanes can't see that what was once religious apostasy and what is today State or National Apostasy are in fact the same crime. Heresy and apostasy never went anywhere. It just changed its name, but the punishment remains the same as it was: imprisonment, and death [capital punishment].

Nothing has changed about the game except for the name. What was once Religious Politics and what is today Secular Politics is the same Product wrapped up in a different package for the same Market manufactured by the same regimes.

There are some of us – of the ONA – who are beginning to see things as they are. Who are beginning to see beyond the illusions of the State. Who have created for themselves a system to change and evolve themselves inwardly into a new kind of Human Being. And who have created for themselves a means and a way whereby they can over time change human civilization. But as the Protestant Reformers of old were criminals to the Catholic State; and as those Children of the Age of Enlightenment were treasonous criminals to old world European States. So will the Sinister Breed which the ONA attracts and makes be incriminated by the State and seen as worthless criminals by their manipulated and mindless mundane mob.

The battle for Liberation and the Freedom to live one's lives genuinely to the fullest potential has always been the battle of the few who still have the human ability to dream and envision. Who still have the spirit and drive to reach and struggle for those dreams and visions. It has always been up to the few dreamers and the greatest of criminals – for what were great men as Alexander the Great, and Ganhis Khan but such – to lead the mindless mob of mundanes forward towards their visions? The mindless mundane mob has never fought for anything on their own initiative.

This mindless mob of mundanes is Nature's source of power to those of Her Sons or Daughters who are the most intelligently fit, with the most captivating visions, to be used to manifest those visions which in turn progresses all of humanity forward – ultimately toward the stars to seed the galaxy with Earthly Life. The next step in our human evolution is that Myattian Vision of Homo Galactica and a Stellar Civilization. The Old political regimes must be destroyed, if the New is to be born. This is the vision my children will live for and fight for. For what Freedom and Potential that comes with that vision. In the end those mundanes are just manipulated by new clique of Masters to fight battles as cannon fodder to help materialize the dreams and vision of Great Men and Great Minds.

INFINITE POTENTIAL

Infinite Potential

This will make little sense, since I am writing all of this as it gushes out. I don't know how other people do it but I can't think or write any moment I choose. I can sit there all day and won't have a clue as to what to write about or how to say it. But there are these things or moments I call "waves" of inspiration. If you are an artist, musician, poet, writer, or contemplative thinker, you'll know exactly what I am talking about.

When that "wave" hits you scramble for pen and paper or computer or your phone to write down what will Flow out. When you're in that wave, ideas just gush out. We don't make the insights, we actually have to write as fast as we can to keep up with the wave and gushing of wordless essence. We try to scramble in our heads for the words and ideas or notes or rhythm or picture to express the wordless stuff.

I learned early that if I miss this wave, I'd have to wait for the next wave to come. Before I would be hanging out with friends, and this wave would hit at the most odd moments when I am busy with no means to jot notes down. I would think to myself that's I'll remember it when I get home in the evening. So when quiet time in the evening comes, I'd sit there empty brained and frustrated! Fortunately now I have an excellent notation app on my phone. It's like having a fold-up surf board with you at all times. So when the wave hits anywhere, I'm ready to ride it out.

Potentiality

When I think about the wave of inspiration and the wordless essence that flows through, I think of something I would call "Potential Stuff." It's not real tangible stuff, its stuff in a state or condition of potential possibility. That Potentiality must be Unfolded and Expressed Causally with words and idea, to express the unexpressed potential.

Thus, we have two sets of "stuff" to deal with. Potential Stuff and Causal Stuff. An article I wrote would be the Causal Stuff. We can look at an article and ask ourselves: "Where did this come from?" "Who wrote it?" "How did it come into Being?" "What caused it?" And such questions would be rationally easy to answer. If it is something I personally wrote, I Caused it into Being.

BUT, there is a side to that article which existed BEFORE it was caused into Being: it's Unexpressed Potential State. If we speak of this specific unexpressed potentiality as a possible potential, and we asked those same questions, can we rationally come up with answers? What "caused" that potentiality into existence? Did it even "exist" as a "something?" If a Potential "exists" before causal cause, is it a-causal?

The key question is: Does a Potential for something have a cause?

I'll use Pi as an example again. There are probably other number sequences by we all know Pi better. Pi has a Potentially Infinite sequence of numbers. When we act on the sequence to unravel the string of numbers, we can say that we are the Cause of the number sequence being Expressed. But when we don't touch it; when Pi stays asleep in a circle; this number sequence "exists" in a Potential State. So what caused that Potentiality to be? Does a Potentiality need a cause?

Another example to draw out the point is a game I have on my phone. I think it's called bejeweled or something. It's that game with all these colored jewels at the top of the screen and you shoot random colored jewels at the mess of jewels to make 3 or more in a row, and the row falls off. So as I play this game on my phone, I can say that my acting on the game Unravels or Causes into Being certain conditions. Except on the "other side" of the game – the software level – every possible potential already exists simultaneously: superimposition of all potential configurations. All I am really doing is literally Unraveling a set of configurations, or drawing out from the co-existent sea of all potential configurations causally.

Acausality

I half-mindedly mentioned somewhere else that I see the Acausal part of the cosmos as some sort of Nucleus of the causal/physical/expressed side of the cosmos. I didn't realize there was more meaning to that idea. Acausal here meaning not acausal energy, or life force, but an essence or substance or thing that exists beyond the "jurisdiction" of causal space and time. If we go back to using the Star Game as an example, we can draw out this point.

We have constructed our 7 boards and pieces and we're looking at the contraption sitting on a table. As we look at the Star Game sitting on the table we notice deep inside that every possible/potential configuration of this game co-exists as simultaneous potentiality. What caused that sea of potentiality? If you really think about every potential configuration, causal sequence, piece placement, pattern, and out come of the Star Game exists because of only a handful of simple rules or laws. As we play the Star Game we only act as “nexions” thru which certain potentials of this game unwinds Causally.

So looking at the Star Game with this state of mind we discern two “aspects” of the Star Game. The first is the visible Causal aspect which consists of the boards and pieces and the causal moves. The second aspect is the invisible superimposition of potentiality simultaneously co-existing in a Potential State BEFORE Causation is initiated: the Acausal side of the game. All we are as players are nexions for that wound up acausal potential to unwind causally.

If we take that same concept and superimpose it onto the Cosmos, then the Acausal side of the Cosmos takes on a new and interesting face. The acausal side of the cosmos isn't just a sea of Life Force. It is a sea of all potential – Infinite Potential – co-existing in a state of Chaos [chaos as the Greeks used it]. Does Potentiality need a cause to “exist” if we can even use such words as “exist?”

There is this concept or thought experiment which goes that if you give a chimp a computer and if given enough time – eternity – sometime within that eternity the chimp will eventually end up typing out Shakespeare stuff. In other words, eternity is so big and vast that the Potential for a monkey to write out Shakespears work word for word “exists.” The Question is what Caused that Potential to “exist?” Could the answer be the infinite vastness of Eternity? Governed by the simple “law” that all things are Possible within the limits of some rules and order?

If we think about it – in a Taoist way – the more laws and rules there are, the less Freedom and Possibility will exist. While the less laws and rules there are, the more Freedom and Potential will exist. If this is the case, and we have an [potential/folded] eternal infinity with zero laws, what are the number of possible Potentialities?

The more I think about it, the more the Acausal is like a Nucleus of a cells in which is wound up the coding and sequencing of all possible potentials. But this is all just rambling and speculation. This wounded up ocean of potentiality in my mind is like a ocean full of balls of yarn. And as the Unfolders or Nexions between the acausal and causal we are like fisherman on a boat in this sea of wound up yarn. We cast our nets out and draw up a handful of balls of yarn, and then we crochet sweaters and hats.

There was something I read or heard long ago that changed the way I would see everything after I was exposed to the thought. The thought was that if I held a seed of an orange in my hand, I am also holding in my hand millions of orange trees, millions of groves, billions of orange fruit, and billions of orange blossoms. All in the palm of my hand neatly tucked away in that orange seed.

Now looking back at that concept, I can make more sense of it. There is an acausal something connected to that seed in which is contained every possible tree, blossom, and fruit in a state of raveled up Potentiality. Which Potentiality has no cause, because they don't yet “exist” in the causal. That seed is merely a Causal-Seed that will set a chain reaction across time. This causal chain reaction of a sapling growing into a tree; a tree bearing fruit; the fruit falling, decaying, and dropping its fruits in the earth; and more trees growing from them; is the Causal Unfoldment of that infinite acausal potential. Which unfoldment occurs and comes into Being within the framework of causal space and time.

If given enough time, that original orange seed would have produced millions of trees. If given an eternity to unravel its endless potential, it would Unfold into an infinite number of trees. Every tree that can ever come out and manifest causally, first was an acausal potential encoded or embedded in some acausal field. We don't even have to use seeds. It still works with quantum foam. Everything that exists or can possibly exist is Expressed/Unfolded into the causal through the "fabric" of that foam, and what that foam can become.

This is just speculative rambling. An attempt of one mind to better understand what it exists in. The essence of the thought is there. I just don't have the right words and ideas to dress them up in for them to perhaps be understood. Hopefully, someone out there will grasp the essence, and someday do a better job at conveying the essence. The key ideas is Unmanifested and Manifested. Folded up Potential and Unfolded Causal Expression. Acausal and Causal. I'm sure that as time goes by I'll come back to this idea and further develop it into something more articulate. The idea in my other recent writings was about Potential Infinity. This is the reverse: Infinite Potentiality.

INTERVIEW WITH ONE OF THEM

It's been a weird year and a half for Nexions THEM & 352. Almost from the get go there was friction and hostile rivalry between the two ONA Nexions. Yet, during the hostilities, there were strange moments when THEM worked behind the scenes to help Nexion 352 rise.

Now, after the two Nexions have buried the hatchet and settled their exoteric drama for the sake of the ONA's future – In Sinister Solidarity and Siblinghood, a Triumvirate has amalgamated – their collective eyes firmly fixed on the future.

Kayla of 352 interviews Kris of THEM. It is strange and even humorous to consider that for the longest time, even now, these two Initiates were/are believed to be the same person. As Kris says wisely: Sometimes giving the game away produces more desired paranoia. Perhaps they are. What does it matter really, when at the end of the day, the “work” gets done.

THE INTERVIEW:

1. 352: What was the inspiration for... or what is the meaning behind the name “THEM?”

+O+ Please keep in mind that while speaking didactically (as an authority) comes naturally to my style of writing – I by no means believe any of my points are objective or unassailable.

I came to see from my involvement in Satanism – even within a powerful organization that expressed and emphasized freedom of thought and an independent path – qv. the ONA, that there was still some restriction against certain forms as a result of the ‘skeletal’ infrastructure of the Order; which as a visible formation, had to use arguments, pre-suppositions, dialectic and create forms to put forth and express/share its views.

Because of the duality of our language – all worded views correspondingly give immediate rise to a counter-argument, and this duality applies to the dichotomy of creating a clan of friends, instantly creating the perception of a division between insiders and outsiders, or a clan of enemies.

However – this distrust and subsequent attempt by Myatt in the early years of ONA to distance himself from the Modern Satanic practitioners as well as the Jewish Qabala, gathered such fierce momentum that for a time the ONA was largely followed by fanatical NS supporters. The result of this snowball of fierce hatred of the Jew/Magian/Christian and the Qabala however did not move on from the stigma of ONA – when Myatt moved on. Thus it is that much of the instruction of ONA members comes from ONA mss, while a study of the enemy is skipped over, out of a misguided sense of loyalty to a changing path by Myatt, which on paper or screen is generally perceived as static. I.e., something written on his path many years ago, since buried under new insight or genius – is taken as fresh, up-to-date, and wrongly applied to an environment in which the conditions that gave rise to that insight have drastically changed, or no longer exist. This is probably why it is exceptionally important that an emphasis on abstraction and the fifth-dimensional way are understood.

I digress – while hating Jews and condemning the qabala may be intuited or construed to be encouraged by earlier ONA mss (either directly or indirectly) comprising part of Myatt's changing experiences and learning: It is more important to Know thy Enemy. How does one do this if one does not study them out of fear for being judged a Magian?

An ONA member generally assumes from the mss that the Magian and their works are to be avoided at all costs – building up a quick judgement of all such associated forms as poison, rubbish, to be ignored. This assumption of what is expected includes an understanding that involvement with the TOS and COS via the perception of the Letters of Stephen Brown is to be aiding an undesirable form. So in the early stages – overwhelmed by what it means to be a member of ONA – certain assumptions lead to certain omissions and self-restrictions.

Myatt's own forms could not help but raise the bar as far as Satanism as a discussion point was concerned. Some very careful thinking and philosophic gymnastics has been developed as a result of his detractors being forced to go out of their way to bring logical dialectic and debate. But for all its freedom, ONA still had the unfortunate outcome of creating restrictive policies as to what was considered Lhp, Satanic and so on. To limit oneself via any mode of thinking, any window of perception, any way of viewing the world – is to immediately limit possibilities.

The Adept, someone who is in charge of their own Wyrld, will come to see through practical application, that they must use all and everything available to them in their path as they see fit to achieve their aims. The forms must never master the Sorcerer. If suitable forms do not exist – then the Sorcerer can create them so they do. The learning and study (and appreciation) of the Qablah or of the Jewish Faith, or working from within a technically Magian system such as freemasonry was not banned per se, but frowned upon as being unable to assist the Sinister Way. To the detriment of the possible Adept – only half of the system was learned, and comparisons with the Qabala for the Tree of Wyrd, largely shunned by people willing to accept Myatt's early views as current gospel.

As a result of these divisions and others – there were many who had an interest in ONA, even fierce loyalty and admiration, but whose views or background were so aligned that they were ignored. In some cases, disagreements over the treatment of ONA regarding Lovecraft, Crowley, or Lavey were the catalysts – in others, disagreement over Culling, National Socialism, or the nature of the Dark Gods, the means to open the Abyss, the Will to Power of the ONA's magic, or the methods by which it propagated itself were the cause of friction.

Perhaps after 40-50 years of answering questions, defending the ONA, trying to make people see reason or sense, AL gave up responding – because the ONA grew silent in the face of many of its detractors and champions alike. Many felt that there should be a means for others to share their own experience of the Sinister even if outside of the ONA's framework. For quite some time I had been trying to make this happen – largely to benefit myself – as I experienced my fair share of silence too. But I was far too inexperienced, too young, too headstrong to be a competent leader at the time, and the groups I did open quickly dissolved. I was lucky in that throughout the silent treatment of others, I was able to communicate with the ONA, receiving some mentorship in the process. Up to this point my involvement with ONA was fanatical and blind. After I met the Sorceress however, I found myself neatly seated between two powerful opposing views and complete paths of the Lhp, on one hand the ONA, on the other the Sorceress who tempered my fanaticism over the course of years and whom I worked with to work out the problems facing Satanism – listening and discussing our involvement with the Septenary Way, and to which we both agreed the problem facing Satanism was one of Solidarity. Meanwhile I continued to receive magical instruction from both sides, not withstanding my own powerful drive, forming a synthesis enabling me a truly fortunate understanding of magic.

After the genesis of my insights via Radia Sol: Emanations of the Self – we came to see that an independent body of shared experience from all LhP paths, using a similar framework, terminology, and groundwork as the ONA, but advancing beyond the personal spheres of creating the Adept toward such things as a study of the components that formed the ONA, (giving rise to our mss on Remote Solidarity, Sinister Solidarity, Form, Abstraction, Mythos, etc) that would be more suitable to our respective understanding of magic and the Order, which at the time was extensive. Moreover, I had made a lot of contacts who felt a similar way. There was of course, also no place for many of the theories and workings others around us had – in the ONA's system.

Recognizing our Acausal connexion, a focus on psychology and sociology, numinous aspects of Time and Space, the power of Narrative Magic, Form and the creative faculties and tools for building a Mythos, extensive knowledge of the ONA, inc how it worked, what it was doing, what it was, put us in a key position to both continue the Sinister Tradition of the ONA – attracting many interested parties keen to learn about the esoteric properties of this enigmatic organization – and a variety of people from many different paths and mind-sets coming together as one – set us apart from other occultists and current ideas. What defined us could not be set down as belief – since we all thought independently, or race – since we were all from different backgrounds – or location – since we were at the time all over the world; – only Time. We believed our unique connection to each other to be the result of breakthroughs on the work on our Selves, and some strange new experiment by the Cosmos calling for the emergence of a more connected unity in people. We believed our personal encouragement for a greater connexion to our unconscious opened up certain gates, certain genius/madness, and a unique nexion; we believe that connexion to the unconscious, and the rise of the Self, to be the Voice of the Dark Gods. Thus THEM, The Dark Ones, and the voice that issues through as a conscious recognition of being a plural or collective unity of selves, not one ego.

2. 352: You have obviously dedicated a great portion of your time and energy to the ONA, thru the many books you have written, and the hundreds if not thousands of initiates you have taught over the years, even decade. We know there was a time before all this when you, like all of us were searching. Maybe you went into a few religions, tried a few Ways, even tried a few kinds of Satanisms before you found the ONA. What do you see in the ONA? What about the Order do you feel makes it stand out above the rest to which you decided to dedicate your time and energy to?

+0+ I saw expansion – and I still see expansion. I still don't know whether to call it simplicity or complexity – but the ONA was so different from all the other views, all the other systems, all the other thinking, I had done before – that I was convinced it was magic. When you compare the ONA to a group like the COS, or TOS you see immediate differences in the approach – in the direction – in the purpose – in the methodology. Most groups, though they try to differentiate themselves, work within a basically similar system – with pylons, degrees, restrictions, dogma, doctrine, leaders, followers, blah. They might look different on the outside, but on the inside they follow a regimented and religious styling of hierarchy and rank. They are different only in wrapping paper. ONA on the other hand, even from the very beginning was so far out of the box from anything I had seen that I am still learning from it even as I learned the first day more in a few hours than any other occult organization had ever taught me before. For instance, other occult organizations might try to capture you inside a certain frame of view/belief – ONA explained that this happened, how it happened, and that it could be avoided. It went 'over the top' of the occult labyrinth and dispelled the nonsense that went with it. It was like an enormous eagle high above the circuit, peering down with a panoramic view, all-knowing because it focused on understanding the essence behind things, not the illusions those things presented. There has never been anything for me personally that has rivaled the ONA for its genius – something I have lamented at times in fact, because there is nowhere else to go after the ONA – after I understood Myatt and ONA – I found myself lost. Because every other writer had been trapped in form, lacking as someone once said, a 'praxeology' – their work was like looking through rose-tinted glasses again via a small myopic perception of the world, however lofty – it paled in comparison to the scope of the ONA. And to some extent this is why the Temple of THEM was necessary, because after learning so much, there was no other way that I could evolve further. I'd reached my limits.

3. 352: How was your personal "journey" into the ONA like as you progressed thru it's grade rituals?

+0+ Difficult Just like you, I had to force my way into the ONA and solidify that position over time, a lot of time.- and I did not do this the “Traditional” way. This may surprise you, but in terms of the Septenary system I am not even an External Adept; I attempted this rite but set the bar too high in arrogance thinking my black magical will power would prevail. Well in some areas it’s useful – but not in this one and not that time. I failed the External Adept rite though I keep it in my mind to attempt it again. And I have not attempted to perform the Internal Adept rite because I fear that my personality would experience too much change, too much shock, and possible even a re-orientation of my anima – proving disastrous to my relationship with my Mistress. As it stands, my personality is required to achieve the aims of THEM. The fact that I am so familiar with ONA but have not followed it to the letter – should provoke some interesting questions – but with luck provoke more understanding than inquiry...

4. 352: We know the Temple of THEM is ONA, but as a Sinister Organization in itself, it is... as it sometimes states – different. In what way?

+0+ The Temple of THEM is not actually an ONA Nexion. It called itself a Nexion to reinvigorate the ONA and give the impression of fresh blood to save it from stagnating during some dark years it was losing its vigour. Prior to you, in fact. But its members were either so inspired by, taught via, or involved with the Order in varying degrees, including respect and homage for it, that it would be hard to call it anything else. As the Order has said – we are “of the ONA” and we recognize that.

As for the second part of your question – one need only read our mss to get an impression of how different THEM are from the ONA. THEM openly invite viewpoints that conflict with our own to provide dialectic – since the point is not that people accept what we’ve written, but accept that what is written anywhere is a viewpoint – and should be recognized in that context. We directly oppose the ONA’s Tradition in some of our manuscripts – but more importantly – the insights and secrets we share about the ONA’s form, function and methodology were not given to us by the ONA – i.e. they did not teach us how to understand them – in fact, they put all manner of obstacles in our way to doing so. Despite this, THEM teaches about Mythos, Forms and Abstractions using the ONA as a prime example – to allow others to perceive what is behind the illusions of the world and its Magian masters – thus destabilizing the infrastructure of the Authorities on the outside just as Satanic Alchemy destabilizes it on the inside. We are not sanctioned by the ONA as much as tolerated – and toleration is a necessary evil – because THEM will voice itself whether the Order wants it to or not. THEM has also expanded much of the Septenary Tradition not only via its own works or preservation of all former ONA mss – but via the dialectic it has posed, prompting answers to difficult questions from the Order.

The crux is this – if ONA had not been so hard to get answers from, so secretive, silent on matters, and more willing to talk – we would not have had to de-construct it brick by brick to see how it worked. I should point out that where we found weak points – we have always endeavored to patch them up. So in some way, ONA’s silence has brought life to a new science by necessity; Narrative Magic.

5. 352: Personally, in your eyes, how relevant is the ONA/Sinister Way in today’s world?

+0+ I’d like to answer that question but information is lacking because it’s in limbo. The WSA is modifying the Tradition from what it was to something altogether unique for future generations; it is difficult to say which ONA or Sinister Way is relevant because they splinter into all-possible definitions; and today's world for me is hardly an objective anchor from which to proceed. I will say this – ONA were relevant for me, then, and now – without which, I should likely be a very different and stupid man. The keys in ONA are still as perennially unchanging as wisdom from any great sage or work – but with the extensive and elaborate (I must confess, breath-taking to watch) transfiguration of the Order by the WSA under way – I believe the ONA has never been made more relevant, more accessible, nor more profoundly condensed. Even by Us.

6. 352: You've been active in the ONA for at least a decade. During that decade the ONA has been successful in accomplishing many things. Have you noticed, or are you willing to name certain "endeavours" where the ONA failed or made mistakes?

+0+ Even after a decade of observation – it would be presumptuous of me to think I knew that ONA had made a mistake – or to comment on Myatt's conduct from a point in time now past, especially, because as an Initiate, I know firsthand that "mistakes" are a necessary part of learning, growing, evolving. If you don't make mistakes, it probably means you're not trying hard enough, daring enough, defiant enough to reach further than you should, and won't experience the sobering humbling fall that marks every step on the staircase of wisdom. But ONA had to have made thousands. If it didn't it wouldn't be the powerful collective experience it is. It clearly grew from them all, too.

7. 352: If you could change the ONA to make it "better," and more relevant to the next generation; what would you change... add, phase out... etc?

+0+ All of my works and books contain the indications where I felt changes should be made. And I went ahead and made those changes giving rise to THEM. With that: it's no longer my desire to change or challenge the ONA; that responsibility has been taken squarely on your more than capable shoulders – with full support from Us.

8. 352: What are your personal hopes for the Temple of THEM?

+0+ As you may already know, THEM are highly secretive as concerns details of their intended function and purpose – hints have been given – but I cannot answer this question; in some regard, THEM is a hypothesis, an experiment being conducted over a thirty year period, and to explain the experiment would affect it. Nonetheless, we hope that the Temple succeeds in acting as Falcifer and ushering in Vindex, in saturating the global psyche with the ONA mind-set and the work of Myatt, to teach what lies beyond, beneath, and behind Appearance; Destroy the Magian; and to give Australia a truly Sinister History.

9. 352: Your most memorable Insight Role – What was it, and what did you learn from it? How was that Role different from the person you are within and the life you normally live?

+0+ Probably a dual role. Working six months as a janitor in an elderly home, and then six months for the federal government as a clerk immediately after. Proving to myself how easy it was to shape-shift by fulfilling behavioral expectations. I also learned how extremely different it is to be an average working joe, (I've held jobs in furniture removal, retail, salesman, warehousing, demolition, metal works) and part of the government payroll. The conditions are so different it made me very angry. Safety, Workplace laws, Comfort, Restrictions on task, insurance, premiums, superannuation are all vastly superior to the working man. I am completely disillusioned regarding the effort of the govt to get people into jobs – which they have treated as a new religion, with job network providers popping up everywhere in the thousands quietly performing a number of dubious activities to get people jobs including extensive psychological profiling. Just as WSA say, the ten percenters are real, are a threat, are our enemy. You make excellent points too in your comments regarding the nature of schools and how they are there to make machines for the industry. This also goes into all the echelons, where in every part of society the rich are catered for at the expense of the poor man. I once had several indepth discussions with a Q.C. at my gym who was so disgusted by the justice system he had quit. And, because I am a Satanist – and my job required gathering National Intelligence – it was directly at odds with my subversive, revolutionist spirit.

10. 352: In your honest opinion: What role do girls play in the ONA? I mean besides making nice naked ornaments for altars; things needed for rites that involve copulation; and reading the part in ceremonies where it says "priestess/mistress." Is a girl even important in the ONA?

+0+ In my honest opinion – my essay "Baphomet: The Greatest Heresy" covered my thoughts on this subject aptly. Because of the secrecy by other members concerning their role in the ONA, let alone the role of their priestesses – I can really only speak for myself and the role my "priestess" has played. In the beginning of my path I sought out word for word, exactly what was required by the Way – viz, a willing priestess who would learn chant, follow the septenary way, and generally rise up there spheres alongside me in the proscribed manner. However – I don't think the ONA ever met someone like my "priestess" NineRays. 9R was willing to do all of this, for me. 9r and I were friends before lovers. For many years she watched me go through the motions, becoming a dangerous fanatic in the service of the ONA. But throughout she also guided me, making me second-guess myself very often and very hard when I came at here with my opinions, ideas, and answers. It was thus she got her name Nine-Rays, for she always knew how to introduce Chaos into anything, even my most sure of answers – for this, any credit to the powerful arguments and common-sense of THEM, belongs to this woman and her ability to make me think ever harder ever further. 9R was taken with the ONA, as was I, and we performed dozens of rituals based on their tenets, chanted together, and generally assembled ourselves into an ONA lifesyle with all that it implies – but she did this not for the ONA, but for me. However – it came to the point where 9R showed this to me, and as she had always done, remained independent of the ONA even if she used some of their works for her own means. She was always strongly, fiercely, darkly, Sinister, willing and capable of using violence to co-erce, even before I met her and introduced her to the ONA. She is a tall striking beautiful red-headed woman with a very intimidating presence. She has and always will, walk her own, path, as she does now. And without that spirit of hers, I should be a weaker, paler, man now. And, she is not the only strong female to influence me, my mother, and the Sorceress, my girlfriends of the past – all strong catalyts. Even though though many of them may have never even heard of the Order – I firmly believe Women of whatever creed play an essential role in the dance of Men. Neither do they need to be directly involved in such things as Satanism or the occult, to do so.

11. 352: We know there are many sincere people out there who are interested in the ONA, and desire to apply its principles, and contribute their time and energy to the ONA, but who don't have the advantage or opportunity of knowing someone to teach them the Sinister Way, and would appreciate guidance, or an adept to point them in the right direction. Besides advising these solitary individuals to gradually work towards undertaking the initiation stages of the ONA. If you could devise a practical curriculum, or essential practice to help them on their way to develop their magickal skills and such what would it be?

+0+ I would advise them, naturally, to look into THEM. THEM – is not a curriculum of defined magic, we are not about returning someone to an occult labyrinth to memorize rituals, names, means, or even a philosophy. We do not believe in one singular magical system for all – but share what we know from experience among us without expectation. We are a means of devising an extremely powerful sense of self-analysis, critical analysis, and rational deduction for when you DO get into a system (occult or otherwise) that has a proscribed curriculum. So that not only can you learn the little things like the leaves and the flowers of the system, but can study the tree, the roots, and turn your eye toward the rest of the forest. That you would also take many things into account in your journey that are largely invisible when you start it – more quickly, can also be of benefit, because Time is your greatest enemy. Thus we host systems like the TOB, IOT, WOT, ONA, OSV, OOS, and so on for others to choose from, combine, or simply study at their own leisure, in their own way. We are, like the ONA, not a simple repetitive set of classes that teach magic, we teach how we learned to learn.

12. 352: Pathways and Pathworking – for the benefit of those beginners of the Dark Tradition who wish to gain insights as to the way and method an experienced Adept pathworks: Would you describe a pathworking session as you personally perform it, in whatever way you have found works best for you?

+0+ Well I'm not an Adept – I'm an Initiate. I would refer them to Shugara – A Sinister Pathworking. Pathworking opened my eyes – because I saw nothing. No demons, no mystical gateways, no voices, no nothing. If the Pathworkings changed me – they did it subtly. But then – that in itself is an experience – testing what is given you – and forming your own conclusions – are what has always worked for me.

13. 352: Dark Gods – To you personally what are these? There comes a point in an Adept's journey to the Abyss where he/she begins to more frequently experience acausal intrusions and maybe even some form or manifestation of these Dark Forces: What's your most strangest encounter?

+0+ From my experience – there's no way to describe what these are. Any conscious grab to understand these concepts only seems to push them away, hides them under wishful interpretation. Rather than try to grab them – to understand or rationally intuit this concept – I just let them be.

14. 352: What is the "Magian" to you?

+0+ I answered this question in a set of essays called “On the Cold Facts of Form and Manipulation”. This is a complex question, as have all questions become with my understanding of the limits of language; because all answers where abstractionsd are concerned (and everything is an abstract) require me to take into account my personal bias, limitations, expectations, and prejudices. This can’t be done fairly – because the ‘Magian’ as an abstract does not essentially mean anything, and could yet mean everything. The easier level provides a nice solid answer like, our enemy, nazarene this, ruining aeon, blah blah. But I don’t feel like a “You” – and even though feeling as though I should say it’s when referring to myself – this is too eccentric for language. And some proof toward the limitations of language to aptly express the alchemical changes of the occult. This is probably why the Lhp and Satanism insist on you providing yourself with the answers to these. Some may see this as avoiding the question – but if my time with ONA has taught me anything more than I’ve already elaborated – its the true power and key of self-sufficiency when it comes to knowledge.

15. 352: How is this Magian force to be destroyed?

+0+ It’s not that easy. But breaking through language is one means to loosening the simplistic boxes that define reality and the means of apprehending it. Language binds us to a specific geometry. Qv. Liber 13.13

16. 352: As an Adept with advice to give to those solitary genuine ONA initiates beginning on this Seven Fold Sinister Way of ours, who don’t have the advantage of a group to work with, but wish to some how contribute to the destruction of the Magian by “bringing down” more acausal energy to help manifest change: How would you instruct or advise them, as far as what they can do as a single individual, to either be a living nexion for the acausal to pass thru or to physically help destroy the Magian?

+0+ Again, I’m not an Adept of the ONA. I would advise them a) to observe very carefully how they themselves process information and learn as much as others have written about it as they can until they feel slightly schizophrenic and detached from their ego, their ‘one-ness’. b) to observe very carefully what comprises the forms they witness in the world in regards to taking into account their own possible ignorance, arrogance, failings, prejudices with good humour and with self-honesty and understanding, and a sense of humour. c) to seek, devour, and explore the works of groups like the Tempel ov Blood, the Order of Nine Angles, the Order of Saturn, the White Star Acception, and anyone else affiliated with THEM as we propose not to bury someone in a system for our own ends, but to remove one from the occult labyrinth and place them squarely into their own seat of wisdom.

17. 352: Imperium – 300 years from now when “Imperium Galactica” has been actualized; in your mind: How do you envision it to be? What does it look like to you? What are your hopes, dreams and visions of it?

+0+ This term used to mean something tangible to me, but it no longer does. “Galactic Imperium”, like “Solvat Saeclum in Favilla”, “Anti-Cosmic Black Flame”, “A Sinister History for Australia”, or “New Aeon” or whatever end or ultimate aim our language professes as the motivation for a form is from where I stand empty rhetoric used only to effect the magicians will; it is the creation of simplistic, tangible, graspable, propaganda or handles (attachments to forms) to allow many to grasp what is conceived by one. Whether a political or magical or social or religious or scientific interpretation; it's all interpretation; one shouldn't forget that and one should strive to understand that if one does not; the laziness of the human being is the laziness that allows society, condensing what is into interpretations that take on a solid immovability; from which all manner of brave postulates proceed even if the prime interpretation is wrong. Whilst on one hand it is essential to work with such phrases, building and substantiating a mythos/reality to support them and the necessary handholds so that others can support them too – the Sorcerer is or needs to be above getting trapped in forms, and believing they have of themselves any real validity or existence; they have only persistence. Imperium, insofar as it echoes from ONA – is David Myatt's personal word, to reflect his apprehension of the future drawn from his studies of the past. And insofar as it reflects a synthesis of wisdom that many of us share agreement on; the idea and ideology necessary to achieve Imperium, qv, Falcifer/Vindex is used by THEM but understood as a form, to carry along the momentum its presence generates among people such forms have the power to affect. My hopes and dreams change as I change, but my belief, is that an external Imperium is only ever going to arise when the inner sanctions people impose upon themselves are re-oriented.

Imperium, via the death-grip of the American-Magian Axis, is already bringing the world to a boiling point, and I think it is going to get extremely dark before the dawn. I cannot imagine what the world would be like, nor the outward changes it would undergo were people to follow the same train of alchemy I have; that is outside the known, and I cannot speculate on that. What I do have conviction in though – is that THEM acts as Falcifer to tear not just down but through the Magian; and whatever comes after they fall, is up to Vindex.

18. 352: In your eyes: What is Anton Long to you? Is he a prophet, a teacher, a guru, some guy with some great insights, or is he irrelevant to what you have become and or what the ONA has become?

+0+ Anton Long is the closest approximation I have had to a father figure (via my projection onto him as a father via his resonance of the archetype of Satan), and the best mentor of Satanism I have had the fortune to encounter. AL is without question a genius in my mind, though one must not forget to thank the many others around him who were a part of ONA and who made his genius ever more vibrant, ever more diverse, and ever more accessible with their own. He's all of those things; a prophet, a teacher, a guru, a guy whose work has completely revolutionized my life and what I do with it. I don't of course sell my own attributes and fire short here; I may see AL as many things, but he is not my God. I have an excellent memory – I've never forgotten, nor will I ever forget those who helped me in my path to be the man I am. I acknowledge every debt; and preserve every member of the Sinisterion in my memes, that the Tradition be REMEMBERED. I am very impressed this man has done so much with life. He's an inspiration to us all.

19. 352: Closing question – What was your funniest shapeshifting/manipulation experience?

+0+ Funniest? There's a side to Satanism WSA bring that I don't see too often. Making light of things... Good to see. Well, when I tried to kill of one of my personas, I invented a story about him being killed in a car crash and posted it on the public forum. I was trying to move out of one role and into a more impersonal one, so Tnepres Ra, had to die not just for me, but for others. It was going alright, and though I'm not proud of this part, many people sent their consolations thinking he were actually dead. Until of course, I accidentally posted something to the same forum from Tnepres Ra's address... whoops. Believe me, happens all the time, in shape-shifting. I have something like 21 personas, and I have to remember twice as many passwords. It's easy to make mistakes and give the game away – but then, I learned that early, and I've also studied Ninjitsu for a few years, and sometimes, being seen to give the game away is just the distraction you need.

It did have a benefit though – people still think I'm places I'm not out of the paranoia it created; it's nice to think people think I'm behind every rock and tree; Watching, Scheming, Lurking like some omnipresent demon with its own existence and when I do die, and someone from THEM announces it, who'd believe it? Perhaps shape-shifting is one means, in a certain way, to live forever – even if it's as a phantom – as DM appears to be doing.

INTIMATE CONNEXIONS

Intimate Connexions

I had a pet dog once named Pepper. I was hanging out with a few cousins at the local mall. We went into this one pet store and my eyes fell on this cute little black and white puppy no bigger than your hand. You can hear me and girl cousins go: “awwwwe” in unison as all of hearts melted onto the floor because the puppy was licking the window of her cage and wagging her tail so hard her little body wiggled with it.

So we were in the pet shop for an hour petting and squeezing her. The older boy cousins just stood there annoyed and they realized that if they didn’t buy the puppy for us, that we weren’t leaving. And so one of the cousins bought the puppy for $1000 because she was a pure bred Shi Tzu.

Pepper was a spoiled brat. We bought her a doll house as her little dog house and put a soft dog bed in it for her in my room and she would refuse to sleep in it. She’d whine and cry all night until you lifted her up into bed with you and she’d curl up by neck and fall asleep.

There were those times when I would be in my room by myself doing my school work and Pepper would just be sitting there staring at me, and you just can’t help but ask yourself: “What a little weirdo, I wonder what they’re thinking about? Do they even think? What are they thinking about when they’re just staring at you?”

I know if Pepper does think, that it’s not how we think. We think in language, which is really more like an internal dialogue. And dogs obviously don’t have a language to think with. So I assume that if they do think, that they think like new little babies that have not learned to think in language yet. And you can tell those 6 month old babies are thinking, or doing something like thinking.

I started to notice other similarities between Pepper and my baby cousin. Both of them can't speak, but yet I know what Pepper wants and needs and my aunt-mom knows what her infant baby needs? Because all Pepper does when she wants something is just sit there and somehow you "know" or feel exactly what she wants. And a baby just cries and somehow my aunt-mom knows what the baby needed. Even though the cries sounded the same to me, my aunt-mom can tell if her baby was hungry, or if she needed to be burped, or if her diaper was on too tight or something. It's funny because it reminds me of that one very old show about a dog named Lassie. Lassie would just stare and bark at her boy master and the boy would say something like: "What's that girl? Somebody needs help? Billy's stuck underneath a fallen tree? What's that, a juniper tree even? Out by the creek? The creek by Old McGee's barn!? Let's go girl!" So I figured there was something going on.

Then there were those moments when I would clean up her poo and bathe her and slave over her, and I think to myself: "Boy, I wonder how this relationship between a primate slaving for a spoiled canid fits into the theory of evolution, and evolutionary psychology huh? I mean how am I benefiting from this relationship?" It doesn't seem to be fair as far as quid pro quo goes. I – Nature's most advancedly evolved organism – serve her, and all I really get out of it is to pet her fur? What a lousy rip off.

But, it's because I love her and adore her that I serve her. In the same way my mothers serve me. And from that Love and Devotion of service, is born something unique and wordlessly indescribable: Loyalty. Besides that incredible bond between a mother and her child; there is nothing more profound than the simple, unconditional Loyalty Pepper gave to me.

We often think that these "lower life-forms" are stupid, and that we are superior to them because of our intelligence. But our human relationships with other humans is superficially trite, based on breakable bonds, conditions, usury, and such. There's the usual: I'll marry you if you're a made man. Or, I'll divorce you if you get fat. Or, I'll be your friend if you think like me or if you have the same skin color as me. We'll give your country money if you support our foreign policies. We think we are better than dogs, but yet we humans can't even duplicate the Loyalty and unconditional relationships a dog makes.

Mindful Mindlessness

When I was in high school my youngest auntie, who wasn't much older than me was going to college. She, my mom, and my aunt-mom had had a talk with themselves about keeping out of trouble and they decided to make me go hang out with my youngest auntie and her college friends on their campus everyday after school.

So I had 12 hours of school life from 8 in the morning, to 8 in the evening 3 days out of the week. Everyday after my school when my youngest auntie has classes, my mom-aunt would drop me off at the college campus and my youngest auntie would come get me and make me sit in her classes with her. There were even some days when she had so much school work to catch up with, she'd make me take her place in her classes while she studied in the library. I ended up also proof reading, and editing, and doing her friends' school work and tutoring them because many of them didn't speak English well. And I couldn't leave campus because all of her friends kept an eye on me. There were those days when there was nobody to talk to on the phone and where I would just spend 5 hours sitting and waiting, reading random books in the library to go home. I must have read a thousand old dusty books during those years.

One day I was sitting in a quiet study hall with a handful of college students doing my own homework. It was a big hall with many table and this one soda and snack vending machine by the entrance which I was facing. I had been doing my homework for about an hour and I saw somebody buy a Coke, so I thought I'd take a break and get a drink to. I reached into my pockets and realized I had no money on me at all, and I was thirsty, and it would be another hour before my auntie came out for lunch.

I thought I'd wait it out. But as time rolled by so slowly from boredom I kept on getting more thirstier and I wasn't planning on taking a walk to drink fountain water. I was going to ask the guy next to me for a dollar, but then Pepper popped into my mind out of nowhere. So I thought to myself, if Pepper can do it, maybe I can too? I'll just sit here like a dog; concentrate on my thirst; and look at everybody that goes to the vending machine and see what happened.

So there I was in a quiet room, not thinking in words, but just letting the thought of being thirst and allowing the Intent of wanting someone to buy me a drink to resonate and fill room. As time ticked away slowly, one or two people would get up and get a drink, and I'd try to do what Pepper does and just look at them with this empty stare and smile, and my thirst was getting stronger. It was really hard to just sit there and not think about anything, but the feeling of thirst and an intent.

I sat there for an hour and nothing happened. I got angry and started to pack my things up since we were going to get lunch or dinner anyways. As I was putting my books in my backpack I noticed a fat lady at the soda machine say to herself quietly: "Wrong button, why did I push that?" I got up, put my back pack on, and slowly started walking thinking to myself: "Is she's going to do what I think she's going to do?" I noticed she had put in another dollar to get herself a second drink. So I looked at her smiling, and she said to me: "I got this on accident, do you want it? I'm on a diet. I didn't do anything to it." So I took it and thanked her realizing that my pet dog had taught me something we often never notice about life.

Happenstance & Coincidences

It seems as though – long ago – that the more I got to know about the intimate details of Kayla's everyday life, and the more bizarre coincidences there were? Not just in the mutual friends we shared, but stranger. Like when we discovered that my paternal Mexican grandfather and her maternal Mexican grandfather had the same last names; but they weren't related. Or how as little children [long before we knew each other] our parents took us to Disney Land, and we both got our pictures taken at the same exact spot with Mickey Mouse! Or like how my Mexican grandmother and her Mexican grandmother came from the same city in Mexico and shared a distant relative in common.

It's like the deeper you look into things, the weirder things get. I said to her during those freaky moments: "Wouldn't it be hella weird if we were long lost half sisters or something?!" She said: "Ooh."

So anyways, one day after our college years one of our friends got accepted into UCLA and she needed a place in LA to stay in so she had asked me and Kayla if we would like to move in with her to help her pay rent and stuff. We decided to do it so since we had nothing else better to do we drove around LA looking for a small house with a for rent sign in the front.

After two full days of driving in stupid LA traffic and not getting any leads we got extremely frustrated. It was in the evening and Kayla says: "Ok, this isn't working. I'm getting really irritable and pissed off, don't talk to me right now or I'll start screaming ok? We need to find a coffee shop and relax until traffic dies down, or I'm gunna run people over."

So I just let her drive up and down trying to find a coffee shop without saying anything, since we both didn't know where a coffee shop was in the area. But as we were driving down this one block she stops the car and says: "Does that say 'for rent' Chloe? Can you go get the number real quick?" I went and checked for a number, but there wasn't one. So I came back expecting her to scream upon me giving her the disappointing news.

I said: "No number; but I almost tripped over a box of books getting out of the car. Who the hell leaves their books out in the middle of the curb?" I had picked up the first book I can grab and got inside and she turned on the car light to see. She said whispering, reading the title of the book: "The Interpretation of Dreams?" we both looked at each other with our mouths opened because we were talking about dreams and what they mean just the day before. She opened the very old book and a card fell out. I looked at the card and looked at her with that 'you're not gunna believe this' look. She asked me what the card said. It was a business card of a coffee shop. So we drove ourselves to the coffee house on the card.

We didn't know what to expect at the coffee shop. We just thought finding the book and the card was already a cool couple of weird coincidences. So we ordered our drinks and waited around for 2 hours to let the freeway traffic die down. It got boring after thirty minutes so we took a walk around the place to check out all the little shops, and as time passed on, the frustration of the day went away, and we even forgot we were in the area looking for a house to rent because the little cool shops had captivated our attention.

Just before it was time to leave for home, we thought we'd go back to the coffee shop to have one last cup of coffee. I stayed inside looking through the knickknacks I had bought, and Kayla said she was going to go out and smoke a cigarette with the small crowd of smokers outside. Five minutes later she calls me outside with a shocked look on her face. I had noticed she was talking with an older guy and was wondering why he was talking to her. She introduced me to her new friend she had made. Kayla was complaining to him about our frustrating day looking for a small house to rent, and the gentleman had told Kayla that he owned a house just up the block in walking distance from the coffee shop which he had just put up for rent! A week later and we were living in the house.

Secrets of Magic

Kayla's ex-hippy parents owns a small little New Age book store who had asked us if we wanted to help out and run the book store since her and her ex-hippy dad were getting stressed out. They needed a vacation and some time away from the book store, but they couldn't do that because the little book store was their livelihood and they knew nobody they could trust to manage the store. So we offered our services after school during our college years.

Kayla actually helped put the store together when it first opened. So it's got all these little drawing and pictures from magazine cut outs pasted on painted ladders and boxes she did as her hippy art work. The little book shop has all these beaded curtains and shelves of incense, colored candles, and herbs. It's got antique décor, sofas and tables, with crystals every where, and shelves of New Age books on the occult, with most of the books on Wicca and witchcraft.

So we were to be trained on how to work and run the store, how to place orders, and things like that so they can leave for a while before they went crazy. I went in for my first day of "work" expecting to be trained on how to use the cash register and stuff but boy was I over expectant. The book store is actually this bohemian hole in the wall in the middle of nowhere. So it not busy a Barnes & Nobles is. I went in and Kayla's dad says: "Hey, come on over around the counter Chloe and I'll show you your first responsibility as an employee of this magnificent occult book store. So I went around and he sits back down and asks me, as he was dividing up the new paper he was reading: "Do you want the funnies or the real news?"

I think we sat there for an hour without anybody coming in just talking like we usually do. He's really mellow and speaks softly and his hair and short beard is usually not combed. So then Kayla's mom pulls up with the in the back and says to us: "Hey you two I brought lunch, you guys wanna "take a 5" before lunch?" Kayla's dad looks at me with a raised eyebrow and says: "Break eh? Come on Chloe, I'll teach you how real musicians take a five." He plays the drums. So we walk into the back and Kayla's mom pulls out a joint and lights it, puffs on it, and hands it to me? I was a little shocked, but hey, when your bosses at work are peer pressuring you to smoke pot, don't argue.

I was thinking to myself that all this time I didn't know they smoked pot, and I wondered to myself if Kayla knows about this, or if I should tell her or keep it a secret or what? But speak of the devil, she pulls up in her car, and I look at her mom saying something to try and warn her: "Kayla's here." And she said as she was waving at Kayla with one hand and passing the joint to me with the other: "Yeah, I told just told her a minute ago to come over for lunch, but she was on her way anyways." Kayla comes over, says hi to her parents, gives me a kiss and a hello, and said: "Break time?" While her dad hands her the joint.

So a week later her dad had told us he was going to teach us the ancient family secret of making magical oils and potions which her dad inherited from a long line of pagans and witches. Me and Kayla were excited. They sell these little vials of magickal oils with labels on them like "Love," "Money," "Luck," and stuff and people buy the oils to rub on colored candles. And those magic oils sell out fast.

That day her mom takes over the register while her dad took us into the back room with his back of magical ingredients. And we sit on the floor in a circle, me and Kayla just looking at her dad as he pulls out thing from bags, expecting to see a ritual or prayer, or something. Her dad says to us: "Well need this almond oil; these things of food coloring, and girls, you can buy this at any grocery store; and these empty mustard squeeze bottles. Ok now Chloe you mix some green food coloring with some of the almond oil and squeeze the magic oil into those little vials that says Money. Kayla you do the yellow for Luck; and I'll do the pink for Love, since I have more experience in that department then you two. Oh, we put this scented oil in the almond oil to make it smell nice."

So after we were done filling our vials, he says to us: "And we're done! Let's go sell some snake oil girls! Remember, this is a family secret. I'll have to kill you two if you tell." Me and Kayla were a little confused so I asked: "But what about the secret magical ritual? We didn't put any magic into them yet?" And Kayla's dad chuckles, leans over to us and tells us: "You guys think I believe in this crap?"

It turns out that Kayla's parents don't believe in the crap they were selling. They were just good bullshitters with their customers, who bought every word of it. And as I worked there I would actually see the same group of people come back to buy the "magic oils" and candles who even tell me that the oils are really powerful. I asked Kayla's dad once when we were working together and it was quite why those customers say the magic oils work but we didn't do anything magical to it; and why the magical herbs work if we get them from the food store? He didn't know either and said it's probably like prayer, if you believe in it and have faith in it, that it'll work.

So after working at that book store and knowing all the "dirty secrets" of the occult business I didn't believe in magic and I thought those people that came to buy our stuff were either crazy or really gullible or were just looking for something to believe in.

One day, a year later, I was working by myself in the evening since I was going to close the shop. I was reading a book on Buddhism since it was a slow evening and this old gentleman with a cane walked in to look around. I smiled and went back to reading, but I thought is was really strange because it's not usual that a very well dressed old man with a shiny black cane walks into an occult book shop. He spent a very long time looking at every single book and thing in the store and seemed more interested in our furniture. Particularly a large beautiful varnished table with a central leg with lion paws we used to display these crystals and "magical tarot card boxes."

He asked me fascinated: "This is a very nice table, where did you buy it at?" I answered: "Oh we didn't buy it. It was free. The owner of the store found it in an alley by the trash bin. Somebody threw it away. It was in three pieces and really worn out. So me, him, and his daughter would work on fixing it up when we had nothing to do. To give it a new life. It took forever for me to sand it down by hand and to accentuate the detailing in the curves and the paws. It's amazing because before nobody wanted it, but now every body that looks at it wants to buy it."

He nodded saying: "Yes, it has a feel to it. A certain magical essence to it wouldn't you say?"

From all those hands that put so much time and energy to it. I love the gold colored grain of the wood. I was going to ask you if it was for sale, but I assume it isn't?" I smiled and said: "No, it's not for sale. I wouldn't go so far as to say anything is magical about it. We just gave it some love and devotion, and expensive varnish!" He laughed, and walked over to me extending his hand: "Theodore, but my friends call me Teddy." I shook his hand and gave him my name, but my mind fell onto the gold chain that went into the pocket vest. I assumed it to be a pocket watch, which I thought was really odd.

I asked him: "Is that a pocket watch? I didn't think they make those things any more these days?" He laughs, and says: "Yes, it's an old pocket watch of an old man. Buddhist?" He saw the book I was reading, so I nodded; and he said: "Isn't that something, we both find the other odd and out of place." I asked him what he meant and he said: "Well, here you are a Buddhist who doesn't believe in magic working in a book store that sells book and supplies associated with magic. I'd say that was peculiar don't you think? Why don't you believe in magic?"

And I answered: "Because I think of myself as a rational person, and I need proof that magic is real before I can believe. I have tried to experiment with the stuff in those books and nothing happens. So I conclude that magic is not real. That it is just a superstitious belief which is a component of certain belief systems." The elderly man said to me: "Well there's your problem! You look for magic and proof of it in book and in people whose only real understanding of magic is what they have also read themselves and what they have written and published to sell for money. My dear, you are looking for magic in the wrong places."

I asked him where I should be looking then if he was so smart, and he said: "Magick is everywhere! It's what you are. It's what the universe is. There is no difference between Magic and Life. 'We are formed and molded by our thoughts,' so the Buddha says. Our thoughts are things. What we think becomes what we experience. Looking for Magic in book Chloe, is like looking for Life, or Enlightenment, or Love in books. You don't look for these things Chloe, they must be experience. No one, no book, can teach you or prove to you that Magic is real. You must come to the understanding on your own through personal experience."

After we had our nice talk, Teddy shook my hand with a smile and excused himself like a gentleman and walked off into the evening. The oddness of the man and the fact that he came in the store not to buy anything, but to spend an hour to talk to me about a topic I really had no interest in made me think about what he had said, and about the experiment he asked made me promise to do for a year. Or at least I thought I had no interest in it. It's hard to be working in a book store which deals in the subject of magic and have a Family that talks about magic to not wonder. So I kept my promise I made out of curiosity.

For 365 days exactly; which was a full year; I was to keep a special diary in which I would keep a daily record of three things: 1) My daily thoughts; 2) The events of the day; & 3) Any dreams I can remember having.

I was to go about my day mindful of every thought I entertained in my mind. Which meant my day dreams, my pondering, my desires, my worries, and any thing which I spend my waking moments thinking upon. I was to describe this as detailed as I could. I was then to write down to the best of my ability a detailed account of everything that happened every day: the people I meet, the things I did, the places I went, even the strange things that stood out. Then I was to describe as best as I can my nightly dreams, as best as I can; like the scenery, the people I meet, what I did in the dream and so on. But I was not allowed to read what I write. I was to just write it in the morning and before retiring at night and not review it. I was only allowed to read the full content of my diary after the full 365 days had expired. I told Kayla about the weird old man and she kept a year long special diary of her own. We kept our journals in our laptops for the whole year.

A Deeper Look At Life

Having a second person do this experiment is more fun because you at least have someone to look at wide-eyed with your jaw hanging opened when you begin to realize just how strange Life is when you for once take notice of Life.

Reading through our year long record of every thought we had, every event that took place, and every dream we had for a full past year was in itself a mind trip. Half way through the journal a chill goes up and down your spine and tickles your ears as you realize right in front of you [in the diary] that your life unravels “like fractal patterns” as Kayla describes it. It’s hard to explain unless you have dedicated a year to do this. But as you read the older parts of the diary you see with your own eyes bits and pieces of “seed” thoughts, seed ideas, seed desires, seed dreams, seed events, that gradually grow or come together to form things you experience in the last half of the diary. You literally see – with your own eyes – your own life unraveling and manifesting from intangible thoughts, desires, and dreams.

But that wasn’t where the experimented ended. We noticed that a large portion of thoughts, day dreams, desires, dreams, and seed things did not seem to materialize during the year. Those were to materialize for us that following year gradually, for us to consciously – with full awareness – experience the Magic of Life.

It was fun. We could be driving and all of a sudden you hear one of us gasp or say “holy shit” and point then we’d hurry home to go through our special diaries to find the exact dreams or seed thoughts or seed events what we saw or just experienced came from; and stand their in utter disbelief saying the now usual: “No fucking way!” And the proof was written down for us a year ago which was the best part.

For example this one time during my year long experiment I wrote down in my diary a weird dream I had. The dream was unusually vivid and in color. Basically I was walking in the back of some school grounds I had never seen before which had this row of trees and bushes all along the back. I was walking along the trees and bush and remember passing three white gazebos and I found a clearing in between the bushes which I crawled into only to find a fence. I can’t remember how I got to the other side of the fence but I did. I found myself standing on a hill with my back to the fence looking over a farm.

The farm had several red barns. As I was walking through the farm I saw pigs, a horse, and a donkey, and a group of geese. I made my way to a side walk just beyond the little farm to find myself standing in a huge parking lot which was empty. I looked back to see the hill and trees I came from and I woke up.

Over a year later me and Kayla were driving out to a fair to meet friend. It was a city in the middle of nowhere we had never been to, so naturally we got lost because "somebody" didn't even bother to write down the exact address. Kayla said her friend said you just make the exit and drive a mile past a few stoplights and the fair grounds was to the right, you gotta be an idiot to miss the fair because there are freaking giant rides she said. I wasn't driving so it wasn't my fault for getting lost.

At the time I had long forgotten those old dreams and we were so frustrated they were the furthest things from my mind. And we didn't want to call our friend either because then we'd look like total retards for missing a big ass fair ground.

We kept on driving up and down the same street, back and forth, and Kayla says to me: "Chloe do something! Where the hell is it? It's a fucking big ass fair!" I said: "I don't see shit Kayla. We aren't gonna find it driving up and down the same street. All I see is a fucking school and a big fucking parking lot." So she asked me: "You think the parking lot is the fair? I don't see any rides on it, do you see any rides on the empty fucking parking lot Chloe? Cuz I don't!"

So as we were fighting and driving up the street again for the 8th time at 7 in the morning, we drive past that school again and I go: "Kayla look at that weird school, its on a hill." She was screaming something at me about not looking for a fucking school but a fucking fair. But my mind was drawn to the weird school because I had this déjà vu feeling when I saw a row of trees in the back and three white gazebos. Then it hit! I had seen the exact same scenery in a dream. So I said all amazed and excited: "Kayla look at the gazebos! I saw that school in a dream! Baby there's a farm on the other side of the hill with a horse and donkey I bet you. Maybe the fair is on the other side of the hill too, hence the big parking lot?" She was making one of those angry disbelief laughs shaking her head and said: "What the fuck Chloe?!" But she made a right turn to go around the parking lot and hill and there was the fair; and the farm was a petting zoo which was part of the fair! We were just a little early.

Seeing bits and pieces of seed thoughts and seed desires come together to unravel into something you experience is even more unexplainably cool. One of the thoughts Kayla found herself worrying over when she read her diary was her older sister who got a divorce and was lonely and depressed. She thought about that most of her waking hour, and also had a desire to find a great guy for her sister. In one of her daily events Kayla [for some strange reason I can't figure out] described a movie she we rented and watched? As if that's a significant daily event to write about. But in her description of the characters in the movie and how she described it she seemed fixated on the lake in the movie, which the movie didn't even revolve around.

In a different part of her special diary she had written down a little weird even she had where she had a dream about white Easter lilies, and that one day as she was pumping gas a truck drives past her with a white lily on its side. So she thought that was weird. During a different time of the year she describes meeting a guy she briefly met named Roland at school. She and Roland, and a few of their classmates were working on a project together. He had a girlfriend. But she just wrote him down in her diary because he just stuck out in her mind.

So one day, over a year later, me and Kayla thought we'd take my car for an oil change. We had walked around waiting for it to be done and came back at the time he [the worker] told us to come back. We were told that it would be just another 10 minutes and it'll be done, so we sat in the waiting room where there were these magazines. Kayla picks up the nearest one to her and I did the same. She had picked up an apartment guide and was flipping through the pages and she reads to me the description on a classy apartment that is describes as being near a beautiful lake. I said: "So?" And she said: "I haven't been to a lake in a while. Do you wanna go check this lake out?"

We went to the lake the first time to check it out real quick so we'd know where it was. It was actually pretty. We saw a huge pile of ducks and geese swarmed around this family feeding them bread, and we both agreed we definitely have to come back on the weekend and feed the ducks and make a day out of it. So we did.

That weekend we bought 3 bags of bread and fed the ducks first. Those things will step on your feet and bite the bread out of your hands before you throw it at them. We had to retreat to the table to stand on it so they won't peck us. After that we thought we'd walk around to see how big the lake was. After 15 minutes of walking we realized there were two lakes actually. We were standing in front of this booth which rents these bicycle cart things. So we decided to rent one for $40 to ride it around both lakes.

Well as we were riding we noticed that there were actually three lakes and the third one was the biggest. The third one had a place where people were racing those remote controlled race boats. So we thought we'd have lunch by the side of the lake and watch the boat races.

Anyways, after a full and beautiful day at the lake we thought it was time to go home so we walked to the car and I was feeling my pockets for my keys as we approached the car and I stopped in horror [as I often do because I leave my keys, and little wallet places and lose them]. Kayla looks at me terrified and says: "Please don't tell me you lost your keys somewhere out there Chloe." I walked to my door and looked in hoping the keys would be in there, and they were, still in the ignition thing. Then we got into a big fight because I had to ruin the whole day.

Lucky she had Triple A so she called them after she cooled down to send somebody over to pick our lock for us because we left the keys in the car. The guy who came to help us had a name patch on his work shirt that said Roland. I didn't think nothing of it, but the name woke up Kayla curiosity or that weird feeling. He was a nice guy. Attractive, very well mannered, built, in his mid thirties. He had this long thin metal thing which he just stuck down the side of the door but in the inside of the door and in less than a minute we heard a clique and the door was unlocked! I said to him: "Shit, where do I get one of those at?" Which started a long and nice conversation.

After 30 minutes of talking we made plans to grab a bite to eat with him in an hour when he gets off work. He was a really cool guy. We went to get some dinner and a few drinks and after the night was over Kayla had set him up on a date with her older sister because he had just gotten a divorce. She called me over to her mom's house that day Roland was suppose to pick up Kayla's big sister to watch. Roland came punctually and knocked on the door and Kayla's mom answers it. He was dressed very nicely and he held in his hands two white lilies! He introduced himself to Kayla's mom and gave her one of the white lilies, and gave the other white lily to Kayla's sister. Anyways, those two are today happily married, and like me and Kayla, the deeper they look at their lives and past, the more strange coincidences they found that their lives also crossed paths in the past in many ways; but as Kayla's mom says, it just wasn't time for them to meet. True story.

It's very hard to explain, after all these years since that initial year we started that experiment to experience Life consciously – with mindfulness – of the daily motions of Life, how Mysterious and Magical Life is; yet how so much of this Mystery and Magic goes unnoticed.

It's like that car game you play we were kids sitting in the back of the car. You and your sister or whoever is playing with you take turns picking a color and the first one to spot a car on the freeway that color gets to punch the others on the shoulders as many times as the number of cars of that color you suddenly become mindful of. It's amazing after playing that game to realize just how many red cars there are.

Or it's like a paleontologist who focuses his trained awareness – his consciousness – on the dirt we normally walk on which we never notice. But the paleontologist becomes aware of things in that same dirt and as he concentrates his mindfulness and energy on that same ground consciously aware of every little bit and piece. With determination and a deeply focused mind, he magically – in Time – manifests a dinosaur [the skeleton of one]. From ground we all know is there, but are not mindfully focused on it.

If we were to place me who knows nothing of the art and science of becoming aware of dirt in a debate with a trained paleontologist who is conditioned to focus his mindfulness on such things to see things I can't and I were to say to him: "I walk on the ground every day, I should know what dirt is all about and what it has or does not have. You can't pull a brontosaurus out of dirt!" How foolish would I look, and how irrelevant would my ignorant and arrogant opinions be to what the ground is and what it mysteriously hides, and what can magically be manifested from it?

Or its like this one time when I drank a bottle of Coke which makes me need to go pee every five minutes and my parents were driving us down to Las Vegas. As we drive my parents are like: "Wow Chloe, look at the mountains. Wow Chloe, look at mesquite shrubs they're everywhere, you know they make barbeque wood with them? Wow Chloe look at Death Valley." But in my mind I'm saying to myself: "Just take me to the nearest Rest Area, my freaking bladder is full!" So what is a scenic trip to Vegas to my parents, is a constant desire and anticipation for the nearest rest area for me.

That is how Life is to most of us – when we think in Mundane [re: worldly] levels. We each live and experience Life as a constant desire, a constant “looking forward to” for the nearest “rest areas” of Life. For our 5th birthdays when we can stay up later. For that moment when we finish 6th grade finally. For us to turn 13 to go through puberty like everyone else. For our first kiss. For our first real bra. For our first boyfriend. For that moment in the distance when we graduate high school. For the right job. For our bi-weekly pay checks. For the “Right One” to come into our lives. For marriage. For retirement.

And before we know, we realize that Life has pasted us by. Or more accurately: That we have pasted Life by never noticing anything about it except for the handful of mundane things we expect or anticipate. And when somebody who notices the more subtle flow of Life; the more Mysterious nature of Life; the more Magical essence of Life, we resist the foolish notion, believing that what mundane events we notice in Life is all that Life is.

My grandfather who is a monk says to: “Live Life with your breath.” Just as in meditation when you become mindful of every up and down movement of your breath, so should you also become mindful of Life and experience it with the same focus of mind and concentration; to become aware of everything that Life becomes not by expecting and anticipating distant things, but by noticing the nowness of each movement of Life that passes by with each breath.

When you live you Life with your breath, you notice the finer, more subtle movements of Life. You notice the coincidences, the “signs,” the deja vus, the interconnection of thoughts and experiences. You notice the unfolding and unraveling, or blossoming the Life constantly is. From each seed thought in you give birth to in your mind. From what seed thoughts you entertain and feed psychic energy with the constant thinking of them. Whether those seed thoughts are negative or positive. Such seed thoughts weaves together into the fabric of your future experiences.

You become aware and Realize that the difference, or separation, between you and Life is an illusion. That you do not stop at the surface of your skin. That your thoughts do not stay inside your Mind. Because you and Life are the same thing in the same way that the sun and a focal point of light a magnifying glass makes are in essence the same thing. Not merely the same thing in the goofy mundane philosophical sense that the Sun is the Macrocosm, and the little Sun on the other side of the lens is the Microcosm. But in the true meaning of the words “The Same Thing” meaning there is no break or division in the Big Sun’s rays of light that passes through the Nexion of the lens to literally become the Smaller Sun. Or as the Taoist Adepts say: “Heaven and Earth United.” The Sun in the Heavens and the manifested Sun on this earth is One continuous Flow of Light/Life.

When you have learned to live Life with your breath; you will come to the Self Realization that you and the Living Cosmos are One Being and that you are Intimately Connected to the Living Cosmos. As if in a dance together in a cycle of Mutual Creation: The Living Cosmos creating and manifesting as you and the Life you experience; as you create and manifest the Living Cosmos into the Life and reality you give birth to from your thoughts.

Dark Providence

It is not my desire or intention to enlighten and illuminate those mundanes. I was raised and bred to see those wretched creatures as a source of one's wealth, power, and pleasure in life. Illuminating them works against my nature and desires. I don't care if they read this and do not understand or take it apart to debate upon its validity philosophically. I write these Insights I have down as they come to mind before they fade away. For what future children I will have and for their children. And for those of us of the ONA who may see value in such insights to come to a closer and deeper apprehension of Life, so that you may each use what comes of such insights to evolve yourselves to your highest potential. Not only to be more intelligent than the anariya. But more importantly to be Master of your own Lives. To manifest and materialize the Life you desire to live and experience. To be Master of your Life, rather than to have Life master you.

It is as if you are in a flowing river: you either swim to a destination of your choice, or be carried by the flow of life like driftwood to nowhere. Because to Nature all you are essentially is a means – via your sperm and egg – for Life to continue itself. You mean nothing more to Nature. You must struggle in Life. You must fight Life for what you are worth. Just as a sapling in a jungle must struggle and fight Life to the top of the canopy for Light or die to be replaced by another sapling who has the will, determination, to pierce the canopy for its reward: the gift of seeding Life's next generation. If Life/Nature desires to evolve, to expand beyond this small planet of ours to vivify the Galaxy, then it must have this ethos of rewarding the most capable. To insure its own eternal evolution and expansion.

Mastering Life begins with Mastering your own Mind. Because it is from your thoughts that the threads of reality are spun: the weaving of which is the Life you experience. Such that if you worry about bills and spend your waking hours worrying about bills, Life will give you bills to worry about. If you are a guy and you spend your waking hour thinking about sex and girls, those waking thoughts gradually manifest through you as the emotional drive you will feel, or the determination and will you will have to fix yourself up, eat right, lift weights to make yourself attractive and such; so that in Time, you Life rewards you with what you have "asked" for.

So it can be easily understood that if you are a guy, and you suffer from mental and emotional issues. Such as insecurity, self loathing, and worry about girls not liking you for the many illusory reasons you tell yourself. Then such constant thoughts will not drive you to look better, buy better clothes, get fit, or learn to socialize and talk to girls. And thus, Life gives you what you have mentally asked for. And if such a guy does not have the power to change his mind – to control his thoughts – then whose fault is it that he lives and experiences such a resulting Life? Your thoughts, those thoughts you hold and entertain during your waking hours, literally manifest as what you will experience in many ways.

For instance compare two stray dogs. One stray dog is emotionally damaged from abuse and abandonment and he does not trust humans. He shows his teeth and growls at people that walk past him. The other dog, not affected by being rejected and unloved continues to wag his tail and offer people who walk by friendly smiling eyes. Which of the two will eventually starve to death or end up in the pound waiting to be euthanized, and which of the two will eat or even find a new home? You don't have to be able to speak and be human for your thoughts to affect your life because thoughts came before language.

In essence, you are in a Cosmic Dance and your partner is Dark Providence. Dark Providence neither likes you or dislikes you. It is beyond human valuations of good and evil. It will indiscriminately give you what you “ask” for. Just like a vending machine: you put in the money and it will give you what you ask for according to the buttons you push. If you don’t like the taste of what you get, it is your own fault for pushing those buttons.

Or Dark Providence – which is the Living Cosmos – is like a lake; such that if you cause a ripple in this causal realm, then that the same movement of ripples comes back to the center from which it originated. The Center being your Mind. And sense we are all, and everything is this same Living Cosmos in causal manifestation, when such ripples comes reverts back to its center of origin, it travels through its causal forms: other people and causal events. This is one of the esoteric meanings of Wyrd: your thoughts not only affects and alters your life, but they affect and change other people’s lives as well. Not just causally, but psychically.

Belief Causes Suffering

Belief – as opposed to Experience – causes one to suffer in Life. We have seen the amount of suffering the mere Belief in sin has caused in Christendom. We have seen the suffering Communism has caused. We can see the suffering the Belief in Consumerism is causing. We can come to understand that the Belief in “religion” has and does cause suffering.

To Believe is to accept another person’s ideas [memes] without personal direct experience. If you Believe in a Heaven, have you ever experienced it? But to experience something to come to a Realization. People don’t Believe fire burns skin and hurts, you Realize it after experiencing fire burning. You don’t believe in the color green, you’ve seen it. You don’t Believe in sex, you’ve done it, so there is no belief involved.

These Beliefs – all beliefs – distracts you from Experience because you accept your beliefs as being true already. Without Experiencing Life, you will not come to Realize the esoteric Mystery and Magic of Life. When you do not Realize such aspects of Life you do not have the ability to utilize it to your advantage. You do not have the capacity to Master Life. If you cannot Master Life: Life masters you. If Life masters you, the causal result is suffering, which is Life in atrophic recession. It is a movement of Life – Acausal Life Force – receding from you, because Life cannot thrive through you; like healthy people moving away from a leper.

It’s like that question: Which came first the chicken or the egg? Which came first the miserable man or his miserable life? It’s common human practice to blame everything wrong and bad on everyone and everything but our own selves, while taking the credit for all thing right and good for yourself. So it’s not shocking that a Life Dysfunctional man [re: a miserable] will blame his suffering on his miserable [dysfunctional] life. Like how a guy will blame his wife for a dysfunctional marriage when it’s his fault half of the time because he’s half of a whole marriage and the wife reacts half the time, because she is the other half you see? It’s just one marriage; as it is just one Life: you are marriage to the Cosmos. And unlike a human marriage, your marriage to the Cosmos really is “till death do you part.” You either learn to make your marriage with Dark Providence work, or endure a life long suffering, or kill yourself.

The reason why I have written all these pages of insights is because I do not want my own children in future, or anyone who is of the ONA who is esoterically inclined to value such insights to be entrapped by the illusion and abstraction of beliefs. Because beliefs misdirects your attention away from the intimate Direct Experience of Life. It's like some one were to tell you on your way to Vegas via the scenic route: "You know, there is a really exceptional rest area just a mile away with impeccable toiletry facilities Ralph." And instead of noticing the passing scenery and absorbing the experience and learning; you just ponder on magnificent toilets.

Such as the Belief in Materialist Atheism. In your Belief of such foreign memes, you reject the entire idea of magic and mystery of a Living Cosmos. So you never notice such things or work to experience them. Not experiencing them, you end up mastered by Life, like driftwood helplessly caught up in Life's current.

But also the Belief in what we might call the "magic" of the Western Tradition, such as what you would find in the OTO, the Golden Dawn, the Kabbalah, Wicca, Chaos Magic, is also a distraction. Because where is your attention, your awareness, your mindfulness diverted to? To the motion of the rituals, the noise of arcane languages, the list of gods, the colorful lamens and shiny knives. The belief that somehow these things changes Life. That somehow with a colored robe and candles and words of power that you can gain an intimate understand of what you are, what Life is, and how your relationship with Life works.

How many so called occultists and magickians can stop smoking or lack the will power to lose weight? How many of these people can't find a date or lack the will to go up and talk to a girl? They have to make a magic "love bag" and wear around their necks and hope that somehow attracts a girl to come talk to them. Even if one came over, the nerd would still lack the skills to get her. Why are there so many money spells and loves spells out there and why do these two kinds of spells sell the most in the occult and magical world, if they work? Why are most occultists and magickians I meet miserable and depressed? The point is the Belief in this kind of magic and the dependence on such draws your mindfulness away from the subtle aspect of Life. Mastering this kind of magic is not Mastering Life. You are confusing the Essence for an outer form.

Such exoteric and mundane systems of magic are just a set of Beliefs – memplex – and my contention with such things is that it causes suffering. Because how many occultists and practitioners of "magic" do you know have not found inner piece? Have not learned to still and find their Center? Have not learned to materialize a genuinely fulfilling Life? Are still searching? How many of them have actually gone deeper into their delusions of sepheroths and qlipoths, of gods, and such, and have moved away from Life to not even be able to apprehend what Life there is out side of their ritual chambers and memplex?

I'm not saying that all "outer forms" of so called Magick is misdirective. It is a matter of focus: what is that outer form directing your consciousness on? On itself to produce a dependence on such outer forms, as one becomes dependent on opiates? On a superficial illusion of Life. Or on Life itself? Those rites that we have in the Black Book of Satan and Naos are our Traditional Foundation of the ONA which does genuinely draw down Acausal Energy and cast our attention via such things as Physis and the Star Game inward and upon Life. But an architect builds upon a Foundation a structure of his own craft and design.

The Star Game is perhaps the most effective means to apprehend the subtle nature of Life. Each piece changes as it moves and each move influences another change and move. Like the gradual unraveling of a fractal pattern. Such that what moves and changes you commence the Star Game with determines the end results. When you have played an entire game through, you come to realize that each move and change is not actually a separate and individual move, but that the whole session was a single unraveling or motion. The expresses one of the meanings of Wyrd.

Life is also like the Star Game where each though we think changes us and each move we make in life influences our next move and other people's next move. And if we learn to see life from a different perspective, we realize that our thoughts and motions in life are not isolated islands, but a fleeting part of an unraveling of the wholeness of Life.

Such Traditional aspects of the ONA found in the Black Book and Naos gradually divests us of our outer superficial garments we wear as a barrier between us and Life. It stripes us of the comfortable shirt of mundane illusions. From the pants Beliefs. From the panties of our private convictions. And we are immersed – naked – into the flowing river that Life is. In that condition – without barriers – we feel Life directly not just without our eyes and ears. But with every inch and curve of our bodies. Our naked skin surrounded in every direction by the subtle motions and undulations of life moving between our toes. In that state of Naked Being, we Realize that we and Life are the same thing. As a single current of many moving currents IS the river.

Life must be lived directly by plunging into it and experiencing it. It is from that Naked Experience of Life, and the Realization that Magic and Life are the same flowing – Becoming – “thing” which is also YOU; which you are the center of; that you begin to learn the finer details and hidden mysteries of Life and learn to make Life work for you. Our thoughts – what we spend our waking hours entertaining Within – sets the Flow. As Within, So Without. There is no need to search for answers and magic outside yourself. For such “outsideness” has its origins from Within.

There is this nice old Greek story I love which has a profound meaning. Long ago when the Olympian Gods formed Mankind they made mankind to tend their cows. But some of these first humans began trying to climb up Mount Olympus to obtain the Divine Flame. The gods were afraid that if Mankind got hold of the Divine Flame that they would also be gods and there would be nobody to tend the cows.

So the gods held a great meeting to talk about where to hide the Divine Spark. Some suggested that it be hidden at the tippy top of the highest mountain, while others suggested that they hide it way down deep at the bottom of the ocean. But Zeus didn't like these ideas because he knew mankind would eventually go to these places.

Then, an unknown goddess named Aphrodite gave a suggestion to Zeus. She suggested that the Divine Spark be hidden right inside these mortals, which would be the last place they will ever look. And to keep them busy, she suggested that Mankind should be split into male and female [since people were androgynous]. Zeus was so please he made Aphrodite an Olympian and named her the Goddess of "Love."

We are kept busy with the illusion of Dualism, constantly searching for our other half, constantly trying to make sense of things in such dualistic terms. When things are all really One. And we go about Life searching for answers in everything and in every place from churches to religion, from magic to money, in books and in gurus. Never Realizing that the Numen of the Living Cosmos is right inside of us. When you search, Life will always give you something to search for. It is when you have learned to stop searching, and to become Mindful of the Numinous Within, that you find your Enlightenment. That you Realize the Oneness of you and Life. That you Realize that Life is in essence Mystery and Magic in motion.

As an engineer who has become Mindful of the intimate details of air and wind. Such that he learns to make airplanes to utilize the natural motion of such wind. When you have Centered yourself Within, and have learned to become Mindful of the natural motion of Life. You learn to utilize Life to move you to where you want to go; to manifest what you need out of Life. When you have come to Realize the intimate connexion that exists between you and the Living Cosmos, you come to Realize that you are like a little spoiled puppy who is taken care of by Life itself. Whose every need and wont is Provided, and whose every desire is granted.

INTO THE DEEP

Into The Deep

I was going to go look for “nothing” and see if I could find a point of origin for the Mind and the Acausal. Until several conversations and coincidental internet posts I read caused me to take a major detour to maybe briefly talk about what exactly “mind” and specifically “consciousness” is; as I was taught to understand it.

I committed some sort of logical fallacy in assuming that my general audience and friends inherently knew what the word and concept “Mind” meant when I use it. There was this debate or talk about Consciousness that arose; then there were certain posts I stumbled upon about Consciousness written by people involved in “Luciferianism” and Satanism.

Every time I read something written about Consciousness by someone in the Occidental Occult mindset I can’t help but cringe a little. I get the same eye-rolling Oh boy, here we go again feeling when I read about Consciousness explained by the Hindus Gurus, Yoga instructors, Vedantists, Neo-trantrika, and Hare Krishnas. But I will say this: I would go with the Western apprehension of Consciousness any old day over the spiritual and mystical crap those Hindus got!

Facets Of Consciousness

I really like how the Western Occult is trying to figure out things about Consciousness in their own philosophical way; considering that the Occident has only recently emerged out of a very mind numbing restrictive magian religion and paradigm. I think what I am generally observing in the fringe segments of the “Western Tradition” [Satanism and related things] is like a gradual “awakening” of sorts. Which I think is cool, because it would seem as though the “zeitgeist” of Satanism [if it even has one] has out grown its 1970’s software, and had become more sophisticated and now need more stronger medicine. But I’m disappointed at the direction it seems to be going insofar as Consciousness is concerned. Because it seems to be going into the direction the Hindus went, where the greater Western Tradition later followed.

What do I mean by this?

I mean these silly – and valueless – concepts like “Krishnaconsciousness,” “Christconsciousness,” “Guru Consciousness,” “Buddhaconsciousness,” “Godconsciousness,” etc; what the hell do those mean? I mean the Kabbalah in that they say it’s a way to develop “Higher States of Consciousness.” I mean the new agers when they say meditating on your “chakras” helps you develop “higher consciousness.” “Higher consciousness?” Higher where? What’s wrong with where it was at before? What is it in the first place, that it can even “go” to a place higher then it actually is?

Then now – mostly in Satanic and “Luciferian” circles – I’m starting to see how there is a growing fixation on Consciousness and how it’s for some reason either directly or indirectly associated with Life and Self and is gradually becoming some sort of self-deification universal penicillin.

These people never realize that they contaminate their apprehension of “Consciousness” with their world views or paradigm they are inside of. For example the Hindus and their theistic paradigm. They believe in gods. They are men. Thus there is perceived a “hierarchy,” of Man being somewhere at the bottom, and gods are somewhere at the top. Therefore – idealistically – it must be that one must evolve in consciousness to that perceived “better place/condition” of Being/Existence of Godhood, Christhood, Buddhahood, or whatever.

And in the Mystical Western circles – the understanding of “Consciousness” is also contaminated with their own paradigm; one which we may call a “Darwinian Paradigm.” In the Mystical West; generally; Consciousness seems to be like a monkey. It’s primitive and it needs to evolve to a more developed or “higher state” of being. And like the Hindus, in the Mystical West, Consciousness seems to be the Self or used interchangeably with what a Westerner identifies as “himself.” In other words – generally speaking – in some circles a Westerner will say such things like: “I am my consciousness,” or “I am conscious, therefore I am alive,” or “My conscious mind is that which thinks.” And so Consciousness is then confused with being alive, thinking and cognition, and thus it only makes sense that to achieve “higher” levels of consciousness means you become smarter and more alive in some special way.

What Is It?

What is “consciousness” in the first place? I don’t know what that word means any more as it is used in the English speaking occult subcultures. But I know what that concept means in my culture, as I was taught to understand it. It’s nothing spectacular really. Actually it’s rather mundane. When I use the word “consciousness” in speaking, I am trying to denote the Faculty of “Mind” that naturally kicks in and starts to do its job in the morning when we wake up and open our eye and say to ourselves: “Shit it’s Monday.”

The Buddha used the word “viññā[ā]” when he referred to “consciousness,” or the “conscious mind,” or the faculty of “recognition and discernment.” That word is used today by every Theravada culture to refer to the same thing. It’s a generic word. It looks like a challenging word to say, but it isn't. The word is pronounced just like the "venien" part of the English word "convenience," so for the sake of convenience I'll spell it phonetically like this: Vinyin.

Consciousness in Buddhism isn't its own independent thing or even equated with life [Jiva] or being alive. Vinyin is a Faculty or function of Mind. In the same way that we can say Reason and Concentration are faculties and functions of Mind. So in this regard, it makes no real sense to say that "I am Reason," "I am Reasonable therefore I am alive," or that "Concentration is the part of me that thinks." In English it seems to make a lot of general sense to say something like: "I am consciously alive," but to a well aware Buddhist, this has the same feel as when one says: "I am concentrationally alive" which makes no sense at all.

Vinyin is the part of your Mind that tells you when you see curves on a body: "That's a girl!" Or when you are grocery shopping and your brain says: "That is an orange, and those are apples." Or that part of your Mind which says: "Green light means go!" We generally call this "recognition" and "discernment." It's a very useful function of "mind" for animals and people to have; but life, existence, and such are not wholly dependent on it. If you had trouble consciously discerning the difference between a red light and green light, you could kill yourself. And it's a nice thing to have for animals because when things like winter comes and you are a duck, you can recognize the signs of the approach of winter and say to your duck buddies: "Let's fly south, I reckon it's gunna get cold."

Vinyin has two sidekicks and 5 employees: Recognition and Awareness; and the 5 senses. Vinyin is like a police chief who sits in an office unconnected to the outside world. This police chief has two secretaries or dispatcher who send out 5 cops who write reports about everyday events in the city and turns those reports into the chief's two secretaries. The chief starches his head and asks his secretaries: "Well, what do you two make of this report?" And the two secretaries say: "I Recognize the criminal sir," and the other says: "I am Aware he's in our file somewhere, here he is sir." That's when the chief say: "Oh, Right! Good job in bringing this to my conscious attention, had you not done so, I would have been completely unconscious of it."

Awareness in the Mystical West seems to be fungible with the idea of "consciousness," and sometimes it appears to be one entire thing: Conscious Awareness; which to me feels redundant. It's like saying Reasonable Logic. Awareness is a subordinate function of Vinyin. In the same way that we can say that Critical Thinking is not Reason, but is a subordinate function of Reason whereby Reason apprehends a subject more Rationally.

Awareness in Thai and Khmer is "Arom," or "Aram." Most of the time Arom is used in context to a "dwelling near," "lingering," or "nearness." For example my grandmother once looked tired and I asked why she looked tired, and she said: "I haven't had much sleep lately. I'm an old woman. My Arom lingers most night around my children and grandchildren." In English we would say that she had trouble sleeping because she was "thinking" too much about her children and things. But in this culture and "paradigm" it is one's Awareness that lingers or is fixated or attached to "something" and not an unstoppable process of thinking that keeps her awake. Because Awareness predates language and "thinking." It is a wordless function we inherited from the animals we evolved from.

Mindlessness

You don't have to be Buddhist, or a mystic, or new ager to learn what consciousness is. Nature has provided many examples to learn from. The best teacher of what consciousness is in our own human terms is a baby. I have over 30 cousins, and I'm one of the older ones, so I got to raise and babysit many of my cousins.

When a new baby is born, it comes into the world Unconscious. Most of the time they sleep, and in those very early moments they aren't very responsive to stimuli. Then their brain starts to kick into that secondary stage of growth and development outside the uterus. Their eyes opens for the first time, and that's when their faculty of "consciousness" first begins to develop. They use their sight and ears first to learn to hone their Awareness on things. And the very first thing most of us humans come into Awareness of is our mother's face when she holds us. Their eyes fixates or lingers or dwells on that face, and there is an emotional – wordless/thoughtless – imprinting of recognition of that face to a "feeling." There is then a "knowing" of that face. Not an intellectual knowing; but a knowing that is wordless and thoughtless.

If you have pets, you'll know what I am trying to get at. Your pet dog does not speak or think in English like we do. They do no intellectualize or philosophize in thought like we do. But yet they recognize you and are aware of you, and their recognition or awareness is primevally affixed to Feelings. It is a "Mindless Knowing" that is more Natural and Primal then intellectual knowing.

The coolest age to witness the real development of human consciousness in a baby it when they start to crawl and put every thing in their mouths. They're like weird aliens with a big appetite for raw Awareness. You can see at that age where they learn to refine their awareness skills, because they stare at things that catches their attention with huge opened eyes, drooling. And they put everything in their mouths. One of my sociology groups I hung out with in school got together once and we did this one "experiment" where we all had to feel and become aware of things WITHOUT thinking or formulating thoughts by putting things in our mouths like babies. It feels silly when you do it, but in the end you learn that the mouth and tongue picks up very fine details of texture and tactile feel of things that works better then your fingers. It's almost a more intimate way to directly apprehend things for the sake of raw awareness, if that makes any sense.

In Buddhism and Buddhist cultures there is a word for that "Thing" which "Mindlessly Knows," things, which "mindfully feels" for things in a more primal way sans word and thought. The word is "Chitta/Citta." Chitta means "Heart." But not the heart that beats in your chest. Heart as in the "Seat" or Source of your thoughtless feelings, opinionless emotions, and wordless knowings. Chitta is also the primal source of volition and intent. The first thing a baby comes into existence with is Chitta. It is the part of the baby which feels, desire, needs, and cries. The phrase, "One's Chitta" can mean approximately "One's Mindset," or how you feel about something or one's "Attitude."

In English this word is almost always mistranslated as "Mind," and I do it too, but only because the Modern English language seems to not have a word that comes close to Chitta. I think the Greeks had one and I have seen Old English words that mean Heart, Mind, and Soul at the same time, which I would say would better grasp what Chitta is. But not "Mind" as in your brain and its functions. Other times Chitta is abusively translated into English as "consciousness."

The word Chitta is a generic everyday word in Thai and Khmer. It's not mystical or magical. In every day speak we say it as "Chet," or "Jet." When you want to say you "Like" something as in to like a person or object, you say "Jol Chet," which literally means "To Go Into One's Heart/Emotions."

There is a compound word that is very important in my family and to any civilized person with culture and manners called "Chet Kamnud." Kamnud means like a sort of reflective thinking. So you are at WalMart and walking to the entrance and you see an old lady walking to the door with a cane. If you have Chet Kamnud, you are able to reflectively say to yourself: "What would it Feel like to be her? To be in her condition?" And when you are able to empathize with her inside your Chet/Chitta, you open the door for her. And the same thing with an old homeless man that you would walk by. If you are a person with Chet Kamnud your chet tugs at you and stops you, and you enter a reflective mood and "Feel" the homeless man's condition inside your Chitta; and from that feeling the volition, will, intent to help is born. Chitta is the source of human volition, will, and intention. It is the Initiator, whereas consciousness (vinyin) is the Observer. That's a very important "relationship" to keep in mind.

In my own family and culture, if you don't have Chet Kamnud, you are said to be Barbaric and worse in condition to an animal, because even a dog Feels for its own and its own children. And the phrase to describe a barbaric human or a person without chet kamnud is "Chet Akrok" which literally means "Ugly Heart."

Just last night at dinner my step dad was telling everybody present about his day at work with his American business partners at one of his places. His two partners are blood brothers old in age [~70-ish]; interestingly named David and Richard [lol]. David is the older and when he was young worked for NASA as an engineer working on the camera systems that got put into NASA satellites. But my step dad was gossiping to a large group of us about how David had ordered a large pizza and he saw Ta Dave ["Grampa Dave"] eat the entire pizza by himself! I thought it was going to be a real interesting and noteworthy story, but it was about "Grampa Dave" eating a pizza. And he said it like he was reporting to us a lethal car accident he saw on the freeway or something or like he saw a UFO in the sky.

And my grandma said: "A whole pizza, and his brother, did he get his own pizza? I hear those Americans eat big. They're built like giants you know?" My step dad said: "No ma'am, Ta Dave didn't call his brother to eat the pizza! Richard was STILL working! He didn't get his own and Ta Dave didn't leave any behind for his brother!" And then all of a sudden you can hear every aunt and lady and grandma in the room gasp and cry out: "Oh Buddha, the barbarity!" One of the grannies said: "What has the world come to when flesh and blood don't even Recognize one another any more?!" Then my mom said: "Where do these kinds of people come from? They have no manners, culture, honour, or respect for anything. His own flesh and blood brother and he didn't have the chet kamnud to call his brother and share! We even feed table scraps to the stray cats in our front yard. You see what I told you Chloe?! I beg you, if you love me as your mother, don't ever marry one of them."

So anyways. Now we have three things to take a close look at: 1) Awareness; 2) Consciousness; & 3) Chitta. How are these three related to each other and how do they work together? I can try and paint a picture so you can intuitively get a feel for how these three things work together.

You are sitting at a coffee shop drinking coffee or tea people watching. An attractive person walks into the shop that catches your attention. This person sits down in your line of sight and is talking on the phone. You now gaze into her direction. That catch of attention and gazing is Awareness. Something inside of you stirs because of this attractive person, and you focus on her in a more refined manner. Other people's conversations are blocked out, you only hear her voice. Your eyes focus on every strand of hair, every crease of flesh, every fold of clothing on this person. In essence you are absorbing as much data and detail as you can; almost as if to bring this person into sharper mental focus.

This act of absorption and sharpening of focus, where even this person's voice and conversation can be discern above the loud chattering of the coffee house, is consciousness or is the act of the mind's faculty of consciousness. Something inside – a wordless feeling, a impulse to act, a yearning, a desire – causes you to get up, walk to this person and ask for their name. That "something" which stirs beneath us in these moments, that "causes" or moves us or nudges us wordlessly and thoughtlessly to act is Chitta. And so from this simple explanation you can figure out on your own that Chitta – volition, will, intent, intuition – and thinking are two very different parts and often conflicting aspects of you.

For even when Chitta desires and stirs in us a primal impulse to act, we often stop ourselves and intellectualize the situation and say to ourselves: "No I can't talk to this person, she's out of my league," or "He'll never want to talk to me, I'll make a fool out of myself." That idiot part of us that is the source of so many of our life regrets is the conscious mind (vinyin). It has utilized its 5 senses to assess the situation, and its memory faculty then waves in front of it a memory of a time when it was rejected. Being now consciously reminded of such, it resists. That's the power and weakness of consciousness. That conscious mind and its fearful chattering ruins the potential for relationships, great business opportunities, and in the battlefield, its idiotic chattering can get you and your men killed. There is an advice the Buddha gives, which is that if you don't want to suffer in life, keep that consciousness in check at all times. The Buddha was asked once what single word he would pick to best explain his Dharma and Way. And Buddha said "Taming." God-consciousness, can you imagine making a god out of a fool?

Primal Unconscious

I see no problem with people trying to intellectualize and philosophize about the Nature of Consciousness. I think it's great, and I often read some very interesting new insights. The potential problem with how the Western Occult is approaching Consciousness is Fixation or

Focus of their attention only on Consciousness, which plays on the weakness of the Chitta's faculty of consciousness.

If we did not know what Reason was, or had a hard time understanding what Reason, was, we can get a general feel for what it is by studying and observing the subordinate functions of Reason. For example we can observe critical thinking, analytical thinking, logic, and so on, and from these, we can indirectly calibrate approximately what Reason is you see. And consciousness works in the same way. If we don't know what it is or have a hard time understanding it we just observe closely the two primary subordinate functions of consciousness: Discernment and Awareness.

We know from studying animals and babies that Awareness has something to do with a "focusing" of what senses they have on "targets of awareness." A cheetah in the hunt, crouched low in the savanna grass, with its eyes intensely fixated on its prey is awareness and consciousness working together. Except the more conscious you are of one thing, the more the rest of everything fades into a subconscious blur. If you have babies, pets, or even yourself, you can learn to figure this out. When your consciousness – your attention and all its sensory faculties – are intensely fixated at something, and somebody comes by you, they startle you and you lose that intense conscious fixation. Or you can just hold your hand up and focus your consciousness on that hand, and you'll notice that the more focused you are on the hand, the less conscious you become of the background and surrounding.

I know there will be people who will say: "Well, if consciousness is dumb and we didn't have it, wouldn't we all be dead or zombies?" And that's like me trying to tell you about how your eyes work at focusing in on visual targets to apprehend an object and saying: "But the eyes are weak, because they are prone to optical illusion, and they only work well at a certain natural resolution and lighting, so keep your eyes and what you see in check." And then you complain: "Well, if eyes are dumb and we didn't have it, wouldn't we be blind?" Well yeah!

Consciousness or vinyin is to an animal's eye ball, as an eye ball is to the primitive photoreceptors of a box jellyfish. It's an evolutionary extra way or refined way of acquiring and interpreting data from one's Natural environment.

Sometimes for a primitive animal that is struggling to adapt and evolve, total blindness doesn't do much so you grow simple light receptors. There will come a time when those simple light receptors will have to be updated to retina powered eye balls. As you evolve on, you may decide to get a further sensory upgrade and get things like color vision and binocular vision you see. These are all add-ons to the Causal Organism's Sensory Data Plan. So as a creature with newly updated color and binocular vision trying to survive and maybe even dominate your territory, you might say to yourself and fellow fish: "You know what, I really like color vision, and the ability to discern depth comes in real handy, but I wish I had something that could tell me what the hell I was looking at. I see things clearly, but my brain doesn't seem to register what the hell I'm looking at, and if we can't consciously tell a predator apart from a potential mate, then our species is screwed."

So consciousness is like a fast microchip that takes in all of your sensory input and allows you to not only recognize what you are looking at, but become aware of things around you. If you have an iPhone or a Droid, consciousness is like your Pinch & Zoom. Your awareness sees the initial environment [website], then you pinch and zoom to get a more refined or focused awareness of specific spots. Which is why most of the time people in general will feel their consciousness to be somewhere in the eye or eye brow region, and why in general, you are most consciously aware of what you are directly looking at.

Consciousness is; despite what many will assume or believe; is not the “thinking” part of a person. Consciousness is the Observer, it does process and interpret data, which we may call “intellectualizing,” “memorizing,” and “recalling.” It’s the faculty which you use to Observe [focus awareness on] the Natural environment, process, and store data with. It doesn’t create your thoughts.

You can ask: “How so, I’m consciously aware of thinking all the time.” No you’re not. You are consciously aware of having thought after the fact. You Observe yourself in the act of thinking, or in the act of speaking, and sometimes when your consciousness is fixated on other things you’re not even aware of what you think or say. What does this mean: “Think before you speak!” Who did the speaking and why weren’t you aware of it? What does this imply: “Think before you act!” Who did the acting and why weren’t you conscious of it? How many times have you driven a car, or taken a walk, and your mind drifted to recall something pleasant, and then you snap out of it realizing you made it to your destination somehow.

If you honestly ask yourself who is doing the speaking and thinking, and you study closely past conversations you had, you eventually come to notice that you don’t actually consciously plan out or script each word you say before you say them. You don’t even proof read them before they flow out of your mouth. All your consciousness is to the conversation is an Observer. You observe yourself speaking. Those words flows out of your mouth prefabricated from an unknown inner source. If you are a thinker, you’ll notice the same thing. You only Observe your thought, which flows into your awareness from an unseen source and thought provider. If you are a writer, musician, or artist, you will understand this concept intuitively. Or if you are a deep thinker, you’ll understand that none of the revelations, epiphanies, and new ideas you “had” are honestly yours which you consciously created. It came to you, from an unknown source.

All this time these mundanes glorify their egos, their Selves, and an aspect of their mental function that merely Observes, never realizing what lays beneath. Like Dorothy and her friends before the Wizard of Oz, that statute of smoke and thunderous voice. You believe that idol of consciousness is alive, is the thinker, is the speaker, is the life behind the form. Until Dorothy – the one with Empathy – walks behind the statue revealing to the Brainless, the Heartless, and the Gutless that the Wizard is just a statue. Just a tool of a hidden man. It’s not until that hidden speaker is pulled out of his hiding place, that the dumb is given a intelligence think with, the numb is given a Heart to feel with, and the scum are given the guts to walk around propped up idols of society.

Chitta is the unconscious primal mind, the hidden speaker, the hidden thinker, the feeler, the source of primal volition, will, and intention. It exists in a Natural state of non-consciousness which is its primordial realm. Like a neuron or octopus, it stretched out its arms up above to Feel for data. And with the data it acquires it initiates intent, will, or volition. It does not think with reason. It Feels with Empathy, “thinks” with intuition.

We're not born Reasonable. We never take notice of that. Nature does not first endow her creatures at birth with logic and reason. She gives them first Chitta: intuition, empathy, intention, will, volition, and feeling. Every order of creature has the feeling of want of food and nourishment. An undeveloped kangaroo fetus intuitively “knows” where and how to find that source of nourishment without thinking. A baby penguin “knows” its mother, even after she has been gone for 6 months at sea hunting for fish. Without Chitta, an animal can't survive in Nature. Everything else comes later. The eye sight, motor skills, refined awareness, discernment, thinking, etc, as a means to assist this primal mind in its causal environment.

At times this unconscious Chitta and our conscious mind enters painful conflict. If you are gay or bi then you'll know this conflict. Primal Chitta just feels, just wills, just desires, just yearns with passion and need. And growing up young with certain feeling surfacing up deep within from somewhere unknown often conflicts with our consciousness and what it has been taught, trained, and conditioned to believe. And so we grow confused. But the confusion is an intellectual confusion; because deep down – chitta – we know what we are and what genuinely will make us happy.

But there are many other times and situations where primal unconscious and consciousness conflicts. Only the conscious mind evaluates things based on right and wrong, good and evil. Chitta only feels, and initiates or creates intent, volition that gives rise and motion to act based on what it intuitively feels. If it is threatened and it is a baby, it cries from protection and solace. If it is threatened, and it is a capable mother bear, it kills without remorse. Only the conscious mind, with its college educated discourses, church acquired morals, and party ideologies gives abstract values to such primal acts, which for aeons since before its lofty judgment, have been wordless, thoughtless, and Natural. Only consciousness [human] ends up confused about the ethical rights and wrongs of killing, tribal war, premarital sex, herd conformity, etc.

Citta Santana

Chitta seems like a lonely thing locked up away inside your chest, but it really isn't. It has a more colorful place in the universal scheme of things. Chitta Santana are two words which roughly means Mind-Continuum, Data-Stream, or Mind-Stream. The Buddha explains that Chitta is not a solitary “thing” but an aspect or part of a collective or hive of Chittas, where each Chitta is akin to a current of a flowing stream. Santana roughly means a Stream, but has the quality of a spectrum or a sort of continuum like the electromagnetic continuum would be a Santana, in that it flows together, but each portion of the flow maintains its own unique signature or identity. The light spectrum would also be a Santana for the same reason that the light flows together in unison, but each color remains its own color.

The Chitta Santana is said to be evolutionary in flow, meaning that collectively and as individual chittas there is a natural evolutionary progression beginning from the most simplest states of being towards more sophisticated states of being.

Each chitta stream is said to be eternal or non-temporal or beyond the confines of causal time and locality. At face value this sounds like a soul or spirit. But the Buddha curbs or flanks the ideation on the Mindstream with Sunyata [Impermanence] and a concept called Pannabhava.

Panna means Again and Bhava means Being or Becoming, together they mean a Re-Becoming. This word, because of its strangeness is mistranslated into English as “Re-Incarnation.”

We can illustrate and make intuitive sense of all this using modern ideas. For example lets say we were farmers, and that we had traveled to southern France and obtained a seed of a strain of grape from an old vineyard. We plant this seed to cultivate it for more seeds. The grape vine gives us seeds, and dies. This is sunyata in effect, because all things change. But before that vine died, it gave us something which if we planted it could carry on its DNA data and outward quality. So we plant these seeds. Each sapling – because they contain genetic information from their original parent can be said to be a “Re-Becoming” of the original vine, in the sense that the strain, kind, essence, germ, of the original plant has re-come into being. This is not to imply that the original dead plant reincarnated into an entire vineyard. Then we can say to ourselves: “If we continue to cultivate this strain of grapes and pass our vineyard to our children and their progeny for another thousands years, this Strain or Type of grapes or its genetic information would be like a Stream of Information that flows beyond the restrictions of time and locality.”

And from an aeonic and chromorphic perspective, this stream appears to be a single, growing, evolving living amorphous begin. Such that we can say if this Stream and its plants were adaptable to the environment and the environment were to alter gradually over centuries, that this Lifestream of our crop would thus evolve to adapt to the changes producing new causal plants to come into existence. So we can say that this Lifestream of ours is not only eternal – insofar as the sun and earth continues to exist – it is evolutionary.

See, so when we take that mindset of streams of grapes, and use the same idea in the animal kingdom and begin 4 billion years ago we can say that the primordial lifeforms on earth is an eternal Lifestream which is a continuum of chittas, each kind as its own current in the greater collective stream, evolving symbiotically and collectively across and beyond the temporal confines of the causal world.

Except Chitta is not by Nature a causal “thing” dependent on or arising from organic chemistry. It is formless, primal, unconscious, and “acausal,” in the sense that its will, volition, intent, feelings, etc arise from within itself without causation. Although Chitta can be said to be “reactive” or reactionary, in that if it acquires data, it may react with its will or emotion in relation or according to the data it apprehends.

Chitta, and Mindstream because it is the initiator, speaker, and thinker, has the Nature of being the issuer or source of “thought-forms,” which carries the impression of its thought. Our conscious thoughts, our ideas, the words we speak, the visualizations we have, the images in our dreams, arise from our chitta. And so it is said that the universe is thus the manifestation of the collective thought-form of Mindstream.

Well, regardless of where the cosmos comes from or what the ultimate nature of Chitta is; Consciousness is only an “Outer Form” and tool of chitta which it uses to focus in on the Natural world. There is more than to a person then consciousness. When we deify or fixate our awareness on consciousness, we fail to see other things. And with something like a primal unconscious which most of us can't even feel in the first place, looking for the holy grail in consciousness misdirects our attention from ever taking notice of or exploring chitta. But feeling this inner mind requires a stillness of the conscious mind and an honest quest to better understand what we each are in all our aspects and multifaceted Nature. Often the conscious mind only gets in the way. It's unfortunate that the Western Occultniks have followed the insane Hindus and are continuing to make gods and idols of it. I suppose a Mundane/Anariya will always be Mundane in that they will always look for idols openly displayed in the most obvious and mundane of places; never venturing into primal darkness to discover what may lurks in the deep.

Parallels

I don't hate or dislike the West. I just greatly dislike all forms of the Western Tradition, which includes the New Age Movement, Wicca, all those mystical orders, the Shishkabbalah, and the Western Occult. But I equally greatly hate the Eastern Occult Traditions as well, in all it's forms and manifestations. Why? Because it's stupid. What is it but a bunch of crazy gurus and vultures who philosophize about things they have no real direct experience of, intimate association or connexion with for self glory and profit?

Think about it: how many “magickians” in the east or west can honestly say without bullshitting that they have seen demons, studied them in their natural demonic habitat as an anthropologist? None, but yet the occult world is crawling with experts on gods, spirits, and demons. How many occultniks out there can say that they honestly study and research Nature, biology, zoology, and so on to know what they are talking about? None, the closest most of these occultniks have been exposed to Nature is a squirrel at a city park. Most of these occultniks haven't even individuated themselves from their Urban Samsara: that Urban reality superimposed on Nature.

Everything they see and interprets is thus tainted with Urban perception. And so obviously if there are gods in heaven they must have governments like people. Which is why you often hear of gods being equated with political offices like “king,” and the occultniks will go so far as to invent a whole political system of princes, and earls, and lords, and jesters of hells and heavens.

Nowadays, if you notice, when most occultniks exist in and are born into an Urban reality which is democratic, you see the king and feudal shit down played, and you start seeing the spirit world taking on a democratic flavour too. Because before when gods were kings that ruled with absolute power, you as a human were a serf in the make believe kingdoms with no power or right to be gods yourself. But now what do you notice: Everybody has equal rights, the democratic opportunity, and liberty, to work at being gods too! Everybody's free to achieving Christ-consciousness, Krishna-consciousness, Buddhahood, Godhood, or whatever. Some one once said: “If horses could draw, their gods would look like horses.” It's a true statement, and if these fools could invent themselves a make believe spirit world, it would look like the world they live in too: a democratic one, where everyone can be president. But these ignorant clowns in the “Popoculture” [al la Kori H] industry can’t see the bullshit.

I have a great amount of respect the insights born from Westerners and Easterners that are sensible, rational, and that actually try to study and research their field of interest within the limits of or in approximation to the Scientific Method. Make an Observation; make a Hypothesis; Experiment, Experience Directly; then Theorize, Meditate on, and Analyze. It’s a simple methodology that is easily applicable. And when we start to follow a rational process of analyzing ourselves and our reality, then strive to either experiment or directly experience life and what we are studying we all basically end up with the same results.

These results aren’t as colorful and sensational as the beliefs and theories the Occult Clowns makes up and pull out of there ignorant asses, which is why you don’t often here much about them. When dealing with Mundanes, the most sensational stories and lunatic crackpot beliefs and action packed world views sell and circulate the best. Zazen would bore the hell out of these Mundanes. So would taking a nature walk and just feeling and noticing Nature directly and intimately. So would the idea of a quiet cosmos which just slowly undulates and evolves in harmony with all its parts and pieces. It’s gotta be a Darwinian Struggle; Class Struggle; a fight between good and evil for domination of the universe. Not even killing is sensible with these occult clowns. Killing happens all the time in Nature in a sensible and practical manner, and it’s been this way sense the emergence of organic creatures. But with these assclowns it’s either nothing or all. It’s either killing in any form is evil, or kill 2 billion of the stupid people [people who don’t think like you].

In the more sensible and rational arena of thought, there are parallels between East and West. Such parallel ideas have comes about independently at different times from people who gave such subjects deep thought. Where someone like Buddha – or those that engineered Buddhism – discovered the idea of Mindstream that is a collective; someone like Jung had the idea of the Collective Unconscious. Where in the rational East Chitta/Citta is the unconscious primal mind; in the West there was/is the idea of an unconscious mind also.

And I’m not entirely stupid. I am aware that in modern Hindu psychology – which is a joke – that Citta is equated with what the Occident identifies as the Subconscious mind. Which I don’t buy for a number of reasons. Firstly they’re Hindu, nuff said. These are people that worship rats, statues, and got an outdated caste system. Secondly what’s the motive behind extricating a sectarian/philosophical ideation like Citta and repackaging it into a semiacceptable psychological conception? Why not just use they word “subconscious,” or use a different Sanskrit word? Why recycle the word and concept of Citta? Lastly, how did they come to that conclusion and theorization anyway? By directly experiencing and feeling Citta, or out of dead texts books and lectures given by other who have never themselves gone deep.

I disagree that Chitta is the Subconscious mind. I can’t bust out a book and bibliography; because everything I know and understand about Chitta comes from old monks who meditate and go deep to directly experience such things, and from my own amateur feeling/grasping for Chitta. Sambuddhi: Self Enlightenment, inherently means that you learn shit on your own, from your own efforts, experiences, pathé-mathos, and observation, not by beings spoon fed by text books and academic lectures.

The subconscious mind – minus the occult, new age, and new thought bullshit which constitutes 99% of the subject matter – is a not a “mind,” like you can say your brain is a mind. It doesn’t even have a truly defined topographical “area” or definition; actually Freud never used the word or term “subconscious.” In one sense it is – and this is my own personal assessment of it – the “subconscious mind” is a “place” between the unconscious and the conscious, that specializes in regulating and maintaining involuntary bodily functions. If you were an astronaut in the International Space Station, the subconscious “mind” would be the computer program and system that controls and regulates Life Support.

All the space stations sensory equipment and the software that specifically works in translating such sensory data would be the conscious mind. You as the person floating inside is/are the unconscious. If you think about it and pretended you were an astronaut out in deep space you’d gradually gain an intuitive feel for what this word “unconscious” feels like. As an astronaut you are completely ignorant about the environment of space and also nearly inoperable in this space environment. The Nature and way of space is not your Nature. We can say that space is the home environment of things like suns, stars, galaxies, planets, moon, and asteroids: things which came into being and evolved within that space environment and its natural laws. Whereas you are human, with a terrestrial animal nature, in an alien environment.

All you can do in this environment is float in your little space station you constructed, push a few buttons, manipulate electricity and digital data flow, and hope everything works ok. You don’t know anything about this environment without your station’s sensory equipment and the data they are streaming in for you to study and become aware of. You are “Non-conscious” of the vast majority of the environment of space, ignorant of its anything that is going on inside it anywhere.

Your space station’s computer software which takes in raw data from this environment which was specifically programmed and created to “understand” and compute data in relation to the natural way of space can be said to be “conscious” of space, insofar as it is able to discern, recognize, and be aware of aspects of that space environment such as electromagnetic and cosmic ray fluctuations, sun spot flairs, solar wind storms, orbital velocity, position and location in relation to things, etc, things which you are Naturally – by your very Nature – are Unconscious of. All you really do in that space station – all that you can do – is Initiate volition, exert will, give rise to intent, feel, and react according to what data you receive of your outside environment. You are the only “living” component inside the entire contraption, everything else is a machine with Functions and Faculties which you operate and use so you can remain in that environment for a while.

I wouldn’t say that the Collective Unconscious, and/or the Mindstream Collective is the Chitta of the Living Cosmos. I think the cosmos is fractal. I can observe in a fertilized egg a single whole zygote, which divided itself into many parts; and so from that small fractal pattern, I would assume that the Chitta or Unconscious of the Living Cosmos is “beneath” the Collective Unconscious, existing in a “pre-differentiated” state. What do we mean by the idea “collective?” We mean many “things” coming together as some sort of cohesive mass. What do I mean by “pre-differentiated” state? I mean to approximately suggest the concept that even beneath every unique cell we have in our bodies, there is a nucleus which contains DNA material which exists as it does in an “un-differentiated” state. How each cell ends up differentiated even though they all contain the same DNA blueprints, is a different – and more mysterious matter – which I don’t know about yet.

So we can hypothesize that the Chitta of the Living Cosmos – the Acausal from which Life Force arises – is like the nucleus of the Cosmos which contains undifferentiated data, or which exists in a state of undifferentiation. Then “on top” of it would be a collective yet differentiated layer: the Collective Unconscious Mindstream. “On top” of that is where individuation arises where each current in the Mindstream is its own datastream [unconscious]. And from the weaving of thought forms and waves etc, crystallizes the causal world. I think the word “weaving” is a great descriptive word which explains the process where things come together into a coherent structure don’t you think? Crystallization is just atoms weaving themselves together into a tightly woven structure, as how the cellular membrane is a woven or coherent structure made of lipid molecules. Now we just need to figure out where this “cosmic nucleus” came from.

KABUKI

Loki is one of the major deities in the Norse pantheon. He is a son of the giant Farbauti ("cruel striker") and the giantess Laufey. He is regarded as one of Aesir, but is on occasion their enemy. He is connected with fire and magic, and can assume many different shapes (horse, falcon, fly). He is crafty and malicious, but is also heroic. The ambivalent god grows progressively more unpleasant, and is directly responsible for the death of Balder, the god of light.

I was just thinking about things I wrote earlier, people I've encountered so far, this nexion, and the private nature of those involved in this nexion, like myself. Everything just got me thinking about "stuff." What got me thinking was a conversation I had with an associate of the Acception as we were talking about 352, ONA, and all the major personalities involved. I didn't come to realize anything until I examined my own natural personality/character.

Like I remember when I was a little girl, maybe 6 years old. I was playing outside in the front yard. I remember going to walk along the curb of the sidewalk and as I was trying to stay balanced a ways down from my house I saw a small pile of broken glass in front of this one boys house I sometimes played with who was about my age too.

I picked up the glass which were square shaped. I figured to myself that it must have come from the window of a car, since cars usually park there, and something must have busted the window? I saw how some of them sparkled in my hand and I pretended they were diamonds. Like I found a pile of diamond.

That boy came out when he saw me squatting by the curb I guess. He ran out side to me and asked me: What's that? I looked at him for a bit and said: Diamonds. I found them, do you wanna hold one? He did, so I let him hold one and I watched him, to see if he would say something like ~Hey liar, it's glass... But he didn't He said: Wow, diamonds, you're rich!

I can't really explain that little stir of something I felt inside when I saw that he couldn't see that it was glass. I had this smile on my face, the kind of smile you make when you were little and you told a lie to your mom, and she believed it! I told the dumb boy: Do you want some, you can give it to your mom as a surprise, she'll be happy? He said: Yeah! As his eyes got real big. So I asked him: Do you have a dollar? He said he didn't have a dollar.

When I was little, my brother and I would go into our parents closet and go through our dad's pants pocket for pocket change. So I told the dumb boy: Go into your dad's closet and look in his pockets. I'll wait here. He ran inside real quick. When the coast was clear I let my self go and I gave this giggle and I felt something inside. Like a feeling I was smarter than him, and he was dumb, and he believed what I told him.

The dumb boy came back with some pocket change a bit later. Back then I can only tell if a bill was a dollar if it was paper and had the number 1 on it or if there were 4 quarters. He didn't have 4 quarters, but it didn't matter because I didn't even want the money; I wanted to get him in trouble.

I gave him the whole pile. I didn't want it anyways – it was glass. I gave the glass to him and told him: Go give them to you mom and tell her you gave me money for it, she'll be so happy! And he ran off inside like a retard into the house. I stood up and walked to my house very, very slowly... listening for voices. All I heard was his fat mom say: Those aren't diamonds, it's glass, that girl tricked you for your money, you ain't playing with her no more! Then I ran home fast just in case the cow came after me for my pocket change.

I felt something bubbling inside when I was in my room after I had hauled ass inside. I couldn't stop giggling. It wasn't a giggling of something being funny; but a different kind of giggling. I couldn't rationalize it back then. All I knew was that it felt good and fun to get him in trouble from a lie I told which he believed, because he was stupider than me. I never really grew out of that. Whatever it was, it just grew with me.

There are in different cultures and world religions these god archetypes that are odd balls that don't seem to have any superpowers but causing trouble, reeking havoc, and straight up blaspheming things. Like Shiva, what a character he is. You read the myths about Shiva and they are just way out there. He kills people with his third eye, he walks in public naked with erections. He chases young girls and rapes them. This one myth even tells of a time when Shiva masturbated in a public and jizzed on the ground. And how he makes people worship him by worshiping a big Dick. It's called a Lingam, Sri Lingam, or Linga, which all means Dick in Sanskrit. LOL! It's so typical of a guy to want people to worship his dick too. Do you ever wonder what type of person thought up of Shiva and his cult?

Or the Greeks have this goddess named Eris, who one day got jealous of Aphrodite and she rolled a golden apple with Kallisti (the Prettiest One) into a party the gods were at and all the goddesses fought each other for it. Or the better known archetype is Loki the Trickster.

I've often read that god-forms like Shiva and Loki imparts wisdom and enlightenment, but I could never see how a person being tricked could find wisdom in being made a fool. Not until a later thought about my own past experiences. Like that dumb boy I sold glass to. He was stupid, I tricked him, he was allowed to go through the whole experience on his own, and in the end he did wise up to know many things. Things that we must each experience and realize on our own, rather than be told. So then in a way, there is a teaching without teaching.

Like a Zen koan in a way. A koan is basically those dumb questions a Zen master asks a new student, like: What is the sound of one hand clapping. These koans have no real answer. They are asked for a reason. The new, often young student has an immature feel or need to impress his master, and most often is not trained to use his mind to speculate, contemplate – to THINK. The young initiate will actually try hard to think of the “right” answer to tell his Master. A good Zen Master will never tell the student that there is no answer, it would defeat the purpose. At some point, the new student will REALIZE on his own, that the question was intended to teach him how to THINK for himself, and actually has no real answer. This is called Enlightenment – when we come to a private emotional realization of things.

What we believe to be thinking, is most often the same thing a computer does – dig up stored files. We read things or hear things, store them in our brain, and when exam day comes we try to recall what we had so-call “learned.” If this is thinking and being smart, then my computer is one intelligent machine!

What got me thinking about the Trickster archetype and the ONA; my own self and others who react to the ONA in a certain way. Most of us that are into the ONA take it seriously in our own way, and when someone says something negative about it we often react.

And I do admit I am very guilty of doing this. I mean the whole Blackwood episode and us for instance. I did get offended when Blackwood once said what he said, claimed what he claimed, and talked shit about me. Because I thought I knew something about the ONA, like I had the answers and I was right. Just like those critics that took what they believed to be the ONA to seriously and criticized me or whatever; because they also believed that they knew it all and had all the real answers.

I suddenly realized I was looking at the ONA in my own way from the inside. Inside a box that I was put into. And I asked myself: Hey, wait a minute, how does Long/Myatt see the ONA, he can't take it too seriously, he's a Muslim!?

What if this whole ONA thing is like Myatt's way of teaching, without teaching? Like a Sinister Koan? And we just don't get it? Do you think Myatt is giggling somewhere out there over all this? How we're all running around trying to figure out if he is some lunatic English person Opfering people in the hills and shires somewhere... some weird nazi movement leader... a Islamic spiritual leader... What the Hell?!

It's not that the trickster type have nothing else better to do with their lives, so they pick on dumb people for fun and games. These types have a certain kind of large intelligence and thinking process that just expresses itself that way naturally. Most often these types make the best and cleverest predators. And if we look closely, and we know our psychology well, we can see that the ONA was invented by such a mind. Not so much to take advantage of those Genuine 'adepts' in the ONA. But to provide a means to express that same predatorial nature. As if the ONA were a Sinister University, and those who truly graduate it end up not only refining their craft, but with a well thought out and tested system to use.

Being a Trickster and/or Predator does require a large amount of intelligence, thinking, awareness, skills like evaluation and problem solving. It requires the ability to apprehend situations, empathize with prey, know people – how they “think,” act, react, feel, believe, to deduce the best and most effective course of action. It's by no accident that Nature gives such animals a coveted position in the food chain, and the coveted large brain. It's very simple to see the difference in the level of intelligence when you compare something like a gazelle to a cheetah or lion. You can see in the cheetah's eyes its immense intelligence.

I was just thinking how stupid some people might be for actually believing Myatt really believes himself to be a Muslim. This assumption is coming from me – someone who thinks she knows a few ONA secrets like Insight Role. It's easy for me to say: Pssh, yeah right, Myatt's about as Muslim as I am, I laugh at the Muslims who read his Islamic writing and run amok for Allah and the English Imam. After all we know he's not...?

But then I wondered if people actually laugh at me for reading Anton Long's writings, and running amok for the ONA and taking it seriously? What if I'm “seeing” the ONA from an immature “Zen student taking a koan seriously perspective,” and not from the perspective of a Zen Master?

I don't know Anton Long, but if he is the trickster type, then I can deduce he is having a good laugh somewhere out there at all of us trying to figure things out, because I would be too. All of us too mesmerized by his Kabuki theatrics to learn. Or worse, too “into” the ONA to figure out what it was really intended to do to us... for us? Genius! If there was one question I could ask Long it would be: How do you really see the ONA, what is it to you personally? Because I would rather see it like him, then see it the way some were intended to see it.

LANGUAGE

I have these thoughts still on my mind about what we talked about in Et Cetera Vel Quispiam, Kayla's illustration and stuff, which got me thinking about human language and it's effect it has on how we mentally "see" the world.

The English language is great I believe. I personally think the world should just give up and make it the Earth's Auxiliary language. But that's just me. Most opponents to the idea of English as the World Language will say things like: But it will undermine and destroy native culture and identity. Shut up!

There's 300 million citizens in America; maybe a good half or so have their own native culture and exo-English identity – like me. Most of these people speak English; sometimes as a first language, other times as a second. But you don't see any of them brainwashed by English into a cultureless American drone. English actually adds to their identity; as well as give them a DIFFERENT method of expressing that cultural identity.

The only problem is, to me, the English language comes with a major flaw which disturbs our eyes and how we interpret the world. The Flaw is the word: To Be – Is, Am, Are.

We learn in basic math that the word "IS" means Equal To or the SAME as: Two plus two IS four. Which means (2+2) IS EQUAL or the SAME THING as the number (4) and implies that there is no difference between (2+2) and (4). Even though we can visually see that they are completely different sets of numerical characters which look nothing like each other. This causes a major problem when we use the word "IS" with our own selves as living beings.

For instance, if I were to say: I AM a doctor. In the mind this comes to mean that the living causal being which is Me, IS EQUAL to or the SAME thing as a Doctor. When you are raised inside the English language – when your brain has been wired and programmed to translate English into conscious bits of pictures and things, it causes the individual to automatically bind it's self identity with what it does – and confusion sets in.

Fortunately for me, I was raised bi-lingual. I was raised with my brain wired to interpret both English and Khmer (Cambodian).

“I am a doctor” in Khmer doesn't exist as a statement. It's impossible to use the Khmer language to render that simple statement, because the Khmer language doesn't have a word for “IS.” In Khmer, it would be like this [I'll use the Francophone spelling, since French has more sounds in common with Khmer]:

“Kgnome [formal I] Twer [do] Kar [work] Doctor.” The word “Kgnome” actually means “slave/servant” but it's a “formal way” for peasants to refer to their person. Khmer by the way also is devoid of real personal pronouns. In our culture, you can tell what strata of society you come from by what words you use, especially what you use as personal pronouns. This sentence in Khmer literally means: “The Servant Does Work As a Doctor.” The way this statement is structured makes it impossible for the individual to psychologically merge it's self identity with what it does for work. The two phenomena remains separate phenomena: the living being (Kgnome) and what it does for work (Doctor). Whereas in English, there exists the illusion of these two phenomenons being the same thing: I = Doctor. Actually, instead of altering the person's identity, the statement – neurolinguatic program – in Khmer KEEPS the person's identity in order – just because you work as a doctor, doesn't mean you are not a Kgnome/Servant-peasant.

It happens also when we express our religious affiliation. In English it would be for example: I AM a Christian or I AM Buddhist. This creates the illusion that the “I” (the self) is the same thing as Christianity or Buddhism. It implies that the Christianity or Buddhism is somehow a part of the I. As this will demonstrate: I am Buddhist – Buddhist am I. In both cases the statement makes “sense” to the English mind painting an illusion that the “I” = Buddhism, and the Buddhism = “I.” There is a clear merger of Identity/Self with the set of abstract convictions/Buddhism.

In Khmer, it's different. If my grandpa were to ask me what my religion was I would have only two real ways to express my religious affiliation: 1) Chloer Juer [believes] Sasna [religion] Christianity or 2) Chloer Jol [go into] Sasna [religion] Pribudh [Buddha]. In Khmer, I don't become my religion, nor am I my religion. I either believe what the religion teaches, or I go into it like I would a house. In both cases, what I am as a living being, and what I believe are two very different and separate things. I am still me, regardless of what I believe or go into, which has nothing to do with who/what I am as a living being. There's actually no real single word for “religion” in Khmer. Sas in Khmer means race/ethnicity. Sasna means something like “tradition,” “culture,” or a collection of wise teaching of a Sas. Sasna in Sanskrit means “wisdom” or teaching of a race of people. It has it's Semetic/Kemetic cognatives as in the Wise Pharaoh Shoshenq, or Sheshonq, aka Shishaq (from the Bible).

It's hard to see the illusion – the blur between the Self and it's accessories – not until the individual is Questioned, does the illusion/psychosis become apparent. To illustrate, if my grandpa were to question my religious affiliation in Khmer, he would asked me: Haet-Ey [why/what for] Chloe Jol [go into] Sasna [religion] Christianity? In a way he is asking me why I ventured INTO the religion, as if to suggest that there must be something inside which I see which I wanted to see closer out of curiosity. This question also suggest him asking me how long I will stay inside, and if I will be leaving soon. It would be the same question a brother would ask you if you went inside his room. Notice in noway is my grampa attacking me as a person. Knowing that he is not attacking as a person, I do not have a need to validate my Self/Existence to him. The answer would be to give the reasoning behind why I went into it, or to name an "object" that caught my interest: To learn; because it's teachings interest me.

Now, the interesting part – if I were to question your religious affiliation in English, it is a completely different mater: Why ARE-YOU Christian? This question in English has the same essence as the question "Who are you," "Why are you;" "What are you?" (The very same questions the caterpillar was asking Alice in Wonderland). Chances are, when you are asked this question, you aren't going to answer at the top of your head: Oh, I see something interested in it, I won't be long. I'm just having a look around that all, maybe learn something. This question becomes a direct attack on you and your existence as a living being. The answer you will give is a resume or list of factors which VALIDATES your own BEING/nature: Because I am a sinner. The mind has confused it's very being/nature with a pile of arbitrary memplexes or abstract beliefs. Do a thought experiment with yourself – ask yourself: Why am I a Satanist? Then observe your feelings. Are you questioning your beliefs or your very being? What kind of answers do you give yourself to validate your "Satanicness?"

So when we hear statements like Myatt IS a Nazi; he IS a Satanist, and has BECOME a Muslim; something weird goes on in our Englishified minds. We SEE some person named "Myatt" changing, malting, transforming into one thing and another, and it makes it seem as though this person is either "searching" for an identity or unsure of what it is or wants to be as a living being. When it simply is not the case. Actually the first statement in Khmer would make more sense: Myatt Juer [believes] Dotch [like] Pug [those people] Nazi. In this case, Myatt, the act of him believing, and "those Nazi people" are kept distant and separated from each other as three separate factors. In other words: the Self or living being is independent of what it does or believes in. Myatt doesn't 'become' a Nazi. He isn't a Nazi. He chooses to believe like "those nazi peole."

If you were actually to say all three statements about Myatt up there in Khmer: Lok [sir] Myatt Juer [believe] Dotch [like] Pug [those people] Nazi; Hai [and/and then] Lok [the sir] Twer [do] Satanist; hai [and/and then] Jol [goes into] Islam, Tiad [again/also/one more time] – he could actually "be" all three at the same time without any confusion; or it makes it sound like Myatt is just going shopping for things, or that he's a busy multi-tasked man.

English is a great language, but it does have problems. These problems isn't just about a simple word "IS," and the etymological or linguistic meaning of "IS." It's a major causal problem.

Language – that is the lexicon of words we use and think in – is like HTML to our "neurological computer." It programs in our minds templates of thoughts. These thoughts in turn manifest emotions. And those emotions in turn influence our actions – which, of course produces results.

“IS” just isn’t a two letter word then. It is a major cause of psychosis and other mental disorders. Just do some research on countries or cultures whose language has “IS” in it and tally up the cases of mental disease, with cultures that lack “IS,” and you will begin to see something very scary.

“IS” makes the neurological system which is wired to use it BELIEVE that IT (it’s self identity) IS the same thing as the label, job, work, religion that IT believes or does. “IS” makes the Self believe that IT is not whole without what it believes in or does.

How many people in America can’t seem to differentiate themselves from what they do for a living? Cops, politicians, whatever; who become lost in the illusion of losing themselves in arbitrary functions and abstract ideologies. Who suffer from mental disorders. How many people suffer from failed marriages, high divorce rates, self loathing, and suicide who can’t separate themselves from their Christianity, Mormonism, Homosexuality, or whatever?

This little essay may at face value seem to have nothing to do with the ONA, when in fact it does. Because you really cannot evolve or progress your Self into a new or higher being if that Self is hopelessly lost inside a twisted maze of arbitrary-abstract labels and beliefs – “old aeonic forms” as Myatt would put it. You must, as Myatt struggled to do, liberate yourself from these old aeonic forms. Only then, when you have dis-covered your true Self, can you begin to the work of Self evolution.

The Self is independent and separate from the labels and beliefs it uses. Labels only help classify things; and beliefs only help to interpret reality into bite sized bits the mind can understand. Beyond it’s objective functions, labels and beliefs have no other purpose or relevance to either the living being itself, or the reality it exists in.

Wait, I just changed my own mind about English being the World Language...

LIBERATION

Liberation

Me and the entire “family” – meaning anything remotely related to us – spent Thanksgiving at grandma’s House. After the initial morning hellos and catch ups, and after the dinner, a Thai/Khmer family breaks up into age groups almost naturally during such family gatherings. All the old people gathered together – like always – in a corner to gossip, plot, and plan. All of the grown ups form this big circle by themselves – like always – to drink and gamble with playing cards with their piles of money. Then all “kids” [23 and younger] are left – like always – to reek havoc amongst their peers. Which means that if you are me and my age, you are naturally stuck babysitting 50 kids.

I was hanging out in a big sitting room with Kayla, one of our friends we brought with us, a younger cousin Salia, Jessica, and their big sister [in college] who broke her foot after a semitruck sideswiped her, to keep her company. We were talking quietly by ourselves in a sensible fashion, and these little boy cousins and nephews were running around screaming, with their nerf guns shooting and throwing balls at us every other minute.

When all the really little ones are gathered in a large group like this playing and screaming around the house, the elders complain in annoyance saying to themselves almost always something like: “Look at all them, just like maggots, just a big mess of them squirming and not keeping still.” Then they’d laugh and point fingers at each other cursing the one among them who had the most progeny affectionately.

They can be annoying, but I love the creativity, originality, imagination, and manner of self expression they have at that age. I think it’s beautiful, and I can appreciate the same primal imaginative impulse, beauty of expressive creativity and originality in big people as well.

Their creativity and imagination seems so bottomless, like they can imagine and make believe anything out of thin air to entertain themselves. So I was sitting there watching the little group of nieces and one nephew assemble together and talk amongst each other about playing house. The 5 year old boy cousin is nicknamed "Panya" which is the Buddhist word for "clever," or "cunningness," or "wily." Since he was the only boy playing house I tried to subtly make fun of him and asked him: "Panya, are you gunna play house with the girls?" And he says: "Yeah." Then my injured cousin says: "Uh oh, there you go, there's always one in every family."

I actually find it fascinating; in an amateur anthropological-sociological way to watch my very young cousins play. This group of little cousins [and nieces] ranged from ages 3-7. The little 3 year old only speak Khmer, the 6-7 year olds know both but only use only English; and the 4-5 year olds know both but mix the two, seeming unable to understand that they are using two different human languages to convey their ideas. But somehow everyone seems to understand each other fine.

They started to "build" this "House" out of chairs, coffee tables, vase stands, sofas, and blankets. Then they brought their dolls out, and everybody pretended to be mothers, daughters, sisters, and nobody really knew what Payna was supposed to be, but he was wearing high heels he found in the pile of shoes by the door by himself.

But the most fascinating aspect of their pretend play was the "little world" they expressed or manifested through their child Minds in their play. There was a little House, and things associated with this House was well defined and formulated in their make believe imaginings. I mean to say that there were bedrooms, kitchens, make believe stoves, even bathrooms and a garage with a toy car in it. Then the 5-7 year olds incorporated elements into this world. The 5-7 year old dictated to each other about school, and going to school; while Panya was instructed he should go to "work" far away.

I noticed that the more "distant" the aspects of their little world was from the House; the less defined and more abstract and hazy they were. What I mean is when I asked Panya what he did at "work" he was unable to tell me what grown ups actually do at work. Instead he creatively filled that Unknown with a fallacious idea of what he believes people at work do. And when the 4 year olds – who were too young to go to real schools – were pretending to be going to school according to the dictates of the 5-7 years old, they could not tell me what people do at school. When I asked, they shyly smiled, looked down, and said: "I don't know." But when I pressed them to tell me, they fabricated a fallacious – yet creative – idea about what goes on at school to fill their Unknowns with.

As I was watching them play house with this in mind, something snapped in the back of my mind, and I started to Think and Ponder. What were they really Doing? What was I observing? Why was Panya unable to clearly express and make believe a real working environment? And why were the 4 year olds unable to clearly manifest a make believe school environment that was accurate? Because they had never been to work or school.

Samsara

I'm not going to pretend that Buddhists invented the term "samsara" and that the crazy Hindus stole it and changed its meaning out of ignorance. I'm just going to say that 500BC was a time when the world in that area at the time was experiencing some sort of Age of Enlightenment when people were liberating themselves from Brahmanism's dogmatic world views and creating new schools and strains of philosophy. This was also the general era when the great philosophical fathers of China existed [such as Lao Tzu who wrote the Tao Te Ching].

So the word or idea of "Samsara" may have been coined during this time, and this word may have been floating around as a meme from person to person, and school of thought to school of thought, changing. In the same way that the word and idea of "Enlightenment" has been floating around in the West since the Age of Enlightenment, and as it floats from person to person, and group to group, it may morph into different meanings to different people. So "Samsara" is just like that.

The oldest organized group to use the word/idea "Samsara" were the Shramanic line of thought, and the proto "Buddhist," and "Jain" schools of thought that evolved out of it. In their hands and in the hands of the latter developed early schools of Buddhism, "Samsara" had a rational and sensible meaning.

When the neo-Brahmanist proto-Hindus annexed the word, samsara took on a lunatic meaning. To the Hindus Samsara is the cycle of rebirth that all sentient beings are trapped inside, except the gods. That's not the actual lunatic part. It's their cosmology and how samsara fits in that cosmology that is crazy. To them the universe is infinite, and every "kabillion" years is destroyed and recreated again. BUT in this infinite universe there is a single planet, on which all sentient life is trapped in some fucked up marry go round of cyclical birth and death? Somebody tell me what in the hell the rest of the infinite universe is for then if EVERYBODY is stuck on the same earth?

Basically Samsara is made of two words. Sama and Sara. Sama is a distant cousin of the English word "Same," but roughly means "Together," or "Shared," or "Common." Sara means "To Flow," and also may denote a River or Lake. It is the root word found in the name Saraswati, meaning Lady of the Lake/River/Flow. Together "Samsara" just means to "Flow Together," or a "Common/Shared Flow" and is a symbolical expression.

There are modern slang terminologies in American English which actually uses very similar symbolical language to roughly denote the same idea or concept: "Rolling," "Rolling Deep," "Rolling Together," "Rolling With the homies," "That's how my Niggas Roll," etc.

What's it basically mean when I say "That's how We Roll." It means that's how we do things; or how we operate together as a group; that's our common/shared way; how we function together to get things done. "Ride," also is used to express the same idea. From the idea that homeboys Ride together in cars taking care of business [drivebies] in a group. "That's how we Ride Nigga." I suppose since there were no Cadillac's in Punjabiland circa 500BC, young prehistoric thugs must have been riding in Boats down rivers together or something, so they say: "That's how we Flow Together," "This is our Flow," "You wanna Samsara wit us, you's gotta be down.”

And so, in pre-Hindu days, Samsara actually did not describe a place where one goes. It actually describes what one is Doing, or denotes a Process and Causal Association of how one ends up doing something; over and over again. Like they say in the hood: “Once you start Rolling with your Road Doggs, ain’t no way outa the game till you put six foot under Blood.” You can’t escape the hood, like you can’t escape Samsara, once you in, you in. Or another way to put it, as one of my street sisters says: “You can take the girl out of the hood, but you can’t take the hood out of the girl.” And when she said that, she unknowingly expressed the essence and Nature of Samsara.

But what is Samsara though, and how does it tie in with children playing House? I used my girl cousins playing House as an analogy because it would be the easiest way for me to describe Samsara in such a way that it becomes intuitively understandable. And I’m not trying to express “Buddhist” doctrine. These are just words, the only words I know, that adequately explains things I see.

You see, my little cousins and nieces were born, raised, and conditioned inside a House [obviously]. In such a way that as their brain and mind developed, that House they were born into is interpreted by their little minds as “The World.” Meaning that the House[s] they were raised in – and more importantly: Conditioned Inside Of – and what domestic aspects are associated with their House Environment, is all they literally know the World to be at that age. Which is why when you observe them expressing their creativity and actions, they do what? They re-create that House World in their play. They manifest through their actions, words, and expression, the Environment/World/House they were Conditioned Inside Of.

When we take a closer look at the scenario of my little cousins playing house, we will observe Three Casually Connected Phenomena. When I say “causally connected phenomena” I mean that each phenomenon is influenced or caused or comes into being because of the other. The First Phenomenon is the actual House they were born and raised inside of, which can be termed the “Primary Condition.” The Second Phenomenon is How that Primary Condition is apprehended and interpreted by their little minds which we may call the “Internal Condition.” We have many words in English with various values and qualities that try to describe this Internal Condition: worldview, paradigm, weltanschauung, “imprintation,” etc, but this Internal Condition also influenced their habit or mode or method of thought process. The Third Phenomenon is Causal Expression, as in how they act, do, play, express, manifest, etc, in the real world of experience.

Thus, when you have a group of children who have all been born, bred, raised, nurtured, trained, and conditioned inside the same causal environment or primary condition, they will develop similar Internal Conditions, and therefore they will not only see the “world” in the same way, but do and act in a common or shared, or similar way together, which is Samsara. In my little cousin’s case, their Samsara is expressed through them as pretend games of Play House.

But what does all this mean on a big people level? It means that quite literally, we never grow out of Playing House; it's just that our "House" gets bigger as we grow up. We never leave the "House." And we can tell most of us never leave the House, and have lost ourselves deep in the phantoms of our Samsara we have created for ourselves. How so? By our actions and what we manifest in life.

For example, if we were to observe my cousins play house, we can ask ourselves: "Where are they getting the idea of a house from?" And the answer simply is the big House they were born inside of or conditioned inside of. Every aspect of their play, the dolls representing children, pretend stoves, pretend parents, are things they have seen and experienced expressed through their words and actions after being processed and filtered by their minds. Those things which they have directly experienced, they can re-create very clearly. But as we observed, what they have not directly experienced is abstract, hazy, and unclear. But they are creative enough to explain away what they do not know in such a way that to their little minds, their Internal Condition has no unknown gaps. Like how our brain fills in our blind spots, making it appear as though we are seeing Everything.

So we look at a segment of the grown up world which most of us can relate to see this same pretend games and Play House phenomenon. If we examine the religious sector of humanity and their religions for example. People are born and raised inside of a religion which is their Primary Condition. This religious memplex is imprinted on our conscious minds from birth, and from this impression and conditioning we have our Internal Condition. Then we causally express that Internal Condition in everything we say and do in life. If we are priests writing bibles, we predictably fill our heavens with Cities made of Gold, like the New Jerusalem. If we have been exposed to wars and battles in our Primary Condition, such wars and battles predictably make their cameo in the book of Revelation. Like children playing house where they pretend to be parents and make dolls their pretend children, grown ups play doll with their gods. And those idea which these priests have no real experience of, are hazy, iffy, phantasmic, and questionable; whereas concepts and ideas they have been exposed to in life, are well thought out and defined.

I love how grown people play imaginary doll and not even know it. How they name their cute little god dolls all these pretty names, and how they have the image of what their god dolls look like, act like, complete with how their god dolls have likes and dislikes, such as liking goat sacrifices but really hates homosexual sex. And you watch these little girls play doll, observing how they verbally, mentally, and physically manipulate and animate their dolls to life, and we see the same shit in grown ups with their god dolls. And just like dolls, gods have "Houses" too, big ones, heavens, paradise, seven story heaven even. And what do children do when they Play House, as they are playing? They narrate stories or tell each other stories about what is going on, and everybody agrees and plays along occasionally adding their own things to such narrations. And so what do we observe in the grown up? Priests and religionists – being adults – can write, so we predictably see volumes and volumes of myths, legends, and "scriptural accounts" literally ever since Man learned how to scribble on cave walls.

The Urban Reality

We don't like to admit it, or we just can't put two and two together, but most of us humans living in developed nations, were all born, bred, raised, trained, school, and conditioned inside a city and abstract urbanized State. A city is a man made thing that is built on top of what was once Nature. If you stare down your city street and believe that the urban scenery you are viewing is Natural or Nature, there is something wrong with you. That's the House you were born and conditioned in, which you never leave. And how you act, behave, speak, think, and interpret data is influenced by that primary urban condition.

You believe life is a struggle or that only the fittest survives, and you may project that "world view," or "paradigm" out into "reality." Yet you fail to realize that you have only lived in an Urban environment your whole life, and have never lived in a jungle, with nature like many indigenous tribes still do. Neither have you ever directly studied or observed animals in their natural environment. Do those people struggle to make a living or to get by? Does a fruit bat struggle or does Nature just provide it nectar everywhere?

I'll give you an example of how my own urban samsara influenced the way I interpreted "reality" or an aspect of reality. How such was a limitation to on my understanding of how an aspect of reality works outside my urban imprintation. And how I freed my perception from this urban limitation.

In my family, whenever a girl gets pregnant we drive down to China Town to an herbal shop to buy a certain kind of Traditional Chinese Medicine. I've always thought real medicine were pills or liquid in bottles, that doctors made specifically and scientifically to fix issues. The traditional Chinese medicine don't look like that. It looks like somebody raked their front yard and put the leaves and stuff with the bugs into a bag and called it medicine?

Apparently different mixtures of bark, leaves, bugs, roots, and crap [sometime literally], do different things. I can't tell. Those Chinese will make a tea out of anything. I saw this basket of weird long dried shriveled curly "things" and me and my mom looked at each other wondering what kind of plant it possibly came from. I asked the Chinese guy working there what I was looking at – as my mom was handling one and smelling it – and he makes a fist and rapidly jerks it upwards and says: "Make man strong!" So I was like, damn is that what I think it is, so I asked him what they were, and he said wild pig penis. You had to be there to see my mom's face.

So we take that "medicine" and put it into a big jar, then we pour vodka or whiskey into it, and let the concoction sit there for nine month so that the alcohol draws out all the stuff, turning into something that looks like really dark tea, which has a "medicinie" smell, and tastes like fucking shit, as if you took everything bitter you knew was bitter and made juice out of it all, then mixed it with hard liquor. This particular mixture is used to shrink your tummy after you give birth back to its original size, gets rid of stretch marks, also shrinks "something else" back to its original size, then helps you regain your full strength back. You drink it as soon as you give birth, a shot in the morning, and on in the evening. My mom when she was pregnant was staring at her bottle of "medicine" as I pointed out to her a big earth worm and said: "Are you gunna drink that?" And she says: "God knows what those Chinese people put in there. For all we knew it could be stuff from their back yard, and here we are drinking it like idiots."

But I wondered how the hell they know what types of plants and bugs to mix together. They've been doing it for thousands of years, so I figured that maybe they learn from trial and error? Or something. But that didn't make any sense to me. In my mind I imagined a group of primitive prehistoric scientists walking around the jungle together experimenting and sampling things. So one of the guys says: "Go eat that wild mushroom over there and see what it does to you, it's for science." Which didn't seem practical. I knew that the pharmaceutical industry sends in scouts into places like the Amazon jungle and they work with local indigenous cultures to learn about various plants. They'd take their research and plant information and put it thru the scientific method, then isolate the active chemicals. But how did those "primitive" indigenous people know about the plants in the first place?

I ended up reading this one book written by an Occult Clown to try and research the medicinal relationship between plants and humans, to see if I can figure out how we humans know what plants cures what ailment. In this guy's book, he basically goes through this long discourse of how Nature is alive and provides for our every sickness and disease and that we can tell what plants did what for us by the shape of their leaves, branches, or roots. He gives examples and says that leaves that are heart shaped cures heart disease, kidney shaped leaves fixes kidney problems. Mandrake fixes sexual ailments since the root looks like naked bodies. I thought that was the stupidest book I had ever bought and read. I threw it away.

This other book I bought was written by this other Western guy who says he studies shamanism with these South American shamans. This one seems more realistic since he visited "shamans." And he said that the old shamans can talk to the plants telepathically because their minds have been tuned into the life force of plants like that. So the plants telepathically tell the shamans what they cure, and the shamans just teach the regular people. Then the guy teaches you how to shamanically communicate with plants by meditating next to plants in all these yoga positions and thinking nice thoughts to the plant to connect with it and after a while of practice, you should be able to carry on conversations with a Ficus. I threw that book away too, after I threw it across the room, but unfortunately I had no other alternative theory, so I accepted this one as the most "reasonable" since back then I was not as smart as I am today.

So one day we had gone to visit the wat [temple] where my monk grandpa lived for a religious holiday. While I was sitting with my monk grandpa and his fellow monk friend down in the sitting room after serving them lunch, I thought I'd ask my grandpa how people know what plants cures what sickness. So after I briefly explain to my grandpa about the traditional Chinese medicine our girls drink after they are pregnant, I asked him how "they" knew what plants and roots to use.

My grandpa asked: "Tell me what you think first, how do people know." So I said something like: "Well, maybe these monk type old people living in the forest can talk to the plants, and the plants tell them?" Then all the monks laughed, and my grandpa turns to his fellow monk friends and says: "Did you hear my grand daughter, she thinks plants talks to people."

He said: "You are born in cities. What do you know outside city stuff? Your eyes open inside a city, and it sees everything as a city. In ancient times when our ancestors lived in tribes inside forests, with nature, the men would go out to hunt you see. We only kill what we need, and only take from the forest what we need. So, on the way back from a long hunt, the men will sometimes see a boy monkeys collecting leaves and berries, but not eating them for himself. Since they did not need to kill the monkey, they follow these boy monkeys out of curiosity to learn what the monkey does with the plants he was collecting. The men would see in their nests and hollows of trees where such monkeys lives that each the boy monkeys would gives certain plants and berries to the girl monkeys that had just given birth to a baby to eat. So the ancient people learned to follow the example of animals. That's how the ancient people knew about plants from. From the wisdom of animals that live in the forest, and from living close to Nature. From observing and studying animals and nature directly. But you will never know of these things. A fruit which grows in Nature flows with Nature. A fruit which grows in things man made, flows with things man made."

The Factory Of Suffering

In English we call a Buddhist monk a "Monk," which to us has the feel of a religious authority of some type, or someone who has joined a monastic order to take religious vows to some god for some reward. This isn't what a Buddhist "monk" was originally.

The Pali word translated into "monk" is Bhikkhu, which is Bhiksu or Bhikshu in Sanskrit. Bhikkhu is an ancient cousin of the English word "Beggar." In fact the "root" of each word still resembles each other phonetically: Bhik/Beg. A Bhikkhu literally means a Beggar, Vagabond, Homeless Person, a Bum. He has chosen to be a bum to remove himself from the samsara of urban reality to graft himself back into the Flow of Nature and Reality which exists outside the illusions – artificiality – of man made cities.

The city, and the daily life in a city is samsara, it is the flow you flow together with every other person. You have no choice or other alternative but to go with the flow of a city. The current of the city entraps you mentally, psychologically, and physically. Escaping the white rapids of a city is hard and near impossible. Once you are born inside an urban world, you will die in it. Even if you leave, you will take that urban imprinting with you wherever you go.

How are you trapped in the current of urban samsara? If you one day got tired of money because you are tired of being poor or tired of suffering and living in poverty and you said to yourself: "I have had enough, I am tired of being poor. I am not playing this money game with all you people any more. I'm opting out. Fuck your money!" Then what? Is it so easy to leave the current of money? Your house bills? Your car? Your food? Your children welfare? How will you eat and survive? You have no choice but to remain playing House with everybody else. Why? Because everybody else is asleep or equally find it useless to struggle free from the money game.

If you got tired of playing the work game, you can't opt out. You have no choice. Things about city life ties you down to the game. Without work you can pay for a house or car, or nice clothes. Looking like an unaccomplished loser means you will not have a girlfriend or wife. You are pegged or tied to the game by your own natural desires.

Opting out of the school game, has its consequences in the game. Opting out of the law game will land you in prison. Back in ancient times, opting out of the religion game was punished by death. You have no choice but to keep playing along, even if you are losing the game miserably.

This was also how things were in ancient times in India. But in ancient times a group of men learned how to escape the prison of suffering: They left the entire city-state and its urban way of life behind and became bums. In pre-Buddhist times they were the Shramana, Sramana, in Sanskrit; or Samana in Pali; which is related to the word "Shaman."

Samanas started off simple as men who just abandoned the city-state to live off the fat of the land in the jungles. They abandoned everything including the Vedic cult of the City-State. But gradually these Samana bums over thousands of years developed their own "Bum Way," which was based on abandoning the city-state, its religions, and ways, and learning to flow with Nature. Early Buddhism and Jainism came out of this Samana tradition. And so a Buddhist who had developed far enough to understand the trap of Urban Samsara "dropped out" of city-state life all together.

All bridges were burned. No more money. No more of the wife stuff or children stuff. No more living in houses. No more paying tributes to priests. No more fancy clothes. No more hair even. Just rags, begging for food, and taking care of each other [other beggars]. A Brotherhood and Sisterhood of beggars developed: the Sangha. All for something called "Jivita Suddha" or "The Peaceful Life" which was the opposite of the bullshit, stress, problems, and suffering, [Dukkha] of the Urban Game. One can say, they were literally lazy bums. In a way, these ancient Shramanas who dropped out of Vedic urban reality were like the Western phenomenon known as "Hippies," who psychologically tried to remove themselves from society to live their own way in Hippy Communes.

This is not to imply that Life/Existence is inherently full of suffering. In an unmolested Natural state, Life is very pleasant and enjoyable. In the sense that Life or Living Organisms in Nature do not exist in some state of suffering. It is a rich, enjoyable, experience, with the occasional challenges. And this enjoyable Flow of Life moves effortlessly unimpeded. Until a large rock – or artificial "superimposition" – which may not "belong" in this River makes itself an obstruction to the Flow and Way of Nature. In which case, we can clearly see a disturbance in the Flow and Way of Nature. Which unnatural disturbance may at times become a Primary Condition that gives rise to the feeling of Disturbance [Dukkha].

Things were much different back then. It was easy for a person who had gotten tired of the urban experiment to drop out and live in the wilderness. Back then even though there were kingdoms and empires that controlled vast territories of land, "State" power and force only extended a few miles beyond each city. The rest of the territory was open and free. Nowadays there is nowhere to run. You can't drop out of New York City to be a bum living off the fat of the land in Yosemite Park, because the State is there too. It's even impossible for real indigenous tribes of people living deep in the Amazon to live life their own way without some State and its policies – and that ever ubiquitous Mundane civilizer: Magian religions – getting up your ass in some way. But what's the Problem with Urban Reality anyways?

Going back to my little cousins playing house; we can ask ourselves [to better understand] why they aren't playing Government, or Imperial Expansion, or whatever. Why house of all things? The answer is because, they live in a house, which environment imprints itself onto their minds, influencing the way they think and see the "world." And so from that thought pattern, and way of seeing their world, action and behaviour arises and is expressed.

So we can in this scenario understand that if we were to get annoyed by such children playing house all the time, and we said to them: "Can't you guys play something else? There is something wrong with how you guys think and see the world. There's more to reality than a house. Your little world view and paradigm is small and stupid. Change it and play something different!" They won't be able to do anything different, because forcing someone to change their way of thinking and way of seeing the world, does not extricate their Mind out of the Primary Condition, which is the cause of the way of thinking and perception.

To alter the behaviour of these kids, you remove them from that house and expose them to a new environment, or you introduce new things to them. For example, you take them to an art museum to see painting and art work. They realize directly that there is "more" to reality than their house environment. Then you bring them home and give them crayons, paint, and paper and watch. What happens? Having an alternative or larger Primary Condition which now includes art work, they can opt to not even play house, and instead they express that same bottomless creativity through art. You expose children to music, concerts, and imbue their Primary Condition with music, and give them pianos, violins, and so on, and they will naturally express their numinous creativity and potential through music. The Internal Condition changes on its own in all cases to mirror what Primary Condition their Mind "exists inside" of.

It's easy to understand how this all works using easy to see environments. We can easily understand that the Matrix those kids' Minds are inside of causes to arise and influences their Internal Condition: all their little thoughts, thought patterns, world views; and that such Internal Conditions is "projected" back onto the causal environment through their modes and methods of expression, action, and behaviour. Such that we understand that if we wanted to change or alter how they express themselves, act, and behave, that we do not focus our assertion to change or alter, or brainwash their way of thinking and seeing the world. We simply give them a new "world," and everything readjusts accordingly.

When I use the word "Matrix" I just simply mean it in a very ordinary archeological way. A Matrix is the stuff that surrounds and envelops an artifact physically and then temporally. Or a crime scene: we can say a bloody knife is the artifact. The Matrix is the entire crime scene, every object and item around the bloody knife, and the time and place and condition. This Urban Reality is an artificial matrix into which we are born and conditioned inside of. Everything about it shapes and influences our internal condition, and that internal condition gives rise to our expression, emotion, action, and behaviour.

But yet we find it almost impossible as adults to figure out – or admit – the real and actual cause of our human problems. For example: Poverty. There are millions and millions of humans living in India, China, and Africa that exists in a state of total poverty, where they literally die of starvation. How does that happen? What causes that poverty? We point fingers and blame poverty on many different things. Maybe they are stupid; they are undereducated; they should have gone to college; they're lazy, they're backwards; they're "undeveloped."

And war, with all the death and genocide that comes with it. We blame such causal manifestations on people's internal conditions. It's the Jews' fault because of their beliefs. It's the Palestinian's fault because of their hate filled beliefs. It's the fault of Marxist-Leninist ideology. And then regarding pollution and the exploitation of the earth, we blame this on internal conditions of people. It's because of capitalist ideology; it's because of Western materialist paradigm of wanting things they don't need; it's greed; it's the corporation's fault.

So having blamed the problems of humanity on internal conditions we focus our time and energy attacking people's worldviews, paradigms, process of thought, beliefs. And we replace their "bad" or unacceptable way of thinking and beliefs with "better" ideological shenanigans. All the while everyone stops short of blaming the obvious gorilla in the room that's often on our backs. That sacred cow we call the Nation-State.

That's like a gross misdiagnosis don't you think? When we see the manifestation of mass poverty, wholesale genocide of entire peoples, destruction of oceans and forests, and we say that such things is caused by belief, thinking, and ideology? We cover these symptoms up with sugar coated new doctrines and paradigm, neglecting to pay attention to the actual Cause. And sometimes we even go so far as to blame human suffering on Humans. You often here these Occult Clown mundanes feign misanthropia by hating people on account that humans are stupid and destructive. Yet such mundane misanthropists seem to have absolutely no problem upholding, defending, and submitting to the State laws these same humans they hate legislate and enforce. "But, but, that's different," they'll cry.

Nobody touches the Nation-State. The Nation-State is the crown jewel of Humanity. It's our Piece de Resistance! Why there's never been anything thing quite like it since the dawn of our species. It protects us, provides for us, knows what is best for us, it feeds us, it bequeaths unto us freedom and rights, it's provided us with all these wonderful shiny pots and pans and computers. It's better than Religion! We once thought Religion was the Supreme Masterpiece of Human creation, which Saved us, provided for us, protected us, fed us, gave us husbands and wives within the sacrament of holy matrimony. Oh but Religion was silly and tyrannical: obviously. Why it only took us 1000 years to figure that out. We're smarter than that now. We don't need Religion no more. The State is our Salvation. The State's secularism is now our civilized and developed way of life. And who would dare bad mouth Democracy which has given us liberty!?

There was a time when most humans on earth believed that the sun went around the earth. But just because global consensus or popular belief says something is so, doesn't make it so. There is nothing wrong inherently with ignorance. But it's when we deify our fallacious beliefs to explain our ignorance away and back it up with irrational murderous force, that is when we start shit kicking, disturbing, and manifest suffering and death. So there was a time when the idea of the earth being the center and the sun revolving around the earth had been propped up as a sacred cow. And all those heliocentric terrorists were punish, burned, and imprisons. But as dangerous as heliocentric terrorism was back then, there were still a few of those sinister minds that refused to give into the worship of propped up idols. It took a long time of struggle to gradually enlighten the ignorant mundanes so they can understand that the sun was at the center, and then the idol fell apart. Then, as one would expect, years later the Church comes along and says to us: "Oh we knew that all along, misinterpretation somewhere, no big deal, no harm done."

Then there was a time when many humans on the earth believed the world was flat. There is nothing wrong with ignorance and not knowing. But it's a different matter when you take such ideas and make gods out of them, then judge and kill others over it. So there was time when the flat earth world view was propped up as a sacred cow. And if you challenged it you were a heretic and enemy of religion, god and his people. But during that ignorance there were a few resistant minds that went against the established grain of the mundane world. And they fought hard to gradually show the mass of ignorant mundane stooges that the world was actually round. And when the mass of people finally learned the roundness of the world, the power regimes of the old world lost all its support and that world order fell apart.

Now we've propped up a new all powerful totem: the State. It's the latest mundane rage and craze. The state and civilization and liberty are the same thing, and it's also the only real way or manner humans live. You go around and tell mundanes you dislike their Nation-State sacred cow, and they screech in horror and verbally – sometimes physically – attack you, believing you to be some demon, or draconian evil doer. You opt out of the State Game, and you automatically become a Criminal, a Terrorist, an Out Law.

It's easy for us to understand looking back that as long as Religion exists, people will always suffer, war, and exploit. We can objectively look at Hinduism's caste system and see that such a system causes millions of human lives indignity and suffering. We can see from looking back that subservience to church and feudal systems generated real measurable death, indignity, and suffering. But we can't get ourselves to understand that as long as the State exists, there will always be human suffering, mass poverty, genocide, mass exploitation of people and natural resources.

Dropping Out

How do you live or exist without the State? It's a horrifying question to mundanes. You tell a mundane that you want to destroy the State, and they become confused. And they'll ask you what would you "live in," what other alternative is there? And that is exactly like me going to my 5 year old cousin playing house and telling her I want to get rid of the house she lives in. She'll become confused and wonder what alternative "thing" she will exist in if not a house. But as adults we know there are alternatives, such as bigger houses, apartments, condos, suites, etc. The little cousin has only been exposed and conditioned inside one single enveloping House, and cannot conceive of an alternative. Just like a mundane can't literally live or function outside the matrix of the State.

I was watching a emotionally horrendous documentary on child sex trafficking in Cambodia on one of those cable channels with documentaries. It doesn't happen all the time, but it is not rare. Usually – in general – the poor Vietnamese immigrant families will kidnap a ethnic Khmer at a very young age, and train her to be a prostitute catering to random men and tourists. There is an easy method to train such young children to perform such acts and behaviour. You lock them up in a box for a couple day without food and water. Then the men will feed them water and food after “abusing” them. This does the same thing as when you train a dog when you give the dog treats. Then the older girls in the “family” will come by later and emotionally console the very frightened girl. This causes the kidnapped girl to associate her emotions/trust in these older girls. So these kidnapped girls end up being “willing” child prostitutes, because their bigger “house sisters” – who were trained and processed in the same manner – tells them such acts and behaviours is “normal” and the only way to survive.

In the documentary members of a non profit humanitarian organization working with local police scoured the child red light district slums, on missions to find and extricate “prostitutes,” as young as 6 years old. The local police raided the kidnapping families at gun point [usually the families operate as a criminal organization with guns]. In every case when these little girls were being pried from their abusive kidnappers, they were in sheer fear; kicking, screaming, crying, clasping their hands together, and begging the police to return them to their abusive kidnappers. One would think that such unfortunately abused 6-9 year old girls would be happy to leave that Matrix. But that matrix was the only existence/world they knew. Which is why they were crying, and begging with clasped hands to be returned to that “family” and life. That is the power of samsara, for even if you are suffering, even if you are abused, even if you are miserable; you will hold on with to that flow, that way, with a death grip, because you simply do not know of an alternative. If you have ever been in an abusive relationship, you will know what I am talking about here too.

You study things like the earthquake in Haiti, and hurricane Katrina where the illusory veil of the State is temporarily lifted, and you’ll observe that people in such conditions end up being totally nonfunctional. They don’t even know how or where to get drinking water. They show themselves to be completely dependent on the State for handouts and sustenance. The façade of their Urban Reality has fallen. The grocery stores have stopped providing food. The televisions have stopped entertaining. The police have stopped protecting. The outlets have stopped selling clothes. The value of money in such instances for that moment vanishes. The Urban leader and their priests of law and order have vacated. You are absolutely disoriented and incapable of living on your own or defending yourself.

And yet in our mundane ignorance/bliss and arrogance; when the façade is propped up and everything is fine, we tell ourselves that we are “individuals,” that we are “independent,” and that you don’t need others. Just like 3 year old children who tell themselves they’re independent and big girls because they can go potty by themselves and change their own diapers, all the while living in a cozy house, safely embraced by the providence of their parents. You tell yourself you’re “independent” and an “individual” next time you ask your boss if you can go on a restroom break.

You are not “individuals.” You have been Individualized, in context to an all embracing matrix. Your ancestral numinous tribes have been broken down and disrupted into nuclear families that barely function. These have been further degenerated into single parent families. This is further disrupted by propaganda of “individuality,” and “independence.” You now are a single individualized unit, no longer attached to an organized tribe or family. You are now completely dependent on the State and its banks, its corporations, its school system. But you'll never realize that you'd starve to death and die in a month if the State idol falls. That's how independent you are.

You are never really an "individual" in Urban Reality. From the minute you are born you are connected to the Urban condition from being bombarded by television, radio, parents, peers, teachers, society, bosses, laws, politics, religions, ideologies, etc. There is not ever a single moment in your life, where your Mind was actually dislodged from the matrix it was born in. You have never been disconnected from Urban Reality. You have never been Individuated. You don't know of anything beyond Urban Reality. Have you ever left It all behind, and removed yourself into a quiet forest for a month or 3. Have you ever experienced any kind of self induced individuating isolationism that extricated your conditioned Mind out of its Urban environment? No, you just perpetuate it.

Everything that we see of the "world," is contaminated with our conditioned Urban perception. It is a struggle in the Urban environment to get by in life. You start off in childhood trained to compete in the first grade on up. "Don't copy," they say. Co-operation is beaten out of you, and you are trained to compete as a unit. You do have to compete for nice jobs in the Urban environment. You do have to compete for girlfriends and boyfriends in the Urban environment. So we project that Urban competition out into the "world," and we end up seeing the world as being a big competitive jungle. But is Life really this Way?

How we think is influenced by our Urban conditioning. People that still live in tribes are "primitive." Things in Nature have to flow linearly like city streets flow straight. If there is king of a state, there must also be a king of the jungle. If the State is some provider, then there is also a provider in heaven. If laws governs the Urban environment, then Nature and Heaven also are governed by laws. If you are punished in the Urban environment, then it only makes sense that breaking divine laws incurs punishment as well. If there are judges in the city, then there are judges in heaven, or some hazy abstract natural law of karma that judges your actions. You can take the girl out of the hood, but you can't take the hood out of the girl.

These Mundanes think that making new religions, philosophizing new paradigms, constructing new ideologies is change and freedom. When such behaviour and actions are predictable causal manifestation of a Mind born, bred, and conditioned inside a Matrix constructed of religion, paradigms, and ideologies. It's like children deciding that they no longer want to play house in a pink house any more but a red one! It's still a house. Still a reflection of the much bigger House. Nothing has really changes. Nobody has really gone anywhere. Everyone is still in the same place. The State is still there. It is still the Primary Condition. It still influenced your Internal Condition. And you will still always end up manifesting the same shit over and over again. The same suffering, the same ideological wars, the same poverty. As it has been for thousands of years. Things weren't always like this though.

If you were a doctor, and poverty, genocide, exploitation were a disease I suffered from, and I went to you to cure it, would you be able to discover the cause of that disease and destroy that cause for me, or would you give me a tranquilizer to cover up the symptoms? Solving the problem we humans suffer from is very easy. The cause is obvious. It just requires the Final Solution: the annihilation of the State.

There is no real way to physically drop out of the State because every land mass is occupied by a State and its law and order. Up is the only free place. Then how do we extricate our Minds from this enveloping matrix it was born inside? Nature has given you the way since your very birth. She did invest you with a bottomless creativity and an infinite imagination. No other creature has the ability to dream [envision] for something, and then strive to reach for such dreams.

It's something we use to do naturally when we were young. Even if we were stuck inside a house all our first 5 years. We still had a window or "escape" portal to different "worlds" deep in our minds. But unfortunately this beautiful ability to dream, envision, hope, imagine, is pounded out of us as we grow up and are processed through schools. Where, by the time we are in high school, we have all but lost the ability to dream, wonder, imagine; create mythos which inspires us; having given such "useless" things for memorization and recollection of mundane information and indoctrination. It's become a dead and dry world. Have you ever stared out the window as a young child during a rainy day, stuck inside and bored, but your mind drifts off "some place?" In our adult life, those windows to an "outside" environment have been shut, and our eyes diverted to stare and see only the big monolith of Urban Reality.

The only thing we can do until System Breakdown, is reopen those window, and to once find that lost ability to wonder, dream, imagine, and create; then reach for those dreams. To question every sacred cow of the Nation-State and its illusory Urban Reality and secular gods. To actively, practically, live a new way of life, against the grain of this established mundane world order. Whatever that means to each of us: "crime," tribalism, exotics. We need to each rediscover that more primeval Mind that lurks beneath the trained and conditioned Conscious mind, and to live our life to it's more numinous primal impulse. And we need to once again find our way somehow back to Life and Nature. To rekindle that connexion we lost between us and all that the Dark Living Cosmos is.

Otherwise as a species, we may be doomed. I once believed that Nature can't be so self destructive as to give rise to conditions that may potentially destroy it. I believed that Nature and Life [on earth] was self regulating and "life" oriented. Until I realized deserts grow, and that ecosystems and species of animals are sensitive to change. Until I considered all of the past organisms that have gone extinct. Most mundanes will say to themselves in this light: "So what, I'll be long dead by then."

How much do we – of the ONA – actually in a genuine way honor, love, and respect our Humanness and Nature? Do we really as Humans mean anything to ourselves? And is Nature really a numinous thing to us? Are we irresponsible in that we can just give rise to bloodlines of progeny and condemn them to extinction in some future? Are we just paying lip service to our ideas of Aeonics and Future Magick. To such things as Aeonic Insight and Dark-Empathy? Why bother? Why waste our time discovering a grim future of our Humanness, just to give up and not try, so long as we selfishly live a full life ourselves? Especially when we do understand how Aeonics and stuff works, knowing that we can change a future aeon by what 'seeds' we plant and what actions we set into motion today? I personally don't care what happens to mundanes and their breed. But what about Our Breed and Nature?

LUCIDITY

I have lucid dreams often. Most of them are self induced. I learned how to do it from a book. You train your mind to question everyday reality, every waking minute, asking yourself if this is a dream, and trying to see waking life as a dream. Then it's a matter of time. After a while, from time to time, while you are dreaming you begin to notice unusual things and question it's possibility. That's when you wake up inside the dream. Once "inside," or phased into it, you learn from there. I had the strangest spontaneous lucid dream last night. A kind I had never had before, which woke me up when it was over and got me thinking about ontology and cosmology in bed.

Before the lucid dream, I had already "woke up" inside my head. My body was going through those weird electrical waves you get when you are in borderland state and just about ready to leave your body. I "surfed" the wave of electrical surges going up and down my sleeping body, hoping to get out. I got out, but I was floating in empty blackness. Like I was in space with no stars, just floating there.

I looked around to try and find the earth or some point of reference because I was getting very frightened from the dark vertigo. I had never been inside empty space before. Then, from somewhere behind me, I heard the voice of a man's soft gentle voice speak saying: Look...

My awareness looked down below where I was floating, and the voice asked: What do you see?

And I said: A blue grid.

The grid stretched into beyond my point of vision. I had seen this grid many times in different ways. I see it when I do that thing where I close my eyes and press them lightly. This causes lights and swirls to appear, and after while when the purple swirls subsides, this grid can be seen. The other time I saw the grid was at a friends house. My friends dad was an electrician who many these doohickeys in his garage. He made this something called a "Mind Machine" once for his son (my friend).

My friend told me to sit in an arm chair and put it on. This mind machine is just a machine that makes tones and lights at different cycles per second, to tweak your brain waves. He set the mind machine at Theta Wave, which is one from Delta – or deep sleep. I put on the flashing goggles, and the ear buds. I didn't experience anything at first, except the annoying bleeps in my ear, and the constant flashing. My eyes were closed so I was already in Alpha wave. I don't remember how much time past, or what happened next, but everything went silent and I saw the blue grid. I thought the machine went broke.

I was floating looking at the familiar blue grid below me, and the voice said: Look...

My awareness shifted to my left, where I saw a dozen or so holes in the grid of different sizes. Scattered in random order. Then a giant grid ball came from the right side. It was so big, it scared me, and I pulled my self back away from it very far, so that it was the size of an orange. The grid ball had its own grid that was of a different size. Its equator was on the same plane as the big grid, so that its top hemisphere was above the big grid, and it's bottom was below.

I saw it [the ball] move towards each hole in the big grid. And from it came a blue spark. The spark budded a new grid ball in the hole, like a yeast cell budded new daughter cells. each time the original ball moved to a different hole to bud, it was connected to the daughter balls it had made. After the hole had been filled I saw the original ball ripple a wave of blue light down to its sparky tentacles to each daughter ball, and this caused the daughter balls to move apart into their own line of orbit. And they circled the original ball.

The voice behind me asked me: What do you see?

I said: I see the sun. It gave birth to the planets.

The voice said: Look...

I looked inside the sun/grid bubble, and I saw a dark sphere, and from it radiated sparks. I was looking at a plasma globe, super imposed onto the grid sun, so that I could understand.

The voice from behind asked me: What do you see?

I said: I see a coil, and plasma filaments are coming out of it, like the plasma globes.

I was confused. I knew a plasma globe needed electricity. I don't know why; perhaps because I was dreaming; but I looked around the space for a wall socket and wires.

The voice asked from behind: What are you looking for?

I said to the voice: For the source, what does it look like?

I felt a pull, which tugged me away from the scene, and I moved far away from the grid until I was once again alone in empty darkness.

The voice behind me said: Look...

My awareness looked up and I saw a massive oval shaped grid, inside which was what looked like the Milky Way, as if the galaxy were inside a blue egg shaped Farady Cage. The grid had a circumference, from which radiated blue spokes towards the center, where I saw the grid lined curve like a funnel into the center of the galaxy.

Something moved me closer to the giant bubble, so that I could see the circumference up close. It was like blue chrome or blue quicksilver. I was fixated on the weirdness of the blue metallic color for a while, until the voice behind me said: Look...

My awareness looked at one of the spokes, and my eyes followed it, and I saw hundreds of tiny filaments or sparks coming out of each spoke. At the end of each spark was a star. I looked closer and i saw each spark and its star move in circles and oval movements. There were millions of sparks and stars, each moving.

The voice behind me asked me: What do you see?

I said to the voice: I see a grid that radiates sparks of energy that becomes stars.

I became confused again, and I looked around for this galactic grid's source.

The voiced asked me from behind: What are you looking for?

I said: For the source...

The voice said: Look...

I saw a spark come out of the galactic grid and from the tip of that spark I saw a small ball grid, inside which was was a light that looked like a star. But this light and grid expanded, growing bigger, until it looked to me like a miniture galaxy. And I shifted my awareness around the mother galaxy to see if it had it's own mother, and I saw a blue tether like a twisted umbilical cord come from out of the big galaxy stretch into the distant darkness and noticed another grid/galaxy at the end of the tether.

The voice behind me asked: What do you see?

I said: I see the galaxy giving birth to a new one, like I saw the sun give birth.

My fascination was then directed to that distant galaxy. I wanted to see it up close, because I had never seen another galaxy before. And in a moment I Became there, in front of that other galaxy. I looked at it for a while, with a smile on my face, and I asked the voice: Which is it?

The voice behind me answered: Andromeda.

I wondered to myself, if there was a living planet in it that I could see.

And the voice from behind said: Go, to the circumference of the grid.

I moved myself towards the circumference until I was inside. It looked like a great big indigo tunnel. I moved with the flow of the circumference and saw holes at the top and bottom, where the spokes enter the circumference. From the bottom hole; which looked like a giant manhole. I saw what looked to me like a dimly lit flow of greyish blue cigarette smoke, that cascaded upwards to the hole directly above it, like an upside down water fall of smoky light. And I was inside the smoky light which took me into one of the upper spokes of the galactic grid.

It looked like another tunnel. But this tunnel looked like swiss cheese. Each hole I figured was where one of the sparks I saw that turned into a star. Each hole was surrounded by a bright blue circle. I was mesmerized by the bright blue electric circle of one that was coming close to me above my head. And the voice from behind said: Touch...

I reach my left hand upwards for the bright blue circle and was caught up in a surge of some kind where I was pulled inside, like I was in a river that flowed very fast. I was up the shaft of the spark and I notice what it looked like up close. The voice from behind asked me: What do you see?

I said: I see a braid of two smoky filaments, twisting and spiraling, like a helix, feeding the star it is attached to.

As I got closer to the sun this filament was feeding the voice asked me: What do you see?

I said: I see a haze of blue that surrounds the sun, and the two filaments diverge, each attached to the north and south poles of this envelope. And as the filaments twist, the envelope turns with the sun inside.

From this turning envelope there were these blue lines that radiated outwards into the distance. I focused onto one of these which caught my eye, and in a moment, was surfing it's flow. Then I came to a planet. Around the planet as the same hazy blue envelope, and the blue filament that connected it to its sun also split, ending at the envelope's poles. I past through the smokey blue haze and saw an ozone layer, that was a bright crystal blue color, and pasted through.

When I had past through the ozone layer I felt hands on me. Hands gently holding my arms, legs, on my tummy, and holding my sides. I got frightened because I felt the hands but could not see anybody. I asked the voice: What are they?

And the voice behind me said: My hands.

I asked: How many hands do you have?

The voice said: Many.

As I was gently being brought down from the sky, I noticed the sky on this planet was a light lime green color. I then asked my invisible guide: Why is the sky green here?

And the voice answered: Why is the sky blue there?

I said to myself and the voice: I watched a show on discovery and it said there was something in the atmosphere which absorbs all the color spectrum's frequencies, but blue, and we see that blue.

The voice from behind said to my speculations: Perhaps the same principles apply here too?

My awareness shifted to the tops of these trees that I was near, and this invisible guide; maybe sensing my focus, brought me to the tippy tops of these trees to see and asked me: What do you see?

I said: I see blue leave.

The leaves were a cool blue color, very much like these eucalyptus trees with the very dark bark we had near my how which had leave that were bluish in color.

I asked my my guide why the leaves were blue and not green here. It said to me: Why are leaves green and not blue at home?

I recalled an episode of a nature show about leaves and said to the voice: I think I remember something saying that chlorophyll was bluish in color, and that the leave back at home were actually yellow or light orange, so it makes green; so maybe the leaves here don't have a yellow color to them?

My guide said: Perhaps so.

I got frustrated with my invisible guide and said to it: Boy, you're not very helpful are you. How am I supposed to know if I'm getting things right or not, if you don't tell me I'm right or wrong?

And the voice said: You don't have to always be right Chloe to experience something. These answers will come in time.

As my guide was carrying in with its many invisible hands to the ground I suddenly realized how dumb it was that it needed to carry me in the first place. As if it didn't have the magic or power to just levitate me to the ground. So I asked the voice: Why do you have to carry me with your hands anyways?

My invisible guide said back to me: Because you are afraid of height.

And it set me down to the ground.

My feet were bare and I was standing on these roly blue grass, much like some I had seen back on earth. It was warm, and in the sky there were a few patches of those clouds made of ice crystals, which are my favorite type. I knelt down to touch the grass and picked a blade to smell it. I had become good enough with this lucid dreaming stuff that the imagery felt as real as waking life to me. The grass didn't smell interesting, so I ate a piece. It has a slight taste of pepper. As I was chewing and being mindful of the odd flavor I looked to my right and became suddenly frightened because this animal was walked by.

My guide's many hands quickly came back onto my body and pulled me away, and it calmed me. It said: What do you see?

I said: Like a brown badger, or a platypus without a beak or tail.

My awareness noticed where it was walking to. There was a beautiful lake a few yards from where I was standing, and in the distance I could see a snow capped mountain range. I had a smile on my face, as I just stood there captivated by the scenery.

After a while, I stopped and looked at the animal again, following it to the lake, and I saw something strange. The voice asked me: What do you see?

I said: I see a hazy cord or filament coming out of its head going up into the sky.

I reached back to the back of my own head, where the skull meets the neck bone to see if I had one, and I turned around; and saw that I also had one; as did all the trees.

My invisible guide asked me: What do you see Chloe?

I answered: I see we are all connected to something. Like this galaxy was a living creature, and it's grid was it's circulatory system. These suns and planets are like its organs; and we are inside, connected to it all.

My awareness wandered back to the lake and the animal. I walked to the lake side and knelt to taste the water with my finger. It tasted like normal water. I got up to look at the mountains, remembering those few times I went up some mountains back home with friends to go snowboarding. And I wondered about the people that lived on this planet.

I asked my guide: What do the people here look like, can you show me?

The voice behind me said: You are the only one here.

I felt sad and disappointed. Because I was thinking of maybe reincarnating as a person living here or something, when I die on earth. But since there were no people, this would not be possible.

I asked the voice: How would I come here later, if there are no people here, to come through?

My guide said: Come, it will be here waiting.

When the voice had said that, it puts it's many hands on me again and lifted me back up into the sky. I figured it was time for me to go home.

I found myself far up in empty space. This time the space had stars in the sky. This is when my dream went weird.

My guide said to me: My friends will take us home, as you came, through the network of tunnels. Remember what you see, and write these things down for a later time.

I asked the voice: What friends?

And it said: Look...

My awareness was draw upwards, and I saw a freaking shapce ship just above us.

I said to my guide: But I don't believe in aliens.

The voice said to me: Don't tell them, you might offend them.

I was watching the ship move over us and was thinking to myself: And I suppose the center is going to open up and we'll fly inside, like in the movies. But I noticed something. And the voice said to me: What do you see?

I said: I see a filament from space, going into the ship, circling it's circumference.

We went into the flying saucer through an opening in the center.

There were these things waiting for us inside the ship. They looked like those generic grey aliens. They were mostly four feet tall. They had a head the size of mine, but a body the size of a child, and big dark eyes. They wore these blue uniforms, like a single piece jumpsuit, that looked like it was stuffed with cotton. I saw they had five thin fingers, and almost like frog skin or dolphin skin.

My guide introduced me to his friends saying: Friends, this is Chloe, Chloe these are my friends.

They waved hello, and I snickered, because it was a weird scene; but I said hello and waved back so as to not offend them.

One of the aliens took my hand and proceeded to guid me down a hallway. Not one f them seemed to be talking to me, so I asked my invisible guide: How come they don't talk to me?

And the voice said: Because they don't speak English. I will translate what they think.

The hallway was octagonal in shape, with soft lights coming from the sides. I looked up because I am use to seeing light bulbs on the ceiling, and we all stopped walking.

My guide said: What do you see?

I said: I see honeycombs in the ceiling. Each hexagon has a black ball at the center and is concave, but they aren't light bulbs.

When I finished observing the honeycombs, one of the greys had brought me a cup of water with a straw in it and my guide said: My friends would like you to spray some water into the hexagons.

I filled mymouth with some water and used the straw to shoot a burst of water, trying to hit the black ball. I saw the water splash the sides of the hexagon I hit and saw drops falling oddly away from the hexagon in a swirl a clockwise swril motion, and falling regularly a foot away from the hexagon. But the drop of water directly underneath the black ball remained floating a long time, before it drifted to the side of the hexagon and swirled downwards as well.

The alien that was holding my hand looked at me, and I at him, and I saw a hurricane twisting, and I saw the eye of the hurricane calm. Then the voice asked me: What do you see?

I said: Those hexagons make a force like gravity, which swirls like a hurricane, but the area just below the source is unaffected.

We all kept walking, and we went inside what seemed to be an large elevator. Inside I asked the voice: How is this artificial gravity made?

The voice said: Look...

One of the greys made a triangle with its fingers, and another one pointed to the three points, as my guide spoke: One point is electricity, the second is magnetism, the thrid is gravity. What do you call the line between electricity and magnetism?

I said: Electromagnetism.

The voice said: What would you call the line between magnetism and gravity?

I said: Magnetogravatism?

The voice said: What do you call the line between gravity and electricity?

I said: Electrogravatism?

The elevator had stopped, and we walked outside; the grey still holding my hand. We walked into a scene that looked like it was out of a Star Wars movie, with those bridges that were suspended in the air; that Luc and Darth Vader were sword fighting on. We all walked to the side of one of these bridges. I saw giant spheres in rows, sandwiching a blue tube that hugged the curved circumference of the ship. I assumed that this tube and the giant sphere went all the way around. each ball has a cap of some sort on their north and south poles, with what looked like a lot of gold or copper wires, which were wrapped around different parts of the blue tube.

I looked at the grey who was looking at me, wondering what were inside those giant balls, and I saw images of great big crystals. As I saw the big crystals, the grey used both of his shall hands to gently squeeze my hand while looking at me, and I understood.

My guide asked me: What do you see?

I said to the voice: Those balls have big crystals inside which are being squeezed or put under pleasure. This maybe makes some kind of force that is mixed with that blue spark being drawn into the ship, and the mixed energy is caused to go around the tube in circles.

My guide said: There are networks of crystals of great size scattered underneath the earth. These crystals hold in them a living force which sustains the flesh. Flesh cannot survive long without this force. If you ever leave the earth behind to live in space or travel through it far, you must take these with you.

I faded. The scenery went hazy, and I felt very sleepy. I woke up to the usual sound of birds chirping just outside our window. Thinking about this crazy dream. I kissed Kayla, who was still asleep, and was glad to be home.

MARTIAL ARTS

That's Grand Master Morihei Ueshiba, the father of Aikido kicking someone's ass. I love how he's bitch slapping that dork like it was nothing for a short old man and that dork is flying to the ground. Oh the shame, to get your ass kicked by a five foot tall senior citizen. Grand Master Ueshiba actually looks hella bored in that picture LOL, like the dork wasn't even a challenge!

I was raised watching kung fu movies, cuz I'm Asian. Asian uncles and cousins like that stuff I guess. My uncle would practice his moves in the back yard for hours with his eyes closed like he were half meditating, and the cousins would mimic his moves. He'd teach us all the basic moves. This was back when I was younger, like 13. I just watched the boys thinking what a bunch of idiots they were. We knew my uncle knew his shit because there was this one time when he went to visit some friends in North Carolina and he was walking down a dark street at night. A group of 5 black guys followed him and tried to mug him with knives and a gun. My mom (his sister) got a call from him in jail asking for bail money, so my mom wired some money to a family friend down there. My mom said the cop was talking to her and told her that my uncle has kicked the living shit out of all five black guys and that he had never seen anything like it because they had knives and guns.

So there were those times when the cousins would get tired of play fighting each other and they would come do their dumb moves on me. I'd say something like: Get the hell away from me before I kick your ass later, when I learn all five Shaolin styles. And that would start the Asian version of that dumb infinity game; remember when you say shit like: well I like it more than you infinity times! And your nerd friend would say: Oh yeah, well I like it more than you infinity bine times and you can't top that! And you're like: Dude, what the hell is infinity bine? Well instead of it being like that we would use how many martial arts styles we'd learn, until one of your dumb cousins says: Oh yeah, I'll learn every martial arts style out there and boxing. I don't know, maybe it's just my family.

I was thinking to myself then how it's pretty smart to know as many different styles as possible, that way you're like a kung fu swiss army knife, so when your enemy switches styles, you can bust your move and switch styles too. So I made a list of hardcore styles I wanted to learn: 1) Wing Chun; 2) San Soo; 3) Southern style Tong Long (Praying Mantis); 4) Shaolin Eagle Claw and finally 5) Krav Maga (Israeli Martial Arts, it's actually really hardcore; we call it "Kung-Jew"). I'm thinking to myself: In ten years, I'll be the toughest bitch on the block, if I ever get married and my husband even looks at me funny, I'll fucking kick his ass through the wall!

So I went to my uncle for advice and asked him what the cheapest way to learn all five of my styles were, and how long it would take to get a black belt in all five styles, cuz I wanna kick ass like him, but better. And my uncle said: Martial arts is like school. Some people study many subject and learn a little about a lot. Others have a thing for only one subject and they'll study that single subject through college until they master it and get their doctorate. Which one is master of his art and which isn't? I thought about it for a while and asked: So knowing ten different styles isn't better than knowing one? And my uncle replied: If one guy dedicates 10 years to mastering one style and another guy spends the same amount of time trying to master 10 different styles, which one will get his ass kicked? I said: The second guy. My uncle said: Yeah, just pick one style you can work with and dedicate your time to mastering it.

I thought about what he said for a while then I asked: So if I spend 25 years mastering only one style, that means I'll be a total master and no one would be able to beat me? And my uncle said: No, by the time you master your style, a real master would have made a new style that is more effective than yours. I got confused and I asked: So what's the point in trying to master it, if someone else is gunna come out with a better style? It's like learning to master texting with one hand on your cell phone, only to have a new phone come out the next week that's better?! And my uncle answered: The point is a true master captures and masters the essence of a style, and after many years of real physical combat, knows how to evolve that style to be more effective.

That little lesson of mastering the essence of something and evolve it to make it more effective stuck with me. I use this same principle in school. I pick a subject like and try to master its essence, then work out the bugs and make it better and more effective. And I brought this principle of Mastery with me into the world of religion and eventually into Satanism.

The religion I mastered was Theravada Buddhism. It's become so complicated and fattened up with all these stupid theoretical and philosophical stuff. I just strip it down to its bare essentials: the meditation and the principle of Personal Enlightenment and I dedicate my time and energy to mastering that essence. Then I change it to make it more modern, more relevant, and more effective to my life style and world perspective. In the end, what was once Buddhism, evolves into something that is uniquely mine, to which I am an expert/master in. This is not to say that I am an expert on Buddhism.

When I ventured off to study people who study the “occult” I can’t help but see that same immature approach to “occult” things as my cousins and I were once immature about kung fu styles. It’s like the more books on Chaos magick and black magic grimoires these people collect and read once or twice makes them a super dooper master of the black arts. Many of these people can write a lot about the little they know on the many occult things they devote their time to a massing, and end up sounding like they know “a lot.” But rarely are any fruits or results ever spoken of, if ever.

Satanism, to me was like that. Satanism is populated with all these people who read all these books and collect all these magic grimoire. They love presenting their Satanic resume saying how they spent 15 years studying Satanism, and they make this long list of books they have read, maybe once that helped them on their 15 year journey to becoming a 30 year old vampire look-a-like, and all they have to show for all those years is a closet full of funerary wardrobe, and maybe a sword.

As a Buddhist in secret, I learned to become aware of people and the results of their actions. People can lie to themselves and be in self denial about being stupid, but the fruits of your actions in life is living testimony to the quality and condition of one’s mind, which can’t be hidden. I learned how to see the fruits of labor on a much macrocosmic perspective. I learned to become aware of organizations, nations, religions, and institutions as a living organism or factory and I learned to judge these things based on the fruits of there actions and the people they manufacture. Satanism, from this perspective isn’t very impressive. It has accomplished nothing, and the kinds of people it manufactures are mostly delusional good-for-nothings in life. Satanism has had 40 years to bare fruit and manufacture people. I’ve seen more emotionally healthy people come out of Alcoholics Anonymous; more happy, beautiful people walk out of Jenny Craig; more self-made millionaire come out of Avon; then what Satanism has produced in 40 years. I thought Satanism was a joke and never really paid much attention to it.

Until one day some friends passed me specially selected manuscripts by Anton Long. These friends knew me and how I thought, so they knew which manuscripts to staple together to give to me. I read it and went back to ask my friends: Whose this Long guy, he thinks like me, like he studied the “esoterica” of [my] Buddhism? And that’s how I started studying the ONA, or more accurately the Mind of Anton Long. I am personally more interested in his Mind, how it works, and what it is trying to manifest or create and why; rather than the outer form this Mind has made (the ONA).

I liked the ONA, because of Anton Long. But like Buddhism I took the essence of the ONA and focused my time and energy on it, to eventually evolve it and make it more effective. I am not an expert or “adept” of it and I find it hard to relate to other Initiate of the ONA who are so lost in the outer forms, and still believe that collecting all these grimoires and tomes of wisdom equals being wiser and better. When all the ONA basically is if strips to its most barest of essentials is: to act and bare fruit in the real world; and to gain personal enlightenment from one’s direct experience of life. It perplexes me then when I see so much intellectualization of the ONA. Because how do you intellectualize or even write about a personal experience, the feelings you felt during that experience, and the actions you did? To make it sound intelligent, philosophical, and “satanic?”

To write an essay inspired by thoughts, is very different than from an action that one has done for an experience. How do I intellectualize and “Satanicify” cutting someone with a razor as they are pinned down? The rush, the feel? Or robbing someone for his shoes? Or getting lost in the wood because you are high on shrooms? Or good sex with random people? Or those times when you scored your goal when glamouring to be someone you are not? “Just Do It” is the fundamental essence of what Anton Long tries to say in many of his writings. It’s not about a pursuit of intellectualism or philosophy and theory. It just doing shit and growing from the shit one does. Actually living and experiencing life, rather than just thinking about it or intellectualizing and philosophizing and theorizing about it in writing.

There should be no need to write; debate; discuss; about the ONA. But such things are done. And I know I am guilty of this too. Nearly half of this wordpress is my writing. I’ll try and say that in my writings I try to explain that we should just do things and stop talking about them; but I am only justifying my actions.

Any act, when you preform it in total mindfulness, becomes a deep meditation that take you one step closer to unveiling the mysteries of life. Such an experience and emotional realization can never be expressed fully in written words. I have felt so much and have realized so much from my own personal experiences, most of which I could never articulate in written format; and if I tried it would come out as simple statements which we have all read somewhere before at one time or another. To read and think about something is so much different from emotionally realizing it and being thoughtlessly mindful of it. I can write: “I smelled Kayla’s hair this morning,” and you would never be able to grasp what I felt at that moment or where her smell took me, or how deep her smell took me to that silent nothingness that lays beneath everything.

You come to a certain point when you are on the road to mastering life, where you realizes intelligence... thought, is itself a barrier between you and life. Like the bathing suit, arm puffies and inner tube one wears in a lake to stay a float. You realize that you can’t fully experience life directly until you take all those things off and are immersed in it mindfully lost in the moment. Nothing between you and life but your naked flesh. There is this natural innocence to just experiencing life mindfully without thought (thinking). I often wondered what my pet dog thinks about when he stares into my eyes like a dork. It’s not until you fall in love with someone and lose yourself in her eyes that you realize there is no thought involved. Just a primal feeling, a deep yearning, a rhythm that pulsates with everything around you. How do you put something like that into an intellectual article. When you have experienced life wordlessly, and thoughtlessly, everything else is bullshit. There’s a lot of that going around these days.

II. What Satanism Is Not:

a) Satanism is not, nor can ever be, a religion, nor just a ‘philosophy’. A religion means acceptance of authority, the rigid structure of a ‘Church’ or a ‘Temple’, and a unified dogma (with the consequent schisms and claims to ‘authenticity’). The religious attitude is the antithesis of what Satanism really is – for Satanism is a way of living, a way of experiencing, in the raw, whereas religion abstracts, limits endeavour, behaviour and moralizes. In short, a Satanist plunges into reality, without any supports (moral, psychic or human) whereas a religious person has that reality prescribed by dogma, authority and such like, and is supported by a `Church`, its members and their attitudes. Satanism is an ecstatic affirmation of existence – a taking of existence into new and higher realms, as well as a plunge into existing darkness and the creation of new darkness.

b) Satanism cannot have anyone impose upon it any structure, authority, or institution of any kind by claiming a `dark mandate` or some kind of `revelation`. There can be no such thing as an, `infernal mandate` of whatever kind because the only thing that really matters to Satanism is experience, its accumulation and the highly individualized learning that results from such experience. A genuine Satanist, for example, confronted by an entity which exhibited all the powers attributed to Satan would not even accept what that `entity` said and would most certainly not show any submission – instead, they would a defiance, a reasoned assessment of what was said, and then a judgement made from experience. A Satanist never surrenders to anything – and would rather die, proud and defiant, than submit. This applies even to `Satan`. If and when a Satanist accepts guidance, it is from someone of experience who has explicated Satanism by their life and thus who can offer advice based on that experience. The aim of Satanism is to create wilful, characterful, defiant, unique individuals who have or can fulfil their potential as gods – it is not to create followers or sycophants. An `infernal mandate` implies sycophancy.

c) Satanism does not involve discussions, meetings, talks. Rather, it involves action, deeds. Words – written or spoken – sometimes follow, but not necessarily. The ideal candidate for Satanism is the individual of action rather than the `intellectual`.

By the nature of most Satanic actions, they can seldom be mentioned and thus remain esoteric. The essence that Satanism leads the individual towards, via action, is only ever revealed by that participation which action is. Words, whether written or spoken, can never describe that essence – they can only hint at it, point toward it, and often serve to obscure the essence.

MIND'S QUIVER

Mind's Quiver

"For us, Satanism is all about the creation of proud, strong, characterful, insightful individuals -individuals who have gone beyond the majority and who thus represent a higher type. Genuine Satanic groups do not seek subservient, decadent, weak-willed followers. They seek to create a real elite -almost a new race of beings. Of course, this is not easy..." - An Introduction To Traditional Satanism, Sacramentum Sinistrum; ONA.

Packed like a quiver. Fast and sharp like an arrow. In my culture Wits is valued above intelligence. I guess the best way to describe the difference between the two would be to retell an actual story of an event that happened once. One time a big rig truck passing underneath a freeway bridge got stuck because the truck was the same height as the overpass, but taller enough where that it was very stuck and couldn't move even if the driver stepped on the gas. The city first tried to call a tow truck, but that didn't work. A day later the city collected some intelligent people to solve this problem. All these people had all these ideas, but none of them would work when tried. One person suggested a flame torch be used to cut the entire top portion of the truck off. The city agreed to this idea because it was the most doable. As the city official were getting ready to leave to spend a lot of money on their smart idea a little grade school girl was walking home that day and she had stopped to watch the commotion of adults figuring out how to unstuck a stuck truck. In her grade school ignorance she went up to an adult and said: "Excuse me sir, why don't you guys just take the air out of the tires?"

Unfortunately for the common person, wits can't be learned from a book. You are born with the potential for it, which is expressed by the practice of trying to see things in as many different ways as fast as possible. A good example are atoms. Intelligence would be when a person is able to recall from learning that there are hydrogen atoms, oxygen ones, and carbon ones. Your wits part of your brain kicks in when you can say: "Yes, and if you make a mickey mouse out of hydrogen and two oxygen you get water. If we put a pair of oxygen with carbon we can carbon dioxide, 3 Oxygen atoms makes Ozone, hydrogen and carbon makes hydrocarbon molecules, and so on." But with this atom analogy we can all say Pshh I knew that. Why did you know that? Because you learned it in school. The question is can you tap into that same part of your brain/Mind and use it on random everyday things to see them in as many ways [perspectives] as possible in as fast as you can? To be able to look at something and be on your toes about it and just flow a stream of insights from what you are looking at? In Buddhism we have the word for Understanding which is Buddhi, and we have a word which describes this Mind's element of wits or cleverness which is Panya [Pan~n~a]. In Pali and Pali vernaculars that word remains meaning a sly wits or cunning cleverness. In Sanskrit [Prajna] it means Wisdom. But since the Buddha used Pali and forbade his ideas to be morphed via the Sanskrit we should as Theravadins stick with the Pali.

For instance if I gave you the word "Black," how many different ways can you look at that word where you can give me a stream of insights off the top of your head, just from that one word. That's Panya. Black is the color of the cosmos. The cosmos is infinitely mysterious. Black is mystery and the unfathomable unknowable. Black absorbs light and transforms it into heat. Black symbolizes the transformation of theory into Fruit. Black is the color of fertile soil. Black is Life. Black from the Old English Root Blac meaning Bright, Shining, Shimmering, Illuminating, a glittering or sparkle. Black in Arabic [Fem/Fam] is also the word for Wisdom and Knowledge. Black is the Ka'aba at the holy city of Mecca. Black is the Qibla. Wisdom is the Qibla and the Ka'aba, the "house" of Allah and the direction our heart's compass should always point. Black is the vault of Heaven which displays its stellar mysteries at night when mundanes sleep. Only those Awake, when the mundane is asleep, Sees the mystery of Heaven hidden in the Dark.

You take that same element of Mind and do what the Buddha did. Go out into the forest [nature] and read the Book of Nature. Just as Buddha sat down to meditate by a stream and drew up a stream of insights from watching the river, can you use panya to draw up insights from that stream like he did? Because if you can, then you end up with something called Sambuddhi meaning Self-Enlightened or Understanding by one's Self effort. Because when you or Buddha sits alone at that river, minus all the Vedas and Brahmins, and the people and their beliefs and opinions, and you can draw up from the depth of your own psyche or unconscious, insights unlocked by that river, then who gave you those insights? You yourself. And where did you get those insights from? From Nature Herself directly, the First, Primary/Primal Source.

-Al-Awrah-

The Catholic Theologian Raimon Panikker said once: “I left Europe as a Christian, I discovered I was a Hindoo, and returned as a Buddhist without ever having ceased to be a Christian.” The older I get, the less conscious chattering I do in mind, and the more I learn to See with the Heart/Chitta, the more I understand what Raimon Panikker was saying. These “outer forms” – whatever they may be – are like wine skins, in which – as the Great Rumi would say – is the same Divine Wine. Many of us young in soul, our eyes get lost in the intricate detailing and designs of such wine skins. Some of us, old in spirit, yearn for the wine within. “And their Hearts are sealed, so that they apprehend not.” – Holy Quran 9:87

Even from something as lifeless as a desert, I can squeeze from it that mystic Wine. The desert is one of the reasons why I have a secret love for Islam. Not really for its superficial mainstream teachings. But for the desert it was born from. For the beauty of the desert, and what I see in that desert. For the beauty of its mysticism.

In such a lifeless place, where even water is scarce, what little water is present, what little life there is, is precious. Not a superficial preciousness, but being someone who lives in such a desert, it is a preciousness that one’s Life depends on, and is indissolubly connected too. What little the desert gives is Heartfully cherished. And in that desert, where there is so little to possess and have, our own people – family, kin – is most precious, in this desert, without whom, we would die. With so little ‘décor’ to dress this desert up, it is our music, singing, dance, our relationships – our culture and tradition – that gives life and dressing to this desert. The lifelessness of the desert causes the few people living in such desert to Need each other. The adversarial essence of Life – this desert – in essence, draws out the precious Nature in each person and drop of water we Need. And so I see the causal universe to also be like a desert. Against the background of a vast lifeless blackness, is an oasis of Life. An oasis in which our many peoples, our many cultures, and traditions colors the world. Anyone who has seen this oasis in its sea of blackness who does not feel within the presence of the Great Creator is truly dead inside and hearblind.

I can never be an atheist or a materialist. But I have no real need anymore to try and convince others to see and feel things as I do. I used to, once, when I was more immature. But now, I understand life to be a big art gallery full of paintings. I once in my immaturity tried hard to make those standing around me see these painting the way I did. But now I've learned to just silently appreciate these painting inside myself. And I've learned to Listen to others share how they see and feel for these paintings. Then sometimes when I stand in front of these paintings, someone may come by and express as best as they can their inner sight for these paintings, which are my own. In that effortless moment of meeting a kindred soul, there is a genuine appreciation of having met them. You see there is Something present beneath all these painting in this gallery most are blind to, in their fixations within their samsara. In each painting, the Artist silently screams – yearns – to be known, appreciated, adored. And so, beneath each leaf and star, each galaxy and rain drop – each person we are – the Divine Artist screams to be known, appreciated, adored in Its Secret Place.

The distractions and abstractions of this – our urbanize reality – draws our attention away from the silent screams of the Cosmic Artist onto these trinkets of ideas, these lofty theories, these great opinions, the gibbering of the great multitude jabbering about dead men and their dead words they once wrote. And in this prison of dead words, dead men, dead ideas, dead stone, and dead pavement, we say to ourselves: Here in this world we have made, we see no Cosmic Artist or sign of a Divine Essence. For all we see in this world of our own making are our own thoughts and our own reflection. And they – the mundane anariya – call this world of their own thoughts and reflection: reality, and truth. As if to say that the Natural world – the universe – were made of English words and the interpretations of such words we think in.

Show us, they say. If God exists then show us. What does it look like they ask. They look for a look. Like that old saying that goes: “If horses could draw, their gods would look like horses.” Horses searching the world for sign of god, looking for a horse hiding inside the world and sky. Yet these horse brained mundanes still believe themselves to be great and intelligent in their opinion. So they opine. They forget that their own causal existence did not begin with a look or a something showable. It began as the passion between two people. Can you point point a finger at Love and Passion? The world came into being – so said the ancients – when Shiva embraced Shakti, and out of their passion arose the World and Kamadeva. You can't point to Love or see it. It has no look or form to stare at. But it has an Essence that can be Felt with the Heart, Chitta, the Soul. And we can see it's byproducts and influence on the World and people. We can't see the Cosmic Being, and it has no look. But it can be experienced and felt, just like Tao and Wu Wei cannot be seen or understood with the intellect but they can be felt and experienced and we can see the byproduct and influenced they have on the World and on people. If we would just quiet the chattering and reasonings of the conscious mind, and allow ourselves to experience the Numinous – the Sacred/Divine – then the very Formless Essence of the Cosmic Chitta has been felt.

These horse brained dummies being stupid and superficial will ask, well how does passion or love make the universe. That's an example stupid. An example of an Essence felt which you cannot see but feel like love or hate. You can't see hate, but you can experience it and see its influence. You can't see Time either, but we know its there. We can feel it, experience it, and we can see its influence in us and our world. These horse brained anariya being stupid will ask, okay but how does an “essence” such as the Numinous or something sacred create something with substance? How does the formless manifest the form? When these horse brained dummies ask questions what they are saying is they need you to spoon feed them because they can't figure things out on their own. When they disagree it is most often only because they have a security blanket opinion they can't let go of out of comfort.

The answer is how does the formless force of attraction manifest Form? By drawing two things together. How does formless temperature manifest a destructive hurricane? By drawing hot and cold air together in certain conditions which produces the spin of air and energy. There is a formless essence unseen in the cosmos which causes things to come together to become form. We call this Creation and being born. There is a formless essence which pulls the form apart back into the formless. We call this deterioration, dilapidation, and aging or Time. The Original state of “Things” is Formlessness, not form. Everything arises from a formless essence, and in “Time” reverts back to that Original State. Tao is not the Original State. Tao moves and flows. Stop Tao from moving and flowing and bring Tao back to its Original state of Rest/Inertia and what do you have? Wu Wei. Tao arises from Wu Wei, meaning “Without-Act/Cause.” The causal universe is not the original state of things. It moves and flows. Stop that movement. Stop every atoms from spinning. Stop the quanta from fluxing. Stop the quarks from flickering. Stop the dance of Shiva and Shakti. Bring everything back to its state of Rest and what you have is the Original State of “Things.” We can closely watch water turn to ice and ice turn back to water and come to realize that something formless called “temperature” is behind the Cause/Act. In the same way is there “Something” unseen – unseeable – within that Restful Chaos which Causes the movement and draws things together if we look hard enough with the “eye” of chitta: our Primal Unconscious, Ayin al-Qalb. [Note: Awrah is sometimes spelled as Owrah. I prefer Al Owrah].

That infinite stillness is like a vast desert of sand dunes at night. Somewhere in that desert is an oasis teeming with Life. You sit there at that oasis and patiently watch. Somehow that little spring of water has the power to draw all that needs it to its wellspring in Time, to drink of it. It is our Thirst – Yearning – which Draws us to the Beloved: the Divine. But shhh: Cast not your pearls before swine.

“He is the real Sadhu, who can reveal the form of the Formless to the vision of these eyes:

Who teaches the simple way of attaining Him, that is other than rites or ceremonies:

Who does not make you close the doors, and hold the rath, and renounce the world:

Who teaches you to be still in the midst of all your activities.

Ever immersed in bliss, having no fear in his mind, he keeps the spirit of union in the midst of all enjoyments.

The infinite dwelling of the Infinity Being is everywhere: in earth, water, sky, and air:

Firm as the thunderbolt, the seat of the seeker is established above the void.

He who is within is without: I see Him and none else.” – Songs of Kabir; LVI, by Rabindranath Tagore

-Al-Khanzir-

My grandmother does not eat beef due to her ancestral Brahmanist ways. I wondered why cows were sacred to Hindus and Brahminism, so I asked her once why she does not eat cows. My grandmother answered something like: “Just the sentiments of an old woman is all. I was born and raised in a much different country than you grand daughter. Back in the home country of my youth I was raised seeing cattle be put to work hard day and night out in our fields. The hard labour of cows is what tills our land, helps sow our seeds, their fertilizer nurtures our crops, and so the food we ate which in turn gives us Life, came from the hard labour of those cows. In silent appreciation for their hard labour, I don’t eat them. I just don’t have the heart to eat them.”

I have a religious aunt who does not eat all meat. She only eats vegetables. I asked her once why she won’t eat meat, if the Buddha died eating beef that was poisoned. She said something to me like: “That’s the Buddha. I’m me. I once ate meat when I was ignorant of how the meat actually is made in my heart. Then one day I watched a television show which showed animals being killed at a slaughterhouse. I just heard the screaming and stopped eating meat ever since.”

My little mom eats everything. She loves chicken and pork. She was eating meat at the table once and rather enjoying herself and I said: “You know auntie doesn’t eat meat because those poor animals get killed and scream. I can’t imagine what horror and sheer pain the animals you’re eating went through little mom. Don’t you feel bad?” My little mom said, still eating the chicken wing: “Who cares. I need to live, damn! Are you gonna eat that?” But that didn’t satisfy my manipulative nature. So one day I tricked her into watching a documentary on slaughterhouses to watch pigs get processed and scream. I just told her it was for a school report on a documentary we pick and I said that the doc I picked was on the art and science of raising healthy pigs, and that I needed her help. Which wasn’t a lie. I just withheld certain information. So she sat there to watch the doc with me. At first she was comfortable and ready to taking notes. But soon she got very uncomfortable and was watching with her hand covering her mouth and a pillow shielding her solar plexus. That’s an unconscious gesture we do when we are uneasy or afraid or uncomfortable, we cover our solar plexus. Sometimes you’ll cross your arms over your plexus to shield it. At house parties you can pick the boys that feel uneasy in social situations or uneasy around girls by looking for the ones who use their beer cans or bottles to cover their plexus. The boys who are very comfortable with their masculinity and are in their element and looking for girls are the ones who hold their bottles nonchalantly to the side barely holding it fully exposing their plexus.

So I was feeling happy – in an wicked way – secretly inside as I was watching my little mom show signs of extreme discomfort. Inside my mind I was thinking: “That’ll teach her to eat meat.” There is a part in the doc where they show the worker take a rod and beat the pigs head. The pigs fall and convulse squealing. I myself ate meat. I just wanted to see if I can make her not eat meat. Then when the pigs fall the workers get a chain saw device and cut the pigs’ neck and blood gushes out everywhere on the floor as its legs are still twitching. My little mom wacked my head with a sofa pillow and ran to the restroom and I heard her vomit. She went to the kitchen to get a bottle of water and she walks back in laughing and says to me: “You are evil girl! I’m never eating meat again! I’ve never seen anything like that before in my life!” I gave a loud victorious laugh and was jumping around since I couldn’t contain my sadistic excitement, and she says: “Keep laughing and you’re grounded.” I thought I won, but the very next day she was eating pork. I said: “I thought you said you weren’t gonna eat meat any more?” She goes: “I’m over it. You lose.”

Have you ever heard the expression: “You are what you eat?” It’s actually a very accurate statement on a biological level. What we consume gets broken down into its basic components and via the small intestines these components gets absorbed into your blood stream to be used to assimilate into your body, replenish supplies of vitamins, sugars, and proteins, and so forth. So you what you consume literally becomes you. This is not to say that you transform in nature into a chicken or cow. But it does end up meaning that whatever chemicals and hormones were used in what you ate, gets absorbed by your body. Usually this stuff is stored in your fat layer, and only later in when for some reason your body has to absorb or consume that fat layer do the chemicals begin to effect you.

This was most likely the case with the 1981 break out of the Immuno-Deficiency Syndrome phenomenon. Just one generation [circa 40 years] before this date, it was very popular in the 50’s and 60’s to use a pesticide called DDT at pool parties as mosquito replant. People in positions of “authority” and the companies that made the stuff said that DDT was very safe and healthy. Later in the 80’s I think all of these sea gulls became very sick and were laying dud eggs with soft shells. People couldn’t figure out what was going on, until it was learned that the pesticide DDT used in farms had contaminated the blood stream of these birds. DDT was discontinued and coincidentally we start to see the first cases of our human immune system malfunctioning and not even working.

I'm very sure our organic immune system is very sensitive to toxic chemicals of different sorts. In regards to the so called AIDS epidemic in Africa, I'd like to see paperwork and record of every mining operation that took place in Africa by Europeans looking for gold, silver, etc. Mercury is used in such mining. I'd like to know if there is a correlation between what toxic chemicals used in the ravishing of Africa and the so called AIDS pandemic the current people of Africa now suffer from. I'd also like to see all paperwork of the man made chemicals used in pharmaceutical drugs made by these drug companies make and test on Africans. Not many of your average dummie in America and rich countries know that Africa is the world's guinea pig when it comes to testing out new drugs. Essentially what I am asking is: What's really killing Africa? Why is this human population is such an acute state of deterioration? Is there a correlation between their high levels of deterioration with the high levels of past and present exploitations of Africa? Don't give me that fucking AIDS shit and brush everything else under the rug. That slight of hand trick might appease the generic commoner, but it don't fly with me. You can't trick a trickster.

As I was researching on orphanages once I stumbled upon a weird case which took place in the 70's I think. All of these orphans in one city had become sick and were dying. This was dismissed at the time by officials as anything to be alarmed about. But later this sickness spread across the state. It became that orphans across the whole state had caught some disease and were dying in droves. All these officials became alarmed fearing it could be a viral born epidemic that would spread into general population. All these doctors and scientists came out of the woodwork and nodded their heads, waving their authoritative conclusions stating that it was a new Virus infecting orphanages. The officials call all of their smart people to figure out how this Virus spreads so as to keep it from infecting general population. So far, the Virus seemed to only kill orphaned children for some bizarre reason. They figured the Virus was in the food the children were eating or carried in by bugs or mice or pests.

Then one day a nutritionist came out and rejected the story and hysteria of the officials and their scientists. This nutritionist said that it wasn't a Virus killing these kids but malnutrition. The state went on a war campaign with this blasphemer, then the whole nation teamed up against this nutritionist. They demonized and vilified this person who lost their job. But this person spent several years collecting proof to show that it was not a Virus. Finally after going through hell, this nutritionist proved that it wasn't a virus. The state changed the diet of the orphanages and gave the children actual healthy food, and the mysterious disease vanished ever since. Naturally this embarrassing incident is not well known. But basically we do become, or are affected by what we consume into ourselves in a very real way.

I stopped eating pig meat several years ago. Not because of any dietary law, but because of – I guess you can say – mystical practice with esoteric or symbolical reasons. As a personal way to show my solidarity to what I believe in. PIG stands for: "People Ignorant of God." The pig is the living symbol of the Homo Hubris, the Pigman. That stupid generic, all too common breed, of ignorant fools blind to everything but their own reflection and projection of ego.

The Pig represents that breed of White people we call Homo Hubris, who are ignorant of God, who are dead to their Original indigenous roots and culture. Not every White person is a PIG. Just your common generic American who have no roots, folk, culture, and who lack a knowledge, wisdom, and understanding of the Divine Essence in Nature and themselves. It's skin is Pink. It is Domesticated and breed to be used.

No pink skinned pig exists out in Nature. In nature the animal closest to a domesticated pig is called a Boar. Boars don't have soft pink hairless skin. They are Black and different shades of Black. Boars have hair, and big sharp tusks. You chase after a pig and they run and squeal in fear. Just like the white devil is fearful of everything it doesn't understand. In the wild, you run and squeal when a boar chases you with its big tusks. Those wild boars exist in tune to mother nature. In tune to the flow of nature they are a part of. The pig is unnatural. It has been selectively breed in farms for only the use of meat. Those farms have nothing to do with nature. They are man made [selective breeding] and the pig is purposefully bred and domesticated for a reason. Wild boars and wild pigs in nature live together in packs and family groups. Domesticated Pigs are slowly individualized by their farmers and segregated. Wild boars have a nature-born culture and way of life. The domesticated pig's only way of life is the matrix of its farm. Boars eat living food from nature. Domesticated pigs eat garbage and the leftovers of others. Just like how the white devil kills off Indians, then takes their land and leftover folk culture and ancestral wisdom.

You are what you eat. Remember that shit. When you partake of the PIG nature of these generic White Hubris America Mundanes, their lack of a connection with nature and others, their ignorance and respect of anything sacred, their lack of real ancestral roots, cultures, traditions: you BECOME that PIG you ate. Because you are what you fucking consume! If you consume their pig liberalism, their pig politricks, their pig materialism, their pig world-views, their pig nuclear family structures: You are yourself a PIG, the spawn of a domesticated unnatural creature bred to be used and exploited by their overlords.

And I'm not talking about Europeans, Slavs, and Russians. Those people have their ancient ancestral roots, ancestral cultures, and we know their blood runs deep. We know they each have a history that goes a thousand years in the past. It's you common white American dumbfucks that are the PIG's. So don't try and call me a racist. I am a "Breeder" in the sense that I discriminate against you as a Breed of people.

If I had things my way. Or rather, when I get things my way, this ONA will have nothing to do with you pigs. I will not stoop so low as to be a "peer" with a pig. You pigs have your own pig satanism to wallow in. Keep your Hurbis asses out of my turf. This ONA is reserved for Noble Folk. Noble Bred. Cultured. With Tradition. Those who conserve their history, ancestral identities, roots, heritage, and who are determined to pass what they conserve to their children. Those who feel the Numinous. Whose Hearts is still living enough to appreciate the Sacred. Those whose roots runs deep into the earth and nature, and whose blood elevates above the generic commoner. Who in their right minds wants to be like these White Hubris American Mundanes? It blows my mind away sometimes thinking about it.

Do your blood and future children, and future civilization a favour and keep them away from this Hubris domesticated breed of humans. Those pigs are the Enemy. They are the fools that get jobs as cops. They are the ones who become the law makers. And we know our "law makers" up in Washington are performing some big Corporate fellatio. But don't call those guys lobbyists now. According to Gingrich they are now called "Historians," and "Consultants," who provide Council. It would be funny if it weren't unfortunate, that these pigs believes the corporate orgy up in Washington is actual politics. Like those politicians really care about them. These pigs are the ones that become members of pig religions and pig philosophical systems. The ONA Mythos of Vindex remember talks about Vindex coming to war with this Hurbis breed. I'm just helping better identify them by giving them a n easy to remember demonym: PIG. People Ignorant of God. People Ignorant of God-nature. People Ignorant of Godhood. Vindex is our symbol of our disgust for this Hubris breed and their Magian overlords.

Mark my words: You cannot trust the Word/Wyrd of a person who has no feel for, appreciation of, respect or honour for The Sacred or Divine or Numinous. Because these people only trust and venerate their own egos. And we know the ego changes as it ages and changes with the passing of opinions and ideations. These pigs cannot be ever trusted when they give an oath, a vow, or a promise. They may mean it in that moment, but as soon as their all important ego changes, they will turn against you.

In my culture the old people tell us that you cannot ever trust a person who has no parents, or who was raised without family. Because in their adult years, because they have never known familial life, familial need, familial cooperation, they will turn on you. You make friends with these cultureless and famililess people and they will one day turn on you, because they do not know what a folk or family, or comrade is. You marry one of these pretz [pretas] and they will step on you and turn against you because it is not in their inner nature to know you – empath you – as their folk, kin, blood comrade, brother, sister, family. These illbred Hubris pig can't even get along with their own mothers and brothers let alone dedicate their lives to them. They live only for themselves. You put such a breed of people in a government and ask yourself what kind of politicians you will have. You put this rootless pigs in priesthood of religions and ask yourself what you will have? Kids getting raped. They don't care if those kids are yours. They don't "know" you. It's not in their nature to "know" you as their kin. They owe nothing to you. They will turn on you. They are pigs.

They will turn on your religious institutions. You have but to look at something Satanism as a new social phenomenon that emerged during the 60's and 70's as a coherent memplex. In the beginning were three institutions: the Church of Satan, the ONA, and the Temple of Set. Each of these three codified institutions have their own well constructed form of Satanism. Each new member of these three institutions adopted what has been established. There is thus a Conservative nature to these three institutions.

Then you get the common deadhead pigs infiltrating Satanism. And what do we see? We see a gradual decomposition – as in a body decomposing – of the Conservative Satanism Memplex. We see every dumbfuck pig start up his own satanic church, name himself his own high priest, go off on retarded tangents and develop his own “true” satanism. And 50 years later you take a look around this subculture of Satanism and you see the majority are the liberal – not belonging to a conservative social order – modern and theistic satanists who each can't agree on what satanism is any more because they each insist and demand that their own individual opinions, thoughts, and definitions is the true and glorious one. These pigs will not only turn on you, they will turn on your religions by fucking them up. Don't believe me? Take 10 theistic satanists and ask them to teach you about their satanism. You will get 10 very fucked up and retarded satanisms.

Don't eat “PIG.” Don't consume their Hubris Nature. Don't partake of their Hubris ways of life. Don't consume their Hubris abstractions. Stay away from these pig, and keep them out of what you uphold to be valuable. Cast not your pearls before swine. Keep them out of ONA and in their pig pens. Let's at least try to keep the ONA unsoiled by their shit. And again when I say PIG I mean specifically the White Hubris American Mundane, the Homo Hubris, bred and domesticated in America who are under the spiritual or psychological control of what we call Magian Ethos. Those are our Enemies. They are the ones that animates and give life to the Nation-State, to religion, pedo-priesthoods, to generic common mentality and outlook. If we don't learn to keep our children away from this despicable breed, our children will become one of them.

I know there are a lot of illiterate people out there who will misunderstand what I have said and get upset. By illiterate I mean just because you can sound out words spelled on a screen or book does not mean you comprehend what you are reading. You are hence illiterate. For instance I can perfectly read Greek letters and make the sounds, but I don't know what the hell I'm reading. I can perfectly read and write with the Russian alphabets, but I don't know don't know shit about the words and sounds I am saying. So I know many of you will get upset. Just know that if you are Noble – Arya/Ariya – whose roots runs deep, then regardless of skin color, we're kinfolk. More realistically then you might think.

One out of ever 200 people on earth are genetically related to Genghis Khan. Do the Math. He was around in the 1300's. That's 900 years ago, and 1 out of every 200 humans on earth are his spawn. How many emperors, empresses, kings, queens, and noble blooded people before Genghis Khan have existed and for how many centuries back in history? I don't know how the Sanskrit people interpret their word “Arya,” but I can say with a certain amount of confidence that the Pali word “Ariya” properly translated should be “Aristocratic,” meaning Noble, Civilized, Cultured. Anariya means “Common,” “Peasant,” and “Barbarian.” Unfortunately over the centuries those words have been clouded by spiritualists. But all you have to do is go trace these two words and their meaning back to a nonsectarian relative of Pali and Sanskrit like Iranian and you'll get the same basic meaning.

What do you think the actual root in the name Iran is? Iran is the ancient foundation of the ancient Babylonian and Persian empires. It's a place of great kings and human history influenced by the Noble Blooded. Alexander the Great was connected to this civilization back in the day. If Aryan to you means White, then be proud of that shit and your ancestry. If Ariya to you [and me] means Noble and Aristocratic then be proud of that shit. Just don't consider those common generics to be your peers. Otherwise you stoop down to their level. The opinions and thought of one common mundane anariya should be completely meaning less to an arya/ariya bred person. You are above them, not on the level with them. They're not our peers. They are peasants, with the mentality and brain capacity of a common peasant. Is that your peer? Are you saying the ideas, thoughts, and opinions of a common peasant affects you and influences you? What does that say about you? One king is above the millions of his kingdom's citizenry and their thoughts and opinions. And you allow one single peasant to affect and influence you? Thank about it.

-Al-Ikhwaan-

I heard a story once in Khmer that went: there was a time when the God Shiva had taken the form of a hermit living on the top of a mountain. In Khmerized Pali these wild hermits or ascetics are sacred and are called Isa, pronounced as “Eysey,” the -ey sounding like it does in the word “They.”

As time past rumor had spread in the local village at the foot of the mountain that this wild man was the Lord Shiva. And so three men set out to climb the mountain to learn the divine wisdom of the universe from the wild ascetic.

The first man one day makes it up to the peak and prostrates himself before the unkempt hermit and said: “Old man, rumor has it that you are Lord Shiva. I’ve come to be your student. Go ahead and teach me, if your are Lord Shiva. Let’s see what you got.”

The old man said: “You see that cliff over there? Jump off it and kill yourself.”

The first man laughed at the old man and left the mountain to return home calling the ascetic a crazy fool.

One day the second man climbs up to the peak of the mountain and prostrates himself before the old man and says: “Old man, I hear from the local villagers that you are Lord Shiva. Please accept me as your student and enlighten me. I will venerate you as my guru and God.”

The old man said: “You see that cliff over there? Jump off it and kill yourself.”

The second man believing it was a test did not jump off the cliff and had the resolve to stay by the old man’s side for a year. Until one day after the year of worship, the second man said to the old man: “I’ve been by your side for 1 whole years worshipping you as God Shiva and serving you. And you’ve given me nothing! I wasted my time with you old fool!” He walks away angry.

One day the third man came up to the top of the mountain and prostrated himself before the old man and said: "Old man, the people below say that you are Lord Shiva. I want to be your student. Please teach me."

The old man said: "You see that cliff over there? Jump off it and kill yourself."

The third man got up and walked to the edge of the cliff, said to the old man: "In my next life, I will come back and ask you again, and again, and again." And he jumped off.

As soon as the man jumped the old man transformed into Shiva and caught him in the air, bringing him back to the top of the mountain. Grateful for being saved from death the third man prostrates himself. The Lord Shiva said to the man: "Sit with me. I'll teach you." The End.

Traffic

I was thinking about this story because a couple days ago I re-watched a movie called Traffic. It's an old movie about a Mexican drug cartel based in Tijuana. The two important guys in the movie were these two petty cops, a short one and a tall one. I can't remember their names.

The movie starts off with the two of them waiting in the Mexican desert. Soon a big truck drives by and the two cops stops the truck. They make the peasant looking drivers open the back of the truck and bricks of cocain are discovered. The two cops puts the drovers into their car.

All of a sudden these black SUV drives up to them and the Mexican army comes out of the black SUV's and hold the two cops at gun point. They said that they would take care of the truck from there. This one old General comes up to the tall cop who was driving and asked him questions about how a petty local cop knew about the truck. The tall cop said a bird told him.

I really like the old General. The movie was about the tall cop gradually being drawn into the criminal underworld, and the General was manipulating him into it, at first to use him for little jobs. To gain a trust for him. The tall cop does his small jobs with his friend the short cop.

At the end of the movie the short cop thinks suggests to his tall partner that they can make a lot of money selling the information they knew to the DEA in America who wants to stop this cartel. The tall guy stops his car and looks at his friend in the eye and says that they are not going to say anything to anybody. Nothing else was said, but you can feel the tall guy said that out of a real concern for both of their lives.

Unfortunately the short guy crossed the boarder to go tell. The General's men catches him in America before he rats and throws him in their car to drive them him back to Mexico to kill him. In the car with him was his partner the tall cop, who was handcuffed to the car like his short and dumb friend. Both of them were going to be killed for snitching.

In the Mexican desert the two bad guys at gun point make the two cops dig their own graves. When the graves were dug the two cops were told to turn around, so they both turned around. The two bad guys each stood behind each of the cops and points their guns at their heads.

The trigger was pulled and the short one falls in his grave while the tall one was held in a bear hold as the guy holding him said: "It's over Javi [that's his name!], it's over." In the car Javi was silent, guess he felt bad for his best friend. The two bad guys told him: "We went through the same thing. It's how the old man [the General] works. We had to put you through it to see if we can trust you. Now we trust you. From now on, we're Family."

Brainstorm

I was jogging in the afternoon a day after I watched the movie. There's a place by my house where there is a giant park with these sidewalks and jog ways and horse trails canopied with big Eucalyptus trees all around. It's a cool and beautiful place to jog.

I do my business thinking when I jog around this place several rounds. So as I was jogging I was thinking about the internet and the cyber medium.

I had read an article by an scientist who said that he was concerned with how we were transferring all of our data from paper onto things like email, e-books, and storing our stuff on computers. The scientist said that this medium does not last long like paper does and he warns that as a civilization we can't become to dependent on unloading all of our information into such a ephemeral medium.

I was thinking about the internet and what I remember of this scientists warning because I was trying to figure out a better way of storing the ONA for a future people and future time.

I found the internet in 2004 which was when I was on Myspace. Since then I have seen literally dozens of these Satanist "organizations" set themselves up on Myspace or some other website. They huff and puff for a year or two. Then poof, they vanish off the face of the earth. Many of these internet groups leave their writings behind, but these writings are forgotten. And they all leave cyberspace without out ever leaving a substantial mark in the real world, or in the minds of people. Most of us can't even name 3 of such dead organizations.

I have all of these USB flash drives which I use to archive every ONA thing I can find. But after researching I learn that these flash drives only last for ten years and/or 1000 insertions before they must be replaced.

As I was jogging I was trying to brainstorm of other mediums I can use that lasted longer. Paper based books I thought. Nah. Books get lost and damaged. They won't serve my aeonic purpose. Not in the time span I am thinking of. I can risk having books lost or water damaged.

So I asked myself how the ancients did this? I have my native Buddhism to give me an answer. Theravada Buddhism has been around for 2,500 years and the bulk of the entire tradition is past down orally. Every so often all of these very old monks from different sanghas around the Theravada world meet up at different Wats and they lock themselves up for weeks. You know what they do for the week? The monks by memory recite orally the entire Tipitaka together: all 25,000 pages worth while secretaries write down each word to compile a "new" agreed upon version of the Tipitaka. This makes it so that each of the Theras [Elder Monks] leaves to their respective countries with the same Tipitaka in Pali. If at such recital meeting the different sanghas have different wordings or such the Theras go around the group to figure out how to correct the difference. The point to all this is that the written text itself is not the authoritative foundation that dictates what the Theras should teach. It is the other way around. It is what the Theras as a collective [sangha] Remember out of their Mind that dictates what will be written in the new set of volumes of the Tipitaka [40 volumes currently]. Once the new set of volumes is done, the old set is discarded. This is a little aspect of Southeast Asian Buddhism that is not really known about in the West.

This naturally got me to think about the much older oral tradition of the Vedas. Circa 5000 years old! The aural tradition goes way before it was ever written down even. And incredibly that entire massive memplex has been able to survive to this day.

I was thinking to myself how funny and pretentious it was for these satanists in the West to talk shit about something like Brahmanism [Hinduism] which has been around for 5000 years and manifested entire civilizations, and we have these punk satanists in the West with their websites and cyber cults only last huffing and puffing for a year?! As a Buddhist I am taught to judge the Fruit or End Result and not what is said or done. We can talk shit all day huffing and puffing, and many of us can try to do shit [action/kammanta], but few ever manifest the Fruit to show and prove their shit. Whatever Brahmanism and Buddhism has been doing has proven itself to work.

In that respect, I'd rather have the ONA follow the example of what has been proven to work by the Fruit/Vipaka. Fuck the words, ideas, and deeds.

So I'm thinking to myself: "Okay. What do I have to do here? First let me break this down into bite sizes and figure out what exact is happening or going on." What is actually being passed from Brahmin to Brahmin or Thera to Thera.

What's going on is something called a "memplex" is being passed from brain to brain. What's a memplex? A complex of memes. A meme is the Idea of a "Pine Tree" for example. By itself, that Pine Tree meme lacks the ability to travel or stick in the mind. Memes needs traveling companions. You peg that Pine Tree meme with other memes like Decoration, Presents, a feast, peg all of it to a season, and add the Christmas Carol meme to that and you have a Memplex which has been observed from generation to generation since the Roman Saturnalias. The more buddies a meme has, the better it is able to spread and stick in the mind. But we look at the more successful thousand year old memplexes and we see that there are tricks to the trade. Some Idea-memes are often pegged to real world things such as seasons, objects, rites, etc. An example would be to take the "Superiority" meme. By itself it lacks the power to influence and spread. It's just an idea. Peg that same idea to a Skin Color, and what do you have?

So the answer I got was to pass the ONA down as a memplex, but to over time make sure this ONA memplex is constructed right where many of the idea-memes are pegged to real world things, to rites, rituals, chants, anything that is tangible and real. The second thing I figure I'd need are the right kind of people.

I was jogging around thinking to myself how I will find people to pass this memplex. I can do it like how Jesus said: cast them like a farmer casting seeds. If one person is fertile the seed will germinate. But after thinking about this I figured this was an nonconstructive idea aeonically, because we would be investing in chance. Jesus gave me my second option. I remember once in the Bible Jesus had told Peter out in the desert that he [Jesus] will teach Peter how to be a "Fisher of men." I remember watching a Jesus movie I liked. I think it was the Last Temptation or something. I remember watching Jesus sit from a distance just observing and watching Peter cast his net for awhile. Almost as if to study Peter to see if Peter [or whoever it was] had what it took.

This idea of being a Fisher of Men caused me to ask how would I fish for the right kind of person I need? I don't want any person curious in ONA to come ask me to give them ONA. I can't rely on that. I need someone or a few someones, who has what it takes to carry ONA for a full generation and pass this ONA memplex down. How do I find these right types? First of all what type am I looking for? I'm looking for someone like myself. This is because being me, I know myself better than any other person. And personally I know I can keep up the Anton Long relay race for as long as I can.

So this was when everything all fell into place in my head. I suddenly remembered the movie Traffic I had watched the other day, where Javi was manipulated, used, put to work, and tested to see if he had what it took to be Family. This got me to remember the Shiva story.

In the Shiva story the second guy was dedicated and wanted to be Shiva's student enough where he dedicated 1 years to worshipping the old ascetic. But that wasn't enough. I can't rely on someone just dedicated. I need to find a Protege, someone with the same nature as me. And the only way to do this is by putting the person through tests.

Testing People

There's this zen story which is often told regarding this subject. One day as a monk was bathing in a lake a guy walks by and seeing the monk went into the lake and said to the monk: "Teacher, I seek enlightenment, please teach me what you know, I'll be your student."

The monk says: "Go away. You're bothering me."

Thinking this was a test the man decided to show he can hang around and wait patiently.

The monk turns around, grabs the guy's head, and sits on it trying to drown the guy. The guy struggles to break free to get air. When he finally breaks free he says: "You crazy fool! I humbled myself and was willing to make you my teacher and you try to kill me."

And the monk said: "Unless you desire enlightenment as much as you desired air in that water, you will never get it. Thus, you are wasting my time. Go away."

The first person to teach me and show me things about testing people was a man and friend of the family named Gino. I met Gino back when I was still in high school over at a business a grandfather of mine owned with his partners. The business was a plant that made polyurethane wood. I sometimes was put to work at the front desk during summer break or the weekends. The actual business itself was divided into two different buildings. The office where me, grandpa and the partners were at, and across the street [cul de sac] out of the office window can be seen the Plant half of the business which was a place I wasn't allowed to go to since it had all of these toxic chemicals and forklifts, etc.

Gino was half Italian and half Scottish, and he spoke with a Scottish accent, from that one city, what's it called, Glasscow. The 4 partners were two older aged White Americans, my grandpa [great uncle] who is Thai, and then Ted the chief engineer who was a very gentle and laid back older Englishman with white hair. In the past Ted used to go around different countries and help them build nuclear plants. He retired and had the idea of making faux wood which he encountered during his travels in Japan where there is a huge market for that stuff. So he collected his old engineering friends together to see if they were interested in trying to get this idea going. Unfortunately the idea proved over the years to be a great cause of huge debt for everybody. After 4 years, when the plant finally learned to make the faux wood, it was sold to investors in Wisconsin in haste to paid for the giant debt. In the end everybody involved barely broke out even, making just enough money to buy a house. There was a time when all sorts of debt collectors and companies were calling the front desk and threatening me with law suits if "we" did not pay. I had to remind these caller that I was just a desk person.

Before Gino was hired to manage and over see the plant he once worked at the docks as a supervisor. He got fired for being verbally abusive to the employees and slave driving them. The union pulled strings and he got fired, and his past work experience got him hired at the plant. He had this constant habit of chewing on pens all day.

My "boss" was a friend of Ted's named Dave. Dave was a man in his 40's and was also English with an English accent. Neither of us were really on the pay roll since we were just volunteering for friends and family. Dave's job was to actually oversee the office stuff, take care of bills, place order, etc. I was talking to Dave once about Gino and how odd I thought it was for a Scottish person to have an Italian name. Dave goes: "Oh Gino's half Italian. His grandfather was an immigrant to Scotland, in the textile business. His mother is Scottish." I said back: "Oh, I didn't know that. I wonder what his mother looks like? You think she's a pretty red head?" Dave replies to me something like: "Well, guess you haven't ever been to Scotland, otherwise you wouldn't be asking that question," he laughed and continued saying: "Let's just say his Scottish mother looks like him with long hair." I laughed. I thought it was funny, but guess you had to be there.

To help with production Gino hired "temp workers" who are the Mexicans you see outside of Home Depot waiting around for work. So every morning Gino comes to work with a car full of the days "employees." The plant at the time wasn't making any money yet to pay real employees. Everyone not a temp worker were just friends and family who literally volunteered time to whatever pay we got, if we did. Just to help out. Sometimes we were given stocks of the worthless company in lieu of pay.

From time to time from our office side me and Dave – since we really didn't have real work to do – just watched the other side. Often we'd see a couple of the Mexican labourers walk out deserting their post and job angry saying things like "pinche cabron," and "pinche gringo!" Dave was the gossipy and nosy character of person. He has his head out the window and speculates over every little thing that happens on the other side of the street at the plant, and own the street in the other places. When the Mexicans walk out Dave would look out the window with a curious and nosy look and say to me or himself: "What the – are those Mexicans deserting their post? What did Gino do this time? Do you understand what they're saying Chloe?" I'd say: "Yeah, they're cussing Gino out. I'd rather not repeat what they said if you don't mind." And Dave was a loud mouth and tattler. He'd run off to Ted and tell Ted Gino caused the Mexican's to walk out. But Ted was so laid back he never really cared, just said: "Oh dear, looks like you'll have to go over there and help out or get more labourers?" Ted pays the temp workers out of his own pocket, for all four years.

So Dave would reluctantly cross the street to go help out. Gino comes to the office frequently to tell Ted and the others important information while the plant is running and going good. Usually when the "employees" abandon ship Gino comes across the street chewing his pen with a guilty grin on his face to report to Ted that the Mexicans walked out and he needs replacements. Ted will always say in his laid back manner: "Let me see if I have the cash to pay them." Usually Gino will hang around the desk and small talk with us. That's when out of curiosity I ask Gino things and he'd teach me.

At first I just asked him why the Mexicans walked out and Gino will say with his guilty grin in an almost shy manner: "They just couldn't take the heat, to hell with them, pardon my language."

After I got to know Gino over the years of volunteer work he opened up and became a friend and my first source of influence. He'd often give me advice like a father would give a daughter or uncle to a niece. There was one time when he was giving me advice which I remember and apply to this day, where he said something like: "You gotta test these blokes. You'll never know who and how a person really is inside if you're just going off of how they are when they are comfortable and normal. If you ever think about getting serious with a boyfriend for instance, you have to test them for their character and fortitude as a man. Don't ever go into anything blindly. Know what you're dealing with first. Remember that, it'll save you a lot of trouble and heartache." So I asked him how to test people.

Gino said something like: "You put them into three situations and watch them carefully. Watch how they act, react, and how they treat you and others in those three situations. First situation: you get them piss drunk, but you don't do any drinking yourself! You need to watch how they are piss drunk, what they say, where their eyes move. Do you want a boyfriend whose eyes wander when he's drunk? Second situation: make them seriously angry. Push them so that they become genuinely angry. I mean angry. Then watch how they act, react, and how they talk to you and treat you and others. Do you want a man who beats you or your children when they are extremely angry? Do you want a worker who walks away from his duties when he is extremely mad? Third and most important situation: Break them. Snap them like a twig."

I asked: "What do you mean snap them?" And he said: "Push them to the breaking point. Stress them out. Apply so much pressure on them that they snap. Then you observe what type of person they are under pressure. Under extreme stress. Can they maintain themselves and still be intelligent and functional? Or do they turn into cry babies and dysfunctional gibbering idiots? You'll grow up to realize Chloe that life isn't easy. It's stressful and takes us all to a breaking point. You'll learn to know that people who are sweet in words and deed when they are comfortable and normal, turn into abusive monsters under pressure. The question is do you learn now, or when it's too late? The best type of person to associate in any way with are the type that is true to their nature in and out of high stress, extreme emotional states, and so on. If they still love you. Or if they still are with it. Can they take the heat? Do you want to build a life or company on the reliance of people who break easy and are only superficially intelligent and superficially functional? Wimps. Too bad America is too liberal in the work place these days."

Nothing Gino taught me that day really sank in my mind back then. It wasn't until much later when I was out of high school, living with friends at dorms during our college years that I began to realize the essence of what Gino had once said personally and directly, with me on the receiving end of being tested and tried.

Me and my friends and cousins got real jobs together at a Target by the campus to make extra spending and party money. When we first got hired there was a transition of regimes over at the target by the campus. The previous store manager had been recently fired and we started our first few days hearing rumors about the new boss the district was going to install. The potential new boss was once an executive at the store named Edward [Ed]. I heard stories from my new friends at work that Ed was known to have a short fuse and he yells profanities and throws merchandise across the store when he's angry.

In my head as I was hearing about the Dread Ed, I was thinking to very young and immature 18 year old self: "Awe fuck. If this Ed guy even talks to with an improper tone, I'll walk out, I don't even need this job. I'm not taking his shit. I have rights!" He did get hired as the new Boss. Ed was very tall, very handsome, in his late 40's at the time. He sounded like he was from the east coast, talked with a deep and very clear and audible voice. He had a natural demeanor of command and authority and confidence in the way he walked, talked, and carried himself. My first impression of him was that to me he was like a cross between a mobster and a politician. He went around introducing himself to everybody one by one during his first week, shaking our hand and saying: "Ed. Pleased to meet you," to the faces he didn't recognize. He'd joke around and tease the people he knew from his previous time at the store.

I used to like watching Ed work his status charm in the store social order those days. When he's happy and in a good mood you can see Ed just joke around with everybody. Usually you see him teasing the men in the store in a light hearted way. It's a subtle establishment of status position anthropologically. Usually the one that is dominant or trying to establish a dominant social position does the teasing, and the recipient of the teasing is socially the subordinate. You can see this behaviourism acted out in high school where the popular kids will pick on nerds and geeks. But also in their cliques you see one doing the teasing of his friends and the friends taking the tease, laughing and shoots a tease back. Then the teaser pats his friend on the back and usually says: "I'm just messin with ya." The one doing the teasing is the dominant person in the clique. The patting on the back is a social reassurance that they are still buddies as long as everyone knows their place. At the store you'll see the men familiar with Ed throw in or initiate a jab or tease Ed, they usually pat Ed on the shoulder right after, and usually Ed turns the situation around and teases them back good. When he was happy he was always formal and respectful with every female in the store. He called us all "Ladies." Usually he'll do his stops and say: "Evening ladies. Anything I should know about while I'm here?" Then he'll do his small talk, comment on our look and hair, and then leave. He never teases a female. When Ed was angry he transformed into a totally different person. His nickname in the store was the "Transformer," because of this.

Our shift was the grave yard, so that way we had the day for either school or to hang out. So Ed's usual shift was when the store was closed to the public. After Ed had settled in and established himself, one night we saw Ed do his famous transformation way in the back by the toys department. Me and some of my friends were on the Planogram team which was different from the stock team which unloads the truck and stocks the stuff.

I was in the middle of the store with my team when I heard things crashing loudly over in the toys department. Thinking something big fell, my team walked over there to investigate. Before we got there we heard Ed screaming at the top of his lungs: "Shit! What is this shit!? What the fuck is everybody doing!? Aren't you supposed to be working!?" After hearing this, we just turned around real fast and went back to our place to do our work hoping Ed won't stop by. You can hear things being thrown across the aisle and breaking.

At the time me and my work partner Lisa were helping each other on my aisle since I was still new. Our job was to totally dismantle an entire aisle, reconstruct the shelves and put up all new items or rearrange the items according to these blueprints they give us. This usually takes all day to destock the aisle, dismantle it, put up new wallpaper and pegs, pull our items and stock it. Lisa was put in the same aisle as me so she can help train me. That night when Ed blew a fuse, Lisa had left her aisle just behind me to help me with my aisle. Usually it's one person per aisle side. She was doing something while I was banging the prong of a shelf loudly to get it to go into the hole things in the aisle. Just as I stuck the shelf in place and proud of my accomplishment Ed walked by our aisle. I guess he was wondering what the loud banging was.

Ed stopped dead in his tracks and looked at me and Lisa working on the same aisle together. I feared for my life as I was standing there looking at him looking at me with a little hammer in my hand. In my mind I was thinking to myself: "Lisa was just helping me. I'm still new and I'm still being trained. I was working. I have a hammer in my hand to prove it. Lisa is my trainer, please don't yell at her." Where we were working at was right across the way from toys in the middle part of the store.

He just stood there looking at me for a few seconds, so not knowing what to do I just said out loud: "The shelf wouldn't go in. She's training me." I wiggled my hammer. Ed puts his palm over his face and takes a deep breath as he turns around. I thought he was going to start yelling. But he turns back around to look at me and Lisa and he said: "I'm sorry you ladies had to see that. I feel bad. I really do. I hope they don't take it personally. I just get angry when I see people not working. I put in 100% of my effort into my job. I expect the same from everyone. I get angry when I see people not work. I don't care if you don't like your job or aren't really working. Just look busy."

I nodded in fear and I said: "Yes sir. We were working, she's just helping me out." And Ed shows his palms at us and says: "No, no, no. Not you ladies. Don't mind me. I know your working. I can hear you down from the other department. I'm just vent some steam at somebody. I'm gunna go and clean up my mess now."

My friends and I where hired a few months before Christmas season that year. In these types of mass retail stores, Christmas season is chaotic. After settling in my job for the easy months and getting to know everybody and learning about Ed's character under extreme anger and stress, December came and Christmas season hit the store. At Target, the Planogram team during Christmas season is like the bitch of the store. We get used by every other team. First our job during November into early December was to literally redo the entire store to make everything Christmassy. Every aisle had to be reconstructed, new aisles had to be build in the back for the extra Christmas stuff. We had to put up the seasonal signs in the store, put up the trees in the display area. Then when we were done the Planogram crew was disbanned for the season since there were no aisles to be worked on, and we'd be everybody's bitch into January.

Our team went into work one night at 12 AM to see Ed pulling pallets and dumping them everywhere in the main aisles of softlines. I walked down the rows and rows of pallets with our team leader Sean in horror to the 40 hugely piled Christmas pallets. Sean gave me a look of part horror, part anger, and part annoyance. Ed dropped off another pallet and walked up to us and said to Sean: "Sean my man. Good to see you two early. All these pallets need to be sorted before the store opens. The stock team over the weekend didn't sort them for you like I asked. Got a little upset. Broke a few things. Sorry to do this to you guys."

Sean is still my friend to this day. He's half Black half Irish, very attractive, body builder type. He spent 4 years in the army and then joined the air force reserves. He's also my personal mentor in the 5% Nation. Sean said in anger and disgust back at Ed: "Man, you know how much work my team already has. What the hell does the stock team even do during Christmas Ed, and they couldn't help out and sort this stuff?" Ed goes: "Tell me about it. It is what it is Sean. Chloe go clock in and and start sorting, you can have my LTR [scanning device]. I want every box repalletized by aisle number to help you guys out. Get as much done as you can be fore the store opens. I'm gunna drag Sean to the back and touch base with him real quick." Sean goes: "Ed you can't do this to me man. They gave me 7 aisles to set tonight. I need her in those aisles." Ed said back: "Sean, work with me. Nobody else will." Sean said 'alright' and they both looked at me, so I went to clock in.

Me and Sean got stuck that night going through every box. You have to scan the bar code on the box then write the aisle number it gives you on the box and then sort them out by aisle number and make new pallets. As we were doing this Sean was cussing and bitching about how bad the stock team sucks. The supervisor of the stock team had come up to us chuckling and patting Sean on the back teasing about the extra load of work we got stuck with. Him and Sean were peers in the store's official ranking system and actual friends. Sean said annoyed and pissed: “Fuck you man and your lazy ass team. Ain’t this your guy’s work? You guys are fucking incompetent. You need the Plano team to pull your truck for you, do your work for you. But whatever. My team gets your work done AND our work done. Get the fuck out of this aisle before I bitch slap you.” The other guys leaves laughing and says as he walked away: “Hey Sean! Thanks for picking up my slack buddy. I owe you one.” Sean mumbled to himself and me: “I really feel like killing a few people right now, you don’t even know.”

So during the chaos of Christmas season on the Plano team, people took shits on you whenever they could everywhere they can. Technically before we set an aisle the protocol is to use our LRT’s or PDA’s to punch in an order of the new items our schematics says we will need. The backroom team is supposed to do their part – team work – and pull our order for us. But this doesn’t happen of course. I took down my aisle to set up a Christmas aisle, and I had all this backstock items not going back up which I put on these pallets neatly for the back room and I had put in my order way before I started taking apart my aisle. So I went to deliver my backstock pallet to Ray who was the supervisor of the backroom.

Technically his team is supposed to backstock the crap we pull off. But of course this doesn’t happen in practice. I pulled my pallet back to Ray who is or was this 40 year old White ex-Marine guy [he was cool] and always, he yells at me saying: “No, no no girl! I’ve had enough crap from your team. I got a job to do too. You’re backstocking everything you’re bring back here!” He acts like that under pressure, where he no longer cooperates or works as a team. So I said back: “Ray I’m setting a damn aisle. I can’t backstock this shit.” He interrupted and said: “Then don’t be bringing shit back here!” I said: “Where the hell am I supposed to put this shit then Ray? And my order? I’m ready for it.”

Ray said or bitched that he had too much work on his hands and could not get to any of our orders. So I had an empty aisle. I went to go tell Sean Ray wanted me to backstock my own stuff and he didn’t pull any off our orders. That got Sean very angry. When Sean is angry is throws things on the ground and goes deathly silent like a sniper and just walks back with a look on his face like he’s gunna fist fight someone. He disappears usually. So that night I went to go to the back room to see what to do with my empty aisle. Sean was pulling our orders and yelling back and forth at Ray saying: “How you gunna do this to me Ray. Fucking lazy ass motherfucker. At least tell me you ain’t gunna pull my orders. I got empty aisles out there.”

Sean – like me – is the type to keep working steady in extreme states of anger and under extreme stress. Usually he verbally vents his steam, but he keeps working and doing his duties and whatever extra shit he has to do. I’m the opposite. I shut up when I am extremely angry or under high stress. If its too much I’ll bitch in my head or cry but I’ll keep doing the work, stay functional and alert, and stay focused. I can still think straight where I can or have to re-prioritize what needs to be done and what needs to be suspended. Sean taught me that panic kills in real live situations. Like when your car is in a lake. If you panic and don’t have full control of your emotions and mind, and you can’t calm yourself, you’re gunna die in the car cuz you’re not thinking straight. Same thing with being out in the battlefield. You always have to have full control of your emotions and mind at all times. You can vent and bitch to let off steam, but don’t ever lose control of your emotions and thinking faculty.

After we had set the whole store our team was disbanded and we were put to work on “projects.” Usually the guys in our team get put in the Christmas tree truck, or they are put in the stockroom truck unloading the trucks. The girls get used all over the place.

I “lucked” out during my tenure with this job, which was my only “real” [non-family] job. Ed had made me his “personal assistant” for the season. Which meant he just gave me a long list of orders to follow and left me alone to execute them one at a time. Technically my chore he gave me was to just walk around the entire store and keep every end cap in the whole store fully stocked and to just do what I have to to keep them all full. Then to pull all clearance items from every aisle and put in in back end caps. Then to take every clearance item in the backroom and flush them out, meaning get them on the floor in the end caps. So usually back at that time I just minded my own business, pulled my own items, kept every end cap loaded with crap for the morning. But I learned that there are only so many back end caps in the store [for clearance], and the stockroom team were flushing out every clearance item from their backroom.

I walked in the store one night at 3 in the morning to find over a dozen pallets of clearance stuff out on the floor waiting, after I had taken a walk to check how many end caps needed to be restocked which was half of them in the store. I was standing there shocked at the dozen pallets of crap as Ray dropped off another one laughing and he said: “Look at her just standing there. I’d start working if I were you. We got more clearance stuff coming for you.” I bitched out at him saying: “All my clearance end caps are full Ray! I don’t have anywhere to put all this at?!” He just said: “Your problem, not mine. I’m just doing what Ed told me to do.” Then walks away.

I went to go find Ed to complain at him about the 12 pallets of shit the backroom was giving to me, thinking Ed would compassionately understand and provide me with a helper or something. When I saw Ed, he just said: “Chloe! My little helper. Come with me to the back yard. I need you to go through a container for clearance items. The stock team was supposed to go through it, but they didn’t.” I was shocked and I opened my mouth to bitch or vent and I said: “But,” but before I finish the but Ed stops me and said: “Don’t do this with me Chloe. I’m gunna blow a fuse. If it’s one thing I hate is people that complain and bitch. It gets absolutely nothing done. I give you everything I got. You need to give me everything you got and don’t ask questions. I know you’re better than that and capable of more. I know because I’ve seen you work stressed out and I’ve put to under pressure. You can’t imagine the pressure my bosses are putting me through right now. I’ve got nobody else to rely on who can take the heat but you and Sean. Don’t burn out on me now.” I nodded and said: “Okay.”

Ed led me out in the store’s backyard to a container just outside the doorway of the backroom going outside. He propped the door opened and called the security guard on his walkie to meet him in the backroom to guard a door, and told the backroom team to keep an eye on me and to check up on me since I’ll be outside by myself in a dark container. The container is the big kind you see on trains, big trucks etc. It’s dark and packed with pallets. I was given a flashlight and a scanner. My job was to go through every box and flush out all the clearance items and get them out in the floor. It was 3 something in the morning and very cold. And just my luck every one of the big pallets – over a dozen – were wrapped in plastic, and there was no room to work in. I had to literally climb on top of the boxes just to move. The previous manager had gotten fired for this. Instead of doing her job, the previous manager ordered all of these containers and pack-ratted stuff into them and never told anybody about them. As soon as Ed left I just stood their for a moment and kicked the nearest box a few times to let out some steam.

Every few minutes my friend the “security” guard came by to check up on me. His name was Rodney, but we called him Big Rod. He was in his late 20’s back then. Had these big bushy sideburns and both of his arms were tatted up. They called him Big Rod because he was big built, not fat. He was chubby, but he also worked out so he was also packing muscles. Big Rod was a Mongol which is a rival 1% biker gang of the Hell’s Angels. He loved talking about motor bike gangs, their culture, street gangs, etc.” I started talking to him at break talking about Asian gangs. His friends were Asians, so he knew every Asian gang. I learned many things about biker gangs in return. He was “cool people,” at break he’d pass out cups to those of us he knew were “cool” and filled it up with beer.

Big Rod once put me to the test for whatever reason after a few drinks and getting to know me. He told me to follow a guy around the stock team for him and gave me a name, and asked me to give him any information about this guy I hear. Since Big Rod was the security guard I figured this guy – named Jeff – was stealing things. So over the months I spied on Jeff and collected every bit of information I hear about him, and during break I’d relay what I knew to Big Rod. I never asked why he asked why. I know enough street ethics and my own family culture to not ask why when you’re told to do something by somebody older than you or who out ranks you. You can smell a test when one is given to you. A few months pasted and as I was walking from the restroom one night I saw Jeff walking around a section in the store he was not placed in. People on the stock team get placed to work in departments. Curious I walked fast behind him towards his direction. I saw him turn down an aisle walking to the a back end cap. Jeff is one of those trashy trailer park White guys that is the type to not feel right with anybody. He was dirty and never seemed to bathe or comb his hair.

I walked very slowly on the front end of the aisles, past one aisle at a time to find him so I can see what he was doing. He was in the electronics department which was quiet. I saw his elbow. He was doing something behind an end cap. I made a snuffle sound pretending to normally walk by and he looked and saw me and quickly fumbled with something and very, very nervously said to me as he was walking back to the front: “Hey Chloe.” I said: “What’s up Jeff?” He goes: “Nothing. Nothing. I went to the bathroom. Just checking out checking out a few things. I better go before Robin [his supervisor] looks for me.” I nodded and smiled watching him walk to his department. Then I stopped him and said: “Jeff,” I got very close to his dirty ear and continued: “You have to be more careful next time.” And I looked at him. Jeff had this look of panic or guilt or fear and he nervously said to me: “You’re not going to tell are you? Please?” But I assured him and said: “No. We’re cool right?” He nodded and thanked me.

The next day I told Jeff at a quiet section of the store that I wanted to buy whatever he took. I used the fact that he knew I knew as an unspoken blackmail. He admitted to me that he had taken a Game Boy for his little son. I told him I’ll give him $20 for it and things will be cool. So he agreed. He had no choice but to agree. The next day after work Jeff gave me the new Game Boy things he stole and I gave him $20. Then that same day I called Big Rod and told him everything, stating that I had the Game Boy in my possession. Big Rod told me to come over to his apartment for dinner with him and his wife to show me the item he stole.

The three of us at Big Rod's pad drank and smoked weed as he was looking at the Game Boy. Big Rod told me and his wife who was my age and tatted up: "We've been trying to catch this fucker in the act. They've been building some case on his dirty ass for six months. Think he's ripped off fucking $2000 worth of shit. A few days ago one of the execs found a fucking Game Boy box fucking opened in the back end caps in electronics. My girl Chloe caught the fucker red handed, evidence and all too. Ain't that something. This is the fucking Game Boy from that box. How'd you do this?" I explained to him what happened and that I tricked him into selling me the Game Boy or I'd tell. But I asked Big Rod if I can get busted for buying it. He said that technically I could, but he'll make sure the fucker never mentions my name and he won't bring up any transaction of money. Then Big Rod goes: "All I know is somebody is going to jail, and I'm getting a fucking promotion! You don't mind if I take the credit for this bust do you?" I said: "No way. Go ahead. If the guys on the stock team [gang bangers] ever find out, they'll never talk to me again." Big Rod reassured me: "Nah, just between us, those guys are cool with me, they take shit in plain view of me. They owe me. You're cool. Don't stress over it. This bust is strictly business." That's how we got to know each other, and how I earned his trust.

So out in the container my friend Big Rod came to check up on me, climbing in the containers he said to me: "Shit, it's fucking cold in here. You know he can get fired for putting you at risk out here by yourself at this time? You want me to put the word in for you? I'll be your witness. I can't stand the fucker." I said back: "Nah, I'm cool Big R. Just helping him out, that's all." He goes: "Yeah, but this ain't right. He should be out here not an 18 year old girl. What's up with that picture. He's using you." I said: "Nah. Just leave him alone. He's alright. Ed is an acquired taste." Rod asks: "What's that mean?" I said: "When you haven't tasted something before, and you have to learn to get use to the shit. Feel people out and know how to dance with them or work with them. You know." So he looked around and changing the subject said: "Alright. Just let me know. Ey, anything interesting in there?" I said: "I'll open some of the interesting boxes up. If I see anything I'll holler." Big Rod says quietly as he starts to leave: "Yeah, just set it aside for me. I'll stuff my fucking pockets."

It took me till 8 in the morning to go thru the whole container. I had few pallets of stuff, and I had set aside all of these things for Big Rod. Every so often he'd come by and stuff his pockets, vanish for a while when he was supposed to be guarding the door, then come back to reload with stuff I find. We did that for five hours. I had pallets and pallets of clearance shit I had to push out on the floor. After lunch break I found Ed to inform him of my only option since all of the clearance end caps were over flowing. I told Ed: "Ed, I have all these pallets of clearance and all of the end caps are packed." Ed claps his hands like he's cheering me on and said: "What are you gunna do about it?" So I said: "I have to pirate a couple aisles in the store. I have no other choice." Ed goes: "Great. Do what you gotta do. Give it to me! Blame everything on me if you have to. Just get rid of everything."

So I went to the Home Décor department after lunch and killed two whole aisles. I removed everything from them and stuffed the items in new homes with their labels in different places. Put up a shit load of shelves in my pirated aisles and started to stuff my pirated aisles with nothing but clearance stuff.

The stock team stocking the department gave me a shit storm. What they do is take tubs loaded with boxes to the aisles the boxes goes in and the are supposed to stock them. But I had killed two aisles which confused the dumb lazy fucks. One of them came by the aisle with their tubs and looking confused or lazy said to me: "Where did these two aisles go?" I said: "I moved them into the next aisle and all along the back wall." And I pointed out where I moved the stuff to. This grown person in her 40's bitches at me: "Well what am I supposed to do now? I can't waste my time looking for their new homes. I'm telling Robin." I got upset over this grown up bitching like a 5 year old and I said: "Ma'am, the new homes are right in the next aisle and down along the big wall. Can you work with me please and help me out?" She storms off to tell her supervisor on me.

Robin the stock team supervisor is this older lady of about 35-40ish. She has short hair and looks like a butch dike, and she carries herself in a very masculine way all bossy like. She has a short fuse and is the biggest bitch in the store when she is barely stressed out. Under stress she malfunctions and stops working right and storms off not working in a cloud of butthurt.

Robin marches up to the aisles I had pirated and out loud with the store open and costumers walking by just losses it on me saying: "Chloe what the hell is this? Where the hell are my two aisles! You can't just go around killing aisles like this? My stock team gets confused. I got a backroom packed with pallets that I need to get out. Blah blah blah!" Just to shut her up I said in a low tone: "Just leave the stuff here Robin. I'll take care of it okay." She goes all smartass like: "If you say so. You're stocking it not me. Ed's gunna know about this." So she walked off, having dismissed a part of her responsibility on me. I was mocking her in my head going: "If you say so. Whatever then. Go tattle tale on me. I told Ed I was gunna do it anyways. Whatever happened to team work? It's like everybody is out to look out only for their own asses and they try to evade as much work as they can get away with not doing." That's when I realized that Ed was right. Complaining and bitching makes you look like a baby. And these are grown people.

A few minutes later, while the store was open with customers in it, you hear stuff being thrown, things crashing and breaking, out in the back of the toy department again. Then you hear Ed yelling profanities while the store was open. And his voice was getting louder and louder, so I figured he was walking my way. I stood there waiting for him to see what he was going to do. I told him I was gunna kill aisles and he said I could. I'd feel very shocked and betrayed if he turned around and yelled at me. Ed snapped in public right in my aisle with the stock team and some customers watching. Ed sort of talked to himself or me or somebody out loud saying in public: "Fuck me! I'm not a fucking manager. I'm a fucking babysitter! That's what I am! I'm surrounded by babies! Chloe do you have any babies I can babysit? I sure could use another baby. Ma'am how about you?"

He mumbles to himself and what went to the tubs of stuff the stock team left for me and opened the boxes and proceeded to stock the stuff as he shakes his head. Just like Sean handles things when he is very angry and stressed out. I thought that was very nice and loyal of him to help me out with the boxes in that situation. That's how I personally learned that Ed was true, trustworthy, and loyal to those he can depend on. Robin came by and in a very nice and sweet voice said to Ed: "Ed I can stock the stuff, you know. I was just," before she could finish explaining Ed goes: "Robin, I'm this close to killing somebody or myself. Leave. Go do your job or clock out and go home for the day. Please."

By then I was just doing my work and pretending to not be aware of the public drama. While I was working with Ed working with me, I wondered how he relationship with his wife was like? So I just kept working, and Ed just quietly stocked the crap. In those moments you just stay quiet and let the men go into their cave and cool down. He gets over his anger quick, then apologizes to everyone, then he kept working the boxes that went into the aisles I killed. At break he bought me, Sean, Faith, and another one of his hand picked helpers who was a friend of ours named Arnie who was a short older man in his 50's with a thick mustache from Afghanistan. Faith was a very cool elder lady. She was 57 and still had a lot of horse power in her. She was working just to stay busy. She was rich, had white hair and a kick ass attitude, and she drove a better car to work than Ed's. She's a Southern Bell and talks with a southern accent, and she cusses like a sailor. Ed told us at break that he needs us to stay 12 hours to finish up our chores and take care of things. He warned us that its gunna be 8 more hours of him using and abusing us. The four of us agreed to stay.

"In one ear, out the other baby." That was Faith's policy with people like Ed. She told me at break that Ed is just like her husband when he was young, and they have been married for over 40 something years. "You let them use you and abuse you. Let them learn to trust you and know they can come to you. Make them know you are the only one that can take their shit. Then turn that around and use that in turn to get you where you need to go. He needs us more than we need him. If he's smart, he'll learn he either needs to put out or lose his support. Let the man be a man and do his thing, that's just how God made him baby. Just remember what I tell you, and this is coming from an old lady whose been through everything imaginable in life: The more a person needs you, the more control you have over them. I wasn't born rich." That's the type of stuff Faith taught me and Sean based on her many years of being married to a man like Ed for 40 years.

Ed ended up building a little clique he called the "A Team." It was 7 of us he had tested and hand picked over the months. The ones he pushed to the breaking point, used, manipulated [buying us lunches, messing with our feelings, etc], and the only ones who stuck by him. He used his "A Team" to get his work load done all during the holiday season. Before it officially started he had a meeting with the 7 of us and just point black said in plain English: "I picked you 7 because you are the only 7 that can think straight and function under high stress and pressure. You're the only ones that can take the heat and deal with my shit, and every one of these babies' shit. We all got bosses here. I get shit on, I'm gunna shit on you, you go shit on whoever. I don't care. Lets make it a shit fest if we need to. Shit on me if that makes you feel better because I don't take any thing said in anger or pressure seriously, just work with me. Fuck the rest of the store. Fuck the stock team. Fuck the backroom team. Fuck those grown babies. We'll run this store our god damn selves. Pull our own shit, stock our own shit, get every lazy person's fucking jobs done in between. I'm gunna use you and abuse you all Christmas season. Use me and abuse me too. Just work as a fucking team. That's all I ask of you. Everyone still with me?" So we all nodded. Sean goes: "Lets do it."

After Christmas season Ed got praised for his work. He had taken a store that got fucked up because of the previous manager, and fixed everything up and picked up revenue again. He got a fat Christmas bonus. In private he gave each of us 7 a very private bonus out of his own pocket, and he actually shows a very sincere appreciation for the work we put in during his little speech for the 7 of us when he cried, or his eyes got very watery. Unfortunately he wasn't perfect. My year of working there had come round. Thanksgiving season had come. The store got all of these for the Thanksgiving Day Sale. Ed saved one X Box in his office for his son which he bought when the store opened. One of the execs who did not like Ed ratted on him. The management team were not legally allowed to save items in their offices that are on sale for the public. So he got fired. Of all people Robin had come to each of us collecting money to buy Ed a going away gift, since over the year she had grown to like him and understand his nature. I put in $300. Sean and Faith were the only others to put in a big contribution. Ed left without a fight.

Two weeks after he got fired he came by our Target with a golf club on Monday wearing his ring. We were out at lunch break. He just stops and says: "Ever golfed on Mondays before? Chloe, you taking care of my Lexus for me?" It was mine, but he called it his since he has a thing for such types of car brands. After small talk he said he got a new job as the top manager of a different company and he came to collect his A Team. He promised all 7 of us immediate promotions if we came. All 7 of us left Target and followed Ed.

Ed and my old friend Gino from the plant had the same "work ethics" as I recalled after my experience with real work. Things that Gino once taught me about people and testing them for their fortitude were true. Most people turn to babies when the slightest pressure is applied. Most people just complain, whine, and bitch their discomfort or disagreement like a baby cries to have its diaper changed. And these grown babies actually want you to change their diapers for them, expecting you to appease them and fix shit for them. They can't do shit by themselves, which is why they complain. How many of these grown babies complain about their work, but keep doing their job and don't change their routine? How many complain about politics, but yet they keep supporting the same system and same two parties?

How many of you cry like grown babies over how you don't like ONA but, it's still here? That's incompetence and impotence. You huff and puff about the sex how your great, but can't ever get it up to do shit. How am I supposed to take you fucking babies seriously then? Whining, disagreeing with me, debating my ideas, talking shit about me, don't do jack shit in the real world, and you know it never has. That's all you bitches got. Just like peasants and serf bitching about their plight and serfdom and talking shit about their masters that own them. Nothing besides talk is ever done. And don't bring up the American revolution like I'm fucking stupid or the French Revolution. Who were the bulk of the loyalists, did the generic populous actually participate or did they just exist and get manipulated, and who had the guts to actually risk their life and freedom to commit treason against the Crown and Law of the day? You all are bitches. You, your ancestry, and whole bloodline. You bitch about breaking the law today, and your ancestors bitched about breaking the law of the land and religion in the past. So don't act like a fucking superhero Captain Satan with me cuz you found satanism and you got opinions. I'd rather cut my wrists then breed with one of you peasant [plebeian] fucks. That's straight from my heart.

A Team

Gino had the exact same method of building up his own A Team. What I remember him do was pick up random Mexicans temp workers. Then during the day he'd push all of them to high levels of stress and just use them all day. Some walked out. Few stayed.

This one young Mexican, who is still a friend of mine to this day named Israel got a job at our plant like this. Israel at the time he first started was 19. He was an illegal alien with false papers. His wife is a citizen. He didn't speak a word of English, and he barely does still. He came to this country by himself. Said it cost him $3000 to pay the "Coyotes" which is the term for the nice businessmen who work the human traffic industry. He came alone leaving his family behind so he can get work to send money to his parents and siblings back home. He told me once – via our interpreter Ricardo the machine tech – that his [Israel's] dream was to work hard for 20 years here, have his parents save the money, then go back home and open his own small business and be a jeffe [boss], so his parents can retire and travel the world.

Me and Dave used to watch how badly Gino treated Israel from across the street in the safety of our air conditioned office. When Israel was stressed out or very angry, he'd walk out the plant and just sit at the side walk looking sad. I felt really sad for him when he did that. Because he's all alone in a foreign country which sees him as a criminal, and all he wants is just to make money to have a better life, and the only place that will give him work is just treating him awful. He sits there cuz he really has nowhere to go. Gino would come out screaming at the top of his lung in a Scottish Accent: "Israel, get back in there boy!" Israel would get up slowly with his head down and walk back inside to work. And you see a smile on Gino's face as he pats Israel on the back.

Everyday in the morning even when we didn't need workers to help, Israel would always be waiting at the front door with his bike. Gino would buy him breakfast and coffee and set him to work. And you'll see the same thing happen. Israel would walk out the plant and sit on the side walk. Dave would be looking out the window and saying to me: "Here we go again Chloe. They're gunna bond again. How do you like that. A Scotsman and a Mexican making friends. Only in America." Then you see Gino storm out of the plant like he was looking to kill somebody and he'll scream out as loud as he can: "Israel! Get back in there boy!" And Israel would walk back in with a smirk on his face.

Dave said once when Gino was hanging around the office: "I feel bad for Israel. You treat that poor boy like shit." Gino says: "I ain't treating him like shit. He has potential. He knows it and I know it. I've seen him work when he puts his mind to it. That boy is smart. But he's lazy. He needs discipline. He keeps a straight head under pressure. He'll understand in time. That's how my father raised me when I was his age. Look at how I turned out." He chuckles to himself and Dave said laughing: "Yeah, look at you, bullying Mexicans."

A year later Gino starts relegating supervisor chores to Israel. You'll see Gino come out to inspect the Mexicans working in the yard and he gets angry cuz they aren't working hard enough. He yells out: "Israel! Tell your brothers to quit fucking around and work god dammit! We ain't paying them to hold hands!" Then you'll see Israel doing the exact same thing Gino does. He yell out profanities in Spanish and makes everybody work while he stands and watches. You'll see Gino come out later to check up on everybody, and he'll nod in approval and pat Israel on the back and go back inside.

Slowly over the years other workers with the same quality and nature as Gino and Israel just comes back and back everyday. They get put into this clique where a very real chain of command structure can be seen to take shape. And you'll see that this clique get's the most work done. Gino had manifested himself an efficient work force. Gino buys his workers food out of his own pocket, and after work hours he shoves extra cash in the pockets of his hand picked boys like Israel. After two years Gino build up his A Team made up of a small group of 5 people who were able to work together cooperatively in a team or collective effort which group was also able to maintain that cooperative ability to productively work together under high stress, extreme anger, and high pressure some days at the plant created. Basically they were dedicated or loyal to the work and their group, and the anger, stress, and pressure was not able to break their solidarity and functionalism apart.

Some may wonder why I'm talking about my boring work experience. Partly because I've alive for about 2 and a half decades and I haven't experienced much else in Life. You work with what you got. But I can still extract insights from these experiences in life.

So what do I mean by a chain of command? I mean Information traveling unimpeded whereby this information is apprehended by each group member, and where each group member then executes its duties accordingly. Ed had an end objective, he tells his A Team what he wants, his A Team divvies up the work needed to manifest it, and the end result is actualized. Gino has a work load and work order to meet, he tells his A Team, they divvy up the responsibilities, and the end result gets done. Your conscious mind wants to cross the street, it dictates its will or desire to the body, your body its limbs and organs divvies up the work load needed to get you ass across the street, and the work gets done. That's what I mean by a chain of command and efficient work force.

There is a different between an army and a mass of common city citizens. There is a difference between a street gang and the mass of common city residents. There is a difference between a construction company building a structure and the random people walking by the construction site. There is a difference between a company of business partners and the common mass of citizens. The difference is that one is structured in a coherent ordering where that Information travels unimpeded and the other is an incoherent structure where Information does not move. Take a piece of Coal, and a Diamond. Both are made of carbon atoms. Shine a laser through both of them. The light of the laser is pure Information. Which on of these carbon made objects does the Information travel through unimpeded and which one obstructs the information and why? And which is more valuable and stronger and which one is actually worthless and crumbles easily? Figure that out on your own and the implications.

The Price of Liberalism

So after all that recollection coagulated in my head I walked home to think about what I needed. I don't need a book. Having a memplex encased inside a book does not guarantee that that memplex will jump out of the pages to be alive. How does a memplex come to life? Where does the Christmas memplex "go" when Christmas season is not here? It doesn't go anywhere. It's still in your fucking head. It just is not influencing you to manifest it. But who hangs popcorn and tinsel on a pine tree in the summer anyways right? Where does the Halloween memplex "go" every other day of the year when it's not October 31st? No where, it's Dormant in the cultural fabric still. It's just not expressed threw your actions/kammanta to produce Fruit in the physical world. So don't even tell me a memplex laying dormant in a book does shit, when one laying in your own head and culture most times doesn't do shit. Telling me you wrote a book with ideas in it and acting like you did something special is like saying to me: "Look I got a Halloween memplex in the middle of fucking April. It's all made and constructed. I put in all this logic and intelligence into it. Not a single fallacy!" So? I got a quarter in my pocket, who the fuck cares? It's fucking April? What's that Halloween memplex do in April? Shit. What do you call something that does shit? Worthless crap.

Or a better example of this phenomenon is what the mundane satanists are good at doing in their forums and cyber hang outs. They'll say: "D00d, come quick and hang out with us in our chatroom. We're talking about the Christmas memplex in the middle of July! Fuck Independence Day. There's a snow storm of opinions going on right now, and a load of cyberdrama. Come on, hail satan!" Cuz what do these mundane faggots do in their special places? They throw their opinions around about everything. And they call that a religion or philosophy. Where they tree hug an arbitrary set of ideals and use that to produce opinions about other people, other belief systems, and so on. That's the essence of mundane satanism, and mundane anything. They call that "praxis," sometimes. Five year old kids can throw their opinions about shit around too. "But we are grown ups and logical." The essence of this paragraph will just fly right above the heads of these generics.

It's like a farmer were to come up to me and say: "I got this special mixture of fertilizer. It's the greatest pile of manure in my opinion. And I have some high opinions about it too. It'll do all sorts of miracle stuff on your rice patties and wheat fields." Then I were to say back: "That sounds awesome. Can I see a basket of your fruits and vegetables you grew with this infallible manure? Just so I can see what I can grow?" And the farmer says: "Well, I just have ideas, but they are lofty opinions! I'm just saying you know. I mean I've tried to grow shit myself, but it never worked out. But I swear it had nothing to do with the actual manure, because I wasn't using it, cuz it's not made yet. Like I said, it's just very important opinions."

And this is the exact same thing your common generic satanist in cybrspace is doing. They sure do have a lot of lofty and important opinions about satanism and everything. But the deed and acts? Oh don't start talking about that cuz you'll start drama, where people will just deflect and say: "Well you prove you did shit first. If your bad ass." But what does somebody like the old Buddha say to focus your attention on when judging the value of something? Not on what is being said, no matter how logical or right it sounds or who is saying it. Not even on the deed or action committed or attempted. The important thing to look at is the FRUIT of such words, beliefs, and/or actions. If a farmer were to bring you a basket of fruit and carrots he's grown, you can't use that defletive shit and say: "Oh yeah, prove it, what have you done." Because his little basket of fruits and vegetables is what is to be judged. By Fruit [Vipaka] I mean the karmic [action-reaction] resultant manifestation of something which is tangible and measurable in a kamma-kosala way, meaning Productive Work/Labour.

For instance I can judge the condition of my life at the moment here in America, and based on my evaluation such life here I can value the American revolution to be Kamma-Kosala, even if it was bloody and cost lives. Or I can judge the value of the English language by pointing out cases where Arab businessmen and Taiwanese tycoons talk business in English and a profit is made. I can bring up how a diplomat from Brazil and one from China talk English and certain diplomatic agreements manifest. I can point out a Japanese pilot talk English to Indonesian fly control to safely land his passengers. Or I can point out international companies that advertise to an international global market in English to a mass of people of different walks of life and nationalities who speak English where billions of dollars are made annually. And I can take all of that and say: "Yes, even though the English language itself is a memplex or construct of intangible memes and ideas, it is valuable and worth something because of the FRUIT which it has and can bare, which I have seen." The English language or its supporters don't have to huff and puff, or assert opinions. I can see the fruit in plain view. Fuck the deeds he "praxis," the application, and the theories and speculations too. I can see the Fruit/Vipaka and that is what you base your judgment and valuation on.

Where is satanism's basket of fruit? I'm not talking about YOUR fruits in life as an individual person doing shit. I'm talking about the memplex itself and the fruit it manifests through you via its influence over you, just as English as a memplex influences us Collectively to talk and communicate thereby producing measurable results, etc. You fuctards had 50 years at least. Show me your basket of shit. But you don't have to show me, cuz its all out in the open. Lets name some fruit the memplex of satanism has produced. My list is not everything:

One, we have internet forums. That's one. Two, don't forget the Satanic Bible by Avon! Three, social networks, that's right. Oh four, yes Youtube, I didn't forget that. Five, don't forget all the wannabe satanic Bibles ever written by a satanist which have all been forgotten! Six, and all the thousands of high priests, grandmagisters and all of their thousands of satanic churches, demonic temples. Seven, lets throw in death metal for the hell of it. Eight, how about those gibbering idiots we call Theistic satanists who believe Satan is a spirit person from sumeria and/or the 12th planet. Nine, yes websites galore, can't forget that shit. You're illegit if your venture doesn't have a well designed one. Ten, chatrooms! Yes, the Nobel Prize end result of cybersatanism can't leave out the all important chatrooms. You the reader can add more to the list if I forgot any Fruit of modern satanism. But Ten is enough fruit for me to evaluate the worth of the kamma wrought and the value of this species of memplex. You guys are fucking pathetic. The whole lot of you. You can deflect from these ten fruit by hiding behind your pretentious ego-based logic and rationalism and scientism and beliefs, but you cannot hide the fruits of your actual collective actions as a people under the influence of this memplex. 50 years and this is the most visible of your fucking fruit.

When I point a finger at mundane satanism, how many fingers am I pointing back at me and ONA? Three. Which is why I'm trying to figure shit out for the ONA, writing my thoughts, and hoping that the very few of you in ONA will find this, understand, and help out by forming our A Team. So in my Target and plant recollections we see there are two distinct groups of people. One group is Liberal, and the other is Conservative. You have the liberal group who are the random generic employees or workers. They are disorganized, incoherent, they have trouble working as a cooperative group where work load is divvied and shared. Then you have the conservative group of workers. These are the ones that have a visible organized structure to their group social order, there is a visible or discernible means of in group information or intelligence transfer. Not only does information travel well in this more organized group, but the information and intelligence has more power to causally manifest as act and then fruit. Work load is divvied up and given to this group's members. Everyone does their duty even under great stress. The work load gets done, and the rewards are shared after.

So here by "Liberal" I mean to say when you get 10 people and each of the 10 think only of themselves, are oblivious to the other 9, and have the mentality where they want to be free to do as they please, to just do their chore or job and not be bothered to do more than they they have to. By "conservative" in this context I mean when you have 10 people and those 10 gives up a portion of their self interest to work in a group dynamic, and where there is a group interest to maintain or Conserve such group effort and group dynamic. So lets do a thought experiment. Take your body and all of its vital organs and the individual jobs they do. Is your body a liberal bio-organic structure or a conservative bio-organic structure? And would you exist if every organ and cell in your body were liberal? Once we come to the understanding that our bodies is a conservative thingy, then we can ask: "Well what is this conservative biological mass most basic function or purpose? The answer is: to pass it's DNA. Now we can ask: Well what is DNA? And the answer is: a Complex of Information. If you are relatively smart, that in itself should get your brain working. If you are stupid and still can't see where this is going: What is a memeplex? A Complex of Information.

If you look at DNA or RNA in context to a living organism, we have 5 interconnected point. The first Point is the Amino Acid itself. Second Point is a set cluster of Amino Acid molecules. Third Point is the Protein such cluster of amino molecules generates. Fourth Point is the Organism and its needs. Fifth Point is the Environment of the Organism. The First Point is the single meme. By itself a single meme is worthless. Second point is a cluster of memes that form a meme-molecule. One example is White = Power, which is a simple two meme-molecule. When separated each of those two memes are worthless and everywhere. When combines it's like putting hydrogen with oxygen, it causes a burst of energy. Third Point is the physical Thing the meme-molecule is pegged to in the real world. The amino acid molecule is associated with a Protein. The White = Power meme-molecule is pegged to a Race. Fourth Point is the Organism itself. What's an Organism, a conservative Organized group of cells. What is an "Organism" to a memeplex? The collective Host such memeplex lives inside of. In our example the Organism of the White = Power memeplex is the Aryan NS subculture. Fifth point is the matrix or environ of that subculture, its society, nation, civilization, culture, etc. All 5 of those points must be interconnected where one influences change in the other. The environment can influence the needs of an animal or plant. The needs of a organism can influence the molecular clustering of amino acids which produces needed proteins. Over time these subtle changes is called evolution or Development.

In the wacky world of satanism we have the same Liberal and Conservative camps. The entire subcultural phenomenon of satanism is like an ocean. The conservative camp are like multicellular organisms. The liberal camp are like unicellular organisms existing as a mess of random plankton or something. The small camp of conservatives are the three Old Guards of satanism which are the Church of Satanism [1966], ONA [1972], and Temple of Set [1975]. Into this conservative camp goes the other organized groups, satanic churches, temples, and orders. The larger camp of liberals are the majority of Theists and the byproduct of the LaVeyan memplex which are the independent atheist, materialist, logic-geeks that populate the large satanic forums and social networks.

In this context by Conservative I mean when a group of satanists have for themselves an established weltanschauung, paradigm, subculture, shared history, shared group identity, etc, and when they have a vested interest in Conserving that shared stuff. By Liberal in this context I mean when a group of satanists are disorganized, incoherent, where they don't have a common history, no shared culture, no common paradigm or weltanschauung. Where they can't even agree on what satanism is, where each individual satanist insists that its own ego based self interest, self-opinions is paramount and all that matters, in such a way that no organization or common understanding of any sort is possible.

Satanism as a memplex can only realistically be passed down into the future intact through one of these camps. Guess which one and why. I'll point out a few reasons why the Liberal camp cannot long term wise pass the Complex of Information which is Satanism into the future. All you have to do is take a cross section of the Liberal camp such as the Theistic Sector of this Liberal camp and look at the rapidity and state of degeneracy Satanism exists in within this Sector. Not only do no two Theists agree on what Satanism or a Satan is, but via this Sector Satan has become a host of goofy things like a reptile alien, a mesopotamian, a demon, a vampire, a werewolf, and shit. Not only has Satan and Satanism become degenerate via this sector, but the memplex itself is decomposed and incoherent. There exists no common practice, no common rites, the 5 Points are disconnected. The memes aren't connected to anything physically real, there is no host organism for the memplex, such a disorganized mass of drooling idiots can't respond productively to social environment even to cause a development or evolution in a memplex which has actually decomposed.

The mass of incoherent Modern satanists in those forums and networks on a subcultural level does not fair any better. No two modern mundane satanists even agree on what Satanism is to pass the shit down into the future intact. Anything that requires the participation of two or more of these species of satanist is shunned as leprous conformity. Nevermind mentioning shit like culture and tradition with them. Satanism as a memplex this sector is also decomposed and disconnected with anything in the real world. They have thrown out their rites and ceremonies in their Satanic Bible they now mostly reject and solely hold onto ideas and their personal opinions of their ideas. It's not impossible in this sector for satanism to live a while. It has become implausible for satanism to live long in the Theistic sector. But in the modern satanism sector one would have to have a big mouth, a loud voice, and great marketing skills to pass one's complex of information down 50 years from now.

As far as competition of passing satanism down into the future and next generation, there is no realistic competition. The Conservative camp have the structure and means, and they are by default Conservative with their memplex. They even have a functioning memetic immune system to protect their memplex. You see this very developed in the Church of Satan, where when somebody brings up or introduces a meme not a recognized part of their established memplex, they react collectively to remove that meme and its host from infecting their memplex.

That's cool and all, but a groups is only as strong as its weakest link. Meaning that it doesn't matter how cultured a group is, if your membership base all caves in and abandons ship due to a couple trolls, then what good is that shit? If your membership base ditches your group out of boredom after 5 years, then what good is that? This kind of "damage" to structure in the conservative camp requires a lot of force. Whereas in the liberal camp say an individual satanist spent a great deal of time writing a self published book. Then 5 years later some other person comes out with a book with better ideas. What good is that shit then when the first guy wasted his effort which didn't due much but inspire some other guy to actually out compete him. In business talk we'd say that the "product" is highly mutable. By that I mean lets say you invent a coffee mug and you patent it with the description that it has one hoop handle. That is a highly mutable product which isn't even worth patenting because the minute it hits the market, some other guy or company will tweak that shit and patent a coffee mug with two hoop handles and a pretty stripe, and so on. USB flash drives are a good example of a highly mutable product. Which is funny because technically some guy or company in Taiwan I think owns a patent for the USB flash drive since they came up with it first, but it's such a useful/marketable idea, the whole planet just ignores that patent. At least with the conservative camp they have a collective product which is owned by their group collectively and they say: "This is our product, don't nobody change shit, this is how it will be marketed."

So what I figure ONA needs is not a big incoherent "membership" of liberals, but a small coherent group of conservatives. I've already explained twice what I mean by the words liberal and conservative when I use it in this essay. The coherency and structure of the group is important because the Information of ONA – its Complex of Information or DNA of the ONA – must be able to travel through that group constituents smoothly and unimpeded. This group needs to know the end result we want and must be able to divvy up the work load and each group member over time does their part: whatever they are good at [their Dharma]. Writing and sharing insights is my natural dharma. Let me do my thing. If art is your dharma, you do your thing and I stay out of your way. If publishing books is your dharma you excel in, then do it. Every constituent follows their dharma and stays out of each others way.

But the Quality of each associate is what is important, therefore each potential "member" needs to be tested. Eventually at the plant I helped out our scientist as his assistant and my technical job title became "Quality Control." My job was to test the ash for its quality and write a report back to the scientist and old people. My job was also to take samples of the wood we made each day and test them. A test I did was using an air pump device to slowly crack the my wood sample. The device gives me a reading to show how much pressure was used to crack it. Another test I did was an Impact Test where I used a big swinging machine with a heavy weight to impact my wood samples and the machine gave me a number representing the force of the impact. Another test was to put my wood samples in a rolling press machine thing which damaged the test wood and gave me a number. Another test I did was write dates on sample wood and put them out in the sun for many days and to see the effects of sun damage. Another test I did was to freeze my test wood and process them thought the other tests. Another test was to heat my test board in an oven, then process them when cooled to the same set of tests. The freezing and heating simulates weather over many years. Then I calculated the density of each days sample. I gave all my data to the scientist.

Now why did I put my wood to so many tests? Your mundane dummies will say because I hate the wood and want to abuse it. Because that is what they say when I test my people. Do I hate the wood? No dummy. I want the wood to be better. I want that wood to be its highest actualizable potential. Therefore I have to push it to its limit, use it, abuse it, manipulate it, etc. Go take a stroll down any of these mundane satanism's forums and look at their average untested member and tell me what the Quality of their average membership is. Seriously. The pathetic thing is those people aren't dead wood. They are living humans and they are made at such poor Quality. And what's more is that they think being tested and tried is bad and evil. I'm abusive that cry. I'm manipulative because I make people work they cry. Bitch if you don't work, then what the fuck good are you? If I can't rely on you that what the fuck good are you? If you can't take heat from me, or a troll, or cyberdrama, then what the fuck good are you. You think this ONA and its aims is just gunna manifest itself. You think ONA will be of super quality populated by whimps and pussies? And it's not just me testing people. Testing ourselves and other is a living part of the Seven Fold Way. Testing yourself and people should be a normal cultural habit of any ONA person mentoring a new cell. This ONA is only as strong as it's weakest link. If the ONA chain is made up of weak rusty links that break easily, then what good is ONA worth?

Everybody in ONA from 3 years ago knows I got tested. For 2 years straight the whole ONA attacked me, tried to chase me out, played mind games with me, didn't like me, called me names. Did I ever fold my cards? Unfortunately no. I'm still here. And after those two years people learned to feel out my quality and character. I don't cave into cyber attacks. Any person that caves in or is stressed out or put to the breaking point because of cyberdrama needs to turn off their computer and take a vacation in the real world, go join the military for 4 years, go work a labourous job under a slave driving boss for a year. Live a life as an Asian growing up in a traditional family for 18 years, where you have to obey every one older than you or get a whooping, where you look at your grandmother wrong and you get beat, where your uncle dad beats you you get the top grade in your class. Do that for 18 years and come back online you faggots.

I got yelled at for 21 years straight in my family and I still did my chores and duties while everyone was yelling at me. You white people whine when you get grounded for a month cuz you can go hang out, talk on the fone, or watch TV. Being an Asian girl in a very Traditional family is perpetual grounding for 21 years. And through all the lack of freedom, the yelling, the Disciplining I still put in my work. I still love my family. I still take orders from my elders. I still nursed my elders till they died. Fuck you hubris white Americans and your liberal way of life. Go take out your grandma from her nursing home and bathe her, clean her, feed her and sleep by her side during your free time until she dies in front of you and than step up to me and act like you're better than me. Otherwise nothing you say, type, or opinionate about me, makes a ripple in my heart. Especially shit said over the internet. You think I'm pathetic like you? And you yourself are the Fruit of your people and parents theories, beliefs, opinions, thoughts, and actions. You each are the Fruit. You white hubris Americans don't have to show me your actions and deed, or show off your brains to me. You yourselves are the Fruit. And you know you as the Fruit are worthless. This internet cyberreality you white hubris American boys and white hubris American girls and the empty [lacking substance] thought and opinions you dumbfucks throw around is all you can do and will do. You are worth, and opinionating like children is all you ever will be worth as a people. And the children you bring into this world will be just like you.

I hanged ten for the 2 years ONA "attacked" me. And I'm still here. I get it from my birth mom. She the type of person who tries even harder when people talk shit. People said that she'll never go to college. She did and at 40 something she still goes to the same college and has never stopped. People said she will never own a house. She owns two one she rents out and the other she bought for her mother who. And she lives with me in a third one owned by her husband, my step dad. People said she would never own a business of her own. She does and she works a career. People said she would never have a nice expense car. She has 5. And my little mom takes care of her elderly mother and 8 siblings. And my little mom gives her mother $1000 a month of spending money. And she survived a genocidal revolution. And she came here to this country with nothing. My mom kicks your mom's ass. That's the Quality of Woman I was born from. What's you mom worth besides sucking your dad's dick off? That's the quality of woman you White Hubris American Mundanes are born from. Don't act like you are better than me. The more you talk shit about her, the more she uses that as fuel to drive her to get better. She tells me as a mother: "Don't ever let them win, not my blood. Don't ever let those white people or any people tell you who you are and what you can or can't be. Not my flesh and blood." You mundanes keep talking about me and ONA. It's just fuel for the fire. I don't fold my cards under pressure. I work harder. You bitch out under pressure.

These hubris mundanes act like union workers. You crack the whip on them and test their guts and they cry and tell on you. You can't test one of them. You can't tell them what to do. They call that using them. The concept of Quality does not exist to them. They just have opinions. It's the quality of their opinions that matter, not the Quality of their person, guts, and blood. Because they are peasant stock people: Common. Do we want that worthless breed of people in ONA? Do you want that low quality of person born from a low quality woman to be your peer? Do you let that lowly quality person born of a low quality woman influence you and affect you with what they say about you and what groups or things you are into? Just like union workers these mundanes satanists want as much respect and handouts for as little work as possible. They just want to stand their and share their important opinions and theories with you and get the adoration and admiration and praise for it. And you look at the quality and worth of their satanism and its shit. And these same people on a much bigger level wonder why jobs are expatriated to other countries. And then they cry about their economy and not having a job. And when they do get a job the cry about being working too hard. They cry about anything.

When my former boss Ed put me on his A Team and gave me special favours the whole store of them talked shit about me and us how we kick ass, yada yada. Why was Ed giving me and my 6 Team members special favours and they were left out? Because I worked, did what I was told, didn't have to be babysitted, kept working under pressure, and still took orders from the boss understanding he too is human and is under pressure. I did kiss anybody's ass. And what did they do? Bitch when they were asked to do something not in their job description. Milked the time and bitched when they were made to work at a normal pace. And you see the whole lot of them huddled together talking shit and agreeing with each other because you are not one of them and don't think like them or do like them and these same common peasants in mundane satanism do the same shit and they dare say they it isn't herd mentality. They call it being an "individual." What they mean is being Liberal.

Are these the type of people that we want in ONA now, 10, 20, 30, 50 years from now? If not, then every ONA person today needs to understand that this low quality of people hates being tested. The way to weed them out is to filter our kind out of theirs by putting every body that comes to ONA to the test. Test them. Use them. Manipulate them. Those that leave in a huff and puff of whine are peasants. Those that have the guts and blood to endure and find our level are our breed and kind: Noble Born.

I don't mind being used. As long as I get something in return. Big Rod used me to get a promotion. I had no problem with that. Just give me what I earned: your love, loyalty, respect, and reliability. I want to go to you when I need something and you work for me just like I did for you. I will use and abuse you, but I give you what you earned: my love, loyalty, respect, and reliability. Ask me shit, and I'll work my ass off for you and never question why. When we have pushed each other to our breaking points, have learned to work together under stress, can put up with each other's shit, and still be loyal to each other and work for one another, then we're Family.

Some ONA people from 3 years ago may wonder why I put up with all that shit and why I'm still here. What am I doing? What's my intention? You once thought I came to steal ONA or take it over or take it from you. You thought I was gunna be another grandmagister taking shit that isn't mine. What's my intent and why am I putting effort into ONA? Cuz its my job. I'm just a ONA "member" doing my job. I'll take the shits and heat from you, and I'll keep working. For what? For the ONA as a whole, because I genuinely love it. It's that simple.

I put in the effort, energy, and years for other ONA people because I believe you are my kin and kind. I know ONA people who have projects in ONA. There are those of you who publish ONA books, who make music for ONA, each of us have our own personal projects we are working on. Who benefits when ONA stays alive and grows bigger? You and I all do collectively. I put in my share of work for that. Hang ten with me for just 10 years more and keep your music, art work, and book projects going. Our market will be bigger and you'll each have more people to help you out or buy your stuff. That's all I'm doing. It's just what I am good at doing. It's my dharma. All I ask is you don't let those mundanes win, and just put in your dharma and work with me as a team.

I also do what I do for DM. Because he is one of few people, actually the only person to have such a heavy influence on my mind. I do the shit I do for DM. So that the ONA can be a coherent medium through which his philosophy and insights pass into the future, which will survive him. I do what I do for myself. So that ONA is also a vehicle for my ideas and insights. I did what I do for each ONA member, if you would just learn to use the ONA we build together as a vehicle to teach and influence a future unborn generation. I do what I do for my future children who will be born in this West. I want them to have a kick as vehicle that helps bring out the best quality in them, which will help them rise above the common plebeian American. I do it for the West, because I honestly love America and Europe as a Civilization. I was born in this civilization. I know it can be better and should be better above all other civilizations. But it is sick with a liberal disease, and I don't mean the political liberalism. It is infested with a sick people who have lost their roots and humanness and natural way of life. They refuse to wake up and grow up.

You can't wake them up and grow them up. The only real option is to wait for them to die. They only live for 100 years and they die. It is the unborn generations in the West who will manifest and inherit this Western Civilization of ours. Those unborn are my target and audience I speak to and write for. You who are in my future when I am long dead. Don't let this sickly breed of people destroy your civilization like they have deteriorated everything else they touch. The best thing you can do is to realize that their mundanity and magian ethos is the sickness of this Western civilization of ours. You of the future are the only ones who can right what they have wronged. They have to socially and psychologically be quarantined and left to rot, so that they will take their magian disease with them.

Our most effective group structure we can work on creating with the right tested type of people is Family/Clan. Random membership in some forum or group can and do fluctuate under pressure and boredom. But your father doesn't ditch you when he is bored or stressed out. Your spouse doesn't bail out on you [if they truly love you]. Your children are still yours in easy times and hard times. With these satanic orders, membership dies off after 2 years because people get bored. What good is that? What good was all the huffing and puffing, debating, and logic and intelligence, the former USSR as a civilization was spewing if it only lasted 100 or so years? And then what?

I figure that a Clan is ONA's best vehicle to penetrate into the future. By clan I mean blood kin and close friends. To me the word "Folk" and Clan mean the same thing. What do I mean when I say: "How are your folks doing?" I don't mean how is your race doing. I mean how are your parent doing. Wat do you mean when you meet me and ask me: "Can I ask where you folks come from?" That didn't mean where do you Asians a lot come from. From Asia duh. It means where do me and my family and friends around me come from. My Folk is my Kinfolk, your Clan. The Clan is ONA best chance of survival into the future because it has the realistic potential to be very conservative with its traditions and culture and it has the extra benefit of having the default means to pass that conserved culture and tradition to its children and grand children. Think about: 1 human lived for at least 90 years. Just have one human dedicated to the ONA, and the ONA will live for 90 years. It's simple math.

The challenge is to find such a person with the fortitude and endurance and dedication to be ONA for 90 years. How is that done? There are several ways, but the simplest and most plausible way is by breeding. By that I mean by actually and intentionally making babies raised in ONA "Kulture" and Tradition. Then let them pass ONA to their peers and friends in their time frame. The second method is to test people who come to ONA. To test them so as to filter out those with the resolve and dedication DM had. He put in 40 years into this ONA thing. If he can do it then why can't you or I? What's he eating that I'm not that makes him special? Nothing. But the important point to consider is that to DM ONA is a personal project. Thus he has a reason to put so much effort and time into it. Which is why I am urging and asking for ONA to be peer based. That way ONA becomes each of our own private projects. This is how I see ONA, and the "secret" of how and why I put in my time and devotion into it. People tend to not want to give something all of their effort and time if it is someone else's work. And nobody has to manipulate me to put in my work because I manipulate myself. I'm just that "evil" and sadistic. I do trick myself into believing that ONA is my personal project that's how and why I get myself to put in the time and effort. But it's just a trick I play on myself for the end result. It's not in my nature to take what is not mine. ONA belong to DM rightfully, until he legitimately gives it to us.

So those are my personal thoughts on a few things that bubbled up. I'm just writing as the thoughts pass by thinking out loud. I think for ONA the best way to go is a small conservative group of associates. It's not the numbers, but the coherency and conservation of Information, and our ability to give our memplex all that we have. Our 100% for as long as we have. We already have a small group. That's all we need. If a few more find their way to us in time that is great. The thing would be for each of us to know that we are seeds of a clan, and that we need to work on gradually manifesting these clans. This takes a long time. No girl can give birth to an entire clan in one life time. The other thing to keep in mind is that if we let ONA be infected with those liberal pigs, our work is wasted because their presence will decompose the coherency of what we have put together. People have to be tested, so we can filter out the pigs from our kind. All we need is a small number of dedicated people and we're good to go. Fuck those mundanes. Let them have their diseased satanism, and keep them there. If you understand the spirit of this long essay you will know that nothing good [productive] will come out of those mundanes but opinions. They are worthless. Time is then one of our greatest testers. Time weeds out those with no endurance from those with the endurance to go the distance. Time will cause the weak among us to atrophy and fall off the ONA body. If we can refine ONA by having a small coherent group of dedicated associated each following their own dharma, ONA will exist in our future and outlive mundane satanism.

MY PGP KEY

My PGP Key Data

For aeonic purposes I will be using the same Name [Chloe 352], One PGP Key [B36DA221], and one blog [onanxs.wordpress.com] for the next 30 years. The picture above contains the important data associated with my pgp key. Keep in mind that it has a Subkey number which is: [53D314DB]. The subkey number will show if you use gpgshell to verify my pgp signatures. I am the only one with both my private and public pgp key, so I am the only one who can make sigs and messages with this key number.

From hereon, any PDF's I make, or things I circulate in public domain shall have affixed a pgp signature. Inside each signature will be written a short code in a cipher which will say a few things about the time, day, context, and reason for the signature. Each pgp sig is time and date stamped. Any alteration or even change in spacing invalidates the sig. Also; although it is unlikely; if I ever make a post in cyberspace somewhere during and after 2012 for the next 30 years, will have my pgp sig affixed. There should be no reason for me to be online anywhere but here, and a few private places from hereon out.

The reason of using a pgp sig is for aeonic reasons like I said. 10, 20, 30, years from now everyone should know that the Chloe of then is the same one here writing this message. One Name, One PGP Key, One Blog for 30 years. When this blog is full, I will start a new WordPress and leave relevant information about the new WordPress here.

The above picture contains a hidden Steganographic file inside using the 1c4nnoph2463 program. The stegofile is a pdf I made with a few private words and my pgp sig.

From now on, all PDF's I create for the ONA or WSA will always have a PGP sig on them to verify that each PDF is from me. This is for future security purposes. Any key number not the one in that picture is not mine. The brief coding is a notation for me, so I will be able to tell if someone copies and pastes a random old sig of mine out of time, date, and context. Those WSA Disciples associated with me can also read the coding. If you are retarded and are fool by such tricks, then whatever. I'm not even gunna bother going out of my way to correct anybody. If you are ONA or WSA you should know how to use GnuPG to verify and decrypt these things. The coded message will always have dates and data which ties a sig to a specific time and context.

GPGshell is a good tool because it tells you the exact day and time a signature was made. If you don't have GnuPG you can go download it here: GnuPG, or Cryptophane is pretty good also. Gpg4usb is great too. I have about 5 different kinds of gpg/pgp software/programs. Cryptophane & gpg4usb are great because they work out of your usb flash drive. GPGshell needs GnuPG installed to work. If you have Windows like me, get GPG4Win & GPGshell will work with that. Gpg4usb shows you data of the exact time and date a sig or message was made, along with the key number and fingerprint.

Quick quote re PGP encryption:

"If all the personal computers in the world – 260 million – were put to work on a single PGP-encrypted message, it would still take an estimated 12 million times the age of the universe, on average, to break a single message." - William Crowell, Deputy Director, National Security Agency.

Note: All pgp sigs and pgp messages I make and use will have a shapshot copy and pdf copy archived and stored here for validation and verification purposes. The snapshot will always be the Original one I made. I will also always leave a reason why each sig I made here. After Jan of 2010, for the next 30-40 years, every pgp sig and pgp message I make will have an encoded unique serial number. Each serial number will be stored, archived, and recorded here in this page with a snapshot of their Original sig. Any sig or message anywhere in cyberspace not archived here in this wordpress, here in this page – for the next 30-40 years – is not made by me and is invalid.

Beginning in 2012 and onward, I WILL NOT be in cyberspace posting in any place, forum, or social network, besides the o9a backroom and the Myatt List. If anybody in cyberspace is pretending to be me, you should first know it isn't me. Second ask them to simply post a pgp sig real quick and verify the pgp sig. If the pgp key used is not the one I have given here in this page, then it is not me, period. The pgp key I have given in this page is the only one I will be using for the next 30-40 years. No other key number is me. No other email address is me.

A pgp sig with the serial number: [00[09[28732]2]1][2732]0002[[05]]00] was made by me on 2.2.2012 for the Amended Constitution of the Accepton of 123 year of fayen. The Constitution was refined with a few significant changes and put into PDF format. The PDF is now in private circulation. A copy of this pgp sig had been recorded in my private diary. The PDF is dated and time stamped.

The above is a snapshot of a gpg signature I made for the Traditional Satanism PDF I created which I circulated in public domain. The gpg sig is archived in my diary. Note the Serial Number. The picture is the original as it looked on the program I used. The PDF I made is 1692 pages long and 71 megz big.

I made the above gpg sig for a pdf called "Joining The ONA" which is in public circulation. The pdf can be found in the o9a archive page here. it is 124 pages and 1.5 megz. This is the original snapshot of the sig.

NEXIONS & BRIDGES

I remember when I was little my parents took us on a vacation to visit some relatives up in San Jose. We stayed in one of my cousin's house. I slept with my cousin Pamela, who is my same age. The boy cousins use to tease her and call her Pamuncula (Pam+Dracula) because she had this weird skin condition where she'd break out in rashes if she stayed in the sun for too long without long sleeves.

After we had settled in for a few days my uncle and auntie said they would take us to see San Francisco. They asked my parents what they wanted to go see. My dad wanted to go downtown to see the architecture of the buildings for some reason. My mom and auntie (being Asian I guess) just wanted to go to China Town. Great, my uncle said, we'll drive over the Bridge so the kids can see.

I think back then (I was about 8 or 9) I had only seen a picture of the San Francisco bridge once somewhere; or it was perhaps a picture on a tv show I once watched. All I knew was that it was red.

So my dad put flowers in my hair and Pam's and said it's a tradition to wear flowers in your hair when you go to San Francisco because of some hippy song. And we left. I guess it was exciting; like I couldn't wait to see the red bridge with my own eyes.

We parked our cars right outside the big red bridge that hogged up the landscape. My eyes opened wide, and there was the usual: Wow. And that was it for me. I was scared of heights, so I refused to walk on it to look over the edge. I close my eyes even when we drive over bridges, because I'm afraid we might fall off of it. Pam was the same way like me, so my auntie stayed behind to watch us since she had seen it plenty.

Then it was time to drive across it to go into the City. Me and Pam were holding each other with our eyes and ears closed, so I didn't get to see the bridge at all. You girls can open your eyes and ears now, my auntie said. We passed the bridge and I saw our destination ahead of me, which was more awesome and exciting to think about, then a crummy bridge. I looked back, to watch our car drive away from the bridge, and it got smaller and smaller, until I couldn't see it any more, because the tall building had now hogged up the scenery.

The city was definitely way more cooler to see. All the roly streets, like hills. The weird people with mohawks and leather jackets, and the forest of tall buildings. It all made you feel very small. Then we entered China Town, which was like going to China itself. Everything was in Chinese and stuff. I had forgotten about the bridge, nor did I really care to recall it.

There was another time when I was slightly older (13). One of my grandmothers (a blood sister of my direct blood granny) gave me a gold necklace with a Jade pendent of Primeda [Goddess-Mother] Gung Im (what the Khmer call Kuan Yin). There were red threads wrapped here and there around the necklace. It was dark green jade, which is the more higher quality kind. It looked like an emerald.

My grandmother put it around my neck as she was whispering something below her breath with her blood red mouth. The old grannies chew betel nut and lime, which turns their spit and teeth blood red. The grandmother said that Gung Im will take care of me, and that she herself had asked for the pendent to be given to me in a dream she had.

She said that it should never be given to a male to touch or wear, or they would get cursed or something. I asked why boys can't touch it? And the grandmother said because Gung Im is sexist, or that she prefers girls, and dislikes boys.

As she was putting it on me, I saw the back part was wrapped in gold, and it had three English letters on it: TNM. I thought that was strange, because none of the grannies knew English, so I asked her what TNM meant? She said that she will tell me when the time was right. And she gave me a blessing and said for me to go and live life, because it was the only teacher worth learning from.

So I did. I grew older and had my experiences during high school. I tried the drugs, the boyfriends, the sneaking out of the house, all the usual stuff any normal girl would go through. My most memorable experience were the heart ache and heart break of boys using me, boyfriends breaking up with me, whatever. Only because it hurt so bad, and I cried so much over it.

The time came when I was 18 for me to learn what TNM meant. By then the grandmother who gave the necklace to me was very old and in her death bed. The old ones in the family say that we all know when it is our time to go. And the grandmother knew her time was near. I would sit there by her side and listen to her tell me she was going to die in a month or two, even though to me, she looked fine for her age. By her ancient side, I was indoctrinated into her ancient culture.

As I sat there she told me in Khmer that a man is worth only a drop of his sperm, otherwise, men are useless to the female race. That they make only good soldiers and money makers. That out of women comes all of humanity, and through us passes human culture, human civilization, human language, and the hopes and dreams of humanity. That women were like bridges, through which the spirit of humanity passes. And that is all that we really are. Just a means for the future and spirit to pass through, then we die. She said that she learned three words in English, so she could tell me with her own lips what TNM meant, before she died: Trust No Man.

The grandmother passed on two months later, as she had said. It's strange to have someone you have known and interacted with be gone forever. I thought about what she had told me, and it was true. All she was to us was a bridge, through which passed a spirit – essence – culture; and although she may have died and was no longer with us, what passed through her “lived” with us – inside of us; made us; defined us. And through us; through me, onto my own children and grandchildren, will pass the same ancient tradition.

“Khom [don't] Juer [believe] Sath [animal] Manuss Pros [male human/man]” at that moment in time meant something to me. Because of what I had experienced directly in life, and what I have seen. TNM are three letters I still live by to this day, and to me personally they have value and meaning, and influences my personal life.

I suppose perhaps it was how I was raised and brought up, or how my own culture is, that causes me, or my eyes to look at things differently you see? The person to me is of little importance. What messages passes through the person to me, and if these teaching have value to me are more important.

From time to time a bridge, or living nexion will come and through this person, a message, teaching, culture, tradition, new insight, will be passed.

Jesus, Buddha, Muhammad, Thomas Jefferson, Nietzsche, Genghis Khan, Oliver Cromwell, King James, Hitler, Mao, the great Adam Smith. These men have come and gone. It doesn't even matter if any of these were real or imaginary people any more, because they are all equally non-existent to us now. But during their brief intrusion in this world a message was past, which had meaning to a group of people. Which helped them live their lives and see a better future for their people. Perhaps in life, many scored them, hated them, spread malicious rumors about them, discredit them, and even sought to kill them.

None of these men are really important. No man inspired a people alone by his mere existence. It is the insights and hope he brings and gives to a people who will listen; who will see value in it; and most importantly: a people who will make something real and practical out of what was passed through them. My grandmother who gave me TNM might as well have never existed. She might as well be a figment of my family's imagination. It doesn't matter. What matters is that I took those three letters, and made something real and practical out of it, which guides my life, and steers me into a direction. It doesn't matter who or what my grandmother was in life, whether she was a saint or a slut. Something I myself found meaningful passed through her to me.

I find this Western-Occidental way of seeing things odd and immature, this focus on the messenger and not the message. Like dogs staring at it's master's finger, rather than what is being pointed at. And even when the occidental eyes have taken notice of the message, they dissect it, and take it apart, to intellectually criticize whatever they can evaluate with their non-empirical intelligence and reasonings. Like swine trampling on pearls. Never considering how hard it is for an oyster to make a pearl, at what lengths the fishermen had to go through physically to retrieve it, and the intrinsic value some people see in it.

And I suppose it's a cultural thing. It is so easy in the East for religions to get so mixed up into a gumbo that we don't even bother naming it, or we just call it a single name for the sake of convenience. The teachers who taught it, never really mattered. The "religion" I was raised in may be called Buddhism out of convenience, but it is a gumbo soup of Brahmanism, Hinduism, indigenous animism, Shaivism, Shaktism, Taoism, and now even the teachings of Christianity and Islam have been added to the mix. And nobody cares who made it or where it came from, or if the one the teachings came from was stainless or whatever. If it works – use it to make you a better person. If you see value in it – hold onto it. That's it.

And to me personally, the ONA is just another addition to my private gumbo soup of insights and practical methodologies. I am more than what was written in ONA manuscripts. More than the memplexes of Buddhism or whatever. These are merely things I have discovered and found to be useful to myself – which helps me grow and progress.

But in the West you have this stupid inability to empathize. An inability to see the value in something divorced from the bridge that it crossed over from. Protestants and Catholics don't mix. Jews and Muslims hate each other. Surely Christianity can't be mixed with Buddhism, because they came from two different people. Hitler is evil, but George Washington is great, even though the amount of native Americans that vanished far exceeds what Jews were slaughtered. The nexions/bridges/people themselves takes central stage. Any message that comes from a social reject must be crazy. And if he isn't crazy, then make him look crazy.

It's really odd for me to walk into "ONA world," and see this Occidental immaturity. The immaturity of not being able to separate the message from the messenger. The teachings and insights from the David Myatt.

All this internet chattering about how the ONA isn't real. Who cares? Is it valuable and practical to some? All this talk about how the ONA never accomplished its goals. What does that have to do with what practical value it has? All this talk about how: Oh Myatt left the ONA for Islam, or he's insane. Who cares? I don't. He could have been a genetically mutated quadriplegic (like Carl Sagan), and it still doesn't really mean shit. It's whether what has passed through him (Myatt) or them – Sagan and whoever, has any insightful and practical value to others, and if they can make something (or sense) out of it. Can you make something out of it – said the inventor, to the corporation.

What does it truly matter who Myatt is, what he did in life, what political or religious beliefs he had, what he ate for breakfast? From a chromorphic perspective; or Five Dimensional, if you will; Myatt is just a glitch in something called: Forever. He will pass away some day, and when he does, it will be as if he never existed at all – especially to the people and generations that will come long after us. From this perspective, it just doesn't even matter who or what Myatt is. What matters is something passed through him, out of his mind, and into a few other minds. Whatever passed through Myatt into some of us, will continue to exist long after we are gone.

What we should look at, or how I see it, is: does what Myatt/Long teach – that which passed through him – seem to have a practical value? If so let's put it into practice and see if we can make something out of it. THEN, and only after we have TRIED to make it work in our own personal lives, can we pass Empirical judgment/evaluation.

What does Empirical mean? It means 'information gained by means of Experience, Experimentation, and Observation.' It's the Cornerstone of something we call "Empirical Science." You see, unless you've personally put Myatt's stuff to use within your own private life, Experienced it, Experimented with it, and personally Observed yourself from direct personal experience that it does or doesn't work – then you're just talking shit. Stupid shit at that. Stupid shit here meaning: unscientific and non-empirical.

From where do you make your opinions, notions, idea, and judgments about Myatt, the ONA, and its "Way?" From biased passion you develop from reading shit on the fucking internet? You fucking weakasses. Do you allow internet gibberish, other people's ideas and opinions control your thoughts, and influence your worldview on things and people? Grow a fucking brain and individual identity. Shit.

You can be as erudite with your intelligence as a scholar with a doctorate but what you know, can never compare to a simple empirical experience and observation I personally had – which mostly remains unwritten. What does erudite mean? It means to be learned in a scholarly, academic way; with emphasis on gaining your information out of books. Book knowledge did not originate from thinking, debating, and philosophizing. It was born at one time from a mind that empirically experience something who gained insights from that experience and experimentation. Only afterwards, was it written down.

How does the erudite intellectualism of a person compare to the empirical realization an ONA Initiate has gained from personal direct experience? You can shove a pile of books by Dr. Gregg or Dr. Phil in my face about relationships; but all of these books combined can't compare to the unwritten experiences I have had personally with relationships – and what wisdom, insights, and realization I have gained from them.

This ONA isn't a school where one comes to learn erudite intellectualism. It is a methodology – something meant to be applied empirically. The real value of the ONA is the unwritten wisdom, insights, and realizations each of it's Initiates have privately gained. It's stupid to demoralize a pile of ONA manuscripts or the person who wrote them; because those things aren't "the ONA." Each Initiate's private and individual path in life, and what she or he personally – empirically – gains from walking that path is the genuine "ONA." If you are not me, and have never walked in my shoes, nor know what is unwritten in my heart; then how do you attack and criticize that with your erudite intellectualism and evaluations? Just because the ONA seems to not work "out there" or for other people; doesn't mean it does not work for me; or that I cannot make something that works out of it.

No-one is perfect. Not even Myatt. He wears glasses – that means he doesn't even have perfect biological 20/20 vision. That's the problem with anything that emanates out of the mind of one mind – it inherits both the strengths and weaknesses of that parent mind. You understand? You have to have it in you as a mature human being, with intelligence to understand this. That we all have mental, emotional, psychological, strengths and weaknesses, which are uniquely our own. And that what comes out of the mind /mouth of an individual – no matter who they are – will always inherit those strengths and weaknesses by default. Once you understand that, you can then supplement – compliment your own personal strengths to equalize the inherent weaknesses – that's called EVOLUTION.

It's how nature/life works over a period of causal time. An animal is tossed out into the natural arena to live and be tested in the real world; and over time, nature works out the bugs – and here we are. The ONA is like that hypothetical animal. Myatt made a primordial ONA and tossed it out into the real world. As a "living entity" it will make mistakes; it will fail here and there; but from these mistakes and failures, it learns to work out its bugs. It will adapt, and through those adaptations there is growth – progression.

What maybe strengths and strong points about the ONA within context to one time frame, might not always be strengths in another. But how can we know? By applying it, experimenting with it, and testing it. Thus, over a period of time we gain an understanding of what parts of the ONA becomes weak and ineffective. We fade out or tone down those parts for a latter era when it might be useful, and bring in or phase up more effective points.

But whether the ONA is effective out in the big real world is not the real matter or why the ONA exists. The matter and question is: Does it work for you as an individual person? Can you personally make something out of it? Do you see value in it? If applied in your private life, does it make you a better person. Does it help you master yourself and your life? That should be all that matters to you about the ONA. Because aeonically, it is through you – the individual initiate – that the ONA passes into the future. It is through you that the ONA evolves and becomes more effective.

Everything else is just crap and shit talk. What does it matter to me as my own person if another Initiate of the ONA seems incompetent with his ONA? It just means that he wasn't an effective bridge for the Dark to cross through. Let it go and focus on yourself. If you feel the ONA doesn't work, make it work for your own self. If you think it doesn't exist, make it exist to you. No-one else matters. Others don't fit into the fundamental equation of the ONA. It wasn't really designed to be an organized, structured organization. It's a private, individualistic endeavour. There will always be the many weak asses who will claim ONA that might give it a bad rep, due to the fact that ONA MSS is generically available to any semi-literate creature. But they don't have anything to do with YOUR personal ONA. It's about you as an evolving person. Your private internal alchemy. The people you may pass it and teach it to. If you would just focus on your own self, rather than on Myatt or Others, the ONA – in time – will work. It will in time – aeonically – accomplish its long term goals. It's a matter of time, keeping up with time, and adapting to the changes time brings. Progress or die.

As an individual person – me, myself, and I – the ONA has personal meaning and value; as do many other things. I could care less if the ONA was just a joke Myatt made up one day because he was bored. It doesn't matter to me. Because I personally see something in it. I apply its principles and methodology in my own personal life, and it works for me and me alone – I made something out of it. If it wasn't real, I can make it real in time – through me, as it passes through me to my close friends, and my children.

Who knows, maybe its being a girl is what makes me see things differently? When boys buy toys, they buy toys that comes as is. Like Tonka trucks, or whatever they play with; G.I. Joe figurines. When something breaks or the toy doesn't seem to work on par anymore, they dislike it and abuse it, and throw it away. Like the religions and politics they play with comes as is – already made in one piece. And if it doesn't work it is abused, dislikes, soiled, and thrown away.

We girls play with dolls. If one day one of my dolls isn't up to par, I just change her outfit – her outer appearance to match how I feel inside. We get emotionally attached to our personal things, even if they are old and not working – we just make something new out of it. I guess that's what I like about the ONA – it's like a doll you can dress up. Unlike those other religious institutions, which comes in one 'already made' piece. Or maybe that's just how I see and use the ONA in my own personal life. And it works for me.

Those of us of the ONA, know it has, over the 30-40 years of its existence, achieved many accomplishments. It has actually influenced many people and has changed the "face" of profane Satanism. Those times are gone now. But can we see or admit that the ONA may not have done well in other ventures and endeavours? If not; if we are in denial; then we will never be able to see our own weaknesses to evolve the ONA, to make it relevant for a future age and people. With each new era comes new challenges which we as individual people, families, cities, states, corporations, must face and adapt to – the ONA is no different.

You cannot look at the ONA with your localized time goggles on. That's like looking at the primordial apes we came from that went extinct and saying they failed as a species. The fact that they don't exist anymore, and that we have taken their place attests to their evolutionary triumph against competition with all those other protohumanoids like Neanderthals. It's like looking back at your teenage years and saying you are a total failure in life because you made a few mistakes, and did a few stupid shit things. That's not how things work "Five Dimensionally." You learned from your past mistakes, and from the experience those stupid things you did brought, you became wiser – which make you who you are today as a living – progressing entity.

The only thing that should matter to those of us that resonate with the ONA is: does it have value and meaning to you? And can you make something out of it? If not – move along. If yes – Try. Don't let this shit talking from outsiders and some confused "insiders" keep you as an independent, intelligent, mature human being, prevent you from trying to put the Sinister Seven Fold Way into practical use for yourself and your own private life. Understand that it's not perfect, and that it was intended for you to add your own personal strengths to it.

The ONA, like any living thing, is not – and can never be – a finished product. It is a becoming – a verb. As you are a becoming – a happening – an event in progress.

Myatt no longer has anything to do with what we know of as the ONA. He stopped having anything to do with it, the minute it left his head. In the same way the Atom Bomb is to Einstein. Einstein may have conceived of the equation: $e=mc^2$; but that equation fell into the hands of the likes of Oppenheimer, and warlords, and it evolved – on it's own terms – into something that really has nothing to do with the original mind that gestated that seed thought (the equation). Although, to many of us, Myatt will always be known as the genius composer; through whose mind; the ONA came into existence as a system of practical apprehension of personal empirical wisdom.

It doesn't matter if Einstein and Oppenheimer were Jews, Nazis, Muslims, or crack heads. They were all just vehicles through which something acausal (the seed thought-form) passed through into our world which – through other vehicles evolved into all the nuclear arsenal we now have armed ourselves with as a species – all for a future reason and purpose – a reason which transcends the confines of localized time and localized awareness.

When we learn to transcend localized time perception, and see things from a chronomorphic – or Aeonie – angle of perception, we begin to understand that “things” come into existence in what we term “the past,” to affect what we term “the future” for reasons. And if we look very close, we will see that the future reason is always us as a species, in some way.

Benjamin Franklin flying his kite in a lightning storm wasn't just a localized event. It is an “acausal intrusion” which evolve – which is – the light bulb which is on in your room and the computer you are using. The tar the Romans “discovered” which was later used to seal the bellies of ships wasn't a localized event. It was an “aeonic” “exoscalar” [meaning outside of time] “entity/event” which became – which is the fuel that brought our human race to the surface of the moon, and which made landing rovers on Mars possible.

Even what we term “religion” isn't what it appears to be Aeonically. The thought-form which germinated into Christianity wasn't a localized event. christianity wasn't just a Roman cult. It was/is aeonically – a civilization – a civilization which gave birth to modern Europe and America.

Karl Marx didn't just write a book of his opinions. Through him as a nexion, virtually/literally – from an Aenic perspective – passed the USSR, China, and all Communist republics. Without whom, we would have never had the competition/insentive to cause us to go to the moon.

If we – those of us who honestly understand, or try to understand, Myatt's mind and these concepts he issued forth – truly understand what Myatt actually taught; what passed through him; then we cannot localize the ONA and condemn him or it [ONA] as not having accomplished much, or even being a failure.

What is the ONA Aeonically? What future “thing” passed through Myatt? And what are we to this seed-thought, but hosts and vehicles to give it life, so it can make it's way to that future time?

Myatt didn't fail anything; if we try to understand his writings from his point of view. He did what he set out to do and moved on – he wrote manuscripts and established the seed-thought of the ONA. That's it. Those fertile minds that resonated with those manuscripts germinated that seed-thought into the ONA. If the ONA failed anything, it's not anyone's fault, but the fault and incompetence; or inexperience; of the people who make up the body/corpus of the ONA themselves. In other words: if the ONA sucks, it's because you/we suck. Myatt has absolutely nothing to do with the fact that we suck ass. He's done and moved on.

Whose fault is it really if we would rather be internet jocks rather than throw molotov cocktails at Jews or the Magian? Myatt's? The inanimate teachings of ONA MSS? No, it's our own incompetence, or half-ass nature that is to blame. Only when we ourselves come to an understanding that we suck ass, can we fix ourselves – IF such an issue exists. Then we can make something out of what we have inherited – or what we are hosts to. But as I stated up there somewhere – we cannot view this ONA from a localize perspective and judge it based on a single frame of its overall existence.

This ONA is still becoming – it will always be in the process of becoming – as all living things in nature are. It becomes through us, and those we pass it onto. As it became out of Myatt, and was passed to us. In the end, we are all just bridges for it's crossing... this Dark.

NINE ANGLES AND VEDIC JYOTISHA

My personal Quest to gaining a “better” or more personal or intimate understanding of what the ONA terms the “Nine Angles” like most of how I have come to understand the ONA, comes from my own indigenous culture, by accident.

I was asking my aunt-mom to recite the seven days of the week in Khmer for me since I can only remember two. The two I remembered was Sunday and Monday. I remembered those two because for some odd reason, in Khmer the literal translation was “Day of the Sun,” and “Day of the Moon.” In Khmer Sunday is “Ngay [Day] Adit[Sun]” and “Ngay Chan [Moon],” Ngay rhyming with the English word “My” with the “Ng” being nasalized. Chan being the Khmer form of the Sanskrit “Chandra” meaning “Moon.”

I thought it was weird how two different cultures and people with so much time and distance between them could at least have two names of days of a week named after the same sun and moon. So I asked my aunt-mom to name me the rest and explain to me what they were named after. My aunt-mom knew the names, but she did not know what they were named after; but her husband my uncle-dad knew the mythological or astrological history behind each name.

Tuesday is “Ngay Angia” which roughly means the Day of the Red One, or the Day of War. Angia is the shortened version of the formal word “Angaraka” which is also the Sanskrit name/word for the Planet Mars. But the Hindus in India call Mars most often by the name/word Mangala.

Wednesday is “Ngay Budh.” I thought Budh meant the Buddha, but the word “Budh” in Sanskrit is also the actual name/word for the Planet Mercury.

Thursday is “Ngay Brihas.” Every time I hear that name it sounds like they’re saying “Preah Hoss” to me which means a “Flying God,” so I always thought that day was named after some flying god. It’s not. Brihas is the Khmer form of the Sanskrit Brihaspati which is the name/word for the Planet Jupiter. “Pati” in Sanskrit, Hindi, and Khmer means a “husband,” and also a “house.”

Friday is “Ngay Sukh.” I always thought they were saying “Sukkh” which means “Tranquil” or “Undisturbed.” Sukh turns out to be the Khmer form of the Sanskrit “Sukra” which is the name/word for the Planet Venus.

Saturday is “Ngay Sao [rhymes with “Now”]. Sao is the Khmer version of the Sanskrit Sani or Shani which is the name/word for the Planet Saturn.

At first the only thing that got to me was the strangeness of how all seven days in both my culture and the English/European culture[s] seem to match up exactly! But the excitement was short lived and I quickly forgot about it.

Later we were at one of my grandpa’s houses during an eclipse to watch it and have a BBQ. When the eclipse happened briefly my uncles and boy cousins came outside with their guns and beer and started shooting at the moon and cheering.

I was thinking to myself: “What the hell are they doing?” I had to ask my grandpa – who is the only grandpa who speaks English – what they were doing. He said it’s a stupid custom. The ancient Khmer believed that there was a dragon that lived in the sky named Rahu and that an eclipse was caused by Rahu eating the moon. So in ancient days when backwards tribes saw Rahu eating the moon, they got scare and would shoot their arrows at the sky to try and scare Rahu away. My grandpa said that the ancient tribes gave a name to the tail of Rahu which they called “Ketuy” which in Khmer just means “A Tail Of An Animal.”

Since my grandpa likes to talk, he just went on and on about the very silly myth these ancient people believed in. He said in ancient times the wild people believed there lived nine “grapas” [Crocodiles] that lived in the sky, which they later named Adit, Chandra, Angia, Budh, Sukh, Sao, Rahu, and Ketuy. Rahu and its tail Ketuy are treated as two separate things. At the time I thought the tribal myth was so silly I didn’t pay much mind to it and forgot it when the day was over. But I did remember that the seven planets the days of the week were named after were believed to be crocodiles.

The Tree Of Wyrd

So I was studying ONA’s Naos one day. I was specifically looking around the Tree of Wyrd and correspondence sections to see if I can figure out a way to better understand “Satan” in a more Eastern way, since I have a hard time fitting “Satan” into my Oriental Weltanschauung.

Satan in the Tree of Wyrd corresponds with the Sphere of Mercury which also corresponds to the Norse God Loki. So I figured that I'd google and research the Roman god Mercury, then study its Greek counterpart, so that way I can look for a Vedic god to correspond to the exoteric name/word "Satan."

To my surprise it turns out that in Hindu astrological mythos Budh/Budha – Mercury in Sanskrit – not only matched up in description to the Buddha of Buddhism, but also to the Greek Hermes, and the Roman Mercury, and even the concept of Lucifer being the archetype of Light and Illumination. So I figured that I can synchronize Satan with the Buddha via the Tree of Wyrd's Sphere of Mercury. But that got me curious about the other Vedic astrological entities and the Tree of Wyrd. So I did some more research, and stumbled upon all Nine Angles in the most unlikely of places: ancient Vedic astrology.

So in the ONA we learn to understand that the term "Nine Angles" often comes from the Seven Spheres on the Tree of Wyrd; which are planets; plus two extra Nexion, making Nine "Angles." The Angles are not geometric Angles. They are just words used to describe something that somehow influenced the causal via Wyrd.

It turns out that the crazy tribal myths my grandpa had told me about actually have their origins in much older – more ancient – Vedic astrological mythos. In the Vedic astrological mythos the 9 celestial entities are collectively called the "Navagraha," or the "Navagraha." "Nav/Nava" meaning "Nine." The Sanskrit word "Graha" originally meant a crocodile or an alligator or a monster in a lake that grabs people with its mouth. Which must be where the ancient Khmer got the word "Grapa" from meaning a crocodile.

In Sanskrit the word Graha ends up meaning something that "Grabs or Catches." The Navagrahas in Sanskrit are: 1. Ravi [sun]; 2. Chandra [moon]; 3. Mangala/Angaraka [Mars]; 4. Budha [Mercury]; 5. Brihaspati [Jupiter]; 6. Sukra [Venus]; 7. Shani [Saturn]; 8. Rahu, & 9. Ketu.

The interesting thing to note is that although most of the Navagrahas are associated with planets, Graha does not mean a "planet," and the last two are not planets themselves. These Nine Grahas are said to instead be "things" that influences mortal existence and Karma. Karma corresponding to what Europeans may have understood as "Fate," and the older – more pagan word – "Wyrd."

I find it very interesting that both mythos – ONA & Vedic – tries to intimate or approximate "something" via words like "Angle" and "Graha" to mean "something" that influences. After thinking about how "Angle" doesn't literally mean Angle, and Graha doesn't literally mean Planet but crocodile, I thought it was funny that an Angle looks like the open mouth of a crocodile!

Ancient Traditions

What a very nice coincidence. Not just the strange coincidence in how a European people and a people all the way in India and the Southeast Asian Peninsula can have all seven of their days named after the same seven planets in the same exact order. But also a nice coincidence in that if we looked far enough around the world and past enough in our collective human history, that what mythos and ideas we find in the ONA has similarities and corresponding counterparts in ancient human cultures.

It's as if a small weird group of people in Shropshire England, and ancient Vedic astronomers/astrologers were trying to put into words, intimating, the same single Nine Natural Phenomena? Just that one group called it "Nine Angles," while another so long ago called it "Nava Grahas."

Of course there are implications here related to the ONA's Tree of Wyrd. The implicative question is: Which is older, the qabalah and its 10 sephiroths, or the 9 Grahas? When I say the qabalah I don't mean esoteric exegesis of the Torah, the use of Gematria, etc. I just mean the Tree of Life, its 10 sephiroths, their mystical meanings, and the mystical meanings they later inspired. If I remember, it was sometime in the 11th century in Spain somewhere that the Tree of Life and the "qabalah" began to coalesce.

The more I personally look into the ONA's mythos, the more I personally see its mythos in an ancient past in India. The ONA's Baphomet resembles Kali, and this can be said to be a mere coincidence or matter of one inspiring the other. The ONA's "Satan" seems to pair up with Rudra-Shivaya very well in mythic and archetypal quality and essence. But again, this can be just a coincidence or one inspiring the other. I'll take that. But now with the ONA's "Nine Angles" of its Tree of Wyrd, matching up with the Navagraha, we have a coincidence within a coincidence. There are far more parallels and coincidences that I have personally discovered.

But I'll keep those to myself. Hoping that what little I have shared here and in my other essays I have written will inspire other ONA Initiates to go on their own historical and cultural Quest to at least broaden their perspective and horizon, to uncover their own things. All I can say is that with my present vantage point I have today, it would not be hard for me to completely switch over from being ONA to practicing a more primal-animistic proto-vedic Tradition. The only thing required for such a transition would be a simple superficial substitution of names and words. Otherwise the Essence remains intact.

NOBILITY OF STRENGTH

“Respect not pity or weakness, for they are a disease which makes sick the strong.”
First Satanic Point [Black Book of Satan].

Pity and weakness helps prolong and promote human suffering. When an Initiate of the Sinister Way [or Numinous Dark Way] pities – feels sorry – for someone in a state of misery, the Initiate lets go of his or her conscious control of intelligence and allows foreign emotions – feeling originating from outside the Initiate – to actually affect him/her.

The Initiate is no longer Master of his/her own Life, in the same way that a person loses control of their reason and mind, and allows unchecked emotions and impulses to dictate their actions. This lack of chromomorphic vision, will do more harm than help.

Such actions, when based on irrational emotions and pity gives rise to actions NOT governed by intelligence. Thus, such irrational actions not only goes against the flow of aeonic engineering and the ethos of wyrd; but it generates causal re-actions that are devoid of wyrd, purpose, and intelligence. The end results of such causal re-actions will manifest as antagonistic forces in the Initiate's life, causing personal suffering. Pity does not end suffering, it multiplies suffering.

Weakness in all its forms: mental, emotional, physical, and social; is the individual person's leading cause of personal suffering in life. Weakness is the complete opposite of or adversary of a genuine Initiate of the ONA.

A person with a weak mind is characterized by an inability to apprehend and comprehend ideas, and concepts; an inability to think for themselves – that is the inability to question ideas and concepts, extract their accuracy, essence, and innovate new thoughts from them; and possess a weak will power.

Such a person is gullible, and will believe anything is told to them so long as it sounds believable to them. These beliefs themselves are Biological Software composed of memetic programs your mind uses. Regardless of whether the belief is a religious or political one, it will affect the individual's life, and manifest as what he /she will experience.

A person with a weak mind is not Master of his/her own Life. Others are his master. Others think for him, and by proxy, live his life for him. Others tell him what is right from wrong, what is real and unreal, or what is good for him and what is bad for him. Without will power or the capacity to question and doubt, he is incapable of psychologically fighting for his mental independence. Thus he is a pawn in life, who will never amount to anything; whom others will use to their advantage and advancement.

Repeating something someone else said, storing in your mind things others thought up of, buying the ideas and concepts others have created, and regurgitating what others composed and created is not a sign of intelligence or mental strength. Such mental activities is indeed the total opposite of living, organic intelligence; because, quite simple a computer and encyclopedia can store and share information other people put into it as well – if not better, and computers and books are dead, inanimate objects, devoid of a mind.

A person with weak emotions, is equally not Master of their own Life. Emotional weakness is characterized by lack of intelligent control of the emotions; lack of passion and determination; and unregulated impulses.

Such a person becomes a slave or is subservient to the ebb and flow of their emotional tide. When we understand that our emotions wyrdfully gives rise to our actions, we can understand how these individuals end up stupidly harming themselves and others around them – causing personal and social suffering.

Anyone who has ever succeeded in life, whatever the field or discipline; be it school, business, war, art, or crime, will tell you that without the crucial element of burning passion and unequivocal determination; there can be no success. Thus it will be understood that an emotionally weak person will not succeed in life, nor ever hope to be Master of their own Lives.

By physical weakness we mean to denote that a person lacks the ability to intelligently – wyrdfully – control and plan their actions purposefully; and that the person lacks an interest in the health and well being of his own body.

A fat tub of lard of a person who lacks the will, determination, and force to change their own physical bodies for the better – to make it more healthier or beautiful – cannot possibly have the knowledge, wisdom, and know-how to change others around them for the better. How strong internally are fat ugly people, if they can't even stop themselves from eating chips and junk food. You can't disrupt society if you can't even disrupt your own daily eating habits.

In fact, biologically, our appearance and physical well being is Nature's very own way of causally showing or revealing genetic health and/or physical disease. And if we think about it, understanding that our thoughts influences our emotions, and our emotions influences our actions, and our actions in turn produces casual results. Then, by backmasking, or working backwards, we can easily determine that fat ugly people, who don't have the power to physically better themselves, also lacks the right emotions and mind quality. For if they are in physical disorder, then they are also in emotional and mental disorder.

Lack of Social Strength is also a leading cause of personal suffering. Anthropologically, the human animal is by Nature a social creature. It has evolved from social organisms in the past. Our cities are a direct manifestation of our natural, unconscious need to live in close proximity to other humans. Even in rural areas you still have neighbors. "Primitive" tribes are also a causal manifestation of our social nature. Hermits are rare choice of lifestyle amongst the 7 Billion of us.

In our modern city where people are emotionally distant from each other, our primal need to socially bond with each other causally manifests as street gangs. Gangs aren't the only modern manifestation of our human tribal nature. We can, and often do turn just about anything into an excuse to band together and bond. There are groups dedicated to sports teams, crocheting, book clubs, golf clubs, political parties, and anything can be an excuse to hold a back yard barbeque.

Someone who is Socially weak lacks the ability to function in society in a healthy manner. Anti-social behaviours are not conducive to social strength. Being anti-social is a sign of social weakness.

No human is an island. Nobody likes to be alone. It has been proven that if a human is isolated from other humans for a certain period of time that they will go insane and mentally deteriorate. Any prison warden who has worked in the old days, who has seen the most diehard criminals break mentally from prolonged solitary confinement will attest to this fact.

A person who lacks the ability to function in society, to make friends, and become an influence to their friends; does not have the ability to influence and change society for the better. How can you, if you are a loser? A socially diseased person, who is a loner and has no friends, is his own cause of suffering; and because misery loves company, he will usually work to make others suffer and miserable.

This is the reason why in democratic nations, the people who often get elected by the people are usually popular people with a large amount of "Social Capital." Because such people have the experience in succeeding in social order, making and influencing a large amount of friends and people. And from that Social Capital, they can change society. Who the hell would vote for a nobody who was a social loser?

Because if we intelligently think about it, a "society" and "civilization" itself, isn't a lego structure or collection of building, where you can just change the structure and landscape, and have a new society. Society or Civilization is nothing but Other People – the social ordering of humans. Our cities, building, science, and technology is thus only a by-product of that Natural "coming-togetherness" of humankind – what we call society and civilization.

There is power in Social Capital, the power to truly mold “society” to your will. A person who lacks the ability to convince, or influence a single person standing next to him to believe something, or whatever, does not have the capacity to influence or convince a million.

It has always been the men, with the most Social Capital, among our species, that have altered and changed our world and our humanity. First think of Jesus. Even if he was a myth, his supporters glamourized his mythos, and from it “Jesus” gained a lot of Social Capital, and through his Priests hypocritical sinister acts, eventually manifested as the civilization of Europe.

There was the illiterate Muhammad of the incoherent Arabian desert tribes. Who, with a book – Al Qur’An – gained massive Social Capital and engineered; within his own life time; a civilization, which still exists today.

Genghis Khan, whose empathy for his people and warrior spirit gained him massive Social Capital, allowing him to manifest the largest empire/civilization known to humankind. Today 1 out of every 200 humans on earth are genetic descendants of this Giant of Humanity.

In our modern age, we have the example of Adolf Hitler. Who came from nothing; and with a combination of his party’s empathy for the German People’s defiled collective morale and distrust for Jews; and a little mythos building. Hitler was able to amass massive Social Capital; captivating and enchanting an entire nation; thus materializing the Third Reich. It took nearly the entire earth to stop this Hitler. He may be type casted as a villain today, but the German People back then certainly did not see or feel him to be a villain. He was a hero who fished them out of dishonor and gave them back their dignity. And he took what was an impoverished war torn nation, and gave them nearly all of Europe and its wealth, thus ending his people’s suffering.

Strength of Mind, Emotion, Body, and Social Capital, is the mark and honor of a genuine Initiate and Adept of the Sinister Way of the ONA. Empathy is the foundation of Social Capital. Honour for oneself is the foundation of a strong mind, emotion, and body. Duty is what manifests these Strengths – the Noble character of anyone genuinely associated with the Order of Nine Angles.

I watched all 6 episodes of Star Wars last week. It was the first time in my life I watched any Star Wars episode all the way through. I have to say the classic three episodes were the best of the 6. The most recent three filled in the back story, but the kid and Jarjar ruined everything. My favourite character was Senator Palpatine. Now that's my kind of politician! He sure knows how to make democracy work [for himself]. I also liked the decoy queen Amidala more than the real one because the decoy queen was more assertive and confident in the way she spoke and carried herself.

If there is any trade or craft that is Sinister in essence, it is Politics. What can be more sinister than a person or group of people who will lie, cheat, manipulate the commoner public, for influence and power: Consented to them by the mass? The power to enforce Policies and have the commoner to gayly obey such policies. The power to declare war on other countries. And the power to amass an army of commoners to fight and die in mass culling for a fight which in reality has next to nothing to do with them and their families. I secretly love Politics, everything about it. I secretly love politics because I openly hate commoners and peasants with a burning passion. "They are the scum of the earth." Said an author once. One man I admire named Henry Kissinger said it best: "Nothing happens in politics accidentally." Or as someone in my family puts it: "Be loyal to the person and not what they say in public." Because what is said in public is ultimately for the stupid common public. Are you above that common public and their superficial mentality, or are you of that public? What makes politricks possible is a flaw in the average person in that such common minded people are Swayed by words and ideas/idealisms.

A few weeks ago after watching the old Alexander The Great movie Aristotle in this movie said something that gave me a problem to consider. He said that "Ideas are bigger than men." The problem in my mind was that this statement was true, but ideas and/or "idealisms" – meaning idealistic Beliefs – is what captivates us in the illusory prison of samsara. I held an internal dialogue with this Aristotle guy and I asked "him" what if he wasn't aware of what he was implying with that statement. My question to him was: "Should Man [humanity] be Master of his ideas, or should his ideas be Master of Him?" My imaginary Aristotle guy said back to me: "That would depend on whom we are speaking of. There are different types and classes of people." Personally – and I know there are others like me – I can free myself from the grip of ideas and idealisms and be master of my own life, mind, heart, as the Buddha once admonished.

But I'm no superhero who desires to liberate humanity. Quite the opposite. I secretly love politics, and I have a passion for enslaving and brainwashing people with ideas. You cannot liberate the anariya which composes the vast majority of humanity. All the Ariya can do is put them to work and make use of them. Power [influence] is consented. The corollary to that postulate is: "Public opinion must be in your favour before the people consents." And the Pragmatic-Utilitarianist principle to that corollary is: "To induce favourable public opinion, you give the public what they need and want to hear. Reality is harsh. The public suffer from an escapist mentality where that they are moved, inspired, and captivated by ideals which makes them forget about such harshness of reality." Which is why what we call Religion enthralles a majority of humanity, as it has done for thousands of years.

When I say "majority" I actually mean majority: 2 billion Christians, 1 billion Muslims, 1 billion Hindus, 500 million Buddhists alone adds up to 4.5 Billion. This does not include the animism of indigenous people, folk cults, and the many minor belief systems. When I say "religion" I mean it in a very loose way which also includes Atheism. It is still an -ism made up of ideas, words, and semantics, reactionary to idealistic theism, and not based on a sound and moderate Objective observation of Natural Phenomena. If I say "God" the Atheist reacts, but if I say "Force" or "Field" or "Energy" or "Universe" the Atheist does not react. Thus, it's reactionary and based on Ideas, words games, and superficial semantics. The Atheist is still a slave to ideas just like the theist is. As it should be. I don't want these people free. If there were 2 billion Atheists in the world and a politician gave these atheists what they wanted to hear and feel, how much consent would he collect over time?

The common person is stupid. Stupidity is when you make a mistake which negatively affects you, and you commit the same mistakes over and over again not knowing you are doing this, which is samsara in Theravada. The common generics can say: "Oh but I'm scientific, I'm free!" Are you? You've been ruled by sweet talking priests in the Old World for 2000 years, and here in the New World you are ruled by sweet talking politicians. How long will political systems of idealistic beliefs exist before you as a people realize that it's the same game as religion? When religion is secularized it becomes "politics," where the priestcraft is lawcraft [lawyers etc]. Otherwise Old World rule of religion and New World rule of politics has the same policies, the same police force to enforce such policies of regimes, and the same punishments for those who do not comply. How telling that a thousand years ago priests of religion preached and actualized a Holy Crusade to slaughter Muslims, and today after Politicians did their preaching, we are in the same Middle East slaughtering the same people and destroying their same civilization. But we don't call it a "Crusade." The politicians call it a "War On Terror," and the common public eat that all up don't they. Like I said, word games and semantics.

"But words have meaning!" They cry. Yes they do. But so said Robert Anton Wilson: "He who has the power to define, has the ultimate power." When Webster defines, the commoner adheres. When random nobodies edit Wikipedia, it is quoted like scripture. When politicians define your words, laws, and reality, you adhere. When priests define what is right and wrong, good and evil, you adhere. You have never as a commoner defined anything given to you. Not your words, not your ideas, not your laws, not your rights, not your wrongs, not the reality you believe you live in. What were once ideas themselves [religion and politics] now dictates and controls. I learned from history class when we studied the British Empire and China that the easiest way to control a people is to monopolize and control what the people Depend on and are enthralled by. In history it was Opium for the Chinese. The British got the common Chinese so Dependent on opium that they were able to “negotiate” with the emperor. Back in the old days when gold was important you had people like the Rothchild bankers horde and monopolize gold. Now that gold is passe and green backs are what the people depend on you see Governments monopolizing the power to make money.

And so if the common public are swayed by and Dependent on words, ideas, and semantics, [abstractions], then you control those things. What does the Pope say to his people? That only the Church has the power to interpret scripture. What’s said these days to the same common public? That only lawyers and governments can interpret laws and human rights. What lawyer or political party would agree with me if I said that as a “Sovereign Individual” I have the “Right” to use pre-emptive strike to kill those I have determined who “may” be a threat to myself and family? None of them would agree. It’s not “constitutional,” and the laws of the land cannot be so interpreted. Says WHO? Says them. You know how many political-lawyers would shit their pants over the term “Sovereign Individual?” And besides, abstractions, assumptions and what-ifs dictates that if everybody killed people pre-emptively the whole nation would be chaotic etc. Which causes me to ask: “If such were the case, then would not this line of reasoning also apply on a global scale where that if a Nation-State used pre-emptive wars to kill potential threats that it would cause chaos on a larger human scale?” Of course the answer is “No,” because Muslims – excuse me “Islamists” – are not humans, they are evil doing terrorists bent on establishing global Shariah [sarcasm]! Same word games, same stupid common people.

Sounds “evil” and heartless doesn’t it? For me to put down the common public like this? I direct this question to any Western Buddhist and ask them to think of an answer before they read on. The Pali word most often translated into English as to “Transcend,” comes from a compound word meaning to Rise-Above/Beyond the Public [and their anariya mentality]. I’ve always thought it was silly how something so objective as the dhamma of rising above the anariya mentality of the common peasant becomes some idealism of “transcending” the world. Or even goofier is the idea of “transcendental meditation.” All my friends and associates in and out of the ONA should keep in mind always to never fully trust and believe anything I say and write here in this public domain. What I say in pubic is ultimately for the public to consume. True power they say, can only be Consented by the people, and the people are Believers by default. I am so convinced that the generic public commoner is so stupid, that me stating this in plain English will have absolutely no effect on them. Because the common peasant is affected by something called egotism [samsara of the Self] and denial of reality. By “reality” I mean that which is Actual in the human world of experience. Actuality and Reality should be interchangeable words if you objectively understand the realism of the world. By “Actual” I mean Natural Phenomena [dhamma with a lowercase “d”] which can be Observed, Experiences, and where such observation and experience are replicable by others.

Watching Senator Palpatine caused me to think of DM. Senator Palpatine has this exoteric or public image he cultivates where he seems to care about people, democracy, and so on. Beneath that public persona is Dark Sidious, like how Anton Long is some evil doer, some sinister hell raiser, hooligan of the occult. And for every Dark Sidious and his secret ambitions there is always a loyal Protege or two. The Dark Lord [Sidious] had his pupil of the Dark Force [Darth Vader]. And so AL has his Pupil(s), doesn't he.

Personally I don't think the Jedi or the Sith has it right with the "Force." It's too dualistic, or "dichotomized." For example if we take a bar magnet with a North and South pole, is it's magnetic Force two separate things or just ONE Field? I would say that the Jedi prophecy of one who would bring balance to the force was more accurate. Darth Vader brought balance to the Force. He brought the realized Shadow aspect/element of Life to the other part. Both balance as one Whole Force is the Whole Force. Life is not really divided with itself. It is only in the human mind – because of the human mind/consciousness – that Life appears to be dualized and divided into rights and wrongs, goods and evils, me and you, life and death, and so forth etc.

That faculty of human consciousness which is prone to separate the Unity into divisions in my mind reminds me of a Prism. When light is shown thru that Prism, there appears to be 7 separate colors. The "separateness" is an illusion. There is no concrete separateness. Together as one spectrum they make the Light. Or reality is a good example. Reality is a spectrum. We are prone due to Consciousness and its Focus to see and consider only this macrophysical "world." And so some of us may be materialists. But reality is also Quantum. Which is why quantum physics and physics are different disciplines dealing with different sets of "laws." One can't be the other because they are fundamentally different in constitution. But both are spectral parts of the same Whole reality greater than its parts, which we are only beginning to fully come to realize. They are not separate because one gradually – alchemically – becomes the other. This thing we call "reality" seems to be a spectral phenomenon which changes and manifests in different forms, but there is no division between it's forms. Like our own bodies. My body expresses itself in many forms. As fingers, and hair, and a heart and lungs, as electrical impulses, as thoughts and emotions, but there is no real separateness. Is the mind and thought two separate things independent from each other?

If you were to camp out inside an ecosystem like say the tropical jungles of Central Africa and just observe the Nature around you, you'll realize that this System of Life is not divided where you can point to leaf cutter ants who farm their food and say: "Those guys are good and practice ahimsa." Then you point to Big trees suffocating sapling of light and say: "Those guys are bad and violent! And here – right here – in between the ants and these trees is a real wall that divides the good ants from the badness of trees!" There is no division in the "field" of Life. Just like when you fly in an airplane and look down at the land below you realize that those neatly drawn borders on your maps are actually not "real." The word is "Reification." When you take an idea/ideal or belief or notion and you treat [or believe/assume] such abstractions were concrete "things." They are just ideas, just beliefs, and they have no real "sameness" with reality. Which came first the Natural World, or our human ideas and opinions about said Natural World? That is also Samsara. Where that we cannot tell the difference between Natural Phenomena [the Natural World] and our own words, thoughts, ideas, and Beliefs. We are imprisoned by such abstract beliefs, and that imprisonment is what causes Dukkha. Why do so many humans on earth suffer in a real way from extreme poverty? Because of the samsara of money which has captivated us. The Belief/Idea that we cannot “have” without money. The belief/idea that we should not work, if we don't get paid.

Another example: nothing in the actuality of reality before humanity existed to speak a word or think a thought expresses that Black people are subhuman. It was an Idea [meme] that served a heinous purpose. The belief in it on the part of innocent yet believing Whites gave this idea power. The power to enslave those old day Black people. Which caused Dukkha for them as a people. And the Belief in this idea – that they were subhuman – on their own part keeps them enslaved to the Idea. And you can't tell me that in context to time and history and after centuries of hearing that you are inferior and centuries of being treated like livestock, that those olden day Black people's psyche was not affected deeply that they did not believe it may be “true.” You tell a girl she is fat and ugly often enough and she will believe it. You tell passionate White teenage boys that they are Supreme Aryans often enough and they will believe it. The Samsara is in that we believe such ideas/idealisms to be real where that we continue to behave and commit acts within the matrix of such beliefs over and over again, ignorant to the consequences of our actions [kamma]. How many people on earth in total died directly and indirectly because of the ideas and idealisms [idealistic beliefs] of Communism?

“Politics is a pendulum whose swings between anarchy and tyranny are fueled by perennially rejuvenated illusions [-Einstein].” The question still remains: Are we masters of ideas, or mastered by them and the illusion [samsara] they induce? Personally I don't Believe in anything [at face value], and as a Buddhist I follow the advice of Buddha and try to master my mind and ideas. Perhaps some of us are not mastered by ideas. Others are. Trust No Man. Believe in nothing with a conviction. Because all the Universe will ever have to say and teach has already been written in its silent, wordless, ineffable Book of Nature. Direct experience and direct observation [Vibhajjavada, Vipasanna, Pachakka] and mindfulness are the only way to “read” this book. The moment that ineffable truth is put into words and ideations, it loses its Essence and trueness.

Aeonic Motion

One of the things I liked about all 6 episodes of Star Wars is Palpatine's very slow and methodological moves he takes. I loved watching out for each little step he took and hearing each little manipulative statement he made. It was as exciting as heavy petting. You gradually detect that he has an agenda and an ambition. You gradually see him moving from a mere senator to the Supreme Chancellor. Thru his co-conspirators he constructs an army ahead of time. Then he gradually builds his “Death Star.” All for the end goal of turning a republic into an Empire. Watching his moves got me to think about my two most favourite “board games” to play.

The first is an “East Asian” board game called Go. It's a gridded board and the two players used black and white pebbles or pieces. The pieces are placed on the intersections of the grid. The objective is “simple,” which is to basically Occupy as much territory as possible. Getting to that objective is the very hard part. Usually when I play Go I loose because I suck at it, but I love to observe how my cousins and uncles play. The game itself teaches me things about

Business and Politics. That you must learn to think “aeonically” ahead of time and gradually make your moves in such a way where that in the future your opponent or competition is left with very few options and moving room. With Business the market is the game board, and with Politics the public is the game board. The more ignorant and stuck in the present moment your opponent is, the better of a chance you have at winning in future.

My best friend in 8th grade taught me the other game I love to play which has no name since his dad made it up to play with him. We ended up calling the game when he taught it to me “The Wall Game” for the sake of convenience.

I had just moved from my Mother County where I was born and raised to Riverside County where I went to a new junior high. Originally I came from the Valley. I was born in Van Nuys and raised out in Granada Hills. I used to hang out often in places around the Valley like Woodland Hills, Northridge [the mall there], Burbank, and my family owned a coffee shop once in the Van Nuys area for a long time. My uncle-dad used to drive me often to the Burbank public library when I was in grade school. I was around 7 or something when the big Northridge Earthquake hit.

Anyways, after 7th grade, I relocated with my uncle-dad and aunt-mom to a different county where they bought their house. I went to a small middle school. Since it was a new school I didn't know anybody. This one boy named Jason talked to me in P.E. And afterward we became friends. My friend Jason was a stereotype “nerd” who wore eye glasses. I didn't have nerd friends in my original junior high, but you know what they say: “Beggars can't be choosers.” So I just became his friend because I was friendless. Back in the Valley my friends got me into LaVeyan Satanism. So my first interest in my new friend was to convert him. So each day at lunch period me and him hung out in the library to talk, and I'd try and make him a Satanist.

So one day in the library he taught me how to play “the wall game” which at the time didn't have a name. You play the game with a gridded piece of paper and a writing utensil. One person is the “X” and the other is the “O.” You start the game off by placing your X and O anywhere in the grid paper, but out of the “piece's” line of movement or your opponent can eat you. The X and O moves like a Queen on a chess board and kills like a Queen piece. When you move you simply draw a new X or O in a square, BUT you fill in your old square with your pen or pencil. That filled in square is now a solid brick which the X and O can't occupy or go thru. The actual object of the game is to build a wall to enclose or trap your opponent. If the opponent is trapped in a walled space with fewer squares than you, you win, technically. One game – as I found out – can last all school week, depending on the size of the grids. When I liked the game, me and Jason played it in every class we shared. We'd just pass the grid paper back and forth in class.

At first in the beginning I sucked at it and kept on getting tricked into the little walled spaces Jason made. But I watched how he played the game and learned to mimic him. What I did was I used a very primitive strategy where I would mentally sectioned the grid paper into a big part and a little part and I'd just make one move at a time to build a long ass wall to divide my parts, then try to chase Jason's piece into the small part. When you make your walled sections you leave a small opening of several squares to chase the other person into, then seal it off. Jason uses a different strategy. It looks like at first he is moving in no real order. But what he does is he makes mazes and divides the grid paper into many confusing walled off parts. This confuses you because you can't tell where you are, which portion is bigger than the other, and you have to dance around his walls to move. Eventually I learned to think ahead of time like he did, which was when the game got very interesting. You have to plan ahead of time and make premeditated moves as close as you can to your plans. Usually when I win, my friend dragged the game out. The rule is that even if you trap your opponent in a small section, the game is not over until the other person gives up or has no more squares to move into. Jason would drag out the game when he knows he lost until he was down to the last square.

That wall game I played in 8th grade all year later in life [in high school] became one of my most influential sources of insight when it comes to the real world and controlling and influencing people, or "moving" them. It teaches you how to think holistically or "aeonically," where you can see all of your options, and all of your opponent's options. Then you try to disable all of your opponent's options one at a time before they even realize they have those options. Then it teaches you how to encircle and trap people or mentally move them to where you want them to move. A quick example I used in this regard was when I competed with others in school to climb social rank. Before the other girl can ever make her moves what I did was try and see all of her options she can take to get more popular than me. Then I quickly sabotage all of those options one at a time before she or they realize they even have options. So in my mind campus life was the grid paper, and I build the walls for the opponent, and I chase them into those traps to get rid of competition. One move at a time. Or you act pre-emptively. If you know some bitch is liable to talk shit about you and spread rumors which could threaten your status, way before she even hates you to spread her rumors you work at owning the minds, hearts, and "public perceptions," of the key popular people on campus that actually matter like your support group, and the popular kids above you.

This topic will be ethically interpreted by many to be "bad." This emotive interpretation is relative, I assure you. I'll give an example and give you the name of it as this method is known in Buddhism. If you take a dog and say you are on a sidewalk with this dog and you want him to go Left, telling him in words and ideas to turn left won't work because the dog does not compute, unless you use treats to trick it into a left direction. Humans are different, they understand words, which is both a curse and blessing. If you have a 5 year old on the same side walk and you want this child to move in a left direction for some reason and she does not at first want to go left, you can use words and ideas to Trick this child to move left. For instance you can say there is a big dog on the right side. If she believes such words and ideas, she will move left according to your Will.

In Buddhism this method is called Upaya, which literally means Trick but is nicely translated as Expedient Method. The mahayanas gives a pretty good descriptive example: You are a father with 9 young children. It is night and the house is on fire. As a father you need to remove your 9 children out of the house as fast as possible or they will die. In the Mahayana's example the children are ignorant and not aware that fire is a danger, so they won't leave the house. The father invents an Upaya to trick the kids out by saying that he bought them nice toys and a Big Wagon [Maha-Yana] which are all waiting outside for them, and if they run out of the house, they can have the gifts. The children run out for the toys and Wagon. In Buddhism we give no emotive value to Upaya like a Westerner would. People can be tricked with words and ideas to do things and “move” in certain directions. This Mahayana story of Upaya and its essential idea was used in ancient times against Theravada. In ancient times Theravada rejected Mahayana as being a legitimate Buddhism, that they were fake. After a while of sectarian debates that Mahayanas told a story similar to this. The story basically states that Maha-Yana [the Big Wagon in the story] is an Upaya, and therefore – per the Buddha’s own teachings – it is usable, because in the end, those people who are tricked with the Big Wagon become Buddhists and take Refuge in the Three Jewels anyways.

A better example or real application my friends and I used in the 9th grade was we made a teacher cry and quit. Most of it was due to Momentum of “Crowd Mentality” set into motion by tricks [upaya] to sway people in a predetermined direction. The simple end objective was to make the teacher go away. The Method of doing this was to simply make his school time an awful experience. This objective was based on a dislike for him because he was simply mean to the wrong students and gave us detention for little offenses. How do you do this? You have to think like that wall game where you mentally section off a part of the grid paper you want to trap your opponent into. To manipulate your opponent to that premeditated place you work on constructing walls and maneuvering him toward that section any way you can. In real life the bricks of this wall are IDEAS and the squares of this grid paper are your fellow student’s HEADS. This wall has to be constructed one idea and one head at a time, until you get enough collected “potential force” to get a kinetic reaction.

This teacher was our social studies teacher. He started off as a substitute and was made a permanent teacher. What happened was our real social studies teacher who everybody really liked moved back to England because he was offered a better job. This original teacher was really nice, very attractive, and everybody – at least the girls – really liked his accent and smile. He had dimples and really nice eyes. He dressed really nice and GQ, had short black hair slicked back. He stood in class and talked with confidence. And when he talked to all of us he always looked into our eyes and spoke with a smile. We all liked him a lot, but he ditched us.

The next day after he was gone the new teacher was in class. At first he didn’t know he was going to be a permanent teacher. This new teacher was Middle Eastern and about the same age as our real teacher. He came dressed in brown suits. His shoes weren’t shiny. When he was up teaching in class or talking to us he did not stand or carry himself or talk with confidence. He spoke with an accent, and I guess this foreign accent effected his self esteem. He also did not use eye contact when he talked to us. Something else was that when he was angry, instead of talking things over with us like our real British teacher did, this Middle Eastern bastard just sent us straight to the office and sometimes threw tantrums in class. Nobody liked him. And when we found out that he was going to be our permanent teacher, we all hated him.

So one of the first things we did on campus was we “dehumanized” him with our peers by saying things like: “He’s a fucking sand nigger,” or “That camel jockey can’t even speak English right and he thinks he’s a teacher.” Those are ideas that occupies peoples heads, and plays on people emotions and prejudices. When our real teacher was present I sat right in front of the class, but when this new teacher started teaching, me and my friends relocated all of the nerds in the back of the room to the front and we sat in the back after that. The next thing we did was resist his dictates, meaning that when he told us to do something we just sat there ignoring him right in front of him and looking at him, to taunt him. The idea was to manipulate him to send us – the right people – to the office for a purpose. We'd go without a fight to the office when he sent us there. This made others start to resist him also after they saw that it was "okay" to be sent to the office. That's another "brick" to build our "wall."

Another thing we did was to let him know that we did not like him in creative ways. For example when he had his back turned we threw paper balls at him or pencils at him. Then we'd laugh. Some of the kids put slime and other stuff on his chair when he wasn't looking to get his ass dirty. As time passed the things people threw at him got bigger. This one time "somebody" [not me] threw an orange at his head when his back was turned and the force of the throw was so hard the orange busted open. When this happens he turns around usually and gives a nervous laugh like it was nothing and asks who did it as he looks in the back of the room for his usual suspects. The nerds up front along with everybody else naturally turn their heads to look back. So you shoot stares at those nerds to warn them to shut up. Usually after we sit there for a while my friends and I have the nature of taking each others heat. Meaning I'd stand up and say I did something when I actually didn't and get in trouble for it. This is an internal move which re-enforces in-group solidarity or cohesion. Another thing we started doing was steal things from his desk and slash his tires in the parking lot. Since we had friends in his other classes it became that this poor teacher was picked on all day.

Another thing we all did was when we get busted or angry we say mean things to him that sticks in his head or we drop hints to make him think or feel a certain way. One time he sent me to the office for something I claimed to have done and as I walked out pasted him I looked at him and said: "As-salamu alekum," right in his eyes. I only said this because many of us knew he felt uncomfortable being Middle Eastern with his accent.

So after a few months of this it got to him. The thing that broke him was one day in our class this sand monkey teacher was showing us a movie and the room's lights were out. He had his back turned briefly and one of my friends threw the social studies text book from under a nerd's desk hard at his back and put his head down after he did hit. This guy stops the movie and turned on the light. We all went quiet after we all realized a book got thrown at him, and somebody was going to get in big trouble for it. This teacher he picked up the book and just calmly asked who did it. We didn't say anything and he just stood there. Then another friend of mine on my left crumpled a piece of paper and threw it right at his face and got up saying: "I did. I'll take myself to the office asshole." We were watching the teacher to see what he would do and the guy started to cry and he tried to talk to us by saying something like: "I just want to teach. You guys never gave me a chance. I don't understand what I did to you guys to make you hate me. You guys treated me like this from the first day." Some people giggles with their heads down because it was funny at the time.

That was his last day. He never came back. The principle the next day was our emergency substitute until he found a substitute. He gave us a big ass stupid lecture of how he can't believe how childish we acted and how we treated the teacher. But that's playing "the wall game" superimposed on real life. You have an objective for your opponent. You build walls with IDEAS in people's HEADS one at a time. At the same time you disable and sabotage as best as you can any options the opponent can take. With the teacher example an option the teacher can take was work on gaining support from other students. Before he ever thinks of this, you manipulate your peers to not like him, starting with the shot callers in the social order. And you slowly maneuver the opponent toward that objective you set for him. The less options he has, the less he can move. But you have to think aeonically. I don't know how to describe that. It's like before you declare war on a country and knowing the enemy soldiers must eat, you send your military to burn all the farms down in the area and destroy trade route to prevent food from coming into the country. Before your competition even realized all of his options, you have to already be working ahead of time to disable them. If the enemy or competition is or will be reliant on a market or powerbase of people, then you work ahead of time to already take as much of the mindshares of that market or subvert that powerbase with ideas, memes, and PR aka propaganda before the powerbase even thinks of the option of supporting your competition or knows your competition even exists.

You have to somehow work to control the future, and work backwards to the present. The best thing you can do is insure that your opponent is stuck in the moment of the Now. For example a group of Satanists who think they have a forum and many members where they believe that such forum and member is a great thing is good. As long as they get trapped in that Now and are not thinking about the future. Mysatan and its associated SOS were a good examples. Just because you have a website, talk show on a blog radio, vlogs, and thousands of members NOW does not insure you will have any influence or relevance or existence in the future 5 or so years from now. You want to manipulate such people's perception where they are engrossed in their glorious achievements NOW. Praise them for their accomplishments in the NOW. Keep their eyes on the greatness of their egos NOW. Then work quietly to disable all of their future option before they realize why they even need options.

"The Market has no opinions of its own." The more you are able to control public opinion [mindshares], the more you get things your way. Power is consented. The trick is to use politricks to actualize that consent. But to do this you need to have a working knowledge of how people work. Most often girls are naturally more apt in this then guys. For example the commoner's opinion is usually dependent on the commoner's perception of things. If you want or need a certain Opinion, you must manipulate the way they see or feel about something. PR can be used to control public opinion over a period of Time. An example is something in ONA we have seen. Three to five years ago when some person claimed to be some leader of the ONA the stupid public in the Satanic subculture either did not know what to make of those claims or they went with it. It took 3 years of PR work on the part of many associates in ONA to seed in this stupid public the right ideas, or to educate them, if we want to sound nice. Later we witnessed that when another person came by to claim to be a leader of the ONA, this same public laughed at this creep's claims. It's because of getting a practical understanding of this that I realized the meaning of what Henry Kissinger said when he said: "Nothing in politics happens accidentally."

When there are two or more people there is a social order. Where there is social order, there are social dynamics and social skills at play. This is applicable to even great apes and monkeys. It's not just in high school that such social skills and subtle manipulative tactics are used. You are ignorant if you believe so. The advertizing and marketing industry is a multibillion dollar industry. That industry goes beyond just making a pretty add for you. Why do they put water drops on coke and beer cans in print adds and commercials? Why do they use catchy jingles? If you live in Southern California there is this sticky jingle that is stuck in my mind and the minds of many of us which goes: "Take 605 to you know where; South street, South street. Ceritos Auto Square!" That autosquare is the only thing I know of in Ceritos. It utilizes the same effect of mind which ancient religions use where entire rotes of scriptures, rites, versus, and dhammas are chanted to a melody. The right brain is better at remembering things. But this right brain is an artsy fartsy fag which only likes stuff like art, pictures, emotions, musicals, and such like. I'm actually more right brained and my left half doesn't seem to work so well.

I think in pictures and I explain things in pictures. "I very rarely think in words at all. A thought comes, and I may try to express in words afterwards [-Einstein]." I had a very hard time learning algebra when my uncle-dad first taught it to me in 5th grade because at first he just told me to read the text book and learn to do the formulas and problems. I got yelled at for hours and days for now understanding the instructions. So my uncle-dad got tired of yelling and he showed me step by step and explained to me that you have to isolate the X variable your trying to figure out on one side of the equal sign so it is all by itself. So you move one variable at a time to the other side and "make it opposite" he said. If it's a positive Y variable it becomes a -Y variable on the other side. After I saw how it was done, algebra was actually pretty easy, at least the simple equations I worked with back then.

If I learn to get to a place during the day, I'm the type to get lost and not know how to get there at night, because I can't work the left brain and remember street names, directions. I remember trees, buildings, and in my mind I can't see what terms like "north bound" and "south bound" looks like with freeways. My freeways have to go somewhere I know. Like you take the 60 to LA, or towards the San Diego direction. Either towards the ocean or the mountains. I go to LA a lot with my cousins and friends. There is this one area we go to where you have to drive down a street with many trees growing out of the side walk, which is the landmark I remember to tell me I'm going in the right direction. One day I was driving some friends to this place who had not been to this place. The trees on this street got pruned, at the moment the entire street did not look familiar so I got lost and did not know where I was anymore.

You watch and study carefully the people that insist that mind tricks and manipulation is a high school thing, and usually these same people are the easiest to maneuver and sway. It's okay if governments and corporations does the manipulating because in that case they all are manipulated so it's fine. It's when a person picks one of them out and used the same tactics that they begin to huff and puff, because now they feel stupid since nobody else got manipulated. These same people who say that this stuff is for high school kids – if you people watch them carefully – are the same group of people most easily swayed by social fads and social movements. Usually these same people were those in school and the work place that lacked the social skills to climb the social structure to get popular or get promotions.

Like loose cannon balls on the deck of a ship. Whichever way the ship teeters the cannon balls just rolls en masse in that direction. This is what I mean by a “social movement,” where that when society move in a certain direction, they move along. We’ll use Satanists as an example since I’ve been watching them since 2004 and because I actually don’t like them.

You have these Satanists who yap a load about “nonconformity,” and individuality, and how they are emancipated from society. Then a social phenomenon/fad called Myspace comes along and what do you see happen? You see all these Satanists start Myspace Satanic groups which they call their grottos, churches, and Satanic societies. Then what happened? Myspace died out as a social fad and what do you see? All the Satanic groups and members vacate the fad just like everyone else. Where did they go? Just follow the next social movement: Ning. Ning made it possible for anybody to have their own “myspace” social network. Other social network platforms like wackwall came out. What do you see happen? You see every body start their own social networks. Then what? Then the Satanists come to start their own nings and social networks.

When Facebook became the next big social movement, what do you see? You see every Satanist has a Facebook profile and their Facebook Satanic groups. When teenyboppers started using Youtube to vlog their drama and others started using youtube to vlog, what do you see? You see these same Satanists follow the social fad. And just like myspace days, they even compete for subscription numbers as a mark of distinction and importance. Remember when we were teens on myspace competing for high numbers on our friendslist? Let me ask you a question, can you predict the future and tell me what these nonconforming satanists will do when facebook and youtube loses its social fadness? Will they stay or move along with everybody else to the next fad and social movement? Something so simple and illogical – as Spock would say – as a social fad can manipulate these so called unmanipulatable and nonconforming Satanists to FOLLOW everybody else in society. And the funny part is that they are so immersed in these social fads that they will actually judge you in a bad way if you don’t follow the fad. If you don’t have a Facebook, a youtube vlog, and a social network profile, then your “fake.” You’re not even real like they are real.

Do fads last? No they don’t. It is illogical – I lied, my left brain works as well as my right – to devote time and energy to building up a religion or memplex constructed on the foundation of a social fad. What do I mean by that? I mean of all the Satanic and occult groups, churches, grottos, orders, that once populated myspace, how many of them are still operating? Not many. Why? Because everybody went to Facebook! But your average commoner just can’t get itself to understand this. It’s best to make it so that they stay lost in that samsara of the Now, in those fleeting social fads. What’s the next social movement? I’ll try and make a prediction here today for 5 years from now, because these mundane Satanists are that predictable. Wherever teenyboppers go, the rest of normal society follows, and wherever normal society goes, the nonconforming Satanists will follow behind. That’s a “cosmic axiom” of denialism and self presumes righteousness. But don’t tell them they are like everybody else. They are special snowflakes, “unique” they say. Nonconformists they describe themselves as.

From what I gathered, at the end of 2008 when my friends found WordPress there were very few Satanic anythings using the blog medium. As far as I can knew, there was the Nineangles blog, the Darkimperium blog which are both ONA. Then I knew of this other Satanist blog. That was pretty much it. Or at least the number of Satanists using the blog medium was so few that they were just not on the radar. It was during this time when we started this wordpress here. Now things are slightly different. Three years later this Blog medium is at that stage in development where it will soon be a fad. At the moment its just a popular medium. So what we are seen right now is more and more Satanists having their own personal Satanist oriented blogs. This blog meme spreads via social networks and forums which is loosing steam now. My first prediction is that within circa 2 years from now the social network medium will be as "popular" as myspace is today. Facebook will remain standing for a while longer. I'm talking about these independent social networks. As we see this happen, we should see these mundane Satanists migrate into the blog medium, just like they migrated into the vlog [youtube] medium, which is now starting to loose steam also. Let's see if in 2 years Blogs will be a satanic fad, where every Satanist has one and is expressing their minds and teaching their liberal forms of Satanism.

The next big social movement after this Facebook era – AF: After Facebook – is harder to see because right now I only see bits and pieces of potential pieces of what may become the next big thing. I'll try and explain. The key or functioning idea of the "next big thing" is: Portability, so I estimate. Some of the obvious signs for this is Amazon's Kindle and "portable" books. Smartphones, and tablets like iPads, also hints at a more "portable" medium. I want to say it's something which is an "evolutionary development" of what Facebook offers but specifically designed for such next generation portable devices. Facebook is too "desktoppish," and clunky for the next generation of computers and smart devices. It has to be some sort of social medium that is specifically made for the market to use with such portable internet smart devices. I'd give it about 5 years before I might see anything that fits this niche market. All I know is I feel inside that this new portable medium has to work with "Kindle-like" eBooks, where a person can make a "profile" or page and share and read PDF-like books with others, as well as share and upload pictures, videos, and then text chatting services. Like chat rooms, but you text with your fones and iPads to talk to people. Video chats based on smartphones and tablet computers also maybe. Whatever the next fad or social movement is, I am willing to bet my life that these so called nonconforming individualist Satanists will follow along with everybody else.

Like I said: loose cannon balls. Liberal and without place and structure. Tell me, what happens to a ship if loose cannon balls are allowed to liberally roll everywhere? They damage the ship they are on after a while. I can't see this liberal camp of Satanists lasting a significant amount of time. Their liberal mentality will slowly damage their Satanism. We can already see this if we simply take a cross section of liberal Satanists from the theist or modern camp. No two of them agrees what Satanism is. Everybody is holding onto their own opinions. Everyone is in the business to slang their own opinions in lieu of the actual Satanism itself. Have you ever noticed that? I really love to read and study their interactions and posts. It's like how Christians preach about Jesus but not the actual teachings of Christ.

These Satanists do the same exact thing in reverse, they preach about their egos but not about the teachings of Satan. Symbolically meaning that they preach about their own opinions about Satanism, but not about the actual satanism itself as a coherent system of principles, philosophy, and practice is nonexistent since they have thrown out their ritualism and magic even from their own Satanic Bibles. You can see this if you make a profile and pretend to be ignorant and ask them what Satanism is. Instead of getting the actual coherent system of Satanism, you get their opinions and beliefs concerning satanism. It's like asking a Christian what Christianity is and they were to answer: "Christianity is a relationship with Christ. He died on the cross for us and washed our sins." You left asking: "Yes, that's fine, but what did this Christ teach exactly?" Speaking of cannon balls, this song is one of my favourite songs: Link.

Geekery

Nerd friends have "interesting" interests. My friend Jason in 8th grade once asked me how many languages I speak. I told him 1.5.5 and he asked me what that meant. It meant I spoke a whole one fluently which was English and a half of Khmer and a half of Spanish. He then once asked me a question I never thought about during P.E. He asked me if I ever wondered where human language comes from. Eventually this talk of language caused me and him to do an "experiment" where we would invent our own language from scratch for some reason. It was interesting at the time.

What we did was we were in the library and looking up the word "Alphabet" in a dictionary because I told my friend that I remember I did this and it gave me a list of different language's alphabets. My uncle-dad with education is an authoritarian and he used to make me read books since I was in the first grade. As I got older in grade school the books he picked for me to read got more sophisticated. He used to sit there and listen to me read these thick books with these big words even when I was in 4th grade and he'd yell at me when I didn't understand what I read. He would stop me after each page I read and ask me about what I just read. I used to cry because the words were too big and I never heard them used before so I really didn't understand what I was reading. He'd yell at me to get a dictionary and look ever word I didn't know us and write sentences with them for him, or I'd go to bed without dinner.

This was because I suppose he was Asian and went to school in a different time where people made fun of him for not speaking English right. I guess he didn't want me to experience the same teasing in school. I remember my uncle-dad during these reading sessions used to yell at me saying things like: "Those White people in school will make fun of you for being different than them. You have to intimidate them by knowing their own language better than them!" So growing up whenever I read books to my uncle-dad, I always had a dictionary on me. Eventually I got used to looking words up that I started to read the dictionary to learn new words.

So me and Jason went thru a dictionary and we picked the Russian alphabet we found to use as our alphabet. But this alphabet did not have the letter "H." Not knowing what to do we just annexed the Hebrew letter for "H" since it was the alphabet closes to the Russian one. This is where I would get my fascination with language from.

What we did was we had little pocket sized notepads and we just simply made up random arbitrary sounds for our words and we paired them to English words. Then during P.E. And break we'd try to talk about people with the language we made. This was when I pragmatically learned that a spoken language needs some sort of grammar since it was very hard to talk about people in our language without grammar. So we spent some time creating all of these affixes. But this wasn't the fascinating part.

The fascinating part happened in our English class, which was my favourite class. I remember our teacher's name since she was one of my favourite teachers and since she had an odd name. Her name was Mrs. Leech. What happened was my friend Jason had sent me a note written entirely in our invented, and I was trying to decipher it with my little notepad. Mrs. Leech had walked by me and asked for the note Jason had sent me. Then she looked at me and asked: "Chloe you speak Russian?" I said I didn't and I explained to her that me and Jason were only using the Russian alphabet to write a language we made, but that our language was now a "real" language because it's speakable, has grammar, and syntax, just like a real one. Our teacher Mrs Leech said back: "That's very fascinating you two, but it's not a real language." Mrs Leech was a very nice teacher and laid back and talked to us like we were real people. Me and Jason got offended and I started an argument with Mrs Leech asking: "Why is English a real language and this not? What's the difference?" She said that the difference is that one was invented and the other not. But Jason then asked her how she knew English was not invented over time by it's speakers? For the rest of the school year me and Jason would have friendly debates with Mrs Leech about human language, which I thought was very interesting. I never really learned our invented language, but at one time we had over 1000 words.

My friend Jason never became a Satanist. I tried. I even gave him my copy of the Satanic Bible to read. He said that he thought worshiping Satan was silly. I tried to explain to him otherwise. So he said he'd give it some thought and research the occult some more. So one day he came up to me and told me he picked his religion, it was Wicca. I got very upset over his choice and argued with him, but gave up. At near the end of the school year I checked out from our school library the book on Witchcraft he read which convinced him to be a Wiccan and I gave it to him as a going away present. His father was in the army and he said he had to move to Egypt with his dad.

I had other friends. All the Asian in the school were my friends. Usually Jason hung out with us Asians when he went to that school. He'd help the fobs out with their English homework. He was a nice kid. In 8th grade I had Algebra for my last period. I took and passed Pre-Algebra in the 7th grade. Math was another school subject my uncle-dad forced on me. He used to make me do my school work, then what he did was take some paper and make up more math problems for me to do. He'll yell at me if I get a problem wrong. And for each I got wrong he made an extra page of math problems for me to do. And I'd have to do every one of them before he let me go to sleep. Sometimes I did his math problems from after school till 1 in the morning. I was already doing long division and working with fractions when I was in the 3rd grade. I used to cry often because you can't go anywhere, watch any TV, or go to bed until you do all of that work, and sometimes it felt like the work would never end.

My algebra class was very small. There was literally only 5 other kids in my last period who were all my friends. The teach was an older lady named Mrs. Davis. She wore glasses, always wore long sleeves and high color blouses. She had dirty blonde hair with some grey in it. Her hair was short. Mrs. Davis was an introverted thinker type. She didn't talk much, but you can see she talks in her head a lot to herself. She was soft in voice and talked sweet with a smile. But she had an ugly heart. Mrs Davis was the person who taught me about cultural prejudice. She wears a gold cross around her neck which she places on top of her shirts and blouses.

One of my friends in Mrs Davis's class was a Lao kid named Vilaysak. I was very comfortable around Vilaysak because he and I shared the same culture and he carried himself in a similar well mannered demeanor as if he came from a well cultured family and was raised properly. He did not speak English well and like me wore an ivory Buddha pendant. One day my friend Vilaysak raised his hand to ask Mrs Davis for help on a word problem he was having difficulty with. After Mrs Davis tried to explain the word problem to Vilaysak she patted him on his head. Vilaysak became very agitated and upset and he got up and yelled at the teacher in his broken English: "No! Don't touch my head! You are not allowed!" Then he walked out of the classroom.

Mrs Davis tried to ask where my friend was going but since school was almost over she let him go. She did not say anything for a few second just thinking and she looks at me and asked: "Chloe, do you know why Vilaysak got upset with me? Why can't I touch his head?" I told Mrs Davis that in our culture the top of our heads is sacred and its a violation and disrespect for anyone besides your parents and a monk to touch it. She said back and I remember her words: "He needs to learn that he is in America now and not Laos. We have a different culture here. The head doesn't mean anything here. In our religion we believe that only Jesus is sacred and holy. Do you think you can talk to him and explain to him that he is American now?"

I had another friend in this class named Kuen, who was an ethnic Cambodian, and a few months younger than me. He used to call me Bong Srey which means Big Sister. Kuen was cool, but I felt uncomfortable around him because unlike me and Vilaysak, Kuen was barbaric. He spoke Khmer, but a different register and he used many words my family and I don't use. He was also just bad and perverted.

One time Mrs Davis came to me after class – which was after school – because she had something important to ask of me. I stayed behind and Mrs Davis explained to me that she was talking to one of her teacher friends who Kuen has a class with and this teacher said that he was talking about sex and using foul English words. Mrs Davis wanted me to call Kuen's parents and explain to them that their son was talking about sex in school and using bad words. So I said to her: "Mrs Davis, I don't speak his version of Khmer. I don't know how to speak to his parents because I don't know any pronouns. Or enough words to make a full sentence. I don't know any words that mean sex because nobody in my family uses such indecent words. I wouldn't know what what to tell his parents he's talking about. I don't even know words for private body parts, or cuss words even." Mrs Davis just looked at me and said that she believed I was not being honest with her. She said that I was lying about not knowing Khmer because Kuen was my friend and I just didn't want to tell on him. She said that she can tell it was a lie because she believes all languages have pronouns, otherwise, how would people talk to each other?

Then my other best friend was in this class with me too. His name was Matt. Matt was a White kid who was the second person to talk to me when I was new to this school. He was short for his age. He loved talking about military stuff. Matt's dream in life he said was to join the Marines. He came to school every day wearing a red Marines jacket. Said he wanted to be in the Marines to be like his father. Unfortunately my friend Matt was defected. His left arm was much smaller than his right one, and he couldn't move it much. His left leg was also smaller than his right one, so he walked with a slight limp. The doctor gave him a special left shoe to even it out with his right leg. I didn't know anything about the military back then, but in my mind I quietly questioned how Matt would fight if he was like that. But I never had the heart to ask him out loud or step on his passion and dreams. My friend Matt one day was talking a storm 10 minutes before school was out about the Marines. How it was founded, how they are the first in and last out. How he's going to go fight for America. Mrs Davis stopped Matt and told him and the rest of us that they don't take those who are not physically healthy and she added: "I'm sorry Matt, but I don't believe you will ever be allowed to join the Marines." But she tried to console Matt by telling him and us that when we go to heaven God gives us a perfect new body.

So Mrs Davis was the only teacher I ever hated with a passion. There was something very unright with her where she can't feel other people. Has no respect for other people's cultures or their uniqueness and difference. Is culturally myopic where she actually thinks that others must be whatever culture and religion she is which is the only right way. I got into a lot of arguments with her and I tried to defend all my friends in that class. She also picked only on the ethnic students. My other friend named Santos was Mexican in this Algebra class and even though he spoke pretty good English Mrs Davis told Santos that she would like to see him in ESL class which she also teaches. That's English as a Second Language. During the school year she went around to the ethnic students in our class like Vilaysak and Kuen and had the office put them into ESL, and Santos was eventually taken to ESL also after Mrs Davis graciously convinced the Principle that he needed ESL.

One day Mrs Davis was sitting at her desk looking at me. I was doing my math work and looked up back at her and she smiled as if to be friendly and actually said to me: "Chloe I was thinking, I would like you in my ESL class. How do you feel about your English?"

I wasn't sure what to think. In my mind I was thinking to myself: "What am I speaking with a savage Chinese accent or something? Do I get my verbs and nouns mixed up? My uncle-dad made me read college text books when I was in 5th grade? I've read the English dictionary twice from A-Z? It's the only language I speak?? I know more English and I can use it better than my friend Matt and Jason? I don't get it?" But to be nice I just said: "I don't think I need ESL. My English teacher Mrs Leech hasn't said anything?" But she kindly insisted and said with a smile: "Well, I think you are very smart and I'd like you to be your best. Let me ask the office if I can give you a test to take to see if you need ESL okay? You might have problems we can't see such as your comprehension skills?"

That's when I got really angry and offended. In my head I said: "Shit bitch, if that's the case, then Matt here needs ESL because he doesn't understand half the stuff I say to him. Take him to ESL. What, I need ESL cuz I'm not White? I'm on the school's Pantathlon Team! Just like

I was in my last school! I compete with other schools in Math, English, History, and Science bitch!" But I just looked at her and shrugged my shoulder. When the bell rang I went straight to Mrs Leech's classroom, who was not only my English teacher but she was our "Coach" on the pentathalon team who took us to other schools to compete. I told Mrs Leech that Mrs Davis said she thinks I need ESL and that my comprehension skills were not up to her standards and that she's going to talk to the office to give me an ESL test.

Mrs Leech said that this was outrageous and so she marched me down to Mrs Davis' classroom and the two teachers had a fight, with Mrs Leech yelling and defending me. Mrs Davis was loudly informed by Mrs Leech that I was working with college level reading, writing, and comprehension skills. At the time Mrs Leech was no more than 25ish years old and very sassy. Mrs Leech said or screamed, that I out perform everybody in her class and have never failed an exam, and technically since I have honours classes and am on the pentathalon team that I out perform everybody at school. Mrs Davis smiled and said that if I had simply told her I was on the Pantathalon team she wouldn't have even suggested ESL. She excused herself by saying that she was just concerned for me then she thanked Mrs Leech for informing her and said that it was just her job as a teacher to make sure students get a proper education.

During my college years I met a friend we'll call Z since he's still my friend and a private person. Outwardly my friend Z looked like a rabid skinhead that you wouldn't want to cross, especially if you were ethnic. Except he dressed really colorful and had this very happy and friendly personality. Back when I met him he was really into the raver scene and made his money DJ'ing at raves. So as a raver the dressed all weird in huge baggy pants very loud and colorful shirts. Rainbow colored bead around his neck and wrists, etc. Z was also into Wicca. He had a "sinister" streak to him. He used to share with me ideas that he'd like to try and brainwash people at raves by placing subliminal messages beneath his music. He also had this "dreamy" personality. I don't know how else to describe it. Like he was always dreaming and lost in a parallel universe or something. He loved Tolkien and roll playing games. And oddly for a grown person, he really liked to play "Pretend" games like how many of us did when we were children.

He was or is an amateur artist, so what he likes to do is spend time drawing all these maps of his make believe world. He'd draw out what the people looked like, make up their languages and alphabets, invent their religions; and when we hung out at his place he'd try to draw me into this make believe world he made by getting me to participate. So I ended up giving in and playing along and drew up a crude continent or map on a big white card board world map he made. We were going to invent our civilizations and then go to his favourite hobby shop and buy figurines and dice to invent a roll playing war game. My friend Z had informed me that his people and civilization had a government and that he had written the details of how this government works, so he urged me to do likewise and invent for my "people" a system of government. This was something I never really thought about, but I eventually came up with a theoretical pretend government system.

Basically this pretend government of mine was a "parliamentary" system and roughly based on the concept of mixed democracy. The Parliament is both the Judiciary and Legislative body. Each member of Parliament serves for 10 years. The parliament elects from among themselves the Head of State and Government called an “Empress,” who serves for 25 years. This “Empress” office is the Executive branch and has the same powers as a cross between a President and a Prime Minister. No man is allowed. The Executive can also introduce legislation proposals. The people are divided into clans where each clan elects a clan leader who is the oldest of them. Clans related to each other make a Tribe. Each clan leader elects a Tribe leader who are the members of parliament.

A body called the Imperial Sangha exists. This sangha is made up of all Buddhist monks and nuns over the age of 50 in the empire. The Imperial Sangha governs and oversees the education system in the empire. Only members of the Sangha can be teachers. All schools from grade school to universities are under its control. Permanent adult education is mandatory. Any adults that do not go to college lose their privilege [“right”] to own property, vote, participate in politics, and own a businesses.

Citizens age 25 and older can vote but they need a License To Vote. 5 years of college earns the citizen their License To Vote. Every 5 years this License must be renewed and each citizen put through tests to see if they are still intelligently able to vote and participate in politics.

The government system from the state level on down is divided into three parts just like the American government. This causes state level governments to function slower than the central imperial government. This makes sure power stays rooted in the imperial parliament.

Only one political party is allowed, which was one I invented I named “Pragmatic-Utilitarianism.” The basic concept of Pragmatic-Utilitarianism is: Use what has been proven to work and reject all theories and beliefs. Belief and theory has no place in the arena of running people’s lives. It is absolutely illogical to take a theory or belief which has not been proven or determined to be productive or destructive, and to use such theories and beliefs to rule the lives of a people. Eventually over the years I compiled a corpus of concepts and principles for my “Pragmatic-Utilitarianism,” which may be described as a secularized form of Theravada Buddhism and “Minimalistic Zen.”

There was a constitution and Pragmatic-Utilitarianism dictates that any law or new article or amendment before being put into the constitution must first be tested and tried on the State level for one generation or 40 years. After the required period the Imperial Sangha reviews the effects such proposed laws has had on the people, society, the environment, etc. If the end results of such proposed laws have proven to be destructive in nature, then no matter how nice it sounds, it is rejected and dismissed and cannot be a constitutional law. Laws past by the imperial parliament exists in a 10 year probationary period of trial, after which time the Imperial Sangha will review each law for its effects on people, society, etc. If found to be destructive, then the law is automatically nullified. Lastly, in this fictitious government no person under the age of 60 is allowed to be elected into any kind of political and public office. Every public office is based on volunteer service, meaning it is illegal to pay a politician for their public service.

I lost the roll play war with my friend Z. But from that superficially meaningless game of imagination I got somethings very valuable to me, one being my private memplex Pragmatic-Utilitarianism. The other valuable thing I learned from this meaningless experience was that Imagination is an immense source of inspiration and creativity. I have this notion that Imagination [right brain] must be functionally balanced with Logic & school based knowledge [left brain] if a person desires to use both sides of their brain in a more wholistic manner. Or as Einstein said it: "Imagination is more important than knowledge. For knowledge is limited to all we now know and understand, while imagination embraces the entire world, and all there ever will be to know and understand." It think Imagination is something lacking in the average person. It seems as though they lost it with their childhood or left it behind in their past. "I sometimes ask myself how it came about that I was the one to develop the theory of relativity. The reason, I think, is that a normal adult never stops to think about problems of space and time. These are things which he has thought about as a child. But my intellectual development was retarded, as a result of which I began to wonder about space and time only when I had already grown up [-Einstein]."

Putting It All Together

It has amazed me consistently over the years how many of my readership needs ESL. Using big words with such people simply does no good. They lack the discipline or desire to look up words and verify data, and do their own research. They misunderstand what they read and develop assumptions. Then they wait for you to break your words down into baby talk for them. They wait for you to explain things for them, rather than go out and do their own research. They also lack critical problem solving skills where you have to break down step by step what you are doing before they "get it," because they can't put the pieces together by themselves. And these same mundanes would have you believe that they are "intelligent." These mental cripples are mentally lazy. Sometimes I ask myself what you mundanes do with your brains? Oh that right forums, chatrooms, social media, video logs, and sharing opinions. In other words: Socializing in Cyberspace, just like every teeniebopper does right?

For three years now I've used the word "Memplex" in conjunction to this ONA thing. I use that word so much its overkill. But yet you mundanes just don't get it, because you simply can't even bother to learn what that word means in actuality. "ONA is a Memplex." What do I mean by that? In that past I used to love stating that ONA is a Memplex in these forums and watch how people react. Usually they don't react and some repeat what I say.

The word has several meanings. Basically it means a Complex of Meme. That may still be too big for the mundane to grasp. Complex here means "A Bunch Of," and Meme here means "Ideas." So when you put those two together what do you have in babytalk? You have: A Bunch Of Ideas. What is another way to call something which is nothing more than a bunch of ideas? BULLSHIT might be one as in: It's All Bullshit. What do you call something that is describes as being all bullshit? In babytalk you can say that it is "Fake." That word "Fake" is too nebulous to have any meaning to me personally. But for you mundanes, when we put it all together and say ONA is Fake, then you Understand don't you? That's the funny part I used to find funny. I say ONA is a memplex and nobody reacts. Others say ONA is Fake and all of a sudden you have a whole cyber drama develop where everyone says to each other: 'I knew it! I knew it!' Just to be fair with those social scientists, a "memplex" does not just mean a pile of ideas. Human culture is a memplex. Graduation ceremony is a memplex. Halloween is a memplex. It's a structured organization of IDEAS put together which is than express through people in behaviour, deed, action and cultivation. But this is too big, so let's just keep it dumbed down as to mean "fake."

Three years ago when we started this blog here I wrote out a short Mission Statement for the WSA regarding the ONA memplex. The Mission Statement is on the left hand side bar just below a picture-sign that reads: "White Star Acception," plus our logo. I don't think many people have ever bothered to read it or actually consider its meaning and implications. Fact is I did not write that Mission Statement. I Plagiarized it from a mission statement of sorts of Theravada Buddhism. All I did was change a few words. Where in the original it read "The Sangha," I simply substituted it with "The Acception." Where in the original it read "Dhamma" I substituted in it's place the term "Order of Nine Angles." Then I added the word "Sinister" in front of the word "Posterity," and voila! I used this Theravada quicky statement because I actually know my own religion and culture's history and how Theravada developed objectively sans the sectarian-political propaganda [mythos]. Which I'll briefly retell.

Historically – in reality – the Buddha never existed and thus, there were no teachings [Dhamma with a capital "D"]. What existed in the Age of Enlightenment of India and China circa 500BC were groups of philosophers who were displeased with the stale Brahmanism. Taking a few inspirational hints from the Jains and other Shramana Traditions, some of these displeased philosophers began to stitch together a very loose primitive mythos. In those very early stages the Mythos was simply there was a teacher of some sort who had all these teachings, and the displeased philosophers were custodians of such teachings.

Eventually this mythos drew in others who were displeased with the state of Brahmanism and what happened was you had all of these sects that claimed to follow some person called Buddha – an ancient nickname of Shiva as Mahayogi – and that their sect had this Buddha's genuine teachings [Dhamma]. But there were so many rival sects producing their own Dhamma that there were literally thousands and thousands of pages of Dhamma from this supposed Buddha.

A sect that considered themselves the most Elder [Thera] of all such sects started to play the political game a hundred or so years after the mythos was alive. Their political game was to wipe out competition and bring Order to Chaos, meaning their agenda was to bring together all of those incoherent Dhammas together into something solid and coherent. Eventually they gathered all of the Dhammas ever written, had a big meeting with their allied sects and cherry picked all of the manuscripts that would politically work in their favour. This collection of manuscripts became known as The Tipitaka which consisted of 24,000-25,000 pages of crap. Just like the olden day Church Patriarchs of Catholicism, what these Theras did next was agree or vote that their 25,000 pages of crap was the Genuine teachings of Buddha and all other sect's manuscripts were fakes. They also asserted that all sects who do not believe this Tipitaka to be the genuine Dhamma of Buddha were fakes. Then these Theras did something very clever that would help them win their political games.

What they did was they invented something called a "Sangha." In English that word simply means an Order, Club, or Association. The Sangha was the body of monks and nuns. But this Sangha was created for a purpose different from why Christian priesthoods exist. The Sangha political agenda was to seed in ever successive generation the mythos and Dhamma in such a way that over time in their future, something real will develop. The Sangha's covert job was to make in the future real what was once just a myth and ideas. All things in our human world starts off as an idea. All it takes is for a group of people to come together to try to manifest that ideas in the world, to make such ideas real. Christianity during ancient Roman times was once just a weird quasi-Jewish mythos. America once was just an idea. The idea of a nation where people can simply be free from the rule of priest and king to do as they please so long as they harm none. And that idea today – because of people willing to make it real – is for us Americans very real. And someday in our near future, many of the things we today consider to be nothing more than Science Fiction, will – because there are people willing [trying] – be real. Ideas need people to manifest in the world as something causally “real.”

I gave the WSA such a Mission Statement for a reason. To hint at a few things. But Most people can't even bother to seriously Understand a simple paragraph. Let a lone read between the lines. I'll quote the paragraph and break it down, as you keep in mind the history of Buddhism. We can't today go to Asian and tell those 500 Million Buddhists plus me and my family and our culture and traditions that our Buddhism is fake. No more than I can tell myself or any of the 300 Americans here that our America is fake and that the United Kingdom is real. It's too late. What makes an idea real – the actualization of such idea – are people simply willing to put in the effort to make such ideas real in their own lives and for those around them who desire it to be real too. Because this civilization we call “America” is in reality just the 300 million of us Each expressing the ideas and principles of “America” through each of our lives, actions, and so forth. The Mission Statement:

“To Presence the Dark, Progression, & the Sinister Feminine. The White Star Acception is a Sinister Tribe of the Order of Nine Angles. The Acception was established to provide a social structure and social order supportive of the practice and application of the Sinister Sevenfold Way, and to preserve the teachings and traditions of the ONA for Sinister Posterity.”

It's pretty easy to decipher if you read it carefully and fully understand some key terms. “The Acception” meaning this WSA, was “established” meaning Put Together or Made, to “Provide” meaning Give. Give what? A “social structure.” What's that mean? Social basically means two or more people together. Structure means an framework, body, organization, building, house, temple, sky scrapper, army. You have a blueprint [idea] then you have the structure. You have the strategy [idea] then you have the army [social structure] to execute such strategy in the real world. To Give what else? A “Social Order.” What's that term mean? Basically a social order is a coherent, that might be a big word. A social order is when all these ideas connected together all together in an orderly way like a single file line, so that those orderly ideas can be alive and pass around from person to person in what we might call a “society” or grouping of people. That's as babytalk as I can make it. So for example a “social order” would be groups of people like the Democrats, or stoners, or emos, skaters, the people you see at Chinatown. That emo life style thing is a social order. They all share common things together. A common social identity, a common fellowship, and so on.

So what does that Mission Statement imply or suggest? It implies that if the ONA were Real – as in a really real organized organization – then why the hell does it need a social structure and social order? It suggests that the ONA is an idea – or fake if that makes more sense to you – and that some group of people calling itself the WSA is trying to give that ONA idea a structure and order. When I say ONA is an “idea” here I mean the entire corpus of ONA ideas/teachings since 1972 in every ONA manuscript and book. For the sake of convenience I use the word “Memeplex” to refer to this jungle of ideas which suggests that such memes need cultivation. And a meme is not just an “idea,” in social science. Nodding your head to mean “yes” is a meme. Making emoticons in your digital writings is a meme, painting war paint on your face is a meme, etc. But this is beyond mundane interest. We’ll keep it simple and just say a meme is an “idea.”

And to re-enforce this suggestion of the ONA being just ideas I actually wrote something called “Joining The Order” where the very FIRST sentence tells you in all honesty what the ONA is and how you “join” it. If people were to just try to read it, you’d see it says that you can’t join the ONA because it DOES NOT exist. In this same essay I go further to try to make people understand that you don’t join the ONA, you have to MAKE IT.

But all of this splaining falls on dumb ears. Most of my readers speak Occultnikese. Yo se habla su lengua, endiendes we? What sort of Occult stuff was once fake but is now real? Let’s see. Witchcraft was once in olden times a myth Puritans used to kill certain women and people they did not like. Remember the Salem Witch Trials? How many of them were Wiccans? None, because Witchcraft was not ever a “real” religion. It was a loose body of ideas. It wasn’t until people like Gerald Gardner, and later Scot Cunningham put these ideas together and slowly collected adherents that the Witch Cult or Wicca became a “real” religion. Same things with Satanism. Before the 60’s the ideas of Satanism existed randomly in the dictionary as the word “Satanism,” as old stories of devil worship. It wasn’t until people like LaVey came and Codified – put something together – and attracted people who resonated with his memeplex that “Satanism” became something real. “Real” here meaning many people assumed the descriptor “Satanist,” and agreed with LaVey’s memeplex. Whereas before those many people, it was just an idea in LaVey’s mind and writings. I don’t think you Satanists would like me or agree with me if I said your Satanism was fake. Because it honestly is not today. But in the past, it was an idea or many incoherent ideas. The difference is that today those ideas have a social structure and social order to express itself in our real world. What’s the coolest occult example of this subject? One of my secret heroes Mister Crowley is a great example of someone who was able to manifest fake ideas into real things.

Thelema before Crowley was a fictitious idea. It originated as a concept found in a fiction novel written by a Catholic monk in the 1500’s. Later in the 1700’s Sir Dashwood and his friends took this fictitious idea and gave it some life. They wrote “Do What Thou Wilt” over a cave entrance in which they had orgies. This group of Masons became popularly known as the Hell’s Fire Club. It wasn’t until later that Crowley manifested Thelema as a “real thing” first via his Book of the Law. Today you can’t go up to a Thelemite and tell them their Thelema is fake or fictitious because it no longer is so. But this is not why I respect Crowley. I’ll share the story which made me respect him.

A long time ago a young Crowley wrote in his personal diary that his ambition was to own all esoteric orders, including Freemasonry and the Bavarian Illuminati which during it’s “existence” only existed on paper. What Crowley basically did was join dying esoteric orders and then just assume a leadership role. Meaning that he joined organizations that were dying from membership decline and just asserted himself as its leader. Sometimes he changed the name around. His A.'.A.'. is one such take over where he just took the Golden Dawn which people had lost interest in. The OTO BTW actually has an “Illuminati” degree or had.

Meanwhile an older guy name Theodore Reuss was aging. Reuss was the Outer Head of the OTO. Young Crowley enters the OTO and puts himself into position to make his moves. One step at a time. The objective was the annexation of the OTO and to turn it into a Thelemite institution. The original OTO was a word for word copy of the degrees of York Rite Freemasonry and had nothing to do with Thelema.

Reuss starts to suspect Crowley’s ambitions. In two instances Reuss stated once in his own diary that he does not want this young Crowley to lead the OTO. The other time Reuss tells his own wife on his death bed that when he dies whatever happens do not let Crowley have the OTO and corrupt it with his Thelema. At Reuss’ funeral Reuss invited all of his close friends from his OTO to his funeral. Who was not invited? Crowley. Later Crowley states that the fact that Reuss did not invite him to his funeral and the fact that Reuss never mentioned his name as the successor of OTO leadership proves that Reuss wanted him to be its leader. [Go make sense of that shit].

After Reuss’ death a legitimate heir had been picked by the OTO. This was when Crowley took things to a radical – or bizarre – level in the name of his ambitions for immortality. What he did was simple yet aeonically quite amazing. What Crowley did was for the rest of his natural life he would ignore every OTO member, their so call leader, and plow every one down by asserting that he is the OHO of the OTO and that the OTO is his. He died making those claims. During his life he changed the OTO and introduced his Thelema and writings into it even though the whole of the OTO did not recognize these changes. It didn’t matter. Crowley had his eyes on the distant future. His Thelemized OTO with him as OHO might not in his lifetime be real and people might laugh at him and ridicule him, but in time it will be real. It was a battle of will power and endurance. And Mister Crowley won.

Today when we say OTO to your average occultnik what two things do they first think of? Crowley and Thelema. And more tellingly, how many occultniks TODAY – in our time frame which is Crowley’s future – knows what the “real” or original OTO was, what it’s degrees looked like, what it originally taught. And who today even cares? Crowley is immortal today in the Western Tradition. Not really because of the ideas, orders, and kabbala he ripped off, but because of his sheer will and endurance and good marketing skills. Although I don’t think they were called marketing skills back then.

So if you have read this far you may cast your eyes suspiciously at me now wondering what all these hints I am dropping really means? It means I don’t care what ONA is, was, who it belongs to, what it was, who is a member of it, if it is dead, real, fake, or imaginary. As long as WSA exists, the ONA Memplex will always have a Nexion to manifest – become real – through. Like I stated publicly here elsewhere. ONA is just a syringe – a tool – I need to inject memes with for a purpose 10 years from now. But it has its uses for me in other time frames such as when my own future children will be in high school when they will have peers. I'd like the WSA to make the ONA real in their life time for other jobs.

As far as DM goes, I have said in our y-group over two years ago which is still there that I will make my own DM if I have to to get my work done. I also stated in our y-group many years ago before I started all of this that I will use everyone in and out of ONA to get my work done. The Real DM may not have ever had anything to do with the fake ONA just as he publicly states for a public audience. But in spirit DM was and is important to the ONA memeplex. This will make no sense unless I tell a different story.

Once upon a time in Jamaica their lived a nation of slaves who after being liberated had lost their precious ancestral culture and traditions due so many years of English brutal rule. Some of these newly Freed Jamaicans looked to mother Africa for inspiration to seed a new tradition and culture.

A quasi-christian group looked to Ethiopia and found inspiration in the person of Emperor Haile Selassie whose family mythos says that his bloodline comes from King Solomon, which was why he was originally picked. The Emperor is also known as Ras Tafari. Eventually a religious sect and belief system call "Rastafarianism" developed around the "spirit" or image of Haile Selassie where the Rastafarians exoterically believes that this Emperor is Jah [God] in the flesh. The funny part was a while back some journalists interviewed the Emperor and asked him if he believed he was God or teaching people he was God. The Emperor stated that he had no idea a group of Jamaicans had promoted him to God status and had nothing to do with it. For the rest of his life the Emperor denied that he was Jah and that he was just a person who had nothing to do with the Rastafarian movement. But that didn't matter to the Rastafarians. Because there were "two" Emperor Haile Selassies, the Real person in Ethiopia, and the Mythic "Image" of one in a Movement which this movement used as a Source of inspiration and symbol.

There is also a similar case of this topic which took place in Papua New Guinea which I love because it's actually innocent and funny. What happened was during World War Two the British and Americans had built bases on the island of Papua New Guinea. The unfortunate natives, not familiar with airplanes believed these military cargo ships were Birds from heaven. They believed that the Gods sent these Birds down to the earth to drop food and cargo for their people but they were sinful so the food was captured by the White man until they clean their sins. As this cargo cult develops it became that the President of America – I think it was Roosevelt? – was made and believed to be a God since the natives learned the airplanes were coming from Roosevelt country. They made hut temples for the President and even went so far as to name him President of Papua New Guinea too, in the hope that the Gods would be nice and drop cargo for them. Of course the actual President was not aware that he had been made a God until much later, and of course being a descent man he denied he was a God.

So that was what I meant when I said long ago that if needed, I will make my own DM for the ONA. And I explained in detail that I did and why in an essay called "The Business of ONA." The Real DM can deny all he wants, and he will perhaps continue to deny public forever. But that is inconsequential. I have my own DM, or I had one. Except now both DM's may be a cause of future problems to this ONA project's longevity. I say this not in a mean and disrespecting way to anybody. DM has to be separated from Anton Long and the ONA. If not, then when DM the person passes on, our DM and ONA might not live long after. A Cult of Personality rarely lasts much longer than its central cult personality. Many Satanists of the modern camp do often say that the Church of Satan died with Anton LaVey, and I agree.

But the Church of Satan and ONA are different. One is still an idea, that needs a chance. Even though the person of DM is being removed from ONA, inside the ONA memplex, he will always have a place as an inherent meme in a Memplex being born.

This notion of "real" and "fake" is stupid and a big bug for me, because those that use such words rarely explains what such nebulous words mean. To make things simple for any future asshurt clowns who cries at ONA people about how ONA is fake, lets say that it is Fake. If this is true, ignore the letters ONA and just focus on the letters WSA and other ONA inspired group's Names. At least WSA and other nexions are real, meaning there are a group of people – social order – giving the IDEA of ONA a Social Structure to manifest, materialize through.

So now that this all has been said, we stay steady on course and things will remain as they were with minor changes. From hereon, the person of DM is not and was never a part of the ONA. Anton Long is a myth used by ONA people. The ONA is a myth. Some groups of people who resonate with this myth are working together to manifest it in their private lives. ONA if Fake. But groups inspired by this ONA myth such as WSA, THEM, Aerhaosh, Meridianus, the Russian Niners, Secuntra, Templvm Carnis, Volastus, and the many single person Niners, etc, etc, puts that idea into practice in their own ways. The Cells of ONA and the idea of ONA are two different phenomena. As different as the field of Theoretical Physics and Applied Physics.

If they say ONA is Fake out there, it is not a bad thing because it actually opens for us a door of opportunity to take advantage of [which I have been doing already for 3 years now]. I challenge all those who like and resonate with this ONA memplex to make it real in their own ways. All it takes is a group of people to just simply apply ONA stuff in their personal and private lives to make it real on a collective level. If people like Crowley can do it with Thelema, and if people can take a fictitious Cult of Cthulhu and make it realistic what does that say about your capabilities if you can't make ONA real? What does it say about you if those mundanes asserts that ONA is not real, and you give in to their will? I will try as I have been. If I am the only one who ends up trying, I warn you ahead of time: ONA will be mine. The choice and fate of the ONA is in the hands of those who are drawn to this ONA memplex. If together we agree it is doable and together we work in our own ways and apply it in our private lives it will be real in Time and it will be Peer Based composed of sovereign and autonomous Cells. If you don't want to try, I can promise you that in 30 years what becomes of ONA will belong to me, and when it does, it will stay in the death grip of the WSA. But for those of us associates, it should always be remembered that what has been stated in Public is for the Public to consume. You are above that Common Public and not the intended audience. Things said for the public often times serve private unseen purposes.

NOTES ON CHANGE

I'm not really sure how long this post will be because I don't have anything pre-written. This note is about change and the confusion it brings to some people.

Generally, the only things in life that don't change are man-made things: books, desks, cars, buildings; your habits. You can leave a book on a desk for a hundred years and neither the book or the desk will change. You can park a car outside for a year and the car will be the same car after the year is done. Buildings on our city don't change and morph. And while these man made things remain "the same" over time; everything around them – the rest of Life and the Living Cosmos – changes to the flow of Time. Things that are alive, that are Natural, that are Nature-made, must change or die.

Recently a student of the Sinister Tradition expressed some confusion about the change that happened in the Sinister:

[Quote Sinister 101]

There was an article written by the WSA 352 that was pretty cool on perspective I'll have to look for it on their ONA NXS site and get back here with it before I go to much further. But I'd like to talk a bit more about some of the relativity of change in relation to the Sinister because frankly I'm confused about what it's supposed to be. Because if it's something that always changes it's like trying to grab at sand.

[End Quote]

Our confused student's consciousness, or awareness, or mindfulness, is fixated on external “things” and not on himself/herself: Know Thyself. This confused person equates change with sand passing through one’s fingers – which to me suggests that this person; on a deeper level; is the type of person who has the feeling of needing to control things in his/her grip. This individual never stopped to realize that he himself – like a flowing river – is always in a constant state of change; yet he is not confused about such.

Chronomorphically, if we were to take this confused person’s life from birth to his present age and look at it as a whole, we would be able to clearly see the constant change in this person. His body changed. His mental capacity changed. Every 11-12 months every cell in your body is replaced, so the very building blocks of his body is never “the same.” His memories, his thought, his feelings, his hopes, his dreams, his world view, all change and are never the same from one moment to another. So, on an individual corporeal level each person is in a constant flux of change.

As each person changes, Time also changes things, and with Time, Nature also changes. And such changes are not isolated phenomena. It’s like a star game, or a game of Go [the board game] you see? Where one move of a piece is not an isolated event, but causally affects and influences everything else on the board, and influences the entire game itself. Each change in Time and Nature ripples out and affects everything and everyone. Each individual change ripples out and affects others. This interconnection of things gives rise to a “problem” for humans: the problem that we must change ourselves – adapt to such changes – or die.

But environmental changes are obvious. The source of this person’s confusion is the Morphology of Memplexes over Time. He is basically asking why such things must change and not remain the same over time. This confusion is born from the individual’s lack of a genuine understanding of who and what he is: He is a single human in a social ordering of humans, called “society.” In regards to society, one of our 352 brothers once said: “It only takes one generation for a liberal to become a conservative.”

If this confused person is in a constant state of change – of inner growth, mental capacity, cognitive skills, world views – and society is composed of many such changing individuals, then it is only rational to assume that “society” also changes over time.

So the zeitgeist of society – the collective mind of a social order – changes as Time changes. Not to long ago most American citizens saw nothing wrong with slavery because it was generally believed – believe: the condition of accepting a meme/memplex – that black people were not human. But today black people can be presidents. What happened? What changed? Biologically, as an organism, black people are still organically “the same” today, as they were 200 years ago. What changed was something which concerns biology actually: it’s called reproduction.

People have children, and those children grow up to have children of their own. This gives rise to the coming and going of generations. From a memetic perspective, reproduction and the change of generations is a problem. Because just because your grandparents believed that black people were not human – because they accepted the memplex of such – does not mean that your own mind, and the mind of your own generations will be fertile and conducive to such a memeplex and world view.

Just a while ago in most Occidental countries women could not vote and had no social rights. There was nothing organically or biologically wrong with us [women] that caused us to not have rights and not be able to vote. Our lack of such liberty has its roots in the memes that infected the zeitgeist of a certain generation. But just because your father or mother believed – accepted the memeplex – that women belong in the kitchen, does not mean that you will also accept such memeplexes.

So what happened to the memeplex of slavery and apartheid and the memeplex of women belonging in the house and not the workplace? They died. Why? Because with reproduction comes new people, and with new people comes social change – a change in social world view. And thus with such change new memes evolve.

Even within specifically religious memeplex, such change and morphology is evident. 100 years ago black people were not permitted to become Mormons or to join their priesthood. It was believed – acception of memes – that black people were cursed and that the color of their skin was the mark of the curse. I insight roled as a Mormon:

Alma 3:6 “And the skins of the Lamanites were dark, according to the mark which was set upon their fathers, which was a curse upon them because of their transgression and their rebellion.”

Mormon 5:15 (prophecy about the Lamanites) “for this people shall be scattered, and shall become a dark, a filthy, and a loathsome people, beyond the description of that which ever hath been amongst us. . . .”

You see, these anti-black memes found in old day Mormonism were fine for the rednecks and hillbillies of THAT specific time and zeitgeist; because the social order around them – popular culture – saw black people in the same manner. So what do you call the act of making things to sell to a group of people based on what they like and how they see things? Marketing. Who do you think the Mormon religion was Marketing their memeplex to back then: To the receptive Market.

Now the revealing question is: What would happen to the Mormon memeplex if it did not change and if today it still held onto this anti-black meme? It would die; and why is that? Because there is no god damn Market for such a meme/belief/worldview in today’s people. Because that anti-black meme just doesn’t fit into the weltanschauung of the everyday person. In other words, that meme has become completely irrelevant to the people of today. And to remain relevant to society and people, such a memeplex must evolve and change. As people keen to the shifting interests of the Market, we can of course expect Mormonism to change its redneck policies. So, as expected in 1978 God himself changed his mind about negros as he spoke to the then Prophet Spencer Kimball directly concerning this issue of cosmic proportion; after the Prophet was vigorously praying on the matter in the Holy of Holies:

Quote [the 1978 conversation between God and Prophet Kimball of the LDS]

REVELATION given to Spencer W. Kimball, March 6, 1978, Salt Lake City, Utah.

1. Hearken, my servant Spencer, unto the voice of the Lord thy God, and receive my word in answer to thy fervent pleas!
2. Lo, I am well pleased with thee and my servants the Apostles and with all the righteous Saints of my Church. Because of your righteous obedience you are blessed, and I now reveal my Word unto thee, to proclaim unto my Saints and unto all the World;
3. For thou hast oft inquired of me regarding the skin of blackness which marks many of my faithful children, because of which the blessings of my priesthood and of my exaltation have been denied to them;
4. And thy cries and the cries of my black children have ascended unto me, and I now reveal unto thee further light and knowledge in this matter.
5. For my Church is like unto your father Abraham, whom I did sorely tempt, in that I commanded him to take his beloved son and offer up his life as a sacrifice to me;
6. And lo, Abraham in the fulness of righteous obedience did take his son, and did bind him to an altar of rough stones, and did raise the knife to sacrifice him, according to the command which I had given him.
7. And by mine angel did I stop his hand, for his sacrifice of obedience was complete.
8. For human life is not to be taken as a sacrifice to me, except the sacrifice of the Only Begotten, of which Isaac was a type, for such a doctrine and practice is repugnant to me.
9. But it was for Abraham a test of obedience to my Word.
10. And lo, likewise the doctrine of the curse of Cain and the mark of blackness, as well as everything pertaining thereto, is also repugnant to me, but was given unto my Saints as a test.
11. And ye have been valiant and righteous in obeying the words of my mouth which were given not as true doctrine but only as a test for your benefit.
12. Now, therefore, rejoice in my blessing and receive my Word! For no more shall ye make any distinction among my Saints as to their race or as to the color of their skin; for I the Lord God am no respecter of persons, but all shall come unto me and all may be worthy to receive all the blessings of my Gospel without let or hindrance.

[End Quote]

So what did we learn from this? Well, we learned that Elohim [God] too even changes his mind, as it is evident in that it took God a good 6000 years to learn to not be racist and to like his negro kids. And just like God, David Myatt also changed his mind, but David Myatt only took a few years to figure stuff out.

The difference between God and David Myatt is that God changed his mind about racism because nobody was racist anymore [peer pressure]. If his church continued to teach such redneck 'anthropology' nobody would join his Mormon church. David Myatt changed from experience and what he calls Pathei Mathos. Which brings us to the topic of why the Sinister has changed.

The Sinister Tradition has not changed. In the same way the you have not changed. This sounds like a complete contradiction to what things I stated up there. But if you search inside yourself for that which you refer to as "I" and you observe that "I" very carefully; you will come to realize that although OUTER things about you have changed such as: you age, your brain size, your body, your appearance, your thoughts, memories, and emotions; there is yet an INNER aspect of you – your genuine self – that remains the stationary, unchanging, Self. So it can be said that you constantly do change on an EXOTERIC level; but remain unchanged on an ESOTERIC level.

So, the Sinister Tradition has not changed Esoterically. “Sinister” is just a useful word which describes an internal Nature of certain individuals who naturally do specific things or live a specific way. That essential Nature, and what they do or how they express that essential Nature are two very different things.

A guy with a Nature – a dharma or “physis” – of desiring to better himself and be athletic, will express that Nature THRU – by means of – various methods such as body building and martial arts. It is non sequitur to say that the man’s Nature = bench pressing and kung fu. One is the Man, whereas the other is his Means.

A person who has a natural disposition for art and music will express that Nature in many ways: painting, sculpting, composing music, associating with artists and musicians. In no way is this artistic person his associations and what he does. They are two completely differently phenomena. This artistic person can one day change his mind about the style of art or music he or she likes and do things in a completely different manner. And although the artist’s Methodology has changed, his Nature has not.

Sinister Nature doesn’t change. Sinister tactics, strategy, and methodology must change over time to remain relevant and effective to the era and conditions of the world and Time.

How ONA initiates 20 years ago expressed their Sinister Nature such as via national Socialism may have worked two decades ago within context to the zeitgeist and collective fears of nations; but do these same methods work today in the year 2010; and will such methods work in 2025 and beyond?

Is race and skin color the collective concern of the Market in today’s world? Such that you can use it to fuel a revolution and societal change? If you belief so, then you are stuck in a time warp and are not empathetic to the Market. Today’s people could care less about skin color or how great some white people think they are. It’s old. Who cares if you are white or brown or black or yellow and your proud of your skin color? People today are more concerned about the economic uncertainty of their country, about the erosion of their personal lives do to long work hours and higher costs of living. People today are concerned over personal finances, which is a leading cause of divorce. People today want more free time to spend with their children, spouse, and family.

If there is any collective political concern on the collective mind, its Radical Islam and this has affected and can effect our Western world. What people today are politically concerned about is terrorism, and how Islam is slowly taking over parts of Europe.

If you are genuinely Sinister By Nature, and can feel the change in the Market, you’ll understand what changes need to be made to generate advantageous end results. Perhaps I need to openly spell it out for people? The game is no longer about race: white versus whatever. This meme/idea today is impotent and CANNOT ignite a fight bigger than a bar fight. If the ONA wants to keep its revolutions and disruption in pubs then sure, go ahead and use this white power shit. If you want to start something big, put that racist shit up on a shelf and start manipulating those insecure and uncertain white people in Europe to see and feel that Muslims and Islam taking over their homelands. Evoke and Provoke anger in these white people and in European Muslims. Not with white power bullshit, because Muslims come in all different skin colors. The name of the game now is religious war, not racial war. Get it?

Myatt got it a long time ago – since 98! You'd think the rest of the "Sinisterion" would get a clue? Why do I gotta spell shit out for everybody. Quit fucking with that race bullshit cuz nobody gives a fuck these days what color your fucking skin is. Go fucking insight role as a religious fanatics or Nationalists and get them white European boys whose raging hormones is dying to have a cause to fight for and get somebody to get angry and focus the build up of raw energy somewhere.

David Myatt has already done half of the work in helping engineer a mind set of radicalism in young Muslim boys. Now we go out and start making these Europeans boys into Radical Nationalists.

Outer form will change. But the Esoteric Sinister Nature of the ONA remains the same. If Sinister Initiates do not learn to change, progress, and evolve, to keep themselves and their memplex current and relevant to the there own age and era, then expect it to die out as an irrelevant and impotent memplex.

NOTES ON GNOSIS

Notes On Gnosis

I use the word “gnosis” sometimes as a substitute for the concept of Understanding meaning a process of coming into the realization of something born from direct experience. Which in the Western Mind is sometimes known as “experience knowledge,” [roughly “Practical Reason” or “Gnosiology”] as opposed to “theoretical knowledge” [roughly “Speculative Reason” or “Epistemology”].

The word “understand” can be a clumsy word to use because we can say after we’ve read something: “I understand the statement which I just read.” Here we actually mean that we Comprehend or that we intellectually grasp the meaning/intent of what we read. And so if we’re not careful, we may confuse the Comprehension with Understanding [with the gerund “-ing” suffix]. In my Mind, perhaps also in yours, there is a difference between the two statements: (1) “I understand what sailing is;” & (2) “I have an understanding of sailing.” The first statement suggests that I know on an intellectual or thinking level what sailing is in such a way that you don’t have to tell me because I already know. The second statement suggests experience and thus implies that what I have grasp of sailing from my personal experiences may differ from your personal experiences. At least to me. But to prevent confusion I sometimes use the word “gnosis” to emphasize a realization born/unfolded from experience.

When I do use the word “gnosis” though, I use it as a cover term for Asian-Buddhist concepts such as “Buddhi,” as in the resultant fruit of citta grasping an understanding of things from experience. It’s really hard to explain what the concept of Citta [pronounced Chitta, or Jid, or Jed] is in English because there is no word or equivalent concept to translate it into. It’s feebly most often put into English as “Mind,” and unfortunately there is just no other word for it. I even use the feeble translation, but to differentiate mind as in brain from Mind as in chitta I usually capitalize one.

In my Asian weltanschauung your Chitta/Jed is your Heart or “Heartmind” which is centered in your chest. It’s not your beating heart, and you don’t think with it. You feel with it. Feel as in everything from emotions, to empathy, sympathy, nostalgia, compassion, to realization, impulse, will power, intent and inspiration. If you can feel it, it originates from Chitta. So from chitta/Jed we have a number of different terms/phrases that will help describe what a chitta is.

There is the phrase: “Toke[keep/retain] Jed [chitta/heart]” which is the word/phrase in Khmer for “to Trust,” literally meaning to Keep inside one’s Heart. When you trust someone, you keep them within your Heart, which is your most intimate place in your Being. There is the phrase: “Gird [think/ponder, pronounced as a Brit would read it] Khnong [Inside] Jed [chitta/heart], meaning to “Think To Oneself.” There is the term: “Yoke [capture/take] Jed [chitta/heart]” which means to “Get Another’s Approval,” literally meaning to Capture the other person’s Heart. Because another person’s approval is not an intellectual phenomenon, it is a feeling they have. The thoughts come after the emotion to justify the approval.

“Deung [know] Khnong [inside] Jed [chitta/heart]” means to Realize or have an Understanding for something. Deung means to Know, but when you “know” inside your Heart, you Realize it. Because if you have ever paid attention to yourself when you have your realizations, Aha moments, or epiphanies, they actually start as a feeling around your heart area, which only afterward inspires thoughts and wording to capture that revelatory feeling. Lastly as an example would be the word/term “Kope[appease/comfort] Jed [chitta/heart]” which means to Please or Indulge someone. Like if I love fudge brownies [which I do] and my little mom knows I do, when she makes me fudge brownies to make me happy inside, she is “koping” my Chitta. So chitta means Mind, but not the Mind one does thinking with. It is your Heart-Mind, which is the seat; or rather; the Heart of Buddhi/Gnosis.

Samma

Samma Dithi. In English that Buddhist term found in the Eight Fold Path is translated wrongly as “Right View.” “Wrong” on two counts: 1) Right View automatically suggests that there may be a “wrong view,” which further suggests that such wrong views are rejected for not being right. 2) the original word Samma included both the right and the wrong and every conceivable angle of view.

Samma actually means Complete, Whole, Total, All, Everything Together, as in the Greek word Pan, or the Latin Omni. Samma Dithi in Latinized English I would render as: Omnivisual, meaning to have the ability to See [dithi] everything in relation to the whole and each part. Samma Dithi would in normal English be better translated as “Circumspection,” which is the act of you walking around something and looking at this something from every angle and perspective: left, right, center, over, under, right, wrong, maybe, acceptable, iffy, rejected, and all around.

Samma is important because the Buddha used this same word to mean the “Middle Way.” Or it's one of the words he uses to describe his Way, which in English has been wrongly translated as Middle Path. Wrongly as in an explanation is never given by the any English translator of what exactly the Buddha meant by a "Middle Way" when he used a word which clearly means not Middle but All Ways.

So to explain why he used those two words or concepts interchangeably, if say you were to one day say: "The North Pole represents the earth." Then your friend you were debating said in return: "You're wrong, the South Pole represents the earth." The Buddha comes along and say: "You both forgot Everything In Between, which is the ENTIRE planet itself." The Samma is the Entire "thing" Between and/or beyond two limited perspectives. Theism and Atheism are only two points and not the Entire spectrum. Red and Violet are only two points and not the Whole spectrum of color in a rainbow. Middle Way to the Buddha does not mean the in between safe path of compromise and negotiation. It means everything in between two extreme points not Considered. "Consider" is the key word here. It doesn't mean that what is in between extreme points is "Truth." It means that you cannot come close to an Understanding of things if your perception is based on extreme myopia. Natural phenomena doesn't cluster together in extreme points in space where you can just point to a spot in the air and say: "That right there is Atheism, and the whole universe grows out of that right there phenomenon! I've pinpointed the elusive Truth and it is right at the tip of my finger. Shh, don't debate so loud, it'll fly away."

Shadows

The reason why I brought up Samma is because of Gnosis/Buddhi. When we in general look for gnosis, it's as if we look ahead for something to pop out in front of us. Like we were in a boat looking for the End of the river. We pass into the mouth of the river and get excited having found it. But we often forget that our Whole journey and the Entire river had to exist to get us to the End. In other words, just as the mouth of a river cannot be a separate thing from the river, our gnosis: our End Experience of that mouth of the river, is indivisible [not independent] from our journey.

I'll use one example to draw out the point. You have Platos cave allegory. There is a cave. People live in that cave in a state of ignorance of the outside world. A boy from the cave one day wanders outside and sees the rest of the world. The boy is "enlightened" having Realized that there is more to the world, than the little cave he was born inside of. But we look closer at the Whole process of that boy's gradual coming to his Realization/Gnosis and we come to notice that had that boy first not experience a life in that cave he would not have had the end gnosis. Because the Condition of ignorance in that cave gives contrast to his end gnosis. You don't Understand what a Light is if you have never seen or experienced a Shadow.

This is something that many Buddhist of any school often forgets when considering Buddha. They tend to see him as a "finished product" of being the Enlightened One. They forget that his supposed Enlightenment was an Wholistic process which first began with him as a young prince living in the lap of luxury and indulgence. Without the Buddha's Shadow Past to give contrast to his End Buddhi, he would not have Buddhied anything. The Samma or Complete Way of Seeing Buddha in this case is to also consider that Shadow Life and learn to comprehend that the beginning point and the end point are not two separate phenomena from each other. It is just one Whole Flow, of one Mind toward a different vantage point.

This is a very important concept to consider if gnosis is actually something you and I wish to attain or unfold. We cannot give up the Shadow to chase after Lights. Because that Light simply cannot exist without its contrasting mate Darkness. There is no Shiva without Shakti, they are both contrasting parts of One Whole. There is no World without Mind. Have you ever thought about that? Mindscape gives contrast to the outside world.

Essentially you can't have Buddhi without Abuddhi as the Shadow background. Abuddhi is an actual real Sanskrit word meaning the contrasting opposite of Buddhi: Darkness, Ignorance, Not-Buddhi. The Buddha developed Buddhi later in life around his 30's, but only with his youthful life as the abuddhi Shadow background. So the process of "gnosis" here meaning Buddhi, begins first with Abuddhi and the experience of such "abuddhicious" conditions. This leads into Knowledge and the gradual collection of raw information which slowly brings in new perspectives and vantage points. This leads to Wisdom and the gradual Experience of such knowledge gathered. From that Experience Understanding – here meaning Buddhi/Gnosis – breaks forth from its dark substrate and muddy waters of Abuddhi. Just as a Lotus breaks free from its muddy base. When we think about it, that Lotus would not exist if the muddy lake was not there. The muddy lake and Lotus are symbiotic parts of a Whole system.

That dark substrate and muddy lake is the primeval Mind chitta/psyche which exists in a Natural state and condition Mother Nature and Father Time made it: Original Nature. The "little mind" [brain/consciousness] in the head is the Lotus that blooms which grows out of that primal water: the Lotus of a Thousand Petals as it is called in Taoism. It is because of how I personally see and understand gnosis/buddhi, and how it needs Abuddhi to grow out of, that I personally interpret Satan and Lucifer to be the same "entity" or "thing" like two points of a single spectrum. Rudra-Shivaya the wild, the terrible, the primeval, the basal, is also the Universal Purusha and Parameshvara-Shiva: Shiva as God The Most High. Satan and the practical Experience of what is "Satanic" [whatever that means to the Satanist] gradually leads us to a Luciferian Illumination: meaning a deeper or more intimate Realization of the Nature of what we experienced.

But all that symbolical myth is meaningless without something on a practical level to see this concept unfold in real Human living motion. We have the Life of David Myatt to observe and how it unfolded over Time since the 70's. For instance you have DM in his days in Leeds as a leather jacket and jeans wearing young man who got involved in the skinhead thing. That Life unraveled gradually help found and experience radical and violent groups like NSM, C18, C88, etc. There is a gradual accumulation of knowledge and application for wisdom after those violent days. Eventually to emerge from that dark substrate and murky waters as a Lotus, the nectar of which we call The Numinous Way. That Life and Mind from those early days in the 70's to the present is the Living Essence and "spirit" of the ONA. And if you can't see this Essence of the ONA in the gradual unfoldment of DM who is the very Source Personality of the ONA, then you are looking too hard and missing the point in living motion.

Conclusion

I wrote this as a side note to the other thing I wrote called “The Power of Mythos,” since I figured I may have left some details out. I really don’t know what gnosis means in English. When I use the word itself I use it as a cover word to put on top of Buddhi which means a sort of Empathic or Intuitive Understanding of things that happens inside your chitta, which is not initially an intellectual thought processing. The intellectualization or the dressing that revelatory feeling into words comes second. Such wording and outer dressing is thus only an approximation of what is wordlessly felt and realized inside.

But because the Nature of Chitta – “psyche” – that chitta does not bare its nakedness for you to see without an intimate process of closeness, touching, with one’s body/heart/mind to Experiences. Chitta is like a girl. She feels. She intuits. She “Empaths.” She needs to Know you first, then intimately Experience you for a while to see how you work, your mannerisms, and Ways. Then she open up for you and unravels her outer covering for you. But she is primal and dark. Abuddhi and Buddhi are not two separate things. They are two points of a Process of Becoming, you can’t have one without the other. It’s interesting to me that in Pali the general word for meditation is Bhavana, the root word being Bhava meaning Being, Becoming, Coming Into Being.

Because of my own understandings of how “gnosis” unfolds for me, and as I see it unfold in others, and because of how I see Time being a part of that process, I personally don’t believe that an institution which rejects the Shadow [abuddhi] – in whatever form – can ever be a Way to genuine personal gnosis. A Tree can’t grow without its soil. A Man Comes Into Being from a Boy. You cannot reject that Boy and his Boy Nature, if you desire to be a Man. The Experiences I had during my teenage years and now, Becomes more meaningful and clear with the cliché innocence of my childhood in the background. One gives breadth and depth to the other.

Without that Shadow and the freedom to experience that Shadow, what is presented as Light is and can only be superficial Knowledge and mindcrafted speculative platitudes. Knowledge that you may agree with, believe, adopt, support, prop up; but never knowledge which truly leads to any gnosis or inner realization. It’s like with Christianity where it rejects the Shadow Nature of being Human and tries to prevent you from being free to experience that Shadow Nature. Instead it gives you pre-concocted ideas, concepts, beliefs, and fairy tales. And then what? What do you do all that? What do you ever really Become in the end? Rather than gradually develop an Understanding of oneself and the world we live in, it severs us from not only that real world, but also from what humanity – Nature – we have rejected. And they sell this as spiritual “Truth.”

Mother Nature really can’t afford to have her creatures learn and evolve and come to some sort of understanding of life, the world, and themselves from reading books and following the flowery words of preachers. There must be a Natural “mechanism” or process whereby a creature is able – sans books and words – to grow in understanding and eventually evolve on their own terms just by experiencing and living Life. Otherwise Nature wouldn’t have made it this far to have us.

Pathei-Mathos; putting yourself directly into the torrent of the Shadow and the torrent of the adversities of that Nature and Life; is the only realistic and hard way to understanding. It's easy to Believe. Which is why so many people believe in things. It's hard to struggle with that torrent of Life, which is why so very few people have any real Understanding about Life, or themselves, or anything at all, beyond their speculative beliefs. So if I were ever asked what "gnosis" is, I'd have to answer that it is a personal process and Experience of Coming to an Understanding of something born from our personal Experiences in Life. As such I can only approximate in words what "gnosis" is. It must be experience, and that experience must begin with the conscious experience and taste of the Shadow Nature of things.

In a way, you will never Understand what a "perfect Love" is unless you first had your heart broken many times and are willing to Leave that condition. You don't Realize you were "perfectly healthy" unless you became very sick; but in the experience of that sickness, you must then chose to Leave that condition. Which is the struggle. Sometimes it takes you to hit skid row to Realize how much a dollar is truly worth. And those people who have lived a life in political oppression or have gone through a genocidal revolution, are the ones who have a deeper Understanding and appreciation of/for "freedom." Easy come, easy go; as they say. People change their beliefs and opinions like they change their clothes and shoes. But when we Realize something, it stays with us and actually redefines who we are inside, at least to our own selves. It is just the "Nature" of chitta, that it must experience "things" to come to its own apprehension of such "things."

When you have tasted genuine freedom – whatever that freedom is – can you ever happily return back to servitude? Can you ever gladly and wholeheartedly become a true believing Christian if you ever truly Understood what Satanism is inside? Belief, knowledge, and speculative opinions are transient due to the Nature of the brain/mind and its constant growth and shifting of vantage points. Feeling – the act and function of chitta – is permanent. Once you've felt Love, that feeling and Realization stays with you. Once you've been emotionally scared, it stays with you. Once you have genuinely come to Understand something inside, it stays with you. You can't un-understand something, no more than you can un-feel a feeling that was felt and experienced. Gnosis is "permanent" in the sense that adulthood is permanent because you can't leave it and be a child again. Like Adeptship in a craft or art or science is permanent. Getting to adepthood is the challenging part, but once you make it there, it is permanent. You can only grow from it further.

NOTES ON SAMADHI

Notes On Samadhi

Samadhi is a word which did not exist before the Buddha's period. It is believed by some to have been a word invented by the supposed Buddha, or the philosophers who invented proto-buddhism to try to convey a new set of concepts. Over the thousands of years it has collected many meanings depending on the sect of "Hinduism" or Buddhism, or now New Age BS you are dealing with. In Khmerized Sanskrit we say the word as "sam-MAH-tee," with the stress on the second syllable and the word "Dhi" sounding exactly like the English word Tea/Tee. It is actually two words put together. The word "Sama" means "Equal," "Same," "Leveled," and sometimes is used to mean "Oneself," or "Same-person" in the similar way the word "Meme" is used in languages like French to indicate "Self" as in the French word "Moi-meme" meaning "Myself," but can also mean: "Le Meme Chose," meaning "The Same Thing."

So what's Sambuddhi mean where the Buddha is called the Sambuddhassa, the One Who is [-assa] SamBuddhi? It means roughly Self-Buddhi where Buddhi here means to understand or be educated. "Self-Taught" or Self-Born Understanding is the best English Translation, "Self-Enlightened" or "Enlightened One" is the worst and most meaningless English translation given. The word "Dhi" in Sama-dhi, is related to the word meaning to See [as in the word Samma-ditthi, which is the first Noble Path of the 8 Fold Path], but is it's own word meaning roughly "Reflection," "Mental State," "Imagination," "Intellect," "Devotion." We can say that where "ditthi" means to See with your Eyes, "dhi" means to See with your Mind [your "mind's eye" or your "third eye"]. So you picture in your Mind, your brain being like a car stereo with an Equalizer. You put on random music and the sounds of this music are at different levels relative to each other. You want to Equalize those levels so that the buttons on the Equalizer are all Equally on the Same level. That's the first basic meaning of Samadhi.

There are many different types of "meditations" and many words meaning such types of meditation in Buddhism, and Samadhi is one of them. Samadhi's generic meaning means the type of meditation where you bring the visions, noise, and chattering of your mind down or level them and you maintain that leveled state of mind. Similar, but not quite like zazen. You're not putting in the Effort of silencing your mind. Much like a car stereo all you want to do is equalize the metal noise, but let them remain in the background and pay no attention to them. Your concentration is not on the leveled noise, but on something else. There is a causal – cause and fruit – purpose to samadhi. The Buddha was obsessed with causal chains, and so his idea of samadhi must be apprehended in this causal context. And so, the other meaning of Samadhi is “concentration” where the Effort of Mind or mechanical [manual] force is Devoted [dhi] to the Same [sama] end result.

Usually samadhi is taken out of its causal chain. When removed from its causal chain, it will be misunderstood to simply mean a pointless exercise in meditation to receive something nebulous called “Enlightenment.” This simply isn't the case. Samadhi in Theravada is the middle part of a three link causal chain: Sila-Samadhi-Panya[prajna]. The First gives rise or influences the second. The second gives rise or influences the third.

Sila are the Precepts [the 5 Precepts]. This also is most often removed completely out of context by Westerners. When the 5 Precepts are removed from its causal context you are prone to misunderstand them to be rules or laws of conduct. And based on your own misunderstandings you may judge Buddhism to be moral and ethical or has 5 commandments and so if you don't follow those commandments you are not a “true Buddhist.”

This is the exact same thing where if I were to take the basic three link causal chain of the Scientific Method: Hypothesize-Test-Theorize; and remove the first link out of its native causal context. So completely out of context I look at the word “Hypothesize” and say to myself: “Science is stupid because its nothing but speculations and encourages people to simply hypothesize about shit.” Is my assessment accurate? No it isn't, because I've taken things out of context and am just judging my own ignorant misunderstandings of simplified abstractions.

Why observe the 5 Precepts? Because when you are not busy doing drugs, having random sex, stealing, and killing people, etc – and risking the consequences of such actions – you have time to Samadhi, or Concentrate. Why concentrate? Because the end goal is Wisdom [panya/prajna]. If your end goal is graduating college, then when finals week comes, Concentrate. If you want to Concentrate during finals week don't be fucking around. So the simple causal chain of college finals week can be: Don't Fuck Around – Concentrate – Graduate. If I were ignorant and I took that first causal link out of its causal chain and said that college is stupid because it makes you not have the freedom to fuck around, am I apprehending college life accurately? No. So is Samadhi a pointless mindless meditation? No, there is an end point you are focusing your mind for.

Another thing about Buddhism completely taken out of context which really bugs me are the soc called Four Noble Truths, which somehow in English ends up meaning that Buddhism is gloomy and sees life as a mess of misery and suffering. It's an awful sounding religion. It sure is in English when things are taken out of context.

The Buddha first never used the Pali word for suffering/pain/misery in the Four Noble Truths. Dukkha is the word which does not mean suffering. The word for suffering and pain is Papa. For example when working at my aunt-mom's business she tells me to not be bitchy at customers so that they won't "Ter Pap" me. Ter is your Khmer word for "Do, Make, Cause, Create," and Pap is Papa. Ter-pap in Khmer means to Hurt, Harm, Injure, Assault. Ter-Dukkh [create dukkha] has an entirely different meaning. If I have gas and I'm bloated I say the gas is Ter-Dukkh me. If I'm cramping I say that my Sboan [uterus] is Ter-Dukkh me. What did I say? Did I say my uterus was causing me misfortune, doom, and ungodly misery in life? No, I said no such thing. I said my uterus is bugging me.

In other places the Buddha uses the word samadhi to not mean a mediation, but the focus or concentration of effort to manifest an end objective. Where you level down your random daily activities and focus your physical effort on accomplishing a goal, aim, or plan. Where you learn to level the noise of mind, the noise of heart, and the noise of action, and concentrate the Force of Mind, Emotion, and Action toward manifesting a single end goal. That's also Samadhi. If you really understand the essence of the 8 Fold Path, and you understand that what you see and think becomes what you experience, then as an Ariya with a Noble Perspective of life, you should have the ability to control your own mind, emotions, and actions in such a way where that you are the Helmsman of your own life. Not many people realize or pay attention to the fact that the symbol of Buddhism and the 8 Fold Path [the so called dharma wheel] is itself an actual Helm, or the actual steering wheel of a ship. Who is at the Helm of your Life? Are you the active willful Driver or a passive passenger in Life? If you wish to be at the Helm, then it takes Concentration of mind, emotion, and causal effort to manifest Goals in life. The Sea your proverbial Ship is sailing – which you are the Helmsman of if you are Ariya – is the Sea of Causality. If you understand the current of this sea of causality, then you should be able to make that current work for you to get your ship places. If you are chronically victimized by the current of causality, you are anariya: an ignorant fool blind to the Way/Physis of Nature/Dhamma. Who is in control: you or the current?

When Buddha said that some things in life causes dukkha he didn't say the nature of life is dark, dismal, bleak, and full of suffering. He said there are things in life which can bug you or trouble you. And so if you take that single statement out of complete context to its idea-environment, you'll misunderstand it. It's like you went to a psycho-therapist for a session and your doctors said to you: "Something is troubling you." Did he mean that life was full of suffering and so you should just commit suicide? No he said you're fucked up and not experiencing life the way it ought to be experienced. Life is a joy to live and if you are troubled, the quiddity of that troublesome feeling is NOT a normal aspect of life. It is a disturbance in how Life is by nature. The mythos in Buddhism even sets the stage to give you a big ass hint as to how Life is. The human world is the lowest of 7 realms together called the Kamasukkhapumi. Sukkha means Ease, Kama is the word found in the Kama Sutra meaning Physical Pleasure. Pumi means plane or realm. The human world is the lowest of 7 worlds of Pleasure and Ease/Repose. And so if you exist in such a world and you are experiencing dukkha in life [trouble, worry, gas, cramps, tax collectors] something is not fucking right with the way you are living or experiencing life.

Passion

In the original Pali the Buddha never said to not desire. He never used the word “desire/want.” The word he used was “Tanha” which in his time and place had its own metaphorical meaning. Tanha superficially means to Thirst and has nothing whatsoever to do with the notion of want or desire. Unfortunately this word in English has been badly translated as “Attachment,” or “Craving.” Which are fine words to use in English so long as we give each word room for intuitive mobility. Things get lost in translation. A better word to use in English for Tanha is Obsession, or even Compulsion. As in Obsessive and/or Compulsive behaviour. The metaphorical shade of meaning comes from how if you were extremely thirsty in 500BC India and you had not drunk water in days, you’d senselessly chug down water if you found a river in Desperation. Which can kill you. In such a state of desperation for water, if you chugged down load of it without taking breaks to breathe, you can choke on that water and die. Desperation is the key idea behind Tanha.

So Tanha is say when I get go to an job interview and the job guy doesn’t like me. So I beg for him to take me and tell him I really need the money. I hold onto him and scream in desperation for the job. And I am so compulsively obsessed with this that I threaten him if he doesn’t give me the job. And so the job guy calls the police. That’s Tanha. It’s not an attachment or craving. It’s lunacy.

Tanha is when you have a boyfriend you break up with and the freak doesn’t know to let go. So in his Obsession of and for you he stalks you. His ass is in the bushes looking in your bedroom window. His ass is at your work place bugging you. This guy is not simply attached to you. He isn’t simply craving you. And saying that it’s okay because he just desires you is an gross understatement. The guy is an obsessed freak. Stalking people does not mean desire. It’s beyond desire. It’s lunacy.

But Buddha was Panya – sly and clever – and so you have to put the Buddhism and this concept once you apprehend its essence back in 500BC India to fully appreciate what the Buddha was trying to tell the people back then in that Brahminical society. Your Tanha – Obsession, Compulsion, Desperation – for your idealistic Brahminical gods, and the crazy shit you people do because of and for religion and your imaginary gods is Tanha. Tanha leads to Dukkha [trouble/worry/anguish].

Your desperation to go to heaven or the brahmaloka. Your desperation to be reborn rich in the upper ranks of the caste system, causes you as a lowly untouchable dukkha. Your willingness to give those gods and Brahmins what little food and money you have which could feed and provide for you causes dukkha. Your obsession for your sect or cult or religion drives you insane to make war and kill for the stupid reason of your enemies simply not believing the same way you do. That’s tanha. It is absurdly irrational and causes dukkha for you, as long as you hold onto that Tanha.

Same thing with some sects or people in Christianity. It’s a fine and inspiring faith when reasonably taken in moderation. But when you take things to an obsessive and desperate level it’s no longer fine. You have these priests struggling with celibacy when sex is natural, and that need, oppressed, ultimately manifests itself as perverse acts of molestation. You have these people who have this compulsion to experience what Christ did on the cross and so they allow themselves to be literally crucified on a wooden cross. You have fanatic Christians who do not believe in abortion so much that they kill abortion specialists. That's Tanha. It's not desire, or attachment, or craving. It is something far beyond those things, which is ultimately self destructive.

Passion is something different. I use that word loosely here. Passion is a key to success in any field. Without that passion, the end goal cannot be manifested. Passion is when the random daily desires and emotions we all have on a daily basis is leveled and takes the background while one emotion for something burns in the foreground naturally. The burn is a natural dharmic fire which you do not need to feed. Natural passion for something does not require you to be motivated for what you are passionate about. An artist who has that natural physis or dharmic fire to be an artist does not need to motivate himself or psyche himself out to paint a picture. It's just something that he does with a natural force and enjoyment, which actually motivate him in other ways.

I was watching a Japanese art show on station 18.2 the other day. The show is about a respected art enthusiast interviewing major artists in Japan. The show was subtitled in English. In the show I watched and really liked the art guy was interviewing an artist who had long greying hair who looked like he was a Japanese surfer or hippy. We were first taken to the artists million dollar art gallery the artist built himself, even though the artist looked like a slacker or jobless person.

The pictures to me at first looked ugly. The paintings looked like as if a Japanese who liked lines and circles were trying to mimic Picasso really badly. I was thinking to myself while being shown his art work: "Those Japanese people are something aren't they? How the hell did this artist make money to buy his damn gallery? Who buys this stuff?" But then the fascinating part comes which completely changed my mind about the artist and made me see his work in a very different way.

This artist did not actually paint his picture to start off with. He cuts wood. So the art guy went to the artists studio to film how this artist makes his art work. The artist takes a wooden panel of wood and lays his hands on it with eyes closed. Then he clasps his hands three times and says to the film crew that he puts himself into a meditative state and prays for the spirit of the wood to impress in his mind a picture it wants to express through him.

When he was done praying and in a state of meditation he quickly grabs a paint brush and dips it in black paint and seeming scribbles what look like random blobs and squiggles. After a few second of this the artist in some sort of semihypnotic state with eyes half closes does something both bizarre and amazing at the same time. He grabs a little wood etching instrument and begins twisting and etching lines and stuff in an astonishingly feverish pace. A minute later he is sweating all over his face and neck and he is done etching. The wood still looks nothing like art and you can't see any real pictures yet.

The cool part is what he does next. The artist then rolls black in onto this board he etched and then places a special Japanese paper carefully onto the board and presses it with a pressing instrument. When he lifts the paper up you see that the paper now has wonderfully drawn images of forests and people. Then he turns the paper over and actually paints the back. The special paper has it so that the paint does not seep through, but is visible on the front side. He quickly dabs different color paint here and there on the back side of this paper, and when he is done he turns it over to show the finished front side, and it ends up looking very nice.

The art guy doing the interview was fascinated by the method this artist was using and made a few comments to the artist. He said: "As I was watching you, it's almost as if you're not etching picture onto this wood, but drawing up an essence of a picture already present in the wood. Like you were just helping the wood express what is already there." And the artist nods his head and says: "Yes! Yes. I was hoping you'd get it. That's exactly what happens! The pictures is already in the wood."

During the interview the artist said that he started etching wood like this when he was a child. His father taught him and ever since then he simply had a love and passion to just do this. He never stopped, and gradually the more he just kept doing this the more people began to take notice. So he ended up being very popular and rich. He recently did artwork for the UN making pictures for their stamps and stuff.

Then on the same station there is this bizarre Japanese show about this seemingly normal Japanese lady who likes to cook. The show said that in her youth she used to work in an American Hotel in Japan. In this hotel she cooked a Americanized recreation of a Japanese finger food desert, which looked like a disk of of yellow soft bread with semifluid inside. This lady said that she tasted the Americanized version made by her boss and really liked it better than their native version. She just got good at making this Americanized version and eventually quit the hotel and tweaked this Americanized version a bit. Then she just baked these things in her house and gave them away to friends and neighbors out of a genuine desire to just share the things. Many years later this lady owns a million dollar business which makes nothing but these things.

Samadhi is a way in Buddhism to manifest end goals. With regard to emotions, Samadhi is when you are able to take the random desires and emotions you have and level them as quiet white noise in the background of your life so that you can Concentrate your awareness on that natural fire or creative impulse you naturally have for something. In this case our emotions are like the commotion we hear at a coffee shop. Sitting at this coffee shop everybody around us is talking and holding their own conversations. Samadhi is when you pick one person who captures your attention in this coffee shop, and all that commotion mysteriously fades into the background, and you are able to hear your person's voice and talking. Isolating and focusing your awareness singularly on this "person" because your chitta is naturally drawn to them is Passion, or the samadhi of emotion and desire. Not just raw mindless passion, but a passion directed at an real aim, goal, or objective in the distance.

In Western circles we tend to assume that freedom is when we are allowed to or when we allow our many desires to just run free. We believe that freedom is when we indulge in all of our impulses and wants that passes by or surfaces up. And we say that when we no longer can satiate all of these random desires in our life, that we are no longer free. But from the vantage point of Samadhi and manifesting end goals, having all of these random desires in the foreground where you are chasing them is like being submerged in a strong current of a river being pulled by that current. Not only are you not free genuinely, but your expenditure of effort and energy is incoherent and ultimately unproductive long-term wise.

That passion we have for something has a sort of “animal magnetism” to it which imbues our body and what we do or create. That animal magnetism is what has the power to draw in others of like resonance to you or what you make or create. There are 7 billion people on earth and each are different. If you have a passion for art, and you stick with it in such a way that you develop your skills and collect your work, that build up is what draws in people from the sea of 7 billion to you who will like and appreciate what you do. It’s the “resonance factor” at work. We are drawn to things of like resonance to our own physis or nature. In business talk: There is a market for every possible thing we can do and conceive of. The trick is to stick to it so that that “magnetism” build up potency.

Thoughtform

Focus of Thought – the samadhi of Mindstuff – works in the same way as emotion. Ideas or thoughts are like horses attached to a cart. If the horses are allowed to run wild, your cart actually goes nowhere. The horses must be brought in control, brought to Order. The everyday ideas, opinions, thoughts we have on a day to day basis are like mental white noise. In Western circles we tend to believe that freedom is when we can blurt out our random thoughts and opinions whenever we want. From the Buddhist point of view this so called freedom is like giving an AK47 to an untrained soldier who is trigger happy, believing that his trigger happiness is the freedom to just shoot. Yes he is free to just shoot, but at the end, his efforts are entirely pointless and unproductive, because nothing is actually accomplished. Samadhi with thoughts, ideas, and opinions is more like a Sniper. The Sniper is reserved, silent, single sighted, he doesn’t blurt out random opinions or thought into the air. His mind does not drift to and fro. It is focused on a single objective, and every fiber of his body, feelings, and will is funneled to that end objective. He has his objective in his cross hairs and each breath and movement he makes goes into the eventual kill. When he pulls that trigger, his shot counts. And just like emotions, thoughts have their own “animal magnetism,” which can either build up or dissipate.

To me I like to see ideas or thoughts as being bursts of hot air. People – all of us – blow a lot of hot air. Most of the time this hot air just dissipates. It is random, fleeting, and unfocused. Impotent. This is Nasamadhi, when something is “dyscoherent.” Here the word dyscoherent does not mean discoherent as in you make no sense and you’re thoughts are a mess. Dyscoherent is when you may have coherent senseful rational or creative ideas or thoughts, but those thoughts are not concentrated [samadhi] in a cohesive structure where that the collective “animal magnetism” can build up and generate a resonance factor to draw people to you or what you are building or to manifest an actual end result. When thoughts are brought into Order, it is like you have a hot air balloon to collect a build up of your hot air. As the hot air build up in this balloon, it generates for you a causal out put. The balloon rises into the air and carries you.

For me the ONA is my hot air balloon. My means to collect my thoughts in a single place to build up its resonance factor gradually. Instead of randomly voicing my thoughts, opinions, and ideas, I invest them in something which has a structure and recognizable “brand name,” if you will. And also instead of writing my ideas, thoughts, and opinions articulately in a few forums, I concentrate all my thoughts, ideas, and opinions into a single “thought-container,” which for me is the ONA. So all of my ideas and thoughts instead of just drifting aimlessly in an incoherent subculture, gets collected into something which is itself a coherent structure of ideas [memeplex]. As the ideas, opinions, and thoughts build up in this meme-container, the container itself accumulates the “power” to cause Resonance in people who are on the same “vibe” or frequency as the resonance factor of this ONA memeplex. It’s this Resonance Factor which is what calls people out from their place and draws them together. Much like a bank account. The more dollars you invest into your bank account, the more commodity this bank account has the power to buy.

A smart intellectual in one of these forums online most often are like big spender. They do have valuable Intellectual Capital, but instead of concentrating that capital – samadhi – into an end goal, they spend it by just randomly making all of these posts. The posts get read by people and gradually those that like what they read take those ideas and make it a part of their personal way of thinking. So when this happens the idea themselves dissipates into an incoherent subculture, which subculture has no real aim or objective or purpose. What’s more, this mundane satanism subculture has an incredibly high turn over rate. So any investment of intellectual capital in such a subculture, is a complete waste of Mindstuff, because in the end no real fruit is produced. It is kamma-akosala, or Unproductive Labour.

I mean you think about this idea of samadhi for a second. You have a person like you know who behind “Anton Long” who for 40 years invested his ideas into an idea-container which ended up being called the ONA. During those 40 years the ONA built up its animal magnetism which began influencing others. Its resonance factor built up. The more Anton Long invested his thoughts into his ONA in tandem to time, the more people knew about it. The more people knew, the more those that resonated with ONA became Initiates. And the most important thing for the perceptive to keep in mind it that during those 40 years all of Anton Long’s ideas carried him aloft and also these ideas and thoughts all stayed with each other in a coherent ordering and never dissipated. In contrast how many smart and intelligent big spenders do we each know since Myspace who wrote all those posts, had all these great ideas, expressed all these assertive opinions, and yet now neither they or their thoughts exists in a coherent manner in anybody’s minds? How do you influence anybody or inspire successive generations, if you lack the basic know how of focusing your thoughts and idea into a coherent – samadhi – ordering or structure? How do you get any work done – manifest – if you can’t even control your own thoughts and bring them to Order?

People probably wonder why I write so much. The honest answer is that its because it is my genuine passion in life. Like that Japanese artist I talked about up there, I’ve been reading, thinking, and writing since I was a small, and I love it genuinely. I write just to write. I read just to read. And I think just to think. I have 10 years worth of journals and diaries. I just write simply because its my natural way of expressing myself. It’s my passion in life. I really enjoy just writing and expressing my thoughts, feelings, sharing my life, and sharing what I have learned or know. Everything else is gravy. This blog is gravy and to me is only a mere medium upon why I can do what I am simply passionate about. But at the same time I understand the concept of Samadhi, and I place a value on my ideas and thoughts. Not on the accuracy or rationalism of my ideas. But on the potential and potency of a proper investment. I know that if I have a passion for writing, that I must focus – samadhi – that passion towards an objective. And I also know that if I am going to express my passion in a public venue for others to read that I want all of my ideas and thoughts to stay together in a coherent – samadhi – form. And this ONA is my thoughtform container, my objective, and my hot air balloon which in time will float and drift into a new generation, and another, and another. Just as ONA for the past 40 years has drifted aimfully to each generation, until we of today now have it to run with.

Samadhi esoterically in modern terms is a Fourth Dimensional way of presencing your Will onto the fabric of what we call space-time. Reality is not just three dimensional space, but a fourth dimension of Time as well. And maybe even a “fifth” of causality. That fourth dimension [Time] does not stay still. It is always flowing. It is fourth dimensionally fleeting to build something in only three dimensions, because such things built will only dilapidated in Time. If you want things to last, the Dark Mother [of Time] Kali must be propitiated and honoured. What does not honour her is devoured by Her in Time. Thoughts without the blessings of Kali are always fleeting and impotent. The ariya who understands the Physis of Time and has a pragmatic grasp of Samadhi learns to have their ideas and thoughts stay afloat in Time’s river. Time is a factor we often forget to consider when we think of manifesting something in our world. To simply have said something, bleated out a thought or opinion to many who are caught up in the current of Time’s river is enough. To the Helmsman at the wheel, samadhi is needed to get the ship to its destination. Every word spoken, every thought written, are only a means to get one to an established goal.

I suppose I had the impulse to write this because I find it inconsequential when I encounter people – sideliners – expressing their opinions and thoughts. No matter how intelligent they are, or how much force of assertion they use. They lack the ability to make those opinions and thoughts potent and productive. They in essence simply blurt impotent words and thoughts. They lack the ability to inspire and influence organically over time; confusing assertion for conduction of influence. As time passes, they must struggle with Time just to keep up. Struggle with their assertions, and yelling of opinions. Many people don’t like the ONA and that’s fine. They have their opinions and ideas, and that’s fine. They, and what they have to say will get lost under the flow of Time. It is better for those of us in and of the ONA to learn to make Time work for us.

People will always think and talk. But the difference is one talking and thinking is unproductive, while the other species of talking and thinking germinates Fruit in Time. ONA has been around for 40 years. If each initiate sought to gain a deeper understanding of their own Physis, their own emotions, thoughts, and action, and learned how to Concentrate their focused effort of mind, emotion, and action in the flow of Time, ONA will continue to stay afloat and draw in those who resonates with it from each successive generation. But besides ONA, if the Sinister Initiate learned to gain a deeper understanding of their own Physis, emotions, thoughts, and actions; learn to bring those things into masterful and skillful control, and learned to manifest that natural flame of passion in each of their lives, they’d be more successful at whatever they burn for in life. Whatever your dharma maybe. The trick is to stay Committed and follow that natural flame of Passion in life. Time is our greatest Tester. Let Kali sort out the worthy from the unworthy.

NOTES ON THE POWER OF IDEAS

Notes On The Power Of Ideas

For the past week or so some sort of a “theme” has been bubbling up around me based on the concept of idealism. It first began over a week ago when I rewatched the very old “Alexander The Great.” It’s the one in technicolor where everyone speaks with a British accent. I love old movies. The last new era movie I watched was that one movie called “Wag The Dog,” or something like that with a set of my parents. Otherwise I’m unplugged from the circuit. Modern movies – like modern rap – sucks. Rap and hip hop died in the 90?s, but that’s a different matter.

So I was rewatching the very old Alexander the Great movie just noticing how gay all of the old philosophers looked in those tight tops that covers their chest like a girls bath towel. I was making trivial comments to myself about how the way those philosophers dressed was not so different from the way a Theravada monk dresses: since those Orange robes are actually – historically – togas of ancient Greek origin. There is a group of know it all scholars I found during one of my researches who speculated that the Latin word and people – a la Philo – “Therapeutae” may be a corruption of the Pali word “Theravada.” Which May – and I stress the MAY – not be as crazy as I thought it sounded. According to Philo this sect called the Therapeutae were based in Alexandria made up of Jews. And we know that by that era [first century] Buddhism has already – via the silk road and missionaries – colonized Alexandria Egypt.

But there are big problems with this theory. The first is that the historic Therapeutae did not seem to have left any sort of iconographic artifacts that might suggest a Buddha was a central figure. No Three Jewels. But at this time the icon of Buddha looked very different. During this time Buddha was actually – as far as iconic pictures and statutes goes – Western in look. At this time Buddha was depicted to be a Prince with royal dress, he had the Apollo hair bun, and also a mustache and he was depicted standing up. This may have been a time when the southern Shaivites had not yet gotten an influential hold of early Buddhism. Anyways. Oh did you you know in ancient times Kuan Yin was depicted as a man with a mustache?

So anyways, I was just checking out everybody's wardrobe and noticing how Alexander in this movie looks a whole lot like that blonde guy in The Rocky Horror Picture Show Tim was in love with and singing to. All of a sudden this guy Aristotle in the movie said something that caught my attention span. He said something like: "Ideas are bigger than Man. That's what Athens needs, a new idea!" What he said started me thinking about Ideas being Bigger than Humanity, so I turned off the movie to give what he said some consideration.

I went to take one of my ponderous walks and as I walked I held a dialogue with this Aristotle. I was thinking to myself – or to this Aristotle – that what he said was true, Ideas are bigger than Man[kind]. In fact – I added – maybe ideas are one of few things that distinguishes "us" from other animals, in that we as humans have the ability to create ideas, so I assume. So I told "Aristotle" that the fact that we can create an idea, and the fact that – as he said – "ideas are bigger than Man," leads us into the very problem the Buddha had with ideas which problem he termed: Samsara!

"Athens needs a new idea!" said Aristotle in that movie. Just like Brahminical India was based on the idea of the Vedas and their Caste System. "Ideas are bigger than Man." Said this Aristotle in the movie." Just like the idea – idealism – of the Caste System was indeed more powerful – or over powering – over their citizens. And there lies the problem of Samsara. Yes we can create ideas, and yes ideas are bigger than us, but who is lord of what? Is Man lord of his ideas, or are his ideas lord of him? It is the concept that the Creator becoming a slave to 'his' creation, that is the problem of Theravada's notion of Samsara.

So when I say "Samsara" in the Pali-Theravada sense I mean the Cause of what we do over and over again we are unaware of because we are totally consciously engrossed within the Cause. We are a part of the Cause in that we are trapped in its illusion. An example of a samsara would be the Idea/ideal of "Individuality." A group of people struggle mentally and physically to uphold that idealism of being an "true individual." But such group fails to realize that their samrsara in that idealism contributes to the decomposition of the coherency and functionalism of their families, communities, and culture on a collective level. And when such families, communities, and cultures fails, they in turn are affected/effectd.

A few days later out of the blue – or as if by "fate" – David Myatt wrote wrote something which was very relevant to this "theme" bubbling around me. DM said:

[Begin Quote]

"The problem, the problems, lay inside us, in our kind, not in 'the world', not in others. We, our kind – we the pursuers of, the inventors of, abstractions, of ideals, of ideologies; we the selfish, the arrogant, the hubriatic, the fanatics, the obsessed – were and are the main causes of hate, of conflict, of suffering, of inhumanity, of violence. Century after century, millennia after millennia. [...] For – despite our alleged, our believed in, 'idealism' – we the outward extremists were, we had become like, those selfish, hubristic, arrogant, unfeeling humans; only that instead of being slaves to our personal desires, feelings, needs, we were enslaved to our ideals, our goals, our ideologies, our abstractions, and to the phantasmagorical problems we manufactured, we imagined, or we believed in.” – David Myatt, Letter To My Undiscovered Self.

[End Quote]

I was thinking about what DM said in that essay for a couple days, and I ended up seeing an old movie called The Matrix in a very different way. I watched the Matrix, and also the original Japanese movie that inspired it, since my cousins prefer the Japanese version.

But in the American rendition of this movie you have a people who have become enslaved by machines they once created where they are literally grown like crops and live stocks. A Machine is something we ourselves create. So in my mind this became a metaphor of our ideas and idealisms. Then very tellingly this movie has a character called “Morpheus” who is the old god of dreams [Samsara]. Morpheus tries to snap people and awaken them from that samsara, and so a small group of “rebels” struggles against this social order controlled by these “machines.”

That’s pretty accurate I thought. There was a time not too very long ago when America was an ideal. A “new idea” like Aristotle in that movie said. It captivated many hearts, this ideal of a new way of being a civilization where people are free etc. Today this idea “we” [mankind] once created is now our Master, and we the slave. Ideas like governments, economies, and religions we once created to Serve us, to help and assist us evolve, have now become our slave masters.

We go down to look at the smaller “fractal patterns” of this and see the same patterns. For even inside a subculture like “Satanism,” what was once an idea/ideal made to free us from religious tyranny, to serve “us,” is now our Master, and we now use that same idealism of Satanism to beat other people with, to judge other with, to tyrannize other with. Tyrannize here meaning other’s either obey the individual satanist’s conceptualization of what Satanism is according to their own definitions or the others are rejected and shunned. This thing called “Satanism” by its adherents no longer serves, it now dictates, and the adherents do what? Tellingly they Adhere. Like I said to “Aristotle” in my mind: yes ideas are bigger than man, but should man be lord of his ideas or should his ideas be lord of him?

It no longer liberates, it enslaves adherents to its orthodox doctrines. I’m using “orthodoxy” in a different way here. Let me try an explain. Say you have a Christianity which has become Orthodox or “regular” in its doctrine. In it’s established doctrinal orthodoxy this Christianity will say: “Okay, everything that adheres to our orthodoxy is good, and everything which does not is evil. And so say from that a group breaks from from that orthodoxy and call themselves LaVeyan Satanists. In the 60’s era, this Satanism was cool, fun, and heterodox. Then Peter Gilmore came along and made that memplex into an orthodoxy by saying: “Okay, we are atheists. Everything that adheres to our doctrine, and ethical ideals is right, and everything else is wrong.” That’s what I mean by “orthodoxy.” When something once alive and evolving has turned to stone and when it had divided life into segments and divisions of a “right/good,” and a “wrong/bad.” Life in Reality is not actually divided with itself. Life is just One Whole. So this Satanism in essence became what it hated and once rejected. And in doing so it gave birth to a new heresy and heterodoxy for others to assume to free themselves from ideological tyranny.

[youtube=<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cHAwbYpRGkQ>]

And then, as if on cue, a day ago I was surfing youtube for a documentary to watch and I found the above video. I didn't want to watch it at first because I thought it would be one of those retarded videos about these idiots struggling to disbelieve something with heaps of evidence. Or so I thought there was a heap of evidence.

The video is not what it seems, at least for me. It actually in a very pragmatic way shows you how one gets lost in a samsara, how an ideal takes control of people, and how an IDEA made by us ends up controlling everyone. The video also shows the "wonderful" [sarcasm] idea of democracy in effect. A civilization run by idiots. The Dumb leading the Blind, as the old people say.

This thematic bubbling is too early for me to write anything more on, so I'll just leave it as a three page note on the power of ideals. Maybe later I'll return to this topic when I gather my thoughts.

O9A, A BRIEF OVERVIEW

ONA, A Brief Overview

I actually just wanted to write Anything before the holiday season rolls in. I'll be out in the real world with my family duties and celebrating well into the new years from here. It might be a month or two before I get a chance or wave of inspiration to write again. I just wanted to restate a few things in different ways, so I can put the cool new date of 123 yf on something. Think about it for a moment: the next time in ONA's history those numbers will be in that order again is 1123 yf and 1230 yf. Makes me wonder what everything "out there" will be like 1000 years from now? Wyrd.

The Order of Nine Angles was founded in 1972 which was the date the first ONA 'Manuscript' was written by DM, who later adopted the pen name "Anton Long." The pen name has its origins in the name of a river named Anton, which was actually a short one, if I remember the story right. DM publicly denies being ever associated with the ONA for his own reasons. But if you look around hard enough, you'll find certain items of "interest." For example the Temple of THEM sometimes puts old [pre-internet] ONA booklets up on eBay which is signed [an actual signature] off "David Myatt," and not "Anton Long." Then there are the several old photo copies of ONA ads placed in certain zines and magazines concerning ONA booklets which have the name David Myatt on them and not "Anton Long."

Whenever an associate of the ONA passes these items to me, I help the glamour by kindly asking them to not make these items of interest too available to the public. Personally it is my desire to gradually separate the actual person of David Myatt from "Anton Long." I've spoken about this idea with a few other associates. The idea is based on the factor of Time and what inevitably comes to us all in Time. Whatever people will think of the idea, I'll probably just do it myself over time.

DM is a real person, and so given enough Time, he will pass on to his 7th Degree in the Seven Fold Way. If an ONA is too heavily dependent on a single mind – such as DM – for all of its input, memes, and insights, DM's inevitable passing may threaten the longevity of the ONA. Not many personality cults survives the death of its personality. Let's watch North Korea and see what happens! I heard from Yahoo news that what's his name passed away.

I propose two methods for circumventing this possible threat. The first is to continue to encourage the Open Source nature of the ONA: it being a Peer Group meta-organism. The Scientific Community is my personal model. Science has no “leaders,” or central commanding meme-maker. It is a group of equals – Peers – working a certain basic Methodology [the scientific method]. Yet science has a way of evolving over time where new theories replaces out dated theories, and so forth.

The other method I get from studying my own culture. The second method is to slowly over Time, make “Anton Long” a Cultural meme of the ONA Kulture itself. Meaning that “Anton Long,” over Time, becomes a ‘character’ indivisible from the ONA’s overall Mythos. Characters of mythos don’t die. So a basic example of a character forever fixed in a living culture would be the Yellow Emperor of China. The actual person is long dead, but as a character of a people’s culture, the Yellow Emperor is a fixture and aspect of that culture. King Arthur and his knights of the Round Table would be an example of characters that are fixture of a cultural mythos. Or more closer to the occult industry, Christian Rosencreutz, who is the mythic founder of the Rosicrucian Order, is a living aspect of that Rosicrucian “occulture*.” [*Note: I give credit to Kori Houghton for coining that cool term].

This in itself does not “fix” the “threat.” There are other minor issue regarding ONA, that can contribute to this “threat” due to misunderstandings of just what a “member” of the ONA is exactly. Ultimately as a person interested in the ONA you have two sources to get your information: 1) The Yapping of know-it-all outsiders; or 2) the ONA itself.

The most basic “definition” of what a member of the ONA is was stated by the ONA way back in 1994 ever before the internet was publicly used en masse. So I will quote it here:

[Begin Quote]

Membership of the ONA basically means an individual following the Seven-Fold Way as explicated in the various Order MSS. Members should understand that they are thus part of an Order which has long-term aims -of centuries and more. By actively following and using the methods and rites of the Order they are actively aiding those aims.

The rites of the ONA -and the Seven-Fold Way itself -create and/or maintain those sinister energies which the ONA represents and has accessed. In effect, an Individual, undertaking, for example, a rite from The Black Book of Satan’, is aiding those sinister energies and thus the sinister dialectic. Such rites and the Way itself have been created to do this – that is, they directly presence the acausal.

Each member of the ONA is thus a nexion to the acausal -they are participating in, by their following of the Way and by the rites they undertake, the work of evolution: they are making their lives instruments for acausal change. Expressed simply, they are fulfilling the potential latent within them. They are positively contributing to evolution- they are using their lives to some purpose.

- Sacramentum Sinistrum, O.N.A., 1994

[End Quote]

It’s concise and precise. It’s easier to use that Traditional 1994 statement as the foundation of what “membership” in the ONA means. Sacramentum Sinistrum by the way is [today] a PDF of a xeroxed copy of typed documents written during the early and late 90’s.

Membership in the ONA is basically anybody who somehow chances upon the ONA or ONA material, and of their choice, free will and accord, chooses to Live the ONA Way. Fundamentally, this Way begins with the Seven-Fold Way.

So, besides the 7 Degrees or Grades of the Seven Fold Way, there are fundamental “MSS” that teaches the new member the “Kulture” or Way of the ONA. Such old pre-internet booklets are: the Black Book of Satan; Naos; the Hostias; Otonen; Sacramentum Sinistrum; & the Deofel Quintet. All of the named booklets state in different ways – over and over again – just what exactly membership in the ONA means. It virtually means anybody interested in the Sinister Tradition of the ONA enough to apply that Way in their life.

Once you have carefully read each of those named books – especially the Black Book of Satan – you will get or understand exactly How the ONA was originally constructed or put together. The BBS in plain English will tell the new member/initiate that the ONA’s existence is virtually up to him or her to express and manifest. The BBS give the member a basic outline for how to go about creating the ONA from scratch. The Traditional Rites are given; the way a Temple/Group – subsidiary of the “ONA” – is created, recruitment, meetings is also outlined in plain English.

If you have carefully read the BBS, then you should understand that the ONA cannot “die” out as a memplex. It was constructed from the very beginning to recreate itself via what DM calls “nexions” which means the individual member or initiate and also the group such individual member may establish.

Besides those Core booklets, the ONA member has a huge corpus of documents and “manuscripts” to learn more about the ONA from. Anton Long over the 40 years or so has continuously produced about 5000 pages worth of philosophically inclined “extracurricular” material to give blood to the meat and bone of the ONA. The most important of these documents – from my point of understanding at least – is the Sinister Dialectic, which is another classic pre-internet ONA document. It is worth quoting in full since not many insiders or outsiders seem to pay much careful attention to what the document actually says, suggests, and implicates:

[Begin Quote]

The sinister dialectic (often called the sinister dialectic of history) is the name given to Satanlc strategy – that is, (a) the use of Black Magick to change individuals/events on a significant scale; (b) to gain control and influence; and (c) the use of Satanic forms (individuals/influence etc.) to produce/provoke changes.

This strategy, and the tactics involved to achieve it, is esoteric – and its learning forms an important part of novice training. Satanic strategy has its ground or foundation in Aeonics – Aeonics providing a means of rationally studying the patterns, processes and energies, both causal and acausal, which do and have shaped individuals and their groupings from societies to civilizations. Further, Aeonics provides a means of interpreting recent events/trends and can predict (within certain limits) future patterns.

[A basic introduction to Aeonics is given by the Order MSS dealing with the subject. A more advanced study involves becoming proficient in the advanced Star Game.]

I. On a basic level, the dialectic is concerned with simple opposition – with defiance of what is accepted or conventional at particular times. This is heresy – the Adversarial role, a challenge against both conscious and unconscious norms. This opposition works on two levels – the individual, and society. 1) individual: The strategy is to provide opportunities for individuals to discover the hidden/forbidden within their own psyche, or lead them/influence them toward this. This means catharsis on an individual level. 2) Society: The strategy means Satanic individuals/organizations disseminate (often with no direct Satanic connotations) heretical ideas or otherwise encourage them. The aim of both (1) and (2) is to challenge and thus provoke change, reaction.

At the present time, (1) means rites such as The Black Mass [qv. the Order MS 'Satanism, Blasphemy and the Black Mass'], and other means of inner liberation. (2) means an aiding of what actually is heretical, now – this means upholding (a) inequality (particularly racially), (b) the concept of war, and (c) aiding discussion/spread of information/exchange of ideas/triumphing the cause of those things which actually are heretical, in Law and mostly ignored by the majority such is their supine nature – such as certain views regarding events in World War Two the propagation of which are illegal and which render the person spreading them to imprisonment (i.e. denying 'the Holocaust' ever took place). Further, (2) at this time also involves countering the unhealthy and anti-natural morality of suppression of the Nazarene.

All these are, however, tactics. to achieve broader strategic goals – they are means, only. These means can and often do change as the times changes – as societies change. For instance, regarding (2)(a) above – in a society which was tyrannically anti-egalitarian, the tactic would probably be to aid egalitarian tendencies.

II. On a higher level, the dialectic is concerned with long-term evolution – with the creation and change of civilizations and ultimately with the creation of a new type of individual, a new species. This means altering our evolution, this alteration being toward the 'Satanic'.

This means two things – or rather two tactical approaches. (1) Enabling individuals to change themselves, to evolve, consciously, and so become part of that evolutionary change. (2) Changing/influencing the structures (such as societies) to make them instruments for such change or at least not detrimental to it.

(1) involves such things as External and Internal Magick – a following of the Seven Fold Sinister Way. (2) involves Aeonic magick – e.g. the creation of new archetypal forms or images and the infection in the psyche of others which results from introducing them – and gaining/using influence.

It should be understood that while the tactics of I above can and do change, the tactics used to attain II remain essentially the same because the goal is precise. Further, I in many ways aids II – that is, the opposition to some fixed idea or dogma, accepted at a particular moment in history, provokes a change and leads to a new synthesis and thus an evolution of conscious understanding in individuals, thus aiding the sinister dialectic on a higher level.

Essentially, I is exoteric, and II esoteric Satanism – and it is necessary to make this distinction because the means of I vary with time (over centuries) while II remains relatively fixed, and all too often novices (and others) confuse a tactic used in I (such as politics) as something Satanic when it is only a tactic, a means, a form.

The reason 'why' there is (in genuine Satanism, anyway) a sinister strategy – a dimension beyond the personal – is simple: it is in the nature of Satanism (genuine Satanism, anyway) itself. Satanism at its highest level is concerned with 'cosmic change' – that is, it is an expression of the evolution of conscious existence. Evolution is something we, as conscious beings, can participate in and indeed create – by so doing, we are extending the range of our being, fulfilling (and going beyond) the potential we possess; affirming our existence in the most intense way possible. Viewed another way (in terms developed recently to explicate such things – i.e. make them more conscious and thus controllable) Satanism accesses the acausal, via nexions, and so increases the amount of the acausal presented in the causal. These nexions are psychic (within the psyche of individuals), physical (places on Earth where the causal and acausal intersect or are close) or created via magickal rites.

Aeonics, and the sinister dialectic, are means which enhance our existence as Individuals – which offer us the opportunity not only to increase our consciousness and our abilities, but to use that consciousness and those abilities.

Thus, Satanism, correctly understood, is more than a glorification of the ego, or an indulgence in pleasures, or some kind of intellectual, ‘esoteric’ knowledge. It is also more than just living ‘on the edge’ and garnishing dark and other experiences [that is only a stage - qv. the MS 'The Practice of Evil, In Context'].

In essence, the sinister dialectic is Satanism and Satanists in action – it is Satanists playing at god: altering themselves, others, societies, civilization and evolution itself. This is its purpose, and the justification of sinister strategy.

–O.N.A.

[End Quote]

The Key Points to seriously think about are: “(2) Society: The strategy means Satanic individuals/organizations disseminate (often with no direct Satanic connotations) heretical ideas or otherwise encourage them.” & “(2) involves Aeonick magick – e.g. the creation of new archetypal forms or images and the infection in the psyche of others which results from introducing them – and gaining/using influence.”

The first statement gives a general outline of why some ONA people do what they do, say what they say, and associate or support what they are associated with and support. This can be anything from racialism, National-Socialism, Holocaust denial, Radical Islam, Radical Anything, Crime, Terrorism, whatever. If that Magian World Order “out there” fears it, hates it, insulates itself from it, condemn it, then as an ONA person you somehow spread those ideas. There is always a receptive social group that is counter-culture willing to accept any of these ideas. The trick is to learn from pros like the KGB or CIA and to not force such propaganda down the general public’s throats, but to spread those memes in subcultures Already primed to like or accept such memes. The fruits of such “subversive” measures take a while to see. It takes a generation or so [circa 30 years] to actually see results. This is because you have to wait for one generation to age out and the new generation to come to their Minds. With the succession of generations there is always a “tension” where one generation as a collective zeitgeist will try to somehow break itself free from the social order established by the older one. For example the people of the generation during the Cold War would have never dared to entertain Communist ideology in their heads. Yet today it is very common to come across a person of our current generation to entertain anti-Capitalist sentiments. The USSR as a political entity may be defunct, but the work their covert operatives did inside receptive subcultures back then, still infects.

The second statement brings us to the doorstep of the Causal Forms and iteration and things of that sort. The basic idea is that if we desire to aeonically – in the span of hundreds of years – change social order because we dislike this Western Magian Order, then we create memetic vehicles [forms] to spread new seed ideas, so that in time those forms will influence and infect receptive subgroups in this West.

There are plenty of other instances in the 5000 pages of ONA stuff where it is stated in plain ordinary English that the creation of new rites, ceremonies, and causal forms is a pass time of ONA initiates, or something they should try to do to either help develop and evolve the ONA or society aeonically, but we’ll just stick with this basic quoted statement and the idea of aeonics.

Basically what the essence of that statement says is that the individual ONA person should not just be fixated on a Satanism. Satanism is only one tool or archetypal form or causal form to get a job done. It is effective in countering Magian memes and ethos in its dwindling receptive market. But society in general is huge and goes beyond Satanism and the “fringe occult.”

If we say that we dislike this Western Magian Ethos that influences and sickens the West, then, anything not Western and Magian is a useful tool and form to be used to introduce new idea, memes, ideologies, philosophical gibberish, into this Western Magian Order. The trick is to learn to dismantle these non-Western Magian forms into their basic functioning memes and then graft those memes into a memetic vehicle of some type which has a receptive audience. In Buddhism we call this same basic idea “Upaya.”

Three years ago I wrote a long essay for the ONA on ideas and how to manufacture new ideas and so on, but I trashed that essay thinking that other people would find an essay on ideas boring.

I learned about engineering ideas actually from a little book I found in the bookstore. I can’t remember the title of the book, but it was something like the “Science of Ideas.” It was written in the 1930’s and was in the New Thought section of the bookstore.

Basically the author of the book was hired by a very rich business tycoon of that time to study what ideas are and how new ideas are manufactured. This tycoon was afraid that patents would run out, meaning that he believed that it might be possible that there is a limit to what we can make or come up with. The tycoon wanted to know if ideas can be created so as to keep his own business one step ahead of competition.

So to make the long story short the author of the book took up the challenge and figured out what he termed the “Science of Ideas.” Science here – for the author – meaning that he conducted experiments, came up with a methodology of making new ideas, and if you followed his methodology, you can come up with similar results.

Essentially the author comes to learn that things like inventions or religions or beliefs are composed of “units of ideas.” This was way before the word and idea of a “meme” was coined, so the author just used the word “unit” and tried to explain these units as like atoms to matter. So just like elements in the periodic table, idea-units have sources which you “mine.” Then you can take those units and construct what the author called “idea-clusters,” out of. I took that term and morphed it into “meme-cluster.”

One of the examples the author gives is Mr. Ford and his automobile. The idea-cluster of an automobile is actually composed of a number of idea-units. Each unit if looked at closely can be traced back to older sources: steam engines, carriage wheels, cranks, coal burning or combustion, the steering wheel thing on ships and boats, etc.

The fascinating thing about the book was that the author states that new ideas, concepts, models, inventions, religions, philosophies, ideologies, can be manufactured endlessly, but that it requires a person with the right Mind to do this.

The author goes to then describe two essential kinds of people. The first kind is one who lacks the ability to see things clearly. This type usually has to be told what to believe, how to live, he is in essence a Consumer of other peoples ideas, because he simply lacks the capability to manufacture his own ideas.

The second type of person the author describes is the kind that has the mental ability to take an idea or thing and systematically deconstruct that thing or see that thing in as many different ways as possible. This second type has the ability to remove, extract, or take bits and pieces of many things, and in his or her mind is able to put idea-units together into a new combination. The second type is essentially a Producer rather than a consumer of ideas-constructs. He is the type with the nature to tinker with things to alter them to his liking. Whereas the other type is has the nature of religiously supporting a pre-constructed thing or idea. The author goes to say that a company which desires to stay ahead of competition and remain in business long term wise must invest in acquiring a large number of the second type and not the idea consumer type.

The point to all this is that it requires a certain type of person to be able to mentally mine “idea-units” from the thousands and so religions, philosophies, and ideologies, or whatever out there and manufacture new models of idea-cluster for a receptive market.

In context to ONA and aspects of the Sinister Dialectics, it may not be enough to take a non-Western memplex and just give it to Magianized Westerners to adopt hoping that they will in time give up their dependence on Magian Ethos/Culture. It may require the ability to deconstruct such non-western things into their constituent memes and to take those memes and either graft them into Forms or to manufacture entire new idea-constructs.

This goes well with the idea of further developing the ONA. I would describe DM as the second type of person, and his past M.O in the many forms he associated with shows it. In all of the things DM got involved with, he seemed to not be satisfied as a mere consumer of an idea product. Instead you can see him tinker with what he got involved with by adding new ideas or morphing it altogether. A good example to see this is in with DM and National-Socialism. He starts off in his early days as a normal NS person, but gradually he tinkers with NS until he and his friends came up with Reichsfolk, and Folk Culture. Or you can even see it with him and Islam. You can actually see him grafting his own “non-Islamic” ideas into his past Islamic writings.

DarkLogos once shared with me how in the olden days DM even tried to create a hybrid Islam-Numinous Way form which did not germinate sadly. But interestingly, if you read around DM’s writings enough, you’ll catch the glitches, where sometimes you will read DM equate Allah with the Acausal, which I would actually agree with. Or at least I like the idea of Allah being the Acausal, and Creation being the Causal. It would lead to a more deeper mystical understanding of reality in general. My only “argumentive point” would be that the concept of Allah implies or infers a being that is conscious or at least alive enough to care what people do. And at the moment I don’t have the understanding that the Acausal is something aware or conscious. I tend to agree with DM’s latter concept of the Cosmic Being. Now, if we could take DM and his M.O. And clone him, so that the ONA is populated with such creative tinkering types and not the mere consumer of ideas.

Which brings us to the last topic I’d like to talk about: that of the ONA Fyten Three. In this Third Phase of Fyten the ONA is a collective of peers. Each peer to me seems to nicely express the core concept of the Sinister Dialectic in their own unique and creative ways. Each introduces new ideas either into the ONA to help further develop it, or they introduce new memes into the larger Satanic Subculture, to slowly help evolve it. Anything that will chip away at the old structure and introduce new invigorating, inspiring, ideas-stuff helps evolve what is being worked with, whether it is ONA, Satanism at large, or society.

ONA or its ideas are now so successful that we have people claiming now to own it, or be its leader, and we hear now ONA people wining about how it has become too popular. I’m personally indifferent to the whole matter. It is what it is and personally I have to stay on course and take one step at a time. Things had to be evolved or changed in the ONA. And such changes have obviously produced the side effect of the ONA seemingly being “too popular” for comfort for some. At such a moment when ONA is in the midst of a transitioning phase or metamorphic phase, it will not be stable. Meaning that if ONA were a line graph we’d see the line drastically move up and down all crazy. It will in time find it’s own stasis or equilibrium. Some nexions are already going dark and leaving the internet. Private oral traditions and privately circulated MSS are now coming into play. I think the “problem” and growing pains we are experiencing are healthy for a meta-organism like ONA. At least ONA is alive enough to have problems and growing pains. Personally it is too early to judge how the ONA will actually be when it stabilizes. I’d give it at least another 3 years, before I make a judgment based on what results materializes. I doubt the ONA will ever be “that” in vogue with the mundane Satanic gentry. But I also know that with numbers can come dilution of essence and quality. But even the realization of this is good, cuz it helps us understand that ONA just might need a big body of only privately circulated stuff for those “on the inside.”

There is a draw back to being on the radar which I find cumbersome. Like Biggy & Friends once said: “The more money we come across, the more problems we see.” But in our case, it might be the more on the radar ONA is, the more drama we get, ain’t that right. Such drama comes with the turf. At least they are talking about ONA. Meaning that of all the institutions, people, birds, tree, celebs, politicians, religions, Stuff in the world, ONA is what those people talk about, hate on, occupy their mental time with. Like our old WSA friend from Puerto Rico once said: “Worry when they stop talking about you.” Cuz that’s when you know you’re out of business and irrelevant to anybody.

This short overview was just a re-iteration of what has been iterated and obliterated over and over again for the past 40 years now. They are just the same basic ideas people have a mis-understanding of, due to a few loud mouths that are either pretentious or just think their assumptions about ONA is divine fact. Where they go off stating – as many have done before them – that ONA is dead, defunct, and so on. A basic reading of old ONA booklets will actually show you otherwise. That it can't die because it was made to be self replicating and self manifesting. As long as there is one person interested and devoted to giving life to the Sinister Way and Tradition of the ONA, the Order of Nine Angles will always have a nexion or portal to materialize thru.

And should ONA die out in any ways: this WSA352, myself especially, and my friends will always be here to revive it, recreate it, redevelop it, remanifest it, over and over again. At least for the next 27 years. If people in and out of ONA don't like that, then tough. Deal with it or leave. It ain't like porn, where you just have to look at it. If you don't like what you see, either leave, or kill me. Cuz as long as I have some sort of medium to write on, I will keep doing what I have been doing.

A couple of years ago in a private conversation I made a small promise to DM care-of DarkLogos which was that I will duplicate DM's time he spent on the ONA by spending the next 30 years writing for the ONA. I am a patient person. Writing and sharing my ideas and life doesn't take much effort or calories. It's just something I do anyways in my diaries and private wordpresses. I might as well devote that skill or talent to something I truly love: ONA. And don't doubt for one moment that I can't actualize what I set out to do with ONA. I know myself, and I know ONA as it was 4 years ago and what it is now today. Granted I am only a small domino in a row of causally falling dominoes. But should that causal and wyrdful cascade of dominoes falling stops and ONA – whatever iteration – were to die: I'll be right here patiently doing what I have been doing for three years. Writing my ideas, talking about my culture and family to the ether. Like attracts like. In time my ideas will call out the next set of dominoes which will fall in a beautiful pattern.

It's like I'm an artist. But I paint with memes. This ONA like Buddhism is my paint brush. It doesn't matter who I am. What should matter is how each painting I make captivates or inspires you in some way. In the same way that the mysterious etchings and painting along a cave inspires and captivates some people, even today when the cave person that once etch the drawing is long gone and forgotten. If I should be known and remembered at all, it is my desire to only be known for my ideas and insights I share. It's best this way, so that when the time is right, I can just slip back into the dark and be a simple ONA member – one of many – “out there” somewhere unmolested and at peace.

2012 will be a busy year though, so I won't be writing as much. Others should write and have a go at the ONA thing. At any rate, in conclusion, I will be “here” for the next 27 years. Same person, same blog. Or hopefully the same blog. I don't know how long wordpress lets you keep a blog, or if wordpress will be alive even 20 years from now. But, whatever. I'll be here, doing what I do for a very long time. Same WSA352 nexion, same me, same writing style. The cool thing for me is to watch myself grow over the years. Which is one reason why I love wordpress. You have all of your writings dated. I tried looking back at my own writings from just 3 years back and they were lame and embarrassing. I can't imagine what I'll be writing about or be like 20 years from now. Culturally I was born and raised to be honourable and to keep my word, especially to an elder. I'll honour my word/wyrd I gave to DM c/o DarkLogos and keep writing for ONA for 30 years. Even if I am the last Niner alive. Regardless of who likes me or hates me. People come and go in life as friends and companions. But once in a blue moon you'll meet a loyal companion who for whatever reason will stick by you through thick and thin till the end. Such loyal and honourable type of people are rare in the West. I think that's what it all boils down to for me? Loyalty. Maybe it's a cultural thing?

In my culture we have two type of “marriage” ceremonies. The first is the normal kind, where a man and woman who love each other get married. The second type of “marriage” ceremony is between loyal friends. This second type grew out of ancient military rites of comradeship where in the ancient time during the Khmer Empire before soldiers set out to war, two best friend soldiers would take themselves to the temple. At the temple before a shaman [Isa] or Monk, the two make a sacred vow before Shiva or the Buddha or Brahma that they will love each other as blood brothers [or blood sisters] till death. That they will care for each other and their families as natural blood siblings. And that out in the battlefield they will lay their lives down for the other, and if one of them does not make it back alive, that the living one will care for his fallen brother's children, wife, and parents.

This concept of loyalty is not exclusive to my culture. One reason why I like Islam is because I read once that in old Islamic cultures [very old times] when you are out and about and you come upon a person who is bleeding for some reason in front of you, you and that person, by the will of Allah are at that moment Blood siblings and must promise to care for each other and each others family. My favourite blood brothering story of this type is the story of Genghis Khan and his best friend who performed a similar blood rite of loyalty. Then of course the olden Japanese empire express loyalty superbly during world war two with their Kamikaze pilots.

It's as if concepts that are ancient and living is Greater Asia such as Honour, Loyalty, and Duty are so simple to grasp and live or express in life for us. But here in the West such concepts that makes an Ariya and Ariya is dead or forgotten, or silly, or too hard to intuitively understand. Or worse such concepts and ways of life and living for others or for a body of teachings, kung fu style, guru, etc, are useless.

I do have a natural – or culturally instilled – sense of Honour, Loyalty, and Duty for my big family, my kinfolk, for my culture, for my people's ancestral Traditions, for our Theravada Buddhism, for friends and associates of family. Which means that for the rest of my life, I will be devoted to such things, bound to such things like a fish in a net, bound to care for them until one of us dies. And that's that. And so I unconsciously bring that same Ariya way of life into things like the ONA. You are just simply bound to it forever, or until you die. Regardless of what other will think of ONA, what shit talking they will do about it or you. You simply just know where your loyalties are, what your duty is, and honour the ways of things. In the streets we say you're a "Lifer." You're in it for life. Even if nobody likes your crew, or set, or family, or culture, or traditions. If you know what Honour is as an Ariya, then you simply know to devote yourself to what you are bound to by loyalty till the end.

I'm thinking of things like honour, duty, and culture because of my granny and her aging years. It's easy to desire to walk away. Sometimes I do think about it. But in the end, you just can't. It's just impossible after so many years of cultural conditioning to turn your back on what you know to be duty and those you know you are loyal to. It's hard to stay and perform your duties. I'll be here doing what I do for the next 27 years at least. Like I said elsewhere a few times, it's not the actual tool or martial arts style but the person wielding the tool [sword] or style that actually makes the tool and style do the skilled things they seem to do. And from my experience, its the same way with thing like memeplexes. There is no "perfect" style or form. You just stick with one and master it, then refine it. Become Master of it, and not be mastered by it. Don't let your memeplex master you, master your memeplex. If there is something you don't like about it, and you know of a better way, refine it accordingly. People will shit talk and hate on you. They can only yap off for so long before they tire and their interests changes. I'm very patient. It's a test of endurance and will. As a Buddhist I am indifferent [unattached] to most real life situations, and especially to chitter chatter in cyberspace. It's expected. I'll be here helping to create the ONA and develop it further for a long time. Even if I'm the last Drecc standing. I have the skills to make more in Time. Peace & Happy Holidays.

OCTOBER LEAVES

October Leaves

October is my favourite month. Not because of Halloween. Because autumn is my favourite season, and because of an inner Feeling that is in the October air. The temperature is perfect. There is a solemn feel to the atmosphere. In Khmer I hear my grandma say about the autumn atmosphere that it “P’doh [change] Tiat [element] Agass [air/atmospher]. Tiat in Sanskrit is Tatva and Agass is Akasha. I’m not really sure how to translate what Tiat as it is used in Khmer. It’s like a “charge” or a “substance” or an Essence in the atmosphere that changes which can be Felt/Empathed inside. Solemn is the feel.

In Theravada culture this season of Autumn is when one of the most Sacred ceremonial things happen in our cultural lunar calender. It’s commonly called Celebration of Pchum Ben. I don’t know what the word Ben means, but its a 15 day observance of the Dead and our Ancestors. Pchum is a word which is derived from the word Pachum [pachoom] which means a Meeting or Gathering. The observance goes by the old people’s Lunar Calender and begins on the full moon of the Autumn season, which can fall either in September or October.

The mythos goes that once a year during this season, on the full moon King Yama, the Guardian of the realm of Hell, opens his gates to let the spirits of the Ancestors walk around to go find their relatives. So the monks will gather in their temples and chant Pali spells over night in preparation for the opening of the Gates of Hell. Of course it’s all a living animist culture’s mythic and rhetorical “bending” of Buddhism to support their very ancient animist tradition of paying homage to their dead ancestors.

During the 15 days you go visit the temples, donate lots of stuff, hold the 5 Precepts all 15 days. Which means no cussing, stealing, sex, alcohol, killing, and no meat or eating during the day. But just for the 15 days. Then on the last day its like a family reunion where the living and the dead family members gather to eat a big feast. This is one reason why I greatly dislike books written on some living subject like Buddhism. Because in such books you only get the superficial words and ideas of some author look in from the outside. If you honestly desire to Understand Theravada, then you must Stand Under [Among/Between] its living culture and peoples. The actual Sasana is very, very different than what has been written.

Usually we bring out framed pictures of the old people in our family that have died. Most I don't know. All the women folk are together in the kitchen cooking the food to be "Saen" [sounds like the word 'sign' and means "offering to the dead spirits"]. We also buy items like clothes, coffee, or whatever the ancestors once liked and offer it to them. The food and items are placed in front of the pictures and you call the ancestor's names to come and eat and talk to them like they were in front of you. This is also the time to introduce your dead ancestors to any new babies born into the family. You'll here the old grandmothers and grandfathers talk to their parents, aunts, uncles, grandparents, and such telling them about the new babies, how some kids look like them, and even share family gossip. Then you ask them to remember you and follow you around to keep you safe. Later when the monks have come and done their stuff, you take all those items you "Saened" to the Ancestors and give them to the monks. The monks in turn take it to the temple and hand them out for free to people in the community who need the stuff.

While we cook the food and the ancestors' favourite dishes, when each dish is done my grandma will tell me to take a small platter and fill a little bowl with some of the food, then place a small cup of water and other beverages on the platter. She tells me and my cousins to bring the platter outside and offer it to the "Nikta Tuk-Dey" which are the spirits that live and guard the house and land. You burn 3 sticks of incense by their platter and call the spirits to come and eat. We can only speak English. We asked grandma once because of this: "We don't speak full Khmer grandma, do the spirits understand English?" My grandma told us something like: "Ignorant children. Think it in your Jed [chitta/Heart]. Doesn't matter what sounds come out of the mouth. The Feeling and Knowing is in the Heart. When you speak with the Heart, everything understands."

We offer food and drinks to the spirits and demons at every celebration or significant get together. Even during Thanksgiving and Christmas. Usually we cut the heads, wings, and ass of the ducks and turkeys and put them on a big dish. A little of whatever others food being eaten that day is place in the dish with cups of drinks and eggnog even. And you place the dish outside, burn incense, and quietly call the random spirits and the guardian of the house and land to eat the food. This appeases the spirits so you'll have good fortune and luck.

Our grandma also has what I always thought was a bird house growing up in a peach tree in her back yard right near the house placed at her arm level. It's actually a little house with no front, and inside is a little toy table with two very small toy tea cups on it. She fills the cups with fresh water every day and burns a stick of incense, sometimes leaving candy. It's like a little "spirit house" I guess. During the ceremony the back yard spirits get a lot of platters of food, fruits, and drinks. Physically, all me and my cousins see eat the food are ants and flies. We figure that maybe the bugs eat the food for the back yard spirits?

Then we do this thing we get from our Chan Chinese Folk Buddhist ancestors where we burn lost of toy money called Ghost Money or Hell Notes. You get them at China Town. The idea is that I guess your ancestors after 15 days are going back to Hell so you want to send them off with some spending cash? It's not really hell. They call the place where the ancestors go either the "Under Realm," or the "Original Place." The ghost money comes in really big denominations, up to a billion I saw once. You just sit there and slowly burn the ghost money while calling the name of whoever you're offering the money to and tell them you're giving them money.

I was watching my aunt-mom burn her ghost money and praying or talking to the ancestors, and I once asked her when she was done: "What do they buy wherever they are at? Are there shops there? Is there an economy?" She laughs. My uncle-dad laughs really loud at the questions and he says back in English: "Yeah, I hear there's a WalMart there now. Talk about a dead market huh?" My aunt-mom was more serious and explained to me that she really doesn't know anything. All she knows is that its Tradition she got from her old people and she just does what they once did because she is Chinese after all. I burn my money too, and my uncle-dad does too. I asked my uncle-dad why he does it if he makes fun of it. He said chuckling: "Because I don't want them haunting me," and laughs.

My uncle-dad is a hardcore rationalist. He's really into science, politics, and computers, so he's not the type to believe anything that can't be somehow proven or verified in some way. He's not a devout Buddhist. He denies the Buddha ever existed and believes that Buddhism is man made, but he is a Buddhist because he thinks that it has good teaching to live by. He hates superstitious and he said that he never used to believe in all this spirit stuff until things happened to him on two different occasions which he can't explain to himself.

He told me that both times happened before he met my aunt-mom. The Khmer Rouge has already taken over and he was living in a labour camp. But this labour camp was run by nice Khmer Rouge people who actually were out in the field working alongside everybody else since they really did believe in creating their Angkorian utopia. My uncle-dad said that during that time there was a cute girl in the came he was interested in whom he was chit chatting with from time to time. He said his Khmer Rouge friends [most of whom he went to school with] saw him talking with the girl and warned him that the girl's mother was a witch that knew really bad magic and that even they were scared to mess with her. But my uncle-dad laughed and didn't listen to their warning.

My uncle-dad said that one late morning this girl brought him a fresh fish and told him that her mother caught and it had asked her to give it to him as a gift to eat. So he cooked it and ate it for lunch. He said after he ate the fish he started to have really bad pain in is stomach and thought that the witch poisoned the fish or something. So he took a walk to relieve himself behind a bush somewhere since he was at the time out in the field working. He said nothing came out, bewildered he got up to go back to work. He said that when he got up he saw a shadow figure from the side of his eye move at him very fast and went into his body. Next thing he said he knew, he was on the ground convulsing uncontrollably. He was fully conscious, but he said he had no control of his body.

The other field workers noticed he was convulsing and had found the Khmer Rouge guys to tell them. The Khmer Rouge guys ran to get an old man out in the field they call Grandpa Chin who knew magic also. My uncle-dad said that he was fully conscious, and had no control of his body or voice box, but he said something was making him scream profanities and try to grab people to strangle them. He said that some of the Khmer Rouge guys he knew had pinned him down to keep him from either hurting himself or others. Grandpa Chin got red string and tied the red string around my uncle-dad's wrists, ankles, and neck, and chanted Pali, while my uncle-dad said something inside of him was screaming at the old man to go away. Grandpa Chin after chanting, sprayed water out of his mouth over my uncle-dad and he said that he stopped moving and saw a shadow figure move fast out of his body. He woke up the next day exhausted, but fully remembering the whole incident. Being a rationalist, my uncle-dad told himself that the fish was poisoned and denied that anything crazy had happened, but he never talked to the girl again after that.

The second time was when my uncle-dad said he was out hunting with his Khmer Rouge friends in the jungle just a ways from the camp. He said that before going deep into the jungle his Khmer Rouge friends went to a odd shaped tree and prostrated themselves three times before it leaving gifts at the base of the tree and asking for permission to have some food to eat. He was asked to do likewise and pay homage to the spirit guardian of that part of the forest, but my uncle-dad refused to saying that such things were not real. His Khmer Rouge friends told him that he wasn't leaving the forest alive, and it won't be them that kills him. They were angry at him and said to him that some people are too ignorant for their own good. Everybody knows the forest was protected and not even their commanders and general dares go through it without asking for permission.

As my uncle-dad was walking with his friends, he said that out of the corner of his eye he saw shadows near some of the trunks of the trees. Just shadow things, that can't be seen if you turn your head to try and look at them. He said they can only be seen sometimes with the corner of the eye. He told himself that its the light effect of the leaves in the trees and kept walking. Then he said he fell over to the ground in a horrible pain in his stomach screaming like knives were inside of his guts. He said his friends dragged him as he was screaming and clutching his abdomen to the base of a big tree near by. His Khmer Rouge friends pointed their rifles at him and were yelling at him to clasp his hands three times and ask the guardian spirits for permission to walk through their forest or they will shoot him out of his misery. He said he tried as hard as he could to clasp his hands and ask, and as soon as he did the pain started to go away. He had to lay there resting for a few minutes while his friends were giving him a lecture and laughing at him.

Today my uncle-dad is still a hardcore rationalist, he still believes all religions are man made scams, but he doesn't mess with the traditional animist stuff of our culture. He is what you might call a myopic materialist who can't logically or scientifically fit "spirits" into his paradigm of reality. But he says that after those two experiences he had which he can't explain, he'll follow the traditions and pay his respects anyways.

I've always thought it was very interesting that every indigenous culture that lives in tune to nature and its rhythms universally ends up believing in "spirits" and ancestors and universally share common ways of paying homage to whatever they are. I have also found it very interesting that Autumn for some reason in many cultures around the world has a holiday for the Dead and/or Ancestor. You have Halloween for the Europeans, Day of the Dead for the Mexicans, and the 15 days of the Dead and Ancestors in Theravada countries all happening at roughly the same period and for the same things, and the essence of the season is the same, where the living give offerings of food to the dead or simulate it in some way. I'm not saying that the Gates of Hell actually opens up during this season unleashing the denizens of the Pit. But it is what it is around the world. This season is also significant to the ONA.

The essence of my so called by Westerner, "Anamism" and so called "Ancestor worship," is not only universal, it's also found in the core of the ONA. In ONA, it is known as Rounwytha. Rounwytha does not sound "the same thing." But it shares common "universal" themes in common with most other ancient indigenous animistic cultural traditions. One of the core themes is the idea of Empathy and Empathizing things that can't be seen with the eyes or known with the brain-mind. The powerhouse of this faculty of Empathy in the Theravada-Asian cultures is called Chitta or its various forms such as Jed and Jai in Khmer and Thai. Another common theme are "things" referred to as "spirits." Another common theme is the offering of food and gifts to these spirit things. Another common theme which is universal is the ancestors, and offering them food and gifts. One common theme that can be found across most – if not all – anciently rooted indigenous cultures is the belief in "guardian spirits" who watch over houses, land, rivers, and forests.

I briefly read that the ancient Romans had a word for the spirits that guard their houses, but I can remember what it was. I had always believed that it was an indigenous Asian thing until I read the Romans had the same beliefs. In our culture, there is a ceremony or rite we have to perform when we buy or move into a new house. The first part of the rite is that a girl or the head female of the family that will be living in the new house must be the first person to set her feet inside. She'll ask the guardian spirit for permission for her family to enter and live in the house. If a boy or a man steps inside a new house, it's considered to be extremely heinous and will cause misfortune in the family. The same day you move into a new house, the girls of the family either cook food or buy food and fruits and drinks, for the guardian spirit. These are placed on a table and incense are burned. Each person in the family burns 3 sticks of incense and asks the guardian spirit of the house and land to allow them to live in the house peacefully, for the spirit to not disturb the happiness of the family, and for them to bless the family with peace, happiness, and prosperity. In return the family promises to remember to include the guardian spirits at family events and special days.

One more thing I have found to be "universal" in anciently rooted "animist" cultures is the knowing and belief that certain places, areas, objects, and things have "something" about them that is "sacred" or "divine" in Essence. This knowing is a feeling you empath. I also thought this was just an Asian thing, until I read that the ancient Romans actually had a word for it: Numen. In Khmer the word is "Preah" which is pronounced as "Prih" which sounds like the first syllable in the word Principle, but with the H sound at the end. In Thai it is Prah. It's really hard to translate that word into English, since I know of no single word that is the same. The Roman word Numen and the Sanskrit word "Sri" is the closest two words I know that feels very similar to the word Preah. It doesn't really mean "divine." It means a Sacred Presence.

By itself it can mean a god, or gods [Khmer has no plural suffix]. To denote a deity or monk or king you say Preahang [Ang as in Ankar]. But Preah is most often a prefix used to describe just about everything as being sacred. Preahchan means the Moon. Preahpita means Father. Preahbotrey means daughter. Preahvayu means the Wind. Preahniang Gaheeng means the Mother Earth Goddess. The Earth [dirt/ground] is called Niang [lady] Gaheeng or Niang Toranny. Toranny is my phonetic spelling of how the Sacerdotal [Sanskrit] is said. It's related to the word Terrain.

When I was small my aunt-mom told me a mythical story once about the Earth. The story goes that a very long time ago the Earth Mother – Niang Gaheeng – had 7 children: the Sun, the Moon, the Wind, the Rain, and three other things I can't remember. One day the Earth Mother had a muscle cramp and her body was aching, so she needed a massage. She asked her 7 children to come and help massage her aching body. But all of her children told the Earth Mother that they were busy doing their own thing. Each of her children made up excuses. The Sun said that he's far too busy and important to stop his job, otherwise people would freeze to death. The Rain said that he couldn't stop raining or the trees would die and the people and animals would not have anything to drink. I can't remember what the Wind's excuse was. Of the 7 children, only the Moon stopped what she was doing to come and massage the Earth. So because of this the Earth Mother placed a curse on the 6 of her children who thought of themselves first by saying that from then on, for as long as there will be people living on her, the humans will forever Curse them. But because the Moon came to her aid, nobody will have anything bad to say about the Moon. That's why when it gets too hot we curse the sun saying: "Damn that sun is hot!" Or if the wind blows, we curse at it for messing up our hair. Or if it rains we curse at it for ruining our day. But every time we look up at Preah chandra, we always praise her beauty.

There is another story about Niang Toranny I hear very often. The people that share this story with me are survivors of the Khmer Rouge revolution. The common story I hear from them is about them escaping and fleeing on foot out of the country. If you get caught, you are killed. This one young lady I talked to said she was carrying her little baby with a group of others fleeing. They were all hiding in a shallow ditch by the road as a troop of Khmer Rouge soldiers walked by. The elders in the group had told the young lady to take a piece of earth and place it on her head and her child's head and pray to the Earth Mother to hide with her dirt so the soldiers can't see them. I've heard lot of people tell their stories of their escape, and almost always, I find it fascinating that they all swear that the Earth Mother hide them from sight. I also find it fascinating that during such extreme moments the trappings of religion all falls apart and the people revert back to simple beliefs in their older animist traditions. Only in times of peace, in the safety and comfort of a modern industrialized decadent city can a person afford to give credence and pay mind to goofy things as philosophy, religion, and so on. When extreme conditions arises where Shiva's destructive eye destroys the facade of our human arrogance, such goody pass times lose their meaning. We are confronted with our very humanness. Our life is a struggle to survive.

Death & Life

Death is the one thing in life that is my biggest fascination. I like being a live and stuff, and I want to live a full 90 years, but I can't wait to die. I want to see what happens to "me" and my consciousness as I am dying. If I dissolve into nothing, I want to experience the whole thing as it happens. If I see a bright all embracing goofy light I'd be disappointed, but I'd like to experience it anyways.

Have you ever read that stupid book "Embraced by the Light" and the retardation it spawned? I have unfortunately. So there is this god-force or all embracing light at the end of some tunnel you see when you die. And when you enter this light you feel some sort of unconditional love giving you a big spirit hug welcoming you home. Which makes no sense to me. It's the same reason that Christianity makes no sense to me. An all loving godthing who makes hell, a fucked up world, the rawness of nature? Why? Why did this big light bulb at the end of a tunnel make the world, if it made it? Especially considering the nature of Nature. That's like a father who sends his children to prison for 50 years and he gives them a big warm hug when they come out. What's the prison doing in the scene in the first place?

I'm not sure what I'd say or do if I met the big light bulb when I die. I'd be extremely disappointed. Because of it is there and is real, then it causes me to ask the question: "And then what?" What's the rest of Eternity literally for? Okay, if life goes on forever, what will I be doing with this light bulb forever? That's the Big Question in my mind. If I die and I am still alive, then the Big Question is: Okay, what am I possibly gonna be doing forever? How far does this life thing go?

I usually think about death when I wake up in the middle of the night half asleep to go pee. I try to stay as asleep as I can and I leave the light off. In that state of mind as I sit there and pee, I usually tell myself: "This is probably what death is like. Dark. Quiet. Sleepy. And when I go back to sleep on the bed I just drift off to unconscious non-existence. For a long while I thought I had the answer. It was easy. Until the ONA ruined it for me with its word "Causal." One night while I was peeing and telling myself that death is like falling to sleep in the dark and not waking up, I suddenly realized that everything about my experience of sleep and night is all a causal phenomena. It's night because the sun is on the other side of the earth. I sleep because I'm an animal which evolved on the same earth. I go unconscious because being conscious while you sleep would be really boring. I realized I was thinking of death in causal terms. Of earth, sun, and moon terms. Of experiential phenomena within the realness of mortal existence. If death happens outside the reality of the solar system, then it can't be "dark," or "sleepy," or the unconsciousness of deep sleep. But I was too sleepy to philosophize about the nature of death to go on, and I was sitting there for a while thinking.

I try to figure out the meaning to life, but I notice myself ascribing human words and human terms to the stuffness of life. So what I usually do is every now and then do some exercising by walking 5-10 miles, which is something I do once or twice a month. But I incorporate a minimalist Zen-Theravada practice in the long walk. What I do is I clear my mind and make it go blank. I have a bead bracelet I bought at a Buddhist temple, and I'll consciously say a chant while counting the beads with my thumb. This keeps my conscious mind busy. Then I try to hold Mindfulness of the stuff around me for all 10 miles. I try to feel life, in a wordless and thoughtless way as best as I can. This way I don't superimpose my human ideas and opinions onto life, but I train myself to feel that Life with chitta/Heart. With my walking meditation I can't see a “purpose” or “meaning” to Life, but I Feel that it is not Pointless, or that “something” beyond the veil or facade of reality is “there” which can be felt. It’s not a meaning or a purpose, or a god, or a reason to live. It’s just “there.” On my way back from such a walk I intellectualized to myself that maybe Life was as meaningless and meaningful as pond scum. Life just happens. But there is much more to that.

I have an aquarium with a blue lobster and feeder fish I take care of. I like to watch the fish and lobster live out their boring lives in a 10 gallon thing. There lives seem so meaningless, but yet there is a simple point inherent in their organic make up: live and thrive. I also have an artificial life game called “Darwin Pond,” which I really like. It’s a real artificial life program, but it’s old. It’s the only computer game I can play and not die after a minute. It’s not really a game and you don’t really play it. You just watch, and sometime tweak a few things and sit back and watch what happens later on because of the changes you have made. I’ve had Darwin Pond for about 5 years, and it’s still fascinating to me where that I can still today run the program and watch a simulation during my breaks all day. It uses real time in the simulations, and it lets you freeze a session and save it, to start up later. You can still google “Darwin Pond” and download a free “updated” version – which is many years out of date – and have endless boring fun like me.

Darwin Pond is pretty simple with primitive graphics. On screen you have a pond and inside this pond you have artificial life things called “swimmers.” The swimmers start off looking like eels or worms. There are green dots in the pond which is the food the swimmers eat and swim around finding. The more food the more they breed. Less food means decrease in population. From time to time genetic mutations will arise in the swimmers which will make them look and swim in different ways. To the left of the screen is your science lab with test tubes and genetic engineering buttons. With the buttons you can change everything about a swimmer’s DNA. Instead of having one leg/tail you can give them 4, you can alter the way each tail/leg flaps and moves thus changing the way they swim. You can also erase food from anywhere in the pond or add food anywhere. The food are simulations of random appearing algae, so you don’t have to manually add food in the pond. You can change the coloration of the swimmers too.

I use to like taking a swimmer specimen to tweak him so he has 3-4 tails that makes him swim fast. This way he can out perform the native swimmers with one tail. Then I let the game play out in real time by leaving the game running at night when I sleep. There is no meaning to life in this pond, but if you watch long enough, you can feel out a point to the artificial pond life: live and thrive or die. Sometimes in the morning my swimmer I genetically tweaked didn’t make it. Other times I’ll wake up and find that my Genetically Manipulated [GM] swimmers ended up populating the pond with a small population of their own kind. Then if my GM swimmers were made well, I wake up and see that the whole pond is thriving with my GM swimmers and the native ones had gone extinct.

It’s a really cool game, to me at least. What is fascinating about it to me is that you actually get to see the Causal changes happening within a simulation of Time Flow. In my current language I can say that the game is like a mini simulation of Aeonics; but 5-6 years ago I had no word to call what I was looking at that captured my fascination so much. You would think that I may have gained insights into Life from playing a game that simulates pond life, but I didn’t. Instead

I gained a deeper understanding of something I once called the Two Certainties or Constants of life: Time & Causality.

From the game I learned to see that Time Flow and Causal Change are traveling buddies that flow together like maybe a double helix. But as I looked closer at this Darwin Pond, I learned to see that the causal changes happening weren't exactly linear. After many years of staring at this game, I had trained my mind to see life in a certain way, and so I used that way of seeing with real life. In real life, Causality – cause and fruit – is not linear. It goes in any and all directions unpredictably at times. Like hitting a group of balls on a pool table, where you can never be sure where every ball will fly to and end up being when they come to rest.

Seeing causation as being nonlinear gave me a problem in my Mind. Now Causation and Time weren't traveling friends anymore. Time went in one direction and while causal change can go in any direction. But then looking deeper I noticed that every causal line/chain of event materialized inside its own flow of Time. Which caused me to revise the way I understood Time flow. It wasn't linear perhaps, but like causality was nonlinear. This then caused me to see Time Flow and Causal Impermanence or Change as being the same thing. Because what do I mean to myself when I say "in Time?" I mean inside a matrix of change and impermanence where that some changes will have taken place. But then I remembered that Space and Time were the same thing: Space-Time. Which in my Mind ended up looking like this: Space-Time-Causality. Or ONA makes it all easier for me by just referring to that Space-Time-Causality as being "The Causal." In my Mind, this meant that id causality was nonlinear and went in every direction, then whatever we exist in also happens in the same manner. Reality in my Mind just might happen like fractal patterns.

But this still did not give me an insight into the big question I had: Where is it all going? What is the end point? Is there a place we are moving towards as some divinely established destination a billion trillion years from now? If the Cosmos is alive, then where is it taking us? From staring at my pond game trying find an answer to staring at real pond life near my house, I later learned that I was anthropomorphizing the Cosmos as some sentient being with some premeditated purpose and "direction," which was causing my confusion.

I learned to see pond life as a whole single organism. Meaning that the pond water, the algae, and animal life, along with dead matter was all one systematic Whole-Thing, just like our human body is a systematic whole thing made of of cells, blood, and inert molecule. Which was my problem, because my body has a conscious Mind with a will that can by volition determine direction and premeditate a place to be in the future. A lake near my house was "alive" and thriving, but as a Whole-Thing it lacked a will, conscious volition, and mind. A Lake as a Whole-Thing was just reactive on a collective level. Where that if you pour toxic waste in one section, the lake reacts to that causal input by dying in that area. And if you input food in another area, the Lake reacts by its life [organisms] moving towards the food where it can thrive for a while. So from taking meditative walks around this lake by my house I one day had the insight or realization that the a lake was just like a Tree!

Trees are alive, but not conscious like we humans are. Inside the tree is water and cells. That got me thinking that maybe the Cosmos was "alive" like a lake or tree and not like a person, where it did not have a conscious mind or volition, but was reactive to causal stimuli like a lake or tree. This would mean to me – in my own Mind and understanding of things – that there really is no true point or purpose to the Cosmos, as if there was an evolution towards a certain distant divine goal operating on some divine plan. Life just somehow happened, and as long as that life is in the living Cosmic Matrix, it will just try to live and thrive. This seen of the Cosmos as a Tree reminded me of a documentary I watched on a tribe living in Borneo called the Dyacks. I can't remember how they spell it. The doc was actually about a tattoo enthusiast who was traveling in deep jungles to live with real tribes and get their ancient indigenous tattoos. After living with the Dyacks in the jungle and passing their rites of passage the American guy is honoured with a real Dyack tattoo of something they call Ahping. Ahping is the supreme deity of the Dyacks. As a tattoo Ahping is drawn to look like a black octopoidal tree design of different shapes. The Dyacks say that Ahping is a big Tree and that all life grows on Ahping. Later when I found the Tree of Wyrd in the ONA, I saw Ahping in it. To me it's an aptly named descriptor, because this Cosmic Tree is in Time shaped by the wyrdful threads of causation we all weave.

I was on one of my meditative walks to the lake trying to figure out why the Cosmos – being so old and alive as it should be – was not a conscious being with a mind, self awareness, and personality. I was thinking about the lake and the trees around it. And I figured that whatever we call "life force" or acausal energy must be like the water in the lake and trees. It's just a "fluid" conducive to or for life to manifest, which is life itself. Then like a lake and trees, maybe the Cosmos is so big a thing that it can only manifest inside of itself. Just like how fish and amoebas can only grow and exist inside their lake and not actually outside of it. Then with the lake and trees, we can say that each living cell/organism is an expression of its lake or tree matrix. Not an expression of the lake's water itself, but of the lake as a Whole Systematic Thing. On a Cosmic level, this would mean in my Mind that each living thing in the Cosmos is an expression of the Cosmos as a Whole Systematic Thing. In other words, basically Life manifests inside its matrix.

This concept that Life manifests inside the Cosmos, led me to a small realization. That if we say that such Life in the Cosmos is an actualization of the Cosmic Matrix as a Systematic Whole Thing, then Conscious Awareness in the human is an evolutionary sense or tool which happens inside this Cosmic Lake. Which to me ends up meaning that The Cosmos "out there" has indeed evolved to be aware and sentient and conscious with will and volition, but that such awareness and volition is Us. In the same way where we can say that a big fish in a lake is the lake's potential for awareness/volition in causal manifestation. In other words, that the Cosmos is like a lake, which it gradually evolves causally and nonlinearly towards more refined/acute states of sensory awareness of its environment simply to better survive and thrive by out competing. Consciousness – the ability to focus your awareness on things – like binocular and color vision, I think is merely a evolutionary upgrade of sensory information gathering. It just helps when you are a cheetah to be able to focus your "proactive" awareness and volition onto a single prey, as opposed to perhaps a bacteria that may have a simple reactive awareness just drift and react to external stimuli.

All this speculation led me to an amusing possible answer to my big question that for now makes things make some sense in my mind. The big question is: How did this [Life] come to be and where is it going? The answer for me at the moment is that when I look out into the universe and ask this question, I am literally the Cosmos looking out to itself and asking those same questions. But of course, there could be another planet with a people on it who have asked these same questions a million years before us. It's as if we were to place a Tree in the middle of Nothing for an eternity so that one day all of the Tree's cells developed an acute form of awareness and consciousness and those cells asked: How did this come to be and where is it all going? I think there is something very, very beautiful and revealing about this big question in human children. Doesn't matter where we are born, as children we come out completely ignorant of where we came from and how we came to be. Almost universally, there will come a time when as children we will ask somebody: Where did I come from, how was I made? I really to think/theorize that the living Cosmos has expressed its potential for awareness in us and other conscious beings, and that with that self awareness, it is asking itself where it came from and how it came to be.

Struggle

I see "Struggle" as being a key factor in evolution. But I see struggle in a very different way than the old notion of Darwinian Struggle, because I see the world that I live in as being a symbiotic system, just like my own body is. This symbiotic struggle can't have it so that its organisms exists in some isolated vacuum where each species just struggles to be the toughest and baddest creature. We really don't live in isolated vacuums.

Struggle in a symbiotic system in my Mind is like when the ice age has ended on the earth, and all the plants say: "Shit, there goes the ice age! It's gunna get hotter. I gotta change my thickness and ways of retaining moisture or die!" Then the herbivores end up saying: "Ah shit! All the plants are changing. I gotta change too so I can chew this shit and digest it or die!" Then all the carnivores end up saying: "Great, the kangaroos are hopping so they can get to the new grass faster than the wombats! How the hell do I catch them now! Man I gotta lose all this ice age weather armour, and get faster myself or die!"

So each group of things proactively responds/reacts to stimuli of its immediate environment. But as a whole the ecosystem eventually evolves as a working system. Many species that can't adapt may dies out, but at the same time, new organisms arise to take their niche in the system. There was a time in the system or environment of America when Irish immigrants were very disliked and they could only get deplorable jobs. But slavery was a causal input in this system that changed the functional landscape of this environment. The Irish White People gradually found their way to a new niche place, and African slaves took their deplorable niche in this system. The Industrial revolution came and changed the functionality and landscape again where now machines took the place of slaves. The Blacks then adapted to take menial labour the machines could do. The freedom the African-Americans now had plus a thriving economy changed the landscape a bit even more so that many of them elevated to better niches. Now the Mexican immigrant has taken their place picking strawberries and such. So, although America as a whole systematic entity has greatly changed since its early days, it evolves together as a whole, such that if and when its parts and pieces shifts or evolves, there is a replacement to take over important niches to keep the system going. For example the niche in a system that Horse Power filled never went anywhere and is still needed. It's just that today, that niche is filled with a more refined source/means of power: engines and fuel.

On a localized level of parts existing within the matrix of a given functioning system, Struggle to keep up with the system is a very real matter of life and death if the system is an ecosystem. If the system is a civilization or economy, then Struggle becomes a matter of freedom. But this type of Struggle is a primitive way to see and understand struggle which is myopic in regard to the Whole System we humans as a functioning indivisible part of. This is where I disagree with both Marx and Hitler when they state in a primitive perspective that history is a struggle of either class or race. Maybe so within context to a Nation-State, it's system, its economy, and social environment. But we know no Kingdom or State lasts very long, so what class or race struggle for dominance in such a "predoomed" system feels like people struggling, fighting, and warring with each other to have a go at the wheel of the Titanic just after it hit the iceberg causing fear and panic on board. Take the former USSR for example. How long did that last? Say 100 years. So all the war and class struggle and uprooting of people from their ancestral history, and the millions of millions who dies happened just so that Party can take a country for a 100 joy ride before the country collapsed?

There is something that will always outlive a country and organized religion: Humanity. Considering that humanity has been around in our current form for about 150,000 it would seem as if the 100 year joy ride communism has was a pitiful waste of time. What's worse is that those 100 years didn't produce anything lasting. Humanity outlives empires and religion. Empires and religion in fact are causal expression of collections of humanity. Because of this, I believe that human history – and our future – is shaped not by a Struggle of class or race; but a Struggle of Culture. If we genuinely understand Aeonics and the basic idea that humanity will go on for a very long time and will always express itself in the causal world, then you'll eventually come to understand the value and power of Culture Struggle.

The way I see Culture Struggle is also like pond life. In our pond we have organisms. Each living organism has one common basic function we never really pay any attention to. Each organism from the bacteria on up to a big fish processes Information. You have an lake seething with information, and what we call "living organisms" which acts as microchips that process this information. Then they react to such information. The more primitive the organism, the more primitive its ability to process the information and react. The more sophisticated the organism the more acute its ability to process the information and react with volition and intent either in a reactive or proactive manner. Each organism also is made up of genetic information which basically allows each organism to replicate more such organisms that inherit their respective ability/capability of information process.

So no the struggle in our pond takes on a different picture. It is a war of information. Single celled organisms that can't pick up information of a threat may die. Bacteria that can pick up the information of a threat and react by producing toxin may live. Organisms that can't process the information of light, might not do so well as organisms that have adapted cells to process the information of light. The more an animal is able to process huge amounts of information and acutely react to such information, the more successful its species becomes.

We leave the pond for the jungle to study more evolved animals like chimps and we see a new layer of information is present. Something we might call "Social Information." Which is a complex interaction of a society of chimps sending and picking up information from and to each other. If you're a chimp that can't process the social information an alpha male is giving you with teeth telling you not to copulate his females, you're ass is grass. If you are a little chimp and you are too stupid to learn to acquire the social information your mother is trying to give to you by sticking a twig in a ant hill to fish for ants, you won't be eating ants like everyone else. If you're an alpha male and something is wrong with you where you can't process the information females are giving you by sticking their ass in your face, then you're not gonna get any action and pass your genes down to the next generation.

Then we come to the human arena. Here "social information" becomes more sophisticated and we call it Culture, Traditions, and Customs. Cultures are like monkeys. They are bodies of coherent information with a number of humans as their cells. In the human area these cultures – just like monkeys – struggle to sire the next generation with their social information [cultural memes]. The most coherent and systematically functioning Culture become the most dominate and influential. The Culture of the Roman Empire and its people still influences us today. If you count all of Europe, all of the Americas, and the British Commonwealth whose people were/are in some way descendents of or influenced by this ancient Roman Culture, you have over 2 billion humans. That's not counting Africa. 1 Billion humans are influenced by Islam, which is based on ancient Meccan Culture. The empire Sinosphere is dominated and influenced by Chinese Culture for 4000 years. Another Billion humans in India are influenced by the Culture of the Brahmins. This ancient Brahmin Cultural memplex also would include 500 million Buddhists around the world.

We see now on the human scale of 7 Billion humans, that there are literally only a handful of ancient Cultures which still wields informational influence on the whole of humanity. And in our modern age we are beginning to see the emergence of one specific Cultural set of information grow into a globally monstrous influence: English. Never before in the history of our species has anything like this ever happened. English – the language – has shaped and still shapes our entire world, our worldviews, our science, our politics, our nations, our economy, our technology. Nothing today really happens in our human sphere of existence and causal expression which is not touched by English in some way. English even dominates our vision of a future via our science fiction novels, movies, and television shows. English is easy to use to show that a Cultural memplex does out live empires, kingdoms, and nations. The English language came into existence just before England was a big kingdoms. That language saw England grow into the British Empire that covered the world. It out lived that massive empire and is now a tool wielded by the sole super power on Earth: America. It will out live America as a political entity. Just like Russian outlived the USSR.

Culture tends to stay intact over long periods of time. Despite the thousands of years that rolled across India, with all the different religious culture, kingdoms, and empires that arose and died in India, Brahminical Culture today still exists relatively in intact with some evolutionary changes. Same goes for Chinese Culture. The Cultural Revolution only killed an empire, but could not kill the actual Culture of the Chinese people, which has existed relatively unchanged for 4000 years.

We see that Culture expresses itself causally. In Catholic Europe in the past we see the Christianized Culture shared by Europe gave rise to causal manifestations such as the Crusades, the Gothic cathedrals, kingdoms, political systems, etc. Over in India Brahminical Culture via its ancient Brahmanism and then its hodge-podge Hinduism manifested as thousands of stone temples, little kingdoms that dotted the subcontinent, the magnificent artwork. In Southeast Asia we see that the indigenous Culture after absorbing Brahmanism and Buddhism expressed themselves in the world as whole empires [Khmer & Javanese Empire], kingdoms, the largest religious temple complex on earth [Angkor Wat], and so on. Likewise in China, whose Cultural influence helped shape Japan and Korea, as well as the wardrobe and attire of the world with its silk hanfu. This doesn't include the enduring influence of a Culture's weltanschauung and philosophies. Our modern world is still influenced by a mere handful of ancient philosophies or worldviews of the Cultures of Greece, Rome, India, China, and England as of the modern world.

The Prize of the top cultures is massive and long lasting: the influence of billions of human lives. The power to steer huge portions of humanity into a direction. The end result of a weak culture is cultural liquidation and enslavement of its people who will serve the cultural destiny of the dominating culture. You have but to look at the unfortunate race of African-Americans to understand what I am trying to mean here. They were stolen from one land and brought to another, their indigenous and ancestral culture was beaten out of them. Now they exist to serve the interests of a system and State. They literally exist only as pawns to help manifest the collective destiny of a political party, an economy, and so on. I mean "destiny" in a poetic sense here. As in would Shakespeare have ever known that the English he helped form, would one day give birth to a nation whose destiny was to set a human foot on the moon?

I would agree with the Numinous Way and Reichsfolk when it says that Culture is a living manifestation and expression of Nature. I would also say that the Numinous Way has it accurate when it admonishes us to stay away from abstractions and live in the numinous immediacy of the moment. It may seem that the Culture millions of people is abstract and distant, and therefore immoral in the Numinous sense, but I'll explain.

In my own Mind what is "Abstract" is if we had a painter who painted a mountain. The painting is the Abstract of the numinous mountain. The painting is an abstraction of that mountain. It becomes immoral in the numinous sense to be oblivious of the actual mountain and to speak of, debate, philosophize, and make a belief system with and out of the the painting. Abstraction is also like when I will be giving a lecture on a subject, and just to give my potential audience the gist of what I will be speaking on I give them a summary of my lecture which is called an "Abstract." It is stupid to read that abstract I handed out and oblivious – unaware – of my actual lecture you pass your judgments and and critique my knowledge on the subject based on that abstract. Abstraction is like you were standing in a line at the movie theater figuring out which movie to watch and I come out and tell you: "Damn nigga, the Matrix was da bomb! Keanu was in there, this one girl that looked like a lesbian, robots, they were flying everywhere, that agent was everybody! Bullets flying in slow motion! It was awesome!" Then you say to me: "Damn, it sounds awesome! Hey thanks!" And you walk off. I stop you and say: "Where're you going?" You say: "Girl, your abstract narration of the Matrix was so real, I don't even have to see the actual movie. Ima go tell my friends how cool it was!"

When you take something living and just there in Nature, like a flower and you describe it in words, thoughts, and ideas, what words, thoughts, and ideas you have is an Abstraction of the wordless and thoughtless flower. There is a difference. And so what we do is we take our abstractions of Nature, Life, of the World, and with those abstractions of words, thoughts, ideas, opinions, we make religions out of them. Which are nothing more than word games, idea games, opinion games. We make philosophies out of them. We in essence juggle ideas in our own heads that have nothing to do with prehending what is Real, Raw, Alive World. We think such Abstractions are real, and we are oblivious to that which is actually raw reality. We lose ourselves in our abstractions of words, thoughts, opinions, semantics, etc, and are disconnected and cut off from the actual real world of human experience. We go off up into idealistic directions fueled by our samsara of abstractions. And the more we lose ourselves in such abstractions and their idealisms, the less of any understanding we have of the real world, and ourselves. It gets to the point where you end up playing make believe like children. You tell stories and play pretends with other people oblivious to reality. Remember when we played make believe when we were small? Where we make up things as we go along. It's like somebody says: "Let's pretend we're walking a special path called the left hand path." And somebody adds to that: "Okay, and then let's pretend we're becoming gods, and we'll call it a big word like apotheosis because we're grown ups!"

Anything I can write or say or intimate, or ideate about a Chinese culture is an abstraction of the actual Living Culture happening between a billion Chinese people in China. My own indigenous culture is not "over there" somewhere in some country or in some textbook in some college. Its here with me as a living thing I do with my fingers and toes by myself and also with those who are around and in front of me. The only way for you to realistically understand – knowing from experience – my culture is my sticking your face right in between me and what I do. That's what I mean by "my culture." I mean the stuff I do and the way I live through myself and for those around me within my immediate sphere of life. And so in a community of people who share the same culture, you have a collocation or mingling of many people expressing the same culture in the community. The culture as a living "thing" is still rooted in the person's cultivated actions and deeds. It's just that now around this person there are others who share that culture. In a nation who all share a common culture, that culture Still is rooted in each individual and their actions. On a national level, my culture is not "out there" somewhere, it is right here with me and expressed in between the people I live with. In fact I actually take my culture with me everywhere I go. That should tell you where a person's culture actually is. On a real and numinous level the culture is rooted in the individual person, those they live with, and such culture develops from such person or small group of people living together in a certain area for a while. Once it develops, the culture is portable, and transmittable.

The Abstraction of a living numinous culture is what is removed from the cultivation of such culture by an individual and those within their immediate sphere. Speaking of a culture beyond that circle of immediacy is only an approximate abstract of a living culture. The social information that makes a living culture travels from groups of people to groups of people within a given area. So that over time a large number practice, express, and cultivate, the same culture, or versions of the same culture. In a way it is the same as with language. Language happens with you. It is rooted in your brain and mouth. You use it with those immediate around you. That is where language happens as a living thing. Any talk, idea, thought, conception, opinionation, ideation, of English or language beyond that immediate sphere around you is an abstraction of the living language you use. In any given area the lingual information that makes up your language you use spreads and travels to other people and groups of people around you. As it is used by others, it will develop regional variations called dialects.

Each group of people will also develop their own version of the Language. You should know that speaking of an English language is dealing with something abstract and not living because on the living level of group of users on the ground such as in England, you have a different variation every other mile you go. Which English are you referring to? Culture works the same way. If you understand this much, you'll understand that there really is no such thing as a "Asian Culture," or a "Chinese Culture," or a "European Culture." Just like I can say there is no such thing as a "Khmer Language," because that term points to something so vacuous and generalized, that no living variant of Khmer would fit the generalized ideated thoughts. So there is a big difference between a numinous culture and an abstraction of a culture. A numinous culture is what is living in between a small group of people living together and next to each other. And what is rooted in each individual of such small group of people. The abstraction of that culture is when you gloss over an entire nation of people and produce a generalization or approximation. The immoral problem arises when we take that abstraction and make it into an idol and standard by which we judge what is on the living level. Or when that abstraction prevents us from coming to know the Real.

Culture Struggle happens for two reasons. The first reason is that we don't live in a vacuum bubble. Second reason is that social information moves and travels from person to person, and group to group. So when you have two cultures in close proximity to each others the social information of each culture will flow into the other. A visible example of two cultures influencing each other can be seen here in Southern California. The Mexican population here is huge which means that locally Mexican culture is big and a coherent phenomena. This causes their social information to influence everybody in the area. It doesn't matter what race you are here, you're gonna eat salsa and tacos, have a barbeque on Cinco de Mayo, talk their variant of English which will have many words in Mexican-Spanish, and so on. But the size of a culture does not always equal its memes being influential. There is also the factor of receptivity of foreign elements. For example there are not a lot of Black people anywhere in my area, but I hang out with a handful of Black guys I look up too that are very street oriented. There are certain elements my Black friends have which neither my own culture does not have. Such as the expressive street grade English they use, the real-raw street based worldviews that have, the tight gang style bond they have for their friends. All these have no strong equivalent in my own Culture, so gradually those elements grafted into my own culture. Meaning how I personally express my culture, not as in my grandma and all of my relatives talking like Black gangbangers, hating on "the Man."

Over time two neighboring cultures can end up sharing so much in common that they are very similar and hard to distinguish. Personally I find it almost impossible to differentiate Khmer, Thai, and Lao culture apart. This happened because in the past the old Khmer Empire was a huge coherent national and cultural entity. In this case the Thai-Lao people in ancient times were feral tribes from Southern China. Compared to China and the Khmer Empire, those feral tribes had a very underdeveloped culture. So it's like taking a 10 year old boy and having the boy being adopted by adults. What will happen is that as the boy develops with age, he will absorb the adult's culture who raised him. This is an example of one type of Culture Struggle where a coherent developed culture influences an underdeveloped incoherent one. The other example of Culture Struggle is "Cultural Liquidation."

A current example of Cultural Liquidation that is fascinating for me is the case with China and what used to be Tibet. It's only been about 60ish years since China re-annexed the Tibetan Plateau. Over the years Chinese culture has relentlessly assaulted the indigenous culture of the Tibetan people. Everything from Chinese writing, Chinese music, Chinese martial arts, to Chinese politics has been flooding Tibet. With this the Chinese government suppresses aspects of Tibetan cultural observances. Liquidation in this real context happens within the flow of Time. Why and how it happens is because as humans we die. It doesn't matter if in 1940 you were a hardcore 30 year old Tibetan sworn to forever hate the Chinese and everything Chinese. You will die soon. And when you die, you leave your children behind. The cultural erosion happens with each dying generation where that each newly emerged generation is like that little boy adopted by adults. The boy not being fully developed will absorb their adult's culture. Each new generation of Tibetans absorbs a little more social information from Chinese Culture. It's been only 60 years and the Tibetan people inside China are fighting to maintain their cultural integrity. Unfortunately they are up against a monstrous 4000 year old cultural memplex which has liquidated and absorbed many nations and tribes.

The key points to think about is that the weaker cultures dissolves, and the Alpha Cultures gets to influence and lead a massive portion of humanity into a direction. That direction might not always be the most positive and constructive of direction. Case in point would be the the spiritless soul of Western Secular-Capitalism. It is a cheap substitute faux-culture [Cult-ture] that is now ubiquitous and eating away at living cultures around the world. It spreads like a desert first killing the young trees, and then finally strangling the ancient old growth forest. It is a memetic war on Culture between those the zombies who have no real living culture and those with living culture. If there is any struggle worth fighting and struggling for, it's the Struggle of Culture.

But that war of cultures can only be won – or just survived – if we learn to understand what a culture is and where it happens. Culture is a Way of Life which has developed overtime between a people and their association with each other and the environment. That culture happens through each of us and our individual cultivation and praxis. The important point to consider is if we as individual people have a strong Mind where we are proud of our respective cultures, have the resolve and integrity to hold onto that culture, to strengthen it, and lastly to pass that culture down to our next generation. Liquidation of culture happens at the newly emerged end of children and young people. We can be as resolved in Mind as we want, but we will die and leave our children and grand children behind. It is in the minds and hearts of those who are "next in line" that the corrosion and liquidation happens.

And so for me, Culture has become an increasingly important thing, now taking central stage in the arena of human existence. On a living level culture is a vehicle of ancestral information compiled and developed since ancient times by long one people. On an aeonic level [of thousands of years], culture has the power to guide and drive humanity either towards a constructive destiny or to our own destruction. It's too early right now for me to formulate some thesis or spectacular thing on the concept of Culture Struggle, as the idea is just newly crystallized. I think in time, I'll work on this. I think at the moment, when I say struggle I in no ways mean to suggest some tiny half formed culture struggle to dominate the world and guide humanity. I mean on a numinous level of the intimate moment, there is a struggling of small living cultures, against the great big empty faux-culture. It is a struggle to survive in one piece.

A struggle to somehow have my grandchildren one day know their roots and culture of their ancestors. Even if such cultural observances today seem weird and unscientific. I would like them to know their ancient ancestral "animism." About how everything in nature is alive and has a life force. That everything living empathizes/understands when the Heart speaks. That their life force is rooted in the Cosmos itself. That when I die and they die, it is not the "end of life."

In my Buddhist culture, we still believe in rebirth. I'm not interesting in arguing with a Westerner who is a know it all. Anatta [anatma] is virtually meaningless. In the same way as when I say I believe in Anti-Self. The problem with the English of today is that the word "Self" can mean almost anything depending on the group of people using the word. Is Self the Ego? The Soul? The Personality? Persona? Spirit? Mind? Life Force? Awareness? Atman 2500 years ago was the same way. Different groups of philosophers had their own meaning of Atman. If a Buddhist monk in Theravada did not believe in a self, then why is the sacerdotal word for "Me and I" in Theravada "Atma?"

The Buddha basically said that he believes the "self" to be an aggregation of many different things and factors. At death all those things and factors separates and dissolves into their respective elements and things. But he says that after everything dissolves what is left is Chitta {Heartmind} which then flows like a stream: chittasantana [Mindstream]. It is the Heart that is like a Seed planted in a new Time, which grows into a new person. And so when most living creatures are newly born, we come into the world with a fully working Heartmind that feels and empathizes even in the womb. It is only much later that a new mind/self develops.

I would like my own future children to inherit and have their own living culture. To know and understand that they exist in inside a war on culture. The most important aspect of any culture is the family bond it creates and the clans it gives rise to. And so it becomes that here in the West, losing one's culture, means one's children loses connection with family and clan and becomes an individualized prey to a lifeless faux culture and its cultureless people. To me, things like the ONA and Numinous Way have become valuable accessories to my own culture which helps me retain, maintain, and preserve what culture I have. For my future children such things as the ONA and Numinous Way will provide them a means to add-on and build up what culture they may have inherited to fortify it from Magian erosion.

End Remarks

This is a short essay which might not flow or fit together very well. I had a few ideas bubbling up and had to write them down before they were lost. The essay is about the things I think about often. Culture, Life, death, ONA. At it's core, ONA does share a lot in common with indigenous cultures, and ancient living traditions the world over. These commonly shared things are things your average Westerner is alien to. I'll hold onto my indigenous culture, traditions, and way of life with a death grip. This is one reason why I like Reichsfolk National-Socialism. I reserve the right to have a culture, to be proud of it, and to preserve it. Even if to the Mundane, Homo Hubris, and Magian aspects of my culture and way of life are unscientific and does not conform to materialist paradigms. In the end, it is the individualized one without a culture that will suffer. I've written in many other essays about the many aspects of ONA that can be found in every ancient indigenous people and their cultures and traditions. This is one reason why I like ONA. It has useful forms to use on the outside. But on the inside is a Core that houses something alive and old. Something forgotten by the West, which is still a living part of the rest of the world. It is something simple which grows and unfolds from Heartmind and Acausal Empathy. That ability to feel the life force in things, its living pulse which is all around us and in everything. From my own cultural understanding of things, it is the Heart which is the beginning of Life, which Feels, which learns to Understand it; and which always beats with the pulsations of the Numinous Acausal. And human Culture is one Sacred expression of that Numinous Acausal. Expressed through each of us as living nexions of that sacred essence.

OLDIES BUT GOODIES

Oldies But Goodies

I've been fortunate – or unfortunate – enough to have been interested in and involved with Satanism for actually a decade now. I've been watching Satanism and Satanists move, grow, and leave since my MySpace days. Over the many years I have seen Satanists gradually grow into a new understanding of what "Satanism" is. This newly emerging understanding is much different than what it was "philosophically" interpreted to be 10 years ago. 10 years ago you basically had 3 general types of Satanists. You had your retarded Theists whose Satanism was primitive reverse Christianity. You had the Modern/LaVeyans whose Satanism back then meant materialist reductionism + Ego worship + the "philosophy" of "Satanism means indulgence." Then you have the Egyptoid Satanists/Setians who were like the "hippies" of Satanism all into the quasi-Egyptian, pseudo-left hand path, subjective universe crap. Thank god Setianism attritted to death and irrelevancy.

One group during that era stuck out, and still sticks out: ONA. I was going through many of the "old" xerox facsimiles of old 1980-1990 ONA MSS just reading writings by ONA from that specific era just to see how much ONA stuck out. Many notions and ideas we may take for granted in ONA have actually been around since those early years. It's pretty cool for me at least to be able to trace back the origins of memes. For example I always thought the meme/idea of "Cultivation" was a contemporary ONA used word, but it's been used by ONA since the early days. The other cool thing to see for me is seeing how over time the other institutions of Satanism and mundane Satanists have used more and more ONA meme/ideas to beef up their stagnant Satanism. Of course they will never admit it. But when you learn to follow memes, it becomes easy to know which fool has been borrowing from ONA.

Following memes is easy. It's useless and impossible to follow one single meme/word/idea. For example the meme "White." By itself there is no way of getting any data from it. But memes like to travel in clusters. The more compact [coherent/cohesive] the cluster of memes, the more power they have to travel from mind to mind and influence. So then, if you learn to look for a meme and its traveling meme buddies, you'll be able to get your data and trace the history and origins of that Memecolony. For example when you notice the meme "Power," traveling with the meme "White" [White Power], it becomes possible to trace that two memeset to a possible Neo-Nazi memplex of some sort. If the meme "Hitler" is in the mix, then you can deduce that the originating memplex may be National Socialism of some type. If you get Hitler, the meme "National-Socialism" with that hyphen, and the meme "Ethical," then you can trace that memecolour specifically to the Reichsfolk memplex. Even if a person does not know where he got his memecolour from, you can tell if he's infected with for example, Reichsfolk memes, that someone he was exposed to was either Reichsfolk or was influenced or inspired by it.

And it's the same way with ONA memes. You can't really say that someone is infected or influenced by ONA if they use a single meme like "Causal." Causal by itself is just a word/idea. It's not one generally used by your average imbecile mundane Satanist, but it's a word in active circulation, at least with the intelligent people. But when you come across a Satanist who uses a cluster of memes like "Causal," "Pathei Mathos," "Form," "Abstraction," or their essential ideas [the actual memes], you can figure out that this person is infected – influenced – by ONA either directly or indirectly. So they don't have to admit that they were influenced by ONA. They genuinely might not even know it. Which would work in our favour since any person who does not know where he's getting his ideas from and why he's using them is a fool. You want those fools to keep using the words and memes. Words – the words we think in – is what we build our worldviews and paradigms with. Those words they use literally influences how they see themselves, their world, and the entire experience of reality.

Let them use those words and ideas, in total blissful ignorance even. It's the only way to have an influence over their Satanism to change it. A memplex must be replaced one meme at a time. ONA memes must gradually seep into and replace their old useless and irrelevant memes. One word at a time. One idea at a time. One concept at a time. One fool at a time.

Like the Gods said once: "Explosion when my pen hits tremendous/ [...] Shacklin the masses.../ [...]As the world turns, I spread like germs/ Bless the globe with the pestilence/ The hard headed never learn/ [...] Paragraphs contain cyanide/ [...] Light is provided through sparks of energy/ From the mind that travels in rhyme form/ Giving sight to the Blind/ The Dumb are mostly intrigued by the drum [...] My pen blows lines ferocious..." - [Triumph, Wu-Tang Clan]. The dumb are intrigued by what they hear. New words used by others that sound smart or cool, they pick up like germs. Their mind, paradigm, and worldview, fall under the influence of such words, like a body falls influence to the beat of a drum of a good song. Intoxicated by the opiate of the mass, who needs their constant fix. Memes are like dope to the deaf and the dumb.

So this will be a collection of some old era ONA quotes that I like or find very interesting, especially when considering the time frame, and the general mindset of Satanism/Satanists back then. All of them are from old facsimiles of xeroxed MSS circulated from a past era long before the internet was in public use. Listen for the drum:

"[T]he ONA understands and practices Satanism as it is, with its insistence that Satanism is about individual self-development in both the real and the Occult worlds, and that this can only be achieved by hard, long, dangerous and toilsome experience. Further, the ONA has exhibited a creativity and an understanding which makes all other manifestations pale into insignificance. Thus, it is not surprising that it has been so influential in the past few years.

“This influence has, however, seldom been acknowledged – other groups and individuals often borrowing the teachings, methods and ideas and claiming them as their own, this ‘borrowing’ not being confined to “Satanic” or Left Hand Path groups in general. This is both natural, and necessary given the sterility of creativity which exists and has existed in such groups, and given the nature of the human species in general, and the Satanic in particular.” – Satanic Influence; ONA, Hostia 1, 1990

“A Satanist is an individual explorer – following in the footsteps of others (and perhaps using their guide books) but always seeking further horizons, daring to defy convention (in ideas as well as in morals and attitude) yet part of an evolutionary succession enabling what is experienced to be understood and become beneficial. For this reason, a genuine Satanist understands tradition as important and necessary – the culmination of centuries of insight and experience, a useful guide which enables further progress and exploration: a starting point for that inner and outer journey which is begun by Initiation, as well as a map of the way chosen and followed.” – The Tradition Of The Sinister Way; ONA, Hostia 1, ~1992

“There is no morality here – only the judgment of experience...” – Manipulation 1; ONA, Hostia 1, 1990

“There is not and never has been any substitute for self-learning from experience.” – The Alchemy Of Magick; ONA, Hostia 1, 1991

“Thus, traditional Satanism is concerned with the ‘inner development’ of its Initiates, and its followers are few in numbers.” – The Sinister Path, Aims & Intent; ONA, Hostia 1, ~1992

“Satanism can never become (until the ‘New Aeon’ arrives at least) respectable: for to become so would destroy its numen, its viability as a way to genuine Adeptship.” ONA – Organizational Structure; ONA, Hostia II, ~1992

“[T]he creation of new forms is important and indeed vital – there must be a continuing evolution.” – Esoteric Tradition; ONA, Hostia II, ~1992

“What matters is action, the desire to achieve, to become again fierce, tough, forbidding and thus real individuals who have broken the psychic chains of the majority.” – Conquer, Destroy, Create; ONA, Hostia II, ~1992

“A Satanist, concerned with experience, may use a political form for a specific purpose -the nature of that form in terms of conventional politics and morality (such as ‘extreme Right-wing’) is irrelevant. What is important is whether it can be used to (a) provide experience of living and the limits of experience, and/or (b) aid the sinister dialectic of history.” – The Hard Reality Of Satanism; ONA, Hostia II, 1991

*“[I] have tried to make clear (sometimes by exaggerating the point) that I regard Satanism first and foremost as a practical way which involves garnishing experiences of the limits of living, and learning from those experiences -transmuting the experiences into self-insight, the development of

consciousness and so on.” Steven Brown Letters [to Ms. Vera]; ONA, Hostia II, May 27, 1992

[Q1]“However, there are some points which perhaps are best raised in a private letter. First -and perhaps inconsequential out of its context -no one has ever claimed to be ‘Head’ of the ONA: no such position exists.” Steven Brown Letters [to Grampa Munster Aquino]; ONA, Hostia II, Sept 7, 1990

[Q2]“Satanism existed in many forms long before LaVey, and the ONA simply represents one such form: a form that has changed and is still changing, developed as it is and has been, by creative individuals within it.” – Steven Brown Letters [to Dr. Aquino]; ONA, Hostia II, Sept 7, 1990

Note: Quotes Q1 & Q2 are from the same letter. I especially like those two quotes by Anton Long, considering the date. AL just states in plain ole English even way back then that the ONA has no leaders or head, and that the individuals within it change it, develop it, and still is changing it. In some recent writings AL has used contemporary language by referring to ONA as being “Open Source.” He has also over the years restated that he is not the leader, and that ONA has no leader.

It’s amazing how these two concepts have been said over 20 years ago, and has been resaid often, but yet still your mundane know-it-all insists that ONA has a leader somewhere who “left it,” and that “we” of ONA today are trying to change it or resurrect it, whatever. Like they Gods said: “The hard-headed never learn.” They must see what they want to see in it. Those who force DM or whoever to be the leader of ONA Need such people to be ONA’s leader for their own “emotivations.” For their own emotive motives. They dislike ONA, they need DM to be the leader, so they can say he left it, thus ONA is dead, and this makes them feel better, like they know information others aren’t privy to. When all they know are their own assumptions and wishful thinking. They need ONA to be static and unchanging, because it’s supposed to be dead and/or not real like their Satanism is. It’s not supposed to be influencing and inspiring anybody. But it is, as it has been for 40 years.

“All these energies are ‘sinister’ (or Left Hand Path, if you prefer) -at the most simple level this means they enhance our creative evolution; at another, it means they ‘disrupt’ already existing forms which may hinder such evolution and explication of individual potential.” – Steven Brown Letters [to Dr. Aquino]; ONA, Hostia, 1990

Note: The above is a cool quote. In it “AL” uses the term “Sinister” the way it is most often used in ONA, and he gives the term its actual meaning. The word Sinister does not actually mean Draconian, Demonic, Maniacal, Psychopathic, etc. It actually just means “Left,” from the actual Latin for Left. And in this quote AL even briefly gives a simple but enlightening summary of what the Sinister Path or Left Hand Path is or means in the ONA. It is nothing diabolical or fiendishly heinous as your average mundane will believe the word to mean. That’s what the word means in their mind. And they project their meaning onto the ONA, never stopping to realize that perhaps the ONA and its initiates have their own definition and use of the word. And yet – and yet – these mundanes insist that they are individuals. If you are a genuinely individuated person, shouldn’t you know and understand that Other People have their own Minds, and thus Other People also have their own apprehension, shade of meaning, and usage of words? I seriously doubt that your average minded mundane [was that redundant?] really grasps what the term “Other People” actually means.

“On the practical level, this means that the societies must be made the breeding ground for the tactical forms chosen. The peoples must yearn for something -and what they yearn for must be given to them. That is, their instinctive yearning will be controlled, psychically, via sinister Adepts.” – ONA Strategy And Tactics; ONA, Hostia II, ~1992

Note: You have to learn how to understand the common idiot, the public, the mass. The common mass – regardless of how much they reject collectivism and insist on being individuals, socially acts, reacts, and moves as a herd or non-individuated mass. They move or yearn en masse for the same thing at any given time. Case in point: How many users does facebook have? Why is Apple Inc the most wealthiest corporation? What do I mean by move en masse as a herd socially? I mean in 2004 MySpace was the biggest thing to hit cyberspace. Everybody was into it. Now MySpace is dead. What happened? All of the dummies as a social herd of human cattle migrated en masse somewhere else. Where did they all go? Answer: How many users are on facebook?

These common Mundanes are cattle. They socially and psychologically move – behave – as a giant incoherent group. They yearn collective – within the limits of a generation or two – for things. If this concept of collective yearning were not true, then Apple Inc cannot be the most wealthiest corporation. I pads would not be selling and be the talk and star-commodity of mundanerville. You would not have 2 billion Christians in the world all yearning for the same salvation. It’s how group minds, group dynamics, and group psychology works. It’s why Sociology as a science is viable, and verifiable. Sociology treats people as a social group or mass, a blob.

But their collective yearning ripples out only for a generation or two. As a new generation emerges, that newly emerged generation as a collective has its own yearning and wants. And you can look to Tibet for your proof of this phenomenon. The generation of the 1950-1960 in Tibet collectively yearned to be free from China, and they still do. The newly emerged contemporary generation collectively yearn for Chinese music, Chinese words, Chinese culture, Chinese fashion. This is how cultural liquidation occurs, in the mass yearning of each successive generation.

So when we observe the mass yearning of the mundane cattle, we can refer to this mass as the “market.” Learning to spot the yearning of a new generation is when you are able to take your eyes off of the out going mass and pay close attention to what are called “Niche Markets.” A Niche Market sociologically would be like a “tear” in a fabric. Or a crack in a dam. They start small within an incoming generation, and may be hard to see. With each emerging generation the tear gets bigger, until when time has past and the out going generation has died, the Niche Market yearnings have replaced the old needs and desires. Nobody yearns for black and white televisions today. Nobody even yearns for a cell phone made 10 years ago. I’ll point out a tear in the Market which ONA now safely dominates without competition. In LaVey’s time Satanists were very critical of Buddhism. The Satanic Bible itself did not have much good to say about Buddhism.

Today, you can now barely begin to notice that a niche market had torn where a new generation of Satanists are seeking new knowledge and memes in Buddhism and other Eastern schools of thought to supplement their own understandings. And this same tiny niche market has now shifted its “Satanic Paradigm” to seeing life as a quest to gain an understanding of Self and World. In other words, the Niche Market is incorporating Natural Philosophy from both the West and the East. Natural Selection will take place where today’s Satanic groups must either give the new yearning market what they need, or become irrelevant, die out to be replaced. As ONA initiates, you have to learn to spot those cracks before competition does, and then make new forms accordingly. To own or dominate these cracks and tears, is to gain an influence in the minds of the future, and thus the societies or social order such new minds will express and manifest.

This isn't in any way saying that an ONA person is not Human. It's human nature to be a part of a group and to follow your group. There are several differences though. One difference is that there is a conscious or deliberate choice to act or behave in a certain way, or get involved with certain things. The other major difference is that there is an understanding that such behaviour is human and natural. It becomes a different and stupid matter when your mundane Satanism teaches some doctrine of non-conformity and extreme individuality, but yet you hypocritically follow the large incoherent mass.

The last major difference to consider is what a herd is, as opposed to something like an army or ant colony. There is a difference sociologically and biologically speaking. You can see the difference if you compare a mafia or Organized Criminal organization with the random criminals of a given city. What's the difference? The difference is that the number of random criminals in a city may be committing the same crimes as the mafia, but they are incoherent and not organized. A herd of cattle is not an organized coherent entity. It's just a field of many cows. A city of criminals does not equal coherency and organization. It's disorganized and incoherent. Which is why – think about this hard – if a general gives an order to an army, his order is carried out almost immediately. If a mayor were to give an order or make a request to his citizens in his city, the collective response time would be much slower, if they even respond. In relation to the big and incoherent urban order that surrounds an ONA person, ONA is like an organ is to a body. It is slightly more specialized and organized than the random herd of city-state citizenry.

Organized entities last or live shorter time spans than disorganized entities. One is a reproductive organ of the other which only forms in response to condition, and/or to Seed something in the Causal. To better understand this phenomenon, let's take mushrooms. The mushroom itself is actually the coherent and organized reproductive organs of mycelium. The mycelium itself is shapeless, formless, and very hard to see. It lives inside the ground in dark moist spots and is very big. When a spot becomes dry of nutrients the mycelium reacts to the condition by organizing its cells into a coherent entity. That coherent entity becomes a stalk which pushes out of the ground, which is the mushroom. The mushroom of course makes and spreads the spores of the mycelium. Stepping on the mushroom doesn't kill or harm the actual non-organized mycelium.

Human culture, not as a memplex, but as a group of people, is the mycelium. Culture on the human level is formless, leaderless, shapeless, headless, and non-organized. This is so to help this culture live long. You have something like Brahminical culture in India which is thousands of years old. And you have thousand year old European cultures. From time to time this non-organized culture produces organized "bodies" within it. So as an example you have the Catholic Church within Southern European culture. That church is the Mushroom of the mycelium of Romanesque European culture. It is the reproductive organ with which that cultural entity seeds itself in other places. And you look very closely at the color scheme and symbolism the priests of this church uses unconsciously. They wear white, or white is regarded in a special manner. Sperm is white. They have wands that sprinkle holy water. They have specialized "cells" or units [missionaries] which carries a bundle of memes which they send out. Just like sperm carries a bundle of information and is cast out. The sperm itself does not contain all of the information of its originating organism, just the basic genes. And so the Roman Catholic Church does not contain all of the “genetic” information of old Romanesque European culture, just the basics.

So you watch history very closely. You see this Catholic Church send out its sperm cells into indigenous lands such as the Mayan, Incan empires, and the Philippines. How do most empires and nations symbolically personify the spirit of their empire or nation? As a female. The empire or nation as a body is the female, with her own genetic information. The missionaries are the sperm used to attempt to inoculate that female body with outside genetic information. Once the “female” culture/nation takes the genetic information from the missionaries, we see something take place aeonically over time. We see an increase in the “Europeanization” of the indigenous population. In fact, just as you would expect in biology, you see Latin America and the Philippines actually become Hybrid entities, mixed with their old indigenous genetic information, and with the new Romanesque European cultural memes.

Another example would be Buddhism. The dis-coherent entity is Brahminical India. The only problem with what we refer to as Brahmanism/Hinduism is that it’s people specific and highly incoherent. This makes it genetically less able to seed outside cultures. So Buddhism is the answer. Buddhism is nothing more than a refined species of Brahmanism/Hinduism made and tailored to be spreadable. It has been stripped away of the memetic parts which are people and place specific such as the Vedas, Caste System, and so on. But the essence – and even most of the deities – are all still accounted for. So Buddhism is the organized reproductive organ of Brahminical culture. And just like a reproductive organ and its counter part in Southern Europe, Buddhism sent out missionaries into foreign lands in ancient times. Egypt was seeded, China, Southeast Asia, and now the West. And we see that the “female” receptive bodies [nations/culture] which takes those Seeds, produce Hybrid people and social orders. They have a mixture of their original culture, but also Brahminical cultural memes and practices, worldviews, and so on.

You have to learn to pay very, very close attention to how those old time tested reproductive organs work at seeding foreign people with a worldview. It’s an important bit of knowledge and skill for the ONA. Pay no attention to the belief system itself. That’s not the main mechanism something like Catholicism and Buddhism gets foreign people to adopt a new worldview, paradigm, and so on. When missionaries spread Catholicism inside a new receptive culture, specialized lexicons and Latin is used. You have lexical words like “Baptism,” “Eucharist,” “Host,” “Saviour,” “Pope,” “Church,” “Sin,” and so on with Catholicism. With Buddhism you have lexical words in Sanskrit and Pali such as “Karma,” “Dhamma,” “Sangha,” and so on.

What do we know about words and language? We know that the words we think in have an absolute influence on how we see and understand reality. Before a person can wholly adopt a belief system or new paradigm, his weltanschauung has to be subverted by those specialized words. The words bypasses their mental immune system because they are not technically foreign beliefsets. They are just words with perhaps definitions. But the words themselves act like genetic coding or digital coding which has been inserted into their cell or operating system. The words influences how they think and see things. They act like primer. After the primer, then you can paint them with the beliefs and foreign ideas.

Before you can make peasants into Communists, you subvert their mindscape with innocent useful word, like Bourgeois, Proletarian, Capital. They are innocent words peasants can adopt and use. But those words have a deeper sinister purpose. It infects how the peasants see themselves and their world. Then you start telling them what they want and need to hear. The rich are bad, Jews need to go, the worker makes the nation and should therefore lead, and so on. And it's incredibly effective. You end up with peasants turned into rebel Proletarians killing for a party. Then the USSR falls, and a change of words is employed by a new political and economic order. Instead of Proletarian, the word "Citizen" is now used. The same common group of people adopt that word, and the behaviour and reaction changes, along with their worldviews and paradigm. The public are no longer rebel proletarians, they are productive citizens of a democracy. Look closely though, and you notice nothing real has ever changed. The leader types still lead, the common mass are still subjects of a regime.

Religion is not the only means a culture sporifies. Any Organized entity which forms within the matrix of its mother culture is a reproductive organ, this includes Political Parties, and secret societies. You have Germany and out of that Germany you have National Socialism. The National Socialism seeds other minds and cultures. So you see in time that those countries or people who adopt National Socialism take on a hybrid "German" flavour and worldview. Incorporations are cultural reproductive organs. Remember old world British colonies first began as territory owned and occupied by a Company. Whatever happened to that old Hudson Bay Company? Why, it aeonically developed into what we today call Canada, which looks and feels like it's parent. Democracy as an institution is the reproductive organ of what we might call the Occidental Order. We see that whatever country adopts democracy, suspiciously takes on a Western flavour. At the moment the East is behind since it relies on things like Buddhism to inseminate World Order with its Oriental Order, which doesn't work as well as democracy.

It's very hard to change a culture because of the lack in coherency of its units/cells. This is a defense mechanism, since it must live long to try to seed humanity. A miniature example would be the constructed language of Esperanto. After about 150 years since it was born, Esperanto collected a very large following globally. That following is the cultural body, which is composed of an incoherent collection of people who learn to speak the language. Over the years many people have criticized faults in Esperanto, and so reform movements started. Those reform movements tried to change words around, add new words, remove old words, etc. None ever worked. Why? Because the cultural body itself is disorganized and made up of random unconnected people. Even if you get some to adopt your changes, you have not changed Esperanto. A living culture is beyond the control of any single person. It is it's own entity.

We in the ONA can see this on a very practical level. For a while several years ago Old Guards like DarkLogos tried to state that the Black Book of Satan II & III were not a real part of the ONA. They tried to push that idea very often. But it was futile. Because a living tradition or culture is beyond the control and dictates of any person simply because the ONA is composed of disorganized cellular units. You would have to get every ONA person to agree that the BBS 2 & 3 are not ONA, and that is futile now because ONA is now a living tradition. I think it's a good thing. The living tradition itself held onto the BBS 2 & 3; even if AL were to decree otherwise. It's like a child you give birth too. When the child – or your baby cousin – is small it's easy to control it and tell it what to do. Just like in the early days, it may have been easy for AL to tell ONA what to do and be. But when the child becomes a teenager, it becomes harder to control the teen and tell it what to do. It reacts negatively. We've all been teens. When the child becomes an adult, then there is no more control. The adult is its own person, with it's own mind, life, and destiny.

In ONA, the Causal Forms which have and may develop within its cultural matrix is the organized reproductive organ of the mycelium of ONA. Each form has the basic genetic information of its parent, with specialized memes, words, and ideas. The forms inseminate foreign bodies around ONA. But we can see that because ONA is still very young, it is clumsy with its reproductive organs. Like a young teen just coming into the awareness of its own sexuality and reproductive capabilities. It will take time, trial, and error for ONA to be a stud muffin.

Give the people what they want, the quote states. Like in real life girls know what they want and need. If you are a guy, and you can't sense what a girl wants and needs, then you're not getting any. Other guys who are more experience, who can sense what the girl wants and needs will get to inseminate her. So ONA people have to learn to sense and intuit what the people want, and make forms to penetrate them. But we're all human, with the same human nature. Just as they yearn, ONA people need an yearn. The ONA as a living entity has its needs. And just like them, we are group oriented. But must you be hypocritical and self loathing because of it?

"The whole of Satanism is a defiance against the religious attitude. Satanism is a rebellion against all those forms which hold or try to hold our existence, our being, in thrall -and the most potent form of thralldom has been and still is, religion. Religion emasculates us -whether it be overtly, via a religion, or covertly by a religious attitude such as is evident in political or social zealotry, in conformity to a dogma and an authority. Satanism, in essence, is an individual defiance -an individual pride, an individual striving, an individual quest for excellence. It is about fulfilling the potential inherent in our existence -and this means finding and fulfilling our unique Destinies. Satanism means self-effort, self-learning, self-experience: it means each individual striving to become like a god; striving to be like the Prince of Darkness Himself." – Concerning The Temple Of Set; Anton Long, Hostia II, ~1992

"There is no easy way, no easy path, to Adeptship. The journey takes years, and involves self-effort, self-discovery, unaided. It Involves triumphs, and mistakes -and learning from one's mistakes. But perhaps most of all it involves a commitment and a learning from practical experience." – Adeptship – Its Meaning And Significance; ONA, Hostia III, 1992

"As Aeschylus once explained Pathei Mathos; one can learn through adversity/suffering and so achieve wisdom." – Mastery – Its Real Meaning & Significance; ONA, Hostia III, 1990

Note: The word "Pathei Mathos" in the original facsimile is in Greek letters. I think this is the earliest dated document in ONA where the word and concept of "Pathei-Mathos" was used. It's just very, very interesting to take careful note of the date.

"They [Satanists] might be real heretics -fighting against the State either politically or via armed warfare if that State (as most Western ones do) upholds the Nazarene sickness of spirit (evident in modern political ideas like 'liberalism' and 'humanism' and 'equality': the triumph of the worthless at the expense of the noble)." – Satanism – Or Living On The Edge; ONA, Hostia III, 1991

"It amuses me -and has amused me -when I come into contact with modern. self-professed 'Satanists'. Be such people a part of some 'Temple' or 'Church' or 'cult', or be they working on their own. With a few notable exceptions, these people are ridiculous -for them, Satanism IS an intellectual philosophy, a collection of rituals, and/or an anarchic attitude. For them, it IS an object of study, and involves meetings, discussions. For them, it IS communal. and involves 'ethics' and/or a religious approach and attitude. For them, it IS a glorification of their ego and a wallowing in the pleasures and wealth this existence can offer: an excuse for self-indulgence and lack of self-discipline." – Song Of A Satanist; Anton Long; Hostia III, 1990

"The notion of self-responsibility is as mentioned above, crucial to the LHP and accordingly any organization which claims to be of the LHP and which does not uphold this in both theory and practice is a fraudulent organization. In practice this means that an organization does not restrict the experiences of its members -it does not, for instance, impose upon them any binding authority which the members have to accept or face 'expulsion' just as it does not lay down for them any codes of behaviour or ethics. That is, it does not promulgate a dogma which the members have to accept as it does not require those members to be obedient to what the hierarchy says. There is no "proscription" of certain views, or individuals or other organizations as there is no attempt to make members conform in terms of behaviour, attitudes, views, opinions, expressions or anything else." – The Left Hand Path, An Analysis; ONA, Hostia III, ~1992

"Satanism is not merely attending nor even conducting ceremonies or rituals of a 'Black Magick' kind. Nor does Satanism mean or imply membership of an avowedly Satanic group. Neither is Satanism merely the enjoyment of material delights. Rather, Satanism – quintessentially – is an attitude and a way of living.

*"This attitude expresses a strength of character – a belief in oneself and one's Destiny. Part of this is pride, and part of it is defiance: an individuality, a dislike of limits. However, perhaps the most important part is a self-knowledge or self-mastery born from having gone to and often beyond one's physical, mental and moral limits." – The Quintessence Of Satanism; ONA, Hysteron Proteron, 1989

"Membership of the ONA basically means an individual following the Seven-Fold Way as explicated in the various Order MSS. Members should understand that they are thus part of an Order which has long-term aims -of centuries and more. By actively following and using the methods and rites of the Order they are actively aiding those aims." – The Aims Of The ONA; ONA, Sacramentum Sinisterum, 1997

"Satanic reasoning, and the judgement of a 'thing', derive from direct personal experience. Thus, for the Satanist, there can be no real understanding of something until that something is lived. Before then, understanding is merely academic, relying as it does on the validity of sources other than one's own experience." – Makrokosmos; ONA, Sacramentum Sinistrum, 1997

Historical Addendum: Reductio Ad Absurdum:

The individual responsible for the present codification of ONA (in the form of the seven-fold way, Star Game etc.) does not claim any supra-personal authority for that codification (in the form of Satan/Set or an extra-terrestrial intelligence) or indeed for the creativity, which was its essence. Neither does he claim any authority via having belonged to some ancient and mysterious group whose "Master" taught and Initiated him.

The truth is simple, and a little ordinary. He was fortunate perhaps in spending most of his childhood and early youth in Africa and the Far East where, in the former, he grew up among people who believed in pagan practices and witchcraft, and, in the latter, he came in contact with many and various traditions including LHP Taoist magic and Martial Arts. All this formed a somewhat unusual education (there is no claim to being “Initiated” into any form) and provided a continuing interest in esoteric arts. This curiosity, interest together with his keen intellect, enthusiasm and zest for danger let him to, in later youth, to not only seek out LHP groups in Europe but also into many interesting and diverse experiences, and in the late sixties he was Initiated into some LHP groups/underground Satanic Temples.

His diverse experiences then and later (some dangerous, some at variance with prevailing social dogma, many dark, some heretical) provided useful background for an Occult and personal synthesis and led to him taking responsibility for a small LHP group. The teaching of this group were rather garbled, full of mystifications and occasional insights, but they did provide some basis for creative extension.

Thus, the new synthesis that was the seven-fold way was created. The original LHP group had no historical significance and did not claim among its former members any person of significance on any level – it was simply a reclusive circle of a few individuals oriented toward the Black Arts whose teachings (such as they were) centred around a septenary approach to magickal alchemy and a “mythology” about the Dark Gods. (It should be noted that the other LHP groups he joined derived their magic from a mixture of Crowley/Golden Dawn/demonism or were rather boring, lacking Satanic zest).

In the early years of the eighth decade of the present century a decision was made to publish the tradition of this small group (the ONA – as it came to be called some decades earlier) together with the new codification. Some of the traditional material concerned Sacrifice and some related to the Dark Gods mythos.

No one within this group believes these traditions and methods are unalterable or invested with “supernatural” authority. As expressed in such published works as “Naos” and “The Black Book” they are a practical method of achieving magickal Adeptship and extending consciousness into the next stage of its development.

Thus the ONA has no structure because no structure is needed – its members may guide others if those others wish, such guidance occurring because those members have themselves undergone (to a greater or lesser extent depending on their own personal development) the tasks of the seven-fold way and can thus offer advise from experience.

It is as absurdly simple as that.

-Reductio Ad Absurdum; ONA, 1989

Closing Remarks

So those were a number of quote from classic ONA MSS & Documents. Most are dated between 1989-1992. All of these quotes come from PDF facsimiles of xeroxed copies of booklets ONA people in phase 2 [snail mail days] created, and distributed during that past era. It is impossible because of this for mundanes to claim that “we” doctored our documents to make ONA look and sound cool. The fact is ONA doesn’t have to be doctored to look and sound cool. It is cool, and has been cool for 40 years.

It’s just took 20 years for you mundane Satanists to catch up to our coolness. To appreciate what ONA has been trying to say for so long. Not even to some generalized “ONA.” But to its unsung intellectual heavy weight, “Anton Long,” and the other heavy weight “Christos Beest.” You spent 20 years talking trash about them, disregarding them, calling them fakes. And now you liberally borrow from their past works to develop your own mundane Satanism. You mundanes truly do live up to your descriptor: Anariya [Ignoble/ Dishonourable]. There isn’t a shred of nobility or honour in your flesh and blood as a breed of people. It’s the very essence of what makes a human a worthless peasant, a serf: Common, Ignoble, devoid of Honour.

An institution or culture is very much like a body. The body needs both a brain and a heart. In the past Anton Long served as the Brain of the ONA, with his type of contributions. Beesty Boy was the Heart of ONA, with the art and imagery, the music and chants, the finer and “softer” contributions which tugs at our hearts. Both are needed to inspire us to think and feel. Because as humans, we have been created – or evolved – to both think and feel. When one is lost, there is an imbalance in “the force.” There also has to be a place in ONA for the balance of gender, both an animus and an anima. Boys do the territory thing with land and ideas, expanding and so on. Girls work the domestic home front and bond, maintaining the culture and social order.

The classic quotes above point out a number of very important notions many in and out of ONA forget or disregard. One point is that ONA has no special history. It has a mythos but not a super spectacular history. It was simply start by one or two guys in Shropshire of all places and then a small number of their friends got involved. Another point is that ONA never had a leader or some central authority figure.

Another point is that ONA has no structure or hierarchy. This means it’s not structured like a Church of Satan or an OTO where you can send an application to request membership and join. It has no structure period. There is nothing to send a request for membership to. No leader, no building, no group. Membership in ONA basically means putting the Seven Fold Way into living practice, and working on your own toward adeptship, via a cultivation of experiences and going beyond your limits. This is one thing mundane Satanists just don’t get. They don’t get that you can’t practice or live ONA on the internet. You just simply can’t do the Seven Fold Way or experience anything in cyberspace. There is no such thing as an internet ONA person. There are ONA people online using the internet, and the internet is a very useful tool, but you can’t do what is ONA online.

Another point is that from the early days, ONA was constructed to be adopted by anyone interested who had Codex Saerus, Naos, and the other core booklets as a guide. Those core books gave you a Self Initiation ritual to do, it gave you the entire Seven Fold Way to work on. You do ONA on your own. Later you may chose to make your own temple/nexion, or join one. Joining a group is what requires the tests, face to face meet up, and so on. Because such groups need to get to know you and learn to trust you.

Another point most mundanes don't want to pay attention to is that from the beginning ONA has been an "Open Source" entity. Anybody within ONA can add and change things. You can add your own writings and booklets, change what needs to be changed. This doesn't mean that every individual ONA person will adopt your changes though. Remember, ONA is a living tradition now, so it is hard to force your changes onto the whole ONA. People like DarkLogos couldn't even do it when for a while he tried to make the Black Books of Satan 2 & 3 not a part of ONA. He couldn't do it, because collectively the ONA likes and needs those books. They are a part of the Tradition of ONA. This is how a living culture or tradition grows. Everyone has the equal chance to introduce new things into a culture, but there is no guarantee that those who make up the culture will like or adopt what you introduce.

For example nothing is stopping anybody from changing and recreating Codex Saerus. You can do it. But will the many independent people that make up the living Tradition adopt it? This is where social skills are needed if you want to have some sort of influence on ONA. Or at least be determined to spend a lot of time to distribute your ideas over many years. Introducing change into a living tradition takes Time, generations. Whereas in an autocratic framework such as the Church of Satan or something, the High Priest can make a dictate and his servile minions will have to adopt the policy or get kicked out. Be glad ONA isn't like that. It's a Tradition, not a structured organization or church, or temple. You can try to be the "leader" of ONA, but how many of the independent Initiates and nexions will like you and "vote" for you as their leader? How many ONA people will subserviently submit themselves and give up their individual autonomy and sovereignty to let you be their "leader?" To let you dictate to them what to believe, how to see the world, and how to live their lives? Submission is the total opposite of the spirit of Defiance of ONA. If you are in ONA and you have that mentality and attitude of looking for or needing phallus worship, an authority, leader, a Jesus, breasts to suckle on, then I don't think you are in the right place.

One great thing about a culture is that not every one will like each other. Do all Americans love other Americans and agree with every other American? No. I hate most other Americans actually. In a culture there is no set or defined morality or ethics. There only exists the sentiments shared by some people. If you rape a person and go to prison, you are still America with the right to vote still. It's just that the people you live around might not like what you did because of their personal sentiments and beliefs. So when you get put into prison, it is not the cultural entity of America that rejects you. It's a group of people and their private sentiments and beliefs. It's not like a religion where if you are a Jew and you work on the Sabbath, you are stoned to death. It's not like a Church of Satan where if you do something against their rules you are no longer a mundane Satanist.

ONA culture means Culture. You don't have to like other ONA people, you don't have to get a long with them, and they might not like you and what you do. If you do something others in ONA don't like or agree with, you are still ONA. It's just that some ONA people had an asscow over what you did. Individuality really means Individuality in ONA. You're on your own, and don't let other ONA people's private sentiments and beliefs stop you from being your own person. If you fuck up, then the consequences of your actions and mistakes are entirely yours to reap and learn from. But ONA people know their own Kind. So if you don't actually belong, people will react and shun you in some way. Blackwood tried to belong and tried to be leader, and he got ridiculed and "thrown" out of ONA, because he didn't belong. A crystal knows what kind of molecules belongs in its crystalline lattice. A pack of wolves knows who and what belongs, knows friend from foe; knows kindred from Other. The acausal ONA entity knows what types of people are its causal cells. Even if we don't always get a long and agree, we're still a pack, with a shared Tradition, shared mythos, shared culture, shared worldview, shared language, shared customs, shared rites, shared Sinister Dialectic, shared aims, and shared Way.

Self-development via direct experience and adversity has been a fundamental concept of ONA from day one. If I could break ONA down to a simple sentence or phrase, it would be that. Self-Development Via Direct Experience & Adversity. It's the spirit of ONA. Everything else rests on that cornerstone. There is no moral system in ONA because nothing and nobody has the power to limit your potential for growth from your own experiences. There is no leader in ONA because no person has the power to limit or dictate what you can and should experience and learn from. There is no dogma or doctrine in ONA because no idea or idealism has the power to say what you can or cannot personally experience and learn from. ONA must grow and develop because as each of its causal cells grows and changes from our own personal experiences and Pathei-Mathos, the acausal organism we are cells of will change and evolve. All ONA MSS are basically are guidelines, or maps to help each individual Initiate find their own way. The map stops at a certain point, and from there, it is up to each individual Initiate to cut out their own trail, for the next generation to find and walk.

ONA FOR ROOKIES

ONA For Rookies

ONA for rookies. What it is, how to “join” it, and what to do with it. In Q&A format since I like that format.

Q1. What is the ONA?

A1. ONA stands for “Order of Nine Angles.” Honestly ONA is 40 years worth of paperwork and creative writing. That’s as down to earth and realistic as I can get. We’re talking about thousands and thousands of pages of writings we call “Manuscripts,” or “ONA MSS.” Most of these writings come from a few key people who just write a lot. “Anton Long” himself has over the 40 years written over 4000-5000 pages worth of ONA MSS. In the past they were scattered around, but these days many of them have been compiled into huge PDF books and archived. “Christos Beast” or now better known as Beesty Boy is the second Niner to write ONA stuff. Besides these two Old Guards, there are two key Nexions [an ONA group] that add onto the ONA “paper temple.” A Nexion called the Temple of THEM over the years has written thousands of pages. And then this Nexion [WSA352] currently has added around 1500 pages worth of stuff to the ONA corpus.

For the sake of convenience I call all of those thousands and thousands of pages of manuscripts that build up the ONA corpus [body] a “Memplex.” A memplex is more than just a bunch of ideas. It also includes the rites, ceremonies, customs, practices, and culture of a people or group. With ONA, it does have its own practices, rites, rituals, ceremonies, and traditions.

Besides being a Memplex the ONA is also a “Mythos.” Here I use the word mythos in a sociological way, so it does not mean a myth; they are two different words. A mythos in sociology is a people’s paradigm, their cultural set of values, their shared history, the way they explain the world, the way they understand the world, the character or “aura” of a people. So if we understand these two words sociologically, then we will know that these two words sort of overlaps in the middle somewhere like two circles overlapping.

So for example when Chinese people say that Man is the union of Heaven and Earth, that is a part of their people’s Mythos. When a group of American Indians do a rain dance because they believe such dance will bring rain, that tradition of rain dancing is a part of their people’s Mythos. Mythos is very important because it is the spring or fountainhead of what we call Human Culture. It is from a shared Mythos that a people develops a common culture. When I use the word “Culture” here, it is interchangeable with the word “Memplex.” A culture is a coherent system of customs, observances, traditions, practices, which a people share.

For example nodding our heads to mean “yes” is a meme of a larger memplex. But this meme is not universal. In places like some regions of India and nearby regions, the cultural meme for “yes,” is to wiggle their head from side to side or shoulder to shoulder. French kissing is a meme of a greater Western Memplex, which is also not universal. Other cultures have their own meme which expresses a deep intimacy between two people who love and desire each other.

The most important thing to keep in mind here is that for a Memplex and Mythos to express itself in our human world, it needs humans to do the expressing. In ONA talk this person or group of people who does the Expressing of ONA memes and mythos into our physical human world is called a “Nexion.” The word comes from Anton Long’s spelling of Connexion. It suggests that the “Nexion” is the connecting point between ideas and theories or principles and practice and action. A Nexion is where the memplex and mythos is Born in the world as culture, practice, and such. And so we can say accurately that such ideas and memes Before they are expressed and Born are not real. To be real they need people like you and me. Much like how a picture of a building drawn on a blueprint is fake and not real. That drawing needs people to manifest it through their work and action to make it real. All things in our human world begins as ideas in the realm of mind. It is through each of us that such ideas are born into the world as real things. The ONA, therefore – like anything else – needs people to give it life and reality.

Q2. How did the ONA start?

A2. It started in the 1960’s when three Dark neopagan groups named Camlad, The Noctulians, and The Temple of the Sun united. At the time the number of members in this United group was 10-12 people. It’s important to keep in mind that the ONA was born from the Dark Pagan tradition, and it still essentially is a Dark Pagan tradition today. During this decade it is known that a local news station video recorded one of these original three groups performing a neopagan rite for a local story they were doing. The place these original three groups were active in was Shropshire England, which is the epicenter from where ONA slowly spread.

Now there is a bit of controversy concerning the origins of the term “Nine Angles” that I wouldn’t want the Rookie to be ignorant of. The controversy started with Michael Aquino claiming in the past that the ONA borrowed the term “Nine Angles” from his Ceremony of the Nine Angles rite. This claim is re-enforced by the fact that Aquino’s rite was published for public consumption in 1972, which was around the same year that the ONA began calling itself the Order of Nine Angles.

If you look at the actual rite in question you will see that in this rite the term “Nine Angles” tried to refer to a specific group of nine “entities” referred to as “angles. In the ONA memplex and mythos no such nine entities, or homage to such entities exists. So first, any similarities is superficial: in name and wording only.

Many mundanes will agree with this claim, and they have every right to. But such agreement is based on a cultural myopia. Meaning that in general those that do agree to this claim are only aware of generically available pop-occulture books and grimoires. So they make their assumptive agreements based on that myopia.

It is known that the person behind Anton Long used untranslated Arabic texts on occasion as a source of inspiration to develop the ONA. A Professor from a University in Morocco named Connell Monette during an interview with the person behind Anton Long was familiar with an ONA book called Naos and he was familiar with several – or many – untranslated Arabic texts. The Professor recognized similarities between Naos and one Arabic text on magic in particular called the Shams i-Maaraf. So Anton Long was asked if he did actually read the Shams i-Maaraf manuscript and if Naos was inspired in anyway by it. Anton Long confirmed it. If you have ever seen the Shams manuscript, it is entirely in Arabic photocopied from what looks like an old book. The Shams is considered one of two of the great Arabic manuscripts on magic. Professor C.M., was kind enough to give me a copy of the Shams MS.

Anton Long claims that he got the term “Nine Angles” from another such untranslated Arabic manuscript he calls the “al Katib al Alfak,” which he describes as an old alchemical text. There are several problems of verification with this claim. The first problem is that “Anton Long” is a clever trickster and is known to use intentional misspellings of words to throw people off track. The second problem was pointed out to me by Professor CM who states that with these untranslated and unpublished Arabic texts, there is no Label or single title. One person can call a manuscript by one label or title, and another call the same manuscript by a completely different label. So the only way to tell if we are dealing with the same manuscripts is to actually compare them side by side. The Professor states that he does not doubt that Anton Long has a copy of or has read a manuscript he [Anton Long] refers to as a “al katib al alfak,” but that there is no way of knowing what other names this manuscript is called unless its content and writings are studied and compared.

Personally all I know is that the notion or meme of “nine angles” is not alien to the Middle East region and people. The easiest examples of the use of “nine angles” in mystical context would be the Enneagram and what is known as the Sufi Enneagram which looks slightly different. I am also personally aware that certain Sufi orders gives mystical meanings to “nine angles.” One being the Naqshbandi Order which – so I have encountered – uses a design/symbol with nine angles which is given mystical meaning. Another Sufi order now dormant were the al-Bonaim who constructed the al Asque Mosque [Dome of the Rock] in Jerusalem. The al Asque is octagonal [8 sided] but is said to have a mystical 9th side or angle. So all I can say about this controversy is to leave your options open and actually try to do your own research before jumping to conclusions and assumptions and just agreeing with the most easily agreeable claims. The mentally lazy will take the easiest route.

Q3. How do I “join” the ONA.

A3. Like you would “join” a culture: You don’t. I’ll use the Skater subculture as an example. Let’s say you want to be a Skater. How do you “join” the Skater subculture? You don’t. You go out and buy a skate board and Learn to ride it. Now, if you don’t ride your board good or you just carry it around and you call yourself a “Skater,” then those Skaters who have been into this subculture for a long time who know a lot of board tricks will call you a Poser or “wannabe.” The only way to not be a Poser here it to work on gaining the respect of your Skater peers. You do this by working on being as good as they are on their boards, practice on your board tricks, and you forge bonds and friendships with other Skaters to adopt their subculture. In essence “anybody” can be or claim to be a Skater, but to actually be one means work, practice [praxis], and living the subculture.

ONA is no different. Anybody can claim and can be ONA. ONA is just a memeplex and mythos of a subculture made in the 60’s. But if you make claims that you are ONA and you just carry that label around and you don’t know anything about it, people in ONA who have been in it a while will consider you a Poser or “wannabe.” You have to work on familiarizing yourself with the subculture, with the mythos, and study the many ONA MSS to gain a competent Knowledge of the ONA. But Knowledge is only the first step.

To Know something means that you have only become consciously aware of that something. Like when I say: “I Know what a watch is.” Once you Know something the next step is to gain the Wisdom of that something. Wisdom is Knowledge applied for results. Wisdom is the actual experimentation and act of experiencing [praxis] that something. In the watch example after I know what a watch is I take it apart to see what’s inside and I play around with the gears. The word “Wise” and “Way,” is the same word. As in Otherwise which means Other-Way. As in Anywise which is Any-Way. To be Wise or to have the Wisdom of something means you Know from experience the Way something works. So once I crack open my watch and study its insides I gain the Wisdom of how the watch actually works. Once I have experienced the wisdom, I then grow an Understanding of the nature of the watch. Understanding is the step when you have come to an inner realization [gnosis/buddhi] of something. After you have been in a few relationships to experience such, you come to an Understanding of how boys or girls work in relationships.

So ONA is no different. Just because you have read manuscripts and know ONA does not mean you Understand shit. Just because you bought a cool skate board, does not mean you Understand how it works, how hard it is to ride it and do tricks with it, and how to invent new tricks of your own. That understanding comes from praxis [experience, application] and Pathei-Mathos.

So if ONA is seriously something you want to “join” then just claim it and start banging and repping it, and give a little respect to those ONA Initiates who have walked the Sinister Way before you. Start somewhere and grow from there. Start with the Initiation system of the ONA with the first Degree or Grade and go from there. Start with Naos and put its stuff into practice. Collect ONA MSS as the first Degree states you do and study. But don't stop at study. Go all the way and gain the Wisdom and work for the eventual Understanding. But start somewhere.

ONA isn't an Order which has black lodges you go to to get initiated. Just like the Church of Satan is not a literal Church building. Just like the Temple of Set is not a literal temple building on a street corner somewhere. These are just words. Don't get so caught up in the superficial words where you can get past them. ONA is an Ordering of people who are drawn to the ONA memeplex and mythos, or who resonates with its “aura.” ONA stuff should describe you as a person, which is what “resonates” means. It should not be something you must try to be or conform to to be one. If you are an artist by nature, then you don't have to try or force yourself to be one. You just do it and grow into your mastery of art. If you love music same thing. You don't have to force yourself to conform to some identity of a musician. You just do it and grow into your mastery of your nature. ONA is the same way. If ONA describes your nature, then just do it and grow into the mastery of your “Sinister Nature.”

Q4. Can you explain what all these “phases” in ONA means?

A4. It's like H₂O has three basic phases. Phase one is the Vaporous state when the H₂O is a nebulous vapor. Phase two is when the H₂O Coagulates into liquid or water. Phase three is when the H₂O Crystallizes into solid ice. Every human invention we know of follows the same alchemical process of Becoming. It goes thru the Vapor Phase, Coagulation Phase, and Crystallization Phase. The automobile first began as a nebulous vapor of ideas in the mind of Ford. It attracted people who resonated with the idea. These people came together which to help make the idea real. After the investments and labour, the automobile is physically manufactured. America began as a vaorous idea. That idea coagulated into a group of people willing to put in energy to make the idea a reality. After the fighting and stuff, America became a real physical nation.

The ONA also went thru its phases of development. It's first phase was when a mythos and memeplex was actually out together. Aspects of a mythos does not always have to be true. The main function of the mythos is to draw in people who resonates with it so that Coagulation arises. An example would be the Knights Templar mythos found in Freemasonry. There is no historical proof that Templars created Freemasonry. In fact the oldest Templar mythos comes from Scottish lodges who have stated that its just mythos they put together to inspire their olden day members. Today that Templar mythos in Freemasonry magnetically is powerful enough to still inspire people.

There have been aspects of ONA mythos which have been believed by mundanes to be true or real. One such aspect of mythos is that ONA is some super secret Satanist society that is super hard to get into. This simply is not the truth. It is a part of mythos meant to produce a certain aura or vibe, so that in turn this aura draws in or attracts a certain kind of people.

Phase two in ONA took place during the late 90's all the way to the early 2000. This was the phase of spreading the memeplex and mythos to other people. During this stage of development the primary way to spread ONA was via snail mail. It was this time that ONA was a "PO Box Enterprise." Meaning that people like Christos Beest at one time with friends made all of these spiral bound ONA books and placed ads in magazines to sell them to interested people. I'll include some pictures of these ads for historic purposes.

Phase three is the Crystallization. Once the people have been drawn together, or once a core group has been formed, the work of constructing or building the actual physical Order and its culture can take place. Basically the thing to keep in mind is that stories, myths, legends, and claims made during the first and second phases in general are not factual. Meaning did the ONA ever exist as a secret society of Satanists bent on overthrowing governments? NO. The ONA back then was a very small group of friends numbering around 12. They were just very good at marketing the ONA by using such stories to captivate the imaginations of an audience. Currently the ONA – as of 2008 – is in Phase 3.

Q5. What is meant by “Causal Forms,” in ONA?

A5. A Causal Form is the Outer Expression or outer face of something. For example let's take you the reader as a living person. There are days when you will be happy inside, and so you express a happy you. There will be days when you are angry, and so you will be a bitch or a douche. There will be days when you feel stressed out or upset and so you will want to be isolated and let alone for a while. All of these Outer Expressions: the Happy You, the Bitch You, the Anti-Social You, are not who or what you really are. They are just expressions of different parts of you. They are not different things from you. They are aspects of you. They come and go. They lead others to the real you, if such others get to know you Beyond such Outer Faces. Just as when Brahmanism states that all deities and beings in the universe are different aspects of Brahma. Brahma is the blossomed lotus, and every god and person, creature, and human is a petal in that lotus. It is when we are able to use such petals or aspects as a Way Pointer that we learn to see and come to realize the reality of Brahma and the Cosmos. If we are stuck on the superficial faces, we will never know the real person. If I assume that you are simply a bitch because I can't see past how you express yourself during your bitchy days, then I will never know the real you will I.

The ONA has different Outer Expressions of Faces which are aspects of its Inner Essence. One such outer face is Dark Paganism, another is Traditional Satanism, another is the Dreccian Way, another is the Rounwytha Tradition, another is Reichsfolk National-Socialism, another is its more traditional understandings of the ancient oriental Left Hand Path, etc. All of these are “Causal Forms” of the ONA. But none of these are The ONA. They are superficial aspects of ONA, which can lead the Initiate to the “true person” of the ONA. If you get stuck on the superficial forms, you will never genuinely Understand the ONA. But you have to start somewhere. And such outer forms are only that: Starting Points. Tools used to manifest an end. If you understand this concept, you will understand that the ONA is not Satanic. ONA uses Satanism for an end, according to the Sinister Dialectic. If you are drawn to such forms, you may use them and label yourself a Satanist, but not all ONA Initiates are Satanists. Just like you may be drawn to a certain aspect of Brahma. It doesn't matter which Deva or Devi. They are all one. As Krishna said in the Bagavad Gita to Arjuna when he said that when people worship other gods, they worship him [Krishna] by proxy because he is All and Everything. Those superficial gods serve as a Way to bring you – draw you deeper – to know the Formless One Beneath The Forms.

Q6. Is there a leader of the ONA?

A6. Is there a leader of the Skater subculture? Is there a leader for the basketball subculture?

Is there a leader of the hip hop culture? NO! There are individuals who stand out and have a lot of influence in each of those subcultures though. ONA has a “phantom leader,” who is “Anton Long.” Anton Long is the only leader. The first and the last leader. The perpetual leader. But he is not a real person. He is an aspect of the ONA mythos. Anton Long was used by a certain someone to work on creating the ONA over the years, but this certain someone is now retired. Today “Anton Long” symbolically represents the whole corpus [body] of all the thousands of ONA manuscripts as well as our aural traditions which together is the memplex and mythos of ONA. That is the “leader,” and nobody speaks for every ONA person but this “Anton Long” because all that needs to be said had been written in the thousands and thousands of ONA MSS.

From the very beginning in the 70's ONA was and still is described as a very individualistic endeavour or quest for self-development. You alone in your own private life work on going through the 7 degrees of the Seven Fold Way. Nobody can do it for you and nobody is going to babysit you to do that shit. You either do or you don't. It's got nothing to do with following somebody as a leader and having them tell you to do shit. When you decide you want to be a Skater and you go out and buy a skate board, do you buy that board for yourself to practice or do you buy it for some leader to use? And do you need that skate board to be stamped and validated by some leader Skateboarder? You learn that shit on your own terms in your own personal life. You work on mastering it. It's got nothing to do with a leader or following somebody. But those mundanes just can't understand this because despite what they claim, they are trained and conditioned to look up to authority figures and leader. Are you like that? Are you mundane? If you need people to tell authoritatively what to do, and how to do things, then maybe ONA isn't for you? Go try the Church of Satan.

Q7. What can I do to help manifest ONA?

A7. Besides living ONA in your personal life, do whatever you gotta do. Spit your game, rep your shit, as Biggy puts it. Claim it, bang it, rep it, spread it, and then help evolve it.

I'm only good at sharing a certain kind of insight with ONA. Let me do my thing. I'm weak in many other areas in ONA. If you excel at magic or have a dharma for that magickal stuff, then step up and take over that department and develop something. You don't have to ask anybody. If you don't like the mystical shit or the magickal shit and you are good with the scholastic stuff, then step up and take over that department and let others follow their dharma. If you excel at doing artwork, then take over that department and develop art for ONA. If you are strong in music, then take over that department. If you like to publish books, then knock yourself out, nothing ONA has is copy righted. If your strong point is ritualism, then take over that department and develop new rituals for ONA, which we need. I'd actually like to see in future a Black Book of Satan IV which incorporates elements of both the Western and Eastern LHP. Like introducing Shiva and Kali into the mix. But this is not something I am strong at which is why the department is vacant. If ritualism is your shit, then take over that department. You don't have to ask nobody. Just contribute with whatever you are strong in, and be cooperative minded enough to keep out of other ONA developer's ways. This ONA is peer based and based on team work. Each person or nexion has their own projects they work on, and collectively together, it adds up to the growth, development, and evolution of ONA.

It's been the nature and internal culture of the ONA since olden days to keep developing ONA, which I think is the coolest part about ONA. ONA changes from decade to decade. ONA people come age go and contribute their shit to ONA. Each contribution adds life to ONA and evolves it. There is something alive and dynamic or organic about ONA. It never stays the same things for long. Just like a living person is always changing, growing, and becoming someone new. You just can't get that with those mundane occult institutions and mundane Satanism. ONA is organic and is open to being further developed. All it takes is just for you to step up and put in your dharma. Don't ask. Just start doing your shit and let your work talk for you. If you got what the "spirit" of the ONA needs, then you will find other Niners grow a respect for your work. If not try harder. This is all a Rookie in ONA needs to know to start them off in the right direction. Don't matter how old you are. If you are magnetically drawn to ONA, and you want to be a part of it, these seven answers are all you need to point you onto the Sinister Way. The rest of the Way – all the walking and learning from Pathei-Mathos – is up to you.

ONA GOES TO COLLEGE!

ONA Goes To College!

The Order of Nine Angles is going to University, literally. ONA will be “living” inside a college textbook for university students to read and study [along with other religious/spiritual traditions].

The Assistant Vice President for Academic Affairs at Al Akhawayn University in Ifrane Morocco, named Dr. Connell Monette; is writing a college textbook regarding the subject of religious studies, which he teaches. The textbook covers a handful of “non-mainstream” religious/spiritual institutions often neglected or ignored by mainstream society and “mainstream religions,” which are growing in popularity or influence in this 21st century. Each Chapter in this textbook covers a different group or institution, such as two different Sufi orders, the International Nath Order, Theravada Buddhism, and so on. Interestingly Dr. Monette included the Order of Nine Angles in his textbook, which is featured in Chapter 5 of this book!

For each chapter and institution Dr. Monette actually works with and interviews key people and/or the leadership [if they have such] associated with each religious tradition. With regard to the ONA, Dr. C since the end of last year has been working with key people in ONA who are Ryan Anschauung of the Temple of THEM, and our very own Anton Long of ONA. I met Dr. Monette through Ryan of the Temple of THEM actually, and became another person Dr. C was collecting data from.

The book in question is titled: “Blood, Wine, and the Golden Chain. Mysticism in the 21st Century.” By C.R. Monette. The Order of Nine Angles is featured in Chapter 5 of the book. Dr. Monette was kind enough to actually let ONA have a copy of Chapter 5 which I will include:HERE.

The book itself is not really written for the typical market interested in occult stuff like you would find in cyberspace forums. The audience are enrolled students doing a study or course on religious studies. So Chapter 5 dealing with ONA is written for that audience. The Chapter is written in such a way where it is insightful for both a novice of ONA, and one who knows a whole lot about ONA 'kulture.'

I actually learned stuff from it I wasn't aware of before. What I personally find of value is Professor Monette's stand and point of view. Not only does he give us an objective perspective of ONA, which "we" might lack because we are inside ONA; but Dr. Monette comes with a different "cultural" point of view. What I mean is that the typical Western occultist may often be culturally myopic where he judges groups and organizations based on what books and information he was exposed to. I also have a cultural myopia with ONA, where I often see or mentally filter ONA thru my own Asian-Buddhism point of view. No one group of person really sees the whole thing "right." There are different "angles" of seeing things, including ONA. And someone like Dr. CM come from a culture [Islamic/Moroccan] where he is familiar with and exposed to all of these unknown, unpublished Arabic manuscripts [as well as a familiarity with other religious traditions]. His insights and presentation of ONA is in this regard valuable, because it widens our own cultural tunnel vision when looking at ONA.

There is a little interesting side story which is sort of like an undercurrent for some topics mentioned in the Chapter which I found to be shockingly enlightening.

What happened was during our conversations Dr. C brought up something called the Shams al-Maarif which is some old Arabic text on magic. At first he simply told me that he sees similarities in NAOS with untranslated Arabic texts such as these, or the tradition such texts represent. The topic of conversation was brought up when I think I asked Dr. C if he had ever heard of an "al-Katib al alfak" which Anton Long said he had read and was influenced or inspired by. Dr. C seems to have a professional hobby for collecting and studying untranslated texts like these, which was why I tried to ask. So anyways, this one day Dr. C said he had purchased a copy of the Shams and was going to take a closer look at it and see. He asked me if I would like a copy. I said yes because I love collecting PDF's. So he gave me a copy of the Shams.

Unfortunately for me the entire copy of the Shams I got was 100% in Arabic. It was just pages and pages in the hundreds of nothing but chicken scratches. I was looking through the Shams for any picture which I can look at, since the writing made no sense to me. It turns out that the Shams did have a few pages of "pictures." They were more like diagrams of boxes and square with more chicken scratches inside. When I was looking thru it some more I came upon a couple pages with these square designs arranged in a way I actually recognized!

I got excited and told Professor Connell about what I found. I basically told him that some of the squares in the Shams looks like the Traditional magic squares we use in my ancestral culture. These are generally in English called "Khmer/Thai" magic Yants, which you can get tattoos of. The word "Yant" [sounds like the English word "Yawn"] is a Khmerized form of the Sanskrit Yantra. I guess the most well known example is the magical tattoo Angelina Jolie got on her shoulder when she was in Cambodia, except her yant wasn't in magic square. What the actress has we call a "yant-pali" [yawn-palley] which means that the writing is in Pali and is a “magical mantra” that does something.

I gave a link to Professor Connell to see what I was talking about and told him the general magical purpose for these things were to make people fall in love with you, protect you from knife cuts, arrows, and bullets, etc. I pointed out that the only difference between the magic squares in the Shams and those used in Traditional Khmer and Thai magic were the chicken scratches. One being Arabic and the other Khmer. This use of magical squares in the Khmer culture is ancient, and goes back hundreds of years. I asked Professor Connell if he could give me the gist of what the square pictures in the Shams is for or did, because I have a suspicion that they may serve the same general purpose. If so then there was a realistic “genetic” link between the two.

Meanwhile, I did my own research with the Shams and found out the shocking bit of news. The Shams al-Maarif was originally written down in circa 1300AD. Mind you, this doesn't mean that the actual magical or occult tradition was created at that time. It could have existed longer as an oral tradition before it was written. What was shocking to me was that historically the Khmer people were the first to use writing in the Southeast Asian peninsula in their ancient temple wall inscriptions. The Khmer only began to write around 1300AD. This suggests that what we [Khmer] consider to be an ancient tradition system of magic indigenous to “our” culture and people, must have actually originated from an earlier outside source. The implication that this Khmer/Thai system of magic originating from an older Islamic tradition is not crazy. Islam actually did colonize South East Asia. Remember Indonesia is technically the most populous Islamic nation; and the Chams are a large ethnic group in the peninsula who are all Muslims. Dr. C gave me confirming data saying that the square diagrams I saw in the Shams were in fact used for the same reason and magical purposes as the Khmer-Thai traditional yants.

Most of the reader are probably wondering: “So? What's this mean?” It might actually mean nothing to the reader. But to me it has a couple interesting and significant meanings. The first meaning is that my several months of talking with Professor Connell ended up helping me learn something about my own people and culture, which was entirely unexpected. The other meaning to me is that there exists three variables: 1) Dr. Connell Monette all the way in Morocco and his professional interests with these unpublished Arabic manuscripts; 2) Anton Long all the way out in Shropshire England and his ONA and NAOS; and 3) me and my ‘ancestral’ tradition of using weird systems of magic. And these three seemingly unrelated variables in a way are all interconnected across time and space by a common ancient tradition.

It may be said dismissively that the stuff in Naos and ONA is all imaginative mumbo jumbo with no life. It may be said that the ancient tradition represented in such ancient Arabic “grimoires” such as the Shams and Ghayat al-Hakim are long dead and imaginative mumbo jumbo. But there is a cousin to this ancient magical Tradition which is alive and well in a place most Westerners will never ever think to look in.

The meaningful thing to me is that in my own culture our ancient traditional magic is actually an oral tradition passed down from monk to monk in our sanghas. You have to read that sentence very carefully for the suggestive hint. A Westerner who has not immersed themselves in Thai, Khmer or Lao culture, when seeing our Buddhism, will simply classify it as a Theravada

Buddhism. In the past there were Western scholars who did immerse themselves into our culture and they used the descriptor “Esoteric Buddhism” to denote the species of Buddhism the Khmer, Thai, and Lao practice. This was based on the not so well known fact that our sanghas are not just a group of monks chanting scriptures, but schools of much older magic. In fact in Khmer the phrase “Rian [to learn] Sil [magic]” also means to learn Sila [“Practice/Virtue]. Sil[a] in Khmerized Pali means both “Magic” and the 5 Precepts of the Buddha. Just a grammatical side note: in Khmerized Pali and Sanskrit, usually the last “A” or vowel of a word is dropped because the “letter” is not actually a standalone letter, but is an inherent vowel sound of the consonant before it. So the Khmer reads Pali and Sanskrit as it is actually spelt, letter for letter. This is why Sil is Sila and why Buddha in Khmer is said: “Booht.” Khmer, like British English, is non-rhotic, meaning the “R” in our words are usually absent in speech. Most verbs in Khmer end in an “R” which is silent, just like the last “R” in Khme-r is actually silent when spoken in speech. This means that when you have a word like Mantra in Sanskrit, in Khmer it becomes “Mant” [said like “mawn”]. Yantra in Khmer becomes “Yant” [sounds like “yawn”].

In my culture when a novice monk joins the sangha he first learns the ordinary Pali chants from the Tipitaka. Except in actuality in our culture the monks learn only specific Pali chants associated with the several traditional rites and ceremonies of our people. In a similar way as how the Catholic Church uses Latin from the Bible sometimes with specific rites. This actually means that in general your typical monk is (a) ignorant of the Tipitaka since he only knows the ritual chants; & (b) he does not understand Pali because the vocal chant itself is “sacred,” and not the meaning of the words. It’s the intellectual monks who take the time to actually read the Tipitaka and learn the meanings of Pali words.

Once he masters the chants his teacher or elder will then begin to teach him the more ancient and traditional magical stuff. Half of the time in my culture when a man desires to join the sangha, he desires so to actually learn the traditional magic and not to be a monastical monk. All the ritual of shaving the hair, and “ordination” is actually an initiation ceremony into an order of elders who keep the more ancient tradition alive. In my great great grandfather’s era this ritual initiation ceremony ended with the newly initiated student/”monk” getting ritual tattoos of dragon [or sea serpent or “fish”] scales around his wrists and ankles, to mystically signify that he was psychically bound to the 7 Headed Naga you see hooding the Buddha. This Naga represents the much older and ancient tradition.

The monks learn the magical Pali mantras, and also all of the magical squares and patterns. In our culture the word “student” [Gon-suhs] doesn’t just mean a person who seeks lessons from a teacher or monk. It also means a person who develops a Guru-student relationship with a monk to either gain magical help or to learn the actual magical tradition. My Bhikkhu grandpa I often write about is this type of monk. He has over 1000 students who are all gang bangers and Chinese businessmen, who don’t go to him for religious teaching, but actually for his magical help and yants he makes for them.

The interesting point is that in Southeast Asian, there lives a very real and living magical oral tradition which has been alive for several hundred years. And this living tradition is “genetically” related to the tradition represented in the Arabic Shams manuscript. Which Anton Long of ONA said was a resource he tapped into as well. At any rate. Just thought I'd share the interesting cultural connections implicated.

So, the University is Al Akhawayn University of Ifrane, which is actually a high profile university I learned. Dr. Monette sent me a few cool picture of a movie actress [S. Weaver] who very recently visited this same university with himself in the shot. The author of the book is Dr. C.R. Monette. And the book is entitled: "Blood, Wine, and the Golden Chain; Mysticism in the 21st Century." And the part of the book which features the Order of Nine Angles is 'Chapter Five.' CLICK ON THIS LINK to download a copy of the PDF. Please keep in mind that the PDF is a reproduction of one single chapter of the actual book, and is not a standalone 'manuscript.' The PDF is 40 pages long.

There are two "historical" factual tidbits for ONA Initiates about Dr. C and this book. The first notable factual tidbit is that Dr. C is the first person to actually include or present the Order of Nine Angles in an actual college text book for a university. The last notable factual tidbit is that Dr. Connell Monette is the Last person – as far as he and I know – to ever interview and talk with Anton Long of ONA. AL is "officially" retired from his 30 plus years of writing for ONA. The last public ONA MS he wrote for us was "Lapis Philosophicus." Anton Long's relay race now begins. And what a cool way to start the relay race off: Dr. C taking ONA to college! Thanks to Dr. C for making this PDF reproduction of Chapter Five copyleft.

ORDO AB CHAO

Order Out of Chaos. Simple words, but profound and powerful. Our entire human civilization, and many things we use today are founded upon this simple principle of bringing into Coherency what was once incoherent. Much like these coherent strings of letters you are reading: made up of words and sentences; are the Ordering in Coherent Structure, the incoherent mass of an alphabet of 26 letters. Such as the incoherent possibility/potentiality – the chaotic soup of possible amino acids in nature – is brought into Order: where 4 basic amino acids are structured in a coherent [intelligent] manner to manifest the DNA molecule which is the living coherent coding/ordering of all living things.

Like the chaotic, incoherent steam of boiling water. By itself the steam would dissipate into the air: useless. But when it is economized – brought into Order – this same useless steam is forced into a coherent system of pipes and tubes which spins massive metal fans – in turn spinning magnets which produce electricity to power our entire present human civilization with electric power.

Like the incoherent chaos of the brute force of random groups, clans, and tribes of people – a force which like unordered steam is absolutely useless – is brought with scheming intelligence into Order. An Ordering or Coherent Structure wherein that chaotic brute force is funneled to manifest specific, strategic, real results: the result of agriculture, architecture, war: which in turn manifests as Empire and Dominion.

I remember a time when I was a little girl when my mom brought me grocery shopping and she bought me a bag of rock sugar. They are usually sold in Asian food markets as candy, sometimes called rock candy. It's like a jawbreaker with many sides made of pure sugar. I was fascinated with the bag of rock sugar I had and wondered how it was made. My dad showed me. It was like a little science experiment I found absolutely amazing.
