He let me break up one of the big rock sugar cube things into little pieces to make a "seed," and from that seed he said will grow a new rock. My dad took fishing line and tie the seed crystal to one end, and a pencil to the other end, and then we suspended the seed crystal in an empty mason jar. Then we boiled water and he let me add food coloring to the hot water. He said the new rock candy that will grow from this old seed will look different, and be the color of the food coloring. Then he let me stir table spoon after table spoon of common sugar into the hot blood red water, until there was so much sugar in the water, the sugar stopped melting and just made a pile at the bottom of the measuring cup it was in. And he poured the saturated red water in my mason jar and put in on my desk in my room and told me to watch, because as soon as the water cools down, the seed will grow.

So there I was, sitting in my room staring at the seed crystal waiting for it to grow before my eyes. It actually took a day for red cubes to grow around what was once the seed crystal forming this blobular geometric mass of deep red big sugar crystals. The image and concept of some fractured seed crystal when nurtured right can – by itself – grow, evolve, into something entirely new stuck with me in my little mind forever.

It is just absolutely amazing to me how a mix of incoherent ingredients when brought into coherency, and placed in the right condition and matrix will evolve and manifest causally as something real and living.

Like the “rock candy” that Hitler made in the 1920’s. Where he took seed ideas from here and there scattered about Germanic culture and folk culture, mixed it with bits and pieces of Hindu mysticism a la Madam Blavatsky et al, grafted and pasted the Italian fascist salute to his thing, and used the Chan Buddhist swastika as his symbol. How inconceivable that this cut and paste, hodge-podge “seed-thing” Hitler put together, when placed in the right conditions and matrix would evolve on it’s own into something so powerful, it literally took the whole world to stop it! The matrix being post war Germany, and the condition being the humiliating effect of the Treaty of Versailles had on the mass morale of the German people and their collective psyche.

Like random floating sugar crystals, they crystallized around Hitler’s “seed-thing” he had put together from random things. And from that crystallization came a real living, breathing, dynamic Reich – which, as it evolved on it’s own grew to look very different from that “seed-thing” it grew out of. As my red rock candy looked different from the clear broken piece of rock sugar which I used as a seed crystal. As the seed of a plant looks nothing like the tree it grows into. As a zygote looks nothing like what you now look like.

Or now take even Christianity, America, and England. Can we truly say that these three things came out of nothing as is, already made for mass consumption – as if they appeared out of nothing the way we know it today? Or, could it be that each of these three things manifested gradually – evolved, progressed in form – from a “seed-thing” put together from random pieces of pre-existing idea and thing?

Where would Christianity be without Horus, Mithras, or Orpheus? Or pagans like the great Plato? Or even the Buddhism that had colonized Egypt’s great city of Alexandria, where Christianity’s first monastery was first born?

What would America be without the “seed-things” of England? Without the hodge-podge seed-things immigrants brought with them? Without hamburgers, beer, pizza, kong pow, and tacos? And what would England be with out the hodge-podge pieces culture of the Angles, the Saxons, the Vikings, the Normans, the Scots, even the Irish, and the many legends and mythos native to that island?

Can we honestly say that any invention or idea we have today came out of nothing as is? Or perhaps these things also are a re-presencing, crystallization, evolution, of a seed-thought. A seed-thought constructed from parts and pieces of previously existing thing.

Where would Ford's first car be without the seed-thought of a steam engine? What would Einstein's theories look like without the seed-thoughts of Newton? Would we have ever gone to the moon, without the seed-thought of an arrow – a projectile being hurled through the air by force?

Not even we ourselves as a living causal species came as is out of nothing. Each of us came from a hodge-podging of both our parent's genetic coding. Even as a species we are an evolution of, a re-crystallization of, a building upon, a re-presencing of: pre-existing things.

Nothing in Causal Nature comes into existence as is. It isn't how causal phenomenon works. The very meaning of the word "Causal" suggests and says that something must be inputted to yield or generate a reactive output/result. Not even our world's most near ethereal things: clouds and fire, come out of nothing as is. Each are the re-presencing of already pre-existing things: water vapor, oxygen, hydrogen, wood, heat.

In fact, everything that exists in this causal [material] universe is the re-precencing – the crystallization of – only a handful of the same basic compounds and elements in various different coherent forms. All the compounds which makes up our physical cosmos fit into the Periodic Table. These are then just the same handful of elemental atoms in various coherent constructs. In turn these atoms are nothing more than 3 basic components re-used, re-ordered: electrons, protons, and neutrons.

It's the re-ordering of such elemental factors, into new compounds and structures, that manifests as the vast multitude of seemingly different things that populates our cosmos. It would not be correct to use reductionist thinking and say that because the same three subatomic elements which composes us and a star are the same crap in different ordering, that humans and stars are the same crap pretending to be different things.

This ONA is no different. The ONA isn't a revelatory thing given to Anton Long on some mountain by some dark god as is. No one – not even Anton Long – pretends this is so. Anton Long even said he took a seed-thought given to him, and added new elemental things to it, and re-ordered it into a new coherent structure. To create a new seed-thought, from which would gradually evolve something living.

What would the ONA be without David Myatt's concepts, or the Arabic alchemical 9 angles concept? Or even the Kabbalah's tree of life, and the religious chantings of Magian monk? It's not really what hodge-podge things composing a seed-thought that matters. What genuinely matters is what the seed-thought will become, what it will be capable of doing; what meaning, power, and life apprehension skills it will impart to it's Initiates. What matters is what the ONA is today – what it will be in the future – and what it can transmute us into when we live it's Dark Tradition.

The seed, and what the seed evolves and grows into are two separate causal phenomena. That clear, broken up seed crystal I used to grow a beautiful chunk of red rock candy out of are two completely different things. What I am today, and the zygote I came from are two completely different causal phenomena.

The hodge-podge seed-thing Anton Long put together from various sources and what the Order of Nine Angles is today – and what it can be, and shall be in the future – are two separate causal Ordering into Coherent form of what was once a chaotic mess of mere potentialities; brought together by intelligence for a purpose.

Now, having been introduced into the right matrix and condition, those who resonate with the “aura” of the Sinister Way have Coagulated around that once seed-thing of Anton Long’s, and have crystallized. And through us this seed-thought evolves, progresses, is re-presented into a dynamic living Causal entity – to which each of us Initiates are but living cells of. Collected together for a purpose, our lives and minds; our hopes, dreams, and visions intertwined. Like spools of various colored yarn is spun together by the Norns, to manifest a fabric of Wyrð. A Wyrð which will one day bare it’s fruit for a future generation, long after we have gone.

OUR NOBLE KAMPF

“Test always your strength, for therein lies success.” – 2nd Satanic Point, BBS, ONA

The essence of “strength” can be summed up in the word “Unshakable.” An unshakable Pillar or Oak Tree compared to a flexible or bendable sapling is strong in character. The use of such imagery as an exemplar of what strength is may be misleading to some. Actual strength also incorporates adaptability – durability – endurance. It does not imply an inflexible nature of resistance. If that Oak Tree does not learn to adapt to a strong wind, and bend with it, it will break. When this wind stops, that same Oak Tree returns to its original position. In its ability to adapt, and return to its original nature, there is unshakable endurance... such, is the essence of Strength.

This thing we call Strength is a triune entity. There is the Mental, the Emotional, and Physical Strength. The sum of which make a single person. What we Think gives rise to what we Feel. What we Feel influences what we Do, how we Act; and those actions in turn materializes causally as that which we experience – the End Results of our actions. In this light, we are only as Strong as our weakest link. If one of these three aspects of Strength is weak, the chain is broken. No matter how physically powerful you are, under the right conditions of mental and emotional torture, you will break.

Just as a body builder must exercise and push the limits of his physical force to build physical strength. So also can mental and emotional strength be exercised – its limits pushed – to produce an unequivocal mind, well regulated emotions, and a fiercely burning passion. Thus, what tests our endurance and the very limits of our strength, ultimately makes us stronger in the end. Fear is the only limit, to how far a man can go. No matter how muscular and athletic you are, and how refined your mind is... if you have a fear of heights and were asked to jump the roof of one building to the next, you will incapacitate yourself. Thus, it must be understood that Fear is Man's Great Enemy, which limits his progression and strength.

Fear alone has limited us and enslaved us as a people. Fear of the unknown... Fear of hell fire and damnation enslaved our people for 2000 years under the Magian Mythos of the Nazarene. Because we were mentally weak to overcome such beliefs. Fear of kings alone subjugated us under tyrannical monarchs. Because we were too weak to overcome that emotion and idea. Fear of the unknown... of not knowing how to pay our bills, make our own money, makes us slaves to corporations. Fear of the State alone... and its illusory power over us... is what limits our people from materializing our human potential, and the full potential of our human civilization.

Fear – or lack of it – is the essential factor which separates us and our Kind, from Homo Hubris. It is Homo Hubris... gripped with Fear like perpetually paranoid meerkats... that remain stagnant and obedient. It was Homo Hubris and his Fear of hell and God, that gave power to the Church during the dark ages. It was Homo Hubris and his Fear of monarchs, that empowered the tyranny of feudal states and serfdom. It is their Fear of these distant... abstract States... that empowers these Nations... Nations which not only dulls and jades our very Humanness, but is also destroying our very species and the earth.

Thus, from time to time, Mother Nature Herself... in Her Natural Primal Wisdom... places us in situations and events far out of our comfort zone, to force us to face our fears. To face violence, storms, heartbreak, loneliness, tyranny, oppression, poverty, famine, hatred, genocide, et cetera. Such tests of Nature breaks the weak... and those who endure – facing such fear – surmount what they once were, and becomes a new person... one more wiser, insightful, stronger. It is through such Ordeals, Struggle, Trials, Tests, Tribulations – such Ennobling Kampfs – that we become more than human... a Fearless Noble Breed of Man.

This Order of Nine Angles to us is then like a Boot Camp which... like Nature... teaches us to face our fears and push our limits Beyond... thus Ennobling us in mind, heart, and body. The Initiate of the ONA (and our Disciples) must understand that Evolution is a Self Imposed Initiative. Only in a given species' struggle to endure, and adapt to what Nature forces onto it, does a species change over causal time into new creatures. The struggle of the first fish to walk on land to survive over causal time became amphibians and reptiles. The struggle of the first ape to walk up right to compete with other apes, in time, became us. Evolution is Willed and striven for. It does not happen "naturally." Insects and microbes that attack plants don't just "naturally" become resistant to pesticides. It is the Will to endure and struggle to survive that initiates change and evolution.

If we understand this as insightful Initiates... we will understand the value in testing our own strengths in the arena of Life. The Ordeals of the ONA's Grade Rituals and their respective Tests are only the beginning. The Sinister Way is a Way of Life, and that Way of living is one of constant self initiated struggle to go beyond what fears and limitations we have, or what has been imposed upon us by an outside force. This is not to suggest an aimless struggle for the sake of strength itself. It is a purposeful Kampf, such as the endurance test a swimmer would put himself or herself thru to swim across the English Channel, to fulfill an objective... a willed outcome. In doing so, not only do we grow in strength, but there is a growing toward a distinct destination as well. Thus are there the many edicts of the Order which urges each Initiate to test its limits, embrace current Heresy, face danger, Act, and Disrupt.

Mental Strength:

The practice of training a Strong Mind begins with Doubt. The weaker the doubt, the weaker the realization. The greater the doubt, the greater the realization. In doubting, even our very own existence and the nature of reality, do we begin the process of self enlightenment. It must be understood that if we do not enlighten ourselves, that someone else has. Such a mind which is incapable of thinking for itself, and doubting what other say or teach, is weak.

Experience is the second step to cultivating a Strong Mind. It is thru our direct living of life via direct immersion, that we each collect experiences. From these experiences we collect, the contemplative mind grows the more wiser and insightful.

Questioning is the third step to cultivating a strong mind. Such questions that arises from Doubt, and questioning our experiences we have collected. What is that which Doubts? What is that which experiences? What is that which is being experienced. Where is the Observer which is experiencing? Am I experiencing the experience or is my body? Am I that which Doubts, or is it my brain which doubts? If I perform an action, does it produce a reaction? If I desire a certain result, what must I do now to manifest it?

Contemplation is the final step to cultivation of a Strong Mind. Contemplation of our doubts, experiences, and questions thru concentrating our mindful awareness in quiet meditation and internal dialogue with oneself. To answer our own questions with our own insights we have gained from our experiences, with intuition, with a struggle to apprehend the essence of things to gain a genuine understanding of such things.

With the Outer Forms and exoterica of the ONA set aside, these Four Principles are the foundation and essence of the Seventh Way and its Methodology. Thus, there are no leaders or authorities in the Seventh Way to teach or dictate. There is only this fundamental essence and your own striving... your own doubting... your own experiencing... your own questioning... and your own contemplations. There is only your own tests and trials... your own becoming.

Emotional Strength:

If the body were a horse cart, the emotions would be the horses. An individual with no control of his emotions, has no true control over his actions, for it is the emotions that governs what we do and how we behave. Thus it can be simply understood that if the Initiate learns to be Master of her/his own emotions, that she/he will be Master of his/her own Life. If you do not learn to control your own emotions, you are only reacting emotionally due to an outside stimuli. Thus outside forces and other people in essence controls your actions and behavior.

Emotional Strength begins with Detachment. This is not a permanent detachment. Your emotional detachment to temporal things and stimuli is practiced and held only until you have learned to hold your emotional state no matter what the situation.

The second step is Willed Evocation. By this we mean to say that the Initiate trains itself to evoke a desired emotion. Understanding that what we think and imagine influences our emotions, it won't be hard for the initiate to learn to begin to evoke desired feelings. The feeling of burning passion and determination is crucial to success in life in whatever arena. Determination here means the unshakable Will and desire to complete an objective, or manifest a goal, without change of heart or mind no matter what situation or obstacles one may encounter.

Thru control and regulations of emotions the Initiate learns to wyrdfully manifest a desired objective by controlling the very source of action. Control and regulation of the emotions is the fundamental force and fuel of the Methodology of the ONA, without which, your actions are empty motions.

Physical Strength:

The Methodology itself is not only the means by which we accomplish our goals; but it is the method by which we initiate self change within ourselves via action, the facing of our fears, leaving the confines of our comfort zone; utilizing our Sinister Dialect, Strategy, Insight Roles, or a modern Heresy to push our own limits. The Methodology in action puts us in the position of pushing our limits, forces us to take risks, and perform Sinister deeds, which is not only our work, but our personal means to progressing ourselves, thru our own acts and merits.

Sinister Kampf:

Such practical tests of our mental, emotional, and physical strength, when cultivated and Lived engineers gradually over time a new human being, one that is more refined and Noble than the common breed. A Noble Breed that does not Fear, but is Feared. Not by what has been written or spoken, but by what our deeds and Sinister Cloaking manifests – what we are capable of.

In the long process of surmounting ourselves by placing ourselves into ennobling struggles, and ordeals... in testing the limits of our strength and pushing further to reach for the unreachable... is there an internal alchemy. From this Triumph of Will – the Will to Become... do we genuinely transmute inside progressively, where we become individuals who are genuinely Master of our own Life and Fate... and Master of the lives and fate of others. Only in this way... via a Natural Progression, can we gradually and permanently evolve our human civilization toward its highest potential.

PASSING MOMENTS

Passing Moments

You don't expect in this day and age for something significant to happen in Life and not have it blogged about right? I suppose with different generations and different mediums of expression, one will have different means of expression and venting emotions.

Things happened so fast, it almost feels unfair or disrespectful. Just a few days ago my Great Grandfather was bored at home and had asked his daughter – whom we call grandmother even though she is only 50 – that he wanted to visit one of our houses to hang out with the other old folks. So in the morning the grandmother and he went in her car. She opens the door for him and helps him sit down since he is 89 years old. She walks over to her seat and tells her father to put on his seat belt, but notices that his head is slumped as if he fell asleep. She tells him a little louder to put his seat belt on and looks closer.

Next thing I know my mom screams out at me and my cousins at the house: "Oh dear god, your people's Great Grandfather is dying in the hospital!" All of a sudden the funeral is on the 13th. You just left in total shock at the speed it all unfolded. Even though when it was happening it was painfully slow.

There was hardly any time to react. I was there in the room with the grandmother after that day for most of the time and his heart was beating fine, he was warm and red in color, the doctors told us that they can fix him. He was just rejecting his food which went down a tube, and they said to us all that they'll see in 7 days if he continues to reject the food, because then they'd have to cut his throat and stomach open and he'd have to eat that way. But he should be fine they said.

That decision of cutting Great Grandpa open at that passing moment was the grandmother's biggest trouble. She had to soon make the choice to let the doctors go ahead and cut his throat and stomach. She consulted her siblings and the entire family because she was at a loss of ideas and opinions. Because another person's Life – her own father's Life – was resting on her decision.

She was crying about this at my mom, when it was just her, mom, me and a few others. She was telling my mom that she doesn't know what to do. She had asked everybody and everybody told her a different thing to do and got angry at her for not agreeing with them. In the room my mom said something that really hit me inside deep even though this had nothing to do with me. She said: "Forget about all of them. If you go to 10 different people you'll get 10 different answers and 10 different people angry at you for not doing things their way! He's your dad. It's your father's Life and yours not theirs or anybodies. Nobody besides you and your own siblings have any right to interject their opinions and judgment."

I didn't interpret what my mom said to be related to the actual situation though. What she said made me realize that what she said was truth in many other aspects of Life. The things that I believe, my religion, my way of life, my sexuality, my hair style, everything. I will never be able to make everyone happy and approve of me and what I do with my self and Life. Everyone in someway is going to have their stupid opinions, beliefs. And everyone is going to be asshurt in someway. Might as well focus on my own self and Life and ignore what others will say.

Letting Great Grandpa go was both easy and hard. Hard because he's your great grandfather, and not a distant one in that one hardly sees him, because he's a fixture in my life. He's been in the family and in my field of awareness ever since I came into the world. This is the first time he's gone. Letting him go was also easy, because of his age, and an understanding inside that he has lived a very long and fruitful Life, and that it was just his "Time" to go. Letting go of someone my mother's age, or one of my cousins would be entirely different and near impossible to do without emotional and psychological trauma. Because you know inside that they haven't lived their Life in full yet.

Death Before Dishonour

The Great Grandfather is/was not blood related to us. His wife is. My birth grandmother's mother and his Wife were blood sisters who had the Thai background. Great Grandfather is actually not really closely related to me in English/American familial terms. He was just somebody who married the Great Grandmother. But in our culture and family, he is as close to me and as in my Life as my own grandfather who died during the revolution.

My birth grandmother hated him. My grandmother is going through her own pathei-mathos right now because of his death. And we all know it too. My grandmother disowned him for a very long time and never went to go visit him for at least 15 years. She never ever tells us why. If we ask, she gets very upset and tells us to not speak about such things any further because we have to just respect our elder's private matters of that sort and not badger about it.

My other elders gossip a lot. And when you come from a family as big as mine, there is plenty to gossip about. I asked a grandfather once why my own grandmother did not like the Great Grandfather. And this grandfather told me that my own grandmother is not a violent person and hates anybody that hits their children. And he said that this Great Grandfather is known across the old province for being greatly violent, authoritarian, and abusive with his own children. That he is known for beating the living daylights out of them over their education and school work. Everybody was afraid of this Great Grandfather. And so all my own grandmother could do was cry for how her nieces and nephews were beat and disown the Great Grandfather.

Later I got to question Great Grandfather's children, because they come to our house often to hang out with my aunts and uncles who are their age and generation. One of his sons, who is only about 20 years older than me, told me about his life with Great Grandfather. This grandfather – what we call him despite his young age – said that his father [Great Grandfather] has a short temper and because he worked hard in life to become the politician and statesman that he was, he became obsessed with inculcating that same level of striving in him and his siblings onto his children. He told me that during his high schools years the Great Grandfather would scream and beat him silly over the most smallest homework problems he got wrong. That they'd get beat until they bled.

I was thinking to myself – at that young and ignorant age – when I heard this that if that were my dad that did that to me, I'd hate him and run away or call the police and put him in jail. I wouldn't put up with it. I won't care if I tear the whole family apart and hurt my mother's feeling because I put my dad in jail for abusing me. If that were me. Nobody has ever raised a voice at me in my family though.

I can be proud to say and know that my Great Grandfather passed away in the presence of all of his family and blood relations and every person he sired. Never in his 89 years of human Life has anyone of us, or his children left him or threw him away in some old folks home. Which is a little weird to me considering how he treated his own children.

Before this moment; a while back after I grew up; I went to ask Great Grandfather's son about his feeling for his father again. This time the grandfather [his son] was in his 40's. He was married with children of his own; and he was very successful in his profession in life. He is a lawyer.

I asked the now very grown grandfather if he still hated his father, how he felt about his father, and if he would change anything if he could go back in time. The grandfather was silent for a long moment and shook his head. And he said to me something like: The way we see things in Life as we get older changes. I felt very bad towards him when I was younger, but now that I am a father myself, I understand what was going on in my own father's heart when he raised me. We all want the best for our children. In that, I cannot condemn my father and I do not hate him for loving me to such an extent. All I can say now in my current state of mind as a father myself is that I disagree with the methods he used with me. And that's all. Otherwise he is my father, and he gave me Life and if it weren't for him and he pushing me to go beyond my abilities as a boy, I would not be the person I am today. What happened in the past is over for me. It's just our culture and way of life to pay our honour to our parents.

Great Grandpa lived his whole human Life with his children, and grandchildren, and us. He lived with them in one of their houses. Moving from one house to another one year to the next, just like how us cousins do it. Even though in the past he may have been abusive to his own children, they never abandoned him or stopped loving and honouring him. They loved him and cared for him until he finally passed.

Sitting there quietly in the hospital room I saw with my own eyes that those children of his who in their youth hated him the most and were the most abused, cried the hardest and loudest and longest. Especially his sons, who never in their Life yelled at their father or disrespected him in any way, even though he was very unkind in his method of punishment. I can only imagine right now what is going on in my own grandmother's heart, since she now realizes that she has let so many years of silence pass by between them without forgiving him, when his own children forgave him long ago. I saw my grandmother in the hospital room the day he opened his eyes for a short while cry and ask Great Grandfather to forgive her for what distance she caused between them and the family.

I suppose I am dwelling on this honour idea because of my East and West life that I live and exist in or am aware of. In one world, it seems that Honour is so natural that it needs not even be a spoken word at all for it to be lived and expressed in our deeds, actions, thoughts, and feeling for each other. And then in the Western world I am in, it seems as if one can write out the word Honour and scream its meaning as loud as you can, and nobody seems to understand what the essence is or how to live it or what it's good for. You can write a thousand pages about Honour, and all it would be to them is an interesting concept, perhaps worth debating for its merit at best.

It's said that you know who your real friends are in tough times, because your drinking buddies will ditch you in your time of trial and hardship. Those that remain by your side, are those that love you truly unconditionally. And the same applies to our ideas, philosophies, religions, and politics. In such moments of sadness and darkness; such moments of emotional confusion and exhaustion, our "drinking buddy" ideas, religions, and ideologies ditches us and fails to mean anything significant. What is left by our side is our genuine thought-companions that truly are a reflection of who and what we are inside. I bring up Honour in such a moment in my own life, because at this moment I do think of the simple concept of Honour in the ONA, Reichsfolk, and the Numinous Way. The furthest thing from mind and heart right now is some satan, some god, some this path or that path. What remains with me at this passing moment are the simple concepts or principles of my own culture, which are also found in that Myattian Triad. Whatever we call it as Dreccs: Honour, Empathy, Clan. Sometimes such concepts comes natural for us in such a way that they don't even need to be words or ideas. For others, these things are principles; axioms; beliefs, etc. Things to be debated for their merit. What merit are you talking about since as a people, you have never lived Honour or Empathy to see their fruits of merit?

Pathei-Mathos

The Greek words in the Myattian Triad according to DM means something like Learning From Suffering and Adversity and Direct Experience. I don't think anything in life causes more suffering, and is more adversarial to life than Death and the emotional and psychological trial and tribulation the Death of a loved one brings for one to face and confront.

If death teaches us anything, it's not the death itself. I was there looking at his face in disbelief for some days and I didn't experience some satori or satanic gnosis. It's like hearing a piece of music. You don't realize its essence or how beautiful it is/was until the last note. Then you sit back and replay the music in your mind quickly again, which is when you fully realize the Essence and Beauty of what you had just heard. The same goes for poetry. It's in that deep reflective space of Mind that the Essence Unfolds.

What simple "lessons" death teaches happens in the same way. It's not until the very last note falls, and the drifting off into that reflective space of Mind, and the replay of past events you shared with this dying or passed person that the Gnosis Unravels for you. Not as an intellectual phenomenon; but as something beyond the function and apparatus of intelligence.

I was crying during one of those days in the hospital. Not over Great Grandfather's condition anymore since I had cried my eyes dry over that already. I think we all did by then. But I felt very sad and bad over a guilty feeling.

Just about three weeks ago from today, I had to wake up early at dawn before the sun came up at grandma's house with a few other cousins. Great Grandfather and his daughter – whom we call grandmother – were coming to pick us up to work on his "orchard." I was upset that day because I had to wake up in the middle of the morning to go work out in the middle of a field out in the middle of nowhere because Great Grandpa had picked us to go with him.

Great Grandpa spent all his money he saved during his life and he bought these many tracks of land up near Palmdale. An acre is about $5000 or so, and he bought many acres to make an orchard of different fruit trees. This land is so big it includes two little hills with huge boulders. But it's all dirt. Just desert and desert shrubs. It is so out in the middle of nowhere there are no telephone poles, no electricity, no water pipes, no nothing. You have to literally drive an hour to the nearest village of 20 people and a gas station made of wood with rusty old cars for a restroom! I didn't think such a place even existed in America; but then again I was born and raised in a big city.

That day he had put the uncles to work to build these structures that collected rain water in these giant blue bin things. So there would be water to water the plants. The aunts they were digging holes in the ground and planting the saplings. So that day he was half complaining and half dictating to us cousins that the bad wild rabbits were coming at night and nibbling all of his little saplings and there were all of these little plants that got their shoots eaten up. So he wanted us to cut up chicken coup wiring he had brought to make these little round fences around every single sapling. We did it. What can you say really. It was hot. It was in a desert. It was in the middle of nowhere. I got angry and I was thinking to myself: "Dammit Great Grampa, who makes an orchard out in the middle of a dry desert where there are wild rabbits?! I can think of so many places to be at right now, and the middle of nowhere is not one of them!" The little orange tree saplings had these thorns that were scratching my hands as I was putting those fences around them.

And we couldn't leave until Great Grandpa was tired and ready to go home. At lunch break I was drinking water with some cousins and the grandmother, and I looked at grandmother and jokingly said to her: "God look at him grandmother, he's still lugging that lumber around! We're never going home. And he's 89 years old!" And the grandmother said back laughing: "Yes, amazing. I hope I'll be as strong as he is when I get that old!"

Finally, after a few hours Great Grandpa he was looking around, inspecting every minor detail, to see if everything was to his liking. Then he nods in approval and said: "Okay, good. Let's go home now."

I was sitting with him and grandmother in the SUV we came in with a few others. I had Great Grandpa right next to me in the back seat to my left. He had already fallen asleep as he was tired and worked all day. His children drive him out to his orchard every other day to keep him busy and happy; and to keep his mind off of Great Grandmother. It's a three hour drive, but over 4 hours if old people are driving.

His Wife – our Great Grandmother – is bed ridden. She has been like that for as long as I can remember her, which is over 15 years. Great Grandmother is blind, she can't speak anymore or move her limbs. Before when they were living together Great Grandpa would nurse and serve our Great Grandmother all day. But he was becoming depressed from seeing her in that condition. So to help him not be depressed and healthy his children had to make the very tough decision of splitting Great Grandpa up from Great Grandma into two different houses. Strangest thing is, our Great Grandmother is 80 something years old, but she does not have a single grey hair on her head.

In the SUV on the the long and slow way home, the Great Grandpa woke up from his nap. He had been resting his head on my shoulder. I gave him some water. He finishes drinking and he says quietly to me, in English, since the other cousins were napping: "You know, Great Grandfather is very old. I think too much about my children and all of you now. I don't want to go and see everybody fight each other for money. I love all of you. I work my whole life for all of you. So I had the idea to spend all my money to buy all that land, so when I die soon, you can share it together and be happy. Promise me you won't fight each other and everybody will live together."

Before, I could answer him or promise, the grandmother got upset and yelled at him saying: "Father, just stop talking and go back to sleep. I don't want to hear about such things! You have many years to go." And the Great Grandfather got angry and said back: "Is it not true! I'm old. I'm dying soon. I tell no lie to my Great Granddaughter. It's human. You can't pretend we don't die. I want her to know what I did and what I left behind for her and everyone. So when I die, she'll know that I lived my life for everyone and take nothing with me." I promised him, and the other cousins gave him a massage and told him to go back to sleep, and he did. The rest of the ride home was in an awkward yet solemn silence. That was the last event me and Great Grandpa ever shared. And actually the last significant words he ever would say to me. Being as young as I am, we are busy with so many things – or so we make ourselves to be – that the family we take for granted is not as fun to be around as friends.

We all know that it's not over. We're all taking an emotional break for the next few rounds. This funeral needs to be planned. People need to be called. Yada yada. In the back of our minds we dread the next major fight: Great Grandmother.

I unfortunately, when I first heard that Great Grandpa was in the hospital and in grave condition, said to my mom in horror: "Oh no, that means Great Grandma is leaving too. The old people say they die in pairs." It's a cultural belief or something in our culture because we are around our elders and take care of them until they die. It's said that when one of an old couple who has lived together for so long dies, the other one soon follows. My mom told grandmother about this – or reminded her of it – and a sad look came across her face and she said quietly to herself: "It's true. So I heard also." Now the whole family is in this pensive state. As I mentioned earlier our Great Grandmother is bed ridden, blind, can't speak loudly anymore, and can't move her limbs. We also separated them into two different houses. Nobody has yet told our Great Grandmother that Great Grandfather has passed away.

Nobody was really expecting him to pass away. He was perfectly fine and active only weeks ago. He wasn't sick, he wasn't tired, or anything. So nobody wanted to tell the Great Grandmother that her husband was in the hospital, so as not to upset her. Now all of a sudden Great Grandpa has passed, when the doctors said he was going to be okay.

I grew up seeing my aunts and uncles take care of the Great Grandmother. Then I grew up taking care of her as well. She lives in one of our houses, and we have to fully care for her in every way. We have to cook soup and special mooshy food for her to eat, bathe her, change her clothes, massage her, and also wash her after she has gone to the restroom. It's a literal serving and service. But she isn't the only elder I have taken care of and this death of a loved one isn't the first time for me, or us. In my young life of only twenty some years, I have spent a good part of it nursing three old people and I have seen them all die in front of me either at home or watched them die in the hospital. None of the elders I served, feed, bathed, changed their diapers, took care of until death in English/American terms were "family" and I didn't get paid. Most often it also meant sleeping by their side at night to make sure they were okay during the night. But, when you are raised up inside such a culture and way of life, you are never consciously aware that it may be a wrong way of life nor question it.

I have my own birth grandmother to think about now. She is 80 years old. Still strong and walking. Incredibly my own grandmother still cooks breakfast, lunch, and dinner for her children she lives with; and for the cousins and me. She'll get upset if you touch her kitchen and cook. She also tends her garden in the back yard and feeds her pond of koi fish. So the serving and service is mutual. She spends her whole life as a mother and grandmother serving her children and grandchildren. And we all know that in turn, we must one day return that sacred favour of serving her to a peaceful end.

I have a little 10 year old cousin I wrote about a year ago maybe who lives with her mother and our grandmother. Her mom and dad met each other during their college years. Her dad's family had wanted to marry one of their children to one of my grandmother's children forever. So after their college years they got married. One day my little cousin's dad and his family put their elderly parents into a nursing home.

As soon as my cousin's mom [my aunt] heard this, she called our entire side of the family to inform us. My uncles and grandmother got very upset at this aunt's husband and siblings. My grandmother in a fit of rage said that they were barbaric and had the instinct of an animal and that they were not fit to be considered human to throw their parents away like that. My aunt divorced this man; and told him that he can visit their daughter, but he cannot raise her in such a inhuman culture as his, because she doesn't want her daughter growing up like them.

My little cousin from time to time is taken by her father to see her other grandmother at the nursing home. Every time she comes back she cries her eyes out for hours. Because even though she is very young, and even though we don't teach her our culture; she knows, sees, and feels the difference. She knows the way our grandmother lives – surrounded by us all - makes her happy. And she knows that her other grandmother is alone. She doesn't have to be taught which way she will grow up living.

I think all of this put together is the unspoken and painful lesson of Death; for those of us unfortunate enough to be intimately exposed to it. It is the same lesson my cousin learned painfully on her own terms from Life. Nobody has to speak it to her in words to tell her that it is our culture and way to care for each other and to serve one another; each serving the other in their proper time and season.

It's the same lesson I learn painfully. Like when I was in high school and I had to go to school, come home, do my home work, then take care of my baby cousins and my elders. Like when I was going to college balancing my mere 24 hours with my school, my home work, my friends, my family, and serving my elders. Scrounging what little time I have left for myself. It's the same lesson I learned in that SUV hearing Great Grandpa tell me his last lesson, of how he lived for others he loved, and will die with nothing. Empty as he came.

It is a hard lesson to put into words, what Death teaches the Living. It is a simple lesson, best not even put into words. Because when you do, the ignorant can take it apart and debate it for some merit or worth or for some religious or philosophical "truth" to it. But I'll share it anyways as best as I can in words for whatever cousin and people I know who have seen and had the sacred opportunity to watch a human they love die.

Death teaches us only to mind our actions and it casts our eyes' gaze on what truly matters: the Living. Going through a Death of a loved one forces us to understand that what we see is our human fate. We are all going to die. And so, genuinely realizing that, our eyes are brought from its wandering state to focus on those that matter to you in Life. When our eyes have been put in its right place, we mind our actions and focus such actions and deeds to and for others. And if you truly learn that lesson, and if you divide your Time up to serve those you love, think about your blood, people, and kin, give time to your intimate friends and self; you come to understand that everything else outside that circle of love, honour, and service is trivial.

Ask me – especially now – if I give a care about politics, about immigration, about 11 million undocumented somebodies, about what some group of republicans or conservatives or nazis are doing; about how gay people in some state are whining about getting married; about gay people crying to be in the military; about what religion is the truth; etc. I don't give a shit about those things. I'm too busy giving a shit about myself and my people. I got an entire clan I'm connected to. The young and the old. That's where my eyes and heart is looking. But I can understand how the average individuated Westerner in America – without a functioning family – with only himself and his ego to worry about can make such a big deal about other people's lives “out there.” To care about about what color the presidents skin in; where he was really born; how bad Muslims suck; why the hell we gotta kick 11 million Mexicans out because their presents in this country is somehow a personally issue affecting their private lives. I can understand why the common mundane can make it such a big deal what gay men do in the privacy of their own homes; what people worship and believe in the privacy of their own minds. Because if you didn't care about such outside matters so beyond your sphere of life; what the hell do they have left to mind?

But it's a good question though: What do we each do with our Life and Time; and ultimately for Whom in the end? You can tell if the person answering this question is a product of Magian Ethos and Magian Weltanschauung; from a person who came into existence in a living, ancient, human tradition; by the direction their eyes and mind and actions is focused. Outward or inward. Inward on Blood and Kin; or outward to random people? People who have no Connexion to and Honour for Blood, Kin, and Progeny have no real need to occupy their mundane minds with such things. There time is best spent doing what? You tell me. Who do you Serve in the end: your Blood; your religion; your political party; a corporation; or the State? Is it any wonder that in countries where people live together in big families and tight groups of friends who care for their elders and see them die and such people don't give a shit about the same issues a mundane Westerner who shuns Death and locks it up away out of sight and mind? But like I said somewhere earlier, these things are learned painfully, if we are ever fortunate to have Death as our teacher. Death is the greatest Adversary of Life and the Living. What it teaches is simple and human: Who do we Live for?

Blood & Honour

It's unfortunate – and revealing – that in the Western World, Blood and Honour, as a living human expression can only be found in poor neighborhoods where gang culture dominates; or in the upper strata of well bred white America. Otherwise, all of everyone in between those two extreme poles of Western social order seem to treat the concept of Blood and Honour as a disgusting disease to be absolutely avoided, lest their independence and individualism be lost. Serving and Honouring Kinfolk to these mundane barbarians is a diseaseful act; but spending your life as an individualized automaton serving an abstract State or a Corporation or some theoretical ideology to these people is the very meaning of their hubris lives.

But beyond the ailing West, many, many humans still live as they have always lived: for Blood & Honour. Which includes my own people and family. And to people like us still connected to our Humanness, our Folk, and Roots, this concept of Blood & Honour needs no words to articulate. I don't need a doctrine or guru to tell me that my blood relations, my kinfolk, and my intimate associates are the only ones that will love me genuinely and who will care for me in time of need. I don't need a religion or speculative dogma or theoretical ideology to tell me of the merits of Honouring my Elders, my Roots, my Folk. Like my little cousin; I learn about Blood and Honour painfully and slowly without word or teaching; where Death and the direct observance of the Death and loss of people I loved who once loved me, is my only teacher.

So that in my own family or clan everything we do and all that there is about us is fundamentally based on Blood and Honour. Or as the saying goes translated into English:

“There is only one Blood in a Clan; and Honour is the only Culture and Practice.” But that saying is born from hundreds of generations of pathei-mathos of a people. A people who from one generation after the next have humanly cared for their Old Ones and seen them die with their eyes. And the people of the West who have been in armies, in battle, or in gangs and in gang wars, are the ones in the West who will best know, intuit, and understand why witnessing the Death of a close comrade, loved one wordlessly teaches us the culture of serving and living for our Blood kin and comrades, and Honour. You can't put these lessons Death teaches into words. They will always come out goofy. But bring me a veteran of a military who has painfully seen his many comrades die and put him in the presence of my own family and culture, and he will understand in silence, intuition, in empathy and sympathy that my culture and his are the same sacred human culture, born from the same tearful lesson that Death teaches.

Regarding how everything my own family does is either based on Blood and Honour or goes back to those two things. As examples, if and when people in my family do get involved in politics it is based on Blood and Honour and not an arbitrary agreement of policies because they sound nice. Those in my own family who are into politics are strictly conservative republicans. Not because that party has great ideals and platforms. But because during the revolution the democratic party of America supported the Khmer Rouge who murdered half our family and the republican party opposed them, with Nixon later secretly bombing the area to try to exterminate the communist and Khmer Rouge. That's why. Because it has to do with Blood and Honour, in the human sentiment and recognition that whatever these republicans are, they were there for our people and family and did what they could, and in return we support them as best as we can from generation to generation.

Another example is that our Great Grandfather will be getting a Christian funeral at his church. He, his own children and half of my own family are Christian and not Buddhist. But they are not Christian because of ideology and belief. Ask my Buddhist grandma and one of my Christian grandfathers how many gods there are and they will both tell you that there is only one god out there and it doesn't matter how you honour it. My Great Grandfather and half my family became Christian because of Blood and Honour. Because in the 1980's when they first came to America the Buddhist people here never reached out to help. It was the White Christian people who came to help them, teach them how to find work and function in their new country, and provide for their simple human needs in their time of need and confusion. I have a White godfather who is a Jehovah's Witness, who is revered with a high amount of respect and honour by everyone in my family; he's even married into the family now. Not because of his beliefs; but because he has for some odd reason devoted over 20 years of his life, since the day my grandma and her children were confused refugees till now, in genuine service to us. And at no point in time, as he ever mentioned religion or asked anyone to convert.

Everything that we do – that is about us as a folk – has to do with Blood and Honour. It all springs from those two things, and it all falls back to those two things. Such that, even when my own family looks outward into the world beyond the flow of blood and the bond of honour, that what they see, do, participate in will always have something to do with the honour of the family, the interest of the family, and the family's culture of honour. These two things in my own culture/family/clan defines everything, even the most littlest traditional customs. For instance the little custom that no person younger than the oldest person can sit with their head higher than the oldest Elder. If your Elder is sitting on the sofa, you sit on the floor. If your Elder sits on the floor, you sit on the floor also with your head slightly lowered. Because of Blood and Honour, in that we know this Elder is our kin and folk, who has spent their whole life serving the his blood and kin and intimate associates, and therefore such Elders are given high Honour, because they have earned it rightfully.

There is no distinction in my own clan or family between blood relations and familiar intimate associates. Because you have to think about it: the people your aunts and uncles marry are not blood relations; they are associates of the blood; who become Family because of that close and intimate association. And this goes back to ancient tribal times of living in the forest. In those conditions you needed all the people you can get to help you survive. Any person who comes along to your little tribe in the jungle and wants to devote their life to help your tribe in exchange for the same is a blessing. That's what a Folk is. It has nothing to do with ethnicity, skin color, national ancestry, religion, politics, etc. Those things are petty issues, that are shown for the pettiness they are in the face of Death. It doesn't matter what skin color or religion or sexuality or party the person you are crying over is when they are dying before you; when such person has loved you and given much of their life in service to you.

Blood in context to Folk in this sense is an Aeonian thing. It is understood that the husband of your blood aunt is not blood, but he is because in time his child who will be your cousin is blood to you. The Folk, or Clan, or Family and its blood is like three strings tied together with a Knot in the middle. That Knot is the Folk or Clan. The strings are the different streams of blood. The Knot is the nexion, or nexus, or point of convergence of what were different streams of blood. You put your finger in this Knot and it moves down the three strings which retaining its pattern. And so with Family or Blood, it moves in Time like that Knot, such that way into the future, the Knot's general shape and pattern as a focal point where different streams of blood and ancestry converges remains. So it can be understood that what persons of a clan or folk today that is not blood related will produce people of blood relation in the future. We call this breeding. Who we are as a living person today is the literal convergence of thousands of years of ancestral history of every person that once existed that had to exist to make you. That history and ancestry flows in our Blood. And that Blood is passed down to progeny, in such a way that seen Aeonically, this Blood is a literal flowing stream that transcends Time. It's very telling that most of it is the Cultured, Refined, Cultivated Breed of Humans that consider and honour their Blood and ancestry; while the peasantry are completely ignorant and disinterested in their Blood; in where it has come; and where it will go.

Numinous Transmission

With the passing of Great Grandfather, there is also the absence of a source of wisdom. Wisdom here meaning practical knowledge a person has acquired from living and experience life which when applied bears results. Wisdom here meaning what philosophy refers to as Practical Reason. As opposed to what? To its opposite: Speculative Reason. Ideological gibberish is Speculative Reason; what your grandpa teaches you, born from his own experiences which bore him tangible results is Practical Reason, is Traditional Wisdom, pass down from one generation to the next as a Living Tradition.

The difference may be philosophical in the West. But in a culture where the practical wisdom of Elders is continuously passed down from generation to generation; the knowing of these two types of reason is innate, intuitive, and understood. There is a living difference between theoretical gibberish written by some scholar about some subject; and the living wisdom – Sasana – of a living culture. One are ideas you toss around in our head. The other is vital for the Aeonian continuance of Blood and Culture.

And in general this is the deplorable difference between East and West. Or not East and West; between a people with Culture and a people devoid of Culture. People that are refined and cultured, who because of ancestral traditions and culture have been brought up with the culture of Honour of one's Elders, have more respect for sasana – Practical Reason – than for speculative ideology. Whereas people who have no honour, no culture, no connection, no care for elders, no conscious connection with ancestral wisdom, deify institutions that teach speculative reason like universities and religion. That theoretical principle and that religious dogma is glorified above what is genuinely practical. You go to an average Homo Hubris in the West and what you will find is a person whose mind has been filled with all these theoretical knowledge, who spends so much time thinking of such theoretical knowledge, who even fight others over such theoretical knowledge, and you will see that such persons are devoid of living Practical Wisdom. And that lack shows in the fruit they bare in life.

I suppose to me, losing somebody like Great Grandpa perhaps gives the same feeling in a mundane Westerner when his college or church has been burned down. When the mundane Westerner stands before his burned down church he is horrified and worries about where he will go find what knowledge he was getting in that church. It's the same feeling. The loss of an Elder is the loss of an entire stream of living wisdom that can never be replaced. And this is another simple lesson that Death teaches. Having seen Elders die, we are more mindful of spending our Time with these Elders to get as much of their Wisdom as we can before they are gone.

In living cultures, such as my family there are a number of old people who act like central data bases for the families ancestral wisdom. These people are called "Nik Prach." Nik means "Person," and "Prach" means to "Orate," to "speak a whole lot about everybody and everything." They're usually old grandpas that collect all this gossip and information from everybody related to them, and everything they like such as their politics and religion. Just everything and at family events they just go on and on about those everythings while they drink. When there is a group of these types of grandpas at a gathering I picture in my mind a group [parliament] of Owls from Winnie the Pooh just "Praching." Great Grandpa was a Nik Prach. He was a vast data base of not only the family's ancestral history, but also of inside politics of nations and states since he served in public offices in the old days. It's through these types of Elders that the new generation is Rooted and Connected to their living history, ancestry, Tradition, and culture. It's these Elders that imparts to us their vast reservoir of practical wisdom born from their own life's experiences and pathei-mathos. But Death blocks that flow of practical wisdom. And even worse, when a people such as a vast majority of those in the West lock their Elders away somewhere, the flow of all that living history, potential tradition, ancestry, and connection is broken.

The Buddha in the past circumvented the problem of Death cutting off the flow of living practical wisdom when he created the Sangha which is the Earth's oldest continuous organization; 2500 years old. What he did was he gathered a bunch of Nik Prachs together, made them monks, initiated them into a Order [what the word Sangha means] and let them do their thing. With the inherent instruction that they find other Nik Prach to initiate into their Order. In this way, even though general society changes, even though generations die and come, even those Elders pass away; there is the Sangha that is a constant presence – as the Knot I allegorically spoke of earlier – in that society. That Order of monks simply goes out and “Praches” their wisdom, inseminating each new generation with the practical wisdom – Sasana – of a people. Not just teachings of a buddha; but more importantly, their own experience born wisdom and what wisdom they learned from those Elder monks who passed on in the Sangha. The closest concept to the Sangha in the West I think would be religious institutions like old traditional churches, and things like universities. But what is taught through the Sangha and through churches and colleges is different. One teaches Practical Wisdom; the others teach Theoretical Knowledge.

I brought this up – or I am thinking about this as I am writing – because Death personally has taught me to value practical wisdom over theoretical knowledge. And so, because this is my mindset, I have a much deeper appreciation for something like the ONA, and greatly so for something like The Numinous Way. Not because I can agree with its theories or principles; but because my eyes opened in a different culture and is conditioned to see and appreciate the practical wisdom therein. There is nothing to really “believe” or agree with or debate in the ONA or Numinous Way. They are simply vehicles that attempt to transmit a body or corpus of practical wisdom. Practical Wisdom is not something to think about in your head. They are things to be applied in life for results, because such things have been applied by others in the past and have yielded results. It has nothing to do with thinking or debating or agreeing. You just either apply the practical wisdom or not.

To me, I see the ONA as an “Order” as being a nucleus or kernel of what may evolve into a “sangha” of sorts that transmits practical wisdom across time from one generation to the next. It's how I have always seen it. Which is why when I do write for the ONA, I try to use my own life and practical experiences, as opposed to just dictating a string of ideas in the form of some lecture of new knowledge. But the way that I right, is just how my Elders teach me things. They don't lecture me doctrines and ideas. They just share their own experiences in their own life with me, then share with me what insights they may have come to realize, and leave it at that. The rest is up to me. If I resonate with my grandfathers and their wisdom, than their insights become meaningful to me inside. If I don't resonate with what I am hearing, then, the time has not come. You must first be in the process of experiencing something that resonates with what they say or have experienced something that is like what they say for their to be an empathic connection.

It's like my mom once told me long ago during one of our girl talks when she said: “Be careful with boys. Don't trust them so much. Don't be so cheap as to give everything that you are and have to them all at once. You will end up hurt very bad.” I didn't have the experience yet at the time to resonate with what she was telling me. And what she was telling me was not Theoretical Knowledge which is to be debated for its merit and truth. It was just a bit of Practical Wisdom born from her own experiences and pathei-mathos. When the season came where I experienced what had to be experienced with boys, then what my mother once told me resonated and was clearly apprehended inside of me wordlessly. I understood what she meant only in such proper time and season. And this is the nature of practical wisdom. Because practical wisdom unfolds for a person within the causal flow of time and season; when we receive an Elder's practical wisdom, our intuitive understanding of them also must unfold in its time and season.

Like a seed laying on a desert ground, waits patiently for the rain to come. When the ground's condition is proper, the seed naturally takes root and germinates. In the same way, what practical wisdom we get from our Elders are only seeds, which we keep in our minds. Mindful of them, but in the understanding that they germinate in their proper time and season. They are not things to be argued or debated. Because debating them is pointless. It's like when you mom tells you: "Don't touch that hot iron, it'll burn your finger." And then you debate what she said and say: "Well, when you say hot, how many Fahrenheit degrees exactly is hot? Is it truly molecularly made of iron or a composition of other elements hmm?" And then you touch the hot iron, and your dumb finger burns. There is actually a word for that, it's "Tah-chess!" It means something like but not exactly as "Stubborn!" It's when your mom or grandma tell you some practical advice, and you reject it because you think you know better than them or are smarter with more experience.

It's like if I were to give the practical advice that when you are in the living midst of experiencing the Death of a loved one: "Don't think about what is happening, don't intellectualize it; don't philosophize it. Just let it happen and mindfully Be a part of it till the end." If you have never experienced the Death of a loved one, what I said makes no real sense and has no value or meaning to you. But when the proper time and season of such experience comes, sooner or later you will intuitively understand what I said on your own in a wordless manner. It's not something to be debated. It's not speculative knowledge. I didn't sit here theorizing it. It's simply something I learned painfully in a living and practical manner. And that is all that it is and can be.

So this is what the Order of Nine Angles is to me in my eyes. It is a collection of practical wisdom, which grows to collect more such practical wisdom from each Initiate as they live their lives and learn directly from their/our experiences. What the ONA may have to impart has is to be applied not intellectually debated for merit or worth. This is something the average mundane gets confused with. There is a difference between Practical Wisdom and Theoretical Knowledge. And if you can't tell the difference or are scratching your head when you see the words Practical Wisdom, then you know you are alien to such concepts as Blood, Tradition, and Culture. Because all that you do know is what speculative reason school has taught you. Your mind is conditioned to only process such types of information. So when you do look at something like the ONA, Buddhism, Tantrika, or some other body of Practical Wisdom; you treat it and attack it like you would a theory.

But the understanding of these things comes only with truly being human, and living a human life connected in Blood and Honour with others over long periods of Time. This Humanness or Numinous Essence of Human Life is missing in much of the West. I wish it were different. I wish the West and much of its lost people would one day quest to re-discover their lost Humanity. In this regard, I do personally see value in what is trying to be presented through things like the Numinous Way, Reichsfolk, and the ONA. It's just that the people it is trying to share its practical insights with are enthralled by outside things that captivate their egos. Their minds and eyes are transfixed elsewhere. All we can hope for is that what little portion of the West which is becoming more Aware of their primal Humanness and their Blood and Culture, will struggle to presence the Numen. So that gradually as the old generations pass, the New Numinous Ones will endue the West once more with Life. In this endeavour, I would say that there is nothing more illuminating which will help you find your way back to your Human Nature, other than to experience Death face to face. Challenge yourselves and care for some one close to you and watch them die. Otherwise, you will never know what Death teaches the Living.

Closing Remarks

This is a first day in a week or so of silence. There is nothing to cry over or look at anymore since the body is being prepared. Everyone is just quiet and in their reflective states of mind. Doing their own thing to cope with Great Grandfather's passing. Preparing emotionally for the next round when Great Grandmother will follow. There is a sorrow to it all, this thing we call Human Life. But when you are fortunate enough like me to have seen and witnessed and been a living part of the full spectrum and cycle of Human Life; from the birth and caring for the little ones, to caring for the old ones and their Deaths; Life becomes Beautiful and Meaningful. As when we allow a music piece to play out till the last note falls. So when the last breath of a loved one who spent his life loving and serving you falls; the whole concert of his life can fully be appreciated as it is: a passing moment. And what seeds of practical wisdom he imparted becomes a priceless and parting Gift.

PASSIONS OF YOUTH

The one aspect that turned me on to the Order of Nine Angles is it's two essential prime objectives: A) The Progression of Man; and B) The Progression of His Civilization to its highest causal expression and potential.

How does a civilization come into being? Initially it begins some where deep in the collective psyche; or zeigeist; of a people. It's a silent subjective process, a wanting, a yearning, a feeling. This is the esoteric reason for bringing down the acausal force. Those of us of the ONA will understand. Then what?

Next comes the Fire... the setting of young passions ablaze. Thru words that evokes and provokes emotions. Words that call out those silent laten wanting, yearning, or feeling! This is Vindex... the Hitlers and Lenins and Obamas whose voice sets the young on fire and impregnates their mind with visions of change.

But why would a regime even give the time of day to make grand speeches to a crowd of dumb rebellious teens and postteens? Anyone with a little understanding of Nature will understand. Because Nature favors action over thinking. This is why evolution has allowed stupidity to be the common standard of Humanity. If stupidity didn't have its place in the greater scheme of Mother Nature, it wouldn't have been allowed to last all these millions and billions of years.

Can you imagine back in our primal days if a tribe of intellectual protohumans sitting around their campfire brainstorming; and along came another tribe into their territory? Do you think Nature would have it that the intellectual protohumans should debate issues and intellectually figure out the best reasonable method to deal with the invaders? What would happen to our intellectual protohumans and their genes, if the invading tribe were a group of young dumb people throwing rocks and spear everywhere? Yeah, it means your smartass genes and bloodline won't make it far.

There is a reason why Nature begins us all being stupid teens burning with a chemically (hormones) induced passion. Passion for anything. What army of any nation which has ever existed was composed of old 30-40 year old mature intellectual partyliners? None. We should all know this by now. Young dumb people burning with a passion to do something makes up all armies. Passion subsides with maturity for all of us giving way to intelligence in its proper time and period. The mindless young warriors of yesterday become the great minded cheiftans of tomorrow. Great from the experience and exploits of a carefree and passionate youth.

This Passionate Youth was what filled Hitler's armies that made the Third Reich possible. Not the mature partyliners. It takes a great speaker to set ablaze the passions of youth. It only takes a boring book of theories to turn the old men on. Those theories don't mean anything anyways. It's the promise of power and glory that these old men sees. The speeches don't mean anything anyways. The young and passionate just need a cause to burn for. Give them a meaningless symbol, and they fight for it. Give them a color and they'll wear it in rebellion. Give them an enemy and they'll kill. Give them Imperium and they'll work for it.

This is the fundamentals of the Art and Science of Civilization. This science begins with the understanding of Humanity and how it naturally works. When the insights are gained, they can be exploited and utilized. If the ONA is genuinely interested in establishing a future civilization, then it must ballance its "Occult" knowledge with the wisdom of Human Nature: "Man, Know Thyself."

Why then deny or condemn Nature? If the Dark Tradition is based on the very primal essence of Nature, why condemn the young and stupid? There is a time and place for mindless passion, and with time, to us all, will come maturity and intelligence... in it's proper time.

This ONA was never meant nor designed to be dominated by thinkers and book thumpers. It is desgined for the passionate youth who burns for a cause and ACT. Thru their action is an end result manifested. Thru their action they grow in experience, and with time, such experience becomes wisdom. A true undefiled wisdom not collected from any book of dead letters, but from the very living library of Nature Herself.

In many of the vulgar satanisms the very power of youthful passion is rejected for meaningless teenrebellion. They glorify the passionless thinkers instead, as if these "Nodoers" were the apex of human evolution. If Humanity relied on these passionless Nodoers, we wouldn't be here today.

The ONA is not a Nodoer religion. It's not a book club or nerd gathering. It was designed to DO. We all by nature start off as not so bright teens ready to burn for something... anything.

These are our warriors. Give them something to burn for and let them set the world ablaze. In their youth, they may not be interested in teachings or traditions, but let them be as Nature intended for awhile, to collect their experiences and grow mature. For in maturity, these same mindless, passionate warriors will mellow out and absorb the mysteries of the ONA in ripened age and become Dark Sages. There is a time and a place for everyone and everything. And because this ONA is a living reflection of Primal Nature, there is within our dark Shadows a place for every age and kind... the passionate youth and the mature partyliners. Or perhaps I should quote here Anton Long:

“What Satanism Is Not:

a) Satanism is not, nor can ever be, a religion, nor just a ‘philosophy’. A religion means acceptance of authority, the rigid structure of a ‘Church’ or a ‘Temple’, and a unified dogma (with the consequent schisms and claims to ‘authenticity’). The religious attitude is the antithesis of what Satanism really is – for Satanism is a way of living, a way of experiencing, in the raw, whereas religion abstracts, limits endeavour, behaviour and moralizes. In short, a Satanist plunges into reality, without any supports (moral, psychic or human) whereas a religious person has that reality prescribed by dogma, authority and such like, and is supported by a ‘Church’, its members and their attitudes. Satanism is an ecstatic affirmation of existence – a taking of existence into new and higher realms, as well as a plunge into existing darkness and the creation of new darkness.

b) Satanism cannot have anyone impose upon it any structure, authority, or institution of any kind by claiming a ‘dark mandate’ or some kind of ‘revelation’. There can be no such thing as an ‘infernal mandate’ of whatever kind because the only thing that really matters to Satanism is experience, its accumulation and the highly individualized learning that results from such experience. A genuine Satanist, for example, confronted by an entity which exhibited all the powers attributed to Satan would not even accept what that ‘entity’ said and would most certainly not show any submission – instead, they would a defiance, a reasoned assessment of what was said, and then a judgement made from experience. A Satanist never surrenders to anything – and would rather die, proud and defiant, than submit. This applies even to ‘Satan’. If and when a Satanist accepts guidance, it is from someone of experience who has explicated Satanism by their life and thus who can offer advice based on that experience. The aim of Satanism is to create wilful, characterful, defiant, unique individuals who have or can fulfil their potential as gods – it is not to create followers or sycophants. An ‘infernal mandate’ implies sycophancy.

c) Satanism does not involve discussions, meetings, talks. Rather, it involves action, deeds. Words – written or spoken – sometimes follow, but not necessarily. The ideal candidate for Satanism is the individual of action rather than the ‘intellectual’.”

This generic disliking and hatred for young passionate adolescents is a product and insurance policy of Nazarene culture and Ethos which is by nature inertal and conservative. This Nazarene hatred for the passions of youth and their desire to destroy this passion is evident in their religion’s control of sexuality and sexual expression, which is the first awakening which marks a child’s advancement into adolescence and is the beginning of a naturally burning passion. A Nazarene mindset based on maintaining religious and political orthodoxy and control will logically hate and cause others to hate Humanity's Fire who are the catalyst and ember of change, progression, disruption, and action in motion – the young; the newer generations, that have not yet been trained and conditions to be Quality citizens.

This is clearly the case in modern nations under Magian control. High school is just an excuse to keep these young out of the streets. What age group are most likely involved in protest demonstrations? The young and passionate, those roughly between 15-25 years of age. What age group is the target of a police state? The older mellow citizens, or the younger passionate ones who want something different? What is the force and age group that can, if collective enough tear down both America and Communist China? The passionate youth. They may not be smart yet, but this smarts comes with time for everybody. They are chemically ready to burn at all times with the slightest spark.

This Nazarene hatred for the passionate youth is even adopted by the vulgar satanism such as LaVeyan satanism as their slogan and catch phrase: Quality over Quantity; their antagonism towards social organizational conformity; and their hatred for collective identity. Individualism is a Magian tactic of divide and conquer to separate you from the power source of a coherent social order to make you easier to control.

Thru their Magian politics, Nazarene religion, and chemicals processes such as floridation of tap water, the more virulent and passionate portion of human social order is mellowed and brought under control. The flames of youth are put out. The young are kept in check by social ridicule for being stupid rebellious teens and post teens without a cause. Where then does the ONA stand on this issue? Think on these things a while.

If we learn to successfully make a Nation of our ONA, it would be much easier in the future to learn how to manifest a civilization. A Nation is not just a parliament or senate of thinkers and traditionalists. It is also made of common citizens and an army, each unique, each in their own state of mental development, but all loyal to the same Nation. Our National Slogan should be: "Quality AND Quantity." The Quality to think and instruct; the Quantity to do and act.

If Vindex is to set the world a fire – the young make the best kindler.

PATHS WALKED

Paths Walked

In very ancient times what is known today as India was culturally split into two halves, the North and South. The South was populated by the Dravidians and Mon-Khmer. The North – old time Grecian Bactria – was populated by a different set of people. The “Southerners” had their own folk or indigenous Sasanas which in those days was something animistic and nature based. Later their Sasanas developed into something called “Shaivism” which the Dravidians practiced, and “Shaktism,” which the Mon-Khmer practiced. The “Northerners” practiced their own “religion” which came to be known as the “Vedic” Tradition. Since earliest times the Vedic northerners disliked the ways and practices of the non-Vedic southerners. The Northerners – from their Vedic perspective – would often call the ways of the southerners heterodox, “evil,” and grotesque. Eventually this would give rise to the philosophical notion of a “right handed path,” and a “left handed path.”

But this notion of a left and right path is not actually unique to Brahminical India. The same basic idea developed independently all the way in China during ancient times. I actually know very little about the Indian notion. But because I have over 100 books on the Chinese version of “left” and “right” path, I can say I know “more” about the Chinese version of left and right handed paths than the Indian version. I also practice the Chinese version; both right and left; in an “amateur” way to supplement my meditative stuff.

As a note, in this entire essay, I’ll be using a more “Eastern” Understanding of “right hand path,” and “left hand path.” Which understanding is or course my own personal grasp of such terms. I understand that there are various different interpretations of these terms according to several different schools of thought in the West. So don’t get asshurt if it sounds like I’m not paying the 'right' respects to the left hand path you may be associated with. The 'left hand path' as various ONA associates describe is something I actually like and agree with which with it's focus on Pathei-Mathos, may be more in Harmony to the essence of this essay in the end. These are just words written.

Chinese Taoism

You cannot talk about China without speaking of their indigenous folkish way we in the West call "Taoism." Except in the West when we say and speak of "Taoism" we only have 30% or a third of the whole folk tradition. This is because in Chinese folk culture, "Taoism" has Three Forms. Each Form really has nothing to do with the other, but are culturally inter-related as a folk Triad.

So the first species of "Taoism" is what we are all familiar with in the West which is called "Philosophical Taoism." This is the stuff based on Lao Tzu and the Tao Te Q'ing and so on. It's appealing to hippies. It's a groovy and psychedelic way of seeing the world. You read the little book and if you agree or even understand the mystical gibberish it expounds you call yourself a "Taoist."

The second species of "Taoism" is called "Religious Taoism." In China this second type has no real name or -ism. It's just their [our] folk culture which has been institutionalized into a coherent body of rites, ceremonies, animistic beliefs, and sectarian observances. This second class of "Taoism" cannot be divorced from the folk culture of its people, because its so intertwined that the two are the same fabric. I guess similar to how Jews are both a group of people and a belief system. This class of "Taoism" is not written in books or bibles. You have to learn the ins and outs from your people and elders.

"Religious Taoism" in China has its own temples and pantheon of folk gods, deities, and spirits. If you have ever physically been to China or Taiwan or Singapore, you will know exactly what I am trying to refer to. It's the folk cultural "religion" you see all these Chinese people doing. You see them going to temples, burning incense to statues of a handful of gods, offering fruits and ducks and fake money to the ancestors. Shrines are often kept in natural places for the nature spirits, etc. The philosophical ramblings of Lao Tzu plays a minor role here. It is the core or base foundation upon which their religious worldviews are based on. In the knowing that all of nature – which includes us humans – are a part of a Whole Flowing. A Flowing which we must strive to be in Harmony with. And so part of the folk culture of living "religious Taoism" is to strive to somehow live in tune with our natural environment.

From this notion of harmony with the environment and the flow of Chi – life force – you get crazy ideas like Feng Shui. The Feng Shui stuff for some reason made into the West and in places like Orange County is pretty in vogue with the yuppy gentry. Although the feng shui sold and popularized in the West is a Westernized form of it tailored for its market. If you think feng shui – as a Westerner – is crazy, then the real folk tradition of 'feng shui' is plain psychotic.

My family is half Chinese. We come from Hokkien and Teochew stalk. My aunt-mom; when she's telling me stories about her grandfathers; calls them "Ong Ya," which is how my grandmother calls them sometimes. Ong Ya is actually a Khmerized rendition of a Vietnamese word. I don't know how it's spelled. That's just my phonetic spelling. I also don't know what the word really means in Vietnamese. But my family seems to use the word Ong Ya to make fun of old men with those really long Chinese goatees. When they see White guys with a goatee, they'll say: "Look, he looks like an Ong Ya."

But the Chinese people that made my family came from China a long time ago to Southeast Asia, so after so many generations everybody lost ability to speak Hokkien, but the folk culture is still there. So my family doesn't know it's called "feng shui" [they don't call it anything] but they still practice it as a left over element of their folk culture. Which I think is actually really crazy.

For instance my family put me to work or to help out at our family businesses since I was little. One of my chores I did was sweep the shop up in the morning. So I'd take a broom and sweep the junk outside the door. And my aunts would yell at me and tell me saying: "No, no, no! Sweep it back in quick! Wrong way. In the morning you sweep from the door inside. Only at night you sweep from the inside out the door. Sweeping in from the door in the morning brings good fortune for the business. More money. Sweeping out the door in the morning means you're pushing the money away." I'd try to argue some "Western sense" into them by telling them that it's just trash and dust? But they insist on keeping to their old ways.

In a "real" folk Chinese business your aunts and uncles will make you even go out to the parking lot to put a stick of burning incense in the grass or somewhere each morning when the business opens as a way of paying your respects to the "spirits" that guards and lives in the area. This way they don't disturb your business with bad luck and will instead help your business be prosperous. After you give the stick of incense to the parking lot spirits, you go inside and change the water cup in front of the Fat Buddha to give him fresh water. Then you give him new fruits and cookies [he likes food, can you tell]. Burn your incense, and pray to him to bless your shop. Then there is an extra thing you can do, which the old people like your grandpas and grannies do, which is scatter uncooked rice in the parking lot just in front of the shop. You'll hear them either talking or praying to the pigeons up on the telephone wire to come and eat the rice in large groups so the customers can also come in large groups.

This isn't just a "Chinese" thing. You see it done all over the place in Little Saigon here in Orange County. You can tell which shops are run by Vietnamese mixed with Chinese ancestors by the Fat Buddha with the literal piles of food in front of him, the pigeons crowded around the front of the shops, and the many red sticks planted in the ground somewhere. The red sticks are the bottom part of incense sticks that don't burn. In our folk tradition [Chinese] it's bad luck to remove those sticks and throw them away. So what happens is that at temples, shrines, and sidewalks in certain places you have a collection of all these red sticks. The Fat Buddha – we call him Preah Ganjai – in the folk cultural religious "Taoism" is an actual deity of that folk tradition. Before he was made a Buddhist Bodhisattva, he and his friend Kuan Yin were indigenous folk "Taoist" deities, and they still are.

In Khmer we call Kuan Yin "Preah Niang Gung See Im" which is the best phonetic rendition I can do. Preah Niang means something like Venerable Lady, or Goddess, and 'Gung See Im' or just 'Gung Im' is her name. I don't know how she is venerated in some sects of Mahayana Buddhism, but in the folk culture of "religious Taoism" Gung Im is a sexist deity. It is considered very bad luck for a man to venerate or wear a jade image of Gung Im. She doesn't like guys. You will never see a Chinese man wear an image of Gung Im, unless they are gay or something. It's like the same cultural effect as when you walk down a street and you see a White guy wearing pink dangling earrings and bracelets. You can wear those things, but you look like a fag.

In the folk cultural form of "religious Taoism" Gung Im is not for business. She's some sort of "protectress" of women who keeps you safe, finds you a good mate, helps you be more "fertile" for child baring stuff, helps you have a happy family, protects your children, and helps girls be smart. Or not smart, but more clever than men, so they can't trick you or take advantage of you. And your elders will say she picks you, not you pick her. When I was in high school I had a weird dream that I was hiking in a forest with lots of trees and Gung Im came out from behind a big tree holding a gold necklace in her hand. I recognized her in the dream as Gung Im, so I knelt and clasped my hands three times at her feet for her. In the dream she spoke Khmer to me telling me that she wanted to give me the necklace. In the dream she requested that I put it on in front of her and to never take it off, and as long as I wear it she'll watch over me and keep me safe.

While I was putting the necklace on, she knelt by me, looked at me and then told me not to trust men, and told me that I don't need them [men] for anything, that "girl people" must learn to take care of one another. I woke up and told my aunt-mom who told my grandmother, and the same day they took me to China Town so I can look for a gold necklace that looked like the one Gung Im gave to me. I had the weird dream before I learned from my elders that Gung Im was "sexist" or preferred to work with girls. So ever sense then my grandmother told me to pay homage to her regularly because she "picked me" in a dream. So I have a statuette of her next to my Buddha. In front of her is a silver bowl with water you. You pray to her with a flower and offer the flower to her by placing it into the water. Then you burn your incense for her and spray her statue with perfume. She does pick men sometimes.

Another "folk Taoist" thing is that when you buy or build a house you want to get one with the front door facing the west. I once asked my grandmother why the direction of the door is important. She said a house with the door facing west gives the house and family a cool and calm atmosphere where everybody gets along. A house with the front door facing east is not liked in Chinese culture because it's believed the house is a misfortune to the family, because the heat of the sun causes a lot of heat and friction in the household. Then the folk stuff also dictates how you arrange your furniture too. You should never have sofas and couches with their back to the front door. This is bad luck for the house and family. It's said that such an arrangement makes people not like your family. You face your couches and sofas so that when you sit you face the door. Essentially, it's more inviting that way and the flow of life force hits your face or something. You also should keep vases and things with water near the door. Nobody really knows why. We just do it. We have vases of flowers with water in it, and potted plants which we water around the front part of the house.

Then there is this really weird folk "religious Taosit" thing that is just simply strange and embarrassing. My aunt-mom said she had to do it and that her Chinese elders told her to do it, so I had to do it myself when I was 6 or 7. The folk tradition is that when you are a child and you have a bed wetting problem like me and my aunt-mom did your Chinese elders tells you to go and pray to the spirit that lives in the kitchen stove each night before going to bed and ask it to help you stop peeing in your bed. You actually stand in front of your stove and clasp your hands and pray to it. I really don't know how a spirit that lives in a kitchen stove has to do with wetting your bed, but apparently it does to Chinese people. It worked though. I have all these cousins who had the same problem and they all also prayed to the stove deity for help. All of a sudden "Taoism" doesn't sound so cool any more does it?

Left & Right

Then there is the third species of "Taoism," which is not so well known of in the West, although many of its elements have found its way into the West. The third type of "Taoism" is called "Practical Taoism." It is neither philosophical or folk religious. It is based on doing and performing certain acts. Most of the books on "Taoism" I have are about this third type exclusively.

This third class of "Taoism" began with Taoist sages, shamans, or hermit who lived on the tops of mountains. Two mountains are famous and well known in this class of "Taoism." There is Green Mountain of the Immortals, and Wu Dang of the Masters. Wu Dang means Black Mountain, and lends its name to a very well known rap group known as the Wu Tang Clan. You'll often hear folklore about the "Immortals of Green Mountain," or the "Masters of Wu Dang."

In very ancient times folk Taoist shamans removed themselves from society and went to live up in mountains to figure out how to become immortal beings. This is also essentially based on a Taoist way of understanding the universe. Everything is a part of Tao: the Way the "World" flows as one Whole. Therefore if the Tao is eternal, and everything is part of the Tao, then people can embark on a quest to Realize their eternal nature, which is called Immortality.

How the ancient sages did this eventually was split into two methods of attainment: Right Handed practice aka Single Body practice aka Mono Cultivation; & Left Hand practice aka Double Body practice aka Dual Cultivation.

The basic process of achieving Immortality was described by these sages as being "alchemical." They even used alchemical language by using words for metal and smelting processes to conceal their secrets from the uninitiated. The methods of Immortality back then were a heavily guarded secret veiled in alchemical gibberish and flowery Chinese pictorial symbolism. For instance you'll hear talk of a "Jade Palace," a "Jade Stalk," a "Moon Flower," the "Midnight Cave," "Dragon Pearls/Balls," alchemical stuff like "Sulfur," "Salt," and "Mercury," processes like "Igniting the Salt in the Stove," "Vapourining" or "Refining" "Salt" into "Sulfur," turning sulfur into "Mercury," making the Mercury into "Dragon Pearls," feeding the "Priceless Pearls" to the "Lotus of a Thousand Petals," and so on. With these secrets as a background, many of the old Chinese kung fu movies will make more sense. They weren't just fighting just to fight. They were fighting to steal or protect secret manuscripts that deciphered this veiled language, so their rich benefactor can obtain the secrets of the “Immortal Ambrosia,” to live forever. If you become familiar with the veiled alchemical language of this type of Taoism, and then go reread things like the Emerald Tablets of Hermes or the alchemical works of Paracelsus, things will make a little more sense. Gold is the supreme metal and is Incorruptible. It represents the supreme attainment which is the Incorruptible state of Prenatal Nature, Original Nature, Eternal Nature, or Immortality.

But that notion of Eternal Nature split into two factions. One faction sought to achieve a state of spiritual immortality where they became one with Wu Wei. The other faction sought to attain physical immortality to lord over people as gods. So the former uses what they call ‘right handed’ practice and the latter used what they called ‘left handed’ practice.

The generic term for “the Practice” in this class of Taoism is “Taoist Yoga,” or its Westernized diluted name: Chi Gung. This is where we get things like Iron Shirt chi gung, Diamond Body chi gung, Rainbow Body chi gung, Embryonic body chi gung, Cosmic Orbit, Microcosmic Orbit, Entering the Jade Palace, and so on.

The Shoalin Monks are a good and easy example of right handed Taoist Yoga, or Single Body practice. The end goal is a spiritual immortality, the tool to attain that goal is the Body. The monk uses his own body and learns the secret or esoteric method of mono cultivation where he learns to generate Salt [jing chi], vapourizes it into Sulfur [chi], rises it and purifies it into Mercury [shen chi], from which the Pearl of Great Price is born which is also known as “Dragon Balls,” or “Dragon Pearls.” Have you ever gone to an authentic Chinese restaurant where in the front of the doorway are two lion like animals with their paw on a ball? The creature is or was a [lionine]“dragon” and the ball it guards is the Pearl of Great Price; which in the Western schools may be equated with the Philosopher’s Stone.

The end goal is distant. There are immediate uses of Chi. Like Iron Shirt chi gung. Basically Iron Shirt is when you learn to breathe in chi from the environment with your body. You purify the chi and pack it into your muscles. This way you don’t get hurt when people punch or kick you. There is also Bone Marrow chi gung, which is the same concept, but you pack your refined chi into your bones so as to make them less prone to breakage in fights.

I actually practice the very basic method of chi breathing uses in both of those things. You first learn to “breathe” with our fingers. Basically when you inhale you look at your finger tips and as you inhale visualize air or stuff being sucked into your finger tips. When you exhale you pack the stuff somewhere. If you do this many times, you end up feeling a cool sensation at your finger tips every time you inhale. This method is also called “chi absorption” which has its left hand counterpart. But in the right handed practice you learn to absorb Earth Chi through your feet, Nature Chi thru your hands, and Cosmic Chi via the crown of your head. Then you mix and store all that in “the Stove.” The Stove or “Clay Pot,” or “Crucible,” is a “point” called a Dan Dien roughly two inches below your belly button, and two inches deep. Dan Diens are like nodes in your body made up of your chi meridians and chi network in your body. They are roughly similar to the Indic concept of “chakra,” but not the same thing.

Because of how the right handed method is used by groups like the Shaolin monks, Taoist

Yoga of this type is also called “Internal Martial Arts.” This internal martial arts was jealously guarded by schools of martial arts. There was an old unwritten law which say you are never to teach an outsider the esoteric parts of martial arts. This commonly caused Chinese people to be very reluctant in teaching Westerners any kind of martial arts. If they were taught it, only the outer Forms – the moves – were given to them. Form without Essence is Empty. You can use it to fight, but your missing half of the Whole thing. If you want to know what the other half can do, all you need to do is youtube Shaolin monks performing their stuff. One style I know which teaches both the Internal and External stuff in the West is Southern Style Tong Long [praying mantis].

The left handed method to me is more fascinating and interesting. The Goal is literal physical immortality or at least to live a really long life. The tool to attain this goal is your body, but also the bodies of others. Double Body practice or dual cultivation means it involves sex. This method was said to have been taught to the Yellow Emperor by the Dragon Lady, or Dragon Empress. Basically the Yellow Emperor desired to be immortal so he can rule over his realm like a god over men. So the Dragon Empress taught him how to use and absorb chi from his harem of 10,000 concubines. One interesting note with this left handed method is that the sages say that girls over 19 years of age have lost their potent chi, rendering sex with them to be useless in the quest for physical immortality. Another thing to note is that to make chi or refined chi, you need two types of jing chi: Yin Chi the negative charge and Yang Chi the positive charge. When the two charges are mixed together in the Stove they inflame or vapourize each other becoming refined chi. Girls are vessels of yin chi. This means if the Yellow Emperor had a thousand girl concubines and absorbed all of their yin chi, he had better have the equal amount of yang chi or it's all useless. Boys are vessels of yang chi.

In this method of cultivation, there are many weird and strange ways of cultivating chi from other people. One strange way was to boil the urine of girls until it became salt crystals, and you eat the crystals. But not too much because the crystals have female hormones. Instead you give those crystals to young boys which over time makes them very feminine. Since they were boys with yang chi, and feminized with yin chi, such types of vessels were good for collective both chi you need.

One method of collecting chi in this left handed method is also chi breathing, but with a certain body part. The technique has several “colorful” names such as “Crow’s Beak,” “Crow Pecking,” and so on. Basically you learn to breath with our penis to absorb the chi of the other person. Left handed practice is more easier for girls according to the Dragon Empress, because during sex a girl does not lose anything, whereas a man loses his “stuff.” The Empress goes to say that for a man to be equal to a woman in sexual cultivation, he must learn to retain his semen and not ejaculate, because shen chi is made from alchemically refined semen [or the female equivalent: Moon Flower]. She also says that in such methods of cultivation of chi, if the man does not know what he is doing and the girl knows how to breathe in chi with her cervix, the man becomes the victim. So according to the Empress, in the left handed way of attaining chi, girls are by default superior to men. This must be the case by Nature’s decree because the girl is the one that creates new human beings in her womb. She needs the extra chi saved in her Stove to make the new person. But sexual cultivation is not the only method of collecting your chi.

You also learn to chi breathe with your eyes and hands. The goal is to get to the point where you can point your dragon and tiger points at people, breath in, and literally suck the life force out of them, dropping them dead. You can find your dragon and tiger points on your palm by bending your ring finger to touch your palm, where they touch is roughly the places where your dragon and tiger points are. These points are like channels that can open and close to either release or absorb chi. These points and your pupils are the 4 supreme points where the most chi can be evacuated [projected] or absorbed. In the right handed method in martial arts you would learn to project chi out of your dragon and tiger points and use that part of your palm to strike your opponent instead of a weak fist.

I once read accounts when I was researching on African folk traditions of Juju priests. Juju I suppose is a word meant to speak of folk traditions similar to Voodoo and so forth. I can't remember what part of Africa the account was from. But the people say that their "Juju" shamans can stare a lion down and make birds fall out of the sky dead by staring at them. In the left handed method, you learn to project your chi out of your eyes to take control of people or you suck people's chi with your eyes. In the right handed method you incorporate eye chi projection into your martial arts by projecting your chi into your opponent's head causing them to become confused, dizzy, or to even black out from absorbing their chi.

In the right handed method, you have to find alternative sources of yin and yang chi. Moon light is a source of yin chi. Sun light is a source of yang chi. You learn something called body breathing or skin breathing which is when you are able to breathe in and absorb chi from the environment, moon light or sun light with the entire surface of your skin. This method of skin breathing is also used in special dual cultivation pairs where the pair is of the same gender. Two gay boys going at it doesn't do anything because they are both yang charged. It's like rubbing two positive poles of a car battery together. To supplement or balance their overload of yang chi they have to regularly skin breathe Moon Light and eat things with yin chi. Then the same goes with a sapphic pair who both have yin chi. They would have to supplement or balance that double dose of yin chi with regular skin breathing of solar light and eating things with lots of yang chi in it, such as onions and red meat. A sapphic pair also does not need sperm to make their Dragon Pearl, although sperm would make it more potent. Instead a sapphic pair can substitute the base alchemical yang salt with something called Moon Flower, which is said to blossom only in the Midnight Cave. The Midnight Cave is just your muff. Moon Flower is a term used to call a post sexual type of vaginal discharge which is milkier and whiter and thicker than the normal clear lubricant. This Moon Flower is said to be more charged with chi and is a prized element in Taoist Alchemy.

The methods for immortality diverges then in practice at the top level. Top level meaning in alchemy you work from the BASE metal/level UP to Gold. Alchemical Salt or jing chi is a base metal which correlates with the region of the body Taoist Alchemists call the Dark Northern Sea. The Dark Northern Sea oddly is the region of your body where your genitalia, perineum, anus, and tip of the tail bone are found. In Taoist Yoga the tip of the tail bone is called the "Pump" or the "Water Wheel." It's where the base alchemical salt is ignited with air [deep breathing] and "pumped" up the spine towards the Jade Palace, which is your Hypothalamus in your brain. The head region of the body is sometimes called the Southern Sky, or the Heaven. The Dark Sea is sometimes called Earth. The spine is called the Back Meridian. From the Jade Palace the chi is brought down the Front Meridian. The tip of your tongue has to touch the roof of your mouth to connect the Back and Front meridians into a Circuit. The chi is brought back the Earth or Northern Dark Sea. This full circuit is called a Microcosmic Orbit. The Orbit is also referred to as the the Union or Unification of Heaven and Earth. This Union of heaven and earth is sometimes depicted as a dragon biting it's own tail. The dragon's head being Heaven or the Jade Palace, the tail being Earth or the Dark Sea. The Orbit is the most essential process of Immortality. All your chi pearls, balls, whatever must do this orbit over and over. This generates something called Shen or Shen chi which is the refined chi from which the coveted Gold grows from. Shen means "spirit" roughly.

This is where the two paths drastically diverges. The right hand path uses shen chi as the base of a practice sometimes translated as Embryonic Body chi gung. The basic concept is that humans and life is not inherently immortal. Meaning that when you die, your chi or life force dissipates back into the universal sea of chi it came from. In the same way where an ice burg can be said to be physically distinct from its oceanic matrix, but when it melts, it becomes ocean again. Spiritual immortality is needed to become one with the Wu Wei because such stuff takes a long time. So the awareness of mind of the sage must be housed in an immortal "spirit" body. Which is where the embryonic body chi gung comes in. The shen chi is gradually packed and condensed into a form that looks like a body. This "embryo" is kept inside the Stove to "gestate." Over the natural life time of the sage this body is nurtured with shen chi. Once the embryo body is fully formed it is called a "Rainbow Body." Then when the sage dies he/she places his awareness inside this "Rainbow body" and continues the work of becoming Wu Wei consciously in higher realms of existence.

The left hand path; seeking physical immortality; uses shen chi in a different way. Inside the Jade Palace is something called the Lotus of a Thousand Petals. This Lotus is said to be unopened and in its seeded state. The shen chi is the only water this unopened lotus feeds off of. Anatomically this Lotus of a Thousand Petals is your Pineal Gland, which is also called the Third Eye. It technically is anatomically an primitive eye; or rather, an Optical Organ. I dare you to find a real text book from a good college library on anatomy. A good one and research on the Pineal Gland. You will discover that this gland bizarrely has a working Optical Lens, a [vestigial] Retina where one is suppose to be, and its own Optical Nerve. The only thing is that it is shrunken and has over the process of evolution taken on a new function. It's actually not odd to have a "third eye," if you know what you are looking at. This third eye in our brains is just a vestige of something we had back when we [as in us creatures] were reptiles. I can't remember the technical name for it, but if you have ever had a pet lizard and you look at the top of their head you will see what looks like a small crystal made of a tiny bead of Jade. You can clearly see this on Horny Toads, which actually looks like jade. This tiny jade dot is actually a primitive optical organ used by the lizard to detect shadows and movements above it [birds and stuff]. When I was little I used needles to poke this jade dot out of horny toads to see what it did or didn't do to them since I was wondering why or what it was there for.

In the left hand practice the shen chi is used to feed this Lotus to open it. That Lotus has something precious called Ambrosia or the Elixir of Immortality. This Ambrosia is the "Nectar" of this Lotus, which drips when it is fully opened. Opening this Lotus takes a life time to achieve, if ever. Lots of shen chi is needed. The opening of the Lotus initiates changes in your cranial structure which are signs that you are getting close. One sign or side effect is called "Returning to your Prenatal State." This is when the various cranial plates that make up your skull loosens again. Again as in, if you know babies, you know that the plates in their skull are not fully bonded together yet. Another sign is that your skull becomes soft again like that of a baby's. This happens because the Lotus can't actually open [grow] inside such a rigid skull. There is just no room for something the size of a pea to grow into something the size of a quarter or ping pong ball without smooshing other parts of the brain and killing you or damaging your very important frontal lobes.

When the Lotus opens it is said to drip a thick, sweet substance down through two holes in the roof of your mouth. If you stick your tongue to the roof of your mouth back a little just below your sinus cavity, you'll feel two very strange "things" on either side. They feel like small star shaped things or crisscrosses, as if two holes had been closed up, but not closed up all the way. That's where the Ambrosia drips into your mouth from. You swallow this Ambrosia which is said to slowly make changes into your organs, flesh, bones, and cells, over time. But this Lotus needs a steady supply of shen chi, or everything closes back up.

It sounds unbelievable to think that a person can be physically immortal. And it probably is not possible. But if you study right, you'll figure out that there are documented cases of Chinese sages or men who lived incredibly long lives. One such case I read about was documented by the various Chinese governments that come and gone. It was about a man who claimed to be 200 years old during the 1700's. At first the Emperor of the China back then took interest in this man's outrageous claims because he too wanted to live forever. When that dynasty ended and the 1800's came, this guy was documented by officials and locals who said this guy still claimed to be very old, except now he claimed to be a whole 300 years old. When the 1800's ended and the 1900's came, government official took an interest in this guy whom locals claimed was now claiming to be 400 years old. The officials didn't like such liars fooling locals I guess. But checking records on this guy, they found out that he had a 400 year old criminal record of telling his tall tales to unfortunate gullible peasants. He finally died in the early 1900's of really old age.

I read this other account of a oddly very old man. This account comes from England of all places. I can't remember the fine details, but I think it took place around the 1600's when the King of England of that era had heard from a village of peasants that such village had a local celebrity whom they claimed was at least 200 years old. The old man in question was so old, he forgot how old he was. Said he stopped counting after a hundred something. The King, after hearing this, thought he'd go and pay the old man a visit to see if it was real. At the village the King asked the old man many questions about events and records to try and verify his age. After the King was convinced himself that the old man must be at least 200 years old just like the villagers said, the King asked the old man what his secret was. What was he doing that made him live for so long? The old man replies back something like: "Oh, you know, I eat potatoes and roots. We're poor here. I've been eating the same potatoes and roots for as long as I can remember. No meat since I can't afford none. Keep myself busy working on the farm like always. Nothing special, just roots and daily work." Thinking that the old peasant was hiding something, the King invited the old man to his castle to have a feast and festive drink with him and his royal entourage to coerce the old man into giving up his secret. The old man was very happy to be invited to the castle to eat with his King so he went to the feast. After feasting and partying with the King, the old man died the next day.

Anyways. With the Chinese way of using and phrasing terms like “right hand” and “left hand” we have something extra to use to gain a better point of understanding of what those terms may have also allegorically meant in Brahminical society. In our modern era its easy to tell the difference between what is sometimes called “right handed tantrika,” and what is sometimes referred to as “left handed tantrika.”

Right hand tantra is the more spiritual side, which uses your single body as the tool of the attainment. This would be when you sit and meditate on your 7 chakra. Chant mantras, and contort your body into odd positions: the more contorted and ridiculous, the better the yogic attainment I hear. This right handed stuff usually is Vedic scriptures friendly. The left handed stuff is the more Vedically unfriendly version. You have the symbolical Five M's, where you're blasphemously eating meat [fish], having sex [maituna], and so on. Certain schools or sects of vama-chara go further and incorporate blood, etc.

In ancient times when Brahmanism was huge in India, the Northerners were the more “orthodox” type to stick religiously to their Vedas. It was the Southerners with their non-Vedic primal Shaivism [Sasana Kumara] and Sasana Shakta that were “heterodox” in practice. In this context, “right hand” is what is friendly with Vedic tradition, and left hand is what is not acceptable to Vedic tradition.

The right handed world view was that the world was an illusion to be transcended. The earth is bad and being human is a curse due to karmic retribution. We must forget about the physical illusory world and strive for spiritual attainments. Such spiritual endeavours are thus – of course – expounded in the Vedas. Therefore you need Vedic gurus, Brahmins, their services, prayers, teachings, kiss their ass, go to their temples, be subservient to them.

Whereas the left hand path had developed into the polar opposite. The spiritual was illusory, the physical is sacred, there is nothing wrong with the earth or being human. We are here for the experience from which we learn. Nothing is forbidden, since your primal deities themselves represents the very aspects of life and nature that man made religions condemn.

The Samma

So this was the worldview atmosphere or philosophical background the Buddha came into during the era he was said to have existed. People had philosophically developed two very different and extreme views they allegorically termed “right” and “left.” Each term is then further defined and refined according to each sect and subculture.

What the Buddha learned to figure out on his own was that these extreme poles were very myopic methods of understanding the world. Let's say we had a construction site around which was a tall wooden fence. On the far right of the fence is a peek hole and on the far left is a peek hole. The people on the left side looking at the construction site says to the people on the far right: “When we look into our hole, we see a fully constructed temple. It's beautiful.

Therefore the entire universe and everything that could possibly exist since the beginning of eternity “non sequiturally” must be – no, has to be! – just like how we see things through our peek hole.” Then the people on the right side says to the people on the far left: “No, you’re all wrong. We see a big hole in the ground thru our peek hole. Therefore the entire universe and everything that could possibly exist since eternity “non sequiturally” must be – no, definitely is without a doubt – just like how we see things through our peek hole, an illusion, a pot hole.”

The Buddha asks you that if you are into this business of Understanding reality as it is, are either of those peek holes giving you the whole matter of reality? No, they are not. You cannot assume to understand reality from one single perspective. You must not only consider the other polar opposite of your perspective, but also every peek hole in between. Then you put that all together as a patch work to try and figure out the bigger picture.

In a sense this is how our court system works. You have a Prosecutor who has the perspective where the Accused is rightly accused and he or she tries to get the jury to SEE things from his perspective. Then you have the Lawyer of the Accused who is paid to understand his client to be innocent or wrongly accused, and he tries to get the jury to SEE the case from his perspective. The Judge in this case is the Buddha, or a level minded Buddhist. The Judge is indifferent to how the Prosecutor and Lawyer sees things. His job is to keep things in order and he considers both sides at the same time so that he can patch together a bigger picture that may be more accurate, so that he can make his sentence in the end. The key concept here to keep in mind is that our Judge does not personally get Attached or clingy to either side’s presentation of events. Otherwise he’d be biased. Unfortunately for the court system based on the judgment of the jury, you have half brained retards who are not as level headed as they should be. In real cases law becomes a stupid game of trying to convince and manipulate the audience/jury to see events as they happened according to how you retell or recreate such events. But a proper Judge him or herself does not get personally or emotionally or mentally involved in either points of view as the Prosecutor and Lawyer may do. The Judge is able to consider points made from both sides objectively so as to gain a clearer understanding of what may have happened so he can theoretically in the end give a proper just sentence.

This way of being able to be Indifferent to either side, unattached to either side, but able to objectively consider points made by each and all sides the Buddha referred to as the “Middle Path.” Here the term “middle” does not suggest a negotiation has taken place just to be on the safe neutral middle. We know this is not the case because of the word the Buddha used half of the time to mean what is translated into English as “Middle” way: Samma.

Samma in English is mistranslated by well meaning people as “right” or “correct.” The 8 fold path of the Ariyamagga [Arya Marga] is wrongly translated as “Right seeing,” “Right action,” “Correct effort,” and so on. In English when we say something is right or correct we immediately infer or suggest that a something else is wrong and incorrect. This makes no sense according to the very meaning of the term Ariyamagga. Ariya means Noble and Magga is the Pali of Marga meaning Way/Path. Ariyamagga is the Way ABOVE being attached to either extremes of “right” or “wrong.” So that you can see things more clearer: from a “Noble” or “Honorable,” of “Civilized” perspective.

Samma in the Pali means Complete, Whole, All Things Considers, Everything Together. But the Buddha used that word to mean “middle path,” as in reality is not just a right and a left, it is right left and Everything in between. Allegorically when the Buddha says he takes the “Middle Path” which he is saying in common metaphorical Pali is: “If you take the left road, and the other fella takes the right road, I’m gunna take everything you don’t consider in between and I’m gunna consider both of your perspective too!”

If you hear your old people tell you stories out of the Tipitaka or have read a few, you’ll see that the Buddha uses this Samma – “Wholistic” – approach in his own form of dialectics or debates. In many cases when the Buddha teaches, it takes three classes of people: 1) the presenter of an idea, 2) the Buddha as antagonist, and 3) the individual the Buddha is actually trying to teach.

So for example if say a Brahmin goes off and tells a crowd of people: “The world is fake and the spiritual realm of the devas is real.” The Buddha comes along with a friend of his he wishes to teach and says: “If you believe that, then I say the world is real and the spiritual realm is fake. What do you say about that?” Then the two of them have their usual back and forth. What the Buddha did was give his friend an other point of view or landmark so that his friend by himself can figure out his way around this terrain. Now the friend has two landmarks to gauge his position. He thinks to himself: “Well, there is the Brahmin’s point of view way over there, and then the Buddha’s point of view way on the other side? Can both be right? Is there a middle? Are both part of a bigger whole? If there are two perspectives, can there be more?” Because with Theravada, what does Sambuddhi mean? Self-Understanding, or the process or method of coming to an Understanding of things by one’s own self and efforts. Look closely in this example and you’ll see that the Buddha’s stated argument was an upaya and not a doctrine for his friend to believe and accept. It was just stated to give relative perspective so the friend can learn to come to an understanding on his own terms. You do not enlighten yourself by accepting the statements of other people/buddha. It’s defeats the whole purpose as to why the prefix Self/Sam is affixed to Buddhi [understanding] in the first place.

It’s almost like the case of when your in a plane over an ocean and a blue sky. In such a condition you may develop vertigo where you have a hard time gauging your speed, direction, etc. It’s not until a Second object of some kind comes into your field of reference that you can pull yourself out of your vertigo and gauge your speed and direction Relative to that second object. The same with the Buddha’s way of teaching with his Samma or wholistic method. With only one loud mouth yapping to a crowd that reality is fake and the spiritual is real, after a while you develop a psychological vertigo where you believe what you hear simply because you have no other perspective to work with. Lie to a people often enough and they will believe it, so someone said once in German.

If you’ve ever been in one of those relationships where your stupid controlling boyfriend talks down to you and is emotionally or verbally abusive and tells you over and over again that he’s the only one who will deal with your shit, that you’re a horrible bitch, that he’s the best you will ever find, etc, you will begin to accept and believe it if you hear it often enough. It’s not until one of your girl friends or another guy comes along who presents a different perspective that you – by your own self effort – come to realize that you have other options. That there are better guys – or girls – out there. Then with that realization, you can Free yourself from your bondage to an abusive relationship. Which you are actually bonded to by your/our own ignorance or lack of relative perspective. But the important thing to keep in mind is that only when you have a number of relative perspectives, do you come to your own inner Realization. This in no way implies that what your girl friend may have said, or what the other guy may have told you is “true.” They were just there to help you out of that vertigo, so you can Realize the infinite number of options you actually have.

Reality according to the Buddha, may not be entirely spiritual. But at the same time it might not be entirely physical. The landmarks have only been presented so that you can gauge your location, relative to those landmarks such that you yourself can eventually come to your own Understandings of what reality may be. Reality is neither Vedicly orthodox or Vedicly heterodox. It is neither Biblical or Unbiblical. It is neither right or left. These are just land marks. You find your own way with them. Buddhism is neither right handed or left handed. It is the Ariya Magga, the Noble or Path Above those relative points. But Above not meaning “better than.” meaning you are indifferent to either extremes and can see them objectively and consider them, along with every other point of view. There is a bigger picture, than a reality that comes into existence from a mere extreme view or single view.

It is not accurate to say that all humans are heterosexual. Neither is it accurate to say that all humans are homosexual. But then neither is it accurate to say that all humans are bisexual in nature. It may be that each of the three perspectives presented are only points of what may be the whole spectrum of the possibilities of human sexual expression?

In the same way it is not accurate to say that reality is spiritual. Or that it is material exclusively. Neither is it accurate to say that some middle ground in between where reality can be both spiritual and material and everyone is right and belief is reality. It may be that each of these perspectives presented may be only points of a spectrum of the infinite possibilities of the phenomena of reality and the infinite potential expression of “prima materia.” It is not accurate to say that a God exists or that a god does not exist. Neither to say that the universe is pantheistically God. Or that Mind is God. It may be that each perspective feebly points to mere possibilities – or not – of a something that is beyond those points. With something like the God example, this is just something that we will never know, because we are all fallible humans existing inside a cosmos we can barely gain an understanding of.

Closing Remarks

This was a quick essay to clarify a few things. Based on the possible question: is Buddhism “compatible” with a right hand or left hand path/way? No. Is a Judge “compatible” with the prosecutor or lawyer’s POV? He should NOT be “compatible” with either or something went wrong with his education as a judge. He is Above the two perspectives. In a position where that he is able to Consider both cases, both points of view, both presentations, as well as other possible scenarios, in order so that he may eventually come to his own Understanding of what may have happened so that he can make an objective sentence. Same goes with the different interpretations of left and right according to the various schools of thought. Spiritual mental juggling or physical doing? Staying in the limits of religious law or societal order or transgressing such things? Samma means Totality and everything considered. Ariyamagga means the Path Above or the Noble High Ground. Sambuddhi means your own Self derived Understandings from that high ground and the vantage point it offers.

Way back in ancient proto-Buddhism times the many various primordial schools or sects of what would become Buddhism got into fights over the subject of learning from books and sages and thus sticking within the limits of what such sages may have prescribed. And learning from one's own experiences and thus nullifying the actual need for sages and what is written. The latter schools eventually developed into a school called the Vibhajjavadins unofficially. This school branched out to later become what is known as Theravada, whose foundation of praxis is the single word or concept: Vibhajjavada. Which roughly means to come to an understanding of things based on direct experience. Vibhajja may be roughly understood as Direct Experience, and Vada roughly means an Oral or Verbal Teaching.

The idea of Gnosis from Direct Experience puts the myopic right and left hand paths in their proper place: as options available for for you to directly experience to learn from, if you are crazy enough to walk either paths. It is not the the walking of the whatever path that is important in Vibhajjavada, but the end Understanding gained that is to be judged as having or not having value. If you kill someone and later in life you end up Realizing [buddhi] that your actions have caused suffering in other people's lives, you may have reaped a valuable lesson meaningful only to yourself. It may be that you are the type to need to learn things the hard way though? Most people understand that randomly killing people may hurt the families of the victims if they have the empathy to realize such things. At the same time we each know what we would do to protect our own children we bare into the world from all and any harm.

It is not the act or process that is important in Buddhism which makes such a big ass deal about causation [kamma]. It is the Vipaka of such acts, that each act bares in the end for you that is judged. Therefore both the right and left handed paths are insignificant in the sense that the walking or adherence to such paths is inconsequential. Because it is ultimately the End Fruit we taste from the waking of such or any paths in life that is to be judged as being kamma kosal [constructive work] or kamma akosal [nonconstructive work]. How you build a building [methodology/kamma] is not as important as how the actual freaking building will end up looking like [Vipaka]. Is the Vipaka the desired end causal objective? Is it something that you can live with? Was it constructive and beneficial to you personally and your people around you? Some right hand path experiences such as the blind following of a guru or priest may not bare the fruit you desire to causally experience years from now. Some so called left handed activities such as a king amassing an army to slaughter enemies may myopically look "bad" but may causally in time be constructive in that it keeps his people safe from tyranny or enslavement or abuse. Or the left hand path pursuit of sleeping around with dirty Thai hookers. Is it Buddhist? Is it good or bad? It's none of those things. If you do it and get AIDS, you learn from your stupid experience: Vibhajjavada. After you learn not to promiscuously sleep with dirty Thai hookers, then maybe you can orally teach others [vada] your wisdom gained from your experiences.

What does Theravada mean etymologically? Thera in Pali means your Elders, and Vada means an Oral Lesson. Theravada essentially means the Aural Wisdom or practical lessons we get from our elders who have walk their paths before us. It implies that the Words born from direct experience of those who have cultivated such experiences Trumps the written letter. No poetry, or scripture, or myth, or mythos of gods, or idealistic shenanigans, or abstract teachings of shoulds and shouldnots out weighs the Substance of the words of those who have directly experienced something in the end.

If you read in a text book that instructs when you stick a piece of zinc into a test tube filled with hydrochloric acid with a cork plugging the top and a little tube leading from the cork to a balloon will cause hydrogen gas to inflate the balloon which will cause something interesting to happen if you pop it; you can be superficial and stick to the letter. But I may come along and say to you: "I did that before and I popped the balloon in front of my face, and the hydrogen and oxygen exploded in a flame and burned my eye lashes and eyes brows, so you may not want to get too close to that balloon." That's a practical oral lesson I gave to you born from something I directly experienced and became the wiser from, You can say: "So what, the text book doesn't explicitly say it will burn anything." You can chose to reject my oral lessons and stick to the book. Then learn from your own experiences.

So at least with the more conservative schools of Theravada that I associate with, Buddhism does not arbitrarily divide things into a left path and a right path. It separates things into a path of having come to our Understandings of things from Direct Experience, and the other path of thinking we know things from what we have read, what we believe, and what we are attached and lost in. It does not matter of you walk an arbitrary right hand path or left hand path. If you walk that path because you believe it is the "right" or correct path to walk because of your own personal beliefs or personal opinions about such matters, then you are not walking that Noble path of experience and Knowing from experience.

The path of walking based on opinions and belief is fast where one can go off into all sorts of fantastical directions of becoming gods, becoming super duper demons to war against some god, becoming supermen, super smart in an instant, etc. The path of learning from direct experience is slow and often times painful. You don't Know and Understand how painful it is to be cheated on until you have invested months and years emotionally into a relationship. You will never know what one goes through in the event of losing a loved one, a family member, a friend, a wife, a husband, a child, until it happens to you. This path of direct experience has very little or nothing to do with the juggling of opinions, lofty ideations, and belief. You can't believe into existence the pain and anguish and hell of being a mother whose child has died. You can make silly opinions about the abstractions of such matters, but your opinions are empty, and so are your beliefs about such abstractions.

You don't "believe" in anything in Buddhism [Theravada at least]. Compassion is not a belief or opinion, it's something you must do for your family, which is hard and takes a life time. Compassion is the caring for your young ones and your elders until they die. Complete Seeing [samma dhit] is not a belief you agree with, it is a something you either apply in your life or not. I cannot really consider anything on the level of reality – as opposed to abstractions, unless I directly experience it. If I have never experience a ghost, it does not mean I reject the idea or believe that they are fake. It just means I have no direct experience to make a worthy opinion of ghosts. If I have experienced a ghost it does not mean I believe in them or anything. It means that I now have something weird to consider to come to an Understanding of.

As a physicist you don't "believe" in atoms or not believe in them. It's not a matter of belief. You either experience them or not in some way. You either work with their equations or not. If you have via instruments experienced them, you don't believe in them. They are just things to now consider the Nature of, to gain a better Understanding of, so you can perhaps figure out if you can apply your knowledge of them in some constructive manner [applied physics]. This has nothing to do with belief. You do, experience, learn from your experience, and gain your Understandings. You don't believe in the scientific method, you do it, experiment with it, learn from your experience, and gain and Understanding of a part of reality. You don't believe in the "4 Noble Truth," or the 8 fold path. You apply it, learn from your experiences, and gain your own Understanding of the Nature of Life and Causality from it, or not.

I use my conservative Theravada to try to explain things about the ONA. Pretty much because all I know is Theravada Buddhism which I have the inner confidence to talk about. You work with what you got. It's my own Understandings of certain parts of the ONA. Such as the concept of Pathei-Mathos. There may be people in ONA world out there who might want to gain their own better apprehension of this. So what I do is present it from how I Understand the term. How I understand it comes from my mind, life, and cultural experiences, so it's going to be peppered with Buddhism.

The whole point in me taking the time to try and explain things to ONA initiates abroad is because the more a Drecc or Niner is able to gain other perspectives of the ONA, the more better each ONA person can better gain their own understandings of the ONA. This is important because the better an ONA associate understand the ONA, the more they can help evolve it and make new forms for it, etc. This in turn is important because the more better forms the Kollektive issues and engineers, the more 3.0 Product we have to compete with. Nobody has to accept my Buddhist spewage as infallible utterances. Just like nobody needs to – or can – take my family experiences I often share as some religious teachings and truths to quote and bible thump, cut and paste someplace to sound cool or something.

There is a reason why I don't write essays in a format where I am just issuing out memes and stuff, and why I chose instead to use a more conversational style of writing where I just share my family stuff, cultural perspectives, etc. It's so that you can't take everything I say as some religious ONA fact or truth or even pretend to be me by cutting and pasting what ramblings I write. You read it, gain a different perspective, perhaps get inspired in some way. Then leave and go do your own thing. Make your own forms and vehicles and tweak ONA in your own unique ways. There is no point in having a network of some Kollektive, if we are all parroting or agreeing, or following one person. Why bother? Just let the one person make the ONA then. Fuck creativity right? But really. If you understand what a Peer Group is or what a Collective of Peers is, and what Open Source actually means, then you'll know that what I write is only and ever presented to peers/equals for review and consideration. I am inspired and influenced by many ONA people, and I hope that flow of inspiration is open and mutual or reciprocal among peers. It is in the network or collective process of each inspiring each that new forms and new ideas are actually inspired into existence. Which, if you are in the business of helping evolve the ONA, might be useful.

I can make stuff up and talk bullshit by pretending to have some sort of grasp of Hinduism, or some other thing to try and explain ONA, but I'd be full of shit. At least with what I know of my own Buddhism, I know what little I know and understand is grounded in something real. Grounded in a living culture, in a real group of people, in a real family, in real life experiences, in real oral teachings of old ones. At least, when I talk about Buddhism to try to explain how I understand the ONA, I am confident in knowing that at least I am not full of shit or just pretending or wishfully thinking to know stuff. Plus I also use my Understandings of Buddhism to explain the ONA as a little bitty Move towards a 5-10 year Objective. Which is to transplant a Form of the ONA into an Asian market. All of this writing, like I said elsewhere is just R&D. I am basically testing out what memes to work with and what memes to phase out. The basic current challenge is: how do I explain using the Asian/Buddhist lexicon and paradigmatic structure I have to explain the ONA. Once I get a feel of that I try to explain the ONA verbally to Asians I know in the real world around me like my cousins, in such a way that they eventually adopt those ONA memes and become ONA.

So don't mind me/us. We're just working. Writing out essays for the public to read just gives us several needed things such as feedback, feedback loops, critical remarks, etc, from real live people. This way we have issues to consider. I like to get critical remarks from random people. And depending on the person, I sometimes give what they say consideration. But when I do things, it is towards a fixed end Objective. I need to make my Moves to take me always one step closer to that end Directive. Sometimes people who have critical remarks don't know the 10 year direction I am taking things. I appreciate their opinions. But, if you ask me, I don't give two rats asses what a Westerner thinks about the ONA. I don't even care if every person alive on Earth right now hates the ONA.

I'll openly say on the record right now that my desire is to relocate the ONA into the bigger Asian market for its future and that the unborn minds of the successive future generations to come are my Target Audience. I have dropped hints at the long term goal I am playing with Satanism at large and with Western Culture aeonically by lately writing about Culture Struggle and Cultural Liquidation. I dropped the hint that an incoherent culture such as the state the subculture of Satanism is in has no chance against a coherent and organized culture like the ONA and its memes in Time. I've dropped the hint that Cultural Liquidation occurs in the young minds and minds of the unborn to come. It's not your minds I am after in the West. I want to infect your unborn. I want to chip away at this secular consumerist faux culture you call "Western" culture, or "American culture," by any means I have at my disposal. Anything, to replace your dishonorable way with something more Numinous and Honorable in Time & Causation. But such a long term goal takes time and small Moves. Time long enough for all of you – and I – to die and take your lofty opinions with you. The ONA is a flute the Kollektive is working on crafting and refining. There will come a time when you will pay the Pied Pier his due. Long from now. It pleases me greatly to see these mundane Satanists use ONA memes to understand and talk their Satanism. It really does. Little steps.

PERILS & PLEASURES OF POPULARITY

“He who stands atop the highest pyramid of skulls can see the furthest.” – 13th Satanic Point, BBS, ONA

A recent piece about Myatt and his stalker by El Darko Loco of ONA put me into one of my inspirational moods and got my juices flowing... my brain juices that is... semicolon, space, right open parenthesis!

I remember a time when I was in grade school, and in 7th grade, when I was a nerd girl. I guess I was a sort of ugly duckling... ok, no wait... I was cute, but nobody liked me anyways... except for my only two or three friends who were freckled faced, glasses wearing, mouth full of braces girls... like me, minus the freckles.

I remember I used to hate this one girl in during grade school named Kristy. She was some cute blond girl with green eyes that giggled at everything and liked to talk to these boys.

Me and my circle of friends sat in the library during recess and talked about her ass everyday. We'd even end up saying really mean things to her in her face once in a while... and she would run off crying to the teacher or something.

I do admit, making her cry made me feel good inside. Because I hated her... because I envied her. Because it wasn't fair that nobody even noticed me or remembered my name... but every body noticed her. You either liked Kristy or you talked behind her back.

It got worse in the 7th grade because that's when you begin to mature from a mere child into a pre-teen with your own evolved personality, sense of fashion, refined social skills... things I didn't have... things Kristy had.

Every body in our junior high school knew who Kristy was. You just had to say her first name and it's like there's only one Kristy in the whole school, and it must be her. Meanwhile you say "Kayla" and people are like – "What? Who?"

Fortunately for me, Satan felt my tribulation. I spent my 7th grade year pupating. When summer break came the good lord (Satan) gave me a good dose of hormones and extra appendages. My braces came off, and my mom and big sister took me to get a real make over! As Mother Nature and my family was working on my body. I was working on my brain.

Back then my dad was an "independent contractor" for a business he and his brothers (my uncles) own. He is very successful at what he does... which is just talk on the phone to build up a reservoir of leads and clients for the business. He also threw lots of house parties at our place where all the neighbors and his business partners came over.

My dad knew everybody in our city. He knew the names of every owner of every little shop. He'd walk in to store by the beach with a smile, and before he even says hi, the owners acknowledge him by name with a smile. So in my pre-teen brain, I figured that maybe my dad was like Kristy, but in the grown up world, out of high school... he was popular.

So one day I told him about my how depressed I was over my problems with school. My dad gave me these two books he had in his library (he knew I like to read) by Dale Carnegie and Norman Vincent Peal respectively. One called "How To Win friends And Influence People," and the other called "The Power Of Positive Thinking." Then he gave me a warning.

He said, a group of people are like a group of cows all chewing cud. Everyone looks the same. Everyone has their head down doing their own thing. Once in a while one of those cows will stick it's head up and smile. Everybody will notice the cow with his head up, and because everybody notices him, the other people will talk about him. That's being popular.... when people notice you and talk about you. When you're not popular, nobody will talk about you, because nobody cares to do so. When you become popular, everybody will talk about you. Good talking, and bad talking. If you can emotionally handle the drama that comes with popularity, its a great experience. If you can't handle the drama of people talk smack about you, spreading rumors, and micromanaging your life, wardrobe, and private life; it will be a nightmare. So think twice, before you stick your head up above the herd.

So I studied those two books, took more pointers from my dad, followed him around to see how he works his social skills... and I hated Kristy so much I was actually obsessed with her enough to morph into her. Meaning that I could recall how she carried herself, how she acted and talked, when and how she did things, and I rehearsed all that in my mind.

When 8th grade came it was like BAM... boobs! Plus a new hairdo and load of social skills and a big smile. Who knew you can make so many new friends just sticking your chest out and saying hi with a smile!

Anyways... It didn't take me long to start getting invited to parties, and after school hangouts. A few months later I was hanging out with Kristy... who became my best friend... and the other popular kids.

It wasn't until my freshman year that people started to do the high school drama queen thing with me. All the rumors... she shops at WalMart crap (which isn't true)... she stole my boyfriend stuff... she's a slut (define slut!)... Kayla sucked off the whole football team shit ("whole football team" is an extreme exaggeration)... Kayla has crabs (where are they gonna live, I shaved?)... Kayla has mono (never did)... She worships the devil... she was checking at so-and-so out in the girl's locker room (tee hee).

There were times when I cried over this stuff. Thank god for my dad, big sister and Kristy. They had been thru things like that before... and I did recall the times when I did the same to Kristy. So I understood why those haters were hating. Because you're basically on everybody's mind... and being on everyone's minds means they will talk about you. Like they talk about and critique a movie they just watch which is on their mind... a tv show they saw... celebrities... politicians.

The mind of most people is not multifunctional, and cannot entertain two thoughts at the same time. In this way, we can see just how significant – psychologically and sociologically – it actually is to haunt and occupy somebody's mind/awareness.

It's just logical you see – if you aren't on people's minds, you don't exist in their awareness for them to talk about you. If you are on their minds, you simply exist in their "field of awareness" and so they talk about you.

It's like tagger crews... which I was into back then. Which tagger crews did your school and friends talk about the most? The ones that got up the most. Simply because their tag and crew letters were so everywhere, it was imprinted in everybody's field of awareness.

It's like political parties. Why do most people talk about parties like the Republicans, Democrats, Communists; but not Ross Perot's Reform party? Simply because Perot's Reform Party doesn't have the skills to put itself into the field of awareness of the populous.

It's like nations. Of all the many nations on earth, why do people talk and give their attention to America, England, Japan, and not Kazakhstan? Because who the hell knows Kazakhstan even exists?!

Even in regards to the ONA, we see this point. If the ONA were a "high school" who in it would be the notorious/popular kids besides Anton Long and maybe Beasty? DarkLogos... Pointy... The Usual Suspects... Kris... and Chloe. Whose got the influence? Same group of people. Whose got the fate and "destiny" of this social order with a strong grip? Same group of people. Whose does the Others talk about? Same group of people. It might be cool to be unknown and in the shadows, but being so comes with a major cost... the cost of Others manufacturing your belief system, your thoughts, your hopes, your dreams, your visions, your life, and what you will do with that safe and unknown life of yours. Think on these things a while.

It's like our human race itself. Of all the humans that walked this earth since the day our species suddenly appeared 200,000 years ago, why do we talk about only a hand full of humans – Alexander the Great, the Pharaohs, Genghis Khan, Washington, Jefferson, Hitler, Stalin, Mao, Che, Queen Elizabeth, Michael Jackson even and not some Sayid living in the outskirts of Calcutta India? Because such people dedicated their whole short human existence standing out from the sea of human mediocrity and “ho-humness” and managed to leave their permanent mark on our collective field of awareness.

Talk is talk... fame is fame... publicity is publicity...notoriety is just notoriety. It doesn't matter if people are talking smack... they are still talking about you. You are still on their mind.

How much does it suck to be a loser in life. To be a nobody. Like when you are a nobody nerd in school. Who even knows you? You cease to exist as a person in people's minds when school is over. People forget your name and who you are the moment you step out side of class. It's the popular girls and guys that are immortal in school. Even when school is over they are still on your mind and you still talk about them.

People will say that such things as popularity is just teenage high school shit... and that people who are still stuck in that mentality need to grow up, and join the “adult world.”

Is this popularity stuff really the domain of childish high school drama? What if we were to keep all of the high school students and just change the scenery... from a school to a corporate office... to the city... to the Hollywood industry... to the political arena... to the religious arena?

Regardless of the scenery... the environment... the structural surroundings... all of these scenarios has one common denominator – People. Where there is people, there is social order. Where there is social order there is social stratification, structure, class, rank, hierarchy. Where there is social stratification there must be social skills. If there is social skills, the ones that are the most skilled in the art of human interaction and manipulation always moves up to the top of the pile.

It is human nature. It is primal animal nature. Even among the lowly monkey species we still see this social ordering in the groups monkeys exist in. We still see social stratification in the natural hierarchy of the Alpha Male and his secondary males. We still see social skill in how these monkeys groom each other, and the intricate relationships and alliances they forge within their social group. We still see the benefits Mother Nature rewards her socially skilled animals. With such rewards as territory, power, sex, privilege, the chance to pass their genes down to the next generation; and most importantly Influence over the fate and destiny of the group.

It's the same social game in the human species. In olden tribal times it was the death defiant warrior who protected their people, who conquered new territory, who got all the sex, who passed their noble genes down, who became chieftains. These illustrious, these noble, these notorious, these popular warriors had the power to guide and influence the fate and “destiny” of their tribe and future progeny.

As time progresses the bloodline of these chiefs became Kings and their realm became kingdoms... evolving into Empires. Empires with the might and power to influence and guide the very collective fate and “destiny” of the entire human race. If you doubt the power and privilege of popularity, show me what nation on earth, and what human on earth is not in some way influenced or affected by Anglo-Saxon. Not only do those who stand atop the highest pyramid of skulls “see the furthest,” but what dreams and visions they do see becomes the very guiding force of those they are standing on top of.

Anglo-Saxon’s past struggle to climb to the top of the pile of human skulls, has made its language, essence, and weltanschauung the guiding force of the human race. It may seem like an exaggeration... but if you understand aeonics, and see things 5 dimensionally you will understand. English is already the de facto world language. That in itself is significant because each word of any language influences and affects how we as humans see and interpret causal reality. We all now see the world thru the eyes of Anglo-Saxon because of “his” language alone. If such influence continues, tell me what will become of humanity 100... 300 years from now? Such is the power and privilege of refined and applied social skills.

The internet is no different. It is simply a medium in which humans interact. Where there are humans there is social order. Where there is social order, those who have the most refined social skills will climb to the top of the pile and reap their rewards. In the case of on line businesses, the reward is about a few billion dollars. Being popular pays.

Of all the billions of web pages and websites on the internet, we can only name a handful – the most popular ones... and the rest is lost in a sea of indistinguishable chattering cyber-junk.

When I first came on line with a mission to initiate change and progression in the ONA 1.5 years ago, I was a nobody lost in that sea of cyber-junk. Now people talk shit about me and Chloe... by name. Of all the billions of people on line to talk about and be aware of, I managed to rise above the cyber-junk. With that rise came alliances, social capital, influence, and a strong grip on the fate and destiny of a small group of people.

I’ve only been at the game for a year and a half. David Myatt has been at this much longer. Well before the invention of the internet.

Of all the 60 something million people in England, Myatt rose into the field of awareness of that country. Not only that but he used his skills to raise himself above other crowds of people – National-Socialists, Jihadists, Muslims, Occultists, and Satanists.

You (generally speaking) might talk shit about him and spread rumors... but you’re still talking about him. You might like him or hate him, but he’s in your mind regardless. Of all the 7 billion humans on earth, Myatt haunts your mind by name. That in itself is a remarkable achievement. While you’re talking and hating, he is influencing and shaping the minds of the next generation. Yeah, it may seem that certain things Myatt was or is involved with seem to contradict social skills... but as they say in gang culture – “It don’t matter if you earn respect or force people to respect you. Either way, they will respect you.” In other words, it doesn’t matter how Myatt got into your mind... he’s there and he isn’t going anywhere for a while.

While you spend your waking hour toiling for others, and talking about others, Myatt steady works his craft. When you die, you will melt back into the dust you came from... and in time when even your bleach white skull has disintegrated, and those who once knew you have vanished also – you will be forgotten... as if you have never existed at all – a worthless waste of time and energy to humanity aeonically.

When Myatt dies, he will continue to exist, because he has made his mark on humanity. That mark on humanity is apparent, because we think of him and talk about him... and follow him. That immortality is a rare prize among our species. Many humans have come and gone; perhaps 100 billion; but very few have earned illustrious immortality and eternal influence on the human race. That is the difference between those that talk, and those that are spoken of.

Me and Chloe at one time got fed up with all the shit talking we were getting on the internet and complained to a brother of our Acception. He gave us a quick word of encouragement which kept us going, which we will past onto DM also -

PHENOMENA AND APPREHENSION

Phenomena & Apprehension

I've been having these unfamiliar weird "dream" states lately which I'm sure will later make more sense. I do a lot of different kinds of "meditation." Meditation in English is a generic word which describes nothing useful. There is no real single word in Buddhism used to mean "meditation." There are over a dozen very different methods of "mental exercises" or internal exercises which for some strange reason gets jumbled up into one generic word in English.

Dreaming is weird. I used to experiment with Lucid Dreaming which I like. You first train your brain to get into the condition of asking if it's dreaming by consciously asking yourself at random moments if what you are doing is a dream. Then you do something I just call "Dragging," which is when you take that self induced confused state of mind and "drag" it out during the day for as long as you can. After 3 month of that you start randomly waking to full consciousness inside your dreams.

I do most of my philosophical ramblings to myself when I drift off to bed; because "somebody" says I talk too much; and just when I come back to consciousness in the morning. So I usually literally hold internal dialogues with my self until I go unconscious, and as soon as that consciousness starts up in the early morning I resume philosophically rambling while still half asleep. In that deep Alpha upper Theta wave state, you end up getting a lot of insights. It my cheap shortcut to meditating: sleep yourself to Enlightenment!

I do that so often that I've been getting into this weird "crack" in between being conscious and unconsciously asleep. I don't know how to explain it as I have never been "in" this "crack" before. It's not that "boarderland" state where you are consciously awake while your body is asleep which you would experience before "astral projection." It's unfamiliar state is like you're outside yard was waking reality and the rooms inside your house was the dream "world." This "crack" I have been finding myself inside of would be like me waking up inside a hidden room in a wall between the house and the outside yard, where I can see "both" the outside and the inside.

In this "crack" I'm dreaming, but I'm not conscious enough to be Lucid or conscious enough to ask myself "Where am I." But I am barely conscious enough to realize something mind blowing. I realize that I am unconsciously "day dreaming" the dream which I am in, which my dream self at the same times feels to be real. The only thing I can do in the "crack" is say to myself: "Huh, that's weird; I'm not actually dreaming. I'm day dreaming it all." When I do wake up in the morning then I can put my thoughts together to end up understanding that the act of dreaming, which I had always assumed was some sort of unconscious chattering from the unconscious mind is actually just the conscious mind day dreaming its dreams in an unconscious state. But yet there is a "me" "somewhere" "aware" that I am asleep and unconscious day dreaming the dream.

It's not a great epiphany. It's just realizing that the conscious minds seems to never shut the hell up, even when it is knocked out cold! But this essay isn't even about dreams. It's about Dhamma and Perception and how we Apprehend things which is a topic of discussion I have been having with myself in my cheap shortcut meditations as I drift of into that weird "crack."

Dhamma

What is dhamma really and plainly. If I had to put dhamma into an exact English definition so we can do nerdy things with it, it would be: "An Observable and/or Experienceable phenomenon which is a part of the natural world." That is what Dhamma is.

So to illustrate what dhamma is in Western terms we can imagine Sir Isaac Newton. Our friend Sir Newton is sitting under an apple tree reading his book. As he reads an apple from the tree falls onto his head. The apple hits his head and Sir Newton looks up and begins thinking thusly: "Hey, what the hell? What just happened? An apple fell. How did it fall? Maybe some kind of force pulled it down?" That observable and experienceable phenomenon of "Falling" is a dhamma.

Why did the ancient philosophers call phenomena "dhamma" if dhamma originally meant a blueprint? Because if I gave a group of 12 temple builders a blueprint they'd all build the temple according to the SAME blue print. Then when the temple is done and I were to ask any one of these 12 builder: "Hey, why does that temple look like that?" No matter who I ask I will always get the answer: "That's the WAY it looks on the blueprint. We're just following it." Each of those 12 people apprehend the same fundamental document. Dhamma is just the "Way" things are and with Dhamma, everyone is on the same page.

And so from that dhamma which Sir Isaac Newton experience he articulated that wordless dhamma into words referring to that dhamma he experienced as the "Law of Gravity" which is now an approximation of the wordless apprehension of dhamma. We know that this “Law” is not a policy or legislation of some type. Here the English word “Law” tries to describe a “Way,” “Rule,” “Principle,” or “Manner” in which a part of the natural world works and functions. This would also be why dhamma also means “Way,” “Law,” “Rule,” “Principle,” and “Doctrine.” Or as the Chinese refer it: Tao; which is the “Way” of Nature, as well as the “Way” of Taoism.

Two Truths

In Buddhism there are two types of “truths.” The Pali word for a Truth is “Sacca” [saccha] which literally means “What is Accurate,” or “What is not a Lie.” It doesn’t mean what “truth” has come to mean in modern English where “Truth” is some absolute and infallible divine ideation.

The first type of truth in Pali is Paramattha Sacca. This is most often translated in English as “Ultimate Truth,” which is a fair translation. “Parama” means “Highest,” and also “Self Evident” and “Obvious.” Attha is the Pali version of the Sanskrit Artha which means a “Notion,” a “Meaning,” or “Concept.”

So if we were both looking up into the sky and observing the phenomenon/dhamma known as the “sun,” and I turned to you and articulated in words to you: “Dude, that is a Sun!” And you say: “No shit.” That is Paramattha Sacca, or Ultimate Truth. It’s an Obvious Suchness. Of course it’s a sun. But it’s obvious because you can observe the phenomenon yourself with your own eyeballs, and you don’t need someone to narrate for you what obvious things you are looking at.

The other type of truth is Sammuti Sacca. Sammuti means a “Something a group of people agrees on.” It’s a weird word that the Buddha himself may have just made up. Sama means “Together” as in the ancient Sanskrit word “Samgan” meaning a “Together-Gang” which eventually became the Pali word “Sangham” or Sangha meaning an Association.

Muti is the Pali form of the Sanskrit word Mati which generically means an “Opinion,” an “Inkling,” or a “Notion.” So together Sammuti means “Together-Opinion” or a “Notion We All Agree On.”

For example if we were standing with a group of our friends looking at the sun as the dhamma, and I first said: “That boys is a sun!” Then you say: “True indeed, sure is a hot sun that sun is.” Then one of our friends added: “Must be made of fire if it is hot, what do you guys think?” Then we all nod our heads and say together: “Yep, sounds about right.” That’s Sammuti Sacca. The sun being made of fire is an idea-inkling we as a group agree on. We have never seen the sun directly up close to actually know it is made of fire; but we agree that it seems accurate/sacca.

Sammuti Sacca is an extrapolation of dhamma which is not observable or experienceable but agreed by some group of people to be right. In English we call it “Conventional Truth.” Nobody in our group of hypothetical friends has observed or experienced the sun being fire. We just agree because it makes sense. With our Western Sir Newton analogy a conventional truth or extrapolation of an observed phenomenon would be when Sir Newton or an associate of his says: "Well if a force of gravity makes an apple fall in England, surely this force works on every planet the same way everywhere in the universe." Have these hypothetical people ever been on every planet to test their extrapolation? No. But with a little math and understanding of mass we can be quite confident that gravity works on most planets in the universe. What do we call that confidence of belief? Sometimes we call it faith.

Svalaksana

In ancient times the philosophers in India were contemplating if they can break down Dhamma into its most basic and smallest observable or experienceable "components" or units. They figured out they could and they named such units of dhamma "svalaksana." Sva means "Self/Oneself/itself" and Laksana means "Symbol," "Sign," or "Image."

So if we observe the phenomenon of a rainstorm, we can break this rainstorm down into its basic constituent components: 1. clouds; 2. rain-drops; 3. wind; 4. lightning; 5. thunder; 6. fall of drops; 7. puddling of drops; 8. getting wet; etc. Each of those things is a svalaksana of a dhamma or a measurable constituent component of an observable or experienceable phenomenon of the Natural World.

Perception

Svalaksana is where I want to be, because this is where the process of Perception, Awareness, Recognition, and Discernment aka Consciousness comes into play. The word svalaksana literally means a Self-Symbol/Sign of something.

What's a sign? What's a sign do to your brain? When you See a Stop Sign what actually goes on inside your head. The Stop Sign itself is a meaningless design. But culturally or socially we agree that such a sign has a what? A Meaning. So when we See a Stop Sign, we consciously recognize it and then after recognizing it we ascribe to it a meaning: the physical act of stopping.

It's the same process that goes on in our heads when we See the svalaksana of a "tree." We see the Self-Sign of the thing, and then we recognize it. How do we recognize it? Our discerning faculty of our brain draws up a meme "Tree" and ascribes that meme to the Self-Sign.

But because of how our memory apparatus works, that meme "tree" is automatically linked to a chain of other memes related with the original meme drawn up. What do I personally think of when I view a "tree?" I think of "Rain," "Dirt," "Leaves," "Fruit," "Pollen," "Allergies," "Lighting." Etc. Those would be the other memes "hovering" in the "background" of my mind/brain when I see a svalaksana of a "tree."

So what's that mean? It means that everything we perceive is "tainted" with "subjective" background noise. It means that sometimes a racist Blackman cannot actually see a White man as a singular svalaksana sans the “background noise,” because the “image” this Blackman sees is tainted with a flood of his own subjective ideas, thoughts, and emotive opinions. It means that very little of what you are subjectively apprehending is actually in the Real.

For example if I were to tell you that one day while walking I saw an unfamiliar silver object in the sky. How would you apprehend that in your mind? You may think to your self if you are a realist: “She saw an airplane.” If you are prone to an irrational thinking you may say to yourself: “She saw a UFO.” If you are prone to having your active imagination run wild you may say: “She saw aliens; they were those reptilians that Icke dude was talking about.” I actually saw none of those things. All I said was I saw a silver object in the sky.

Or even you yourself. If you experienced a strange apparition one night while camping in the woods, what “background noise” is attached to that experience? It depends on what type of mind/person you are. As a Satanist, when you perceive or think of Christianity, how much of what you see in your mind is Objective and in the Real? As a Jew when you apprehend in your mind National Socialism, how much of it you are seeing in your mind is Objective. Can you even tell the difference between your subjective apprehension of National Socialism, what National Socialism as a memplex is, and Germany’s Nazi version? When we each apprehend Reality, how much of it is the Actual Stuff, and how much of it is the paradigmatic chattering of our own weltanschauung-samsara: our own words, intellectualizations, philosophications, interpretation, etc?

Natural Philosophy

The World of Phenomena belong to no religion or memplex. Directly observing and experiencing Life, Nature, Phenomena as an act belongs to no religion or memplex. The Phenomenal World of Experience is just something we are all born into. We come into this world free from the fetters of our memetic chains. But as we grow in age we collect for ourselves a memplex. When that happens we can no longer see the world with Natural Eyes, because that memplex now filters what we see.

As a Christian you will see the reality in a Christian manner: a perfect creation of God the creator. As a materialist you will see the same world as a lifeless accident. As a dalit you will see existence as a punishment for past evil karma. As a urban commoner you will see the world as a struggle. As a crook the world is a vast opportunity waiting to happen. As a Satanist reality is the Adversary.

In such instances when you can no longer perceive Reality objectively As-Is, you have been Mastered by your memplex; entrapped by it. Limited and controlled by it. How so? Because what we perceive influences and gives rise to how we think/believe. What we think and believe influences and gives rise to our emotions. What we feel influences and gives rise to behaviour and action. What we do in Life manifests Fruit. Your “eyes” controls your mind, heart, and actions.

For example, let us say that you perceive civilization to be the masterpiece of human genius.

This perception influences you to think/believe. You believe that civilization is an expression of human genius. This belief governs your feelings. Such that when your people colonizes other landmasses and you encounter “uncivilized” peoples something happens. Your beliefs emotionally attaches your identity to your own people and your civilization, and you now reject the “uncivilized” people as being “primitive.” That feeling governs your actions and behaviour with such “primitive” people. What will you do? Give such primitive people the gift of civilization by force. We don’t deal with the “civilization” rhetoric today. Today we use the “democracy” rhetoric. It’s perfectly acceptable to go into a sovereign nation like Iraq and decimate the place to bring its people democracy isn’t it?

Natural Philosophy – or the study of the Natural World of Phenomena – is the Real way of gaining an understanding of who we are and what this Cosmos is. But to “truly” understand who we are and our place in the Cosmos we must first work on either silencing our conscious minds, shutting up our subjective background noise, and objectively observing Nature in the Real sans memeplexes.

Nature as a Book of Life gives you the words and letters to read. Each phenomenon is a word. Each svalaksana is a letter. It can be said that “dhamma” is the doctrine of study of a Natural Philosopher. Insofar as dhamma meaning “Observable and experienceable phenomena.”

There is a saying I hear my Chinese grandpas say: “The Tao, Nature, and Man are the same thing in different forms. If you know one, you know the other two.” Which is to say that as an inquisitive individual on a Quest for Self Knowledge, if we do not know what we are, or find it hard to study our Self, then we can study Nature. The more we understand Nature, the more we gain an understanding of ourselves; and vice versa.

Science

Back in circa 500BC the “size” of a svalaksana was limited to the organic power of your senses. Which meant that although people back then were empirically studying the Natural world to gain an understanding of it, there was a limit to how far or deep they can go. A svalaksana is the smallest constituent unit of a phenomenon of Nature which you can observe or experience. Thus there was a limit to how much Buddhi – Knowledge – you would have extracted out of Nature at that time.

Today with our current technology augmenting our senses plus all the sophisticated mathematics, the “size” of an observable svalaksana has literally been shrunken down to the size of atoms, subatomic particles, and photons.

Thus we can say that Modern Science born in the West, is a natural evolution of the Natural Philosophy of the ancient world: Post-Brahminical Hinduism; Greek Philosophy; Chinese Taoism; and Buddhism. The only major difference is the size of the svalaksana.

The ancients uncovered a whole lot with what they were working with way back then. But as we break down the Cosmos further into smaller parts, we seem to be getting closer to a core understanding of the Cosmos. And this Cosmos we are dis-covering seems to work like a chess game or star game or some artificial life digital program. It has very simple basic rules, but is open to complex development.

Closing Remarks

The reason why I have brought up Natural Philosophy and Science is that no religion has ever shown us the Actual “real stuffness” of the Universe and of our own Nature and Being. What have we observed most world religions manifesting instead? Irrational concepts and fighting. Whereas science just goes on uncovering veil after veil of Reality.

Science doesn't schism. It doesn't stagnate. It naturally progresses and evolves over time in tandem with our level of understanding, mental capacity, and instrumentation. Science and Natural Philosophy is universal, because the world belong to no body.

But there are things science cannot do. Science can't inspire us with mythos. There is more to Life and Human Nature then just nerdy science. Contemporary materialist science must be balanced with the other – right brain side – of being human. Balanced with art, music, poetry, mythos, ceremonies, love, community, Numinous Life Force.

Which is where something like the ONA comes in. We already know that “Anton Long” has written somewhere several times that Natural Philosophy is an inherent way of the ONA. As a Drecc or Satanist working with Life and Pathei Mathos, one must learn to understand that going to doctrines devised by Man has lead us as a species nowhere. Especially when we glorify and beatify such doctrines as being infallible concepts.

As Dreccs or Satanists on the Quest to understanding the Living Cosmos and your self/person in this world by studying Life and Natural Philosophy you must question your reality. By first asking: “What is Reality actually made of?” The answer is Phenomena. And you go from there. It doesn't matter how you approach Natural Phenomena, whether with Buddhism, Vedanta, or Empirical Science. Phenomena is where you start, not doctrines. Doctrines have never done anything constructive for us as a species beside blind us to the Real. If you continue to be blind to the Real, then how are you any better then the Mundane?

But seek to balance that animus apprehension of life, with the more softer and inspiring anima essence of Life such as mythos, music, dance, art, literature, traditions, culture, clan, community, fellowship, and Passion. Which is something the ONA has plenty of. Or if it doesn't, make it so.

PLURIBUS EX UNUM

Pluribus Ex Unum

I wonder if you can have Nisay for plants? If you can fall in love at first sight for one, or if you met a plant for a destined reason or purpose? My aunt-mother says that I learned to talk fluently and hold conversations when I was one years old, and that at that age I was obsessed with asking her questions about every plant she carried me past. I never really grew out of my fascination for plants. I have three weird fascinations carried over from my earliest childhood: the fascination with plants, the fascination with little bottles. I have this picture of me when I was 2 years old holding a small empty baby powder bottle, and I still collect little empty bottles. Then my love for giant vases, the kind taller then a person. Except I personally can't afford to collect giant vases. First each costs around $7000-$30,000 and then I'd have no room anywhere to keep a collection. I'm not even sure what they are practically good for anyways either, besides sitting room décor. I love going to Chinatown to look at all their giant vases and plants they have in their supermarkets.

It started over 2 years ago. I was walking around my block as I usually do for the exercise and time to contemplate obsessively over something. Usually when I walk around the block it's to think out moves and opponents' options. I don't mind or care when someone makes a big noticeable move, like when someone starts a new organization or a new Satanic website, youtubes, talk shows, and so on. I can study the character of such people and guesstimate how long/brief their venture will last. What gets me to get up and walk around the block to ponder and hold dialogues with myself in my head are tiny moves the unnoticable makes in front of me. I end up asking an imaginary panel of board members in my head questions like: "Why did this person make that little move?" "Give me a list of all their possible end results." "What options are they trying to take I can't see?" "What has this person accomplished in the past?" After my walks about the block, if my inner panel of board members gives me answers, I start working on disabling their options. For me, it's a game of Go not chess. The objective is to occupy as much territory as possible.

I learned how to make an imaginary panel of board members from an old and classic book called "Think and Grow Rich," by the great Napoleon Hill. Mr. Hill was commissioned by Mr. Carnegie – who was America's richest man at the time – to find out what makes a man rich or poor basically. So he spent a few years interviewing the hoity-toity [rich & powerful] of his era – people like J.P. Morgan, Rockefeller, etc – and discovered a handful of interesting things these successful men in life share as common traits.

Mr. Hill's book is not a book on the occult and magic. But in the back of this book things get weird. Or at least Napoleon learned that these people share some weird things which helps them in their success in life. The weird thing Napoleon finds out is that the subjects of his interviews like holding conversations with dead people and hero figures in their heads? Napoleon explains it as tapping into the minds and creativity of such dead men and heroes. Eventually Mr. Hill ended up calling this "necromantic" practice the "Master Mind." The idea is to learn to visualize successful people you admire so well, that you can tap "psychically" or something into the person's abilities, creativity, and qualities. In your retard occultnik talk, they'd sometimes call this "assuming godform." Please keep in mind Napoleon's book was written in the 1930's or so.

Mr. Hill describes how to put a master mind group together of your own, then goes to share his own personal experience with his own master mind group. Mr. Hill had a small executive board for his master mind made up of people he looked up to from different fields. He said that in the beginning you have to put in the effort of animating these people in your head. You go into a relaxed state of mind – semi-trance or meditative state – and ask your master mind group questions, and animate them to give you answers. He suggests that you pick people whom you can easily mimic or recreate in your mind. After a while of doing this Napoleon said that something happened which frightened him terribly. What happened was that after a few months of faithfully animating his master mind group, he was shocked to one day learn that the men in his master mind group one day came to life and were self-animated, as if his "subconscious" mind had taken over their roles for him. He also explained how the men in his group who were now "alive" had the traits and personalities of the real men they were based on. Mr. Hill was so frightened that he discontinued his master mind meetings for a long while.

So after I had read that book, I put together a "council" of my own group of people I look up too and admire which I call my "Board of Executives." Unlike Napoleon and the men he interviewed, I don't wait for my men to die before I hijack them into my master mind. Most of the people in my master mind group are still alive. Half of the people in my master mind group are fictitious characters from Mafia movies like Casino because I find their characters very easy to duplicate, and I think they are my type of businessmen. I'll keep the real dead and living rich and powerful men in my master mind group to myself. But I have one character who is based on two people I really, really like I just call "Agent Sagan." This character is based on the main Agent from the Matrix movie and on the scientist Carl Sagan since in my mind they look, act, and talk similar to each other. I specifically reserve this character for my Unconscious Mind to take over and speak to me as my trusted Vizier.

When I walk around the block several rounds most often I hold "meetings" with my board of executives for insights, advice, and different perspectives of seeing things. There is something about the routine of walking slowly and mindlessly around a place you are very familiar and comfortable with. It's very easy to drift away from the city consciously and enter a semi-trance or fairly deep meditative state of mind where your mindscape is crisp. The more I lose myself in the mindless walk, the more crisp the board room my meetings becomes, and the more self-animated my board members become. Often when I walk around for an hour the board members will stream ideas and insights which later becomes major parts of my essays.

Red Amaranth

I wasn't sure how many rounds I did around the block that day about 2 years ago. But as I was coming back up to the awareness of the sidewalk and cars on the street I found myself walking past a brick wall fence of a home just down the street from a house I usually stay at. It's a house I must have walked past hundreds of times. In the front yard they have pretty Geraniums, a very large Chrysanthemum, and a cherry plum tree. As I was walking around their side yard I saw a weird plant peeking just above the 6 feet tall brick fence. It's leaves were dark royal red. I really liked the color and wondered what type of plant had such colors for leave that grew so tall. I decided to come back to check on the plant a week or so later so I can see the shape of the leaves. Over the many years of being fascinated with plants, I've gotten pretty good at telling how plants are related by the shape of their leaves and their general appearance.

So a week or so later I returned to the brick wall of this house. By then this red plant had grown a foot taller than the fence. The leaves were now visible. I stood on my tippy toes to feel a leaf, and based on how it felt and how it looked I recognized the plant as being related to regular Amaranth I had seen and ate before, except I never knew a red species existed. The only amaranth I had ever seen were small weed like plants which grew sometimes in our yards. In Khmer we call them P'tee and are used in stews. They have a very distinct and nice flavour which reminds me of concentrated spinach. I didn't know what this red variety was called, so I walked to our place to google "red amaranth" and figured out it was called Red Amaranth. The plant and its royal red color was the most beautiful plant I had ever seen. It's tall size reminded me of giant vases. I figured I have to somehow grow some in my front yard. So I told myself to take frequent walks around the block and check on that red amaranth plant to see when it starts growing its stocks of seeds. That way I can take the seeds.

It was in my favourite month of October that I one day noticed the red amaranth at the neighbor's house was mature and gravid with beautiful red seed stocks bowing down over the brick fence just in jumping distance from my hands. I was thinking of jumping to grab a handful of the seed stocks, but I didn't. I figured the seeds might still be immature to sow, and the people in cars on the street behind me might think I was weird. Plus I couldn't steal things like that culturally. We have this animistic belief in my culture where we believe things like trees, land, rivers, mountains, etc, are guarded by a spirit of some type and it's bad luck to steal from plants and places which does not belong to you. So I decided to take frequent walks around the block and propitiate the guardian spirit of this red amaranth each time I walk past it with one shiny new penny each time I took my walks. I'd set the penny on my side of the fence near the plant and ask the spirit of the red amaranth if I could have some of its seeds, and if I may to drop it on my side of the fence.

As the weeks went by I saw the red amaranth grow taller and its stocks of seed grew longer and heavier. The weight of the seed stocks caused the top of the plant to actually bow over the brick fence with the seed stock stretching over the fence. If the stocks detached, they'd fall right where I was placing my shiny pennies. I told the red amaranth that I wouldn't hurt it, and I'll wait patiently for it to live out its full life, so its seeds can naturally fall to the ground.

I spent the holiday season of Thanksgiving and Christmas months at my aunt-mother's house. The season kept me busy and I forgot about the red amaranth. It wasn't until January of the following year that I returned to my little mom's place. I suddenly realized I had forgotten all about the red amaranth! I feared it may have already died and the seed stocks fallen and gone by now. So I walked real fast down the street to the brick wall. I was saddened to find that the red amaranth was no longer alive. Its leaves were all dry and brown. It's beautiful royal red velvet aliveness, gone, and so were its seed stocks. I looked around all over my side of the fence and the sidewalk for signs of any seed stocks and I found none. I figured the rain must have washed it all away. I felt sad so I stood there looking at the dead plant I wanted to grow so bad, but I was too late. My eyes fell to the ground since I wasn't feeling happy, but then my awareness noticed the ground. Between the brick fence and the public sidewalk where I had set my pennies is a thin row of dirt and weeds that runs along that part of the fence for some reason. In my chitta I suddenly felt hope, that maybe some of the seeds fell on that ground and would germinate among the weeds. So I took my walks around the block and check on the sliver of earth for little amaranth shoots.

A month later there was one little amaranth sproutling. Just one. It was red and no more than an inch tall growing on my side of the fence among the weeds. I knelt down to touch it and then took out a key from my pocket and dug it up carefully, and carried my little red amaranth home happy. I was thinking to myself how in a few months I'll have an 8 feet tall royal red amaranth growing in my front yard! At home I put it in the ground by a tree. But later the next day I feared the tree might hog up all the water so I uprooted it again and replanted in a place by itself. But then a day later I feared the cats or people might step on it or dig it up so I uprooted it again and replanted it in a pot. But then a day later I feared that the pot was too small and so the plant might not grow big, so I uprooted it and replanted it again by itself and placed a half top of a two liter plastic coke bottle over it to keep people and cats from stepping on it. But then the next day I feared the soil where it was growing was too rocky so I uprooted it again and placed it in the biggest pot I could find, and was sukkha [without worry].

A few months later I saw something about my little red amaranth that scared me and disappointed me. I noticed that it was already generating its seed stocks from its tip top and it was only 7 inches tall! I was telling it in a frustrating way: "You're supposed to be 7 feet tall before you grow your seeds not 7 inches tall!" Thinking that maybe the pot it was growing in messed up it's biological clock, I uprooted it in a hurry and planted it in the ground hoping it would still grow tall and not die yet.

It was no use. I tried everything. Fertilizer, purified water. My stubby red amaranth wasn't getting any bigger than 7 inches and it was dying. The seed stocks were maturing. It was growing weaker and bending to the ground, so I propped it up with a stick I tied it too. I told my short plant that I was going to prop it up with sticks and water it, even if it wanted to die so I can make it at least give me stocks of seeds to grow the next generation. After a while my plant was a dry brown mummy of a plant. But I still had it tied up to several sticks to prop it up and I still watered it because the seed stocks had not fallen yet.

One day I was watering my mumified plant propped up with chopsticks and yarn and my little mom came out to watch what I was doing. She said laughing: "Are you watering the chopsticks, cuz they aren't gunna grow. I think your plant is beyond dead girl?" I told her, and my step dad who walked out to see, that its seed stocks has not fallen off yet and it could still be green inside. My step dad pointed out that the stem of the dead plant is too dry and hard and the seed stocks too light to actually fall off. My step dad pushed me aside and told me he knew what to do. He took the dried seed stocks into his palms, and rolled the dried stuff all over empty ground. Then he took a few gardening instruments and tilled the ground and watered it.

A month later we had small patches of all these baby amaranth. But like their parent plant, all these second generation red amaranth never grew past 7 inches. I was wondering what could have possibly happened to their pooj? Their original plant was over 8 feet tall. And the worse part was my little mom and step dad were eating my amaranths. There was a time when I was very frustrated and told them to not eat them. My little mom and step dad asked me why I would even grow P'tee if not to eat them. So I told them to only look at the plants. It's what American people do. We grow pretty plants and just look at them to appreciate their natural beauty! But they thought that was silly and didn't understand why anybody would want to just stare at vegetables grow and not eat them. So we negotiated and I got them to promise not to eat 12 I picked out so I can have the seeds and grow the third generation.

My 12 stubby amaranths grew old and bore seeds, and I collected most of the seeds into an envelope and scattered the rest everywhere in my front yard. During the last few months when my Great Grandpa was alive he had taken his daughter, myself, and some cousins up to work in his big empty field. He was trying to grow an orchard which he once had when he retired from politics back in the old country. My grandma – Great Grandpa's daughter – and he, had eaten some of the amaranth my little mom and step dad gave to them from our front yard, which they really liked. So that day I passed the envelope of dried amaranth seed stocks to my then alive Great Grandpa and told him they were the seeds of a pooj of P'tee that is red in color and grows taller then a person which he once ate from my house. I told him for two generations they have not grown past a foot for some strange reason, I still want to grow this pooj hoping one day, the pooj will make tall plants again. But I need to grow them far away from my little mom and step dad so they won't eat it all. My Great Grandpa said that if the pooj produces very tall plants that one of its generations must grow tall. And so Great Grandpa took the envelope and agreed to help me continue my red amaranths flow of generations. He and some cousins made these little patches of broken ground and scattered a few seeds into each patch, while me and other cousins made anti-rabbit wire fences to go around the amaranth patches.

To manipulate or subvert my Great Grandpa and grandma from eating these plants I brought up supermarkets and how I don't ever see P'tee sold in any Asian supermarkets and I asked why this was so intentionally. My grandmother – great grandpa's daughter who is the Head of our big extended family – said that she saw one or two Asian supermarkets sell them once but they were terribly expensive. $1 for only a handful of leaves. The intended idea was to subtly implant in their minds the idealistic prospect of growing the amaranth as a crop to sell to supermarkets. You only clip the tops of the plant to sell, and the plant spouts new branches to grow its seed stocks. My grandma had the sudden idea of growing this P'tee as a cultivated crop to sell to supermarkets. I nodded and said that was a great idea! My grandmother took some of the seed stocks to grow in her back yard.

Great Grandpa said that he had never seen red colored P'tee which grew taller than a man, and that one day he would like to see one. He returned to the Essence before he could see the Red Amaranth in full bloom across his field now. When talking about the seed stocks of amaranth, Great Grandpa once told us a long winded old people story – the kind they often tell – of his days as an ambassador visiting Japan. He was sent by the king to fetch rice as the kingdom was experiencing a famine in certain regions and was told to agree to trade whatever he felt was needed. Great Grandpa said his Japanese counterpart brought him to the Japanese countryside to show him vast fields of beautiful traditional rice terraces.

His Japanese counterpart said to him as they looked out at the countryside that people were like rice plants. Just like rice plants we live collectively together in large groups called families, clans, cities, and villages dependent on Nature and those around us for our sustenance and well being. Arrogant and self centered people are like the rice plants with seed stocks stuck up high toward the sky as if to set themselves lofty above others. The Humble and Honourable people are like the rice plants whose seed stocks bows low to the ground. Why so? The Japanese counterpart asked Great Grampa. Great Grandpa used to work on farms and was familiar with rice plants. He said because the seed stock of rice which sticks up are empty inside and worthless, whereas the seed stocks which bows to the ground are full with life giving rice. He reminded us that day to be like the rice plant and always humbly in heart bow low toward the ground in life, knowing inside of us there is a fullness of life, value, virtue, tradition, honour, and culture. And like those rice plants he once talked about, his Red Amaranth now humbly bow low toward the ground full inside, ready to give birth to the next generation.

Generations

I never realized you can learn about life from a single plant, and the little pathei-mathos gained from the trial and error of nurturing this one plant. My front yard is now filled with big, beautiful red amaranth, and little green ones are everywhere. From one plant my friends, this front yard, my grandmother's back yard, and late Great Grandpa's field is filled with amaranth. Out of One, Many. But this required the flow of generations. Four generations of amaranths and over two years to be exact. It looked like the single little amaranth I plucked from the side of the fence was just one doomed and neglected weed. But I took it and devoted my time to it. Nurtured it and allowed it to live out its natural life. And from that one plant came many seeds dispersed, such that the second generation bore many more. With each generation – if nurtured and tended – bearing a further larger amount.

What have I learned on a pragmatic level? It's hard to put something experiential into words. Populum Non Campos Tempus. Memes are like seeds. Mind the field. Mythos the water which floods the rice paddy. One Manu, One Moses, One Buddha, One Muhammad, One Saint Paul across time and generations of man, increasingly bares fruit. If the seed and mythos is tended to aeonically across Time and Generations. Wyrd willing.

Knowing what I have learned from cultivating Red Amaranth for 4 generations now, I can calmly say that I don't care if I am the only ONA person on earth. I don't care if ONA numbers are few. As long as the one or few ONA people bow low towards the ground, gravid and full of life, culture, tradition, and inner value. For just as the rice stocks which sticks up high bares no fruit or generations, the arrogant and self centered are empty and bare no fruit or generational influence in the greater Field of Mankind.

To stay relevant to each emerging generation is what is key. But the person once behind Anton Long had this figured out in a genius way long ago. I've learned to become aware of how "Anton Long" worked in the past. He is very good at writing and developing new concepts for ONA, but may be very aware of his own personal limitations, which is a great self assessing virtue to have. I have noticed that Anton Long taps into the Next Generation market by appointing or allowing Outer Representatives far younger than he is to take charge of ONA. First was Beesty Boy who was very young – an entire generation in front of Anton Long – when he was Outer Rep. Not only was Beesty Boy of a different younger generation, but he was creative and had marketing skills. After him was Michael Ford, who was also of a much younger generation than Anton Long. It's a genius way to take root in each successive emerging generation, by making/allowing one of them as the Front Person and "face."

If I had a few ONA Initiated dedicated to live, express, and develop ONA it would be better. And to have the number of ONA associates we do today is more than I can ask for. Hitler once said: "He who owns the youth owns the future." On a wide scale pragmatic level, of the 2 million humans slaughtered by the Khmer Rouge the killers were mostly between the ages of 12-16, who used rocks, big sticks, and plastic bags. Mao's Cultural Revolution would not have been possible without the passionate and emboldened youth. Remember my words: "Old men fart, the passionate youth are death defiant." Mundane Satanism is dying. It's constipated with all these old 30-40 year old men farting around in internet forums. Farting their lofty opinions around. You listen to how they talk shit about young teenagers, as if they were never one's themselves. How they say a 13 year old or 15 year old is "too" young to understand shit to be a "real satanist." Cuz their young minds won't compute the senseless gibberish of their "satanic philosophy," or whatever they call their idealism of the Left Hand Path. Yet – do consider this – these same old dummies bleat on and on about how their satanism is a “praxis,” and doing.

It's not in the nature – the Time & Season – of a 30 year old human being to “do shit.” That's when nature mellows you because it's your season to have Nature her next generation of humans. When was Jesus a-preaching? Around age 30. When did Buddha preah-trah [“became enlightened”] at age 30. Age 30 is the peek of a person's “thinking/contemplative curve.” Right? Cuz it's down hill from there. So don't tell me if you are 30 or 40 that you are out “doing shit.” I ain't stupid. The only shit your doing is talking, and doing what others your age are doing: work, family, bills, taxes. You and I know very god damn well that the age group of humanity that “does shit” are teens. I was one, and so were you. It's the proven works of Mother Nature and Father Time. The only “satanic” praxis your average old person in their 30-40 is doing is living vicariously via their satanism's idealistic talk of praxis.

They talk shit about these young people. How teens can't understand the lofty ideology of satanism. Fuck understanding shit. The Understanding comes later from pathei-mathos. Let them do what teenagers do since the dawn of our species: rebel against stale orthodoxies, raise hell, start warrior groups, kill for a cause. The warriors of the past become the tribal elders of tomorrow filled with wisdom born from their past experiences. I'm talking about wisdom rooted in decades of exeatic experience only a red blooded teen can live out and express. This shit in mundane satanism passing off as “wisdom” is empty abstract beliefs, opinions, and ideals. Fuck that shit. I'd rather see ONA populated with emboldened passionate teenager, then old aged partyliners farting philosophy and theories. Both are needed in a functioning system. But every person and generation has their place and natural dharma.

We got our partyliners in ONA now. Come next Generation, I'll have my teens. I've already pre-planned ways to get my teenagers. The best way for me personally is to have children of my own and raise them ONA. Once they are teens, I'll put them in charge of recruiting in their junior highs and high schools to make their own nexions. Then let them go out and do what teenagers do naturally. Wait for my teens to grow up inside the actual experience of ONA Kulture and Praxis. They become the new partyliners. Give them the ONA to run with. Repeat the cycle across Time and Generations. Give me just one ONA person devoted to nurture and cultivate ONA. By next the next generation [circa 40 years] I'll have a handful. A handful is all I need to seed the third generation. And by the aeonic season of the fourth Generation, I'll have an entire living, breathing, Tribe of ONA folk.

I don't care about numbers now. I ended up with a big field covered with amaranth from nurturing one plant. ONA can be small now. I care only for the quality of its current associates. If this ONA were a blood red Amaranth, those few of us Sinister Initiates today are the seeds of this single plant. It is not how many we are today that really matters. What really matters is if we as seeds are each full inside. The numbers comes in Time and Generation, wyrdfully from such seeds with inner fullness. Inner fullness meaning that rather than mind other people's businesses and be concerned about their beliefs, paradigms, opinions, views, and rather than being on some crusade to convince others to see thing our way, we instead focus purely on our own personal self-development and inner growth. Like attracts like. In Time for each of us, those who resonates with us each, will naturally become associates. It is a slow and natural growth which ultimately begins within each of us and spreads out from there.

A plant's entire energy and effort ultimately goes to the proper development of its Seed so that it's Seed can give rise to its next Generation. If ONA were a plant and we the seed of this plant, then the very energy and effort of ONA goes into the proper development of each of us first and foremost. Because it is from each of us that ONA spawns into causal existence. I've grown very tiresome of mundane satanism. Like the West, it's lost its social glue and is in a state of dilapidation. As a system mundane satanism no longer cares for the Quality of its Seed. Rather, it seems to not even be a coherent functioning plant at all. Instead mundane satanism feels more like garden weeds today growing in a neglected field. Where every weed is out for itself, asserting it's views, definitions, convictions onto anybody different in mind. It has become an rice plant whose seed stocks sticks up with emptiness. Nothing but an empty worldview, a feel good pill, an opiate of a mass, an empty excuse to feel better more intellectual than others, an excuse to get into chatrooms and debate about abstractions. An excuse to mind other people's business, but not mind your own. Quite typical as one would expect in a decadent social order in decline. Rome didn't fall in one day did it. And in Time, from its rubble came many new kingdoms and civilizations.

PRACTICAL INFLUENCE

Practical Influence

There has been this theme bubbling in me going on, about a new topic to write on, which I have been resisting. But coincidentally someone actually searched the phrase “onaxs practical influence” three times to find our blog the other day. I first resisted writing a practical guide to inspiring and influencing people because it seems as if nobody “out there” cares for this topic. Also I resisted because I thought it would be more advantageous for me to keep most of what I know to myself and a close body of friends. But I know the human nature of your common mundane enough to know that even if they know how things are done, usually they won’t put shit into practice, or care enough to do anything besides yap an opinion, which is about all they have ever done as a breed. You know how many books on business and making money like “the secret” has been sold over the past 20 years since Don Lapre was yapping on late nite stations selling book on this topic? And of all the mundanes who bought the shit and knew how things were done, how many of them are rich today? How many of these mundanes actually have it in their mundane nature to apply with effort what they “know?”

But what’s “influence” got to do with ONA? It’s the basics of what ONA calls the “Sinister Dialectic” which has been a part of ONA from day one, and is a part of the Culture of ONA. Meaning it’s one of many, many things an ONA person is encouraged to try and practice. As the Sinister Dialectic's first opening paragraph puts it:

"The sinister dialectic (often called the sinister dialectic of history) is the name given to Satanlc strategy – that is, (a) the use of Black Magick to change individuals/events on a significant scale; (b) to gain control and influence; and (c) the use of Satanic forms (individuals/influence etc.) to produce/provoke changes." – ONA, The Sinister Dialectic.

Marketing

Don Lapre was my earliest influence on the subject of marketing. He was a con artist and for a while was successful at his business. Then eventually he got in big trouble for the fraud he committed, and killed himself over it unfortunately. But he was an early influence and today he is one person in my "Master Mind" group which you learn how to make in the book "Think & Grow Rich," which is like a bible to me. I believe it is unfortunate that we have safety-net laws such as anti-fraud laws to protect the stupid from their own stupidity. It's also unfortunate that when we do have such anti-fraud laws, that we can't prosecute and convict popes, priests, and religionists for fraud.

I liked Don Lapre's style too. Too bad he killed himself. Don Lapre, Solomon Tulbure; this libation of pink juice on a beautiful California summer day is for you guys. Don conned people with a smile and a nervous eye blinking problem in his infomercials. He was entertaining to watch do his moves. Somolon T., was a nut case, but I still admired him as an unknown hero and early influence. I made up this one saying when a friends and I were talking about people we admire: "Crazy people look up to crazy people." Ain't that the truth. Or in lay terms: 'The people we admire are ultimately a refecation of our own inner character, because like attracts like.' I would have loved to watch Solomon T., in action as a chronic troll back in the day, just for the entertainment value. I learned about him long after he jumped off a freeway bridge to his death. I have bad luck with people I look up to. They seem to commit suicide or just go insane. I learned about Tulbure way back when I was a stupid teen on Myspace. Back then me and a group of us "hung out" in the Knights Templar group with Masons and we fought anti-masons and nut cases who thought they were descendents of Templars or Jesus.

So I made friends with this one Mason who said he owned his own music studio thing [which turned out to be a computer program only]. This Mason one day told me that he had 260 degree in Masonry. I objected saying: "What? 260 degrees? The Scottish Rite maxes out at 32, with the 33rd being an honorific title bestowed verbally only." He explained to me that he got all of his degrees from the Illuminati Order! After I rolled my eyes I went to alert all of my same aged friends and those Myspace Masons that I found a fake Mason who was talking about how he had 260 degrees, being a member of the fake illuminati, and so on. We all bashed him. It was fun. A year later I got curious about this “illuminati order,” and so I ordered the book that fake Mason suggested I read which was by Solomon Tulbure called the “Illuminati Manifesto.”

Amazingly – to me personally – this book turned out to be very similar in thought process and way of seeing things as what you find in the Satanic Bible. The first part of the book spent time trashing the bible’s illogical points, the second part trashed Islam, Solomon – the so called Illuminati Grand Master – praised Objectivism [al a Ayn Rand]. But the most fascinating part about this so called Manifesto was the organizational framework Tulbure created for his “illuminati order,” which for me at the time was a novel idea. It wasn’t an actual order with lodges you can go to to get initiated. And it didn’t have just self initiation rites. Actually, it didn’t have initiation rites at all. It was something you – the interested – created. He had a “degree system” which was based on tests or things you had to do to be in that degree. Like to be in the second degree of this “illuminatty order” you had to agree with and uphold the Constitution of the New World Order [or whatever he called it]. He did actually draft a constitution that was very reasonable, but I disagreed with half of the articles. To be in one of the higher degrees, you had to be involved in practical real world acts of insurrection against the American government.

My major contention with his constitution was that it wasn’t based on the learnings and yearnings from real life experiences, like with the case of the American Constitution. In the American Constitution you had a group of guys who were colonialists, who were a part of the Old Order in England and Europe, who did experience religious persecution, lack of liberty, tyranny of crown and mitre, etc. And so because of those experiences they desired for something new. So we see that the constitution those ancient fellas created was in part a realistic reaction to the Old Order, and a proactive Attempt [stress on attempt] to create a New Order [a socio-political framework/order]. Whereas with Tulbure’s constitution, it’s mostly intellectual ponderings, idealistic wishful thinking/projecting, creative thinking & writing, and he may be reacting to conditions of America, but he reacts to it within the Comfort of the American Order.

I shared this book with my network of friends back then because of the great idea Solomon had with his organizational framework. It was this book which had the most influence on the WSA352 at that time. We based the WSA on Tulbure’s design, and even went so far as to make our WSA a “black lodge” of Tulbure’s Order in those days. I learned much later after trying to research on this guy that he was an active “troll” all over in the old parts of cyberspace [usenet]. Or at least many people back then called him a troll. It looked like all Solomon was doing was trying to find a market and distribute his ideas. I have personal disagreements with many of his ideas, ideals, and how he sees or presents the world and politics, but all in all, I liked his ideas and how his mind work. The way his mind reasoned, the way it thought things out, the way it designed organization as a means to try and accomplish objectives, and especially the way it sought to duplicate/replicate itself.

Unfortunately a good idea is only worth its marketing power. A “good” idea which lacks the means to be sold to a market cannot logically be “good,” because that valuation of “good” is an internal and subjective judgment we make of things, and a thing lacking the means to be sold has not reached the market to even be subjectively valued in the first place.

Tulbure’s ideas and memeplex is virtually unknown, even though if we disconsider the outer labels and key words used, Tulbure’s memeplex and LaVey’s memeplex virtually overlapped 80-90% of the time. Something odd happened in 2004 which drove Tulbure to commit suicide by jumping off a freeway bridge in the middle of the night. It may have been years and years of simply trying to “sell” his “radical” ideas to a cold market which repeatedly was mean to him plus a case of some mental disorder where he became paranoid that “they” were after him.

So in those early days of my mental growth I had two Minds to study: Anton LaVey and Solomon Tulbure. I liked the idea of both individuals, and from my unbiased perspective, 90% of their ideas overlap in mindspace. Personally I guess or hypothesize that this may be so because Tulbure borrowed from the Satanic Bible and just reworded things, but my hypothesis is just speculation, since I have no proof. The first question I asked myself was why was one mind successful in inspiring and influencing other minds, and one mind failed, to the point that it was driven to kill itself, if and when 90% of the core ideas themselves were congruous? It took a long time – years – to slowly figure out what the difference was, and the questioning of this difference between these to ultimately lead me into the study of influencing people, amateurish “politics,” and marketing.

Politics

The old people in my family often get together and you’ll see all these very old, white haired men, drinking, eating, and talking up a storm about politics and their “good old days,” before the revolution, when they were deep in the business of politics of a now defunct kingdom. The term used by these old men is actually “Roa-See,” to describe their old profession. Roa means to look for or search for, and See means to eat or consume. Together Roa-See means to earn a living or to do business. Politics to these old men was a business.

I was overhearing a small group of older boy cousins talk about American politics and 'arguing' with the grandpas. The boys were talking about the typical stuff you'd hear like democrats and republicans, liberals, and conservatives, theories and things each party stood for. Most – if not all of my family – of those grandpas are strict Republicans and liked President Nixon, even though, if we recall, Nixon bombed Vietnam and Cambodia ruthlessly. Its considered an act of dishonour to these grandpas if you vote democrat or talk about the democratic party with them.

So after the boy cousins stated their ideas and arguments one of the very old grandpas said angrily: "No, no, no! You're speaking from the wrong side! What side are you on? This Business is like a broom. There is the handle part of a broom and the bristles part. In politics one group works the handle, and another group is broomed! You're not speaking from the perspective of a Handler. Learn to know what side you and your kin are on before you speak!"

As their talks and reprimand went on, another of the old grandpas informed the group of older cousins that their "business" of politics had nothing to do with any of that liberal-conservative, democracy-communist crap. The politics was there is a government or regime and a populous, and if the regime desired to remain in power, the populous must be controlled with policies. The craft [trick] of their end of politics is getting the populous to adopt the policies and keeping public opinions – minds – fixated in desired spots to maintain the business.

So from these grandpas point of view there are two perspectives of this thing we call politics. There is the point of view of the citizen, and the point of view of the regime. So if you knew of these two perspectives, you can generally guess/know where in the spectrum of the socio-political order a person is from or attached to in some way by how they see politics or how they talk about it. A person who talks about parties, ideologies, leaders, officials, and so on are subjugated/citizens. They speak about politics in this way, because this is the end of politics they see and experience: the bristles end of the broom. It is the only side or aspect of the political spectrum such public people have ever been exposed to.

Now if we had a person who when talking about politics is fixated on the law system, justice system, does not have nice things to say about the police, has contempt for or is critical for this law and justice system, we can assume or guess that such a person has been familiar on a first hand basis with prisons and the law system. Because that is the side of the political system he has been exposed to for whatever reason. But you can't expect the same perspective and talk from the actual regime members [and their friends and family], because they see things from an entirely different end or side. The Game of politics from the handle side is to say and do whatever it takes to maintain your hold on the power apparatus for obvious personal, family, and clique benefits. It's not only human nature, it's primate nature, and virtually animal nature.

A good example I overheard was about the past king of their old country. The opinion of many of the peasantry is that he is a god king [Sihanouk]. Most of the thinking middle class believe he may be a bad king or even a traitor. But the regime side of things sees this king and what happened before and during the revolution very differently.

Before the revolution when the Khmer Rouge became a political movement and party with arms, the Democratic Party in some foreign country [America] tried to stick its nose into the native's affairs by stating that it would be best to have a government which included the Khmer Rouge. It's the democratic thing to do they said, because in a democracy all groups of people have the right to speak. And so this foreign political party [the US Democrats] supplied money to and supported the Khmer Rouge in their early days. This is why most elders and men in my own family are diehard loyalist Republicans who'd slap you for saying bad things about Nixon.

So that's the background scene for the first problem the king and regime had. Can you see the problem as a regime member? The problem as king and regime is that you understand that you need the people as a collective – their collective opinions/favour – to have your power. The problem here is that now you have a foreign nation using money and ideas of democratic equality to give to a “party” [the KR] who are allegedly for the peasants and workers, which are 90% of your social order, ie: the majority of the populous, your power base. So the US Democrats weren't just trying to be nice. They were using ideas and money to attempt to subvert the political and social order of this country to change the political and social landscape. The problem is this foreign nation is using its money and ideas to Subvert the collective sentiments of your populous: your power base, for their own ends. How do you as king and regime fix this problem? Cuz if you don't fix it, you're out of a “job,” and you'll lose your power. A way to fix it is to get those people to not like America. So here the “policy” or will of the regime is to get the people to dislike America. How is that done in practice?

The way people work is funny. They are stupid. You can't tell them straight on or directly to do something or believe something, because they will reject what is told and do the opposite. The more you apply force, the more they will resist. Apply enough pressure and they will revolt. The king back then couldn't say to the populous: "Look I have a big problem on my hand. All the power me and my friends have is derived from controlling you people, and now America is using their money and fancy-pantsy talk of freedom to get you to make a new kind of government. So can you people help me out and not like America and stay my subjects?"

So that is your "Policy" the king and regime has in this scenario. The Policy is that the king, regime, and governing apparatus must remain in place and the people must support that apparatus. So as the regime, how do you assert this Policy onto your own people and have them conform. You first do what you see Sihanouk and any "anti-American" political leader do: basically talk shit about America, but in a very "strategic" manner.

The strategic manner in this regard is a simple pattern used even in religion, and also in marketing. Don Lapre used the same pattern: (1) You first present the Bad and Hurtful, targeting people's emotions; (2) you present an idealistic Good; (3) You present your "solution" the people must take to obtain the idealistic Good. But you always target people heart buttons, and stay away from appealing to the masses logic and reason.

A working example of this three step strategy of influence is what you seen in labs. You have a rat in a cage. There is a red button. There is a green button. Rat pushes red gets shocked. Rat pushes green gets food. Which button is the rat going to learn to avoid? The fucking red one. We are biologically wired to avoid what is hurtful and painful. And so why is the emotions the target? First because the emotions – chitta – is the more primal part of us, and second because reason can't feel.

Another example of this three step strategy is in religion. You first talk a whole lot about Hell. What's the language of Chitta? Pictures, imagery, symbolism, mythos [as opposed to logos] right? You dream in pictures, not in logical discourses. Avoid the lecture of hell. Just go right into the mythos and Paint a picture of it to cause the people to feel negative emotions: fear, hate, etc. Step two is to present the idealistic and the Good. You talk about God as the God of Love, appease the human ego by talking about the worth of the human soul etc. Third step is the Solution. If you want to avoid Hell, worship God. If you want to worship God the solution is go to "our churches," read "our" books," and follow "our" priesthood." So how effective is this three step strategy? Its fucking effective. Count how many human beings on earth belong to a religion. The entire three step strategy on a logical side is entirely a non-sequitur, where the last part doesn't even reasonably follow the first part. If a hell even exists – let's say one does – and if a god exists [lets say one does], why "their" religious laws, books, and priesthood and not some other book or priesthood? Why their laws, their dogma, their teachings, and not others?

Heaven is just one example. Radical Islam uses the same three step plan to power and influence in a different way. You first hear a load of anti-America talk, how America is either the Devil, or how American culture is corrupting “our” culture and ways. Or how America and England occupy Islamic countries and commit alleged acts of oppression and such with the local people. Throw in a few crying ladies, and pictures of dead children for good measure. Then you bring in the idealistic talk. How great a people you’d be if all the Americans and English were gone! No more Zionist occupation! Don’t let those Jews and their American and English stooges do to Iran what they did with Palestine! What a wonderful nation we’d have. Can you imagine the peace and prosperity? Work up the people’s emotions for that idealistic vision. Then once you’ve sold your emotive idealisms, you give the people the Solution, the way to make it real. Jihad is the Way. All of a sudden the young men who once had nothing to live for in life, now have a cause to die for... because they actually have nothing to live for.

In the old days you see Sihanouk as king on black and white television talking about how much he loved his nation and people [him in PR mode]. And how much he cares for his people like a father. In his speeches he refers to himself as “Owpouk” which means Father, and we – the citizenry – out of respect call him the Samdach-Ow which means the King/Lord-Dad/Father. So there he’s using a very subtle psychological trick on the masses. He’s appealing to their emotion/chitta by Painting himself a father figure, a provider, one who cares affectionately for you: his Child. Where have we seen this psychological tactic used before? God the Heavenly Father. Where also? In a movie called Traffic. Watch that movie. The old General kidnaps a petty drug dealer to brainwash him to do something for him. He and his cohorts play the good guy bad guy ploy on the drug dealer. The General says in plain Spanish [subtitled] that he’ll be the good guy and present himself as a Father to the tortured drug dealer. Why? Because the same fucking tactics works on animals: dogs.

You beat a dog silly, and then act nice to it, pet it, and feed it, and the dog will obey you and like you. He doesn’t know what he did to make you stop beating it and then act nice to it. All the dog knows is that it’ll do whatever you want as long as you don’t beat it and keep feeding it. Pimps – real one – use this same Father tactic. You beat the bitch silly left and right. Tell the bitch she’s worthless and make sure you talk about the bitch’s old life in the slums with nothing. Once you’ve broke the bitch you put on the Father figure role. Be a caring father figure, pet the bitch, feed her [wine and dine], give her gifts. Tell her “we gotta take care of each other,” I take care of you, you take care of me. We’re family. Then give her the solution: work the streets.

I had a source I won’t name who once told me how they make child prostitutes. He said his “people” use a tested and tried technique to make any person a money earning loyal prostitute. My source told me his people learned the technique from the Japanese and Chinese mafias. It's a simple technique. The first step is to know what type of girl sells in the underground market. Generally blonde American girls are gold. So the first step is to trick these girls to leave America. How do they do this? By putting up ads about modeling and acting in foreign countries. Or you just take one, if your country has a large resource of blondes.

Once the girl is obtained you go into step two which in this case is the presentation of the Bad or Hurtful. You strip the girl naked, beat her silly, and put her in a small box in a dark room with no food and water for several days. That breaks most young people. Once you have emotionally broken the girl you go into the presentation of the Good and Idealistic. In other words, you show the girl that she has an alternative. You send in a woman or kind looking male associate who talks to the girl in an affectionate tone, feigns empathy, cries for the girl, and most importantly: the person feeds the girl water and food. The same nice motherly or fatherly person must do the feeding. The caring mother or father figure gives the girl the Solution to have the nice alternative. What happens is you tease the girl with just enough water and just enough food to keep her alive and tell her the boss needs her to have sex with people for food and water. The first client are male members of the group who are brought in. The men just have sex with her, and after the sex, the girl is given her water and meals. This is done over and over again, until the girl is trained to equate the good, sweet affection, the food and water, her own safety, with having sex. You'll hear in satanic circles that self preservation is the highest law of nature. If so, then that law can be used to your advantage, can't it? The more you understand how something works, the more you can work it.

This method is used in Southeast Asia to make girls you see working the red light districts. In places like Cambodia poor Vietnamese families will kidnap little girls 5 and up, from their families, and they are processed in this manner. The effects are shockingly amazing. These girls don't ever leave their pimp families to find their natural families, and they stay "employed," raising their pimp family money. I've seen documentaries of these nosy Good-Doers from these Christian organizations who go into such countries and tries to liberate such girls from their profession and pimp families, and you can see 100% of the time, these girls scream in fear and cry and asked to be brought back to their "adopted families." We're all animals right? If you can train an animal, then you can condition people with the same basic methodology. The thing to keep in mind is that the human animal has a major weakness or flaw his "lesser evolved" cousins lack: animals don't compute spoken language, as we do. People do, and so spoken language becomes a very useful tool in the training of people.

So in the old days Sihanouk presented himself in his speeches as a caring father figure. And his presentation of the Bad and Hurtful was to caringly tell his people that America is a two faced bastard nation, plain and simple. They can't be trusted. They are friendly Now, he said, just like the French were at first friendly. But he then asked, what did the French do afterward? He said the French colonized them, and they as a kingdom and people no longer were free to be their own country and to live for their own destiny. And so he told his people back then, that even though the Americans want to help, as the Father-King, he believes that the people and he should try and take care of things on their own. To prove to the international community that they are capable. And he told his people that he doesn't want another foreign nation to control or colonize them again. The people bought it, and he maintained his power and place. He resisted the idea of the Khmer Rouge being a part of his government. And so things escalated and the KR started their revolution. After the KR won and took power, you then see something very strange, which tainted the king's reputation forever.

What the king did was he sided with the KR. There are old footages of the king in all black with the scarf of the KR. And now he is heard saying nice things about the KR. Why? From a citizen's point of view, it looks like the king either betrayed the people or he was a traitor. From the king's point of view, he was trying to save his position and status in the "new" regime. The political situation was that the king had a PR connection with the populous and so he offered himself up as a "puppet king," just as long as he and his family can maintain some status. He and his family lived in China at the time. After the KR fell, the King returned and still had his place in the political apparatus. As the politician you can't simply tell the people: "Okay, we're in deep shit people. Here's the plan: Ima save my ass by siding with these bad guys. Then when they fall, Ima return to subjugate you like old times." So here you can see the king saved his ass, and his family's asses. Now we have to go see how the rest of the regime saved their asses and tried to save their power and positions.

Politics shows its true colors in times of war and hardship, or at least you can see the regime and their function better. In this case, during the revolution, nobody in the regime gave a shit about party or ideology, liberalism or conservatism. There are for the regime member two crucial objectives: (1) Save your own asses and family, & (2) try to insure that when things get better you still have your status and power. So how did those old regime members do this? Remember to have power, it must be consented to you by the people [via force or otherwise]. Which means the sentiments and opinion of the people must be in your favour. How do you influence a people to give you power when during the revolution, you didn't give a shit about them? You act like a politician and just lie.

So what happened in this case was you have the KR which was in power. They are a communist group of armed peasant hooligans and run by college educated intellectuals peasants. You have the National Regime Cronies who need to save their asses and try to maintain their power through all of this. To make things happen the regime cronies secretly sent envoys into Vietnam. Remember, at this time Vietnam was being taken over by a Communist group of armed peasants itself! The secret plan was to first trick the Viet Cong into thinking that their Khmer Rouge allies was going to betray them and invade Vietnam. The second trick is to promise the Viet Cong land, resources, and joint power, with the condition that the national government [ie, the regime] remain in public power as the in between “person” connecting the Viet Cong [the Private Power] with the Khmer people. The third trick is to – as the regime – welcome Nixon’s bombings because it killed the KR and VC, and “some” of your civilians, but who cares. This strategy actually worked pretty good. A lot of citizens and regime members died, but it worked.

So that’s something political that happened in history from the perspective of a regime. It gives you a glimpse into what Politics really is from their point of view minus the clap trap and glamour. Politics is not the actual ideologies, beliefs, hopes, visions, of a party. That’s the sugar coated glamour created for the public to consume to get them to support you. Politics is the method of gaining power and asserting your policies on a people. The art, skill, craft, or science of it is the sly methods used to get the people to accept the policies and give you the power. This science is called Influence. And its simple, in theory. The simple equation is: Popularity = Influence. The hard part of putting the theory into practice is to obtain the popularity. How is that done? A clue is that the words Popularity, Populous, and Population, all share a very key common root.

So the break down is that you have a Policy you want to force on a group of mundane generic people. That policy can be anything. It can be the people obeys your religious laws, and pays tithes to you and your priests. It can be that the people obeys your secular laws and pays secular tithes to you and your law priests. It can be that shop owners and residents of a city obeys your rules and pays protection money to you and your fellow racketeers. The first step to making the people to accept this Policy is to first present to them the Bad, Ugly, and Awful imagery. Appealing to their heart-mind and primal side. Why the primal side? Because reason is still a “new” thing, and that primal part of us has had more time to exist, and thus has more power to control us. For instance, Fear is primal. There is a reason why we fear things. It keeps us alive because we stay away from big scary things that can hurt us or dangerous things that can kill us. So can test this out by putting a person who is deathly afraid of heights near a normal 10 foot tall ladder. Then when your test subject is by that ladder, you can proceed to give your friend a well written and cited lecture on how falling 10 feet off a ladder won’t kill him or do much harm. The worst that can happen is he fractures a bone, which heals. Will your friend climb the ladder? There is a battle going on inside him, which is a battle between his more Primal chitta, and his very new faculty of reason/logic. Which of the two will – almost always – win?

Appeal to the people’s primal side. One important thing people fail to see or understand is that when a group of people come together, a Group-Mind is formed. “Think & Grow Rich,” and plenty other books talks about this. It may be very true that you/us; the individual Human; has reason. But you see, this Group-Mind is an entirely different thing altogether, with its own Nature and psychology. This Group-Mind doesn't function with the same mental dynamics as our own individual mind would. It has its own dynamics and "mechanics." So, the trick is knowing your "audience" in this case. Not the individual humans, but this Group-Mind they are a part of. Make the Bad imagery/glamour look and feel as bad as possible. Jews are not only ugly with big noses, and are not only stingy, but they control the all the banks in Germany and they live in all of the nice houses! They are responsible for everything bad in Germany! Ney, the world! Just like imps and demons are the source of evil on the Christian mythos. Jews want to control you! Make you slaves. The signs are everywhere! Look they even cut the foreskin off non-Jew babies in secular nations! That's proof at the extent of their control dammit! We must be heroes and save the galaxy from Jewry!

Then you give the people [the Group-Mind] the Good and Idealistic stuff. Aryans are wonderful people! Aryans gave the world civilization, not the English. They are supreme! Fuck the Treaty of Versailles! Such a great Aryan race needs a hugely great Thousand Year Reich befitting of the Aryan race!!!

Then you give the people the Solution to the equation. So how do you make this Aryan race and Thousand Year Reich thing happen they ask? Why that's simple: Just make Hilter the leader and kill Jews or course?!

This is just a super simplification for what actually transpired in Germany. The missing element in this Germany case is the Factor of Influence: Hitler himself, and most importantly, "what" he was talking to: not to the "people," but to the invisible collective Group-Mind they were a living part of. In ONA terms, he was speaking to the acausal entity the people are a part of. Which acausal entity has the "power" of influence and control of its physical cells [the individual people]. No idea is worth anything if it can't sell itself and propagate in other minds. Hitler was the leader he was because he had the ability to Speak and via his showmanship [words & charisma] he captivated his audience's imagination [chitta] & emotions [chitta]. We Dream in pictures and feeling. We come into our mortal existence dreaming as babies. We never leave the realm of dreams fully in our mortal life. The power of ideals, ideas, vision, lie in that Dream Factor which is a primeval and constant part of our Beingness. So if we understand this aspect of human nature, then we can learn to take advantage of it.

My friends and I learned about this "acausal" group-mind phenomenon first from the books we read, then from observing people and places. At one time this topic led us into a conversation about a more different approach to civil engineering. The issue were slums and ghettos. My friends and I believed in the past that it was enough to reform a person living in such areas from criminal behaviour. But as reality shows, reforming the individual doesn't work. As soon as the person returns to his area, he turns back into his old self. How would we fix this issue? The hypothetical answer was that the person wasn't the Cause of the problem, but a visible symptom. The Cause was that the ghetto over time has developed some type of Group-Mind which influences its cells, meaning the people living inside of it. So our idea was that if we wanted to curb crime, we had to break up the coherency of the local residents of this area, and force everybody to relocate to different areas, into neighbourhoods that have healthy Group-Minds. Unfortunately, if you have ever observed neighbourhoods with healthy group-minds, you'll notice that such group-mind seems to have its own immune system and ability to accept and reject cellular units. If you introduce an unfamiliar poor Black family into a health place made up of mostly White residents, you get an immune reaction where the Black family [or Mexican/whatever] is shunned and rejected by the residents.

All of the great Immortals of our human species were bards of the Human Heart and the Collective Psyche. Muhammad and his desert poetry gave a people the idea that they were special to some God. Jesus redeemed his audience with words from a vile state back to a state above the angels. Buddha appealed to the sentiments of his audience by speaking of human suffering. Genghis Khan gave his people a dream to fight for,. George Washington gave his people a dream to fight for. And Martin Luther King Junior gave his downtrodden audience a Dream to strive for. It's in how these people spoke, or actually, what they were singing their ideas to: the Human Heart. Influence doesn't come from an intellectual or lecture.

You as a child or your children don't draft intellectual or philosophical essays to get you to buy them toys. They cry, and if you feel bad because they cry, you might give in and buy the toy. That's influence and manipulation. When these children learn to talk well, instead of crying they might use the sweet talk on you to get you to buy them things. That's influence. It comes naturally to children – to all of us when we were children. We know from instinct to speak to the human heart, and not no faculty of reason or apparatus of philosophy.

Inspiration works in the same primal way. I've never been inspired by reading clinical papers on makeup to buy makeup to use it. I just look at a pretty face that captivates my chitta and want to look as beautiful as her. I don't get inspired from reading a well cited essay from a fashion house to wear their clothes. I see the clothes on a person, it induces a feeling in me, and I go buy. No college lecture written by no scholar inspires you guys to go out and buy your trucks and work out. Who knows why you buy trucks, but a hot girl is all you need to inspire you to work out.

The ideology, philosophy, is for the potential "partyliners" in the public. It calls out a certain type of person to your inner circle. What do I mean? The doctrine and theology of the Church is not meant for the people. We know this because the shit wasn't even in a common language the people could even understand for hundreds of years. It was in Latin.

Same thing with Nazi ideology. Your everyday common German did not understand – or cared to – the whole doctrine and system of National Socialism. They grasped the basics which made them feel good, which stirred them emotionally, gave them meaning in Self and in Life. But when a person comes to you knowing the entire ideology and doctrine of Hitler's NS from front to back, such a person has a natural dharma for that doctrine. He's got something if he's knows the whole shit right? If a person came up to me knowing every ONA MSS, can describe to me how each of Beesty's tarot card drawings looked, and can explain to me in wonderful [new] detail the mythos of Vindex and the Magian, then this person is no ordinary person. Cuz no ordinary person would care to spend so much time knowing this shit. You have to have some sort of passion or dharma for it, to be spend so much idle time studying everything or to give your life to it. That's the type you hand ONA to, the ones with the natural dharmic passion for it. That's what the doctrine and ideology or philosophy is good for in practical terms. Other wise the mythos, the art, the rituals, rites, and pageantry, the culture and tradition is all the people need to inspire meaning to Self and Life.

Knowing human nature is the trick to influence. Which is why things like psychology, sociology, and anthropology, are subjected studied in Political Science. Having the Wisdom of how things works, allows you to have the know-how to manipulate it. Remember wisdom is applied knowledge. From the word Wise meaning the Ways/Wise of things. Knowing from experience, trial and error, how things work. So you first know something such as human nature. To know basically means such stuff has come into your conscious awareness. Then you mess around with what you know to figure out how it works. You study the car manual first, then get dirty and take things apart in your car. Once you have gained the Practical Wisdom for how the parts of a car works, then you can manipulate your car and trick it out. I know how a computer works. The electricity goes into the CPU chip, there are a bunch of 1's and 0's somewhere, if something doesn't work you hit it, and then you type shit with a keyboard. But I don't have the Wisdom for how a computer actually works. Which is why I can't manipulate my computer like computer geeks can do. So that is the difference between Knowledge and Wisdom. Understanding comes after wisdom, after long time experience.

If you Wisdom the flow of a river, then you can construct a water wheel to exploit the natural flow of the river. If you wisdom the nature of dogs that they can learn tricks if you give them treats and pet them, then you can learn to teach your dog tricks. If you wisdom that the human mind makes its opinions based on not how it objectively sees the world, but on how it subjectively interprets the world, then you can take advantage of that process. Because you now know that the reality of things is not a factor, and so you realize that it is the elements of the subjective mindscape which causes the formation of opinion, belief and feeling. And once you know that our thoughts and emotions gives rise and influences our actions and behaviour, then you have the basic knowledge of influencing the actions of a person.

In Practice

People should have learned the fundamentals of influence and social skills in high school. Then you build your know-how from that foundation up. It doesn't matter what social arena you are in, whether its campus, the work place, a political party, the military, or whatever. Because you have the same common denominator involved: People.

This first thing I was exposed to in early life which got me interested in influencing people of all things was watching an old black and white episode of Mission Impossible. It was on a weekend and late at night, so I got to stay up to watch TV with my uncle-dad, and he was watch the old Mission Impossible. It came after a black and white old timer TV show about some weird spy guy who knew nothing about anything. Not the Pink Panther.

I couldn't figure out what the show I was watching was about. I wasn't really interested. I just wanted to stay up. The main character reminds me of the guy from the Naked Gun movies, but when he was younger. But the one and only episode of Mission Impossible I watched was about these secret agents who were put on a mission to capture a bad guy living in a trailer in the middle nowhere with bushes and trees. But instead of going in the bad guy's house to handcuff him like I see all the time in Cops [the TV show], these secret agents played tricks on the bad guy's head. The agents were around the house or trailer and doing things to trick the bad guy into hearing and seeing things. That's all I remembered. And I never gave this episode any thought after that until years later when I was in high school. I was watching some old black and white documentary the teacher was playing and a scenery in this documentary triggered a memory of me watching that old Mission Impossible show. So then, armed with a high school level intelligence, I was able to see the value in that old episode, and the new thing I saw changed me inside forever. I saw that the agents in that old episode had used outside stimuli to influence their target to hear, see, and believe things, which in turn influenced the target's behaviour and perception of things. And how people see things [believe] influences their opinions.

That was a high school epiphany for me. I realized that you can manipulate a person's opinions by tricking their mind in how it sees things. And more importantly I connected that people's positive opinions of you gets you their Favour, and the more favour you had, the more popular you were. And the more popular you were, the more power of influence you had on everybody. And I want that power and influence. Power and influence as in, I tell what to wear to school, where to shop for your clothes, I tell you how to think, who to like, and who to hate. And if you don't do what I say, I'll get my guy friends or chola friends to lynch you.

Here I should define what I mean when I personally use the term "popular" in this essay. By "Popular" I simply mean that the populous [people in general] consider you in their minds, hearts, field of awareness. That's it. That you simply exist [as a coherent and recognizable meme] in the minds or awareness of a people. It does not matter if they – as a collective or loosely associated large group – consider you in a negative way or a positive way. Just as long as a crowd of people considers you. And by "consider," I just mean they think about you, talk about you, or what you did or said, how you dress, whatever. Consider means when you are on their minds, for whatever reason. Because as long as they as a group are fixated on the consideration of you, they spread you as a meme into other people's minds. And that is what I mean by "Popularity." I don't mean it the way it is generally used to suggest that you are liked, admired, and loved by a large number of people. That's a completely different phenomenon. Admiration or even adulation and "popularity" are different terms because they are different things. Their semantic fields may overlap, but they are discernibly different phenomena.

A real quick and easy example to illustrate what "popular" means in this essay and how it works is Hitler. You can go to pretty much any country's people and bring up Hitler, and most often they will recognize the name and person and some historical elements associated with that meme. So Hitler in this case Hitler is a "Popular" icon, meaning that to a group of people, he is simply recognizable or known, in their awareness. We also here know that just because people know him, that they don't always admire him. I think Hitler in most cases produces a different emotional response. But the trick to all this is that the "meme" of Hitler, due to the popularity it has, bounces from mind to mind, across one generation to another. And once in a while that meme sinks into the right minds, you see. And so we have this real phenomenon where even after 70 years since world war 2, and even after Hitler and his regime politically failed; Hitler's words, rhetoric, and propaganda still infects receptive minds across Time. Which is why National Socialism has not gone extinct, and will continue to propagate as a memplex, so long as the mass continues to bounce that memehook around. You don't kill weeds by scattering their seeds.

Back in high school I had a great source of insight to learn how to influence people: Celebrities. I learned from just simply studying celebrities like musicians how their popularity has the power of influence over their groups of people who also like or admire them. So here's a real example. You have these very popular hip hop artists who used to wear a line of clothing called Fubu remember? For Us, By Us? So these Fubu wearing hip hop artists got all popular, and all these African Americans began wearing Fubu also, making Fubu a multibillion dollar brand. You see these other types of more hard core rappers wearing sports jerseys in their videos, and then you start seeing all these people in public life wearing sports jerseys also, all blinged out as well. Or when alternative groups like Nirvana and Pearl Jam came out with their grungy wardrobe, you see people who listen to those popular groups wear grunge also. Heavy metal groups have long hair, and so the people who listen to that genre wear their hair long also. So that's what I mean by Power of Influence, like you wear what I tell you to wear. It actually doesn't work to directly tell and demand that people dress like you or else. You have to play games with them like this, and if you got the Game, people just do what you do without being told.

This social phenomenon is called "Association By Proxy." In one sense if you have a well liked celebrity, this celebrity is only one person and their fanbase is many. So the fanbase associates with the celebrity by proxy. By adopting what the celebrity wears, talking like the celeb, and so on. In another sense we have a natural desire to be identified with things or others which/who reflects us. If we like Communism, we desire to be identified with it. But since Communism isn't a thing, we associate with it by proxy. We may wear or use its symbolism for example, and so on. Things like Satanism and Christianity have several means for people to associate with them by proxy, the symbolism, the mythos, the demonym, identifying core beliefs, etc. The more a person can identify with such things, the more ideas the person will adopt from these things.

LaVey doesn't have to tell you to think like him. He had Game and marketed himself very well for many years. His market thinks like him and beliefs what he has written without being told to do so. And so the most productive way to get a people to adopt your policies is to "maneuver" that people in such a way such that they willingly adopt the policy on their own, so "popularity" in conjunction with being liked or admired is a means to do this. And the most powerful and fascinating aspect of this Game of power of influence is you cannot snap one of them out of it. What I mean is you can't go up to a LaVeyan Satanist and tell them or reason with them that all the ideas they have were put their by LaVey. What they will do is rationalize and justify things to themselves in the same way Christians "rationalize" out the things in their theology which don't make logical sense. Like why angels have wings if they are spirits and weight nothing? They'll do their own brainwashing to keep themselves fixated to their chosen sect. You see this bizarre phenomenon of mind with the Jehovah's Witness, and other dooms day sects.

Like this one recent sect I read about lead by a crazy lady. It was a dooms day UFO "cult," and the lady taught her followers that at a certain day of a certain year the space brother will come in a ship to teleport them to a new world to save them from a dying earth. So the followers were urged to sell all they owned. When the special day came nothing happened. So you would think that logically the followers would leave the cult. But they didn't. Instead the leader lady invented an excuse where she said that the space brothers did not come because their group had filled the world with so much light and wisdom, that it saved the world. And so, the followers emotionally and psychologically believed this as a mental means to mask out the inconsistency of a failed prophesy. But what is a better, more real world example of this Mission Impossible method in use large scale wise? North Korea.

I recently watch on the Japanese station [18.2] at work a really fascinating hour long documentary about North Korea. The documentary was about political leaders in Japan getting worried about North Korea, so the show interviewed all of these political scientists and intelligence agents from different countries about North Korea and specifically about the old regime and what they were doing to maintain power. So the documentary was studded with people who specialized in this field in the real world, and not just random crazy people with an opinion. The show was subtitled in English. I used to like political science, but after watching that documentary, I really, really love political science now. I found the whole documentary fascinating because it reveals the inner mechanics [behind the scenes perspective] of a regime struggling to survive the death of its central personality. With that idea of a regime struggling to survive its central personality, I took what I would learn personally because of ONA reasons some will understand.

The doc started out briefly informing you of the history of how North Korea became North Korea, who founded it and stuff. Then it focuses on Kim Jung Il [the late Supreme Leader]. The very fascinating parts started when Kim Jung Il had children because the interviewer in the doc began asking all of these politicians, political scientists, and intelligence agents, what was going on in Jung Il's mind and how did he eventually decide on a successor. One of the political scientists [an Englishman] said in English that the fact that North Korea has a de facto dynasty is unheard of in any socialist country, and that it inadvertently redefines or challenges the meaning of socialism. Which I thought was funny.

An American intelligence agent from the CIA was asked who, if anybody, Jung Il was considering of being his successor. So this agent told us that they knew that Jung Il had 4 wives and each had a number of children. The agent said that from what secret intelligence they gathered they over heard that one day Jung Il had gone to have dinner with a friend who was a very high ranking official in China. This friend asked Jung Il which of his children would succeed him. So Jung Il told his friend he wasn't sure. Jung Il said that only two of his children have a passion for politics and showed interest, the rest were doing their own things and wanted nothing to do with politics. The two were a girl and a boy. Jung Il told his friend that he'll have to wait and see which of the two was really into politics and state affair. The American agent ended his information saying that this was all they had at the time, which was not verified [the conversation that allegedly took place].

Later on the doc interviewed a few people asking why so much time took place before Jung II found a successor. The scientists and politicians hypothesized that maybe before Jung II was sick that things were well, so Jung II did not see a realistic need for a successor, so the idea was unimportant. One intelligence agent add that they believe Jung II put off the idea of a successor also to insure that he still had retention of his power over the regime and country, since the naming of a successor could cause a division in the regime regarding loyalties and personal sentiments.

Then the doc turned a sharp corner so to speak, and Jung II is now oddly sick all of a sudden. It was unexpected for every body said one of the intelligence agents. What happened – based on intelligence data – was that Jung II suffered two strokes and his liver failed. They knew this because a French doctor was phoned in the middle of the night to fly immediately to North Korea, and he wasn't told why, but that North Korea knew he was an expert in a medical field they urgently needed.

The French doctor was actually interview. The doctor stated that Jung II was unconscious, and in the room were some officials and Jung II's daughter and son. The French doctor oddly commented on the son stating that he found the son to be very polite and well mannered, looked understandably very sad and afraid for his father, but tried to smile at him [the doctor] when they shook hands. And when the son spoke to the doctor, the son used a polite soft voice and often bowed his head. The son is Kim Jung Un, the soon to be successor.

Very odd demeanor for a dictator stated a political scientist regarding Kim Jung Un, and an intelligence agent stated that if Jung Un were to be the successor, that they would have to train him, but said the agent, there may be not enough time to train Jung Un for the job, thus, the regime would be in danger, if Jung II dies. The agents knew that he was getting dialysis once every two days, which in medical terms meant his chances of dying were good.

The intelligence community stated that soon after Jung II got better, he held a secret meeting with his sister, an uncle, one of his wives, and his son Jung Un. The meeting was about making Jung Un the "leader" in the public's eyes, or the "successor." Jung II's sister rejected the idea stating that Jung Un was far too young for the role. The uncle who was a top ranking member of the regime and military also rejected the idea for the same reasons, adding that Jung Un just simply has not done anything to give him a name and credibility to the military.

But after the meeting, the family agreed to make Jung Un the successor. So then the documentary focused on the very fascinating training process of Jung Un from polite and gentle boy to a dictator, and even more fascinating the doc showed the little techniques the regime used to induce [influence] the populous to see Jung Un as the next leader.

One technique the regime used was the old “Guilt By Association” routine. This was when the Supreme Leader had his son Jung Un at every important meeting and public event, even when Jung Un’s presents was absolutely unnecessary. This way, the military, regime, and public over time gets use to seeing Jung Un at important events concerning the State.

One of the agents then stated that all of a sudden, after being made a general of the military, the Supreme Leader for some bizarre reason made the heir [Jung Un] the overseer of amusement parks. He was put in charge of inspecting public parks and theme parks. The doc asks a political scientist why on earth a soon to be dictator of a nation should have the odd chore of watching over communist Disney Lands? The political scientists stated that it was a ploy the regime was using to manipulate the public in a certain way. An agent shared the information that in one incident Jung Un had made a surprise visit to the equivalent of North Korea’s disney land. At this amusement park Jung Un goes into a fit over the condition of the park and yells at the workers and military personnel demanding things be fixed. He added that amusement parks for the people shouldn’t be in such neglected conditions. And he did all this in front of lots of people [civilians/citizens]. So the agents and political scientists stated that this was an example of gradually conditioning the public to perceive Jung Un as an assertive leader type of person who has the best interest of the people.

This other agent gave the secret – and odd – data that at one time in the early stages of Jung Un’s training as heir dictator the regime members had asked the young Jung Un to cut his hair, and Jung Un refused stating that he kind of liked the way his hair looked. But after a secret meeting, Jung Un is seen with a new hair due, which is the one he wears today. So I’m racking my brain trying to figure out what the hell a hair cut has to do with manipulating public opinion?! Before the doc tells why!

It turns out that Jung Un’s grandfather – the revolutionary hero and founder of North Korea – had that same hair due which he wore all his life. That’s when the doc got more interesting for me. The regime was gradually making Jung Un a replica of his grandfather to tap into the old hero worshiping sentiments of the populous. The doc showed pictures of Jung Un’s grandfather as he was dressed, and in public Jung Un is seen wearing the same style of clothing. The doc then shows a before footage of how Jung Un used to walk, then showed an old footage of how his grandfather walked, and after training Jung Un is seen in public walking exactly like his grandfather.

Then Jung Un's first public speech was looked at. I saw nothing remarkable. I actually thought he had very bad public speaking skills because his head was down reading his paper and he never made eye contact with the crowd or camera. The intelligence agents and political scientists pointed out something I would have never noticed. They zoomed in on how Jung Un was rocking back and forth while he was making his speech. So I'm trying to figure out what rocking back and forth did to the people. It turns out that Jung Un's grandfather had an odd habit of rocking back and forth while he was giving his speeches.

So one of the agents said that its as if the North Korean regime were trying to make the public believe that Jung Un is the reincarnation of their beloved hero and leader [Jung Un's grandfather]. This was ultimately because since the young and gentle Jung Un did not himself have the qualities of a dictator, the regime had to superimpose the Grandfather's characteristics onto Jung Un to influence the public to see Jung Un as one with the qualities a leader and hero. The military and old folks in the regime were put in charge of training Jung Un to act like the grandfather. Why? Not just to influence or manipulate the collective perception in the people, but more importantly because Jung Un was their key to maintaining group coherency, enough to maintain their power over the people. It was the only choice the regime had if all regime members desired to keep their power and status after Jung Il dies, and he did. So the person of Jung Un to the collective regime is the means the regime uses to influence and manipulate the minds, emotions, and perception of its people.

Another trick you can learn from watching this documentary concerns popularity. If the case is you are not popular to a populous [people], you can always fake popularity. Which is what the North Korea regime has been doing with Jung Un. You'll see in every instance and opportunity that the media and regime praises Jung Un, grafts him into fantastical mythos and narratives, mentions his name and "accomplishments" whenever they can. In effect, the people are given reasons to consider Jung Un. And they really have no choice, since the regime controls the media [information circuit] and Jung Un's face and name is made to saturate their society. So you'll notice that in the real world, these techniques are super complicated. They are actually simple. The main idea is to learn how to use these simple techniques on different people and different situations to gain a practical experience of how people and these techniques work. This practical wisdom can only come with trying and failing, and learning from your own failures.

Trial & Error

Knowing somethings about how politics works from hearing talk from old people in my family, and knowing a few things about advertising and marketing from reading written material is one thing. Putting all that theoretical and abstract stuff to practical use to make results is a bitch beset with tons of failures and missteps. Luckily cyberspace is a great place to find all sorts of groupings of people to experiment these theories on for the practical wisdom. When I say "practical wisdom" here, what I mean is you know when you've tried something and it works and you know how it works, so you nod your head, touch your chin, and say to yourself: "Um-hmm, so that's how it works." That's Practical Wisdom. To See what was once an idea or theory in functioning practical motion.

Cyberspace is also great sandbox to experiment and learn from mistakes from because when you do make mistakes and fail, you can virtually start over with an entirely new nym and identity and new group of people. And the best part is, you keep what you have learned and learn from the mistakes you have made. You can also create multiple characters and have each character test different theories out on the very same people in those forums. So you take everything you learn and begin to put the wisdom into a project that really means something to you.

An example of trial and error, and learning from trail and error would be me learning how to download and implement torrents. I usually go to isocunt or the piratebitch for my torrents. In the early days what happened was I downloaded what looked like a confusing program to install. It came with all of these instructions, like you had to put the shit together yourself. You had to change a host file, delete some dildo file [.dll] and put in a dummy dildo file. Seeing all those written instructions is one thing. Learning the practical side of following the instructions, and more importantly why each of those things must be done is another thing. I didn't know what or where the host file in my computers were. And I'm the type to reject instructions cuz I "know better," even though I don't know shit about computers and programs. I'm just cool like that.

So I used to ask myself in a smartass way: "Why do I need to change some host file," or "Why do I have to change the real dildo file for a dummy one?" And so I won't do what the instructions tell me. So when the program doesn't work, I go do what was told and figure out the Why of thing on my own. That's when I do the chin touching, head nodding, and thinking to myself: "Oh I see, so that's how these things work. The instruction guy was right!" Cuz now I know how the inner working of the program works, in a very amateurish way. So that's Practical Wisdom. Knowledge is having read the instructions. Wisdom is that "Uh-hmm" factor you get From [because of] the experience of following the instructions and learning how and why things work. Understanding is when you're a pro at something and you can say to a novice: "That's ain't gunna do shit! Give me that, I'll show you how a real lady pleases a woman!" I never noticed it before, but one time a good guy friend of mine point out to me saying: "Why do you touch your chin when you ponder as if you had a beard." I never knew I did it, and I still don't know why.

Once you have the Practical Wisdom of something then the Understanding develops. Understanding is when you over and over again mess around with something until you "know/buddhi" – intuit [sans thinking] – how something works. You can't say you Understand boys or girls until you've had many practical experiences with them. This doesn't mean your experiences were all good. You don't actually learn anything from a good going relationship. It's when you fail or make mistakes that you learn. Because that's when you reflect and ask what went wrong. That's when you can say you Understand relationships. If things are good, we usually don't take notice of things. You can stand in front of a boiling pot of water that is boiling well all day and if you never make the mistake of touching that pot, you'll never know it burns. It's when you have gained an Understanding of something or someone that you then have the know-how of tweaking or manipulation.

I have this one computer "game" called Darwin Bots, which is actually an evolution simulator thing. You have these bubbles which represents creature. Each creature comes with a text file which is its genes or DNA. You run the game and the creatures actually come to life, since it's an artificial life game. I love those types of things. The longer you run the game, the more new "species" evolve, and you can check their DNA to see what changed. There is this species of plants called the Red Queen, which is an algae that over time ends up dominating the pond. And an animal species called the Republican Hive which breeds hugely fast and they hive attack and kill every living thing in the pond. Part of the game is to compete creatures you make with these old school tested creature.

So I didn't know shit about computer programs, or the programming language this Darwin Bots game uses. But I wanted to learn to make my own creature to fight the Republican Hive since nothing seems to out do them. My idea was I wanted to take the Red Queen species' genes and manipulate them to make a new creature which hive breed like the Republican Hive and which shoots out poison and viruses like other algae do. So to gain the Practical Wisdom, what I did was I first spent time watching these thing evolve, and I'd then study what changed in their gene programming and where, and what the changes did different to the creatures. After I got fairly familiar with that I started messing around with the actual programs. First I just deleted a single number from a line and watched what that did if anything. Usually things go wrong and the creature malfunction in the pond. That's when I learn what those numbers actually do. Gradually I learned how to manipulate how much a creature eats, how many offspring it has, if its solitary or collective, where to graft in genes to make it a toxic algae, and so on.

I ended up with something close to my end goal, which I named the Amazoan Collective, from Amazons + Protozoan + the Borg Collective. So I cleared the pond and made an ecosystem and placed in the Red Queen and my Amazoans to see what happens. All my Amazoans started spawning hordes and hordes of hives and they were all spitting out poison and viruses and the Red Queens ended up dying. So I put my Amazoans up against the dreaded Republican Hive. My species got obliterated by the Republican Hive in a matter of seconds. What was wrong was that my species initially hyper-bred many offspring, but after the third generation or so – which happens in seconds – none of them bred and they just die out. I couldn't figure out which gene program makes a plant continuously breed. So I got so frustrated I just deleted the whole game. But you most often learn from things that go wrong, because such situations make you ask why. And once you know the Why part, you can manipulate things.

Learning how to influence people – subtly – works in the same manner. Being on good terms when things are good doesn't teach you anything about people. It's when you make mistakes, fail, stumble, then ask why. Like a question I often asked in the very early days: "Why didn't these people join our WSA?" Nobody in the early days 4 years ago wanted to join WSA. Why did we fail? Why don't they want to join? What's the difference between our WSA and whatever group they joined? What are those "other guys" doing right that we are doing wrong? There are still old posts in random myspace groups from 5 years back where you can find posts made by my friends and I where we directly ask people to just simply join our WSA group, and we gave them links. Of course people laughed and didn't join. So we failed, miserably. But: Why?

I was watching a show on the Japanese station about some historic war the Japanese had with the Russians. I loved the part in the movie where the Japanese had taken the North part of the Japan chain of islands and this one Russian soldier is running down a hall to inform his superiors. The door opens to show a large wooden desk in a room packed with generals and the soldier says to the top general at the head of the table: "Sir, the Japanese have taken the North!" The general goes quiet and leans back in his chair, then takes a calm deep breath. Then he says calmly to his associates at the desk: "War is like breathing. There is a time to breath in, and a time to breath out." The general then gets up to look at the map behind him, but before he turns he tells the soldier at the door: "I want to know how they took the North." So this general from his long time experience with war understands that in war, there are times you will win, and times you will lose. A time to charge, and a time to retreat. A time to be on the offensive, and a time to be on the defensive. And his final question/demand reflect his wisdom, where he desires to know how or why things went wrong, to gain the Understanding.

In the book Think And Grow Rich, Mr. Hill tells you that Failure is a blessing in disguise. Those who are defeated by failure will never past that limit. Those who are afraid of failure, will never go beyond their default limits. The few who aren't afraid to fail, who learn from their failures, and get up and try again and again, end up succeeding in life. Failure is Nature's test. It either crushes you, or elevates you, depending on the worth of your internal makeup, your Physis. The Fruit which you reap in the End is not only Nature's reward to you, but also the Proof of your worth. Word and Action doesn't prove anything practical or real according to oriental thinking. The End Results do.

Staying with the war theme, there was a book [Chinese philosophy] I read about people's worth and character. It said that War is the realest arena to test and prove a man's character and worth. Because when a man [a general] fails in war, nothing he can say to excuse himself works, because the casualties speaks of the man's ineptness. In war, the worth of a man is in the end results in the battlefield. But the book says that in other arenas outside war, man can lie to others and to himself. If he is inept and worthless he can simply cover up his ineptness by making up excuses. And he can brag about himself to make it appear as if he is worth something. So the book tells you that in ancient times when a general goes to the Emperor to ask for more men, the emperor simply cuts the general's head off knowing that the general is inept, and replaces him with a general who has proven his skill [via end results] in the battlefield.

We started off years ago on myspace and small forums in cyberspace wanting to grow our WSA. But we failed, and failed, year after year. Each failure was a stumbling block. We just got back up, dusted ourselves off, asked why we failed, learned from our mistakes, and tried again. And so over the years it got to the point where we were getting all sorts of people wanting to join the WSA so often we had to close membership and just let the WSA atrophy offline. Growing some WSA was no longer important. Because over the years – and after the many failures – we had learned a few somethings of value. And so we brought what we learned and used it for the ONA.

One of our first mistakes we made which I clearly remember was that when ever somebody said something critical of our WSA we just started bitch fights all over the place. It wasn't until a old WSA associate we knew back then whom we met 4 years ago who went by the nym PansGirl had pointed out somethings to us that we were doing something wrong. PansGirl basically told us that instead of bitch fight every single person for uttering a critical remark about WSA, why not take what they say as constructive criticism so we can see our own weak spots to fix them, that way the WSA gets better in time. She had a big point. So ever since then we did what she said and we stopped flame warring with people who said stuff about WSA. We first learned to listen and consider what they said, even if they lacked communication skills to state their grievances in a nice or productive manner. Then we learned to see our own weak spots, and we fixed them.

So a real example was the critical remark many people made in those early days when they criticized us [WSA] for having retards for members [online affiliates]. Okay, fine, we said, that's fair. I personally liked the people who associated with us, so I won't personally judge their level of intelligence, but fine. So we gradually learned how to draw in smart people. That weak spot was fixed.

Then others attacked us saying that our WSA was crap because we were just a forum with zero teachings, no doctrines, and nothing to our name but a name. Okay fine, that's fair, and true. So we fixed that and started to compile our own corpus of teachings. That bug was fixed.

This idea of listening to what the Market had to say and fixing weak spots they spotted worked so well for our WSA that we did something extra to invite critical remarks. We wanted more people to give us their critical remarks, but it's lame to go up to somebody and ask them to evaluate WSA. They'd think you were lame and just dismiss you. So we played games, which were fun, and educational. What we did was we made all these fake accounts in many different forums and we posed as anti-WSA users. So in these forums we'd pretend to not like the WSA, and actually talk shit about it. The idea was to inspire third part talk, where the other users joins in the thread to also talk shit about WSA. Which was what we wanted. Cuz when they talk shit, the smart ones actually knowingly or unknowingly points out weak spots we may not have seen.

The reason why you need outsiders pointing weak spots out is because when you are an inside member of a something, you can't see it objectively, you see it as an indoctrinated member [idealistically]. It's like you can't smell your own body odor, but others can. But you keep in mind that those same outsiders represents a section of the market you actually want to tap into. They might not present their critique nicely, but when they do, they often pepper what they say unconsciously with what they need or want to see. So the more they critique and the more you learn to change things to the trends of the market, the more your product actually sells.

You'd probably wonder why trends in the market is a significant deal. I'll explain why its a big deal. Why are familiar things like news papers, the yellow pages, and more interestingly the US Postal Service dying out? I recently read a very good article about the US Post Service on Forbes explaining why they were cutting down on employees, dropping offices, and just withering away.

The issue is that at some point in the 90's something new and very under-estimated crept its way into the reality of our human civilization as we once knew it. This under-estimated thing ended up being called the Internet. So at first all of these pre-Internet corporations just dismissed the Internet thing. Then the email thing came. Why is email an issue? Because emails is what is killing the Post Office. Not killing, but pushing the Post Office further and further into Irrelevancy, which in corporate terms means bankruptcy.

The problem for the Post Service was that they failed to recognize the potential of the internet as a shift in the market. They assumed that everybody would need to send mail in the mail box. But others Post Office like companies saw this potential shift and acted accordingly. One such company was FedEx, which bought out Kinko's and started incorporating the Internet into their repertoire service to customers. The USPS reacted too late said the Forbes article. They started to try to make changes too late, because by the time the USPS saw the need to change, the newly shifted market had already been dominated by corporations which offered what the USPS wanted to offer. Is shifts in the market or market trends a big deal? Fuck yeah it is. The USPS makes how much money annually, and has been around for how long??? And a simply failure to move with the shift in the market is now killing it.

The internet caused a big evolutionary shift in the market. Its why News Paper companies like those classic big wigs like the New York Times etc, are dying because of irrelevancy and doom of bankruptcy. Why buy a new paper which costs money and kills trees, why yahoo bombs your page with news for free? Who the hell uses a yellow page phone book to find shit, when Google does it faster and better, with a map and talking navigator? What's the common thing you hear the old folks in the X generation and backwards say about the internet? They say: "It's fake." And its that same dismissive mentality which fucked up the USPS, costing thousands of employees their jobs and ultimately changing the landscape or commercial topography of America. Niche markets have a thing for growing big in a generation or three and replacing old and out dated markets.

Blockbusters is a good example of failure with niche markets. Remember Blockbusters? They rented movies in these video things that went into your VCR player. The internet was in their face, and they didn't know what to do with it or know why to even react. But there was a niche market that cracked open because of the internet. NetFlix found that niche. So then what happened? NetFlix grew huge, and Blockbusters could no longer compete. Each year that past made NetFlix bigger, brought more copy-cat internet movie dealers, and Blockbusters became more, and more irrelevant to general society. Then what? Then they lost billions, had to close many stores, lay off many employees, and went bankrupt. Then what? Then, now we see Blockbusters struggling to have an internet presence where they are doing what NetFlix does. Except, its now too late. The Internet changed the landscape forever, and those who can adapt – and become adept – of the changes develop or evolve to dominate the new market.

Those who are into the satanic subculture today even knows that the old school Church of Satan organization the way it existed pre-Internet era is today irrelevant. Sure, way back in the day you might have needed to fork over the money to be a member so you can meet other satanist. But this Internet thing has changed the landscape. And we know it has. Social media and forums now takes the place of those old school pre-internet organizations. And we know which ones are out doing the other. You either adapt to the changes, or die out. And we see that the Church of Satan has tried to keep up with the changes. They have their websites and LtD forum, and so on. The odd thing is that, many of us see that the internet has changed things, that old school institutions have adapted to these changes, but for some reason, we still talk trash about the internet and those “Internet Satanist.” Not realizing that the internet is today a living part of our lives and human civilization. It’s not only going to stay, but it will evolve, and change the non-cyberspace world. And we’ve even see this already happening where folks online spread information about protests and new to their peers in those Islamic countries that experienced those revolts.

When we say “market” what we mean are people’s heads, and the money [or social capital] attached to those heads if your a business. People grow old, they die, new generations come. The new generations have a different outlook on life, different likes and dislikes, and different needs and values. Old folks might not like the internet and believe it to be fake. But those of us born and raised during the post-internet era feel the internet to be as real as television, cable, cars, and WalMart. It’s just an aspect of contemporary society or an extensions of it, and it’s not going anywhere.

So that should tell you something about getting critical remarks from people. Which market sector are you getting your criticism from? The incoming market sector [new generation] or the outgoing sector [old generation]? The outgoing market may have wisdom because they have been around longer, but they may criticize because things are just different and they just don’t like change. Whereas the incoming market sector may not be very wise, and what they say as far as critical remarks may be stupid, but what they say between “the lines” offers clues into potential shifts in the market. It’s not what a Y generation dude says, its Why they are saying it. Why would a group of 20 year old Satanists critically state that they don’t like the Church of Satan. Why is the old school institution of Satanism inadequate in the eyes and hearts of this new incoming market sector? They express a need beneath their critical statements. If that need is unattended to by these old institutions, then they will go else where to satiate that need or want. That’s when the “market shifts.”

A pretty good practical example of a shift in market trends in the subculture of Satanism is honourific titles. It used to be that in the old days using big titles like “High Priest,” “Grand Wizard,” and stating that you were the “Grand Master” of your own coven was marketable. The superficial décor of authority and respectability sold in that old market. But then a new generation came, and this generation found it very silly for dummies to have stupid titles which are empty. So you see that the majority of the subculture shifted in tandem to the new market trend. And more interestingly you can find out of touch groups of Satanists who still use that old market programming, where they still use great big titles to garner respect and feign authority. So where is the “market” now investing the bulk of its social capital? Not in the groups which still uses big goofy titles. We know this because, its almost standard that those groups that have a leader with a dumb goofy title, only can muster 5 active [responsive/alive] members. But why is this important and topical? Because if you are irrelevant to any market, then what real influence do you have?

Another early mistake we made – as was mentioned – was that we directly just asked people to join our WSA. But nobody did, and they laughed. We couldn’t figure out why. Until one of our early WSA members from Mexico pointed out to us brilliantly that in any groupings of people there is something called social dynamics. And so if it is lame and laughable for you to go up to somebody in high school and ask them to be your friend, then it’s also lame and laughable to ask people to join your cult or gang, or whatever. People have to want to be associated with you. That’s when I said: “Oh! Just like high school!”

In high school when you want to be friends with the popular kids to be popular yourself, there are tricks to doing it. Not many have the natural instinctual know-how of how that social dynamics works, but those that do know how it works, works it to their own advantage.

My friends at my school called the strategy used to get in with the popular crowd “Zigzagging.” These were jocks who played football, so the term zigzagging comes from how when they have the ball instead of running straight to the goal, you zigzag across the field so the bad guy team doesn’t catch you.

So on practical terms, if a guy has the objective of being friends with the popular guys on campus, he has to zigzag in that clique social framework. This means he first has to find the lowest ranking opposite gender member of that clique and establish a connection with this girl. Why do this? For two reasons. The first reason is that if you are a guy and you approach a low ranking guy in that social order and make friends with him, you might get stuck in that rank and more importantly the guys above you in that group might feel you as a threat because you are a new comer. The second reason is if you are a guy its easier to work your charm on a girl. But you don't want to talk to the low ranking girl in front of her popular friends, otherwise the top guys will see you as a threat since your "taking" females that "belong" to them or their group.

Once you establish a working rapport with the lowest ranking girl, you zag to the guy friends she has just above her in the ranking system. This has to be done by her introducing you to these guy friends. You cannot intrude into their clique even if you have made friends with the low bitch and act like you are friends with the other guys. The girl has to introduce you physically, after she has spent some time saying nice things about you, which is a way to tell the guys in her clique that you're not a threat to whatever they have established. This is where house parties comes into play in this social setting. It provides the setting for the girl to physically introduce you to her guy friends. You stay away for the time being from the top ranking friends and now start to develop a friendship with the lowest ranking male just above the lowest ranking girl you were friends with. Then you can zigzag your way like that up each notch one at a time slowly and carefully. The higher up you go, the less you are socially "allowed" by default to interact with the top ranking girls, because they are already "claimed," by the popular boys, whom you want to be friends with. So you don't want to do anything to step on their toes. They might kick your ass.

Girls zigzag the same way in a clique to get popular. Except in the beginning you charm the lowest ranking boy in the clique. You stay clear away from the other girls. Cuz they will mad dog you and talk shit about you, since to them you are a threat to their shit. Once you've made friends with a low ranking guy, then it is okay for the low ranking girls to react and talk shit about you, because the guy friend now supports you. Then you zag to the girl just above the guy in rank after he has introduced you to everyone at a party. The higher up you move, the less allowance you have in making friends with all the top guys. This is because the other girls will see you as a threat.

When you zigzag or are at parties trying to make friends you do something called "mirroring." This is when you adopt the same body language the clique uses, or the girls in the clique uses; drink what they drink, smoke what they smoke. Or if the girls don't smoke, then you don't either. Adopt the in-group words they use, and just pretend like you understand everything they say and have done everything they have done. What is mirroring actually? It's actually when you adopt a group's Culture. You are showing the members of this group that you honestly want to be a part of their group to the point where you speak their language, dress like them, listen to their music, and eat what they eat.

This works in real life in much bigger arenas. For instance in most of Asia, the typical Asian [in Asia] who come from areas outside the big tourist spots don't like foreigners. So when you are White and you travel away from general tourist spots you stand out and the populous does not like you. It's not that they are mean intentionally. It's just primate nature. You obviously not only look different, but you are also apparently not from the area. You are a threat or they do not trust you instinctively. Nobody wants to talk to you, and nobody is definitely going to offer their daughter up for you to marry.

But there are tons of White people that learn Japanese, or Chinese, Thai, or Khmer. And when we first see a White guy talk our language at first its innocently amusing. But that amusement is like an icebreaker because now the people don't feel you are a threat. You took the time to learn to speak their language. That means something. So that's when you can build a deeper rapport with the locals to earn their trust and familiarity. So when you adopt more of their culture, they warm up to you more, and they interpret that as you desiring to sincerely be a part of their people or culture. That's when you can go "native" and are accepted by the people as being "one of them," regardless of your skin color or hair color. The best place to see this in historic action is the old and great movie: "Laurence Of Arabia." The guy is English, he's a colonialist, none of the natives likes him or trusts him. He learns the language, learns the religion, dresses like everybody, eats what they eat, and gradually earns the native's trust. In the end he was not only accepted in heart by the natives as being one of them, but he was respected and honoured as one of their heros.

This same phenomenon can be observed in monkeys. I watched a cool nature show on PBS once where the English narrator and his camera team was following a troop of baboon around Africa. In the documentary when this troop had rested in a plain somewhere, in the far distance was another troop of baboons who had some drama. What happened in the other troop was a young female baboon got caught having sex with a low ranking male. The alpha male and the females in the troop chased this young baboon out of the troop and shunned her. If she remains alone in the desert she would die.

So this young girl baboon wandered around and found the troop the film crew was following. What this shunned baboon did was – devoid of social skills – just moved right along into the new troop like she belonged in it. All the other female baboons reacted violently and chased her. She went back and tried again to join their troop and met up with the same violent reaction. The troop wouldn't let her join for some reason. Defeated and beaten up, she sat by herself in the desert as the troop moved on. And she died.

Later on this same troop made "camp" in a new place. Luckily for the film crew a similar incident happened with a troop in the distance. This time an older female baboon was chased out of her home troop for having sex with some guy baboon other than the alpha male. So she left into the desert and saw the troop the film crew were following. She did something unusual, or something you would not expect. She just sat in the distance from the troop by herself and did not make any moves.

When the troop moved on, this rejected baboon lady followed the troop from behind, being very careful to keep her distance. If the troop rested and they looked at her the lady baboon gets up and walks away a bit. But each day she's try to get just a little closer to the troop. So one day unexpectedly, a female from the troop walked over to the outcasted baboon female who was now very close to the troop. The female from the troop sat herself in front of the shunned baboon, back turned to the shunned one. And the shunned one carefully gets close to the other baboon and begins to go through her fur to pick the lice and ticks. Grooming as its sometimes called is a way they make friends. The groomed female then grooms the shunned female, and after that the female from the troop leads the shunned one into the troop. And the troop does not react negatively. They seemed to be more curious, but acceptant. It may seem as if the female baboon from the troop did an altruistic thing in making friends with the new comer. What is really happening is that the female was a low ranking female who needs more allies if she herself desires to climb ranks. So the new comer was an opportunity to make a new ally. But for the new comer, the low ranking female was an opportunity to be a member of a group to survive.

In my new high school where I didn't know anybody, I "instinctively" used the same method the second female baboon did. When you go to a new school, or are in the presence of a new set of people, you are an outsider and must start at the very bottom and approach the social group very, very carefully. For the first few days I didn't talk to anybody. I knew enough from my old school that asking random people to be my friends immediate kills your social credibility. The object was to make friends, but how. After studying the "landscape" of the new campus to figure out who's who and what's what, I figured my best option was to make friends with the delinquent Asian crowd. So I picked a low ranking Asian boy with baggy pants. You can tell they are low ranking boys because the other boys will sort of tease them and then pat them on the back to let them know its all for fun. So I talked to the target I picked and during my conversation I just tried to find anything we had in common that interested him. I suspected based on how he looked an acted that he'd be into Asian gangs or tagger crews, which I was familiar with. Fortunately he and I had cousins and friends in the same Vietnamese gang. And that shared commonality was all I needed to start zigzagging.

But why be "popular?" Because the more popular you are, the more power of influence you have. The more you are known in a group, the more you can assert your policies. That's the very basics of "politics" from the broom Handle perspective: the assertion of your policies on a group of people. You don't vote for nobodies, you vote for the most popular, who then get to assert their foreign and domestic policies on citizens and the world at large. When some nobody tells you to buy his computers you laugh. When Steve Jobs shows you his new computer its sells a billion dollars worth. When some nobody with a forum asks us to join his new Satanic organization we laugh. When Anton LaVey presents his Satanic Bible, you become Satanists.

When celebs get fat injected into their lips, you do to. When they get Botox, so do you. When some Asian nobody eats fish eggs you don't. When the rich and popular eats caviar, you want to also. You laugh when backwards people eat snails. You wine and dine at fancy restaurants and order Escargot. You don't buy cheap tee-shirts at the WalMart, but you will drive to LA to buy a $100 tee-shirts because its the same brand someone famous and popular wears. Nobody cares what kind of gloves a nobody golfer wears. When Tiger Woods wears Nike golf gloves, so do you. The more popular you are, the less you need to actually force your policies onto the people, because they will willingly follow those policies. Nike doesn't have to tell you to buy their shit. You will willingly buy it because you like Tiger Woods. If you are not known and popular, you fake it, just like North Korea is doing with Jung Un.

That's a game we played 4 years ago, when nobody knew WSA, or cared to know. So the end objective is to have people care to know what WSA is. How do you do that? The policy is for them to give a shit enough to care. How to you induce the people to accept that policy? Well, you can look at North Korea, or any dictatorship. In that arena you have 3 parties involved. The first party is the dictator, Jung Un in this case. Second party are the people in the loop which are the regime and military for Jung Un. The "Third Party" is the intended audience. You can see the regime hype up Jung Un, his face is everywhere, the army is seen praising him as the new supreme leader. All that is an in-party circuit, its fake, in other words. The in-party circuit is to induce the public [the Third Party] to see Jung Un as being popular. That's why in classic dictatorships you will see the leader's face plastered on every other wall in the nation. He's hated and not liked, but oh well, he can fake being popular by flooding the nation with his face.

This is the same shit you use in high school. You wanna be popular, you generate third party talk so the students on campus will just talk about you. They will say both good and bad things, but just get them talking about you. If you want to shoot down a rival you do the same, spread rumors and get the Third Party to just talk about the bitch. The more people talk, the more the phenomena of Momentum Build Up and Group-Mind takes place. It becomes that if "everybody" is talking about you, then shit, you must be somebody to be talking about. It doesn't matter if its negative. Everybody has an opinion. You want everybody to be tossing their opinions around about/for you, and not your rivals. Think of other people's opinions as being "hits" like a youtube or blog gets hits. Cuz the more opinions you get, the more it seems to that crowd mind that you are worth the opinions. In other words, if you were not relevant to them in some way, they wouldn't be giving you "hits" in the first place. What actually matters is that you occupy the people's mental prime time space. What's that means?

Prime ad real estate is the position of your line of view where your eyes naturally look at. That's the most coveted and expensive space to buy. Prime time on TV is that hour when the most eyes are fixated on the screen. That's the most expensive and coveted air time to buy. Prime time real estate in people minds is right in the front of their heads, where they are thinking about you constantly, hating on you, liking on you, critiquing you, judging you. You, you, you. Because the average mind can only think of very few things at the same time. If they are thinking of you, they aren't thinking much of anything else. That's the spot in people's heads you want to tag your name or organizations name in. Again, this is the same technique dictators use. Their face is every where, and they have giant statues of themselves in every corner. You cannot mentally escape thinking about them. They have invaded your brain and you can't get them out. It doesn't matter if you hate the dictator. You think about him and will talk about him.

Why doesn't it matter? Because you are expendable and will die and the next generation will take your place, and so long as your face and name is everywhere, the next generation might like you! Why is there a church on every corner in Christendom? Why is the symbol of the cross or crucifix everywhere in Christian occupied areas? Why is there a wat on every corner in South East Asia? Why is the Buddha's statue everywhere in Buddhism occupied areas? You cannot escape thinking in some way about Islam in the Islamosphere, because its simply everywhere. Why? Because the saturation of those faces, names, and symbols tags your brains prime time real estate. You can't mentally think about two or three things at the same time. That's why mantras works. You think about the meaningless drone of a repetitive sound, and that's all you can think about. Try it. Try to say quotes from your favourite writer and think of grating cheese at the same time.

When you're constantly saying to yourself: "Man, I hate those Catholics, or Christians," you aren't thinking about anything else. And so, unbeknownst to you, you help keep that memplex relevant in people's minds. You might hate it, but guess what, there are 7 billion other people in the world, and billions more unborn. You keep that memplex afloat long enough for the memehooks to grab just one other receptive mind. It's the same idea as playing "Hot Potatoes" with a group of people. The hot potato is past to you, you emotively state: "Man I hate hot potatoes, it's hot and stupid. Ima pass it on to the next fag." And that's how the game actually works dummy! If you don't like the potato or game, then hide the bitch, don't pass it on. That's why there were book burnings in the old days. If some sectarian or secular regime did not like something, they don't pass it on and talk about it. They killed people who were infected with it, and burned books. Why? So it's not passed on to the next generation. In the medical field that is called "Quarantine." To keep a disease from spreading, you quarantine the infected, and let them die isolated.

So in the early days when we weren't known what we did was we did in-party routines to generate a flood of third party talk from the internet "populous." Nobody knew what WSA was, but that didn't matter because we can fake it. In the beginning WSA was so unknown, nobody even knew about it to hate on it. So one of the funny things we did was made all these fake profiles and we'd make some profiles mention WSA, and we'd use others to attack the WSA. So we'd use phrases we ended up calling "landmines," which were placed in posts to make third party people join in the thread and just attack the WSA. A landmine phrase we used which worked all the time in mysatan was: "OMG, we cannot allow the WSA to be a part of Satanism because they misrepresent Satanism!" And we'd leave a link. Then what you see were all of these would-be high priests and grand masters of these little satanic "organization" actually join in the thread and agree with our landmines and continue the debate or talk. They might not know what WSA is, but they are pretentious enough to believe they represent Satanism and know what's best to talk shit about the WSA anyways. So once third party people started taking about WSA, we left to hit up the next forum using the same method. The threads we left usually just "exploded" into flame wars and dick sizing contests with the WSA mentioned, which is where the term "landmine" comes from.

In the early days, this worked so well for us, the WSA was the most talked about group in mysatan and many other forums at the time. So we took what we learned here, and 3 years ago started to use it with ONA. Three years ago ONA was not on the satanic subculture's prime time real estate. Not many people knew about it, not many cared to know. But we used the same simple method on the same people and it works still. All we did was make all these fake profiles, make half pro-ONA to say positive things about ONA, and the other half we made anti-ONA "people." Then like crazy people, we'd make our fake profiles fight each other. Who cares if nobody is talking about ONA, we'll fake it. The funny part was in most cases it was the same person behind 10 pro and anti-ONA accounts fucking with people in one forum. We claimed our own little forums, so this way we can give links to our other in the loop friends to come see what the third party people were saying. It became a contest to see which one of us can make the longest ONA thread, make people react emotionally the most, and so on. The intent was to just have others [Third Party] join in and carry on the third party talking. And they will join in, because everybody has an opinion, even about things they really have no clue about.

And it was actually fun. After a whole year of this, ONA saturated the top three satanic forums at the time. It was everywhere like a big dictator's face. So all that is the process of maneuvering yourself into the right position to start inspiring or influencing others or implementing your policies.

Implementing Policies

Influence, as I use it throughout this essay simply means where you have an idea or “thing” in your head [the point of origin] and you convey that idea/thing to other minds [the receiver/acceptor] where that an effect is produced in/thru the acceptant recipient. That’s all “influenced” is used to mean in this essay. It doesn’t mean you control people, or people are zombies, or your some puppet master.

For instance if you are Hindu from South Asia and I were to say: “Indians are not Asians,” and you as the recipient reacts to that statement, that is “influence,” since the reaction itself is an [pointless] effect produced by that statement you “accepted.” The term “accept” here is shady. If you were a judge of a court, and somebody presented a case for you to hear, then that is an act of “acceptance” as this term is used here. It doesn’t mean the judge “approves,” agrees, or disagrees with the anything. The judge is just saying: “Alright, I’ll deal with it.” If you badger a king’s guards and the king gives you an audience where you can speak before this king, you have been “accepted,” into his audience or field of awareness, to be considered.

If Bill Gates gives a lecture and teaches the main power points he used to become successful and a handful of listeners goes out to apply his power points of success to try and produce similar results, then that’s “influence.” It doesn’t mean Bill Gates is some controller or puppet master and the people are mindless zombies. It simply means his “target audience” has “accepted” [to be considered] his claims and will simply test the principles out.

Learning how to implement – put into causal motion – your Policies is perhaps the easiest way to start gaining a practical experience of influencing people. If you can’t tell the difference between a policy, a procedure or protocol, and a regulation/order/law, then you know have a lot to study before you know where or how to begin. Basically Policy gives rise to Procedural Necessity, and the Procedural Necessity dictates Regulation. If you are born and raised [conditioned] on the Public or Commoner end of your socio-political order your whole life, chances are you have only seen the regulation part of the three tier system. The Regulation end is itself the cause and effect end of a causal chain. You’ll catch what I mean in a moment.

In plain English a “Policy” is merely an expression of Intent given by the shot caller. This is the same basic idea you encounter in Chaos Magick where before you commence your Procedural Work or Magickal rite, you make a statement of Intent. “It is my Intent that such and such happens.” So on a pragmatic level a leader setting a “Policy” is him simply stating to his OG’s [shot callers]: “Let’s creep in to the neighbouring hood and take their business.” That’s all a Policy plainly is. It’s not a command, or order, or brainwashing people. It’s just one person stating a desired intent.

So once this head of the gang states his “Policy” to his OG’s, the OG’s then has the job of figuring out how – in whatever way – to make that Policy work out. This is called the Procedure or Protocol. Let’s say in this hypothetical scene the neighbouring hood is occupied by a gang that claims the Purple rag and that they had no animosity with your gang. But you’re looking to expand your dope slanging business. So what do you do? Whatever you figure out is the Procedure which takes place in the second tier of the gang social order [OG's].

A real life example of how people I knew back in my high school years created animosity between two “peaced out” crews its to do things in secret. You got the head wanting to expand his crew territory for whatever reason. The territory is occupy by a friendly crew. So one or two of the shot callers in the loop would go out at night and cross out their own tags and then put up the tag of the friendly crew. That’s enough to cause verbal altercation at school and fights. You make sure as leader that you have a couple shot callers step up and fight members of the target crew to generate animosity. The unfortunate friendly crew might have no idea what’s going on, but they have been accused, they boys are under attack, and they have no choice. In gangs this is enough to inspire violence which may escalate into drivebies. You need to take a few hits [casualties] so that you can use those casualties as a means to excite and anger your members.

So the procedural necessity in our hypothetical case is that your gang needs to induce animosity in the Purple rag gang. You send out two of your OG’s to secretly cross out your tags and put up the purple rag gang’s name. The next day you have other shot callers in the loop pick up the rhetorical deliverance of how the purple rag gang are bitches, how they crossed out your set and dissed your people. This excites your gang citizen – your junior members – who in their anger and lost in the emotion and rhetoric act out their anger. This in turn causes the needed animosity. So now, after the Procedural Necessities are put into effect, the Regulations or Orders, or Rules or Laws can now be given to the general membership/citizenship to obey/follow.

In our hypothetical scene the Regulations would that from now on, nobody in your gang is peace with the purple rag gang, people from your gang who sees anybody with a purple rag gotsta bomb [fight], their hood is now your crew’s turf, nobody not affiliated with your gang can sell dope in that hood without paying taxes, and so on. So why were these laws made?

Because of protocols. Why do those protocols exist? Because somebody made a policy. If the laws and procedures don't generate the right end results, new procedures and laws are employed to try and actualize the Policy.

In a real world simple example we can use cars. It's 1930-1940. Cars are new and big cities now have them. Streets are chaotic now. The policymakers in the big cities say: "We need to somehow fix the chaos in those streets these new contraptions are causing." That's the policy. So the officials in these big cities collect civil engineers to figure out how to manifest the policies. An answer to the solution might be to use traffic cops to dictate the flow of traffic, another expensive answer is to have traffic lights set up. That's the procedure or protocol. Once these protocols are figured out and implemented, then the Laws can be passed. Laws like citizens must obey the traffic cop and traffic lights or get a ticket, and so on.

Or this same causal process in sectarian terms. You have a church and you are priests in this church. You depend on tithes and donations to put money in your pocket. So the policy you have or the intent is to gain as many churchgoers as possible. How this is done is the procedural process. This might require you to verbally attack an antagonist like secular society. Once you get the numbers in, you set the rules. What's a rule or regulation called in the sectarian arena? Doctrines. And so you have the familiar Mormon Doctrine of tithing 10% of your income to the church if you wish to get your Temple Recommend to get married.

So, now that you understand the basics of how policy gives rise to rules or law or regulation, you'll understand why setting up policies is the easy way to begin learning how to influence people: because it gives people the appearance of freedom of thought and liberty. You make the policy, but allow them – your target group – to come up with the protocol and also the rules or doctrines on their own. But you need to have a favourable public opinion from your target group or nobody is going to pay any mind to your stupid policies or will or intent.

We can look back in the DWM & Company's old days and see that when they had their Neo-Nazi groups the Intent [policy] was to destabilize the home government. Race wars or racial tension was one Means – procedure – to manifest the Intent. Nazi talk is one way to engineer the memetic or regulatory or doctrinal end to get their members in to action. Influence in this case is theoretically easy since your group as a target audience is already primed [receptive] to such radical memes/ideals.

Before you can "influence" anybody, you need to have a favourable opinion from your target audience. If you are not known in this target audience then use the “Guilt By Association” routine. This takes several different forms from “name dropping” [which is often transparent], to actually associating with the shot callers in the target market.

In Khmer we have a common term for this part of Influence. It’s called “Yok [take/capture] Chet [chitta].” When you Yok Chet Kay [others], what you are doing is captivating or stealing their hearts and sentiments to make them like you, favour you, support you, love you, want to be with you, and so on. Chet/Chitta does not exist in English. It doesn’t heart or mind exactly. It means your heart-mind, the seat of your emotions and will. Side note: even though it’s spelled “Yok,” its most often pronounced as “Yor” as a Brit or someone from Boston or NY would say it.

It’s like the old story of the Fox and the Crow. The Crow one days finds a piece of cheese. The Fox really wants the cheese. So he “Yo’s” “chet” the Crow by saying nice things about the crow. The crow feels real happy and opens his mouth and the cheese falls out.

There is a similar story like this told by the old grandpas in my family which teaches something about their business of politics. One day there lived a frog in a pond. The pond was drying up because it was the hot season. The frog was trying to figure out how to save itself. So one day a bird comes by the pond perched on a branch. The frog said to the bird: “Excuse me, my pond is shrinking, can you help me out and take me to a new pond?” And the bird said: “I know of a pond near by, but how can I help if you can’t fly?” The frog answers: “Well you can hold a stick in your beak, and I’ll bite on the stick, and you can carry me there.” So the bird liked the idea and agreed to do it.

So as the little frog was flying in the air, he past by all these other animals in the forest who were amazed at the site of a flying frog. The other animals said that the frog was really clever to fly out of his shrinking pond to a new one. Inside his heart the frog said to himself: “Oh, you guys don’t know how clever! I’ll tell you.” So he opened his mouth to speak in mid air and fell to his death. The End. The grampas will ask us young folks you what the moral of the story is after they are done telling the story.

There are several morals inside that short story. Like the Fox and the Crow story, the Frog’s feelings of himself were being manipulated by the other animals in the forest, and he fell for it: literally. The other moral is that if you are using others for your own ends, you keep your mouth closed and keep secrets, or you’ll fall. A good “politician” or businessperson knows how to captivate the hearts of others, but is hard to be moved or captivated him/herself. You only open your mouth when you are secure in your new pond. Like how the CIA & FBI releases files to the public after one generation [40 years] when nobody gives a shit anymore.

But captivating other people's hearts is the first step to any real influence. Mother nature just simply can't have random untested nobodies yielding influence, memetically or genetically. This might require things like charm, charisma, social skills, and people skills. The more rapport you have with your target person or audience, the more the resonance factor between you and your audience. The more resonance, the more influence. The more you vibe or resonate with the Satanic Bible, the more likely it will be that you Adopt LaVey's memes, ideals, labels, etc. Most of these LaVeyans tellingly don't idol worship Ayn Rand, Nietzsche, or Redbeard or follow their ideologies to the letter. But they will passionately adulate LaVey, adopt his teachings, try to look like him, and become antagonistic to those that don't like him.

Which would be the practical reason why regimes do what they do when they take over a foreign country. The protocol across the board is to set up a dummy government which we call a puppet government. The obvious reason is that the general public won't react that aggressively to a government made up of their own people. The other protocol is to make a list of the country's artists, intellectuals, and journalists, and quietly remove them or liquidate then give artists, intellectuals, and journalists aligned with you fame in your annexed country. Why? Because artists, intellectuals, and journalists have a huge amount of influence and power of inspiration on their people's hearts, views, and opinion making. The artists, intellectuals, and journalists have the ability to forge a rapport with their audience. We can vibe with a music piece better than we can to a dry boring lecture. Something like the Star Spangled Banner can bring real heartfelt tears to your eyes, give you goosebumps, and send good chills down your spine when it's done good. But unless you're crazy, you don't get teary eyed and emotional from reading the constitution.

Jesus and Buddha are two sectarian devices used masterfully to generate rapport between the sectarian "politicians" and the intended audience. You have a Jesus who came from heaven to suffer and die for the common people. And you have Buddha who gave up his wealth to be a beggar to help relieve the suffering of the mass. So here we try to think like an amateur "politician" and take a few steps into the secular arena.

Jesus or Buddha is the iconic head of their respective religions [memeplexes]. Just like a King [monarch] is the head policy maker of his kingdom. In the case of Jesus and other religious figures, the priesthood speaks for the gods. The king speaks for himself. The thing with the king that is great for politicians is that he lives a long time. So you have the same person/entity making the same character of policies for many decades.

You would think that in a democracy this niche the King or monarch took has been removed and replaced by some president who serves for a mere 4 years. This isn't the case. The case is that the king and the niche role he served in a democracy has been taken over by the Political Party. The thing is a Party – more specifically it's ideology [memeplex] – lives longer than a king and is a source of the same character of policies across the many successive generations. Unfortunately for the mass, you can assassinate a king, but its really hard to kill a Party or its ideology. Any “change” in newly elected presidents and government officials, is cosmetic and superficial change, because the same source of policy is still in power.

So you can see how with the case of Communism, the trick is that the niche role which a Jesus, or a Buddha, or a Monarch once filled, has now been taken over by a Party and its Ideology. The Party/Ideology is the Policymaker. The Party/Ideology itself – if we pay attention – not only has a rapport with the People, but its power depends initially on that resonance the proletariat has for the ideology, which appears to care for and understands its condition of suffering. The current state of our political systems [democracy] is not a devolution or replacement of the old world kingdoms. It is an evolution of the Old Order, where the “king” and “priest” variable have merged and evolved into a variable which lives longer than a human life time. We can even see in the Age of Enlightenment that this was the metamorphic period between the Old Order and the New one.

So when we grasp the little process of how influence works, we'll realize there is a crucial and often overlooked step which comes before the transmission [conveyance] of the idea: Acceptance. What are two cases where acceptance is a significant matter?

The first is in your body. You have these things called “cells.” Each cell has a membrane. Each membrane is covered in these protein identifying markers. This way the immune system “knows” what cells belongs to “you.” So if a “foreign” cell [bacteria/germ] enters your body and it does not have the right identifying markers, it is not “accepted” and the body thus works to remove it so that the foreign things does not Effect the body. So the germ, if not accepted, is unable to influence the body the way it is “designed” to influence a body.

The other case where acceptance is a matter of life and death is in the world of espionage. You have a “spy” from America who is put into Russia during the Cold War to collect intelligence, and vise versa. This spy has to be able to “blend” in with the general populous so that he is “accepted” as being “one of them.” If he is not accepted, he risks life and limb. But human collectives such as a State or a society does not have cellular membranes or protein identifying markers sticking out of it. But we do have identifying markers a collective employs. Language or dialect is one ID Marker. World view or paradigm is another ID Marker. Chinese people see the world differently than Europeans do. Group mythos is another one. If a spy is pretending to be Russian is asked about the history of Russia and this spy has no clue, then he may fail to blend in.

So before you can influence anybody, you not only need a defined audience or “target market” but you also must first either blend into this target market, or blend your ideas you are trying to convey to match your target market’s identifying markers. Otherwise, they won’t accept it. You can try, and you’ll get a reaction, but it will be a negative immune response to get your memes out of their mind or group.

A real example which took trial and error, on our part, is how we spread WSA “doctrine.” So here we’ll use the term “indoctrination” just for convenience and clarity. So first we had a target market already desired. We saw this potential market way back in 2004 when we were in Myspace. We witnessed all these groups of independent Satanists who were forming their own groups and trying to put together their own twist on Satanism. We interpreted this to mean that there must be some sort of group of Satanists breaking away from those old school institutions like the Church of Satan. So from this – much later – our WSA referred to the old school camp as the “Stagnant Satanists,” and the break off camp as the “Progressive Satanists,” since the latter group appeared to have some sort of a desire to progress beyond the old ideological confines of those old school institutions.

So that is the real reason why in our old WSA writings [Opus Vrilis] we used the descriptor “Progressive Satanism” to refer to our “brand” of Satanism. The intent was to tap into that disenfranchised potential market who were in need of new ideas. A secondary original intent as to why we specifically desired to use that dichotomy of “stagnant Satanists” and “progressive Satanists” was to later induce altercations between the two groups, for a different end goal.

So before we could even share our ideas with anybody, we spent years developing rapport with key people in our target audience. During this period of rapport building we used a “campaign character” to induce the needed rapport. Campaign Characters are like the news anchors on your favourite news station. You see the same faces everyday, and that familiarity builds trust and rapport.

Being familiar and charming doesn't cut it though. To maintain relationships of any kind an exchange of commodity has to take place. Here the term "commodity" represents things like resources, material, items, as well as praise, affection, need, information, support, security, assurance, and so on.

Exchange of assurance and security in the right social level is something valuable. For instance let's say you are new to the work place and you have been there for a while. Some person who worked there longer than you steps up and acts aggressive with you. So the well known and respected employees there says to your antagonist: "Chill out man, that guy's cool." Coming from such a social ranked person, those words offers you security and assurance in that social order. And because of this you would end up "liking" the person that said that statement to vouch or validate you, or at least you try and build a bond or rapport to keep that person supporting you. Or another example is when two people's mutual exchanges helps mutually provide security and assurance. America and China have a [in]vested interest in maintaining a functional relationship because that relationship provides security and assurance for both parties involved.

So a method to forge a deeper connection or relationship with another person or group of people is to make sure that you exchange things like this and intellectual capital. This is what's trying to be get at when you here people ask: "What have you brought to the table?" In other words, what they are saying sociologically is that before they can give you their approval, acceptance, like, trust, support, whatever, you must give something they value or need first to them. The trick is to take the extra step and try to make it so that your target person or group needs and grows dependent on what you have to offer. This can only be learned the direct and hard way from knowing your audience, having a working experience with them, and having made mistakes and learning from those failures. The more you know about the "psychology" of your person or target group, the easier it will be to induce dependence. If your target audience is poor, and thus have the psychology of being uncertain and insecure financially, they worry realistically about money, then like the late Don Lapre you can use what you know to induce dependence. You're audience "needs" you to teach them how to end that worry and anguish. Or those penis enhancing pill ads and commercials you might at times see. They have an intended audience who most likely suffer from the psychological insecurity of having what they believe or perceive to be a small penis.

More importantly in this case of commodity exchange for social capital is you really need to know yourself and your honest limitations. If as a business owner you know you won't make a good CEO, you hire one. If as a venture capitalist you know you aren't good at screen writings, you hire a writer and be the producer. If you are stupid or retarded, then you have smart friends help you out. If as a cult leader you know you can generate the cool ideas but you know you lack the skills to sell those ideas to a crowd, you find yourself the right partners.

A quick practical example of this method in use which worked for us – after the usual trial and error – would be when we work a forum. First you scope out the place to get a feel for the social topography of the forum we are working in. The second thing is to look for the alpha male/female of the forum. You leave this person alone. Then hit up the guys just below them. Why? Because even if they act like they like each other, there is a natural rivalry there waiting to be expressed. So you work on building a rapport with those “Beta” males and females who may not be Top Monkey, but they are well known, liked, and somebodies in their forum environment. Once the rapport is build, then the commodity exchange take place. In return for their support and “endorsement” in that forum, you give them memetic arms in the form of “Intellectual Capital” tailored to fit their needs and paradigm. In turn they use that memetic arms to express their natural rivalry for the alpha monkey. You are to these beta persons like Nike is to a Tiger Woods. You use your Intellectual Capital, or Social Capital [if you're popular], to buy their name and face to spread your brand and memes. Realistically each forum or market is populated with smaller cliques, where each clique has it's own alphas and betas. Use the same methodology on such fractals.

We use – or learned to use – a method of “encouraging” others to “adopt” our ideas. It's a way of “re-educating” them. We got this method from Asian Communist countries who during the wars which took place in the Cold War era would have all these “Capitalist” prisoners of war. So some of these captives were taken by the Communist regime to be... you know, encouraged to become Communists, so they can be happy and have new Communist friends. From my own research they were oddly pretty successful. In just cheering people on, but slightly more aggressive. Like a gun pointed to your back. You nervously ask: “What's the gun for?” And the answer is: “That's your moral support.” You'll say that's retarded. But then you ask the IRS: “What's the prison for?” And they answer: “To encourage you to volunteer to pay taxes.”

So the first step in this method is “Incarceration,” or “Encirclement.” The Prisoner in put into a box, prison, jail. Or the new cult member is encircled socially and psychologically by his “new friends.” Or you tell your child or younger siblings to go to their room, or ground them and cut off their access to TV and the computer, and they can't play outside. You lock the wild animal in a cage after catching it. This generates in the target physical and/or psychological isolation and insecurity. Insecurity here means to feel unsafe or uncertain, or unsure. No animal likes feeling this way. Isolation here really means that you have cut off all their incoming supplies of information. As I said above somewhere, people don't see the objective world. They see their subjective interpretation of it. This means that a person can be living in a busy city, but if you can cause him to subjectively see himself as being alone and isolated, then the person will behave as if it were physically isolated. In acute cases such a person will become depressed, socially dysfunctional, insecure about themselves and the world, or even suicidal.

You want to isolate them so that you are the sole provider of information, and better, that you are the only source of emotional stimulation. Think relationships or North Korea. In a very controlling relationship your stupid boyfriend makes or asserts himself as the only person who can make you happy and please you in any way. You can't have real friends, you can't be loved by others, etc. How do you do that psychologically? When your child comes back from school and says: "Well my teacher said such and such," then you as the mother says: "I'm your mother! You're teacher isn't your mother. You listen to me." Or when you are a Satanist and your Satanic Bible spends a whole lot of time trying to get you to see the "others" [RHP] as being "bad," or stupid or not worth believing. That's a way to psychologically cut your target's many free flowing streams of information down to just having your memes as the sole supply.

The second step is "Induction of Dependence." You feed the wild animal. You feed your newly bought pet dog. You feed your child. You share a meal together at church. The church is the only source of salvation. The State is the only source of freedom. Satanism is the only source of truth. Buddhism is the only way to enlightenment. Your target learns to be dependent on you for its food, or shelter, or needs, or ideas, or so called truths. Emotional breakdown is a part of this step. You yell and your child cries. You yell and your puppy you are training gives you that sad puppy dog look. Your preacher repetitively tells his congregation that you are sinners, how dirty you are inside, how vile you are, and you feel bad inside. You make sure your prisoner is emotional insecure where he doesn't know if you will beat the shit out of him or feed him. You can see this unconsciously used as a group mind phenomenon if you watch these satanic forums. When a new comer enters those satanic forums and the new comer is detected to not be "fully" a satanist, a group breaks them down emotionally by ganging up on them or verbally assaulting them or calling them names. It makes it so that the target grows aware that it must depend on you [or perhaps your favour or benevolence] to feel secure again.

After the child cries, you hug it to reassure it. After you scream at your prisoner, you hand it food gently. You'll hear in gang culture words of reassurance like: "We got your back." The life of poverty in the ghettos you come from is the insecurity. To have a gang whose got your back is the sense of security, which forges in the junior gang member dependence. You'll understand how security and lack of security induces dependence in the military. On the battlefield with bullets flying all over the place you feel insecure and afraid. It is comforting to know that you have your fellow Marines by your side. And so you stick together. Dependency is the strongest bond, not love. It's not because a tapeworm loves you that it is bound to you for life. It's because it is dependent on you. It is not because the government cares about you that it is bound to you for life, it's because it depended on you the common citizen.

You want your target to need you for whatever your reasons are. It doesn't even have to be a "real" need. You can make one up. We pretty much have most thing we need in contemporary life. But inside Christianity we lack something we "need" called redemption. What is it? Well, only the Church knows that. And only Jesus thru the church can give it. Inside Buddhism you lack something called "enlightenment." What is it? Well nobody knows, but if you follow the Buddha's Way you will find it. Inside tantrika you lack something called "divine illumination." What is it? Who knows, but if you meditate on your 7 chakras, and breathe thru your nostril and then your right one, you will eventually find out. Inside satanism you lack a whole lot of things depending on whom you are dealing with. You might lack reason, logic, selfishness, nonconformity, critical thinking, individuality. How do you get them? Well, only Satanism can show you.

Third step is "Presentation of the Bad." You take your prisoner of war whom you have been nice to and feeding. Then you sit him down and have him watch all of the atrocious acts America has committed around the world to other countries and against innocent people. Show him visually how Capitalism is endangering the world's ecosystems and is producing global poverty. The church preaching about Hell and sinners. Capitalists fearmongering their populous with images and ideas of how Communism is a crazy liberty-less system of control. How mad terrorists are plotting to kill them. This is where you lightly slap your dog and say: "No! Bad dog, don't do that." Or where you say to your child: "No, we don't cuss, only barbaric kids cuss." Or when your Nazi Party says: "No! Bad Aryans! Don't play with those Jews! They are Bad because they are inferior!" Or when "Satanism" tells the new Satanist: "Christianity is stupid! It's filled with irrational insanity! Are YOU stupid?" Nobody wants to be stupid, or inferior, or an unforgiven sinner, or an anariya, or harmed in any way.

The fourth step is "Presentation of your Good." That's when your prisoner has seen all of the horrible things America or Capitalism has done. So now you show him nice pretty movies about how beautiful Communism is. You tell him things like: "We just want for those hurt and suffering people to have equal opportunity, now is that wrong, hmmm?" "We just want a utopia, don't you want that too for your family and children, and puppy?" "We just want to save your soul so you can go to heave, that's all." Or in Satanism: "We just want you to be rational and self-centered, what's wrong with that?" Where's this from: "We just want you to be the supreme master race, that's all." This is when you give your dog treats when it does something Good you want. This is when you recognize and reward your child when she or he does something you approve of.

You've already established yourself as the Authority from the first step, and you have already made your target dependent on you. Now you reward your target to re-enforce behaviour you approve of. When they start beginning to think along the lines of your Satanic or Christian doctrine you encourage that and re-enforce it by rewarding the individual with affection, kind words, fellowship, recognition, and so on. The greater your target's striving, the greater the reward you give. That's why Institutions like the military will have Medals of Honour to reward different acts. Boy Scouts get the Badges. You have to have done something to have earned your jacket badge in a 1% motorcycle gang. Your Masonic institution rewards a nobody with the honour of being the "Worshipful Master," and rewards those who have striven for your Rite with the 33 degree. All this gives the target a sense of Importance in his new group. He means something to somebody. "You were nobody in America as a Capitalist. Here in Soviet Union you are Big Guy!" "You were nobody in Christianity. Here in Satanism you are Reverend, Leader, High Priest, Top Smart Guy!"

Last step is "Labour For The Solution." After you've indoctrinated your new Jehovah's Witness, you send him out door to door to spread the news of the coming Kingdom of God, and tell him to sell the little magazines while he's at it. If you are smart and you look closely, you'll actually see that the idealism or ideology itself and the actual Labour for the Solution is a fucking non-sequitur. One doesn't follow the other. Selling magazines for a quarter has jack shit to do with Jehovah's Eternal Paradise. Riding your bike around to recruit new Mormons has shit to do with being resurrected as Kolobian gods in the afterlife. Killing Jews really had nothing to do with being Aryan or supreme. I mean if say you were a lion who is king of the jungle, do you really need to kill 7 million field mice to prove yourself? Does an elephant really need to step on 7 million ants to prove that it's really big? Shouldn't it be Apparent somehow?

Send your Mormon boys on their missions. Send your Christians soul saving [recruiting]. The key idea is that once you have your person, he needs to do something – anything – to Feel as if he is a productive part of the new group. You know how insanely stupid it is to breathe in your left nostril and then your right one? But in Kundalini Yoga its something people do. Here's a question which draws out the essence of this step: "What do Satanists do?" So you have your group with its group identification markers. And you have your new people who have adopted those identification markers. Now you give them a common something to do as a group to reenforce that group identification. You want a strong group identification because the stronger the feeling of belonging the more the person adopts group ideology. All German citizens belong to the "Aryan Race!" So that group identification brings the German people together inside a new meta-organism. You give them things to reenforce that collective identity and the more they feel like they belong to this "Aryan Race" the more they will adopt your National Socialist ideology. Really think about it.

First think about Traditional Christianity with its boring old Mass where the audience is actually just boringly observing some priest prepare a cheap meal of bread and wine. Then you recall an evangelical church or Pentecostal church meeting and see how instead of the audience just boringly watching something, they are actively jumping around, singing, and feeling the holy spirit, picketing together with signs that says: "God hates fags." Now ask yourself why in such a short time did this species of Christianity we call "Evangelism" or Evangelical Christianity has not only produced staggering amounts of members, but fanatics also? But you might say: "Okay, Catholicism is boring, but what about Ireland?" The Church itself might be boring still, but in Ireland the Catholics have a shared activity: fighting Protestants. Islam has a shared activity: Hating Israel, and sometimes bombing them. Some sort of simple shared activity as riding on bikes door to door forges a strong group identity in the Mormom. The stronger that identity, the more willing that mind is to accept and adopt ideology. It goes back to our ancestral tribal instincts. We are accepted into a tribe. We feel belonged to it. We go out hunting and fighting together. Our bonds are tighter, and so each of us adopts the tribal mythos and ethos more readily and fanatically. Rituals, rites, and ceremonies, fits into this final step. As long as the group or person has a shared "doing," "praxis."

So what's the "Taoist" way of influencing others? By Taoist here I simply mean the effortless way of Tao. How Tao doesn't try one way or the other. It just is. How does Tao build or create without effort? If you had a land and you built a structure up on it, this is effort and not let-be. If you build a city from the center out this is also not effort. How do you have something arise which did not exist before without forced effort? You work effortlessly – harmoniously – with the physis of Nature. So in your mind you see a cup of water. You drop a drop of red food coloring at the center of the surface of this water and what happens? The Nature of the water, plus the nature of gravity slowly draws down the drop of color forming shapes and forms which were not their before. So those forms and shapes came to be without effort and in harmony to the Nature of its medium, ether. Creating in this way lasts the longest since it flows with the Nature of things, but it is the least likely way to bring you fame and fortune or admiration. Tao creates effortlessly and Tao is unknowable and always behind the scenes of our physical reality.

Influence with this effortless way is something ONA has learned to do over the years. It's also something I try to induce with ONA. The idea is simply. The Policy is still set. The procedures still brainstormed. So what happens is ONA will write something. A PDF or essay. Not just ONA people read this. Others do to. So others will read these PDF's and essays. They might not like ONA or want to "join" it. But they may see one or two ideas they like. So they take those one or two ideas [memes] and then incorporate it into their own paradigm or writings. They then share this paradigm or writing with that grafted meme with their own subgroups. If that meme catches it spreads in that subgroup. So you might have a Luciferian or two read ONA stuff and carry a couple ideas to share with their Luciferian subculture. You have a mundane satanist or two take a few memes and graft it into their overall memeplex. Over time, what you see is these memes diffusing slowly into other groups of people with the ONA memes gradually supplanting their old and useless memes. One meme at a time. One mind at a time. A memeplex has only so many memes, only so many core ideas. All it takes is time and learning to make memes catch. With each new generation more and more memes will be replaced. This method of memetic diffusion will only work if you have a valuable body of Intellectual Capital to offer.

Some Things Learned

I have personally failed countless times during these past 4 years of doing what I have been trying to do. I can honestly say that its partly from failing that I learned to fine tune the way I do things. Only because it's when I fail that I ask why I failed. As time past by, I have accumulated a small number of rules which my friends and I follow or have been following. They are just guide lines we have learned to follow or live by so as to do what we do. The early game has long died. You'll see this when you realize that WSA is gone. There are no more WSA forums, WSA Ning, WSA sites, WSA teachings. The old policies [intentions] have been actualized. It's now exclusively ONA, and the work is focused on a 10 year policy. So these guiding rules – and what new rules we learn to keep – will help us get to that 10 year goal. I'll list each rule and explain each quickly for other ONA associates who may be interested.

[1] Keep all non-associates guessing. Never be honest or tell them any real information.

If they are not trusted and known ONA associates, then nobody needs to know anything. Nothing. Let them speculate, assume, and never correct them. If they are wrong, let them be wrong. It's like playing poker. You keep a poker face and the intent is to get a good hand. You're not playing poker to make out or hold hands. Fuck communication, bonding, chat sessions, meetings, discussions. There is no discussions period.

There is a Buddhist proverb in my culture the old people say that goes: "On a crooked path, never walk too crooked, and on a straight path, never walk too straight." That means that in bad company, you don't want to go all the way and do what they do, just enough to get what you need, or where you need to be. And in good company you don't want to be too honest where you tell people where you live and other private information, because it will harm you more than help you. It also means lie if you wish, but don't exaggerate it where nobody will believe it. If you have to steal food to feed your children, then take what you need, but don't go and rob banks or kill people for things. And don't be so foolish or naive as to be honest and trusting with people because they are nice and friendly.

[2] Don't play games by their rules. Do do what they do.

Fuck their facebook, their youtube, their cyberspace forums they hang out in. It's cool to have nameless and identity-less accounts there, or made up personas, but fuck them. Don't play their internet games – excuse me, live their internet reality – their way. They will tell you that you are a fake person, and not real like them, but let them under-estimated and dismiss you. You want them to.

[3] The less they know about you, the less real damage they can do.

I love these occultnik Westerners who pay so much lip service to books like the Art of War, as if it's the best thing they have read. But when someone uses one of the first and most basic rules from that book, they get all asshurt and throw tantrums. "Know your enemy," is the first and most basic rule. The less they know you the less anything real they can do. Stay nameless with many names. Faceless with many faces. Personality-less with many personas. It's almost standard ONA protocol. The only real thing those mundane dumbfucks on cyberspace can do is bitch about how we have no real identity and how we have fake profiles. Who the fuck cares. Like that stops any of us from doing what we do.

[4] Never debate, argue, interact, or communicate with the opponent. Let them occupy themselves with their speculations.

Again you don't play poker to make out or make friends. You play to get a better hand. Don't be seriously debating them, arguing with them, or fixing their assumptions. You want them to be stupid. If you're gunna talk to them, give them half truths and misinformation. Let them speculate to their hearts content. In fact encourage them to make straw men and scare crows out of their speculations.

[5] Let your opponents assume, and let them react, act, or not act in their assumptions. Every act or lack of action bares fruit.

This would be really cool in war. You let the enemy assume, and hope the enemy acts on their assumptions. Fortunately for our species, on a collective level, we are pretty smart with our wars. This isn't the case with mundanes in cyberspace. You let these dummies speculate so they can stay fixated in their assumptions and act out or behave in that assumption. Don't correct them. If they believe the ONA does not exist, let them. If they believe 0 or 1 or 10 people are behind Anton Long, let them. If they believe there is only one real person in the ONA, let them believe so.

[6] Keep your opponent lost in the now. Invest for future dividends. Expect nothing at the end of the day.

Those mundane dumbfucks like asking people and themselves: “What do you have at the end of the day?” This just shows you the peasantile – wage working – mentality and world model they are working with, where these dumbfuck expect are conditioned to get paid at the end of the work day. Their mentality is: “I work for you for an hour, I expect to get paid $8 for that hour buddy. I’m worth it!” Then after the day’s work they tally up what they earned.

On the other end – opposite to the common peasant – if you own a business, are into politics, or have been in wars, you’ll know that you get shit at the end of the day. You’d be luck to be still alive, financially sound, and still in power at the end of the day. You invest your money, time, and effort not for shit at the end of a day, but for the distant profit. For the Cream. Cream takes along time to build up, but its rich.

You have this social system where the common person is trained to work like indentured servants for daily wages, all the while their masters invest for distant dividends and returns or proper profit. By proper profit I mean in business you don’t make a profit until you made your initial investment back and have paid your bills, which could take years and decades. And you have these common fool bred mundanes working their whole lives for daily wages. They are so lost in this peasant mentality that their whole worldview or paradigm is based on their indentured service of expecting something at the end of the day. The idea of an aeonic investment for a distant future profit return is ludicrous to them. I can guarantee that not only will you fail, but that you will not get results at the end of a day when you try to learn how to influence people.

And you wonder why so few human beings ever risen up beyond the indistinguishable mass to make a lasting legacy, impression, or impact in the fabric of our collective human mind. Don’t draw their eyes away from their egos and the Now. Keep them fixated in the glory of the moment. Keep them working for their daily wages. While you learn and struggle to own their future. Your pay as Master of Self and Life, is not daily. It’s when your work has been actualized.

[7] Work with Time and not against it.

If Time is the 4th dimension, then learn to work 4 dimensionally. If you pay attention to Time, you'll eventually notice that Time destroys all things causal. Nothing in Nature lasts: Anicca. The only thing which lasts are things which flows with Time, things we might call "aeonic entities," due to a lack of a better term.

For example the individual person only lasts for a good 100 years. But something beyond that 3 dimensional person and its life span lasts longer. This something is his progeny, or the generations of living people he sires or seeds into existence. A tree may only live for 1000 years, but the forest can live for a million years. That idea of a forest is what I am trying to mean by an aeonic entity. A something alive which exists not out side of time, but in the flow of time.

[8] Proper PR work today, bares fruitful results later in Time.

I learned this for trial and error, and its pretty effective. By "proper PR" work I don't even mean the amusing play of fucking with people. I mean serious work. Subtle work. The End Results speaks for itself. So those who know from many years of observing the before and after, knows what I'm talking about.

[9] The Market does not have opinions of its own.

The out-going market does not have an opinion of its own, in the sense that when you alter how they see things subjectively, their opinions changes accordingly. The incoming-market don't have their own opinions yet, because they have yet to be born.

[10] Disable your opponents' options, before they are aware of any.

Like in the game Go. You want to learn to see all the potential areas your opponent can move into, and them work to secure those areas so he can't move into them. An example I used was that 3-4 years ago before everybody at large knew WSA or me existed to talk shit, I made friends with the ones in ONA who matters. This way, you can talk shit all you want, and it doesn't change any thing about what I am doing. It's 3 years too late.

[11] Keep them talking and hating, but never talk about them or hate them. Never invest any emotions into the opponent.

It's actually socially common for any given mass of people to talk shit about anybody who sticks out, or thinks different, or is different from the mass. You see this everywhere. Some poor guy from the ghetto ends up with a record deal and make money rapping. Instead of getting love from his former residents and friends, they hate on him. The more visible you are, the more they see you to talk about you. The Average mundane citizen will do a whole lot of "talking" [throwing around opinions] about people like Obama, or an actor, but I doubt the people they talk about even consider them in their minds. Don't ever invest any real emotions of hate or other wise in one of them. They are not worth occupying your mindspace or heartspace. Don't even give them the attention by talking about them or bringing them up; unless you know for sure they will monkey dance for you.

[12] Stay aloof.

Aloofness meaning to keep your distance from everybody or the public. Employees work, and management are aloof. Management should not be one of the "fellas" with the employees. This induces authority. The manager of a retail store you work in is in his office somewhere. So you go in to have a talk with him. Between you and he is a space and a desk. That's a psychological boundary that reinforces the aloofness. The desk itself is a psychological symbol. It has paperwork on it. There is a wall of protocol and professionalism between you the employee and he, the Boss. You're now rubbing elbows with the boss. Even in the same office room together there is a space and professionalism separating the two of you. In between the Jury, Court, and Judge is a desk and gavel and space. You don't have to tell people you are the boss and you don't need stupid titles to have people see you as an authority. You make them feel it. Don't ever mingle and get friendly with the Third Party. Hitler may have been relaxed and out of character with his trusted party liners, but with the Third Party [the folk] he is the perpetual Fuhrer.

Never make yourself accessible to the Third Party. The more people and red tape the people have to go thru to get to you, the more "important" you appear to be. The more important you appear to them subjectively, the more of an authority they will feel you to be. You might say that "appearance" does not equal actuality. That's true but irrelevant. The appearance is only a means to an end. Plus, what's it suggest when we say: "First impression is important?" It suggests that the Common person is superficial and judges the superficial appearance of a person. That for the Common average person, there is no depth when valuating the actual worth and character of a person.

End Remarks

So those are some things I have learned over the 4 years regarding this topic. These things are easier said than done. Everything talked about in this essay is completely meaningless unless you try to experiment and apply these things. You're going to fail, and people will know you have failed. Welcome the failures, and ask why you failed. It's not the actual technique because they have been used by others with success. In ONA the idea is to start our own groups and things in line with the Sinister dialectics, and influence and use the mundanes via those forms.

The past 4 years have given me a group of people to just test out ideas I hear my family talk about, or things I pick up from books on advertizing and marketing. I'm just the type of person to like putting what I have learned into motion so I can see how and why things work. Yes I did fail often. I made many foolish mistakes. I also kept things fun for myself and friends. I have never taken this online thing seriously. I have been the troll type to have a laugh at other people expenses since my myspace days, and I still am. I've used WSA in the past to troll people which was funny but ended up messing things up for WSA. I've done and do the same with ONA. I make no apologies for my Nature as a person. I just do not regard commoners, the Average Person, the uncultured, to be anything to consider. You as a breed have always existed to be used and abused by those with the will and means. Just look at human history.

Look at Russia and China. Doesn't matter what system of government they used, who was leader, what the ideology was, and what was said. In all systems these two governments used, you – the Common stock Human – have been equally used and abused. And I have no ounce of sympathy and compassion for your breed. The ancient term for you people is Anariya. The ignoble, the Dishonourable. That's the Common denominator of the Common person. Honour is the dividing line between the Ariya and the Anariya, the Arya and the Anarya.

One of my earliest influences in my way of seeing people is oddly the Church of the SubGenuis. I got into way back in junior high when my friends were into it. Back then I had watched all the videos, heard all the devival songs, read most of the books, and past out all of the pamphlets. You get to the point if you seriously look deep where you realize that there is a real philosophy beneath the superficial joke. And that the joke exterior exists for a "sinister" reason.

The thing that gave the Game away for me was a writing by Ivan Stang in one of the early books where he goes out of character and just writes his sentiments. He was talking about how in the old days the Flow Power and Free Love movement was a truly enjoyable thing to be a part of. It was genuinely counter culture at the time. It was one generation truly breaking free from the social confines of an old generation to evolve. But then something unfortunate happened. All these normal people started to join the movement. It became a fad and devolved into the so called hippy movement. By then Stang said that the original people who founded the movement left it to enjoy something else which was their own things. The normal people had ruined something once enjoyed by the few, which once was counter culture and turned it into a decadent fad of the mass. From this unfortunate event Stang coined a term which would change the way I saw and understood people. He coined the term “The CON,” for the Church of the Subgenius.

The CON stands for the “Conspiracy Of Normalcy.” The CON is like a mass of dumb and blind people feeling around like zombies for things to ruin. They send in their minions – the Pinks [the average or normal person] to infiltrate people’s groups and organizations. And they slowly make those organizations Normal and Acceptable.

The twist in the Church of the Subgenius is that you don’t fight the Pinks and their CON urges. You work with it and Con them back by making them wannabe SubGenii. Which is where the jokes facade and all of the items for sale comes in. The genuine Subgenius knows his own kind and knows who are the Conned Pinks. The Conned Pinks are the ones who buy membership and items because of the superficial facade. They are the ones who can’t see things for what they are.

Ever since then I try to make things I am a part of “CON proof,” to keep them out from ruining a good things. The CON is afraid of crime, counter social norms, and the idea of murder. By counter social norms, what I mean is that if generic society has heterosexual sex, then anything different is disliked. But even homosexuality is not safe from the CON. They’ll Normalize that too. Now you see gay pride parades out in the open and egalitarians screaming for gays to have equal rights. When you see two grannies making out in public, you know being a Lesbian isn’t counter social anymore. You have to use extreme measures to keep them out. Mention things like child-love, and any sort of extreme sex fetish and the CON will scream in moral horror. Mention racialism today and the CON will convulse into intellectual spasms. Tell them you think its okay to kill people and they think your are a demon from hell. Any institution which uses things like crime, counter social norms, and murder as defensive firewalls is guaranteed to be safe from the CON. So this helps me see a practical function for what we call in ONA social “heresies.” And a practical use for using the ideas, practices, mythos, and rhetoric we use.

The other influence the Church of the SubGenius had on me was to see the Average, Normal people to be resources to be used and abused for your own benefit and ends. That's the most basic fundamental equation of anything we have today. The equation of business is: you majority-average people buy my shit, or get the fuck out. Politics is: you majority-average people vote for me, or get the fuck out. Religion is: you majority-average people believe in my god, or get the fuck out. If you fall for this stupid game, then what group do you belong to? If you think you belong to the other camp, then learn to do what they do, and get good at it.

Don't ever believe that you are peers with them. You are not of that common mass. You should strive to be above it. To do the opposite of what they do, believe the opposite of what they believe, see the world opposite to how they see the world. Be a "Satan" to that Common Generic Mass and everything they believe in and stand for. You must learn to understand that Nature has created things the way things exist for Her own reasons. There is a Natural – Satanic – reason why they exist. For the same reason why most monkeys exist: for the Alpha males and his friends and bloodline to use and abuse. If they can do it, have the will, and the means, to pull it off and do the using and abusing, then it's all good. I don't care what species you find, it's the same actuality of Nature. The majority exist for those willing and with the means to use and abuse. It's not the most fit, but the most cunning that thrives. That's the dharma of Nature and Time: "The most cunning thrives."

And there are a lot of cunning organisms out there. I was watching a nature show on the Discovery Channel about the Amazon Jungle. The documentary showed natives urinating in the river and there's this parasitic worm-like fish which smells the ammonia from your urine and follows it to swim up your pee hole and lodge itself in your junk to suck your blood. The fish is amazingly related to a catfish. So if this fish can outsmart you because you are stupid and pissing in rivers, then you deserve what you got. Nature doesn't give a shit, she made that fish, and in this case she made you to be a host to the fish. That's just your earned lot in life.

I was watching videos on youtube about giant Japanese hornets. The videos showed how the giant Japanese hornets flew into honey bee hives and how a few of them in a matter of hours can wipe out the entire honey bee hive. The problem for the honey bee growers was that the bees were European bees which had not cunningly evolved a defense against such giant hornets. Then a different video showed the giant Japanese hornet send out its scout to search for a new hive.

The scout finds a Japanese honey bee's hive which looks the same as a European bee. But the Japanese bees react differently. The European bees react by continuously sending out their bees to attack the hornets. The Japanese bees run inside their hive and lure the giant hornet in. When the giant hornet comes inside the hive they all pile on top of the scout hornet and collectively shake their bodies. The collective shaking increases the temperature in the middle of the ball of bees, which cooks the hornet scout alive.

So in that bee case, Nature doesn't give a shit about size or even "reason" or intelligence. I'm sure the giant hornet has a bigger brain than tiny bees. But the Japanese bees with the blessings of Father Time became cunning enough to survive the giant hornet.

Nothing in Nature or Time says you can't use and abuse those mundanes. In fact it is a phenomenon in Nature that those mundanes exist to be used and abused, by those with the will and means. Nature even goes so far as to "bless" you and reward you if you can do it.

You watch these male baboons fight to be top male of a group of baboons. When a young baboon gets to the top and has sex with all the bitches he owns, Nature does something remarkable for him to make him stand out. The alpha baboon's face and body is transformed. He grows huge and his face grows colorful. It's not survival of the most fittest. Look closely and you'll see that this alpha baboon survives just like his inferior baboons survive. What makes him different and why Nature "blessed" him is because he used the other baboons to his advantage. So he gets to sire the next generation, and his bloodline thrives to see to it that this baboon troop exists at least another generation further. And the cycle of the most able to thrive repeats.

That's one of the many aspects about ONA I really like. ONA keeps it real and Natural. It sticks with the eternal dhammakaya. There is nothing wrong with influencing people. As a species we would not be where and what we are in this current age, had it not been for the few humans in our past whose memes thrived to influence all of us. English, of all memeplexes, is by far the top winner so far. No other memeplex has as much influence on our species then the English language.

Not only does English influence the field of science, entertainment, and the usual named arenas, but the language itself when used as a means of thinking, interpreting our world, influences our very perception and understanding of the world and reality. In a sense, we live in an English universe. Mad props to the Anglo-Saxons for their aeonic triumph.

ONA keeps it Real. It's the only psychological place where a human can be fully human. Where a human can learn to be fully human. It provides us who live its Sinister Way the means to refine our Humanness and Nature/Time given skills. There is no wrong or right, nor morals, or immorals, no default political stance, no fixed doctrine. Everything is open to be further refined, developed, and evolved. There is just Us & Them. Just our own Individual striving to adeptship. Just honest Self-Knowing from long-time earned Pathei-Mathos. And a distant aeonic goal to ever keep our eyes beyond the horizon. The one thing which may differentiate us from our four-legged kin is that we can see a Potential in that distant horizon, and Reach for it. It blows my own mind away to think that it has taken Nature and Time “this long” to manifest that Reaching.

The Sphere of Mercury

“...WITH A BLAST, OF MY TRUMPET! I HEAL, YOUR WOUNDS! Before you the yellow Sigil of Mercury. Touch it. Armed with the knowledge extracted from the pool, you are now entering the Dark Sphere of Mercury. This is a desolate place. Heath blasted by fiery tempest, scorpions eating charred animal. See, how the dismembered are scattered to the bitter winds! The air congeals and chokes. Farewell happy fields! Hail horrors! Hail! This is the Sphere of Transformation. But do not tremble in the face of a breeze that would dismantle your features. Instead, be indulgent, remember all that you saw in the bloody pool, remember you deepest desires. Before you now is a black inverted pentagram. This, is the Womb of Mercury, the Eye of Satan. This, is the gateway, of Transformation. The pentagram will begin to move closer... you will feel the fear and sensuality of metamorphosis, your form cracking, shedding and mutating, as it takes on the attributes, scryed from the previous Sphere. Transformation, will be complete, when you pass through the pentagram, and emerge on the threshold of the next Sphere, as that, which you desire to be. Only intense lust for this outcome will pull you through. Passivity will render you as useless ash, cast, into the pit, of a particular nameless horror. But hark! The pentagram grates forth... TRANSFORMMMMM!!” [- The Self Immolation Rite, ONA]

“...With your lover, by your side, I put before you, the gold Sigil of the Sun. Touch it. You are now entering the Dark Sphere of Sol. The swords, that cast their shadow, over hateful paradise... draw back, to reveal mountain ranges, majestic against a sky, of flame. You are standing on the edge of the circle made by nine sacrificial stones. Here, there is a thick darkness weaved by the unsated fog and contained by the mountains. Those roaring obscurers of that which lies beyond! Illuminated by the glow of putrefaction, the corpse of your former self, discarded during transformation, lies in the circles centre. Witness the repulsive entities that violate and mutilate your corpse! This sacred shell, is now the prey of every necrophiliac and cannibal! It seems initially, that they are performing gross obscenities for pleasure, but, look closer. The corpse is delicately gutted, and from the bones extracted, these creatures are constructing a tower, that rises far above the mountain peaks. Their work finished, they withdraw, bowing to your superiority and divine disposition. They light a protective circle of fire around the stones. This, is the Sphere, of Vision, Understanding, and Prophecy. Accompanied by your lover, climb the bloody bones to the top. Here, you will see your kingdom, surrounding, stretching out far into the solar fire, of increase. See your Temples! Your Riches! Your Works! Commentary:

Preah-Tra is the word denoting the Death of Buddha. Preah meaning “Sacred,” “Venerable,” “Worshipful,” and Tra/Trah/Tras being the Sacerdotal word of Sanskrit/Pali origin meaning “PASSED,” “Gone To The Other Side.”

You never use the word death or die when speaking about the Buddha, as it is a sign of high disrespect. Preahtra is the word. Or we say “Preahbudh Preahnibbian,” meaning “The Buddha is Dead/has Died.” Preahbudh is “The Buddha” and Preahnibbian means something like “The Most Sacred Nibbana/Nirvana.” Here Preahnibbian does not mean the Buddha has gone to or achieved some Nirvana. It simply means he is Dead/Tra.

That word “Tra” is then related to the Latin word Trans meaning to Go Thru, Go Past, Go Beyond, Go Across. The root can also be found in such words as “Transition,” and “Transformation,” which are two English words that touches very closely to the quality and essence of the word “Tra.”

There is one other place in the Mythos of the Buddha where the word Tra is used. The word is Tra-Deung, which is Sacerdotal Khmer/Pali-Sanskrit.

When in English we read or hear about how the Buddha sat in meditation without eating for many years under the Bo Tree and became “Enlightened,” that English word “Enlightened” is a mistranslation or a grossly inadequate rendering of the word “Tra-Deung.”

It is questionable and debatable what “Enlightenment” means in the English language, since it has so many qualities, values, and flavours, and since it is so nebulous a term. But in the more older word “Tra-Deung” it is very clear what the Buddha achieved. He didn’t achieve anything. He didn’t get hit by a bright light. He didn’t become all knowing. He went passed or beyond something. Or he overcame something.

Tra means to Go Beyond, Cross Over, Pass. Deung means “To Know,” or “To Recognize/Discern” something or someone. Tra-Deung therefore means something like ‘Having Gone Beyond Knowing,’ ‘Passing Recognition and Discernment’ “By-Passed Knowledge/Knowing.”

“Deung” as a verb and adjective describes a function of the mind. That part of mind which “knows.” This part of Mind which knows is Consciousness: Vinyan [vin~n~an] in Pali, which per the Buddha has Recognition and Discernment as its functioning quality. Oddly, the word “Deung” seems like a distant cousin of the Germanic root “Denk-” as in “Denken” meaning to Think; except “Deung” means to Know.

Consciousness apprehends only what its 5 senses can grasp. Without those Five Senses we/mind cannot “Deung” or know anything.

There is no knowing without Seeing object/form. There is no knowing without hearing word/sound. There is no knowing without feeling texture/things. There is no knowing – no recognition/discernment – without smelling aroma/scent. There is no knowing without tasting. How do you know what a Jackfruit or Logan or Mango tastes like? Can that Knowing/knowledge be given to you in word? No. You must Taste it for yourself. Then you know. Then we are able to recognize and discern such taste.

If we see a bird, we know what it is, and we can say: “Birds fly in the air.” That statement is logical and reasonable in general. We know we see a bird, and then we know that birds fly. Why or how do we know that bird fly? Because we have Seen birds fly before. Therefore if we Hear someone tell us they have seen a pig fly, it sounds “illogical/irrational” to us. Why? Because we have never consciously seen a pig fly ourselves. The experience of grasping pigs flying with our five senses does not exist within our World-thought-word-model. Thus, Logic and Reason has its limits.

Logic and Reason is limited also by Consciousness, or the functions of Consciousness: recognition, discernment, analysis, recollection of memory, and comparing what it apprehends with its 5 senses up to its world-model made of words and ideas it has accumulated. We call that accumulation of thoughts and ideas “logic,” and “reason.” Logical and Rational Knowing is limited by what consciousness knows: what it has gathered with its five senses. So when what we gather with our five senses matches up to our worldmodel of words and ideas, we say that such “makes SENSE,” it is “commonsense,” and therefore is logical or reasonable.

How does one go beyond the limits of Consciousness: of Knowing?

By not even using the mental/intellectual function of consciousness to gather information. There is another mind beneath Namō/Manā [mental mind] called Chitta/Citta which means the Heart-Mind. Chitta doesn't "know" things. It "feels" things. "Feel" is the wrong word to use because it doesn't capture what Chitta does. Words like "Tune Into," "Communion," "Empathize," "Become One With," and "Intuite" better captures the function of Chitta. In the original Sanskrit and Pali, the word used to describe the actual function of Chitta is "Buddhi." Buddhi basically meaning "Intuitive Understanding." Thinking is to Consciousness, what Buddhi is to Chitta.

Because chitta does not rely on the five senses, chitta does not grasp orprehend Form or "Things." It grasps or "feels" for the "Essence [arupa]" of things [rupa]. A quick example of chitta working would be when you see someone a long distance away, and you "know/feel" who that person is instantly even before the person comes close enough to be seen with the eyes in detail. In the sense that the Conscious mind does not grasp the timeless flow of sunyata, Chitta does. The Essence and Beauty of a fine piece of music, artwork, or person TRANscends the functions of Consciousness and its knowing, by prehendingsomething finer beyond the forms and thingness of things.

Consciousness cannot genuinely grasp the suchness of Love. Chitta does. If left to the logical function of mental consciousness, love would eventually be broken down into meaningless biochemicals, molecular structures, biological and physiological functions, and common law rules of courtship. Consciousness is boring, its stupid, its superficial, it is meant to break Things down into bite sizes to know. Consciousness must break down Forever into hours, minutes, days, years, centuries. It must break down Forever into miles, kilometers, light years. When chitta can simply "grasp" the Essence of Forever without much effort or breaking it down into baby bites. In a way Chitta says to Vinyan [consciousness]: "This is what Forever 'feels' like." And in return Vinyan says to Chitta: "Okay, I've seen what a mile looks like, how many miles is in Forever?"

So, to Understand something, one must stand "under" what one is trying to grasp. Under coming from the words Inter/Antar meaning "Before," "Among," "Between." You can read about and know of a culture; but to Understand that culture and people you must Stand Before/Among/Between that culture and people to Directly Experience such. So Chitta can only Buddhi what it is up next to. You cannot "appreciate" or feel the beauty of Canon in D Major [my favourite classical piece, I can play it on the violin: my favourite instrument] when you are not intimately connected to that music or in its presence. Likewise, you cannot appreciate/feel the beauty of a painting sitting at home, when the painting is in the Louvre.

So the word "Tra-Deung" simply means that the Buddha went beyond knowing the suchness of Things and Forms and Words and Ideas and Concepts, and learned to Buddhi things to come to an Intuitive Understanding of what everything was around him, how everything works, and how he and others fits into this everything. And so we say that he is a "Buddha" which is the masculine form of the feminine Buddhi, meaning "That/He Which/Who Buddhi-ed." The grammar makes a lot of sense if you know Spanish or Italian. In American Spanish a "Guapa" [La Guapa] means "She Who is Hot," and a "Guapo" [El Guapo] means "He Who is Good-Looking." In Sanskrit the grammar runs on the same line of thought: a Deva means "He

Who Is Shiny/Luminescent,” and a Devi means “She Who Is Shiny.” In the Tipitaka Buddha is also called the Sambuddhi meaning the One Who Intuits By Itself. He is also called the Samma Sambuddhasa, which means the One Who Totally/Wholey Sambuddhi-ed. So we can say that Tra-Deung via Buddhi – Intuitive Prehension – causes us to Transcend ordinary/mundane – anariya – knowledge such that we grasp or Understand the wordless Essence/suchness of Dhamma: Phenomena.

The Eighth Pathway

For the Initiate of the Sinister Seven Fold Way who knows a few things about the Traditional side of the ONA such as the Septenary Tree of Wyrd, we can see that the essential mythos of Buddha – Mind Transcending Mundane Knowledge Via Dark-Emapthy and/or Intuition – can be understood as being a part of the Initiate’s Pathworking Quest from the Yellow Dark-Sphere of Mercury, thru the 8th pathway of the Tree of Wyrd represented by Atu 0 [Physis] and Ga Wath Am, and finally to the Gold/Orange Dark-Sphere of Sol.

The word Buddha is related to the older word Budh, which is the Sanskrit word for Mercury. Budh/Mercury represents knowledge, wisdom, and understanding. Physis or Nature is the Living Book of Life. There are two methods of reading the Book of Nature [Physis]: Mental Knowing of ideas/words/concepts/forms and the Intuitive Understanding of the Essence beneath such ideas, words, concepts, and thing-forms. So it was said that Physis represents: “The gradual unfolding of nature; the source of Evolution, that which creates Wyrd. The essence behind the appearance of things. Ga wath am: the Power within me is Great.” “The Power within me” matching up nicely with the concept of Sambuddhi: to Buddhi to gain an understanding of things by Oneself/Sam. Meaning that you don’t need another person to unload their ideas, words, concepts, and worldmodles into your head, to know what they know.

And so like the Buddha, we end up right where we should be: the Golden Dark-Sphere of Sol, which represents what? “This, is the Sphere, of Vision, Understanding, and Prophecy.”

What does the word “prophecy” actually mean? A “prophet” is one who is in communion or connexion or in tune to the Divine [Numinous], and shares his/her Understanding of that Divine Essence with others. “Prophecy” is the act or process of a Prophet relaying/conveying his/her Vision, revelation, insights to others after having been gotten inspiration from the Divine Presence or Numen. In the same sense that the Prophet Muhammad was in “communion” with the Divine Presence/Being of Allah, and shared the Qur’An with his people. But also in the same sense that the Buddha was able to tune into or harmonize himself with the Divine Essence of Nature and Life [Dhamma/Phenomena] and shared that Divine/Numinous Vision with his people in words. That Understanding of the Divine Essence beneath the trivial mundane radiates and shines out of such people like light shines from the Sun bathing everyone equally. First is the experience, then the grasping of the Essence, then the packaging of that Essence into words and ideas. What we do with that light or how we use and mentally/intellectually understand that light on the receiving end is entire up to us and based on our individual level of Understanding.

Prophecy does not always involve prediction and foretelling the future. Although if one is At-One with the Numen or the Way of Things, one can aeonically use what insights gathered to see and predict future events. In a similar sense that after a scientist has studied a phenomenon in Nature, and has conducted tests, he may use his Theories to make accurate predictions with. Similar also to the Buddha, as how when he intuitively grasp the understanding of causality or cause and effect, he is able to predict the karmic effect arising from a present cause.

The Eye of Satan

It is said in the Dark-Sphere of Mercury: "This, is the Womb of Mercury, the Eye of Satan." Mercury representing "Satan," and the gateway of transformation. The Womb suggesting something developing. The birth of which is accompanied by a gush of water and life. The Eye Sees. Satan is The Sinister. The Eye of Satan being the "Eye" that can see the Sinister Essence of life and nature and the cosmos sans the outer words, ideas, theories, morals, etc.

In the Tipitaka it is said that the Buddha apprehends and "rules" the world with something called the All Seeing Buddha-Eye, or the Eye of Buddhi, or the Eye of Buddha. Which is to say that chitta has it's own "Eye" with which it "Sees." What is Chitta again? The Heart-mind.

So in the Holy Qur'An it was said by the Prophet Muhammad: "Say this is my way. I am inviting you towards Allah by way of Inner Sight." – (12:108)

In the Islamic Traditions one can only Understand Allah with the Inner Sight of what is called the "Eye of the Heart" or Chasme Qalb in Arabic. The Sufies states that when the Heart is hardened like Stone, the Eye of the Heart is closed and thus cannot See the Divine. But when it is softened and this Eye of the Heart is opened, Understanding gushes out of it like a spring. In the Sufi Traditions, thus, this Eye of the Heart and the spring of Understanding it gushes out is represented by the Prophet Musa striking a Stone in the desert with his staff whereon Water came forth. Which is to say that even in such a visibly barren "land" as a desert – having no life – the Eye of the Heart can See the Light and the Life in this desert, and its Waters/Understandings Quenches our Thirst/Quest.

QUESTIONS FOR CHLOE 352

Questions For Chloe 352

I'm not important yet to be interviewed, so I'll just interview myself. I have actually been "interviewed" a few times. But a majority of them were private conversations between an associate and me where our conversation stays private and any answers I give them should stay in their head. If it's questions someone asks me for a public venture, then I request that I stay anonymous and that this person refrains from identifying me as best as possible. Answers I give for the public sector is carefully crafted to reflect a certain image I want to cultivate in respect to the ONA or whatever or whoever it is I am supporting. It's easier for me to teach actually with the questions and answer form. Because I know a question and that way I can give answers related to the actual question. Freestyle writing has me going all over the place. But I really don't like it when I am actually questioned by others. I prefer to answer only questions I wish to answer, so being interviewed is not my forte. If an associate of mine in the ONA actually tells me that somebody wants to ask me question, most often I tell these associates to pretend to be me. I'm the type of person who works well with a spokesperson who knows the game and objective and can make up stuff. Answers must be political above being honest to engineer a desired end result. I don't mind being asked questions which helps me do my job. I do mind prying questions that tries to get at places I don't like the public digging into.

If I were into real politics and ran a government, I'd be a fascist dictator. I'm a kick back person that does not get angry over much. Only 3 things pisses me off badly: 1) Eating loud with your mouth open in front of me; 2) Repeating myself because you are fucking deaf or stupid and didn't understand me the first time; & 3) Being questioned [about anything]. If I was a dictator, I'd have my men shoot your face and mouth off for asking me a question about about what I'm doing. Shut up. People around me in Real Life know how I roll: I'll break my friendship with anybody that does any of these three things with me on the second offense. And if you actually come to me to ask why I don't want to be your friend anymore I don't give you an answer, I send my older boy cousins to beat the shit out of you. I don't have very many friends. If I wanted them to know something about me, I'd tell them, don't be asking me questions about my private life.

I'd make a very bad politician because I'd probably spend my time killing people, starting with all my friends. I hate keeping friends. The worst kind of people on earth are friends. They are parasites that leech your time, energy, and emotions. And they are entirely unreliable. One of my older OG cousin who is aged out of an Asian gang once told me, which I live by: "The only true friends are the ones with your gun to their heads." That's real friendship: you either got my back, or I'll kill you, and vice versa; otherwise why know each other? We called it a "Gunpoint Friendship." But shooting your friends dead these days sends you to jail, so the best thing to do is stop being their friend and send your boy cousins to teach him a lesson. I almost exclusively in real life hang out with my cousins. Because between us cousins there is a wordless understanding that we'd kill and die for each other. Like my pet dog is my best friend. There is a wordless understanding between me and my pet dog that we would lay our life down for one another. If you are human and you are my friend and you don't have the nature and honour to die for me, like I would for you, then you are more worthless a creature than a dog.

The only friends are family. It's all or nothing. You don't have to be related to be family. You just need to know who you're willing to live and die for. That's Asian style gang culture. Most Asian "gangs" don't classify or call themselves a "gang." It's called a "family." Only the low strata Asians that live near Mexicans and Blacks make gang that use Mexican and Black gang methodologies. Otherwise, Asian "families" do their "gang" business differently. One of my family/friends from one of these top end Asian "families" joking said once: "We don't claim streets like dirt bangers. We claim college campuses and Wall Street." I have Filipino family/friends who tell me that their gangs back on the islands are called "fraternities" and like college frats, these Filipino gangs use Greek Letters. And the other cool thing about these native Flip gangs is that if two parents come from the same fraternity/gang marries and have children, their children are born into the fraternity and raised in that culture. Tribes never went away anywhere.

People think it's hard to make a tribe in the modern world, but it ain't like like. You drive down LA and every other block you pass is turf claimed by an urban tribe that is just as bonded and deadly as their Amazon jungle counterparts. Then you put yourself back in time and walk down the streets of Roman townships up North where Germanic barbarians may live and you'll see that the ethnic gangs of LA and NY which exists in a empire of America, is no different from the bonded and self-determined tribes of Germanic barbarians living inside the Roman Empire. Then you ask yourself: What group of people were the catalyst for the Fall of Rome, which group eventually took it over. Then you take a look at the FARC in Columbia, and the Zetas in Mexico. And finally cast your eyes on the gangs and ghettos of America which are expanding as each year passes. History has etched America's Fate in stone: it will fall one day from the inside out. The late Soviet Union taught us one great and valuable lesson: Nothing Trumps

Human Nature.

I think at least my form of “democracy” would more than likely resemble Vladimir Putin’s Russian democracy, but more controlled. Mr. Putin is a private hero of mine. I think he is one of the greatest and most productive politicians to have influenced a modern State. I think what he has done to Russia – the Russia after the fall of Communism and the current Russia – is very impressive. It’s the End Results that speak louder than ideological shenanigans. Putin isn’t perfect, but he took a Russia that broke free from a communist stupor and gradually turned it around into something worth being proud of. It’s just that its public sector maybe drinks too much? But that’s understandable, because on a collective level the communist era severed their ancestral roots of their history and culture in an attempt to implement in the population an arbitrary and ideological substitute. As a people, when this happens, you feel empty inside, because your culture, spirit, essence, and life force of your ancestry is gone. I hope he and his people tap into Russia’s great history and past to give their collective identity as a people a firm foundation. This is something the mundane America will never have: the ancestral roots of a grand and glorious living history. Their history starts with capitalism and Webster, and they will die in that empty superficial substitution.

This will just be me answering random question. Most of the topic for the questions comes from search terms that people use to find our wordpress. Sometimes I get a few search terms of people who perhaps are looking for information on a subject and I feel like helping them out by giving them answers. But I never do because I don’t know where to posts the answers at. Other times we get some really odd search terms where we can imagine how those words on google ever led to our wordpress. I actually do take certain search terms and use google and yahoo to see what results draws up for research. But Some of these search terms that shows up on our back end of our wordpress when googled don’t lead to our wordpress? Some of the more very odd search terms we’ve gotten is “Naked Horse Pix.” How the hell did that lead to this blog? I tried to search this term because I was scared that ONA was somehow getting mixed with bestiality websites, which is bad for business. Nobody here even talks about horses?! And horses are already naked dummy. Another weird one was “Zeena LaVey Tits.” Nobody here talks about either Zeena or tits? The weirdest one for me was a recent one that goes: “Old Gays Exhibiting Their Ass.” I’m afraid to google that to see how in the world that term led somebody to this blog. I didn’t think there were people out there searching for ass pix of old men. That’s just not right. But I guess it takes all kinds doesn’t it.

So the questions will be mostly based on the reoccurring search terms random people use over and over again to find our blog. Some of them don’t have anything to do with Satanism or the ONA, since I write a lot about Buddhism and such things. Other questions are based on questions people have asked me often in real life and via cyberspace. One search term that is now used very often to find this blog is “Chloe 352,” so I’ll prolly end up talking about myself often. I even named the title of this article after me for you relentless fuckers that won’t quit searching the internet for information on me. I’ll provide you fuckers with some information about me mixed into the Q&A. I hate that feeling like I’m being stocked and seeing handfuls of people searching the internet with my name really bugs me, quit it, it’s creepy.

Questions & Answers With Your Friend Chloe 352

Q1: Why do you guys use WordPress?

A1: There are two major reasons why. We didn't always use a blog medium. Originally 4 years ago Kayla 352 took over a profile one of our friends had at the 600 club. She used to be very active there a while back. But that account was a "portal account" meaning that several people who are friends just have the password to that account and they use the profile to just answer questions about ONA or work the PM system or something. When Kayla used it, she usually signs her posts off with her name.

The thing with Kayla is that she is a popularity freak. She was like that in school, on Friendsters back in ancient days, and on Myspace back in 2004 when most of us were around age 16. Kayla brought her "Myspace culture" into the WSA and ONA with her.

Back when Myspace was still very new – even before youtube was invented yet – our friends were all on Myspace. In those times there was this stupid contest somebody started where people were competing to get as many friends as they could on their friends list. There were these things back then on Myspace called "Whore Trains" where you ride them and random people just add you. So Kayla had about a dozen profiles to herself. She used her real one to whore herself for friends since she was into that contest, and with her other profiles she trolled the shit out of Myspace groups with her friends and got kicked out from Myspace often. She and her friends had these fake profiles back then where they used year book pictures of the principle and teachers to make profiles to hit on under aged girls and boys. They eventually got in trouble for it.

At her peak Kayla amassed over 10,000 friends on her list. But all these other girls were getting way more than her so she got frustrated because she was losing. Kayla eventually figured out that she would never get a million friends on Myspace and never be the most popular on it, so she had a plan: she would go find a smaller websites and have her own popularity contest there by herself to make herself feel better. Which was when a friend of ours gave her the password to an account they used but did not want any more at the 600 club. The name of the account was "Luciferific." There is a Myspace history actually connected with the WSA to that name. In the olden days on Myspace, we had close friends who were Satanists who started one of Myspace's first groups for Satanists which was called "Luciferific." Many of the people now in WSA hung out in that group back in the day. The Myspace group was based on what we called "Progressive Satanism" which back then was just an unformed idea.

But for Kayla there was a problem with the 600 club. It didn't have a friendlist you can add people on to show how popular you were and there were no whore trains. She was slightly older and slightly smarter than her Myspace days, so she had a plan to fix these issues. Her plan was she would turn the letters WSA into numbers [352] and then try hard to make insightful posts to collect friends, then have her friends display those numbers on their profile. She ended up calling this "eTagging" which is when you use the medium of cyberspace to tag and graffiti on people's brains.

I think after a year of her writing short but insightful posts Kayla had eTagged at least 15-20 people who all displayed the number 352 on their profiles. What changed everything was that one day some weird bitch came by the 600 club to post a link to some forum she had where this weird bitch was starting her own cult. Kayla went to the link and had her first “epiphany.” That was when she told us that she was wasting her time collecting friends when she can start her own cult too! This was when I went and started for us our own little forum, and all of Kayla’s “352” friends migrated to this forum. Then Kayla started to go thru our old writings from our Myspace days when we were trying to create our own version of Satanism, and she started to write long essays by updating them, which became what is known as “Opus Vrilis.” So instead of forum posts Kayla wrote long essays for her book, which I added to. She tried to make Opus Vrilis a joint effort where we all contributed our own understanding of Satanism to it, but the others complained that they didn’t know how to write. And instead of eTagging random people with a mere set of numbers, Kayla started to tag people’s brains with her ideas. It was Blackwood that introduced us to WordPress.

Back then we had never heard of a wordpress or Blackwood. By this time Eric of Mystan had introduced us to Ning, and so we had our own Ning network too. One day in our little WSA forum one of our olden day brothers had made a post saying that we [wsa] must be famous because we were on WordPress, and he left a link. When I read that post I was thinking: What the hell is a wordpress and how did it make us famous? I clicked on the link and saw that some jerk had come into our Ning and stole something were worked on called the 10 Proclamations from our Opus Vrilis and critiqued it with these illiterate retorts! That’s how we came to know Blackwood since he did it. After Kayla and her 352 friends found out about this they started a massive 3 year long troll campaign to attack Blackwood, by pretending to be him all over the internet. I was more interested in what the wordpress was and why that brother said it made us famous. He was kidding, but at the time I thought wordpress had something to do with getting people famous.

So I researched what wordpress was. The first thing I did was do a background check on it via Alexa to see how popular it was. At the time I did not know what a “blog” was. All I knew was that you can write on wordpress like a book so people can read it. I learned that wordpress is a major website that is one of the top sites that gets the most traffic. This was all the information I needed to figure things out. Later I told Kayla and our friends that making posts on forums is a total waste of time because no matter how insightful our posts are, nobody but us will read them. If we wanted to spread our memes far, we had to use something writable outside forums. I told them that wordpress gets major internet traffic and would be a perfect medium to write on. This way we have a better chance that our memes and ideas gets maximum exposure. That was the period in our “history” where we shut down our Ning and our forum and relocated all our efforts onto wordpress. At the time the only Satanic anything using wordpress was ONA. You had back then just the nineangles WP, Pointy’s WP, and the darkimperium WP.

The second reason why we use WordPress is because of the many statistical tools they give you to use on the back end of wordpress. You get a graph which counts how many hits you get per day; a chart which lists your top read posts of the day, week, month, quarter, year, and all time. A chart that lists all of the search terms that leads people to your site. And we learned how to use all of those tools to write the next batch of articles and topical essays. For example the current most popular articles we have right now is “The Business of ONA,” and “Questions For Anton Long Pt II.” From this information we get a feel for what type of thematic presentation our audience likes at the moment, so we use that knowledge to dictate the theme of our next set of writings. Which is why this essay here is a hybrid between the Q&A and type of information presented in our two popular posts. So basically we learned to wrap our ONA ideas into the most effective thematic presentations.

Originally, before I knew about blogs, I wanted to write books because I believed that books were my only means to spread our memes and ideas to a target audience. But books has problems that I found limiting. It costs money to publish a book and it is not guaranteed that anybody will read it. I knew that writing to spread memes takes experimentation, study of feedback from the market, and manufacturing new memes to reflect the market’s needs. This meant that books for what I wanted to do was impractical. WordPress literally changed everything for me. It’s free for me to use. It’s free for people to read. You can attach tags to each essay you write to make them searchable on the web. It’s malleable and dynamic. You can easily go back and edit and you can add as many pages as needed. The bast part is if you work it right, over time, you get maximum exposure for your memes. And so the influence via this format happens much faster than from books. For my goals and purposes, I’d take WordPress anyway, hands down, over a book.

Just writing an essay and filling it with information doesn’t cut it in business. During college me and Kayla and some of our friends worked for a year at Target on the Merchandize Presentation team, also called “Planogramming.” This was the team that came in at night, deconstructed a whole aisle, removed all of the products, reset the shelves, set up new items, and put up the displays as a means of presenting the merchandize to the customers in a presentable manner that appealed to them. As a corporation Target keeps tabs on its customer demographics and with that information they make theories on how products and aisles show be set and presented to induce customers to buy more. That theories gets put into aisle schematics which is given to these planogram teams to execute the theories. Then they wait and see how effective their theories are and make changes. So our work was constant. I brought this corporate “culture” and way of seeing and using merchandize presentation into the ONA with me. Which is literally all that I am doing with the ONA.

All we do is take the ideas and memes made by ONA Central [AL & Co] and we just re-present the merchandize in different ways to target specific demographics and mindsets. Then we pay attention for several months to see if those ideas spread into the general Satanic Subculture. The “Average” Target shopper is a middle class White female with about one child in her mid 30?s. And so based on that profile Target lays out is stores to capture the attention of that Average shopper. As so as you walk into a typical store the first thing ahead in your field of vision is the clothes and bags and accessories. Usually the jewelry department is also within your first field of vision as you walk in. If you don’t do towards the clothing and turn down the aisle into the main section of the store and walk straight down you hit the next set of departments aimed at this Average shopper: the little food department, and Health and Beauty. If you don’t go down that lane and you turn into another lane, you get hit by children clothing and your house appliances and domestic house décor department. Everywhere you first turn you hit a department aimed at this Average target customer.

So what is the Average “shopper” of ONA product/memes? You Average “shopper” of ONA stuff is X Generation, male, in his late twenties, educated, articulate. Therefore this Average potential ONA shopper is also Disenfranchised with Modern Satanism, needs higher quality stimulus, is unsatisfied with the condition of the State/Nation their father’s generation manifested, is not satisfied with what Satanism and the occult has been selling for the past 40 years, questions and is not trusting of authority, and open minded where they will venture to study other cultures and philosophical system to find new stimulus to add to their need or search for things to make Their Satanism or belief system, better. The last part is the most important part. Your Target customer isn’t looking to buy Target, they are looking for things to supplement their home and life style they already have.

You Average ONA audience is not looking for a new belief system, new ideology or anything. X Gen is fed up with that shit. They don’t want their father’s hippy religions. They have their own things, and they are only looking for memes to supplement what they already Are and Have. X Gen is so different from the liberal Babyboomer generation that many X Gens are actually conservative and looking for grounded traditions. They are now yearning for something solid and traditional their grandfathers had. The liberal hippy generation nearly killed something like Freemasonry because none of them wanted to join it. Today these old school fraternal societies [and traditional religions] are getting an influx of X Gen looking for culture and tradition. This is what we would call a “shift in the market.” If you don’t learn to be responsive to that shift, you sever your connection to any real market. The word “market” here simply means human relations and interactions.

You can’t just write into the ether and hope for the best. Memes can’t exist outside the medium of Mind. Whose Minds are you targeting if you’re just writing shit on a whim? Do you know your demographics? You don’t. If you knew your market demographics you would know that your Average X Gen person dislikes joining forums with private membership. Myspace is dead because they could not move with the aging of their most passionate market: the teens back in 2004. We all grew up and got fed up with all that forums and chatting and joining groups shit. Facebook usurped that aged young adult market that left Myspace by giving them an environment they liked in which they can function in. If you study Facebook’s operating environment you’ll see that everything is “Open Ended.” You have a typical profile where you have your real friends. You have a wall where you can without leave comments and openly share music, video, and comments. You have “groups” you don’t really join but like and you just read or post. Everything is “Open Ended” and hassle free.

Something like a WordPress works better at tapping into that big market because it’s open ended and hassle free. You just drop by and read the damn posts on wordpress and leave. No joining, no making profiles, no body to bug you, you stay anonymous. You read stuff, pick up whatever ideas you find useful, and leave to go about your own life and business. Nobody chases you down to bug you about joining some religion, adoring some leader, adopting some prefabricated set of beliefs. You just take what you need and Personalize it all into your own thing. Your own repertoire. If you like ONA you just align yourself to it and help evolve it in your own unique way. Not hassle. This will also explain why I had the idea of getting the rank and file of ONA to demote Anton Long from leader to just a respected peer. Because your typical X Gen person although they may be seeking culture, tradition, and community or some solid ground to stand on, they do not trust or want to marry their lives to some authority figure. In the older generation, those older people did not mind it when they joined a religion or belief system and that religion came with an ego-driven leader. You want the religion or philosophy, I come with it; which is what the game was. It's like going to a car lot to buy a new car, and the salesman guy tells you: "I'll let you have the car if you take me home and let me live with you!" Your average intelligent X Gen doesn't want that ball and chain shit. Especially in this Satanic Subculture thing. You look at all those goofy internet cult leaders still doing things in the old school and they each have a following of 4 retarded people. That alone should tell you something about market trends and shifts in "demographical mindset."

Q2: How much do you weigh Chloe 352?

A2: I am a whole 98 pounds. I'm about 5'2" got my mother's Asian genes so it's okay. The family dog can knock me over if he rushes at me. But that's okay though because it just means I'm all brain. Rice has no nutritional value. You eat so much of it with so little of the other stuff. We call those two separate things. The Rice is called "Bai" which sounds like the English word By or Bye or Buy. Then the various stuff you eat with the Rice is called Aha [Pali-Khmer], Ahan [Thai], or Mahoap [Common Khmer], which means "Food." Normally, as Asians in our natural habitats and left to our own devices, we eat a lot of the rice and only use the actual food as flavouring to give the rice taste. Plus our great grandparents were all Chinese, so we get their frugal way of eating. A family of 12 Chinese people can share one fish together all day. Because they only use that fish as something like "condiments" or garnishing to add flavour to their bowl of rice. That's how we eat things.

When my Great Grandpa was alive he used to tell us stories about his life as a Chinese immigrant to Indochina. He said that they were very poor and left China with nothing with only a few pairs of clothing. And in their new country the whole lot of them shared a very small hut of some type and they would work together to do business by first making food and sweets and selling them, then other types of business. Late Great Grandpa said that for most of his childhood he only ate rice with soy sauce and whatever eggs and crabs and fish they could find. They just kept working together, living together, and doing business together while eating like that until they got rich. This is one thing I really admire in Chinese people, is that they have this natural family based collective work ethics.

One of my aunts who is a cousin of my own aunts and uncles is mostly Chinese. She is the oldest of her seven siblings. When she was in her early teens her mother died and having no father they were all left orphans. So she was forced to leave her childhood and teenage stuff behind and be a mother and father to her 6 siblings to keep them alive and together. They all found their way to California safely and together and were living with relatives. But this auntie took a vow before the Buddha to never marry or have children of her own so she can devote all her time and life to her 6 siblings.

What this auntie did was she would work several jobs here and save her money. Then when one of her siblings was old enough to work she would put them to work and take their money and put it into a collective account. She told her siblings that if they did not work together like that, they would be poor and die together since they had no parents. When she saved up enough money she would buy a small business for her oldest sibling, and continue to work and do the same. She did this until all 6 of her siblings owned a business of their own. By then she was 60. She told her siblings that her duties were done, she was satisfied and at peace, and now she'd like to retire. So in turn her 6 siblings now take care of her every need and gives her allowance money to spend each month. Her siblings all revere her as a mother and boss. They are grown people, but they ask her for permission to do everything from going on vacation to getting married. Growing up she tells us that she and her siblings ate frugally like any Chinese family, especially since back then money was hard to come by.

This auntie – and everyone in my family I know – said that they were horrified when they first saw Americans eat because the Americans would each an entire plate of food all to themselves which could feed a whole small village of Chinese people. No wonder there's a billion of them you know. My family and most others I know called Americans "Yiak" which means Giant or Monster, because they are so huge and eat like giants too. There is one thing about food and the way Americans eat that is culturally disrespectful, which is when you eat and don't have the consideration of your kin and friends to call them to share your food. It's a custom and respectful in our culture that when you have have food or are fixing to eat something that before you eat your food, you call everybody around you to come and share your food or ask everyone around you if they want to eat what you have. This is an old tribal custom from way back in the day when if you don't share what food you have hunted and gathered with your tribe, you all die in that forest together from selfish greed. That type of selfish greed of not sharing things in this tribal Culture and Buddhism is called in Pali-Khmer "Lop" or "Lob," from the Sanskrit Loba meaning "Greed," or "Lust." Even if what you are eating is small and you know nobody wants to eat what you have anyways, you still have to call everyone to share what you have with you. It's disrespectful on the other end when you are not invited to eat and someone just garfs their meal down by themselves. You're left asking yourself: why are we living together or friends if you don't share with me?

During our college years we all shared this apartment next to the campus in walking distance. It was expensive because of the closeness to the campus but our parents paid for it. Our several White friends lived with us too. One of them – who is still friends with us – was this huge 6'2" White guy from Boston named Francesco [he was Northern Italian like Kayla] but we called him Franny.

Our roommate Franny didn't actually go to the university. He just lived with us. Franny is a loud personality. He's the type to actually narrate every thought he has out loud as if you were interested in every thought that passes in his head. But I love him to death because he has a huge heart. You have a dependable friend for life if Franny is your friend. He literally gives you his car for free when he buys a new one. He's a trust fund baby so even though he was older than us he really didn't work a job. When he needed spending money he would fly back home to Boston and mow lawns of people he knows for a month, then fly back to live in our apartment with us.

Franny also hung out with the kids in the complex, played ball and video games with them. He also hung out with the Black people his age in the area. He really like gangsta rap and in the most random of moments just busts out with a "flow" or some rap about republicans killing liberals, Satanists killing Catholic bishops. He also loves to break dance and pop and dance to Madonna and 80's music for us and the kids at the complex. So at random moments in the middle of China Town Franny would bust out in all sorts of dance moves and pop on the sidewalk. He also sleeps with two medium sized teddy bears he had names for: "Cary," and "Beary," and takes his teddy bears with him in his car when he goes places. And we've never seen him have a girlfriend? So Franny was always "special" to us. But we never offend him by prying into what we assume to be his bizarre personal life. We had to housebreak Franny from his White barbaric ways and give him some semblance of culture and manners. There were about 6-7 of us living in that apartment and only 2 were guys, him, and one of my cousins.

He had this bad habit of cooking his favourite dish – white spaghetti with carameled onions – in the kitchen while I was doing somebody's homework. I was doing people's homework and editing or writing essays for our roommates and their friends because they were all fobs who barely spoke English. But Franny would finish cooking and sit at the table and without calling us to eat with him just proceeds to enjoy himself. Then me and my cousins all turn our heads over shocked. He'd stop eating and say: "What? What happen? Why is everybody looking at the White guy eating?" So after we told him that what he was doing was rude and disrespectful and taught him how to do things right he fixed himself proper and exaggerated it. After he cooked stuff he'd put a small towel on his arm like a butler and went up to each one of us, knocked on all of our doors, called each of our names and would say: "Ms. Chloe, Ms. Richelle, Ms. So and so, I've made some lunch with extra for everybody and will be leaving into the kitchen to eat my portion. I wish to formally invite you all to join me and share my food. If you wish to join me, please do so at your discretion. Thank you." I thought it was funny and cute, but guess you had to be there. He ended up learning to speak a lot of Khmer, Thai, and Vietnamese.

Q3: What is Samsara?

A3: This is for some reason the top word search to find our wordpress. You people are starting to bug me now. I took down the samsara picture we used hoping this would stop. There should be other websites that talk about it besides this one.

Samsara is a word and different groups of Hindus and Buddhists will have different interpretations and understandings of it. Nobody is either right or wrong with things like this. Personally I tend to gravitate towards the rational and down to earth apprehensions of that word.

In the Hindu influenced sphere of thought Samsara is like a cycle of birth and death. You are stuck in this cycle constantly reincarnating as different people and animals paying back your "bad karma," and this cycle ends when you have attained Moksha which means something like Liberation of that cycle. It's hard for me to imagine what the rest of the infinite universe is for in this Hindu model if every living being is stuck rebirthing on this one single planet. Just the cosmological matrix this idea is found in, tells you that the Hindu model of Samsara was made by a people ignorant of a universe being big beyond the world. It's similar to the idea of analyzing the zoological matrix the book of Genesis in the bible. Genesis names and mentions only post-ice-age animals, and what animals were named are typical ones that can be found around the Middle East and Levant. So from that you logically conclude that either God was retarded or that it was written by a person only familiar with such animals and environment.

In Theravada Buddhism on the TEXTUAL level of what the Buddha is said to have taught and so on, Samsara is said to be not a cycle of reincarnation, but a cycle of what you do over and over again mindlessly in such a way that you do not realize that samsara to be free from it. An example would be when you take the same streets to work everyday in such a way that you don't even need to Think of where to drive because it's like you are on automatic pilot. There is no Thinking involved, and it's repetitive. This example would only be "samsara" if you actually believe that there is no alternative way to work but the one you take, and you would get emotive and angry if others try to tell you there is another way. That is one form of samsara. The other form of samsara is like when you do something over and over with a group of people in such a way that all people involved are not aware and can't stop. An example would be family and the culture we pass to our next generation. If you were born and raised in a nuclear family, that is the "culture" or mode of living you will pass to your children, and they to their children, and so on. The problem with this interpretation of samsara arises causally. Because what we do generates consequences. And so if we are not aware of what we are doing to even stop, we punish our own selves in a prison of our own actions, unawareness, and ignorance.

But all that rational stuff goes out the window in Asia where Asians have this thing called Culture and ancestral Traditions. Because in such places it is our living cultures and ancestral traditions that effects and influences the Buddhism and not the other way around. Such that, even if the Buddha may have taught there is no soul or reincarnation is not real, and samsara is what you do and not a place you are in, as a people we still believe in the Brahmanical worldview of things. Meaning that as a people, we all still believe in spirits, in reincarnation, in ancestor worship, in animism, and that samsara is a cycle of birth and death.

It can be argued by Westerners and such that such culture and tradition is "anti-Buddhism." And usually a favourite quote the Buddha said is quoted which has the Buddha saying to question your traditions and don't practice things just because your elders did. What is wrong with this quote is that it is completely taken out of its native matrix and context. Who was the Buddha speaking these advice to and why? Not you or I. What the people who love to quote this bit fail to do is read the story in the actually surrounding text this quote was taken from.

The story is that there was a town of people in India who had gone to the Buddha once to ask him a question. The town's people had informed the Buddha that for the past 100 years in their town different leaders and elders had come and gone who left behind all sorts of traditional observances to such an extent that they had lost their original culture and traditions. Not having an ancestral culture and tradition rooted in antiquity like other people, the town's people asked the Buddha for advice in what they should do to correct this wrong. The people wanted only one set of traditions but were not sure of which to chose to live by. And so the Buddha thus advises these town's people to question all of those customs and traditions these elders left behind and work together to weed out the ones they don't like, and practice the ones they collectively agree upon. This was the best way to recreate a culture for their descendents, since these people had lost their original one to outside tampering. In a different instance the Buddha even goes so far as to warn the people he was talking to, to beware of outsiders not a part of their culture and traditions who may seek to impress from the outside onto their culture new observances, rules, and elements. I've never read this story myself though. I just hear my elders tell the story to me.

Every story found in the Tipitaka has a moral lesson beneath it you are supposed to extract. They aren't just empty myths and stories. This was just the best way to teach his audience at the time since your common folk Indian 2500 years ago were illiterate and simple. Pali remember was the common dialect of a common street grade people and it did not have its own writing system. Which is why the Buddha had to rely on chanting and oral transmission. The Pali word Sutta [Sutra in Sankrit] does not mean a book with written pages in it. In Khmer was say this word as "Soud-TOR," read as a Brit would. It means to Chant or to Recite or a Chanting or Recitation of a line or string. In the Sanskrit Sutra means Yarn, String, or Line. In the Pali it goes to mean the chanting of such lines, versus, etc. When monks chant that is actually called a Sutta or Soutor, where you say the monks are "Soutoring" in Pali. The word in the Sanskrit is associated with letters since that language and its speakers or users had an alphabet. The word in the Pali is associated with the vocal chantings of versus since that language and its users did not have an alphabet to use.

Buddhism in the original Pali was meant to be an oral tradition passed down by word of mouth from elder to young. These sayings of the Buddha were originally collected into the Tipitaka first for political reasons since back then many rival schools of Buddhism had their own set of teachings that the Buddha supposedly taught. The winning school at the time put together their Tipitaka and asserted that their collection was the true and honest teachings of the Buddha and other stuff were fakes and corruptions of the "original." The second reason was to be only an aid to memory as a type of body of reference. In total the Tipitaka is 25,000 pages and 40 volumes long. No average Buddhist person or common monk has read the whole thing.

The Tipitaka was not meant to be read and adhered to as "scripture." They were metaphorically named the three baskets for a clever reason. What do you do with baskets back then? You haul loads of earth and raw building material at construction sites. What do you do with raw material at construction sites? You build things with them. So why was the Tri Pitaka named the Three Baskets? Because they contain three loads of Raw Material. What do you do with Raw Material? You Build with it. How do you say Build and Work in Pali and old Sanskrit? Kamma and Karma. So when an elder speaks a versus where Buddha talks about the Dhamma – Natural Phenomenon – of causality, you don't worship or believe in that Raw Material. You use it as raw material to Build your own shit with. To Build onto your life in your own ways by using that raw material. It was intended that as an Upasaka you helps build onto what was given or helped build onto the foundation.

What does Upasaka/Upasika mean? Upa meaning Next To or Near By, or Up To & Asa is a word we still use in Khmer with its old meaning Helpful, Willing To Assist. The Khmer words "Min [not] Jes [know] Asa means To be Lazy. Aka is the male suffix for like the English -ER, and -ika is the female form. Put together you have a word which means "One Who Is Close By and Ready To Assist/Help" an Architect do his work. You literally Help and Assist the Buddha Build his shit. Don't worship him or his words, because that gets nothing done. Help his ass

Build the Buddhism up. Add to it, make something out of it. When you are sitting there doing nothing and your Grandma yells at you and your cousins: "Owy [Give] Asa Mer! [Look! Behold! Hey You!]" She is telling you to get off our lazy asses and Do Something around the house like choirs to help out. In this regard, what the Northerners in China did by building onto Buddhism thus creating Mahayana, and what the Tibetans did by adding onto Buddhism by creating their Vajrayana was the Work of faithful Helpers doing what they are actually supposed to be doing with their Buddhism. Live it, question it, refine it, add to it, build it up further. All that old feuding between Mahayana and Hinayana was dumb sectarian fighting. Being only human, we all want to be right and we all want our version of religion and philosophy or views to also be right. So the old schools of Hinayana got asshurt forgetting the work an Assistant is supposed to be doing.

The Buddha once admonished his followers to question his teachings and test dhamma and that if something he said does not match up to our own inner understandings and convictions, to discard what he said and go with what is inside of us. You are taught to question Buddhism and Doubt its teachings in Buddhism. Following the words of another man does not lead to sambuddhi [self-enlightenment]. You are taught to put whatever dhamma he pointed out to the test in the real world and in life to validate it and take nothing at face value. Believing others words at face value does not lead any body to sambuddhi. You are to question what Samsara is and come to your own conclusions of the Raw Material, and then after coming to our own inner Understandings of it, as Assistants, our Work/Kamma is to Build our own things with such Raw Material, such as our own form/yana and understandings of Buddhism which will help us live better lives and help our Sangha live better. The Way is the Sasana of Sambuddhi, not the way of following a Buddha. At best the character of the Buddha is a guide and a symbol of what we can become. Esoterically the word Buddha means Mind or the part of mind that is Awake which apprehend Dhamma: Natural Phenomena. There is no Buddha but Mind. There is no Dhamma but the World of Human Experience. There is no Buddhi but the Gnosis we each unfold from our own experiences.

If you simply accept and believe another person's interpretation of Samsara, you open yourself to Dukkha or worry or mental anguish. It's not a big deal in the West for us to do so. But in India if you were of the lower caste and you believed in a Hindu version of Samsara where you sincerely believe you will be a worthless low caster for thousands of life times unless you serve those of a higher caste, you really do condemn yourself to a life of servitude. It was a big deal back then. And with the more rational understanding of samsara it is a big deal today. In the recent past in America if you were Black or a Woman and you believed the rhetoric the White Male Government were saying and sincerely believed that because of your skin color or gender that you had no rights to social equality, no rights to vote, and no right to self-determination, it is your own fault for believing and not questioning, and doing something about it. You perpetuate that samsara in your ignorance, and your children are then born inside that samsara. Which is why it is said that you are born and die inside samsara; unless you Liberate yourself, by your own awakening first, and by your own causal actions second.

Q4: Are you and Kayla and Shugz the same people?

A4: How do you know or not know? That's what I'm wondering? Because nowhere in cyberspace has anyone of my friends/family in the WSA ever put up personal information about them. There are no pix, no profiles. The only thing anyone ever sees associated with us are posts and blogs. How are you so full of yourself, so lost in your own greatness and intelligences, that you would tell me you know me and my family simply based on what meager things can be seen on line? How do you read a blog and assume to know the life of another person? That you would Speculate about who is who? What the fuck does it matter to your fucking piece of shit brain who is who or who is not who? I'm not directing this at anybody ONA. There are a few Outsiders that seem to be really prone to making assumptions and Speculations about other people's lives on their websites and in there postings. You know who you piece of shits are: the ones that assume and speculate every ONA person is David Myatt, the ones who assume and Speculate who Anton Long is or isn't and how many of them there are or aren't, the one sitting behind his websites collecting the IP's of ONA people going to your site who assumes and Speculates you know everything about me and Kayla. You know who you are asshole. I'm talking to you, cuz I know you regularly read this blog. What the fuck does it matter too you? It's interesting that you mundanes who assume and Speculate and fabricate theories based on a few writings that you spend your time Speculating about other people, and that those other people don't even fucking think about you. What's that saying that goes: "People who mind other people's lives, don't have a life of their own to mind."

Fuckin quit that stocking shit. Stop fucking searching google for shit on me, Kayla, and Shugz. That shit bugs me. You're not going to find shit, and it's none of your business who I am or Kayla or Shugz are. If we wanted you to know, we'd tell you or make a fucking facebook for your ass. The less you know about us, the less harm you can do.

I'm not reclusive or elusive like maybe someone like DM is. People who know me know exactly where to find me and they know I'm open and approachable. But I am a very Private person. In real life and online. I have a personality glitch where I am obsessed with keeping everything about me a personal secret. Which is why I don't like keeping friends. What I can't stand about keeping friends is that they talk to me, and will try to get to know me by asking questions. I understand they mean well and that's how they operate as a person. They just ask what to them are honest question about my thoughts, my likes, what kind of music I like, etc. I don't like that. I have a personality glitch where I do not like to let anybody know anything about me unless I feel like sharing. Even if it's about what music I listen to. Don't ask me question, because you make me feeling like killing you. The less you know me, the less harm you can do. What's Sun Tzu tell you the first step in war should be? Know your enemy. Spend as much time as needed to collect intelligence about your enemy before ever making a move. I do not want you knowing ANYTHING fucking thing about me. But I will spend my time collecting everything I can about you and your life and personality type to manipulate you and use you.

I've had this glitch since I was small. I'm not introverted and anti-social where I just sit there and not talk to people, but I just have never liked the idea of people knowing me, so I never reveal anything about myself which I don't want to reveal. High school was a big bug for me. I was pissed off all 4 years of it. Because I'd have these friends or meet people who'd ask for my number. And just the simple act of them asking me a question to get my number makes me want to kill them. I do not understand why the fuck you need to ask for my fone number when I spend 8 fucking hours with your fucking ass at fucking school! You have 8 fucking hours to fucking talk to me for fucks sake! Why you gotta call me after school for? What the fuck can possibly be so important that you need to call me cuz it can't wait for the next school day? Your nail broke? You having a bad hair day? I wanna listen to you bitch in my ear for an hour about your girl or boy problems? And fone conversations are stupid. What's the first two question a fone convo starts of with? "Hey, what are doing?" "Hey, where you at?" You telling me you got nothing else better to do but call me to ask me what I'm fucking doing? That's why you want my fucking number for? I keep my cell phone turn off most of the day and I only turn it on at designated times to check my voice mail. You leave a fucking message. If it's important, I'll call your ass back. If not, you won't be hearing from me. Fuck you.

Then these friends will ask me: "Hey you wanna come over and hang out?" WHY?! Where the fuck have you been for 8 fucking hours? Did I not spend 8 fucking hours with your fucking ass at school? What, that wasn't enough? You need 16 hours of me? You telling me I don't have a life? Like I have all 24 hours to hang out with your fucking ass? I don't sleep or something? Is that what you're telling me? I don't have family to be with huh? I don't got shit to do huh? I live to make you happy huh? I'm your slave huh? Is that what you're telling me? I wanna stare at your ass for 8 more hours cuz the first 8 weren't enough huh? Fucking asshole.

During my college years my cousins and close friends and I actually worked real jobs to make spending money. Usually we try to get the same jobs at the same places to be together. For me a "real job" is anything not owned by my family where you get real paycheck. You wanna know slave labour with zero benefits, go work for your family. I've worked for my family most of my life, since I was 7.

My first "real job" ever was when me, Kayla, and my friends got a night job at a Target. It was a fun experience. We were mostly around 18 at the time. I didn't last long though. I thought it was amazing when I got my first real life paycheck. Before my family just gave me cash. We were on the planogram team which was about a group of about 7 people. The store and executives left us to ourselves and never bugged us. Each Monday our team lead got a pile of schematics which are these papers that tells you what aisles need to be redone. So for the whole week we knew what we were supposed to do. All we had to do was organized ourselves and know everything that needs to be done.

So you needed somebody in the stockroom pulling the new merchandize all night, then you needed someone to backstock the stuff we take down. Then you needed at least 4 people to do the tearing down and rebuilding the aisles, then you needs people to take care of all the clearance items.

Kayla liked working in the back room pulling items and backstocking stuff. She climb on the shelves and doesn't use the ladders and she'll throw her boxes from high up down and many times the stuff inside the boxes will break. She also has markers in her pocket and she likes to scribble things on the very tippy top shelves. I liked doing the actual planograms. The structure thing the shelves latches onto is called a "gondola" and amazingly it's all held together by no nails or screws. With some of the gondolas with old parts that didn't hook together, Kayla and our team lead who became our close friend, just used cardboard and ducktape and zipper ties.

This one time during the night an end cap fell because the team that made that godola before us used cheap stuff to put the end cap together. It was missing a T-Bar to keep it stuck to the rest of the godola and we could find a spare. Kayla told us that she knew where a spare was "over there somewhere" she said, and she went to get it. So we fixed that end cap. And then in the morning after the store had opened I was walking to our private planogram back room to get more shelves and as I walked past the back side of the very last gondola I noticed the end cap was leaning forward and was slowly falling on top of me. So I was holding it up and screaming for help because I didn't have a walkie talkie that night. Turns out Kayla went to take the T-bar off that end cap because she figured it was too far in the back of the store for anybody to care, and she used duck tape to stick the end cap to the gondola. Guess you had to be there.

But working there taught me that I really do hate people. The more everybody got to know me at that store, the more they asked me questions about my private life. Then they started to ask me for my number and to hang out! I was thinking to myself: It's like high school all over again, I'm gunna fucking kill myself. But now, these co-workers started to ask me if I wanted to hang out and drink beer with them. Which ticked me off. I just spent 8 hours with your stupid ass at work. Why the hell do I want to spend another 8 hours watching you drink and being stupider? I can barely stand you people sober. You people already barely make any rational sense to me sober. What, I'm a monkey? I get entertained watching you act stupid on beers? Is that what your telling me? The funny thing is I don't drink alcohol and I tell them I don't drink so there is no point in me going. And they tell me: "Oh, you can just come to hang out and look pretty." And do what dummy? Listen to you talk in my ear for another 8 hours drunk? I already put up with your ass talking for 8 hours straight. It isn't like you people are going to be talking about things that interest me.

I just one day stopped going to work because of this. Since then I've never worked a real job. I also have the habit of cutting ties cold turkey with everyone I meet or know who thinks they are my friend because they asked me a question or asked me to hang out with them. I change my fone number once every two months and don't tell anybody but my family and close friends. I put people who want to be friends to the test and ask them do something for me to prove their loyalty and level of honour. If we're going to be friends I fucking use you and you do shit I tell you to do and don't ever question me. Because I will do the same for you. I'll let you use me, do shit you request of me, and I don't ask you questions. Tell me you need a gun, and I'll get it to you next week, don't ask me how I get it, and I don't ask you why you need it. I ask you for an ounce of weed, and you get that shit to me like I asked, and I don't ask you where you get your shit from, and you don't ask me what I'm gunna be doing with that shit. Don't fucking tell me about your life or personal information cuz I don't fucking care, shut the fuck up, and don't asked me about my private life. I love my pet dog to death and he doesn't tell me about his life or bug me with his thoughts and opinions about shit, neither does he care about my thoughts and opinions. I tell you shit about me on a need to know basis, and you do likewise.

My pet dog love me and would die for me, but he and I don't have to fake being friendly, fake a smile, fake being interested in friendship, conversate, talk, text, hang out, whatever. I can stay at another house and not see or talk to him in a month and when I go back to that house, my pet dog will love me and die for me the same. And he doesn't ask me where I have been and who I've been hanging out with. He's just happy I'm back. I have 9 aunts and uncles, and I don't know a single real detail about their private life. I have 30 direct cousins, and I don't know most of their real full names, what girls or guys they date, what their favourite color or flavour of ice cream is. I serious know next to nothing about my own private family. I didn't learn my Great Grampa's real name until I saw it written on his obituary.

In my culture it is wrong and offensive to ask questions about other people's lives and affairs. You don't talk about people, about your thoughts, and opinions with others, and you don't "get to know" your elders and family members by carrying on conversations and asking them questions about their life, interests, and affairs; unless you're peers. What you need to know is on a need to know basis. The only thing you do with a family is live with them, work with them, be there to help them, take care of each other, and die with them. That's the magic word: Peer. Unless we are Equals, or the same age and/or mentality/understanding; or unless we mutually consider each other to be peers, you have no business knowing me or talking to me or asking me questions. If you aren't ONA, and nobody I know knows you, you have no business talking to me and asking who my associates are. Whoever Kayla and Shugz are is my business. If they wanted your ass to know them, they would put in the energy to tell you themselves.

Me and my friends spent may years on Myspace in our past. And from those years of experiencing that cyber environment, we've learned how to handle business in cyberspace. You are seriously asking for unnecessary trouble [dukkha] making profiles on shit like facebook and posting your pix and personal information up. Not trouble with the law, but generic drama. That drama is teenage shit. I went through that phase when I was in my teens on Myspace. I grew out of that. I don't want or need a profile with my info and pix on it as if other people give a shit. I don't give a shit about you, so do me a favour and don't give a shit about me. But some of you grown people – take a look at the number of users on facebook – have not grown out of your stupid teenage years, and teenage need for attention and drama. Grow the fuck up and delete your facebook shit. Your family isn't on facebook, it should be in real life. You know how fucking absurd it is for family members to be interacting with each other more on a facebook than in real life? You know how silly it is to have friends and all you do with them is interact with them on facebook and texting them? What the fuck ever happened to Real Life? You're mundane religions are now internet religions, and your mundane "families," and "friends" are internet based too. And the funny thing is facebook is a product and tool to make money: Capitalism. That is your mundane culture.

I got over my Myspace teenage shit a long time ago. So no, I don't have an internet presence or profile for you to read about me or check out what I look like. Fuck you. Stop googling me because you're not going to find anything beyond this wordpress. Same goes for Kayla. Shugz still has profiles here and there somewhere.

I know a few non-ONA people assume and Speculate that me and Kayla and Shugz must be the same people because our writing style is the same. This is an assumption based on Speculations and a lack of understanding what Myspace "culture" me and my friends picked up 7 years ago. We use joint accounts, use each other's names, etc. To tap into an audience. Even today, I tell certain people in the ONA that if they need to, to just pretend to be me and use my name. If we're peers, I don't care, pretend to be me and sign off whatever with my name, and I will help that Glamour and say it's me. I even tell people openly that not every thing that appears to be written by me was actually written by me.

You ever wonder why some of my essays are 30 pages long? Because of how we do thing on the back end of production here. I draft an essay and leave in as a draft on the other side of this blog for Kayla and Shugz to add their stuff to. I even tell people openly that Shugz does a large amount of writing for the ONA but usually she never puts her name on it, and will use my name. If you want to get a feel for Shugz's natural writing style, you can look along the side here and find a list of some of her posts we brought here under her name. She has a very different recognizable style than Kayla's way of writing. If you want to get a feel for Kayla's natural style, just read the entire first half of Opus Vrilis, and her "Epistles to the Acception." My natural style is I mimic other people's styles. I mimic the way DM and AL write, as well as mimic and mirror the way Shugz and Kayla writes. To access their audience.

The less you know about me and my friends here, the less you can interfere in whatever it is we are doing. How do you ad hominem attack me, Kayla, or Shugz if you know nothing about us? How do you attack, disagree, or debate anything I write here, if the comments are off? You can in your private sites and forum posts perhaps attack what I write there, but I will never know to read it. And I openly tell people about Upaya. Everything I do and write is a means for me to materialize a desired End Result I want. Debating, disagreeing, and deconstructing my writing does not – and has not for the past 3 years – stop my End Results I want from actualizing. You people are fucking stupid, I swear. Retards. You see a moving train and you try to beat it up and stop it from moving because you don't like it. But you never stop to think of blowing up the bridge in front of it to stop it. Fighting a moving train of memes does shit. Take a look around your dumb ass, the ONA, as it is today still exists and is still growing regardless of how much effort you put your stupid ass into try to stop moving trains of memes. Your negative remarks and energy you put in to it only helps push it further. Trust me, we wouldn't be here if it weren't for the group of you asshurt anti-ONA people putting in the energy to talk shit. As long as you are talking about ONA, you help my train move along. Pretending to be the leader of ONA with your own ripoff watered down version of it, doesn't do shit but help ONA move right along. You put in the energy to pretend to be ONA and not some other organization that would actually be a rival.

You can't stop me from doing what I do. Unlike you I know my audience and market. I know to leave very little for you dummies to attack about my person and my friends. Debate and object to what I write all you want. What I write is not the End of what I came to do. It is a Means to give birth to a list of End Results. Go ahead and attack my writings. You can't stop a train of memes flowing between the minds of people by deconstructing what dead letters you see on a screen. You mundanes are absurdly ignorant and superficial. And that ignorance and superficialism makes you incompetent. None of you have been able to stop and kill the ONA from solidifying and growing. Because you're all stupid. Keep talking about ONA, because that is really all a mundane is good for, beside serve as labour force. I hate you mundanes in a very real way. Everything about you as an anariya mundane, how you think, how you live your life, and how you interact with others, makes me sick.

You guys base your self importance/worth on your opinions/thoughts. I base my self worth on the number of people I know who love me, live for me, and are willing to die for me. That's genuine "wealth." I am worth more than you in life. I mean something to many people who would die for me. You mean nothing to nobody who wouldn't even give you a dollar without making you pay them back. All you have are your empty opinions, and incompetent thoughts. And so to maintain that empty self importance or yours, you believe that debating other people's opinions so you end up right is constructive. When in fact it does nothing. Especially nothing to stop a train of memes from inspiring and influencing an end result into being but perpetuate your delusions of self worth. You should have learned this during the Cold War. Getting asshurt and intellectually attacking Communism's ideas never stopped the ideas from manifesting the Soviet Union and their way of life. It only strengthens their group identity. And it's not going to change China either. The fortunate thing is you mundanes are so stupid, you don't know where to apply pressure to stop the manifestation of End Causal Fruit. You mundanes keep doing what you do for me. It makes my job easier.

Q5: What would you say are the most valuable aspects of the ONA?

A5: When I personally say "ONA" I mean the whole spectrum of ideas that is an expression of the Weltanschauung of DM. That includes the ONA proper, Folk Culture, Reichsfolk, and The Numinous Way. I just personally need a single term to refer to the shared essential ideas in all of these things for the sake of thinking. And it's like a spectrum if you look at it the way I see things.

In a "real" spectrum like light for instance, you have a "something" on a fundamental level that wiggles and waves as a common denominator within that spectrum. And how this fundamental "something" wiggles and waves causally becomes picked up by us as a part of that spectrum. So with light you have let's say light waves that wave and wiggle at difference frequencies. And from that wiggling we get the 7 basic colors, with red on top of a rainbow and violet being at the bottom. We can say that all 7 colors as "different" things and be accurate. But we can also say that those 7 colors are expressions of the Same Light wave in different forms and intensities.

All those Myattian stuff I see in the same way. You have in each of those things much of the same ideas and the same essence of his weltanschauung waving and wiggling. On one end of this spectrum is the Primal Pagan wave length. This becomes the ONA proper. That gradually morphs into the Folk Culture wavelength. This becomes the Reichsfolk color. And then the spectrum refines into the Numinous Way. They are all different expressions of a human mind. So for me it's easier to refer to this spectrum as the "ONA." Because the only real difference is the intensity of certain concepts in the spectrum. The concept of culling in the far ONA proper side is intense and so you get a lot of mythos and rhetoric supporting that intensity. But way on the Numinous Way side that concept of culling is weak. Not gone but weak and expressed differently as when DM on this side of the spectrum says that killing causes suffering, but it is our duty to protect our family and loved ones with lethal force if necessary. In the Folk Culture wavelength you see that National Socialism is intensified where all the Aryan rhetoric and mythos is used. Then in the Reichsfolk wavelength you see that concept decrease in force, where you see DM say that maybe the White Aryan thing to too intense, lets make it open to other races to. Then in the far end of the Numinous Way side, you see this concept weakened where DM is seen to say that maybe all that race and folk gibberish is too much, lets make it numinous and say that it is the people such as family and intimate friends within your immediate circle that is important. So all the concepts or memes are still all there within this Myattian Spectrum of Self Expression. It's just that they take on different intensities in that spectrum.

I would say that the most valuable aspects of this Myattian Spectrum from my own trial and error is located in the middle section of this spectrum. Things or concepts that help you construct and/or maintain your culture. That teaches you to focus on your own family, friends, and traditions. Concepts that help your family, friends, tribe, gang, clan, nexion, or whatever solidify into a coherent and cohesive functioning system are the most valuable. It's so much easier to use those aspects of this spectrum when say, talking with my own group of Asian cousins and friends because the concept of pride for one's culture and tradition and all that jazz really does help form us into more bonded group.

Without that solid group structure, the other stuff doesn't happen. Who is going to put ONA proper stuff into practice? Who is going to make clans like the Numinous Way stuff says? What dark is going to be presenced without a group of people to actually do the presencing? People are the common denominator of anything in this human arena. From religion to corporation to nations. Without people, you have nothing. The most valuable aspects of the ONA are first things that can bring people together. Then are the stuff that can help create or maintain group culture. Then the stuff that can introduce new traditions to be practiced. This would then include the mythos, stories, and art, as well as shared rites and rituals which all help coagulate a group of people into a solid working system.

I would consider the Seven Fold Way of the ONA to be one of its most important aspects and its back bone. Because when you get a group of people going through the same Seven Fold Way, and sharing that experience together it manifests a group culture and tradition. We can see the same thing happen in a real way in military boot camps. You put random guys with nothing in common together and make them do arbitrary exercises together for 4 months and 4 months later you end up with a group of people who fiercely share a common culture, military tradition, mindset, and they are ready to kill and die for each other. It's a bit genius if you genius if you think about it. It's easier to see with Islam. We can say that the back bone of Islam are the five pillars. Anybody anywhere in the world who honestly applies the Five Pillars in life, ends up sharing a common identity, common culture, and common set of traditions. Doesn't matter what your color is, how smart or dumb you are, what nationality you are, or what language you life. Just simply living out those Five Pillars manifests the culture. Then that cultural praxis is attached to the Qur'an which gives that culture a common worldview. This doesn't mean that everyone is the same. A Bedouin Muslim and a Cham Muslim have nothing in common with each other except their shared Five Pillars and Quranic views. Otherwise each retains their own unique cultures, ancestral identity, and folk customs. Cham by the way are an ethic minority of Indochina who are all Muslim.

Something like the Seven Fold Way, the Five Core Principles, and the Code of Sinister Honour will, if put into practice by a group of people, in Time will materialize a shared culture and tradition. And this culture is then attached to its set of views and ideas. Then you have the necessary rhetorical ingredients to further help make this fledgling culture into a more coherent one with all of the honour and pride for one's people talk. These are all rhetorical devices: memes. But it's not the memes in themselves that should distract you. It's what those memes can manifest, and ultimately what fruits they do bare that holds the value and is to be judged. Whether a meme or ideation is true or false, mythic or factual, materialistic or spiritual has very little to do with the power they have to actualize something in the real world. Shooting down and killing an idea because you don't like the way it sounds, or a myth because it not real, reduces your chances of materializing anything real. For instance, as real as Christians and secularists believe their theories of creationism and evolution to be real, factual, and true, what things measurable in the real world of human experience have those two supposedly very real and factual things actualized, besides the belief of it? But yet a simply myth of Jesus, and simple poetry in classical Arabic about Allah have inspired into being entire empires. And we cannot attack these past civilizations for being barbaric and grotesque, because in reality, we would not have come this far without them. Without the science the golden age of Islam produced, and without the exploration of new worlds European empires did, would something like America even be here today?

There is a single word for all of this in Buddhism: Upaya. The easiest way to explain upaya is with the classic example of a baby crying. You have a baby who is crying and you desire to stop her from crying. So you close your fist and tell the baby you have candy in your hand. The baby stops crying.

A religious moralist will look at that and say: "That's not right, there is nothing in the hand! That's lying! Shame on you." An intellectual moralist will look at that and say: "That is a logical fallacy! It is an untrue statement of no factual foundation! The hand is scientifically empty according every law of physics I know. There is no candy in the hand according Webster's definition of candy!" The pragmatic minded will say: "The baby has stopped crying. Therefore it is a Useful Means."

Is life really divided into 7 grades? No. Is the Cosmos really in the shape of a tree with 7 balls on it like the Tree of Wyrd? I don't think so. Are there 21 dark beings with arms and legs in space somewhere we call the dark gods? Not likely. Did the Buddha ever exist? No, there is no archeological evidence and the Pali he was said to have spoken does not match up with the time he was said to have lived. Pali as a language was already dead and had broken into vernacular dialects during the period he was said to have lived. Is Jesus real? Not likely, his life sounds too much a ripoff of the life of Mithras, Horus, and Bacchus. Are White people or Asians or whatever "supreme" and better than others? I doubt it. But these are all Useful Means, which can be – and have been – used to actualize an end objective. We learn to judge the value of the methodology used by the Fruit such methodology bares. Those religious and intellectual moralists will get their dicks serious tied up in a knot over the 'memetic' constituency and moral quality of the methodology, never understanding to wait to see its fruit.

That's like a farmer with an ax cutting down a fruit tree. You ask the farmer why he is cutting that tree down and he says: "Because I don't agree with it and it's not scientifically a tree, it's a shrubbery." Then you ask: "But have you tasted its fruit yet?" And the farmer says he has not, and passes a moral judgment on the tree by saying: "What is not spiritually true or scientifically true is bad. Therefore this bad tree will make bad fruit." There is no room in a concept like Pathei-Mathos or the Theravada concept of Vibhajjavada for such moralistic intercession. Because if out of moral judgment and valuation you cut that tree down, you prevent yourself from tasting that fruit. How do you come to a genuine gnosis or realization or understanding [buddhi] of something without the experience?

I understand that there are mythical parts to the ONA, that there are rhetorical parts to it, that there are aspects to it that are unfounded scientifically and mathematically, I understand that there are aspects of ONA that are objectionable to 2 billion Christian moralists, 1 billion Muslim moralists, 1 billion secular moralists, tens of thousands of anally retentive intellectual moralists. I'm not retarded. I am smart enough to save my judgment until after I have planted the seed, watered the seedling, pruned my tree, nurture it, and tasted it's fruit. Then after I tasted that fruit do I make my mind up if I like it or not.

Actually we had an incident like thing in my grandma's back yard. 15 years ago one of my aunts ate a grapefruit that she really liked because it was sweet, so she took a seed from it and planted it in my grandma's back yard. It's a huge tree now, but my aunt was complaining to me one day it's been 15 years and the tree is so big now, but it has never made a fruit or flowered. I said that maybe it was a boy tree and just did not give birth to fruit? She told me that all trees make fruit according to what she has seen. Then she said she's going to tell her son [my older cousins] – who lives there with her – to cut the tree down. My grandma walks by and asks not to hurt the tree. She said it was in nobody's way and has done nothing wrong for it to be killed. Grandma told us to be patient because the tree is one of those shy ones that needs time to make fruit. When it has given fruit and we eat them, then we can say if it is a rotten tree or a nice tree. So my aunt agreed. My grandma is an animist and believes every living thing has a spirit. So every day when she waters the grapefruit tree she talks to the tree and says: "You're a stubborn tree missy. That big and still shy. They're going to cut you down if you don't show them you can have fruit. I've done all I could. You need to do the rest and show them." A year later the tree had its first batch of flowers ever, and then it grew 6 whole fruit. But the 6 grapefruit tasted very good, so my aunt judged the tree to be of value or good and she decided to keep it. The other aunts were laughing at the tree because they thought it was funny that the tree took 16 years to grow 6 grapefruits.

These various things we have in the ONA are like seeds all wrapped up in a single package we call the ONA. Some of these seeds as they are might not look nice now, and we might prematurely judge them for what quality we think they have. But those seeds were meant to be planted and cultivated that each will bare fruit. If we understand what Pathei-Mathos is and we each genuinely desire to evolve from our own experiences and understandings of things, then we need to learn to withhold our judgment, apply all these ONA stuff in our lives, and then judge the end result or fruit each seed aspect of the ONA bares. It's easy to take the ONA as a bulk of seed ideas and critique it and deconstruct it intellectually to somehow pass judgment on the value of the ideas read. It's hard to put in the Time to apply those ideas as a living praxis in life in such a way that they bare results, then to judge those results. In other words critiquing a cook book's set of ingredients of dishes does very little and is not intelligent, even if you believe such behaviour to be smart. You cook the dished first and taste them, then you can intelligently determine if the cook book is worth anything or not. It's not how science works either. You experiment to prove a hypothesis, then from the experimentation you gain your insights. Prove the ONA to be useless or useful by what fruits it bares in your application and experimentation of it. Don't judge the hypothesis.

Q6: What is Satanism to you and how do you understand it?

A6: Satanism to me is exactly like a foreign dictionary I would carry. I am inside a population of people I want to communicate with who speak a different language. I formulate what I want to say in my Buddhist mind. Then I flip through my Satanic vocabulary and idiom dictionary and proceed to speak my Buddhist thoughts in a way such foreigners will understand. I'll demonstrate.

When I speak to a faithful Buddhist I express the Buddha as a person that once lived 2500 years ago. When I speak with an esoteric or mystical or Mahayana Buddhist I express Buddha as Mind. Buddhi means to intuitively understand, and Buddha means to be awake from a sleep and to know or understand something. The Mind is the faculty that does these things. The luxurious palace Buddha was born and raised in is our childhood. The world outside that palace is the real world we will each experience "out there" when we are grown up. To a Satanist I would express this Buddha as the faculty of our awareness. We "Know" something when we become consciously Aware of the something. Experiencing that something develops in that mind/awareness an Understanding.

When I speak to a religious Buddhist I speak about dhamma to make it sound like the teachings of the Buddha. When I speak with a more elevated minded Buddhist I express dhamma as Natural Phenomena. When we apply Vibhajjavada [direct experience] to that body of natural phenomena we gain an Understanding of our world/reality. If I speak to a Satanist I also express dhamma as the corpus of natural phenomena we experience in the world of human experience.

In my mind this thing we call "Buddhism" and "Satanism" are exoteric and superficial trappings. It is the essence of thought beneath the superficialism and forms that such forms are put together as an upaya to convey. I personally don't get caught up over the superficial forms. I'm actually only a "Buddhist" in English. There is no such word as "Buddh-ism or Buddh-ist" in Khmer. We don't call ourselves that. That is an exonym. Neither the Buddha or those Buddhists in Asia speak or spoke English.

In Khmer the Way of the Buddha is called Preahputsasana or Sasana Preahput [Prihboot]. In Thai it is Prahputasasana. Preah/Prih/Prah means something like Reverend, Worshipful, Honourable, Sacred, Divine, something or someone imbued with the Numen which is a sacred presence. Put or putgotam is Buddha-Gotama. Sasana means a set of instructions or a method of doing stuff, it should not be translated to mean a "religion," but there is no single word in English to translate sasana into so religion is often used. If someone is curious and wants to know what your sasana is they ask you: "What sasana do you go into?" And because of how the language is set up with no word for "is" and not "-ist" suffix, there is only one way to answer that question: "I go into the sasana of preahput." There is no way in the language to say: "I am a Buddhist." You as a person and the sasana of Buddha in Khmer and Thai are kept psychologically apart as two separate phenomena. Whereas in English the language makes it sound as if you and Buddhism are the same thing. This produces a mild state of psychosis where you believe that you have your existence because of a set of beliefs.

"Go into" is an old tribal idiomatic expression. If the men form a hunting group to go hunting and you say: "Wait up! I want to go too," and you GO INTO their group, what will you end up doing? You end up Doing whatever it is they do. In this case hunt. If in your tribe the warriors gather into a group to war with the neighbor tribe and you say: "Wait up! I want to go too," and you GO INTO their group, what will you be doing? Whatever warriors do. Which in this case implies then that you will be following the instructions of your group leader and behaving like a warrior. If a group of people gather to form an exploring group to hike around the area and gather intelligence of the topography, and you say: "Wait Up! I want to go too," and you GO INTO their expedition group, what will you be doing? Whatever explorers do. In all cases GO INTO implies a DOING or a Behaving, or Action as others in a group do, act, and behave. It does not suggest a belief, or a set of morals. You don't believe in hunting, you do it. You don't believe in exploring and it's not a religion. You do it. Sasana is means Instruction, Order, Command of an officer to a subordinate. When as an assistant apprentice carpenter your master orders you to sand down wood, put it together into a table, then oil it, that set of instructions your master gave you is a Sasana. You follow it or do it. Believing and agreeing or debating with your master does not do not build the table.

Nobody who is a Buddhist in my family thinks the same thoughts and has the same beliefs, but we DO the same things. That is a Sasana. When as a pupil your master teaches you the forms, moves, and katas of your martial arts that is a sasana, you follow it and do it. When your lieutenant in an army give you an Order that is a sasana, you do it. It's not a religion. You don't worship or "believe in," your lieutenant's orders as the prophetic words of God and make a religion out of it. It's in the Western mind and their paradigm that the words of authority are made into religions to worship. "Go Into" a group of people who follow the instructions of Buddha, does not in its original languages imply that you worship the Buddha or worship his words as infallible prophetic utterances of God. No more than the instructions and command of your martial arts instructor are infallible and sacred. Your kung fu instructor may have demonstrated his abilities to you, and in seeing his abilities you may have desired to learn his style. So you understand in your heart that this instructor has something you do not which you wish to learn. Therefore you chose willingly to follow his instructions. The instructions are not the end in and of themselves. They are a means to give you the end fruit, which is the culture of the style. There is no moralistic belief system founded by an infallible mouthpiece of God implied anywhere. Sasana is not a "religion" if we understand religion to be an ideological system of infallible beliefs, philosophies, doctrines, thoughts, and ideas.

As a person living inside the West, I am surrounded by Christians and what we in ONA call Magian Ethos. In this setting Satanism has its uses for me. It's a tool first. It causes my mind to stop and question the ideas and memes of these Christians and Magians such as their beliefs, ways of life, and morals. That way I can actually preserve my own indigenous culture, way of life, and sasana. But even this is "Buddhist" practice, because the Buddha does instruct you to be careful in mixed company because outsiders to your own culture and tradition seek to impress upon your culture their outside observances [traditions, customs, rites]; which in turn will cause you to lose your culture and identity, which then in turn causes you dukkha and makes you subservient or under the control of those outsiders and their observances. I use every tool and force I got to preserve my own self-sovereignty and ancestral ways from outside Christian and Magian tampering. I'll support crime, gangs, and murder and encourage it if and when I need to to protect my self-sovereignty and ancestral ways from Christians and Magian Ethos. I have every right to. Because if I don't, we end up with dukkha like Tibetans under Chinese rule. I might not personally kill a Christian or Magian, but I will if I would ever need to manipulate others to kill you.

Secondly Satanism in the Western Magian matrix is a way of life, a way of Doing. You do and live counter to how the mundane/anariya live and do things. If the mundanes live in nuclear families, you do the opposite. If the mundanes are dishonourable scoundrels you be the opposite to that. I once asked a mentor how you become above average in life. This person said: "If you are raised by average parents, go to average schools, learn average things, and follow the advice and example of average people in life, what will you end up being?" I said Average. And this person say: "That's right. Pull yourself out of that equation, and if you are not mentally handicapped, you'll not be average." Just replace the word Average with Mundane or Magian, and you'll understand the gist of how I understand the word Satanism. Satan means antagonist, opposite, or against; and -ism means a Act or Deed that is to be done. As a "Satanist" you live and do the opposite of what those mundanes do. You are against their way of life and beliefs of they impose it or seek to impress in on you.

Lastly Satanism is to me a down to earth and honest way of grasping reality/nature and our own human nature. It's not spiritually goofy where you believe the world is made of sugar and butterflies. It teaches you to be brutally honest with yourself at least. The world and nature is not a pretty place. It teaches you to grasp Natural Phenomena as it is, and not as you really, really wish it was. You'll never genuinely Understand what or who you are, if you never learn to understand the nature of Nature. Because we are a living part of that Nature. Like our liver is a living part of us. You fool nobody but your own self with self-deception and delusion. Self-deception and losing oneself in one's own delusions has never "enlightened" anyone. Satanism helps me keep my Buddhism brutally honest. Since there are a lot of retarded Buddhists out there who are spiritually inclined in nature.

Like any tool, Satanism – and any ism – is only as good and useful as the Person wielding the tool. If you give a stick to a hiker, he'll use it as a hiking stick. Give that same stick to an old man and he'll use it as a can to help him walk. Give that stick to a man who can't control his anger, and he will use it to beat his children with. The stick itself being unalive and inanimate does none of these things. The people behind the stick does the expressing.

If you give Satanism to a spiritual retard who has read one to many Sitchin and Von Daniken books, you will get a Satanists who believes that Satan is an alien. Give Satanism to an atheist-materialist and his Satanism will be different. It's not the Satanism doing the expressing, it's the people behind the Satanism. Spiritually inclined people will be spiritual no matter what religion or tool they are wielding. Religiously prone people will venerate and be subservient emotionally and mentally to even splotches on a tortilla.

I think rationalism or reason may be a traveling buddy of IQ? I only say this because of what I have seen. In any given city or group of people most the IQ thing will look like a baseball diamond. The fat middle part is where the majority of the population is. It tapers down to the extremely retarded. And it tapers up to the extremely genius. The further you go down or up, the few peers you will have. From what I have seen, the lower people are in this diamond the less rational they are. People in the fat average section have simple average levels of reason. Then the higher you go up the diamond, the more incredibly – and fewer – rational and reasonable the people become. Which is why I cannot ever get myself to accept egalitarianism. Not all 7 billion of us fit in the top point of this diamond. Some of you are really far down in the diamond. Regardless of whether those at the top region of this diamond have a religion or not, they are going to be very rational and very smart. And so whatever religion they get into will be used differently by those with a lower IQ and lower state of rationalism. I'm not saying that every Satanist comes from the top region of this diamond. But those that do use their Satanism in a very intelligent and rational manner. The Satanism then just helps them understand stuff in a brutally honest way. I've seen plenty of people smarter than me use their Satanism very skillfully.

Q7: I've been stocking you on the internet looking for any information I can find on your private life. Can you please tell my creepy ass more about yourself?

A7: My favourite color is magenta. I also really like Magenta from the Rocky Horror Picture Show, which is a favourite movie of mine. I have a blue Lexus that is paid off. I have a pet baby bull frog named Pickles and a pet blue lobster named Edward Scissorhand. I love sheep dogs. I've had lots of pet dogs since I was small. My first dog was a black and white sheep dog named Viking. I don't know what kind of sheep dog he was though since we get our dogs from friends who don't know either. I can't remember what happened to Viking.

Then I had a beautiful white and grey husky-wolf mix with two eye colors named Two Tone. That was proly the coolest looking dog we had. I was in the grade school still. Some Black guy gave him to us because he was moving and couldn't take Two Tone. I had a pet tarantula at the time who was really boring so I fed him to Two Tone. We gave Two Tone away to an uncle of mine because he really liked two Tone.

My most favourite dog I had was a sheep dog that looked just like the one I had from way back when I was very little. He was a stray dog who we just let stay with us. I named him Yoda. He was a real nice dog. But he had a gross habit. He likes sneaking out of the yard and he rolls himself on the poo of other dogs. Yoda would come home covered in crap. He got run over after I had him for 3 years. He was almost home right by the side walk. I cried my ass off when I heard he got run over. Poor Yoda. I currently have a pet dog named Paddington because he looks like Paddington bear. I don't know what he is. He's either a sheep dog or a terrier. I'm not a zoologist. My cousin raises him now. I'm too lazy to actually take care of my animals. Yoda was cool because he took care of himself.

I like to kill things. Ever since I was small. My family drop me off with other cousins during the summer at our uncle's property in Arizona who is Shugz parents. It's a suburb of Tucson. The back yard of the house is a open green desert. It's a beautiful green desert with all these cacti.

There are these types of lizards the size of your hand called Horny Toads that run around the desert eating ants. It's like a frog and flicks its tongue out at the ants to suck them up. Me and my cousins use to catch them and kill them. Most of the time we threw them at the cacti to impale them. I get crafty with killing them. I liked to tie their arms and legs up and drop big rocks on them. Or I get even craftier and tie them up with kite string, tie a rock next to them and on the other end of the string I'll tie another rock. Then I toss the rocks up to the telephone wire that was low and let them hang there. My uncle found a safe snake once which he let us keep as a pet, and the next day I talked my boy cousins who liked the snake into letting me skin it. Lynzie [Shugz] ran to get a knife, and we stretched out the snake and I cut its throat and head off. It was wriggling for many minutes on the ground. Then I ran the blade of the knife down its belly and peeled the skin off.

My uncle in Arizona also used to take us out hunting with his Vietnamese friend and his daughter our age name Ngoc [means "jade"]. I was around 9 when I started going hunting with Lynzie's dad and Ngoc's dad. We drive way out out the city into these vast empty fields and park the car somewhere on the side of the dirt road and hiked around the desert for jack rabbits. They are huge rabbit with very tall ears. Fat ticks live in their ears the size of small prunes. I think 2 feet tall when they sit there, and their ear is at least about a foot tall, or something like that. My uncle and Ngoc's dad let us take turns shooting the jack rabbits after they taught us how to use the rifle. They had a .22 which was safe for kids to use because it didn't kick hard. We use to practice shooting at cans and bottles we found. My uncle taught me how to kneel on one knee, rest my left elbow on the other knee to keep the rifle steady, and aim by looking at that prong thing at the tip of the rifle with one eye and get that prong thing right on what you want to shoot at. Then when you pull the trigger you have to relax your shoulder and move back with the rifle when it kicks or you can hurt yourself. I love the smell of smoking gun powder and the little click sound the chamber makes when it throws that end half of the bullet out. Then after hiking and practice we eat a snack Vietnamese style which was French bread dipped in cold sweet coffee.

I was – and still am – the curious and inquisitive type. I wondered how a bullet worked after I first saw my uncle shot one off. So I opened a box of bullets and took one, then threw it at a wall as I stood safe behind a tree covering my ears. When I saw that it didn't explode, I took the bullet and used my teeth to wiggle the top half off to see what was inside. Black powder came out. My boy cousins said to set it on fire and they ran to get matches. When we learned that fire makes it explode we had the idea of taking newspaper and take to make firecrackers. So we bit the heads off all these bullets and rolled the powder in newspaper, and we twisted one long end of our firecrackers which we set on fire. They didn't work until one of the older cousins figured out you need to twist a thin strip of newspaper with lines of powder in it so the fire and run down the thin strip. After we learned how to make good ones that worked. I made these tightly rolled up ones that were small and I shoved them up the asses and mouths of Horny Toads I caught and blew the lizards up. It was the coolest thing I saw.

There was this one time when we were watching some cowboy movie where some guy got hanged by a rope and one of the boy cousins asked our uncle how you make one of those ropes. So our uncle took some string and said he'd show us how to make a simple and safer one called a "snare," which he and his siblings used to hunt for small animals. You just make a loop and tie one end loosely to the rest of the string. After that we learned to make snares out of clear fishing line. We took chopsticks and ties our snares to the top and hammered them into the ground in the back yard. We also took shoeracks and hung snares from the racks. Then we scattered rice and bread around our traps. We ended up catching doves that way to cook and eat. We caught other birds like garbage birds and pigeons which we didn't eat since uncle said they weren't good for eating. So we'd clip their wings and make our firecrackers, stuff them down the bird throat and blew their head off. Our uncle said we were very clever. It was fun.

Back then when I was 9 I invented one thing all by myself, which I am still proud of to this day. Our uncle had taken us to a flea market to look for hunting rifles to buy. At the flea market I saw a guy selling long thin tubes which he was blowing darts out of. Uncle explained to us that they were called blowguns and shot out sharp darts to hunt small animals like birds. The darts were long needles with a little plastic ball at the end. I was smart enough back then to ask the seller guy why the darts know how to fly always with the point in front and did not twirl around. He explained to me so I can understand that the needle needs a tail of some kind like a kite so the wind keeps it moving straight.

So taking what I saw and learned I cut a smooth cover of a magazine, then I took a normal lead pencil and used the pencil to roll the magazine cover into a tube. But not tight where the pencil is stuck in there. Just loose enough so the pencil falls out. Then I taped the tube up and took a red marker to mark the mouth part where I would put the dart into and blow. Then I bit off the little metal part at the top of the pencil that holds the rubber eraser off. You throw the wooden pencil away and keep the metal and eraser part. Then I took a long sewing needle from my aunt's kit and standing the needle on a table I pushed the needle into the eraser so it came out in the middle of the eraser. But you have to do this with the eraser part up and the metal and its opening down. Then I ran around outside for used cigarette butts and removed the paper from them. The butts have one end that is burned and stuck together. I put that end into the opening of the metal part of my dart and then I ripped the end of the cigarette butt into half, then in half again long ways so you end up with 8 or so tails. I shoved my dart in the mouth piece and ran to the back yard to test it out on a cactus and it worked!

I showed my uncle what I had made. He tested it out and was very proud of me for being clever enough to make one. But he said that it worked so well it was a very dangerous weapon that can pop someones eye out. The other cousins wanted their own. So our uncle made us promise to never point it at anybody, never to touch on the blowgun, and never to shoot the dart into the sky and look up or our eyes will pop. My home made blowguns actually killed lizards, but not birds or cats or dogs. The needle was too thin. We tried. I watched PBS one evening with my uncle and the cousins when a nature show showed us about Indian tribes in the Amazon jungle. I saw them hunting with bows and arrows, and they were making poison tipped arrows. I saw them take all these plants and boil them into something black looking and dipped their arrows in it. Me and my two older cousins when we saw that slowly looked at each other.

The next day we got an empty tin can and went threw the back yard to find all sorts of leaves and cactus and roots to boil into into poison to make our darts poisonous. Fortunately our poison never worked because we didn't know what a poisonous plant looked like. Our uncle came out side the second day and saw us boiling stuff in the back yard and asked what we we doing. The cousins pointed at me and said it was my idea. They told our uncle when they were pointing at me: "She told us to make poison for our darts so we can kill the neighbor's dogs, the horses down the street and hide in the bushes and shoot people's faces in cars with!" So I said we were only making poison like the Indians to make our darts poisonous only to hunt big animals that's all, but none of the plants seem to be poisonous. Then I asked him if he can show us what a poisonous plant looked like. My uncles said back something like: "No way! My god Diapers [my nick name]. Why can't you and your sisters [other girl cousins] play with dolls like the neighbor's girls? Killing people is against the law Diapers! They take you to jail forever for that! No more nature shows for you!" We weren't allow to make blowguns or boil plants after that.

We went out hiking and hunting a lot. I shot my first jack rabbit when I was 9. He was sitting there far from me, and I pulled the trigger and he fell over and screamed. My uncle calls out to his dog: "Go get him Hunter, go get him boy!" But the dog was stupid and never moved. So we had to go get the rabbit ourselves. I remember that first one I killed I shot in the stomach and his guts were sticking out and it smelled bad. He was still alive and crying which sounded like a baby crying. Lynzie and Ngoc they started to cry and felt very bad for him, but I was just watching. Ngoc's dad picked up a big stick and said it wasn't dead yet and handed me the stick and told me to beat its head hard until it died. So I took the big stick and beat the rabbit many times as hard as I could and killed it. He was laughing hard and clapping his hands cheering me on. I remember as inside that the more I beat it, the more something inside made me like to beat it more. My uncle skinned it and we went home and grilled it. We make a sauce which I always use with my meat with fish sauce and lime juice. You mix it until its sour, but still has the salty taste and flavour of the fish sauce. Grilled wild rabbit is the best meat you'll ever taste. It is white meat and looks and tastes a lot like chicken. You dip the meat in the sauce. We just call it "Dip Sauce" in English since there is no name for it. I love rabbit meat.

Ngoc's dad had this big yard also but it leads into a little hill where he has a large over turned cage made of chicken coop wire. His yard gets a lot of doves since he has the habit of feeding them rice. He usually calls Lynzie's dad and us over to trap doves and eat with him. So what they do is prop up the big cage with a stick which is connected to a string and Ngoc's dad scatters rice on the ground and we go wait and hide behind this camouflage hiding place he makes. He use to let us take turns pulling the string when there were many doves under the cage. When you pull the string you trap at least a hundred of them.

There is a "door" on the top of the cage where you fit a small person inside. It was too small to fit the grown ups so usually two of us would have to go into the cage to kill all of the doves. Ngoc and Lynzie never went into the cage. So it was always me and my older boy cousins that went into the cage with the doves. My uncle taught me how to kill birds by handing him one, and he crouched down next to me and told me to watch. He twisted its neck real fast and it was dead. And he says to me when I was still 9: "Snap the neck hard to break it. That kills birds and people. You snap and break the neck of a person like the birds neck and he will die. But killing people is illegal!"

But seeing it done is easier than doing it. My boy cousins were good at it. They just snapped their necks one after another and handed them to the guys waiting outside. For my first few times I tried to hold the dove's body and twisted its head like you were wringing a towel, and it was still alive! You can feel the doves have this sack in their neck where they keep the rice and seeds they eat. But I eventually learned how to break their necks. So I used to go into the cage often and with my older cousins we'd have contest to see who can kill faster and more birds. You have to place your thumb pressed on their neck bone and when you twist your wrist you pull the neck from the body and push down on the neck bone with your thumb. Dove meat taste great too. They don't actually taste like chicken. They taste like quail meat. You fry it or grill it. Then dip it in the Fish sauce and lime dip sauce.

When we eat Lynzie's dad and Ngoc's dad like to talk about their past experiences during the Khmer Rouge revolution and the Vietnam war. Ngoc's dad said that during his war he was in his teens and the Viet Cong came and drafted him and all the boys in his village. So Ngoc's dad while we ate dove meat or were to hiking used to share stories with us about how he killed people as a Viet Cong and he'd teach us different ways to kill a person.

He told us a story once when his group of teenagers had caught some of what he called the "Bad Vietnamese" and an American soldier. Ngoc's dad said him and his friends dug a hole in the ground the size of a person to fit 3 people. They went to tie the American up with his arms behind his back and two of the bad Vietnamese. He took rope and demonstrated on us how he tied them up. He straps the rope tight above the elbows so you can't untie it. He said that after the hole was dug, they put the three bad guys standing up in the hole so their head is in a triangle shape and fill the hole up. Then they collected fire wood and put a pot of uncooked rice on their head and made a fire and cooked their lunch using the bad guys's heads like stones to hold up the pot. Ngoc's dad told us that they scream and he screamed like them for us to hear. And he told us their faces burned and smelled like cooking meat. He used to tell us that killing people in war was like hunt rabbits. You have to kill the bad people, or they kill you. You just shoot your rifle at them like shooting at rabbits, and sometimes they scream like rabbits. They die and you go kill more. I asked him once if it was scary to kill people. He said that the first time it's scary like I how got scared to see a rabbit die. Second time not so scary. Third time, okay. Then he says: "Fourth time it's fun like a game you know. Don't be scared of people to see them die. Killing people is natural. Only people who never kill people say it's bad and scary. It's scary in their feeling you know? Inside their head. But in the real life, it's no feeling or scary. Like you kill the doves."

Those were fun times from my childhood. I used to love going down to uncle's house for the summer. Uncle and his friends were outdoors people so they kept us busy and active outside. They liked to go camping in the middle of nowhere by small lakes to fish, frogs, catch crawdads, and find duck eggs or wild bird eggs. I wouldn't go out and cook wild frogs. You have to cook them right or you get worms. I remember this one time we went camping by a lake with pine trees. My little mom and stepdad were camping with us, Lynzie's parents, and Ngoc's parents. I think I was 13 or something. There were these big fish in the lake and some body threw bread in the water to feed them and they all came to bite on the bread right up to the shore of the lake. So the guys told us to keep throwing bread in to call them to the shore. And the dads got big sticks and just pounded the whole lot of them dead. We caught over 20 fish doing that that day and cooked some and walked around giving the rest to everybody else camping near us, since the dads got too happy and killed too many fish.

At the lake at night you walk around the shallow part of the lake to hunt for crawdads. I love the taste of crawdad. They're like little lobsters about 4 inches long or something. You catch them with your hand skillfully or they bite you with their claws. My step dad taught me how to catch them. You make your hand flat and slowly creep up on them, then quickly put your flat hand on top of them like you were going to swat a fly. You have to press down on them and their claws so they have no room to move or they clip you. Then you scrunch your hand and pick them up and throw them in the bucket. I tried it and the first many times they bite you, and that shit hurts. But after you feel the pain and you know it's not that hugely bad, then that's when you aren't really scared any more. So I kept practicing and learning the right way to swat them and pick them up from trial and error, until I got very good at it. You need a partner. One does the catching and the other holds a bucket and a flashlight. I got really good at it where I can stick my hand right into their cave they lived in under the rocks and swat them in their cave and pull them out without getting clipped. It's easy to cook them. You throw them in the camp fire around the edge where there is white ash and you pull them out when they are red. Then you break them in half, pull out the meat in their tail and dip it in that Fish sauce and lime juice. Fresh cooked crawdads are the best. In one night you can catch a hundred or, if you have a lot of people and you walk around the lake.

So that's my tom boy childhood. I didn't grow up with my face plastered to a computer or even a TV. My family actually invested their time into keeping us active and busy outside in Nature, killing things, camping, hiking, and stuff. I still love outdoorsy stuff.

When I got older my step dad made friends with a trucker from the east side of America who took his wife and son along with him. They were like chubby hillbillies, but very nice cool people. But this trucker family said that they come out here to our parts often and when they stay out here they usually have this family hobby of taking metal detectors and hunt for gold out in the lakes near Las Vegas Nevada. My step dad said he wanted to learn to do this, and his new friends said next time they were down they'd take him and his family along. So they traded phone numbers. And the next week we did go treasure hunt!

It was fucking hot. It's not at the lake, but a place near the big lake with all these red rocks. That one hillbilly kid – his name was Junior – shared his metal detector with me and took me out to his "sweet spots" where he found the most gold nuggets at. It was so boring. I got very excited after a while because I saw a tortoise the size of a shoe box. It was the first tortoise I ever saw in the wild. I showed my friend Junior the animal and told him to go and smash its head with his metal detector so we can see what he tastes like. That's when I learned that White people weren't as "explorative" as Asians and Viet Congs were. Me and Junior did find anything the first day, but the other teams did. My little mom and her partner Junior's mom found a real gold nugget the size of a raisin! Which got us excited. The next day me and Junior found a real gold nugget the size of a small pearl, like 5-6 karats big. He let me keep it. It's a fun hobby that actually can pay you back for your time, but it can't make you rich.

Back then if I watched TV, it was what my uncle dad watched which was nature shows. I was raised most of my childhood on Sesame Street, before it went all politically correct. My favourite characters from Sesame Street was Mumford the Magician whose magic words was "Ala peanut butter sandwich!" and then those weird squid aliens things that goes: "Yip yip yip yip yip!" Then I used to love watching the reruns of the Voyage of the Mimi on PBS. The theme song to that show is one of my favourite instrumental tunes. My uncle dad never let us watch cartoons or Nickelodeon because he said those things weren't educational and useless. I grew up watching Star Trek the next Generation or reruns of it since my uncle-dad really likes that show. Otherwise we were all kept busy and away from TV. Thinking about it now, keeping your young children away from TV is probably the best thing you can do for them.

Later during my college years I was in my brain phase so I was reading about different subjects on the brain. I stumbled upon a book that talks about an experiment they did with rats. They raised rats related to each other in two different groups. One group was raised in a small normal terrarium with a wheel they can run in. The other group was raised and lived in a very big cage with natural-like surroundings and many things for them to play with, and each week their care taker gave them new things to play with and use. Both groups were fed the same diet. They raised these rats for several years and then studied their brains. It was discovered that the rats in the boring cage had less brain mass then a control group of natural rats, and the rats in the large cage who were kept busy with new things had more brain mass then the control group and a substantial amount more then the first group. It turns out that your environment and how you are raised and live, and what you are exposed to influences your synaptic connections/network and your brain mass.

It's true. An active life and environment does make your brain work better. I might not have been able to spell right or do my math right when I was in my pre-teens, but my brain was working. In my uncle's neighborhood in Arizona the community there had a community yard sale together a week out of a summer month. The whole street around our block was out with all sorts of things in there yard. Me, my cousins, and the neighbor girls the "J's" would used to walk around the block looking for toys and dolls and little knickknacks and the neighbor people would just let us have things for free. The neighbor's girls were my summer friends. They're collectively called the J's because their parents named them Jenny, Jessy, and Jacky. My best summer friends was Jenny, and Jessy and Lynzie were best friends because they actually have the same name, but our family calls her Lynzie.

Across the street in from of Lynzie's house were a couple old people who were very nice. They saved the rolls from their paper towel rolls and toilet paper and what they did was stuff them with toys and candy, then wrap them in pink or blue wrapping paper and sell them for each roll for a dollar. But they were nice enough to let the neighborhood kids each pick one for free. I was 10 when I crossed the street to go pick out a free roll of toys from the nice old people and I saw the old man was smoking out of a pipe. I lost interest in the roll of toys and asked him what he was doing. He said he was just having a little smoke out of his pipe. So I asked him if I can look at it closer and for him to explain to me how the pipe worked because I had never seen one in real life. He knocks out the stuff and unknowingly explained to me how it worked. He pointed out the bowl part, and showed me the little hole where the smoke runs up through the mouth piece, and his pipe had a small screen to keep stuff from flying into his mouth. I smiled at him and thanked him, and asked if I can have a pink roll of toys. I took my roll home and looked around the house for things I can make a pipe out of.

I went straight into the fridge because I remember Coke bottle caps were round and plastic. It took me a while of thinking in my brain how I was going to turn a plastic bottle cap into a working pipe to smoke out of. But The next day I walked down to the little corner store called the Quick Mart, its a small liquor store. We called it the Kweef Mart since that's what one of the older boys in the neighborhood called it. The man who owns it was a fat guy named Bob, but we all call him Blob. In the Kweef Mart I was going thru all the bottles looking for a cap made of metal to snap onto my plastic cap. I tried to snap my plastic cap on each of the different metal caps and when I found on that fit I told Jenny to go ask Blob a question and keep him busy. When he was busy I unscrewed the metal cap and put it in my pocket and we left the store.

I had already told Jenny I was trying to make a smoking pipe. So we went to her house which was quieter with less people and worked on our pipe. I asked Jenny to take out the plastic stuff from the inside of the metal cap and poke holes in it with a nail. Then I asked for a big screw driver. I took the screw driver and put it in the fire of the stove until it was red hot, then I melted a hole on the side of the plastic cap. We snapped the two pieces together and had our bowl. But we couldn't figure out what to make the sucking part out of that would fit in the hole I melted. After a while Jenny remembered that pens were hollow! So where went in her room looking for pens. I told her we need a pen that comes apart in the middle where you unscrew it. We found one of those clicky pens and took it apart and used the bottom half with the screw part and small hole as our mouth part, and it fit nicely in the hole I made. That was it. We sneaked into her dad's room because he smokes cigarettes and took one out of his box, and ran to her back yard with a lighter to test our pipe out. It worked! Me and Jenny ended up experimenting with smoking anything dry, like dry grass, roots, twigs, dried fruit peels. It was all gross. We threw the pipe away.

It makes me wonder that of the people drawn to the ONA, how many of them had childhoods similar to mine where they were active and outside often. I do know from talking to the many ONA people I meet that an unusual high number of them are in the military, or like doing military stuff and like that survivalist subculture.

Q8: What would you like to see the ONA become?

A8: To be independent from the Mind it was born from. I know at first this sounds bad like I want to steal the ONA from its maker. But very often organizations and memplexes that cannot separate themselves from its maker which have become personality cults often die shortly after their maker passes. DM is not physically immortal. He has a long ways to go still. I have people in my family I care about who are his age, so I would rather see that they have many years left. But AL will one day pass into his Immortal Grade in the Seven Fold Sinister Way. And so my main focus or desire is to somehow cut the ONA's "umbilical" cord from that Mind it came from now, and help raise or nurture this ONA as an independent Order not reliant on its maker for life force. That is my major concern. The "dark ages" of the ONA not too long ago is what worries me.

But circumstances during the dark ages were much different. There was a time back then when it looked like there was some silly power struggle between a number of people who either thought they were leader or wanted to be leader. I tried to fix this problem by talking to the right people to get rid of the whole structure and leader thing. And AL was nice enough – or understanding enough – to step down and throw out a leadership thing in the ONA. Then I thought that it would help ONA live longer if each Initiate and/or Nexion had the ‘power’ to help change, evolve, contribute to, and influence the ONA in their own unique ways. Sort of like we add on to what AL has built. This way over time the ONA becomes less dependent on AL and more self reliant and an “entity.”

My other concern was the future market and condition of this thing we call “Satanism.” As cool as some of us might feel it to be, it may die out. It is not smart for an Order to be so blind that it is convinced that Satanism is eternal. If we say there was a small island of Catholics, and on this island was a monastic order, then one day Catholicism died out on this island to be replaced by secularism, what would happen to that monastic order? Do we thus take the chance and put all our bets on Satanism?

My worry was that in the old days people in the ONA and inspired by the ONA put too much faith and investment into the Satanism causal form. We can see this is nearly every off shot and spin off of the ONA that came out in those old days. They were all Satanic institutions of some kind. At least the known ones. Did these old time ONA members know or understand that Satanism was a causal form or outer form and not its core essence? Did they understand that Satanism and things like NS were useful forms only, or a means to get work done? Did they understand that you can engineer new forms that isn’t Satanic or NS to get other work done? So I wanted to see the ONA not be so heavily lost or captivated by its causal forms. They are useful, and I like them all, but like the 21 Satanic Points says, we can’t love something so much that we cannot see it die. Is the ONA – as a collective Order of associates – able to see Satanism die and still know and understand they are still ONA? That is the question. If they/we can’t then the ONA risks dying with Satanism. So I would say that I also want to see the ONA become detached and independent also of Satanism. Not throw it away, but just detach itself from it and understand that it is only a useful and interesting form.

I would also hope that in time the ONA as a collective Order of Initiates will learn to actually appreciate and preserve the ONA’s unique “Kulture” and Tradition. I speak of the Traditional forms or aspects like what is found in Naos: Physis, the Star Game, the Tree of Wyrd, the Sinister Tarot, etc, along with the rites and ceremonies of the Black Book of Satan. The Seven Fold Way. Reichsfolk. And then the Sinister Fiction, and the Tradition of writing and sharing such Mythos. This also includes the Balobian Kulture of creating sinister art work and musick. Preserve it but build onto it. Meaning add onto Codex Saerus by making our own new rites and rituals. Add onto the Tree of Wyrd concept. More Balobians adding new art work. Things of that nature. These are things made and makes the ONA, the ONA. Just like what makes English, English are the core Anglo-Saxon words, no matter how different English evolves. We build on top of that like science build on top of its old and useful theories to advance itself gradually. So it’s not an evolution for the sake of changing things. But a thoughtful evolution, balanced with a Mindful preservation of the foundation and backbone of ONA Kulture and Tradition.

My other concern is jumping the generation gap or the ability for ONA to pass from mother to offspring. This is important to me if clans and new cultures are to be grown in the future from this seed culture we call the ONA. So I would like to see the ONA refine itself if necessary so that it can pass between mother to child. It's not impossible and over the months I have studied the several ways my own culture and family pasted Theravada Buddhism down to me.

Theravada Buddhism has a gigantic written side made up of 24,000 pages. No child is going to read or even understand 24,000 pages of dictations. Interestingly most of the content of those pages are actual stories or mythos that each teach a moral lesson. By that I don't mean morality. I mean lessons to live by and consider.

So I got my Buddhism growing up from seeing, hearing, and doing what everyone else was doing; as well as through stories my family told me which taught key aspects of Buddhist dhamma. Then I was allowed to watch and participate in the religious ceremonies and simple rites. That was it. There was no going to some temple once a week to hear some body preach. No reading out of some Buddhist bible. No lectures of teachings from elders. Just seeing people living their Buddhism as a culture, mimicking and participating in that culture, and then the many stories I often heard, which I still hear. And then only when I grew older in life, did I have the mindset to look deeper into Buddhism to understand it on a deeper level. Where I am now able to pass it to my future children, when I have them.

So based on all that, I would say that the stories and mythos aspect of the ONA is of major importance. I think it was a brilliant idea which has many uses. The best part is AL already write hundreds and hundreds of such stories for us that teaches the essence of the ONA. These stories can be shared with the next generation, or new ones can be created specifically for their age and mindset. Next most important thing we can do are repetitive activities we can do as a family together. Nothing elaborate. Playing the Star Game together is a realistic example. An ONA document called Eira excellently gives us the other example of shared activity:

[Begin Quote]

In order to move forwards, we must make this reality a living one, within each and every one of our lives. We must trust in our latent, evolved creative genius and have the courage to discard the romantic trappings we as a species are becoming dependent upon. The Galactic future can be presenced through our magick if we allow it to be. This requires a leap of faith into the Abyss into the realm of Satan.

All that the new ceremonies require, is for individuals who possess this new aeonic faith to gather at specific times and perhaps light a bonfire which will function as a focus/symbol for the gathering. All else will create itself from there.

The specific gathering times or fests are as follows: Mid end of April; Early November; Spring Equinox; Mid end of May; Summer Solstice; Early mid August; Autumn Equinox; Winter Solstice; Late January late Feb.

[End Quote]

I would add to that something like full moon family Sunedrions where something as simple as a family barbeque is shared together. The most important idea is the family or clan do things together often. It doesn't have to be "Satanic" where people are sacrificed and shit. Actually since the Rounwytha tradition is a core of the ONA, I would rather raise my future children connected with nature, with their culture, and as Rounwythas. They would then grow up to understand that the ONA is the thing that houses their Kulture and Rounwytha Tradition, and that AL presenced it. The stories and fiction would teach them the concepts. And the simple rites and fests solidifies the family/clan. Then as rites of passage a ceremony of some kind can be performed for them at 13. Then at 16 as their right of passage they are initiated Traditionally, a copy if Codex Saerus is given as a gift, and set out to accomplish their first Grade in the Seven Fold Way. Which is when they will on their own terms come to understand the forms and deeper aspects of the ONA from their choir or ordeal of finding all ONA manuscripts, etc.

ONA would not be a replacement for a culture, but simply an add on to a person or people's culture. This is something that some cultureless Americans may find hard to grasp. In my own culture, Buddhism is not a religion, it is an aspect of our culture, or how we live and do things. In my culture you can be "Buddhist," and still also be into the much older Brahmanism, and the even older animism. The living culture uses these things to express itself through, not those things asserting itself onto a culture. My whole family and every person I know like us are all Buddhists, Brahmanists, Taoists, and Animists all at the same time. It's just "The Culture & Tradition" of "our people." A living culture I suppose is like a living culture is like a slug? As it slithers across time it'll pick up bits and pieces of stuff. ONA would thus not replace something. It would be an add-on to what already exists in your life.

So this is what I would like to see the ONA become one day: a Nexion that presences new living Kulture and Traditions into the future. Independent of its original maker. The ONA, from my understanding of things, seems to have all the needed components to help it survive, if we today take care to nurture those aspects. ONA is still a baby "entity" that need care and life force. We'll see. All it takes is just one dedicated nexion. There was only one AL and through him the ONA past to all of us today. Even if I am the last Drecc in the ONA, I will follow AL's example and do what it takes to get it into the future. What it needs is more of the stuff that breeds culture. Myattian stuff like Folk Culture becomes a valuable resource of ideas and practices. Especially those 5 ceremonies and rite of passages DM put together. Love and pride for one's family, clans, folk, are also useful memes. The Numinous Way is also useful in this regard. Whatever DM made that helps create or breed culture is valuable as a Useful Form for the ONA.

I don't personally let the ONA replace my own indigenous culture and ancestral traditions. To me it's an add-on that helps accentuate what I already have. It helps me understand what I already have better. The ONA actually helped me understand Buddhism better. This is so because when I write ONA stuff and I try to explain some concepts ONA uses in writing, I am forced to dig deep into every corner of my brain for insights and example to try and make my examples as clear as possible. So when I do that I end up drawing from Buddhism as a resource of examples, imagery, and insights. Which in turn helps me understand the Buddhism. This is the main reason why I write anyways. Writing and forcing myself to articulate these ideas in a way that others can easily grasp fine tunes my own grasp of Buddhism.

Then other aspects of ONA fits elsewhere in my indigenous mindscape. The concepts of acausal, nexion, and causal helps explain in my mind how my own internal cosmology works out. Except in my mind, the concept of a "nexion" most often correlates with the Mind, since for the moment, I understand the Mind to be the in-between thing between the causal world of experience and mindscape. And then the Acausal to me at the moment correlates with all the stuff on the other side in that mindscape. But when I use that word "mindscape" it comes with its own vast topography that goes beyond the simple space between your ears. I explained in a different essay how that topography looks to me. I used the word "SubNatural" to describe that topography. Meaning that you have Mind/Chitta, which is your individualized core, below that you have your psyche, beneath that you have what Jung and Buddha refer to as a collective unconscious mind which we all share. They use different words and terms to describe this. Then below that at the "center" is something bizarre the Buddha refers to as a "hive mind" made up of all Mindstreams [chittasantana], from which reality is said to arise.

The English word "mind" is a near useless word for me, but I have no other word to use. Acausal just simply does not mean mind vapour or thoughts or mind stuff. It bugs me because there is nothing in this English welanschauung to correlate with what we in the Buddhist Orient understand as Chitta. But whatever. DM in his writings does use a revealing term he coined called an "acausal membrane" which surrounds a causal object/organism and "tell" that that organism what to look like or where its cells should go. I agree with this because as far as I understand things the mechanism of cellular differentiation inside the cell itself is absent. How is it that each cell comes from the same zygote, which all carries the same DNA blueprint, but yet each cell "know" to be different things? But the important thing to keep in mind is that I don't "Believe" the acausal membrane is responsible for this. It is a "Theory" which makes sense to me, that I can use to explain certain things, which needs to be tested later.

I do not agree with the theory that acausal and causal corresponds with this favourite or Western occult notions: objective and subjective "universe." These terms are useful reifications that help us understand things, but they are reifications. If there is such a dualistic separation that there is indeed two different universes where there is an innie universe and and outie universe, show me the boarder between these two. Point a finger at the wall between these two universes where you can say in all honest accuracy that: Here in the most refined levels of the Cosmos is the Cosmic Blood-Brain Barrier impasse! Point a finger to the barrier between the conscious mind and the so-called "subconscious mind." Prove to me that a magnetic field has those neatly drawn lines that moves from pole to pole. That's what I mean by reification. Explain to me what the "subjective" universe is subbed under and what makes it a "universe?" Then explain to me if the "objective" universe you believe to be "outside" which you see with your eyes and apprehend with your Mind is actually outside or inside. How do get yourself to believe that a world in which you only apprehend in your brain/mind is objective/outside of your Self? But this is off topic.

Q9: Will we ever colonize space?

A9: No. We're getting our system of science mixed with our system of governance. They are two different systems built from the ground up. Each “programmed” to function in a different way.

If you look at this thing we call Science, you see that from its very foundation it is based on the idea of investigation, experimentation, and gradual refinement of theories. Because of that as we look back in time we see that science does in deed grow, evolve, add onto itself, and becomes more sophisticated.

As state’s fundamental stuff is not based on investigation, experimentation, and the gradual refinement of theory. It is based on maintaining stasis or its own equilibrium, assertion of a party’s policies, and control. That type of system does not evolve into a stellar republic. It costs far too much money for a State to realistically colonize space. So depending on a current model of a State to do the colonization give us two very big problems. The first problem is that the State doesn’t want to go to space. The second problem is that money is to the State and thus us, dictates what we can achieve and what our human potential is going to be directed toward. We use our human genius to make new products to sell to people and new kinds of weapons to kill other states with.

Science is progressive, but it lacks the power to collect the manpower to build giant terrariums in space. If Steven Hawking were to say next month: “You know I really like black holes. And I’d like to make a ship like the Enterprise so we can go see one. Can I get 10 million of you to work for free to make this ship for the next 20 years?” I doubt anybody would volunteer.

I have a friend who likes science fiction and one day we were talking about “utopia” and he gave me his idea of it and how he would step by step gradually materialize this utopia. He said that all he would need is a small island where he can establish something he termed a “Scientocracy.” It would be a state run by scientists and elected by universities on the island. The state uses science as its politics, and the only real law on this island is that no laws shall be past to impede the progress of science. The money and labour force would be funneled over many generations into projects, with the ultimate goal being colonization of space. The first project would be colonization of the ocean, to expand the island. This adds experience knowledge. The second step would be the colonization of Antarctica. After this the state would have the experience and familiarity of working together to colonize space. The first step in colonization of space would be constructing O’Neill Cylinders kilometers in size. It would be a project each generation would work on. Then from there you would gradually expand into space.

His hypothetical model might more realistically work better than a normal state. But the problem I picked out was the issue of money. It’s just not possible to have any kind of significant evolution into space with money. As a species we need to learn to not let money dictate what is possible for us and what is impossible.

I have another friends who is an older business guy I went to one day to tell him about this problematic topic of mine. I wanted to colonize space, but money is a problem we can seem to let go of. How do I go around that problem? My friend thought about it for a while and invented a speculative form of economics he named off the top of his head: “Projection Economics,” which is based on the simple idea of “work now, pay later.” He says it would be like investing money into a company. You don’t get your earning immediate. You understand that it is a long term investment with future yields. In his hypothetical system you train people to not work for immediate pay, but to cooperatively say, build a company with the investment of their volunteer labour. Then each person involved in that building of such company owns an equal share of the said company. This way in future their effort is paid, if not with them harvesting the earnings, then their descendents. This isn’t like market speculation. So he said to do the same. Collect people and families into a cooperative “corporation” and gradually build these space structures using Projection Economics. The paid load comes later, since each person involved in the construction of such structures would own a share of the structure and its potential economic value. But this would require a process of re-education and paradigm shift in the people themselves.

So if we continue to use the current model of Nation-States and money system, it would be close to improbable that we will ever live in space. We would most likely die on this earth we are killing. In this regard, I would agree with certain ONA texts where it says the old must be destroyed for a new something to take its place. Some sort of “Scientocratic Imperium,” that uses “Projection Economics?” Or something like that. But that “projection economics” would be balanced by normal methods of making money to live. I added the idea that you force the military of the hypothetical state to help work on these projects when they are not making war.

When I was in high school I wanted to go to college to be a bug scientist because I was fascinated with ants. I used to make ant farms with my cousin-brother when we were small. I was fascinated with how they live and work together from birth to death. So I figured I’d like to be a bug scientist to study ants because I theorized that their might be some hormone or biochemical the queen or these ants natural makes that makes them live and work with each other like that. As a bug scientists I could isolate this chemical. I gave it a hypothetical name of “Formicine.” My idea was to manufacture this Formacine and give it to the military and government so they force the population to get Formacine inoculations. This way the population won’t nee money any more and we’d all work and live for each other for free until we die. This was phase one of my personal utopia. I named this stage “Buddha,” meaning the “Awakening.”

Phase two of my personal utopia I named “Kama” [love] which has the theme of something I ended up called “DiovoGenesis,” which is when you take two female ova, extract the 23 chromosomes out of one and inject it into the other, then zap it with a mild electrical charge to induce cellular division. This would allow two females to breed with each other. The offspring of such method would always be female, since no Y chromosomes are present.

Phase three I named the “Moksha,” which is the period of engineering of a virus and a bacterium. One virus infects androgen carrying males and causes them to be predominantly infertile. The bacterium carries enzymes that invades male gonads and cuts up the Y chromosome into pieces.

The fourth stage in my utopia is “Nirvava” [which means “extinguish”] which is when laws are pass declaring Y chromosomes as a parasitic chromosome in humans, which is made illegal contraband to possess. Men would be quarantined in friendly and hospitable cities in Antarctica far away from femalekind so they can't infect the Human [re: female] population with their Y chromosome. They would live in the nice camps until their race dies out.

My last phase is I named "Tantra" [here meaning Thread That Binds] and its theme is Cyborgation. This is when everyone is forced to have neural computers implanted in their brains to connect them to a single neural network and collective cyberconsciousness. The neural computers would be assembled and woven in with neurons by "nanomachines. Then we can colonize space. A girl can dream.

I shared my utopia with an much older friend who likes science and science fiction, and after he said he felt like a criminal in my presence, he said that he doesn't think the extinction of the male gender was the central issue. And that what he believes this utopia actually reveals to him is that deep down inside I have serious but interesting antagonistic feelings towards the concept of individuality. But he said it would make a great science fiction story. After he told me that, I had the idea of maybe later in life, when I have developed and fine tuned my writings skills to write a science fiction series called just called "Protocol X" for the x chromosome. Interestingly – if you do your research – Japanese scientists several years ago already conducted experiments with making viable zygotes from two rat ova. But laws were place which disallowed the zygote to progress into full blown fetal stage. So theoretically "diovoogenesis" is possible. They didn't call it that though. There are already laws internationally made to make it illegal to make human offspring from this method. Which I find to be very telling. All I know is that based on this Japanese case which shows that female to female reproduction of viable offspring is possible, is that as men, your years are numbered. Fortunately I never studied bugs science.

I'm not insane or anything. I just have a "creative" imagination sometimes. It's not like I hate men. It's more of an innocent scientific inquiry. I just wonder if it is possible to wipe out men from the earth with a simple virus and bacterium. We'll never know if we don't try you know. That's the beauty of science. You save your judgment till after the results of the testing and experiments. We don't have to experiment on the whole planet. Just a small country, like Israel since nobody likes them.

I was sharing my Utopian idea with one of my guys friends this one time. He's into Wicca but smart, and more into Nature and animism. We were sharing our utopian ideas with each other since he says that such ideas can reveal a lot about the psychology and emotional state of a person. So it was like a "get to know you friend" exercise thing, without asking prying questions, which I liked. His utopia was him sectioning off the red wood forest in Northern California into a walled kingdom which he was king of and the citizens were his harem. Just all these girls of different races and his friends can live there too. He said I can live in his kingdom with him and he'd share. I told him that was a retarded utopia, and shared mine. After I told him about my phases and end dream, he said: "Well that's not nice. I let you live in my utopia. Can I at least have my petty kingdom in the red wood forest with a harem? I won't bother your regime."

Analyzing my utopia is easy to get a feel for my personality type or "psychology" I'm working with. Like one of my friends said, I do have strong issues against “individualism.” I don’t like people who think different than me and I don’t like people who, I can’t depend on who doesn’t want to give themselves to me, like I would for them. It might sound all evil that I say I dislike people who think different from me. But think about why we fight many of the wars we have fought? Why two political parties have a hard time working in harmony? Why some of you go to great lengths to assert and exert your own opinions and beliefs onto others. And you’ll see that what makes my dislike for others freedom to think for themselves is only “evil” because I am brutally honest. My nirvana of men isn’t because I hate men. It’s because on an emotional and sexual level I feel men to be useless an organism to me. I can go to the sperm bank to get pregnant or I can adopt. I think a lot of the crap that soils of current world such as unnecessary war and conflict and this capitalist competition to out rich and out produce the other is testosterone influenced. And the formacine which makes humans into a hival organism originate from my extreme dislike of money as a power of limitation to our species. I only wish to some how go around that.

DM has left a whole lot of writing which to me I find fascinating to read through as a way of profiling his personality type and inner make up. Unfortunately he doesn’t reveal much in the idealistic utopia department. What I do see that is a common thread in all of his garage inventions is that there is the constant idea or dream of colonizing space. Which would match up perfectly with what I recall were his favourite TV shows: Babylon 5 & Star Trek Voyager I think they were. In many of his inventions there is also a common reoccurring theme of destroying something and creating something new. So maybe DM is a kind of person who feels inside that he is unhappy with the way things are in either the world or “his world,” and he has a obsession to try and change it or to try and get others to change it.

One thing I dislike is when I read people calling DM a “fascist.” This does not show up in any of his writings or in any of his memetic inventions. The opposite shows up. In his ONA you get rhetoric of being a free willed person and he reused the idea/meme “exultation of life” and “exeatic” very often which is the opposite of fascist control. In all of his inventions you can clearly see that DM does not give up on the anti-state rhetoric. Even when he was into Islam, he carried that obsession over with him. This is also not congruent to fascism, if we say that in fascism the State, the People, the Party, and the Religion are One. In his Folk Culture he goes so far as to name his ideal form of government – at the time of such writings – which he calls Folk Democracy. DM in the same writings goes so far as to draft an entire constitution for his idea of Folk Democracy, which clearly has nothing to do with fascism. It actually resembles the direct democracy used in cantons of Switzerland and I think some city-states in ancient Greece. Then in his Numinous Way he calls the idea of a Nation-State of any kind to be immoral and an abstraction. And he tries to bring the focus of a people from the distant immoral state down to a more numinous level of your immediate sphere of family and friends, where the clan is self-reliant and self-governing. I see nowhere in any of DM’s writings where there is the slightest hint of fascism or some totalitarian dictatorship. This assessment is based on a total ignorance of his writings.

He and I do share the desire to colonize space. Unfortunately – and I may be very wrong – I don’t see that happening if we rely on our current model of a State and if we are relying on Capitalism to get us to space. There is just no capital is space. Colonizing space would cause negative capital gain. We aren't the problem, and the state itself is not a problem. The barrier is money and more importantly our infatuation with it. In such a way that we allow it to dictate our potential if we can't pay for it. I hear well meaning people in Satanism talk about elevating the Human Potential to its highest state. I don't see this ideal as being a realistic possibility inside the samsara of money. At the moment we are powerless to do anything if money says we can't.

People today in many parts of the world can't even actualize their human potential to eat and drink clean water without money. People today can't even actualize their human potential to be medically healthy without money. People today can't even actualize their human potential to have a healthy functioning family with out money. What is a major cause of divorce in America today? Money and finances. The idea that confined within the powerful grip of money, that we can fulfill some idealistic human potential [whatever that means] and become gods is ludicrous and wishful thinking. That's what I try to mean by samsara. You can't see samsara when you are lost in its delusion. These idealistic people who talk about some actualization of humanity's full potential makes such claims blind to the ball and chain of money clamped to their legs, and they don't even realize it. No greater human potential or space colony will be possible until as a people we Awaken from this samsara of money. The state is a thorn in most of our side, but it is not the true enemy of mankind. The state acts more as a vehicle to take us from point A to point B. The Enemy of mankind is our attachment or enthrallment to money. Such that we allow it or are powerless to go beyond the limits this money sets for us.

Q10: What are some ways you use to profile somebody's personality type without asking prying questions?

A10: I learned how to do this a while back when I had a friend who was majoring in psychology ask me a bunch of weird questions. It was a trick at first because he knew that I have a private personality type where I get extremely offended with questions that openly dig into my life. So he play a game with me by asking me to imagine myself on a hike. Which was fun. I'll include the meanings of these visualizations below this section so you can do it to yourself. After I learned this, I like to use it on all sorts of people, and it really works. Especially the Cup part, which you'll see. I actually teach ever girl I know at least the Cup part to use and assess the men they are interested in.

I was asked to imagine myself on a hike and to just describe my surroundings. There is no right was or wrong way to experience or describe anything. The more details or the more vivid the scenery the better.

So the first question [1] that was asked of me was for me to describe as vividly as possible what the back pack on my back looks like. If in my visualization I did not carry one, I say I don't have one. But if I was carrying one I describe in detail what it looked liked, if it was heavy or light. What things I may have inside of it, and perhaps why I brought such things with me.

The second question [2] that was asked was for me to visualize that on my hike I now come to a tree and at the base of this tree is a cup of some kind. It can be a mug, wine goblet or one of those things you drink out of. What does it look like? Describe in detail what it looks like, if it has designs on it, how you like it or feel about it. They I was to tell my friend what I do with the cup. Do I take it with me? Do I want it? Do I feel happy in having found it? Or do I put it back where I found it. I can do anything I want with it, even imagine a trash can and throw it away. Any thing. What do I do with it?

Third question [3] is as I hike on my trail in front of me somewhere is a bear. I have to keep hiking further. So I have to pass the bear. What does the bear look like? Is it big or small? Cute or scary? Nice or mean? Maybe it was asleep and not aware of you? Anything. Just describe the scenery and explain how you pass this bear.

Next scene [4] is I have passed the bear and am back on the trail and this trail leads me two a white house with a big tree in front of it. Describe the scenery in detail. House big is the tree? Does it cast a shadow? What does the house look like? House do you feel being there? Then I was told to open the door and walk inside the white house. All the rooms are empty and the walls are plane white. Describe the inside of the house. Are the rooms big or small? How do you feel inside the house? Are you relaxed? Happy? Or do you feel uncomfortable or even afraid? In one of the rooms I notice in the middle of the floor is a black box of some type. Describe it, what's it look like? How do you feel about it? Go to the black box and open it. How do you feel about opening? What do you see inside the black box? Describe it, and then close it and continue hiking.

Next scene [5] is as I leave the white house I go back on the trail and in the distance I see a lake and walk to it. At the lake I will spend some time exploring it. Describe the scenery. What does the environment look like? Lots of trees? Is everything natural? Do I see trash somebody left behind? Is is a big lake or a small lake? Go up to the lake and look around. Is it clear? Is it deep or shallow? Is the water clean or dirty. Would you drink a little of it. If not why not? If you do take a taste of the lake's water, what does it taste like and how do you feel about it? Is the lake alive and full of fish? Is it empty of thriving life?

Next scene [6] is, after I have explored the lake I am back on my trail hiking. After hiking some distance in front of me crossing the hiking trail is a stream of water of some type. It can be a creek or a stream, or a river. I have to cross it to the other side. But first describe the scenery. What does the river look like? Is the water fast moving or a slow tranquil flow. Is it deep or shallow? Is the rive wide or narrow. Now I have to go in and cross it. Explain how I do this. Is this river hard to cross or easy to cross. How do you feel? Are you calm or afraid. You do feel relaxed enough to enjoy the river or do you feel like you are in a rush to get to the other side.

End scene [7] is I have crossed the river and I now stand at the riverside looking in front of me. What do I see?

Answers & Interpretations:

[1]: The back pack is a person's burden in life. The weight they feel on their shoulders. A heavy backpack would suggest that the person has a lot on his shoulders. A light backpack means the opposite. A backpack that is stuffed with unnecessary things that makes it heavy suggests that the person is type to clutter their own life with unnecessary things that actually contributes to their feel of burden. People who say they aren't carrying a backpack suggest that either have no burden in life, or that they are the type to just not even be effected. They are carefree in other words and travel light.

[2]: The Cup. The cup represent Love & Relationships. People who say they are happy or excited in finding the cup suggest they are the type looking for a relationship or someone to love them. If the cup is describe as being ornate, like made of gold and bejeweled or an expensive crystal goblet such people tend to see either their relationships or the girlfriend/boyfriend they are or will be with to be of value and worth and "precious." If the cup is something like a coffee mug or some other useful drinking cup, the person sees relationships or their girlfriend as something or someone they need. Not necessarily "useful" but need. People who take that cup with them on the hike desire a relationship. Those that leave it behind don't want a girlfriend or boyfriend or relationship at that moment.

I teach all my girlfriends I know at least the cup part. I had a few girlfriend I taught this to and they tried it on the guy they were dating. They each came back angry or sad or confused because the guys they were dating said the cup they found was a cheap Styrofoam cup which they Used to drink out of because they were thirsty and then they threw it away. One of the guys said he used his cheap foam cup to drink out of then, threw it on the ground and stepped on it. I didn't say anything to them and just allowed them to date their pigs. Their relationships didn't last a year. Their guys couldn't commit and were sleeping around. The one that stepped in his foam cup ended up cheating on my friend with another girl.

My cup was a coffee mug because I like coffee, and it has flower designs on it. I took it with me in my back pack to bring it home, because I thought it was a special find.

[3]: The bear is responsibility. If the bear is scary, it means you are afraid of responsibility. If it is small it means you may have very few responsibilities in life, or that you have no problems handling them. Many guys I did this too said they saw their bear, pulled out a gun in their backpack and shot the bear dead. A lot of the girls I did this too did what I did, we went off trail and walked far around the bear as fast as we could. Which means that we are the time to evade responsibilities or are afraid of it.

[4]: The white house symbolizes Death. It is house you see death and how you feel about it. The tree's shadow draws out your feelings of the scenery. If the shadows makes the house creepy to you then you feel death to be shadowy and creepy. The interior of the house helps draw out more of your own unconscious thoughts and feelings about death. It might make you feel claustrophobic. The interior might be dark and you are afraid of the dark? Of the house can be spacious with large windows that illuminates the empty rooms. If you feel relaxed and comfortable, then you are the type to no be afraid of dying. The black box represents how you feel or what you deeply see to be on the other side of death. If there is an other side. What you see inside is an unconscious representation or symbol which correlates to how you feel or how you see what is on the other side.

I have actually met people who describe their black box as being an actual coffin without knowing the white house represents death. Some people I did this too are so afraid of the house and black box that they can't get themselves to open it and look inside.

I describes my house as being a big two story house. The tree in front was a big ash tree, but not as big as the house. It has a tire swing on it. There was plenty of sunlight on the house. The inside was very big and roomy and the windows were also big and flooded the rooms with plenty of sunlight. I felt scared and uncomfortable about being in the house. I walked along the walls with one hand touching the walls at all times. But I felt very curious and wanted to have a look inside all the rooms and tried to imagine what the family who lived in the house was like and what they did in the rooms. My black box was a velvet hat box, with a deep royal red ribbon and bow on it. I was happy to see the black box because I like finding free things. So I opened it and saw a pastel pink hat with rims which I wanted to keep. My friend said I could do whatever I wished with anything. So I put that hat on happily and left the house. My friend said that my culture and Buddhism may explain why I saw this house in this way.

[5]: The Lake represents how a person sees and feels about Sex. Is the environment Natural? If so then such a person may feel sex to be natural. Is the area littered with junk or polluted? If so this person may feel sex to be dirty that might need to be cleaned up. The quality of the lake water? Is it clean or dirty? Again this is how they see the sex act or sexual behaviour. Is it alive with fish and life or barren? If barren then this person may not enjoy having a lot of sex. Is the water clean enough to drink of. People who say their lake water is too polluted to drink from have a serious problem with the idea of sex. They may be the type to have sex, then feel very dirty or bad. Or it may even suggest sexual abuse in their history where such abuse causes them to resent or dislike sex and see it as being unclean.

My lake environment was a natural pine forest. There was no trash. The lake was deep, which means your appetite for sex may be deep, or are able to enjoy it deeply, or that you have a deep consideration towards sex. People with shallow lakes tend to see sex and just sex. You just screw a person to get off and whatever, or that they might not be naturally sexually active. Test this out on intellectuals and see what their lake looks like. My lake's water was crystal clear and I drank it. It tasted natural and sweet. And there were lots of fish in it. Which proly means I'm a slut.

[6]: The river you must cross represents your own personal Sexuality and your attitude or feelings of it. This is different from the lake which just represents sex. This river represents your own Sexuality. People who have a hard time crossing their river because the water is deep or the current is rough have a hard time dealing with or accepting their sexuality. However they feel inside the river crossing it, they feel also about their own sexuality.

My river was a shallow creek that had a tranquil little flow to it. It was just high enough to cover my ankles and I wiggled my toes in it and stayed in it a while to enjoy the feel of soaking my feet, then I crossed it without effort. Which means that whatever I am sexual, I am very comfortable very comfortable with it. I am also able to take my time in it and enjoy it with no feelings of fear or whatever.

I like testing this one out with those teen boys I meet who are feminine but who swear they aren't gay, and most of them will describe a wide river or a river that is deep and hard to cross.

Which would suggest in their case that that have are having a hard time dealing with their sexuality because they may be confused. But not every person with a rough and tough river are fags.

My cousin and I were hanging out with one of her friends who is a normal, very attractive half Black have Mexican guy who has a girlfriend, and he was in the military and had just gotten out. So nothing about him suggested that he was confused about his sexuality, so I figured that it would be safe to play this game with him and not reveal anything embarrassing. My cousin who is his friend ended up taking over the game as the narrator, and at the end this friend of ours said that his river was very deep and the current was violent. Inside the river he was very afraid of drowning so he swam has fast and hard as he could to the other side. When my cousin heard this she looked at me knowing what it meant, and seeing if I would approve of her interpreting this to him. I interjected and said that the river wasn't important and had no real meaning and to skip it.

Later this friend had asked my cousin in private what the river meant because he would really like to know why I said it wasn't important. My cousin told him quietly that it meant he was having a hard time dealing with his sexuality. But that this made no sense because he had a girlfriend and was a typical macho guy. After that he told her a secret he had never told anyone and asked her not to say anything to anybody, and that he'd tell me himself since I knew something already. He came to me in private this one day and said: "About that river. I know what it means, she told me. I'm not gay. I love girls and I know I do. It's just that something happened to me in the past that I'm still dealing with, and sometimes it hard. When I was little my older brother molested me. I've never told anyone this, besides a couple people. Please don't tell anyone."

[7]: The scenery you see on the other side of the river is how you see or feel your life to be in the years to come. It is your future. I saw more pine trees and my hiking trail kept going on. I had a friend here in California I did this to and he said he saw a metropolis with tall skyscrapers. I didn't know what that meant. We both thought that might means his future would keep him real busy? But two years later he moved to New York city. He emailed me and said: "Guess where I am?! I got a new job. I'm in that metropolis I saw two years ago with you! New York baby! Wish me luck."

Q11: Why are you even into the ONA?

A11: For a number of reasons. Because it closely resembles the way my close friends and I live and do things in life. We were in the process of making our WSA into something like the ONA anyways. We did have our own degree system. Each degree came with a set of tests of loyalty. As you get higher up our old system, the tests became more illegal in nature. You were forced to be loyal to us or the state and its laws. This is where our ABC's originally came from. When we found the ONA and studied it, we saw that it was what we wanted our WSA to be. Then after studying DM's other stuff we really liked it. So we went with the ONA.

One thing we like about the ONA is that many aspects of it is brutal and realistic. It makes no moralist interpretation of killing and being sinister. This is a realistic reflection of real life on the street in an inner city's urban jungle. When you join a gang either by choice or insight roll, or whatever, you'll know what I mean. There no moralism to the day to day activities you do to survive and protect and feed your own. If you gotta slang dope like a petty criminal on the corner to buy shows and help you single mom pay rent, then that's what you gotta do. Don't matter if it's right or wrong. You do or you die.

Life in that lifestyle is sinister. There is no other word to aptly describe it. Do a research and profile of Mara Salvatrucha13 and check out how they handle their business in the culling department. They are nothing to the Zetas and Sinaloas down in Mexico. And even that ain't shit compared to Pol Pot, Moa, Stalin, and friends. And even that aint' shit compared to the horror that went down during world war two and the lives lost. We don't just kill people nikka. We fuck em, mutilate them, eat them, skin them, gut them, and over kill them. It's just human nature. We've been here 200,000 years and ain't nothin changed about our nature. Just the environment and topography, and the tools of the trade. The more technologically advanced we get, the more we refine our science of killing and war. We're right now dedicating and focusing our human genius and "potential" in developing cloaking technology and anti-matter. What the hell you think we're gunna use that shit for? Charity?

ONA is just brutal honest and we don't like, because we wish we were otherwise. ONA comes along and uses the words "amoral," "culling," "sinister," and says that its in our nature to do and be that. It's just that most of us are in denial. And people get asshurt over the truth. The truth hurts. We are amoral. Not 'immoral,' Amoral. We do kill. We are sinister. All natural life is. No plant or animal has morals to live by. Some plants kill like Venus Fly Traps. Every organism is "sinister" by nature. I know that is merely a human description superimposed onto natural acts. Don't get so caught up in the words, get caught up in the natural acts. Call it what you want. I'll used the word "nice" instead of "sinister" and the essence will still show. It's nice when viruses kill a host. It's real nice lionesses chase down a gnu and eat it alive. It's nice when big trees in a jungle hog up the light to starve the little saplings. Nature is nice and friendly isn't it. It's friendly when Nature makes a tsumani and kills 15,000 people. It's friendly when Nature makes a monsoon that drowns 100,000 people. ONA just tells it like it is, and keeps those options open. It says if you wanna be amoral, do it, if not whatever. If you wanna cull, do it, if not whatever. And that upsets mundanes because those mundanes wanna believe that they are otherwise.

Denial is a big business. It's what makes the world's major religions so popular. You look in the proverbial human mirror and see yourself as a sick amoral, murderous creature, and you don't want that to be true. So you turn to your bible and korans and torahs and believe that you are special. You're made in god's image. You're angelic. Jesus loves you. You just have a few issues under the rug. Let's not look under that rug. Don't pick it up and peek. The devil's down there. That's not human nature. That's Satan. That's ain't us. That's a demon. It cool to fuck a kid up the ass now. Just ask Jesus to forgive you and the Pope to protect you. It's cool to blow people up now, because god said you. It's not you're human nature.

You don't hear the talk that I hear. Why do you think there aren't as many Buddhists as there are Muslims or Christians? You don't hear what I hear. I asked my little grandma who is a Christian why she was not a Buddhist one day. She says Buddhism is nice, but the Buddha can't help you. Buddhism has that thing called karma. You do something and you have to live with it. Nobody can help. In Christianity when you do something and make a "mistake" Jesus forgives you and you don't get punished for it. Did you understand the essence of what she said? She basically said in Buddhism you are responsible for the results of your actions, whereas in Christianity, Jesus takes that responsibility away so you don't get the consequences. You know where she gets that bullshit from? From piece of shit missionaries who go into these Buddhist countries and points out that little "flaw" of Buddhism.

Buddhism is the only "religion" where no god exists to forgive your ugly ass. No angels exist to save you from your own animal nature. Buddha is just a man who died thousands of years ago. He can't wash keep the results of your actions from you. You know from the very beginning when you start Buddhism that you get out of life what you put in and ain't nobody that can stop that causal reaction. And people don't like that. It's a dumb religion. What kind of religions doesn't offer you at least a god that forgives and a way to bail out of your causal shit so you can't get the consequences? People need a get Out Of Jail card. That's big business.

But you got Christianity that says oh it's okay to have sex with children. Jesus will forgive you. What consequences? It's okay to kill all of those heathens, God said so. What human nature? Go ahead and make war with that infidel country and kill people. You still Allah special babies. You Jews can do whatever you want. You're Yahweh's chosen people. Go ahead and take Palestine, it's your promise land. Take North America and kill those savage injuns. God still loves you. You're still angels in Jehovah's eyes.

Tell them the naked truth that they are amoral, murderous, and sinister, and show them a mirror so that can look at their grotesque human nature and they will hate you. You rudely woke them up from their fantasy! They don't wanna be human. They run and hide behind every security blanket they have. They run and hide behind state law and tell you killing is illegal! I don't kill. I'm law abiding. Then snap back into their denial. I don't rape women and children, they say, my religion says me and the universe are moral. Their denial knows no limits. Their whole universe is even built from the fabric of heavenly decreed moral goodness.

I'm into the ONA because it is honest and reminds me that my options are open. I reserve the right to be amoral. That don't mean I will live an excessively immoral existence. But I reserve the natural right to do so if I please. I reverse the right to kill. That don't mean I'll be a serial killer. But I'll manipulate people to kill for me if it is necessary. I'll kill to protect my future children. And you know you would too. My dads and moms and uncles would kill a person if they raped me or abused me. They have the natural right to kill when they need to. I reverse the right to be sinister: the right to be Human and accept myself for who and what I am, a human, with Human Nature. Anybody or religion or government that takes that right for me to be Human without a real good reason to do so is my enemy. An enemy to Human Nature.

I'm not in denial. I know what I am. I'm at least honest and true to myself. That doesn't mean I am "evil" 24/7. Nature isn't deadly and perilous everyday of the year. There is a beautiful side to nature. And there is a beautiful side to Human Nature. Which is another reason why I am into the ONA. Because there is a Numinous quality to life, mortal existence, and being human. And the ONA is open to that also and helps you come to understand that side of my nature too. It keeps all my options open for me and provided me with a method of experiencing and practicing those options and lets me be. And it reminds you that this is a causal world. And so your causal input will produce a causal consequence you will meet up with. And there is nothing you can do to stop that. No gods or dark gods will save you from your own ignorance. In fact the ONA says that you are free to be stupid and make your mistakes and eat your consequences because you grow and learn from it: Pathei-Mathos. It forces you gradually to be responsible and you gradually understand that there is no teacher in life, but you own actions, experiences, and their results. It forces you by your own realization that if you dislike an aspect of your nature or have come to understand that you have greater potential than to be a savage murderous monkey, then you must by your own efforts work to go beyond your own limits and basal nature. The ONA is brutal and honest, and it put you at the center of your own life to your own devices.

This is the reason why I personally don't like the theory/doctrine of "Self-Deification" you find in mundane Satanism. Being your own "god" meaning your own boss in life is a sound concept in itself. But when you use Word like "Deity," "Deification," "God," in that doctrine, where you now believe that your mundane satanism is about you evolving into your own deity or god, then you're on a train ride to self-denial and self-deception. Because those words and the essence and cultural quality they have influences our minds and perception of reality and ourselves. So you can do an easy experiment to test the hypothesis that mundane satanists who believe in that self-deification theory will end up deceiving themselves or becoming out right delusional. Pick 5 normal mundane satanists, then make a list of acts of human nature that you know we humans have committed. But don't tell them its human nature. Just state the act and give them two moral options to value such act. For example ask these mundane self-gods: if or when you become a god, do gods kill? Rape? Genocide? Do you believe such acts are good or bad. And pay attention to their answers. Then go ask a Christian the same questions. It's like there is something wrong with being human. Nobody wants to be one. Not the Christians, not the Muslims, and not even the Satanists.

I also like the ONA because it reflects my own indigenous nature. It has a place for ideas like tribes, clans, family, culture, and tradition. These things might not be important to mundanes. But being human, in tune to my human nature, I feel that such things are important to me. I want to continue to live such ways of life. And I appreciate the ONA for having a place in its memplex for such ways. You don't get that with other systems. Mundane satanism makes it some sort of a religious crime called conformity if you even stand next to another person and like them. Secularism has no place in its system for family. The state doesn't want you to have family and culture. Because they want you to be dependent on them. Religion doesn't want you to have a tribe and your own cultures. It's their culture or nothing.

The other aspect about the ONA which keeps me a faithful customer is that the words, vocabulary, lexicon, and ideas the ONA has and makes to me are very useful. They help me better understand myself and the world I exist in. But better than that they allow me to actually express in words, what wordless stuff I have inside. And best of all because there are other ONA people, I thus have others who understand what I am saying and who can give me feedback or add to my understandings of things. In other words, the ONA becomes a way or method of trading and sharing or circulating ideas/meme.

But the best part of all is that the ONA is customizable, and “add-onable.” The ONA has all these lego pieces called causal forms you can customize. Sometimes I don’t feel like a Satanist, so I’ll take that form off. Some days I like Reichsfolk, so I’ll add that on. Other days I’ll feel like doing Drecc things, so I’ll add that on. Add-onable meaning that you can take the ONA and evolve it into how you want it or need it. You can make new forms to add-on. You can write new manuscripts, teachings, make new rites, rituals, etc. And as long as you keep to the core principles, you are still ONA. In this way, there can be now schism in the ONA. Because all you are working with is the outer expression of causal forms. It does not matter how you take the core principles of the scientific method to make whatever new scientific fields with to add-on to science. It is still science. Science doesn’t schism. You can call Cosmology and Zoology schisms of science because they fucked up the causal form of science so bad they look nothing alike. You can call physics and quantum-physics schisms of ideology of science because they teach different sets of laws and “world-models.” It’s all science. The core essence of science hasn’t changed in any of those causal forms/fields: speculation, experimentation, and illumination.

The way that the institution of science has set itself up makes it so that it is immensely creative, dynamic, living, and evolutionary. But it doesn’t crack apart like religion does into rival sects. Scientists argue and debate each others view points and theories, but that is an aspect of science. You have to experiment with and prove these ideas and test them. Then science has this unofficial thing call the peer review process where theories and insights are passed around elders of the scientific community to be looked at. Not every idea or theory will pass. So this institution as a living organism has itself a way of insuring that as it evolves, it does not evolve into an irrational direction. It’s the greatest institution and jewels of – one of so few – of the human species. I’d rather have the ONA follow the example of science as an organism, then the example of a Western occult cult. But, I’m a rationalist, so that’s just my personal wish.

But the ONA is like science. There is an essence to the ONA that can be expressed into different forms and fields of discipline. Even if two forms look radically different, they are still ONA. For example the Traditional Satanism and the Buddhist-Drecc [Dreccvada?] thing WSA uses are both ONA. This is the main reason why I am a loyal ONA customer. Because I personally love science, and I love the way that the institution of science is based on a very rational and simple core, which evolves over time into all of these cool fields and disciplines. And I see the ONA with many of the same features that science has. Anton Long even built Natural Philosophy and the apprehension of Physis into the ONA.

Well, I guess 11 Questions and 45 pages is good enough. That’s a minor thing I notice in the ONA. It started with AL and the culture spread out to many ONA people to come after him. Its the culture of doing these question and answer formats to share insights on specific question. It’s another thing I appreciate about ONA. It’s not “perfect.” Nothing is. But it admits it is not perfect and is fallible. Unlike other institutions it opens itself to be corrected and evolved and advanced. This characteristic alone gives the ONA a better chance to survive and thrive. It’s good that it is not perfect and can always be better. That way we each can come and add our own things to ONA to make it better gradually. As long as ONA keeps this vital culture of "self-becoming" via its cells [us] it has no competition in the Satanic subculture. Our two nearest competitors are stagnant, dying, and sinking into the pit of irrelevancy. After 40 years and the ONA is the standard bearer and sets the bar.

People hate us. They fight to be some leader of ONA. They pretend to be ONA. They talk about ONA. They use our ideas/memes. They set out to challenge ONA. They are inspired by ONA. They are influenced by ONA. And revealingly they don't fight among themselves to be leader of any of those other groups. They don't run around pretending to be any of those other groups. Whatever we are doing: keep doing it. The attention and drama comes with the territory. Trust me. On campus or any social setting, the popular ones are the ones the others talk about, gossip about, hate, want to be, pretend to be, wear what they wear, etc. Same thing with celebrities and popular politicians. The more popular you are, the more you have the social/human means to inspire and influence. But that popularity draws attention, and with attention comes the drama. It comes with the territory. A girl in school who has no drama knows she is nobody worth having drama over. All that drama and attention is a good thing. Revel in it. Because when it dies out, then you'll know nobody gives a shit about us. That's when you know we failed as a company. Failure means bankruptcy. Many Satanic and occult organizations have come before the ONA. Many have died out of existence from such bankruptcy.

ONA has been around 40 years. With just a few dedicated Initiates to do what AL did, it can go for another 40. I'd like to see what ONA looks and feels like 40 years from now. I know I'll be one of those dedicated people to follow in the footsteps of AL and carry that torch into my future. All it takes is one. 40 years ago there was just AL, now there is all of us. Today there is just us. Through us, tomorrow there will be many more. If our aim is to manifest a new way of human living, a new human type, and a new kind of civilization, then this work happened one person at a time, across Time, aeonically, through each of us as living nexions between a past and a future.

RACIALISM & NATURE

“The term race or racial group usually refers to the categorisation of humans into populations or groups on the basis of various sets of heritable characteristics.” -Wiki

It sickens me when I hear people talk about Racism as if it was a bad thing. I mean those pussy-people who are lost in idealisms that have no bearing on nature and the real world. People who hate to hate the feeling of hating someone are very far removed from the natural world and are out of touch with their own base human nature. It's as ridiculous as the Buddha teaching his Arhants to desire the desire of not desiring to escape Samsara.

What is racism anyways? Stripped of its politics, it's just a feeling of hate or repulsion for someone because of their racial characteristics. That outer/exoteric racial characteristic is just a “target” for that hatred/repulsion.

This instinctive repulsive feeling is actually the same feeling we get when we come near a pile of excrement. Why do we naturally react to a pile of poo in universally the same repulsive manner (coprophilics like poo)? Because it has germs and disease causing agents in it that can kill you. This is bad from mother nature's perspective. If you go touching and eating shit, you can get sick, get E. Coli poisoning, get parasites, and dies. And when you do die, you can't continue nature by propagating progeny. This repulsive feeling we get from seeing a pile of steaming poo is so important, nature couldn't even risk it being culturally transmitted, it had to be ingrained in us instinctively.

Now, if you were to imagine yourself as a protohuman living before or during the last ice age we can begin to understand the importance of “racism” as a survival mechanism which nature ingrained into us, which is effect, is the same repulsive feeling described above.

Back in those prehistoric times the population of the human species was sparse. You had small packs of protopeople living in blood related groups that occupied a certain amount of territory. Things were fine under those condition, because all of the natural resources within that territorial domain belong to the group. You upset the ballance of things when a second pack of protohumans enters this territory. Maybe the second pack’s land stopped producing food for their cattle or sheep, and they wandered into new land, occupied by another pack.

This is where problems enters the picture. First, the secondary pack requires natural resources to stay alive and nature only goes so far with shring. It’s natural to love and share within your own pack because they offer group force and protection in return, but two packs don’t share, they compete. The second problem is the men and women of each pack. You can’t have your womenfolk falling into the second packs hands, because then you’d be assed out of girls, and your pack goes extinct. Same thing with the boys in your own pack. If your boys runs off with those strange girls and breeds with them, your pack is assed out of men, and goes extinct. Luckily, you don’t have to think or rationalize this situation, because nature gave you an instinctive answer.

You don’t have to think about it, you just hate them and want to kill them, and sometimes take their womenfolk. You have a natural hatred/repulsion to the secondary pack, and their “racial” characterisricks serves only as a way to tell your packmates from theirs. The boys and the girls will compete and react to the threat of the second pack in their own ways.

What do two competing boys do? They fight. How do they fight? By trying to physically cripple the other guy or kill him so he can’t breed, or so he looks like a loser to the womenfolk so nobody wants to breed with him. How do two girls fight? By saying things and doing things to make the other girl look and appear ugly. That’s why boys fight with fists and clubs, and girls call each other names like “skank” and “slut” and pull on each other’s hair. If you’re a slut, then that boy that mated with you, isn’t even sure if that baby is his- with his genes; and if you’re ugly, nobody wants to mate with you. I hate other girls, but I’m not gunna make myself look ugly and fight a girl like a boy does. I’m not breaking a nail or messing my hair up for a bitch.

All this competing and fighting does something for nature. It insures that the stronger pack survives to pass their much more stronger genes onto the future generations. This is how nature makes her long term investments to insure that her species exists thousands of yours down the road. The stronger pack, with there genes, and their progeny also are rewarded with influencing the world and taking it into a direction.

Lets fast forward into a distant past when the Aryans invaded India. What does the word “arya” actually mean in it’s original Sanskrit? It simply means “Cultured,” “Civilized,” “Urbanized,” and refers to a person who lives in a “City” as opposed to those nomadic people and feral tribes.

This 'thing' we call a city was a very new idea. For thousands and thousands of years people has been living as nomadic peoples and feral tribes, as some still do to this day. Something strange happened somewhere in the middle east or Steps (that area where you find those weird sounding countries that nobody gives a shit about like Uzbekastan, Khazakastan, and the rest of the Stans). A group of people there, simply stopped moving around at the mercie of the weather and clamate change and established the first "civilization" meaning a city-state. What's a city-state in essence? It's a group of people that come together in a more organized and coherent form, and utilize nature to live in one place; rather than be utilized by nature as a nomadic or ferel incoherent group of people.

So these "Aryans" came into India, from somewhere in the asian steps. We know this because they brought with them a religious drink called "soma." This Soma is a concoction of Canabis, Poppy (the kind with opiates) and a plant which has Ephedra in it that is made into a tea. This ephedra baring plant only grows in the mountains of this region, and is not native to India. I had to bring up this Soma because there are these stupid Hindu scholars, and other simpathizers that are saying that the "Aryan Invasion" never happened, that these "aryan" were native to India.

Anyways, those Aryans left their original lands due to climactic changes and they scattered, taking their invention with them- civilization. A group of them entered India, which back then (and sill is in many areas) a rich nation in natral resources occupied by lame brained darkies who were as good as animals. Coherency manifests power, so naturally, the Aryans subjugated the incoherent darkies who became Peasants. A form of religious racism was established called the caste system, which insured that the Aryans and their descendants ran the whole gambit.

In modern, more ONA terms, those old Aryans were adepts who understood human nature. They learned to apprehend that instinctive emotional repulsion to a competing pack to their total advantage to insure their continued success and survivle, and to manifest real world results. They disguised this apprehension in a way that was acceptable to the lesser evolved darkies - in the form of religion. This situation of a more civilized and coherent human meeting a feral inhoherent human brings us to another valuable aspect of racism.

In times of our most ancient primal protohuman ancestors, the alpha male gets to breed with his choice of the healthiest females. This produces genetically healthy progeny. The other males got the not so healthy females. In a situation where these humans now live in a coherent civilization, we see this same breeding process in play. The alpha male: King or Emperor, has his choice of all the females in is domain... the aristocracy and nobles – those with noble quality blood, bred intelligently (selective breeding) amongst themselves; while the peasantry bred aimlessly with their own kind. Racism helps insure that noble blood, which has been refined across the entire history of our species, doesn't get mixed mith a portion of humanity which nature has turned her face from and has forsaken.

Those are tough words, for me to claim that nature can be so heartless and cruel as to forsake portions of a species or an entire species, but she does. Where have all the dinosaurs gone? And those ancient mammals? What has become of Neanderthalis and Cromagnon? She has forsaken them and left them to rot away, in favor of a better investment which will take her further. Progression and evolution is the only agenda of Nature. What holds her back, she destroys. Those that help Her progress forward, she favors and rewards.

What is happening to Africa right now? What is happening to these people, who have never amounted to anything? Besides the political deterioration and genocide? Not only are these native Africans slaughtering each other, but Nature Herself is helping them with their autohomeocide. Her deserts in Africa are growing. She starves millions of its people, her rivers stop flowing, the rain stops falling, and She plagues them with viral epidemics. All of this combined adds up to a grim and dire future result: The Extinction of Africa. All the while, peoples and civilizations on the otherside of the same earth are reaching for Mars.

The peasantry of any civilization is this same forgotten and forsaken old model of humanity. They lack the ability to think profound and/or lofty abstract thought. They lack the ability to progress themselves and society. All they are good for is working the fields. Old world Racism helped insure these two breeds of humanity remain separate. The Noble destined for great things, the peasantry destined to become genetically degenerate rejects of nature. Even in today's social order where feudalism no longer exists, we can still naturally pick out those humans of noble blood and genes, from a degenerate one. It's not just a matter of looks, it's also the mental capacity, the ambitious nature, the visions and dreams, the will to power, and the way they carry and express themselves. Versus the unrefined rudeness and imbecility of the degenerate stock.

Even in countries where there is only one homogenous race, "racism" still exists between those of light skinned and noble blood, and the darkies that work the fields. The one with noble blood, those of aristocratic, powerful ancestry, whose forefathers struggled with physical and intellectual might to gain the power they had, remain indoors and are lighter in complexion, to the peasants. Racism isn't just a caucasian thing. It's a matter of favored genes and noble blood which took millions of years to ennoble and refine versus the genes and blood marked and scheduled for termination. If Nature were a factory, some of us have been marked for discontinuation, because we no longer affect the market as the Executive Board desires. And our skin tone is the Mark. It's not just a black and white thing. It about the blood, the genes, the ancestry, and how far those favored genes will take nature.

The "racism" of Anglo-Saxon culture literally took hold of the world, and molded it to its will. That's power. Without the racism of Ango-Saxon we'd all still be living backwards. Sure the ancient Chinese may have invented a lot of things Anglo-Saxon used such as gun powder and such, but ancient China never went anywhere. Great Britan and White Europe did something with these inventions and changed the whole world. It's something to be very proud of, thankful for, and admired. Japan is only great now after it learned that "something" from the West. We are, where we are today because of Racism. It's a beautiful thing.

Western culture passes that "something" even to the different ethnicities that exist under its auspice. Just compare an African American to his kindred native Africans in Africa and you will see the difference. America is run by a very intelligent, noble African, one with an obvious higher quality then his forsaken kindred in Africa.

The only problem with racism today is that it has lost touch with its primal nature and has become to far corrupted by politics that no longer is of any relevance to the 21st century. Racism exists for a very important reason, it's just lost itself in a maze of old world politics. This needs to change. Those of us intune and in harmony to primal nature must come to realize once again why racism exists. We must re-understand that the blood we carry in our veins took our noble ancestors millions of years to refine, regardless of our nationality or phenological type. Undeneath it's the same nobility, the same refined genes, from the same small group of alpha males from our primeval past versus the blood and genes which nature Herself has marked for eventual termination.

This is one thing that the ONA can be proud of. That it is the only religion and system intune with primal nature nonhypocritically. We have always embraced racism, albeit a confused type; while these profane satanism have rejected us and racism as something stupid, all the while claiming to have an understanding of human nature. When Racism is used and applied properly, in harmony to its primal nature, it accomplishes the same end objective as Culling- the purification and refinement of the human race... but it accomplishes this on a much larger scale.

This is why I hate Communism so much. It's a pussy flowery idealism that goes around teaching how we're all equal and how we should all share what we have with one another... even with the lazy. Then it takes these peasents which nature Herself has forsaken and glorifies them as the new abstract deity. All to what end and whose benefit? The peasants? They remain the same, no matter what regime runs the show. Russian peasants are Chinese peasants whether under the emperor or chairman, they get run over and exploited all the same- which is all they are good for in the end. And to think that there are profane satanism that thinks Communism is "satanic?"

My family came from aristocratic back ground. We might not be white, but the racism was and is still there. I grew up hearing my grandmother and her cousins talk and recall their good old days. I hear them talking about how they never believed that peasants should have ever been educated. Because if you educate them and teach them to read, they think they has rights and act like they own the country. And they revolt. How many of these piece of shit countries run by peasant stock humans amounts to anything? Africa? Mexico? Cuba? China? They're all failed states, and a poor excuse for a human civilization. I agree with those old ladies. Peasants don't need education, it doesn't do them any good. What good has it doe for the peasant stock of the bible belt of America? That's what's wrong with democracy- these peasants vote.

We need to reharmonize our racism to Nature, and update it. It needs to shed it old world politics, and focus on future agendas. It's no longer about nationality, but about Nobility. Hate is good. I'm not ashamed of hating stupid backwards people marked for discontinuation. It's just business. It's is about reclaiming what our ancestors and nature put into motion- selective breeding to advance our species forward. It's about consciously breeding intelligently to create our future generations, by rejecting genetic undesirables. What's another term for selective breeding? Natural Selection. Natural Selection is the very modus operandi of Nature and the essential spirit of progress and evolution, without which life could not exist for the billions of years that it has. Natural life must constantly keep up with time. As time moves on, life must adapt to the changes or die. Those species -more especially their genes – which cannot adapt to the progression of time is detrimental to Nature as a Whole. We are not individual life forms existing in nature, we are an integral part of a whole system.

But to what end you ponder... To the stars. Nature isn't stupid. If she keeps all of her life forms stuck on one planet, and that planet goes to shit, like it is, all those billions of years of evolution would have been a total waste. Racism is nature's way of achieving the coherency needed to manifest enough collective power and effort to take her to the stars.

Memes & Mind

The best kind of learning is the one you get from direct experience and direct apprehension, instead of reading a book based on secondary [or tertiary or whatever] source interpolations or the crap on the internet. I feel sorry for anyone who thinks they are smart because they have read books or the internet, because nothing they know and have in their heads actually comes from a primary or direct source.

Perception is “reality” and our Beliefs molds and influences our perception or view. In this sense, what thoughts and beliefs we house in our heads becomes the building block of our subjective apprehension of reality. So, in this way, those people who accumulate knowledge from books and the internet acquire memes from other random people, and these memes of other people end up fabricating these people’s weltanschauung and subjective reality. It can be said that such people live in a world of other people’s making.

By “subjective reality” I mean it in a Buddhist way, and not in an Occidental psychological or philosophical way. Reality in Buddhism doesn’t exist as a single “thing,” as in it exists in two states that can never come together. The first state of reality is the field of coherent information, which may be considered “The Objective Universe.” This can be likened to the field of coherent information on a computer hard drive.

The Mind [Chitta] is the Operating System which touches this field of information, and translates it into things on the screen of conscious awareness. What we each become consciously aware of is thus a product of information being drawn in by our several senses translated into electrical impulses brought to various centers in the brain and only then are we consciously aware of our surroundings, sounds, sights, and so on. Thus what we “see” or assume to be a world we observe with our eyes is not actually “out there” in any way. What we see “out there” is all the second state of reality: processed information.

The two forms of reality never touches. The conscious Mind in essence – because it is totally dependent on its five senses – never actually directly touches [apprehends] the first state of reality. In a more Occidental term, we can say that the objective world and the subjective world never touches, and that the conscious mind of a person can only be aware of what has been captured in it's own brain. In other words, the reality that we consciously know, is not the Original Reality, but a processed one; and that we can not genuinely grasp or consciously know the Original via our senses or everyday conscious mind, because our conscious awareness is itself only a product of the aggregation of these same senses which is like a wall between our conscious awareness and the Original Reality.

One of my bhikkhu grandpas explains Citta [mind/consciousness] as a Blind but intelligent king who is completely dependent on 5 viziers that aren't very smart and that don't always tell the truth. This Blind king must struggle to learn to use his inner sense of reason and intuition to discern what his idiot viziers gives to him or his kingdom falls. In other words, what you know, and observe cannot be accepted at face value. You must learn to use your inner sense of Reason and Intuition to measure everything that you become consciously aware of.

This is where language, thought, beliefs, and memes becomes such an influential factor, because these things influences the Mind, and the Mind is the Operating System which impregnates the brain with information that is interpreted by Consciousness as “reality.” Thus what we think, what beliefs we have in our heads, literally forms our world we experience.

Give a person the meme: <<Heaven Exists>> and if this person believes, his reality has a heaven in it. Give a person the meme: <<We Came From Apes>> and if the person believes, their reality becomes the kind where humans evolve from primates. In both of these brief examples, nothing about the First State of Reality has altered or changed. What happened is that an extra component [the memes] has been introduced which contaminates information by acting like a virus that injects its “genetic information” into the stream of information the Mind is processing, thereby contaminating the end resulting image [Second State of Reality]. In this context, Reality in Buddhism is not an illusion, at least not the First State. What is an illusion or delusion is the Second State, especially for a person who has no mastery of their own Mind.

In another illustration my bhikkhu grandpa told me is that the Mind is like 10 water buffaloes. If you give the 10 water buffaloes the freedom do as they wish and to go wherever they please, you get no work done on your field. You must learn to control all 10 water buffaloes to work the fields to produce yields. Most people in the West believe that freedom of thought is great; they would have it no other way. The idea that one's Mind is absolutely free to wonder and think and believe as it pleases is wonderful. Along with this, it is also believed that you should be completely free to emotionally feel as you please. And then most Minds are not only free to believe and feel as they please, but they are at liberty to visualize and image whatever pictures and images that so entertains them. This is the state of Mind in which the 10 water buffaloes are just wandering about incoherently.

So what you say. Who cares right? I care, and I would like my own descendants and associates to care for their own benefit and self-perfection. Because if you were to sincerely study a group of people successful in life who have the money, free time, life style of their dreams with a group of people who struggle with life whose life consists of drifting from servile job to job until retirement: you will begin to learn that the single most important difference between these two groups is one of Mental Ethos. I was fortunate to have personally known both rich and poor friends and I took the time to ask them questions to probe deeper into their mental habits and mental culture, and there is a great big difference. Can you guess which of the two groups has a very well disciplined Mind?

It is the same factor and differences between a person who is wise or enlightened and a person who is ignorant. When the mind incoherently wonders and is untamed, it is like a flashlight radiating photons randomly in every direction: there is no force or potency. When the Mind is tamed and intelligently controlled, it is like a laser, where those same photons are brought into a coherent beam which generates both force and potency: the potency or Potential/Power to influence and affect one's causal environment. The Power to extract insight from Nature and from direct experience of Life, thus becoming Self-Enlightened as opposed to being told how to think and how to believe by a dead book written by others who are most often dead themselves.

The field or causal environment is the world of experience. An untamed Mind, no matter how smart it may be, has very little if any command or control of what it experiences in life. As yet another illustration my bhikkhu grandpa told me about Mind: There are two big elephants pulling a helpless villager into the water. The villager struggles and screams for help because he doesn't want to drown, but the elephants – beings much bigger than the man – pulls him into the water and he suffers [dukkha]. The two elephants are "habit of action" and "habit of mind," or in other words: Inner and Outer Ethos. The helpless villager is Chitta [Consciousness/You]. Such habits [ethos] of action and Mind [way of thinking, thought-process] manifests into what we experience and drags our conscious mind along. Untamed, unskilled, Ethos of action and Mind, born from ignorance and delusion, generates an experiential world of suffering. Habits are hard to break. And most often, we don't realize anything is wrong until such habits break us first.

So to me, something like memes [beliefs, ideas, thoughts, and such] are very important. Because these things, the ethos that arises from them, can not only affect my perception of things, but can drag me into a world of delusion and suffering.

Direct Experience

I am the kind of person that cannot allow myself to accept or believe in anything which I have not somehow experienced directly. Especially if they are thoughts and beliefs originating from the written words of other people. One who struggles to Tame the Mind must cultivate its content very carefully. What I believe, mostly arises from the experience in life I have directly touched or that have directly affected me. What I know comes from three main sources: 1) my own direct experiences; 2) my own understandings of nature; & 3) living people who have also accumulated wisdom in the same direct manner. I only use books as footnotes, and references.

There are several names and terms for learning and growing or evolving as a person by direct experience of life, and direct apprehension of Nature in different Cultures and Traditions. David Myatt aptly describes one such term and method:

“The Greek term ????? ????? (pathei-mathos) derives from The Agamemnon of Aeschylus (written c. 458 BCE), and can be interpreted, or translated, as meaning learning from adversary, or wisdom arises from (personal) suffering; or personal experience is the genesis of true learning.

“However, this expression should be understood in context, for what Aeschylus writes is that the Immortal, Zeus, guiding mortals to reason, has provided we mortals with a new law, which law replaces previous ones, and this new law – this new guidance laid down for mortals – is pathei-mathos.

“Thus, for we human beings, pathei-mathos possesses a numinous authority – that is, the wisdom, the understanding, that arises from one’s own personal experience, from formative experiences that involve some hardship, some grief, some personal suffering, is more valuable than any doctrine, than any religious faith, than any impersonal words one might read in some book.

“The essential difference between these two ways is that what we may call the way of pathei-mathos is the personal way of direct experience, while the religious way is the way of abstractions. For the way of pathei-mathos, knowledge – and thus learning, based on such knowledge – is personal, direct, acquired in the immediacy of a living, a lived-through, moment of one’s own mortal life. For the religious way, knowledge – and thus learning, based on such knowledge – can be and has been contained in something otherthan- ourselves which we have to or which we can learn from: something impersonal, some abstraction, such as a book, a dogma, a creed, some Institution, some teacher or master.” – From Aeschylus To The Numinous Way; David Myatt

Although the term “Pathei-Mathos” is new to me, the essence of the term is something I had long lived by, had been taught, and which had been around in my own culture for about a thousand years. Vibhajjavada is the term I am familiar with which is a concept similar [NOT the same thing] in Essence as Pathei-Mathos. It should be emphasized that each word describes it's own unique concept, methodology, and approach. About ~75% of what I know in my head comes from reflecting and studying my own life experiences, my elders, and from the Forest Doctrine [studying and meditating on Nature]. Because of this, I have a hard time referencing sources when I do share insight: it's not like I can refer people to my grandpa or some personal experience I may have had when I was 10.

People who are used to accumulation of information from dead books and the internet seem to consider information and insight that lacks verifiable references to be invalid. Many of these people never really consider that their information may not even be Primary Source Information, or that it is lifeless knowledge gained from reading a dead book. And that the Original Source of such book knowledge was somebody's own direct observation and direct experiences. I think some doctor once said: "You can't genuinely understand Life from studying a dead body."

Pathei-Mathos and Living Culture versus book based knowledge is like cooking. To illustrate: I learned how to make spaghetti from Kayla who is a living person. She learned how to make spaghetti from her mother who is a living person. And her mother learned it directly from her mother who is Italian, and so on. So we see that the "style" or methodology of making spaghetti I got from Kayla came from a Living Tradition. This living tradition has had a long time of application, trial, test, research & development to refine itself and evolve its own unique methods, style, and flavour. The uniqueness of putting a few "drops" of olive oil, a "pinch" of salt, a "tip" of fresh basil, and a two "thumb's length" of rosemary into a pot of water and using sun dried tomatoes with the sauce and so on. So this living tradition which I got has had time to work out its bugs, to figure out what makes the spaghetti taste better and stuff. There was never anything Dogmatic about the methods I was taught from Kayla.

But let's say that I wanted to share this family recipe with others. So I write a cook book and I try to explain in words what I was taught. This is when what was once a living culture is captured into dead words, like something living and evolving has been turned into stone. This is when problems come into the picture. Let's say a group of friends on the other side of the world China buys my book and studies how to make Kayla's spaghetti. This Chinese group – because they have no real connection to a living culture – follows the book Dogmatically. If the book says "half a pot of water," or a few "drops," or a "pinch" debates and arguments may arise as to what exactly a drop or a pinch is, or how long "two thumb's length" of rosemary is exactly. The belief may arise – from ignorance – that if they do not follow the book exactly, that they are not cooking real Italian Spaghetti. They forget – or are not aware – that such recipes and traditions, have literally had hundreds of years of freedom to evolve, adapt, change, and mutate.

Wisdom versus book based knowledge is the same way. I'll use Buddhism as an example because its something I have direct experience with. I do have certain major contentions with Buddhism spreading in the West and being adopted by Westerners. I think it is wonderful, but I also think most in general apprehend Buddhism in the wrong way.

I got my "Buddhism" from my mom and elders in my family. I have never read a "holy book" on Buddhism, nor have I ever heard anyone recite "Buddhist scriptures" to me. I am taught by my elders as I go along in life. My mothers [I have two] teach me what I need to know according to my level of understanding and experience in life. They learned about it in the same way: from living people, from monks and lay elders: Sangha. That Sangha/Community is a nexus and nexion through which a living culture passes naturally from one generation to the next.

That Sangha is like a snake which sheds its old skin over time. It regenerates itself with each new generation as the old one dies. It transcends Time. And over the hundreds and thousands of years of that Sangha's living existence, it's collective direct experiences and application of Buddhism, it has had Time to work out the "bugs" in Buddhism. To figure out how things about Buddhism best work in life. Its own experiences, application, and insights borne from such trial of application supersedes written words: the Tipitakas are only guide lines which are not infallible and must be testes and tried in life. So what I have gotten from my family, living culture, and community as Buddhism, may and does differ from what was written circa 2500 years ago in books.

But – generally speaking – when a Westerner becomes a Buddhist, it happened like a Christian conversion or a college course. They read a book by the Dalai Lama, or research online, or read the Tipitakas, like what they read, and choose to identify their ego/self as a "Buddhist" meaning one who follows what has been read and written. These people assume that being Buddhist means accepting what Monks and Dalai Lamas have written or that being Buddhist means behaving and doing what other Buddhists do. When they do something or experience something which deviates from what they have read, this deviation shakes up their superficial or ego-identification as a Buddhist. In their sincerity they may be devoted to Buddha, and try faithfully to follow Dhamma; but the general Occidental Buddhism is completely devoid of the third Jewel: Sangha; which cuts them off from living wisdom, a means to learn from a living culture, and a means to apply and practice Buddhism. As Buddhism is a social and communitarian way of life where one helps relieve the suffering and wants of those around you: Community/Order/Fellowship of Bhikkhus, Bhikkhunis, Upasakas, and Upasikas which is Sangha. In Buddhist Cultures, the Sangha is most often made up of ones own kinfolk, relatives, and friends.

One example of this phenomenon is the first Precept of Buddhism: "I will refrain from killing." A living culture which has had a thousand years to test and try this precept in the real world understands the meaning of this precept and knows why this precept exists, and understands what Context and Condition such a precept is applied. On the other hand, people who depend on the written word base their beliefs NOT on direct experience, but on interpretation of words become gripped with confusion due to misinterpretations, misunderstandings, born from a lack of application of vibhajjavada, praxis, and life experience. So some such Buddhists may interpret this precept to mean that as a Buddhist one should be vegetarian as to not harm and kill animals. Some may interpret this precept to mean that as an ego which superficially identified itself with Buddhism, that a Buddhist cannot join the military.

They fail to realize that in the real world – the world beyond dead letters, written words, theoretical conceptualization and intellectualization – the Buddha ate meat and died eating meat [he ate meat which was poisoned]; that the Buddha never condemned or suggested that those kings and warriors who came to him to give up their capital punishment of criminals and their wars to live like pacifist beggars; that living Theravada Cultures such as Thailand, Laos, Burma, Cambodia, and Sri Lanka have armies, raise farm animals, eat meat, kill, and engage in wars; yet they are the most devout Buddhist Cultures; and that Shaolin Monks invented, teach, and use many forms of lethal martial arts.

The difference is Time and Direct Experience versus written words and the interpretation of those words. Both give birth to Belief Patterns. One set of Beliefs is tied and bond to Life, whereas the other is very removed from Life. If Life is the ultimate Primary Source, then books are merely secondary sources of information: merely someone's opinions, convictions, and interpretation of Life. What is wrong with you that you can't put your own self in the middle of feral Life and from your own direct experiences and direct apprehension, form your own opinions, convictions, and interpretations? Why have many of us become dependent on others to tell us what reality is, what to believe and disbelieve, what is right and wrong, true and false?

I do believe that each Initiate of the Order of Nine Angles should strive to understand the difference between these two forms of belief patterns, and to strive to cultivate insight, wisdom, and knowledge from application and trial of theories and principles, praxis, and Pathei-Mathos. Each of us Dreccians should learn to understand that what has been written are just words: only the words of one man, one girl, or one fellow mortal struggling to understand the mysterious reality we all exist in. These many words written in the ONA should only be used as guides, like a crudely drawn map of a barely explored landscape. It is what we each experience and learn while we travel this unexplored landscape that is our genuine knowledge and wisdom. Road maps can be wrong. My friends and I were up in Big Bear this one time and we were trying to find the freeway so we were following the GPS lady. She told us to turn onto some small steep dirt road which we assumed would take us to the freeway: our car almost slid into the lake below.

I also believe that the ONA should strive to make itself into a new living tradition wherein we each share our Life borne insights, knowledge, and wisdom with each other, and pass such things down to our progeny. We can see this already happening. As of now, the ONA has become an expressive culture of living people sharing their insights borne from their personal quest and pathei-mathos. Anton Long began it and continued to share his insights for 40 years. During which time many others came and went sharing and teaching what they know. I am just one, of many now, and I hope many will continue this way and tradition of living Initiates sharing insights based on their own personal quest and direct experiences for our own common and collective growth, evolution, and progression.

Continuing something old and ancient as a modern belief pattern is something I do not agree with. As insightful as I personally find Buddhism to be, I cannot accept it as my Software because it does not address my real world needs, concerns, current world views, and visions for a future. If we hold onto the past or things of the past we anchor ourselves and this has an affect on our Potential to actualize all that we are worth and capable of striving for. I do believe that the only way to influence and inspire each new generation to reach for the next stage in human evolution is to inspire us and them with new ideas, new memes, and new biological software that inspires us and them to reach for the stars.

Beliefs

Our Beliefs shapes our world and wyrdfully gives rise to our experiences in Life. Generally speaking, I classify Beliefs into 3 different “species” or categories: 1) Personal; 2) Consequential; and 3) Trivial. Each species of belief patterns or memes is measured by its causal effectiveness or potency: meaning if and what they can/cannot manifest.

Personal Memes are ideas and belief patterns that actually causally generates something measurable and observable in your Personal life. For example the belief that I am ugly or fat does have a direct material, mental, emotional, and physical influence and effect on me. Practical belief patterns also fall into this category. Such as the practical belief that eating healthy, working out, and staying fit is good for me. Practical and pragmatic belief patterns like if I go to school and work hard I will get a good paying job, and that if I learn to save money in a savings, stocks, 401K's, and Bonds now, that when I retire I will live very well off. These are practical and pragmatic belief patterns which have a very real affect on life that we can each personally observe and experience.

Consequential Memes are a step further from personal apprehension and direct experience. Mythos of certain types may be such a Belief Pattern. Such as the Mythos of the Vedas in consequentially gives rise to a common living culture and social group identity to an ordering of people [Hindus]. Like the Mythos of the Bible, Torah, or Qur'an consequentially gives rise to cultures, common practices, collective identity, and even civilizations. But belief patterns such like “nature was meant to be conquered” is also consequential because such belief patterns over time gives rise to deforestation, extinction of species, disharmony with nature, growing climate changes and so on. Consequential Memes are observable and measurable over long periods of time. The longer the time frame, the more pronounced it's causal effects. Thus, from the study of such consequential belief patterns in context to Time, we learn to understand and see with our own eyes that our Beliefs are not just intangible thoughts that stay in our minds. They have very real influences on people and real effects on the world.

Trivial Memes are useless beliefs that really do nothing personally or consequentially. If life were a house, Personal Belief Patterns are things like the stove, fridge, the shower, the toilet, and washing machine. Consequential Beliefs are like the furniture, the X-Box, the Wii, and so on. Trivial Beliefs are like the wall paper, décor, the paintings, the giant vase, and drapery. In real life Trivial beliefs are things like the idea of a finite or infinite or curved universe. It really doesn't matter whether you believe or disbelieve in such ideas or not because either way, it does and changes nothing. So you believe in the big bang: then what? So you think space is curved and wormholes can take you back into time: and then what? The belief that God is a trinity is Trivial: big whoop, why trinity, how about a quintinity instead.

Nothing spectacular happens anywhere whether I believe in such trivial memes or not. The belief in Lovecraftian god creatures from some Lovecraftian otherworldly realm is Trivial. How does believing or disbelieving in such a meme relate to my personal needs in life, my relationships with people in life, what I want of life, and where I want to go in life, and what I want the world to be like? The idea of killing millions of people not like you is sinister, is pointless: how about a billion or a trillion? It's sinister to enslave the human race: why just human mundanes; lets enslave aliens from other planets too and all abled bodied life forms from other galaxies too? Taking over the world is sinister: why stop at the world; lets be supersinister and take over every multiverse system too while we're make believing.

We as people tend to keep Personal Memes or practical memes closer to us because these types of memes tend to stay relevant to us longer: relevant to our personal and direct life, needs, and experiences. Memes such that helps us get better jobs, be better people, make more money and friends, get more out life, those that help us develop better relationships with others, that teaches us to get material needs and wants out of life stay relevant to us over long periods of time. Trivial beliefs are changed, adopted, and thrown away easily with a change in mind. This understanding of the enduring nature or easy trashability of memes is important for a Memeplex or Institution which desires to exist for a long time and which desires to remain relevant to successive generations of people into the future.

If you base your entire memplex on useless trival ideas/memes, your institution will get a high turn over rate: meaning that people will come and go often. High turn over rate in the business arena is bad because your business lacks the ability to generate or develop a dependable market and loyal consumer base. A corporation and/or product that does not have a dependable market and loyal consumer base will not sell stocks and is thus financially broke and worthless. A memeplex that does not have a dependable market and loyal consumer fanbase is broke in social capital and worthless. If a memeplex is bankrupt in social capital and worthless, then it does have the means or potency of influence. This understanding is simple "social mathematics," and the backbone of politics, political and sectarian power and influence. You need power and influence if change in people, society, and civilization is desired. A memeplex with a lot of useless trivial memes does not last and is impotent as far as social engineering is concerned. Unless you anchor your trivial memes to consequential memes such as a reward and punishment: heaven, hell, paradise, reincarnation, etc. These beliefs are "consequential" because they do alter our behaviour and ethos of mind, which wyrdfully translates over time into causal results.

The most enduring memes are Personal Memes in the form of Cultural Memes. By Cultural Memes, I mean to say an indigenous people's Way of Life, and their Traditions. Such memes even transcends humanity. This species of memes can even be seen in Chimpanzee culture. For example the meme of sticking a thin twig down a termite mound to fish for termites, or the use of a rock to crack open nuts. These are practical memes that over time becomes Culture which is past down from one living entity to another. Thus, such a culture is, in every sense of the phrase, a Living Tradition. This example of chimpanzee cultural memes works well also because it is a knowing and wisdom each chimp apprehends which is not book based or dogmatic which yields very measurable and practical results that each chimp can personally see and experience.

The same goes for human culture. Personal Memes like indigenous dress codes, codes of behaviour such as manners and paying respect to one's elders, cultural dances and art, rites of passage, methods of farming and styles of architecture, dialect of language. All these memes come together to form a Memeplex that out lives even religion and civilization. How many civilizations and religious sects have come and gone in places like Europe, India, and China? Yet despite the rise and fall of political and religious regimes and movements, the peoples of these lands have remained culturally intact over the countless millennia. Of course – as anything living – such cultural memplexes have evolved and adapted over time to what changes and challenges such living cultures meets and faces. Without evolution and progression, all things, even memplexes die.

What will this ONA become in the years ahead? What kind of ideas/memes will it fill itself up with? Trivial ideas and useless beliefs? With consequential memes that generates negative results in time? Or will it be and become something meaningful and practical. A living culture and tradition that endures the ravage of Time?

Software

Usually when we find new computer software we install it and give it a try to figure out if we like the program or not. We usually [unless you're a supernerd] don't actually read the software coding and judge the program on what coding we read. So for the typical binary-code illiterate person like myself, we install the software and if it does things we like we keep it. But if it messes our computer up, we quickly delete the program and throw it away. If we take so much care to do this with our computers, than why not with our own Minds?

Generally we ignorantly adopt a belief because it sounds good to us, or because we have been convinced by others to adopt a belief. Yet we never pay any attention to what such biological or neurological software does to us, what such software turns us into, what they make us do, how they make us see the world, and most importantly: the causal End Results such beliefs bares. Sometimes we can't even see or get ourselves to understand that our beliefs we have installed into our Minds has very negative and destructive results, consequences, and effects on our person and in our lives.

We continue to judge a meme or memplex based on some silly notion of whether they are believable or not. Whether they are factual or "fake." Whether they are true or not. When such factors have very little relevance to the power and potential of memes to influence, effect, and manifest experiential End Results. It does not matter if a belief pattern is false or true, believable or unbelievable. What matters is what each meme/belief pattern does and the fruits such beliefs bares. Mythos does not always have to be factually true, if it generates a stronger tribal identity and bond between tribal members of an indigenous folk, then it has produced a positive and productive yield.

The belief that drug and alcohol are bad is debatable, but agreeing with or disagreeing, debating and arguing with it is not the issue. However you see it, if you abuse drugs and alcohol, it will fuck your life up in many ways, which is a negative and destructive yield. Whether or not Communism is true or fake or whatever is irrelevant. What truly matters is its causal End Result. What conditions of life and what kinds of people has Communism manufactured? Whether Capitalism is good or bad is irrelevant. What genuinely matters is the End Results such a memetic software engineers. What is the condition of life and people Capitalism engineers and creates? Is that condition what you have always dreamed of living? You can't dream or envision anything better? Is a consumer trained to work and buy to support wealthy and powerful oligarchies the type of human being you have always wanted to be? You can't dream or envision of a better type of human being?

Memeplexes such as religion is the same way. It's not a case of whether a religion is true or fake, or if a religion is rational or irrational. What we must each learn to observe, assess, and evaluate is what kinds of people these religious software manufactures. Think of religions as being factories that manufactures self-replicating products. The Question is what KIND of product are these software producing and putting into the world. Over Time the generic product of a memeplex can be seen.

Ask yourself what kinds of people the memeples of LaVeyan Satanism manufactures. This memeplex has had 50 years of production. 50 years of consumers downloading their LaVeyan Software. What good has come out of San Francisco? After 50 years of LaVeyan Software, what kinds of people has Modern Satanism produced? How many millionaires? How many are successful in life? How many live the life of their dreams? How many live in the home of their dreams? How many don't have fat ugly girlfriends? LaVey died broke and alone. Zeena does so much drugs she barely has any teeth left in her mouth. Not only did that "family" not even function properly, but the individual members of the LaVey family don't even function properly as individuals.

What great products ever came out of the ToSer Software besides a handful of internet forum jockies making posts about some trivial Egyptian god? What is your typical Setian like as a person, in thought, and what kind of life are they living? Do you want to be like them? Do you want to play pretend games with Aquino and make believe his imaginary friend Set is relevant to anything? What kind of people does the occult scene manufacture? Besides lunatics like crazy fat ladies who give psychic reading to horses and pets. Crazy people wasting their lives chasing after imaginary super powers to make their dreams come true, all the while neglecting life, disconnected from life and lost in occult memes, and lacking the social skills to actually get what they want and need out of life in a real practical way? Do you want to end up being a fat woman that talks to horses? Or a fat grand magister that drives a truck and talks to the devil? What good does the Christian memeplex do but manufacture bigots and haters? Buddhism is just as bad, they misinterpret their religion to mean that being Buddhist means being pacifist wimps, and when China takes their country Tibet away they cry and whine like babies. Whose fault is it that Tibet is conquered and that Tibetans have lost their culture, their religious freedom, and now suffer in poverty and political tyranny?

Is this the kind of person you want to end up being? Do you want to be like these typical products of such memeplexes? Is that your highest aspiration in life: to be dysfunctional crazy good for nothing human beings that are only good for propagating useless religions? If it is, then I pity you because that's a very low and pathetic aspiration. Why is that that we can panic over how our computer is messing up because of shitty software, but when the software we install into our brains messes us up we ignore it and hold onto such destructive programs?

Now the Question for us in the ONA is what kind of factory can we make our ONA into, and what kind of people has it manufactured in the past, and what kinds of new human beings do we want to create for the future? It's all about the quality and potential of our Software. We determine the quality and value of the ONA by the Sinister Software we develop, the people we each become and what people our ONA is producing and will produce.

Do you as a Dreccian understand that you have great potential and that you can – with will and effort – become something more than what you are? Does the ONA help you actualize that latent potential? Do we as Dreccians dream of a better world, have visions of a greater civilization, and greater starborn humanity? Does our ONA Software in any way help facilitate and actualize those dreams and visions? If it doesn't then these are practical programs we each need to look into further. Is the ONA relevant to your personal needs, your personal growth and evolution, your personal world view? Does ONA help you live the life you want, manifest what you want and need out of life? If not then these are programs we also need to consider.

We are each in life a living testament to what the ONA is. We are each a living product of what the ONA produces and yields. Most institutions out there that exist have been around for years, hundreds of years, and thousands of years. Do you like what kinds of people they have manufactured? If not, then the only option we have is to create our own memetic factory which will engineer the type, quality and kind of people we want to become, and what kinds of people we will need to help us actualize our vision. What we believe, what ideas and beliefs we agree or disagree with matters very little. What matters is what those beliefs/software causes us to Become. Our beliefs – although ethereal – truly does have a very real affect on our Minds, Feelings, Actions, and World. Mastering Life begins with Mastering one's own Mind. If we want to change the World and Ourselves, it begins with our Minds and what we clutter it with.

RESPONIENDO EL ETER

Respondiendo El Eter

Too bad I don't know enough Spanish to make any sense. Otherwise I'd pinche translate ONA stuff into Espanol por mis gentes, tu sabes guey! I was reading around old ONA MSS, and interviews with Beesty Boy. So I thought I'd make up questions about certain topics and answer them. But first a couple quick subjects I saw about ONA and this blog at a weird site which linked here. There were a few people there who had some great things to say about ONA and there were a couple misunderstandings which I'll try and explain:

1. Somebody stated that "apparently ONA has thrown out all of their earlier work" and making new ones as an attempt to bring in the more New Age type.

1. Nobody I am aware of on the production end of ONA – Anton Long to the Old Guard to current Associates – has ever stated in word or writing that old ONA MSS were nullified and void or "thrown out." Every bit and piece of shit ever written thus far – since 1972 – by "Anton Long," R. Moulton, & Company is still – and will always be – a living part of the ONA. This included the Temple of THEM stuff and even the old Temple 88 writings. I would go so far [because I like his ONA stuff] as to say that Magister Hagur's ONA tracks are also ONA. All of that shit is "ONA," in quotes because if ONA Associates sees value in such shit, then its ONA.

If the ONA does not exist as an actual "Order," – which it doesn't – and if each ONA Associate makes the ONA, then ONA is whatever the hell we say it is at any point in time as a peer group. As of now, I have not come across one single ONA person who has said they wanted to throw out old ONA MSS. No such person with such "authoritative" power exists to even do so in ONA.

At no time have I ever said – nor will I ever – that what I write supplants or replaces other ONA people's writings. Besides, even if I said such a thing, I'm nobody to any genuine Initiate of the ONA to follow or believe. But concerning this topic of people implying or assuming or hinting that I have thrown out or replaced "old" ONA MSS, I'll let Jesus speak for me, since he said it best, and since I think Jesus was The Man: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." – Matt 5:17-18

Everything which has ever been written from day one [1972] by every ONA Initiate is still – and will always be – a living part of ONA which will never be nullified or discarded. They simply can't be, if things like the concept of the Sinister Dialectic is genuinely understood. It really doesn't matter Who wrote what. The matter is whether what they have written has value to the individual ONA Initiate. No single person speaks for all other ONA Initiates. It's not how ONA works. ONA is literally nothing more than all of its writings. You yourself, as an independent and autonomous associate who resonates with ONA, takes that corpus of writing and express it, and you by yourself go through the Seven Fold Way at your own pace. You yourself study whatever written stuff in ONA. You may like some, and not others. But your private sentiments has no authority over any other person who chooses to associate with and live ONA.

That's if we are thinking for ourselves. If I don't personally like the "Satanic" stuff in ONA, what in the real hell does it – and should it – have to do with other ONA people? Do I think for you? Am I your mom? Are you paying me to think for you? If you, or some other ONA person does not like some aspects or written material of ONA, fine. But who died and made you king of ONA people? Why does the world or ONA have to conform to your standards, or mine, or anyone elses? I thought the ONA as it is put together was an Individual path, of Individual people striving in their Individual lives toward adeptship? Where in your intelligence does the concept of Individualization mean adopting the dictates and standards of others?

Some of you people in this stupid occult scene really need to grow the fuck up and stop acting like children. Stop looking for or projecting a nanny to think for you, tell you what to read, believe, or how to live your life. Grow the hell up and do that shit yourself. Keep that baby shit out of ONA. There are no leaders or person of authority in ONA who can say such and such is or is not "officially" or "unofficially" ONA. There is only a loose association of peers sharing a common "ONA" thing, who may agree but often will disagree. Don't let me or anybody tell you what is or isn't ONA. And don't assume you can tell me what ONA is or isn't either. Especially if you are on the sidelines spectating.

As far as New Age people, the 5 Core Principles of ONA and the Sinister Dialectic together serves as a way to keep them mundanes out. Unless you like the idea of culling, racialism, crime etc., you have no place in ONA proper.

2. Another subject brought up at that site by someone jumping to unverified conclusions was that "ONA was going Buddhist since David Myatt was all into his Numinous Way."

Nobody in ONA is "going Buddhist." ONA is not "Buddhist," no more than it is "Satanist."

These are Outer Forms. I have not “gone Buddhist” either. I was born and raised Buddhist, in a Buddhist culture, and I belong to a Buddhist people. My Buddhism has been evolving with my culture and people for at least 1000 years. So the culture, folk, Buddhism, language, weltanschauung are all entwined as a single fabric. This means that whatever I say, however I see the world, is going to be contaminated with my culture and Buddhism.

Just because I use Buddhism in my writing, does not mean in anyway that the whole “ONA” is now a Buddhist Sangha. As far as I know, I am perhaps the only ONA associate who writes about Buddhism along with ONA stuff. I am One Person, I am not the “ONA.” But it’s really flattering to see that some people out there equate what I personally write to be the “whole ONA.” Stupid people like you Mundanes, and this mentality or tendency you have, is what give to the “privileged,” politicians, and corporations “power.” That mental laziness you have.

If power is consented by the public or people [by your public opinion], and the people are mentally lazy, then your laziness of mind is what gives the power to others. If more of you lazily believed based off of unfounded assumptions, that what I simply and personally write is ONA, and that my personal opinions is ONA doctrine, then because of your Public Opinion [collectively] you make me the authority of an ONA. Keep that shit up, please. And then after you give random people power, you bitch and complain. Just like you do with your politicians you elect; as if other people besides you yourselves as The People, elected them.

I wish I was the whole ONA. Seriously. I have entertained the idea often of somehow kicking everybody out of ONA, or somehow liquidating it, so I can be the only “ONA Initiate” in ONA. That way, I can make it into whatever I want for my target market. Unfortunately there are many other ONA people just as ONA as I am, who may have been in it longer than me. And also unfortunately I like the idea of ONA being a peer based group of loosely associated Associates. I’d like to see ONA stay this way, and I will do what I can to make sure it does.

ONA is not a Buddhist organization. And it did not become Buddhist because of David Myatt getting back into his Numinous Way. I was born in the 80’s, and from then till now I have been a Buddhist regardless of what DWM may have been into. I started writing for ONA just 4 years ago, which – if you actually observed – was the time Buddhist shit got mixed with ONA stuff.

Even if the assumption were true, there is no shame in admitting that the ONA is influenced by DWM lol. If – if – he created ONA, then he can do whatever the hell he wants with it. And as the consumer of his product he made, you – the common public joe – have no real say in anything. All you can do as a spectator is bitch. Let’s keep shit in perspective. You are spectators watching and reacting just like you watch and react to the sports you watch. All you can do as sideliners and spectators is bitch and complain. Which does nothing in life. It certainly isn’t going to change shit in ONA. I mean I describe ONA as a business, but it isn’t a real one. You the window shopper/spectator don’t mean shit to anybody ONA. I certainly don’t exist as an ONA person to make ONA “your way, right away.”

ONA doesn’t exist to change itself to be more likable and agreeable to you Mundanes. If it’s one thing anybody should have learned in Life, it’s that you cannot live to please everybody. The very basic meaning of Selfish or Self-Centered, means you primarily are focused on your own Self, and not living for others or existing to make other happy, or to appease others. If the individual person is selfish, then ONA collectively is concerned only with it Self. Deal with it. You Mundane satanists have this double standard you yield where you make a big fit over being selfish and demand others recognize your self-centered nature as satanists, but yet you expect others to give their own self oriented nature up to appease you. Because you have opinions, because you don't like how they believe, because you don't like how they live their life, because they don't conform to your views, and subjective standards, and so on.

Also as of now DWM – if you haven't been following – has publicly renounced his Numinous Way for many reasons he gave. He is now running with a something called the “Way of Pathei-Mathos.”

And while we are speaking publicly of DWM, as far as ONA and DWM goes, for the next 40 years, David Myatt has nothing to do with ONA. And he never has. I'll be the first to admit that I contradict myself. For the past 3 years I said he has, and now I say he hasn't. Oh well. In Private nothing has ever changed. In Public, things will change often depending on what you – the public commoner – need to know and believe. Let he who has an ear to hear, Understand. “And he said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables.” – Mark 4:11

David Myatt even admitted to you – the public – that he created the ONA as a neo-nazi honeytrap. He also stated that he was only involved for 1 year and left. After which time others simply ran with the idea. So as far as public history goes, the original ONA only lived for 1 year, and it was fake. What was ONA after that 1 year has nothing to do with David Myatt in any public way. ONA has been around for 40 years since 1972. The ONA for the past 39 years [1973-present] is not the one made by David Myatt as a honeytrap which only was used for 1 year.

Don't say I never told you or was ever honest with you public people now. I share because I care. The fake ONA was real only for a year and the real ONA is fake for many years because the fake ONA is less real than the real one which is fake since the real ONA was never real and the fake ONA was always fake, but the fake ONA was real in a fake way for a year and the real ONA is fake in the real kind of way until now. Something like that. It's all true.

I will repeat it for the public record: For the next 40 years, David Myatt has nothing to do with the ONA, by his own public statements. As far as the public goes, who knows who was behind “Anton Long.” Could have been anybody?! Nobody in and of the ONA actually cares. But you common public people seem to give a big ole shit about it since you haven't stopped talking about it in your sites and forums since whenever. Everybody is speculating, and of course each of your speculations is Enough to make you feel like you are right. I love how the human mind works.

From my very reliable source, I hear that after DWM left ONA, somebody named Antony played the part of Anton Long. And Antony had three wives [at different times] named Hellen MacMorfran, Celeste Moulette, & Haifa ibna Al-Hayat, a daughter named... Lianna MacMorfran, and two sons; one named... Enrique “le Petit Bête” Moulette and the other named... Daud “Al-Qariah” ibn Al-Hayat. Antony worked in the big office skyscraper in the... metropolitan area of downtown Shropshire just across the street from the Bank of Shrewberry. Hellen, she was a double decked bus driver. Antony met Celeste in France at the Moulon Rouge, when he was on a business trip. Later a Lebanese friend of his introduced him to Haifa, a beautiful tone deaf singer devoid of singing ability. But Antony did not mind Haifa’s lack of singing skills, for she was skilled in other ways. Lianna, I heard was going to a university and married a professor there after she graduated. Then the professor – a Cambridge don juan – played the part of Anton Long for a while. He was known in private circles as the “Cambridge Don Juan Mack Daddy Anton.” That’s all I know. Now for the questions.

Q. What’s up with the maze of manuscripts?

A. It all helps separate the stupid from the rest. There are generically two types of people. The first are those that can’t think for themselves. This type usually believes what they read [especially if its written on the internet] or are told and lack the ability to verify information. The second type are those that have a mental habit of verifying information they hear and read. And so, as dummies read all of these ONA MSS, they will get confused about what ONA is, if they really do ritually sacrifice men to satan, if they are bent on destroying society. Usually such dumb types on the internet get very selective with ONA. They usually do not consider entire core books of ONA, and simply believe that only some of “Anton Long’s” philosophical tracts equals ONA. Naos, Codex Saerus, Hostia, etc do not exist, or are conveniently brushed out of the mind. Or they reject tracts by Anton Long, and simply believes the traditional stuff is all the ONA is. In other words – like Robert Anton Wilson said – “We see what we want to see.”

You get dummies that read shit, and they will have assumptions and believe what they read, without ever trying to verify their data. They will hang onto their unverified speculations and assumptions as long as such makes them feel better than others like they are winning at something. The phrase “thinking for yourself” here can be “equivocated” or parsed by these types to mean that because they have read something, and because they have come up with their own conclusions all by themselves, they are thinking for themselves. The phrase which better fits this type is: “Thinking by yourself.” Because that’s what they are doing. They read shit, don’t bother asking people or verifying shit, and they come up with their own unverified speculative conclusions. Usually these conclusions are subjective and assumptive. Then these types – after extrapolating their conclusions – will turn their unverified and unconfirmed conclusions into Convictions. Thinking stops with Conviction.

There is no rational point in arguing with someone who is fixated in their convictions. Because we don’t argue or debate to uncover facts or truths in all practicality. We debate and argue most often to look better than others in the eyes and sentiments of a desired market [set of people], to sway public opinion in your favour. By public opinion here specifically, I mean the spectators of any given social framework/subculture. You have the “Players” and the “Spectators.” Arguing and debating is simply a means for most “Players” to swing their dicks around to win the support and favour of the spectators. Look at the Quality of your market/spectators, seriously. It’s not a coveted market.

The second type has a mental culture we call in Khmer to be “Asa.” Asa means when you always stay busy doing something. Always keeping busy, physically and mentally. My step dad is an Asa person. If he’s not at his shop fixing computers and television sets, he’s at home in the garden, trimming trees, fixing our cars, messing with the knobs and plumbing. And he also has that same culture of being Asa in mind, where if he is curious he’ll first share his views or opinions about what thing he wants to know, then he’ll ask around to try and get confirmation, verification, know-how, and so on. And he doesn’t just ask one person. The Asa in mind type badgers people left and right asking the same questions. My step dad never graduated high school, since his education process was interrupted by a revolution. Everything he knows how to do today, such as fixing electronic devices, cars, to building houses, he learned from that Asa nature of just bugging people and helping them out to learn things. He owns his own business today.

Asa is the second word in the Pali word Upasaka. The word is Upa+Asa+Aka. Upa means next to, up near, close by. Asa means what I explained up there. And Aka is the male suffix which corresponds the English suffix -Er, as in Builder. It’s a word referring to a male associate of the Ariyasanga [~Noble Order], or in other words a “Buddhist.” The word means an “Assistant,” or “Helper.” It literally means The One Who Is Close By And Asa. The female form is Upasika. The Upasaka in its ancient native weltanschauung is actually more than a “helper.” The Upasaka has a specific physical and mental habit or nature to them. A very good secretary of an office guy is a good example of the nature of a genuine Upasika.

This good secretary not only takes her boss’s phone calls, and keeps notes and appointments for her boss, but she can take an order of few words and make things happen without having to be told. Her boss can simply say: “I need to be in London next week for a meeting.” That’s all the secretary needs because she has that mental culture of researching for hotels in London, calling contacts, booking rooms and flights to make the “will” of her boss happen. That’s an Upasika. She can make things happen without being babysitted.

The word Upasaka originally in ancient times was an architectural title of one who was the helper or assistant of what was once called a “kammaka” which originally meant One Who [-aka], Builds/Constructs [Kamma/Karma]. In Khmer – via the Sanskrit – our word for Work/Labour is Kar [said as a Brit would, with a soft “K”], which is the root in Kar-ma. One Brahmanist diety still retains the older meaning of Karma in his name. He is Vishvakarma. His name means the Universal Architect, or Omnipresent Architect, or Supreme Architect of the Universe. A.U.M.: Artifex Universalis Mundi. A Dharma in those ancient times was what you called the “blueprint,” literally meaning “That Which Is Fundamental,” or “That Which Is The Foundation,” or a “Constitution” which describes how a structure or system is to work or look.

In my culture there is a sacred day out of the year where people gather at the temples, monks will dig a hole and lay stones and offering in the hole. The temple goers give these offering and then offer food for the monks [bindbat]. It’s a sacred day dedicated to some diety I thought was Vishnu, since I hear the god’s name sounding like that with my ear. But I never see statues of Vishnu and I can never connect what walking around a temple, consecrating dirt, digging holes, and laying stones in holes had anything to do with Vishnu? So I asked my aunt-mom why we’re doing this for Vishnu? My Aunt-mom goes: “Not Vishnu: Bisnu, Bee-Snoo.” It turned out that Bisnu is the Khmer form of Vishvakarman, the Supreme Builder of the World. On Bisnu's day, the monks and temple goers re-enact a temple precinct consecration rite, where they ritualistically consecrate ground, dig, and lay stones in the hole which represents the foundation of a temple/world. In ancient times blood sacrifice were performed and the animals also put in the Foundation, but today cooked food and meat is used.

Back to Dhamma. Just the other day I went to visit a Thai temple near my house to hang out with some of the monks and chit chat. The wat is associated with the Thai Forest Tradition. Some of the older monks speak Khmer, and the Novice monks speak English. I met a really cool ex-bhikkhu [samanera] that day who was a few years older than me. He was in normal civilian clothing like me, and after greeting him we talked. I told him I was Thai so he clasped his hands all proper and said: “Sawa di kap,” and spoke fluent Thai to me. So I had to tell him I don't speak it, only English and some Khmer. I told him I came to talk with the elder Bhikkhus, specifically the one who knew how to read your fortune. So my new friend told me he was a monk for 3 months, and that he did it to repay his debt to his parent, which is something many boys in our culture do.

I asked my new friend if he liked being a monk, and he said that he really did, but he had to leave the temple to be normal again to finish college and pay his college loans, but now that he has that all settled he was going to be a monk for the rest of his life. The more I talked to him about what he learned during his 3 months of intensive training as a monk, the more I realized we understood concepts in Theravada in the same way. I had never met an English speaking Theravada anybody who understood Theravada the same exact way I do. It was like I was hearing my own thoughts. And the best part was he was fluent and articulate in English!

So our conversation – a conversation between a female ONA Initiate and a ex-Buddhist monk returning to the robes mind you – went into the concept of Dhamma [dharma]. I was thinking to myself that this conversation, and how my new friend understood the concept of dhamma was the “test.” 99% of the Buddhist I have thus far met, give me the usual shit you'd expect about dharma. He first asked me how I understood Dhamma. So I said that it was the Way or Essence of Nature. How it moves and works. That's Dhamma. Not Nature itself, I added, but the Foundation or Constitution from which what we know as Nature is borne or springs from into physical existence.

My ex-monk friend nodded his head with a big smile and told me something I did not know. He said: “Yes! Dhamma is the root in a Thai word we call “dhammachat” [my phonetic spelling as it sounds to my ear] which means Nature. It's said as “TAH-mah-jat.” So I added that in Khmer we have a word where dhamma is the root which is dhammata, meaning Natural or Normal. Dhammata [pronounced Tom-MAH-dah] is a direct borrowing of a Pali word of the same spelling and ancient meaning.

It has two parts: the root dhamma and the suffix -ta. Here the suffix -ta is similar or related to the English suffix -ity, like when I say Civil-ity meaning the State and Condition of being Civil. Dhammata means the State or Condition of being dhamma/Nature. Idiomatically we use it as an answer for when people ask us how we are doing today or how was our day. If we say, I feel “dhammata” it means we feel Natural or Normal. Similar to the French “comme ci, comme ca,” but not exactly the same. Culturally, the shade of meaning of dhammata means that things at the moment is not Artificially induced. Meaning you don’t feel either Happy or Angry, excited or sad; things are neither good or bad. Neither here nor there, but in the Natural “middle” state of naturalness. Those feelings are stimulated into our hearts from outside stuff. Being angry or mad is not our natural state of being. It is either an agitated or outside induced/influenced experience of feeling. By “natural state of being” I want to mean like a still pond. And by “artificially induced” I want to mean like a pebble thrown into that pond causes ripples in the surface which was not there before.

All that put together helps hint at what Dhamma is, or what is meant by the approximation of a “foundation” or “blueprint.” Dhamma is not Nature itself. Nature is the Form, manifested onto and into our physical world of experience, which we are a part and aspect of. Dhamma is the foundation of that Corporeal Nature/Reality. The closest Western idea I can come up with is “Phenomena,” which can be said to be the Foundation, or Constitutional parts, or Constituent parts of what we know of as Nature/Reality/World. I’m wondering if the English term “Quiddity of Nature” would be a close approximation to the Dhamma of Nature? No, quiddity [suchness/isness] sounds too “phantasmic.” The Buddha said that Dhamma is Observable and testable, and verifiable; so Phenomena might be the best English word I can think of right now. Since you can observe, test, and verify Natural Phenomena. I know little Western Philosophy, but what little I have gleaned from the Stoic use of the notion of “Logos,” seems it might be approximating the same Essential idea? But don’t take my word for it. So Dhamma to Nature is like a Blueprint is to a Temple, which was the other ancient use of the word dharma/dhamma.

So what happened in ancient times was your Master draws up his plans or designs on animal hide, and he gives that Dharma/Dhamma to his group of Upasakas [Journeymen]. What do the Journeymen do? The Journeymen have completed their Apprenticeship and have the wisdom & skill in their trade and craft. To do what? To take the Dharma given to them and Build it or Labour [karma/kamma] to make it real. This idea is greatly reinforced by how the old Buddhists in ancient times called the collection of Buddha’s Dhamma: Tipitaka, meaning Three [ti] Basket [pitaka]. In ancient times at construction sites baskets were used to haul earth and rocks first from the foundation area, then the Raw Material to actually build the structure. So as an Upasaka you should have the know-how [wisdom] and skills to make the dhamma happen. This implies that what is written is not the end in and of itself. The written is only the dhamma – the Blueprint – which is to be made real through your physical labour in life. Which is what the word Sasana means: Instructions to be followed for and End Result.

Asa is that quality, character, or nature of a busy-body who does not have to be told what to do or how to do things. They learn from watching and observing others, from first following instructions. They learn from direct experience and from direct observation, which in Theravada is called Vibhajjavada. Once they have acquired a skill or knowledge from a direct source, they are able to apply what they have learned to make what they know real. And this Asa type is the second type regarding these ONA manuscripts. They are the type to have that Asa mental habit or culture. If at first they are confused or don’t understand, instead of going on assumptions, they ask a person in ONA. This gives them a direct source of information, as opposed to mere assumptions. Instead of getting lost in the maze of manuscripts and rhetoric, they find someone who has walked the maze.

The second type with this Asa mental culture is also the type to once having learned the needed information directly, they can – like journeymen – work to make things happen on their own, without a supervisor and babysitter. What is written – every ONA MSS – is not the End. They are merely the drafted designs; some drafted to intentionally cause confusion. Just reading a blueprint and really knowing that blueprint well, does not make you an architect or journeyman. Reading and being familiar with a map of New York City, is far different than being a veteran taxi driver in the actual city who has been driving the streets of that city for years. The taxi driver doesn't need a map. You can be an expert on ONA MSS, and that don't mean shit. One can read every page of the tipitaka, but it don't mean you have realistically manifested the dhamma in your life and the world of experience. You can memorize the scientific method word for word, but that don't make you a scientist.

All the ONA is in reality is a pile of idea in manuscripts and PDF's. That is all it is. ONA is not an organization with a lodge you join to be a member. ONA is a written blueprint. It is up to each Novice of the Seven Fold Way to study this Blueprint as an Apprentice. And then as a Journeyman with the know-how, it is your job to take that Blueprint, and work to make it real. You don't "join" the ONA, because it does not exist to join. You have to Build it by living it and manifesting it through your actions in life. In the same way that in Asian cultures, you don't "join" the Ariyasanga [Buddhism]. You live it, and express its dhamma through how you live in Life. You simply associate with it and make it your Way of Life.

There is another architectural aspect of Buddhism often never noticed in Buddhism. The word "Sila" itself has a dozen meanings. Besides "moral virtue," Sila also means Nature, and a Stone or Rock. The Upasaka Builds [kamma] according to the blueprint [dhamma] with Sila [Stone]. The notion that Sila means both Nature and Stone is meaningful. In the symbolism used by the ancient and honourable society of Free & Accepted Masons, the two meanings of Sila corresponds to their concept of the "Rough Ashlar," and the "Perfect Ashlar." The rough ashlar is a stone cut from the quarry. In its Natural state it is rough at the edges. The job of the Journeyman is to take that stone in its rough state, and polish it – refine it – in such a way that the shape already there in the stone is expressed or accentuated, thus producing the Polished or Perfect Ashlar or Cube [the Philosopher's Stone], ready to be fitted in a building. If you pay close attention, you will realize that the Stone Cutter does not make that natural stone into anything it is not. The Builder merely refines the Cubical Nature of the stone already present within that stone.

"And he beheld them, and said, What is this then that is written, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner?" – Luke 20:17. Mother Nature & Father Time has endowed us with a physis or Nature. And there is nothing wrong with that Nature. It is not to be rejected, but made the Corner Stone. It is to be polished, refined, where what is already present in its rude state is drawn out and refined. For instance, it is natural for humans to make tools. So we take that already present nature of making tools and polish it, accentuate it, refine it such that we end up with something we call technology and technological advancement. If we seriously learn to Know Ourselves, and know our Physis, and we learn to polish what Nature has endowed us with, rather than reject it, we'll eventually come to understand our "destiny" or collective "role" in Nature and the bigger scheme of things.

In other words, we are not the End of Mother Nature & Father Time's work. We are merely a Means for Nature to further evolve, develop, and progress beyond, towards its own greater potential. We are a tool used by Nature and Time to refine Nature's rough edges, to accentuate Nature's potential. It took 4 billion years for Nature and Time to "invent" or produce a Mind such as ours. That Mind has great potential, limited only by its own creativity and imagination. It is that Mind and its potential which Nature and Time wrought, which will take the "world" or Nature or Life forward. I'm hinting at that Myattian notion of our Next Stage of Evolution. But that physis in us must be first recognized and Understood, before it can be refined. The Sila must be found, before it can be made into the Philosopher's Stone. Interestingly the Perfect Cube was a symbol of the god Saturnas, and Apollo. The Upasaka, Builder, Journeyman is the Nexion between the rough and the refined. Between what is naturally latent, and what will be expressed. Nature provides the blueprint. Man is the Builder. The dhamma is only a blueprint to be Expressed.

Show me a person who can Do Buddhism without the written stuff, and I'll show you a genuine Buddhist: one who lives it and applies it, as opposed to repeating verbally what he read or was taught. Show me a Niner or Dreccian who can Do ONA without the MSS, and I'll show you an adept of ONA Initiate. Studying the written instructions, or teachings is the chore of the Apprentice or Novice during his/her Novitiate. This is why the first Grade or Degree in the ONA's Seven Fold Way begins with the Novice finding every ONA MSS and studying them. There is something wrong with your intelligence if you can't get past your novitiate mentality. I don't care if you can quote Anton Long, Buddha, or every Prophet in the Bible and Muhammad off the top of your head. If you haven't gone out to apply the shit – no matter how accurate you can quote shit or how expert like you know the written shit – you are not a journeyman. And certainly not a Master.

Those ONA MSS out there helps serve the purpose of separating two types of people. If you read the shit, and believe what is there, or go off into conclusions and assumptions, never actually confirming or verifying your emotive bias, assumptions, or convictions, then you're not ONA material. Because you're stupid, and you don't have the nature, character, and quality, or habit of action and habit of mind, to get anything done in the real world. You're the type who will need to be babysitted and constantly instructed. And/or the type to memorize shit you read or heard and become an "Intellectual," who does nothing more but speculate, philosophize, and intellectualize what you read or heard. Which is retarded. That's like your Master giving you his blueprint, and instead of taking the blueprint and constructing something, you philosophize and intellectualize stuff about the blueprint given. In other words, you get jack shit done. This is not to say that a person out in the "field" working is not intelligent to articulate his craft and teach it to others.

The other type is the ONA type. They may have read the manuscripts, but they push that aside to find people associated with ONA to get some living sources of the actual thing. Or they apply the shit in the real world, mess up, and by themselves work at becoming a wise journeyman from trial and error. They may have preconceived notions and ideas about what ONA is, or what the MSS teaches, but they don't fall into any conclusions or assumptions. They ask, learn, and interact with a real living person or many persons. Then once they get enough knowledge, they branch off and go Do their thing and make things happen. Put it into living motion. Build. Make real what is written and designed. There is no intellectualizing shit. No pondering who is behind Anton Long. Just trial and error, and Pathei-Mathos. If the shit works, use it. If it doesn't its Mythos.

Q. What do you guys Do?

A. I like hearing Western Americans ask that question. And what I find even funnier is to hear the things Western Americans answer in return. You'll understand why later. Have you ever been asked that question: What do you Satanists do? Usually they'll stumble around their brain looking for an answer. And you pay very close attention to the answers their brain draws up. They'll say things like: "Well, you know; Satanists worship Satan/Self. We rebel and step on the consecrated host. Talk shit about Christians. And do whatever we want."

Why do they give such answers? Because they lack something inside their American weltanschauung called a Culture. And all they have as a reference in their mindscape is the religions rooted in their American weltanschauung. So when they are asked what do you do as a such and such. What they do is recall the religions they have encountered in their life. They think of Catholicism. What do Catholics Do as a praxis of their faith? Well they go to church, go to Mass, eat a cracker, look up to the Pope, touch their chest and head in special places, things like that. They'll think of those foreignly weird Buddhists and Hindus, and how they meditate, chant mantras, burn incense, worship idols. So having only these ideas, memes, words, concepts, experiences, in their mindscape, they usually give answers to what a Satanist does which can be seen to correspond to what they know of other religions.

So what do mundane Satanists do to broadcast to others they are Satanists? They give the sign of the horns. This would correspond with the [meme] sign of the cross or other sectarian gestures. They are members of a Satanic Church, which correspond with Christianity's concept of a Church. They even have a bible sometimes. They have a system of philosophy, which correspond to the teaching and philosophy of the religions in their mindscape. So that's what I mean by correspondence.

Now ask that same question in context to Culture, and you'll see the problem. For instance, if we asked: "What do you Chinese people do?" Or: "What do Thai people Do in their Culture which makes you Thai and not Lao?" How does a person Do their Culture? What does the "praxis" of Culture look like? What makes one culture different from another culture? This is a significant question, because as a Satanist, if you give answers about what you Do, and it sounds like what everybody else does, then it can be said that either everybody is a Satanist, or you render Satanism meaningless.

I'm Culturally Thai, but why? It's not because I'm ethnically Thai. I'm only part Thai. And there are different ethnicities that make up the Thai people. It's not because I speak the language. I don't understand it or speak it. I understand Khmer and only speak English. It's not because I was born in Thailand. I am American, born and raised. So what exactly do I Do that makes me “Thai” and not “fully” a “Westernized” American?

A Culture is very much like a dish you order at a nice authentic restaurant. That dish has all of these many little ingredients put together in different combinations. And the combination of those little ingredients is what helps give a dish its stuffness [quiddity]. It's Essence. But something else helps give a dish its stuffness. Why can't I take a Taco to Greece and call it a Gyro? Aren't they “basically” the “same” things? Meat wrapped in a flat piece of bread? Or why can't I call an Italian pizza an enchilada? Aren't they “basically” the same? Tomato stuff over bread? Or why can't I call ramen pasta? Because of not only the unique combination of the same basic elements, but also because that combination of elements were combined in such a manner over a long period of time attached to the long-timing of a people.

The historic or aeonic passing of time is what brought those elements into their unique combinations. It slowly developed in time in other words in a specific place to a specific people. And this is also what makes one Culture different from another. And it is also the way Nature and the Cosmos functions on a fundamental level. There are subatomically only three parts of an atom, but it is the unique – and simple – combination or arrangement of these same elements which gives rise to the stuff in the periodic table. Same thing with organic life. The same 4 amino acids, arranged or combined differently gives rise to the different shape and forms of biological life. And those combinations of basic elements develop over long periods of time because of condition.

I always thought Fish Sauce was “Asian,” until I was curious enough to research it and learned that in ancient times the Romans had something similar. I can't remember what they called it. How or why did fish sauce develop? Basically in a place like ancient China you have people living in two types of places: Coastal and Inland. Because of this, each group has access to different kinds of foodstuff. The coastal people have a larger access to protein based food such as fish, while the inland people have more access to vegetation. This means that often, the people inland suffered a deficiency of protein in their ancient diet. So how did they learn – from trial and error [pathei-mathos] – to remedy this harmful deficiency? The inlanders preserved fish they got from coastal people in the form of fish sauce, which they put on their rice for the needed protein.

Okay, so how did Soy Sauce come to be? Same coastal and inland groupings of people. But now with the added ingredient of a lack in money to buy fish. The very poor people inland could not buy fish or even travel to the coast. So from long-time trial and error to survive disease caused by a lack in protein, they learned to preserve soy beans and make a sauce out of them to put onto their rice for the needed protein.

So how did Sushi evolve? From a cultural practice, observance, learning, pathei-mathos, custom, of preserving fish. The practice is believed to have originated somewhere in the Southeast Asian peninsula, and it is still practiced. What you do is you take uncooked rice and roast the rice, then pound it into bits and pieces. Then raw fish is taken, salted, and this roasted rice is rolled onto the fish. This fish is then left to ferment, which the rice helps with. If the fermented fish is left to ferment and its juices collected, that juice is what becomes fish sauce. The end product is a horribly smelly foodstuff called “Prohok” in Khmer, or “Mam” in Vietnamese. It looks like rotten brown mushy fish, and the smell reminds me of really bad cheese vomited into the sewer. They usually take small pieces of Mam and steam it, then use it as topping on vegetables to eat with rice, or they put a small bit in soup for flavour. Thai people don't usually eat Mam, but Lao people eat it raw.

It's not known how this method/meme of fermenting fish found its way to ancient Japan, but it did. So in the old Samurai days in Japan, some person who owned a restaurant had this genius idea of making a fast food you can eat with your fingers since there were a lot of hungry samurais walking around. So what this forgotten genius did was take that old method of fermenting fish and innovated it a bit. He simply took raw fish, salted it a bit, and instead of rolling it in uncooked rice, he rolled it in cooked rice, et voila, "sushi!"

So stuff like this is the bits and pieces of living culture, and what a culture does or practices. Everybody eats fish in any country. But unique conditions causes this fish to be used by each group of people in different ways. And its all such unique hundreds of customs, practices, and traditions [their aeonic combination] of a culture which makes one different from another; plus the factor of Time. Those many, many customs and traditions observed [done] adds up to a Culture in living practice. Culture, meaning essentially what one Cultivates. A Culture is not just one thing done, like where some can say: "I am Catholic because I go to Mass," or "I am Christian because I believe in Jesus," or "I am atheist because I don't believe in anything." I'm actually culturally Chinese & Thai. So what customs and traditions do I do which makes me so? Little things, all put together.

For example I burn fake money. By itself this is meaningless and doesn't make a person Chinese. Burning the fake money with the meme of incense and the meme of dead ancestors, and the meme of raising your clasped hands three times, and the meme of a Chinese style altar, starts adding up to one very small tradition which may be peculiar to Chinese culture. At the shop my aunt-mom owns, there is a traditional Chinese altar with no idol by the desk on the floor. The altar just has a red framed paper with gold Chinese writing on it, none of us knows how to read. It has a pointed roof like a house. On the platform are five little red cups, a dish of fruit. On the side of the platform are a dish of candy, and two bottles of liquor. At the center is a tin can with uncooked rice in it with lots of ends of incense. Every morning when I open the shop when I work there, the first thing I have to do is do an ancient animist Chinese Practice [tradition] of burning incense and praying to the spirits that care for the land and property and ask the spirits to help keep the business safe and prosperous.

Every week I buy fruits at the market specially for these spirits. Everyday I put hot tea in the five tea cups for the spirits. Stacked on the side of this altar are a pile of boxes of cookies. Then out back, in the back yard of the shop, there is a plant which looks like thick grass. There is a patch of them my aunt-mom grew in the dirt. The patch is about a foot and a half long and wide. So it's small. It's out in the public dirt in a sort of space between two building where people walk. After I do my thing at the altar, I go fill up a bottle of water to go water the patch. There are also "spirits" in this patch who are attached to the land and property. I water the patch and ask these spirits to help bring in lots of people to the store. So these two little – very small – traditional practices, are tiny parts of a bigger memeplex we call Chinese Culture. And a culture has thousands of such little things practiced. Practice is the wrong word to use. A better way to say it is expressed as a part of how we live. And just like ethnic cuisine, these little practices grew in time.

Or the Thai part of me. We clasp our hands when we greet people. That's a small practice, which by itself does not make a person Thai. Indians in South Asia do this too. We have a soft demeanor and speak whatever language we do softer. If the person we are speaking to is older than us, it is customary to lower your head so that your eyes look up to theirs. Since in Thai and Khmer there are whole "dialects" used to speak with elders, we do the same [almost unconsciously] even if we don't speak the language. What me and my cousins do is be very selective with the English words we use with people older than us, and we avoid using names and pronouns. All that combined together adds up to something little which a Thai person does, which is a small part of the much bigger Culture.

Another custom observed in Khmer and Thai culture in higher social strata is something people in my family do. We don't just clasp our hands to greet people or pray. If you are sitting in a room of friends and other people, and someone in their conversation talks about you or brings you up, you have to clasp your hands at chest level and look at the person who mentioned you, and slightly bow your head to them. If you don't do this, you are considered barbaric and rude, like you are stuck up and don't want to acknowledge others, for saying nice things about you. So that's another little tiny element of a person's living culture. And all these hundreds of tiny customs, traditions, and observances is what a culture is and how a culture is "practiced" or lived. You don't really consciously "practice" it. It is a way of living and expression or behaviour, which you really don't even have to think about doing.

So a Culture turns out to be something that you cannot "Do." It is so enveloping it can't be done. A culture is Lived. You can Do a going to Church on Sunday every week. But you have to live a culture every hour, everyday, from birth to death. There is no such idea as doing or practicing a culture. It is a Way of Life. A way you live in life, and a way you live in context to and with others. I don't have to explain this to any person outside of America. Russian people know what Russian Culture is and how it is a way of life or a way of living. So do Irish and Scottish people. So do Japanese people and Muslims in North Africa and the Middle East. So do Hindu Balinese in Bali. So do Buddhists in Bhutan and Nepal.

A culture is composed of so many different elements which it has collected over the centuries that you don't have to express or observe every element to be a living expression or part of that culture. For example language or dialect is an element of a culture, but you can not speak Thai and still be Thai. Ethnicity is a familiar part of a culture, but you don't have to be White to be English or European. Spirituality, animism, and religion are a part of culture, but you are still Japanese if you are atheist and disagree with religion. Eating rice is a part of Asian culture, but you are still Asian if you eat pizzas. Drinking tea is a part of English culture, but you can not like tea and drink coffee instead and still be "authentically" English.

But with that thing we call religion, its different. If you no longer believe in Jesus, you might not be a Christian any more? If you stopped believing that Muhammad is the Prophet then your Muslimness might be questionable. If you are not a member of the Church of Satan with a membership card, your good standings and "authentic" Satanic identity might be questionable.

If you don't recognize the leadership of the Temple of Set, or OTO, then you might not be true Setian or OTO Initiate. If you don't agree with the beliefs, views, definitions, and standards of "standard bearers" in mundane satanism, then you might not be recognized as a "true" satanist.

Only in the cultureless American mind are things like Ways of Life and culture dismantled and broken down into something you can do on special days, which makes you special. I'll show you the difference between a Way of Life, and something Done [a "praxis"]. When it was getting close to mother's day I was working at my aunt-mom's store with her. A Western customer comes in and small talks with my aunt-mom. The customer asked: "So you gunna do anything special for your mother this mother's day?" My aunt-mom said in return: "No." So the guy asked: "Why not, I can't believe it? She's your mother? Asians don't value their mothers?" And she said back: "It's stupid. You people give one day out of a year for your mothers, while the rest of the time you throw your mothers away in nursing homes. Every day is mothers day for me for my whole life. Not just one day."

It's this same difference between Metta for an Asian Buddhist born and raised in the culture, and for a Westerner. Metta is an all enveloping way of life, you express through your mind, heart, actions, speech, behaviour, towards those close to you and to strangers. Metta to a Westerner who likes Buddhism is a "teaching," or a philosophical concept to debate, agree with, philosophize, intellectualize, or believe in as a concept because the belief in such makes you feel nice inside. Vibhajjavada is to an native Theravadin a Way of Life, which is all enveloping. By all enveloping I mean it is everywhere. It's in your weltanschauung, in your language, in your literal beholding of reality and the world, in your feelings, in your understandings, and in how you do things. All that expresses itself through you to be something real. Vibhajjavada is living life everyday where you reflect and analyze everything directly by yourself, and where you study everything you experienced each day for insights. Who knows what this means in the West or how it is "practiced" in the West. If you have to Think about it, believe in it, philosophize it, debate it, you are not Living it.

These Westerners in America when they ask what a such and such does – like a Satanist – sometimes expect to hear something different which nobody else can do that really, really makes you a Satanist. Just one special thing "praxised." They'll ask you: "So you're a Luciferian huh? Well what do you do that normal people don't?" And your like: "Well I fight the darkness of ignorance, breathe out of my bellybutton and read with my armpits." And they're like: "Damn! Yeah, you are a Luciferian! That's praxis sir!"

I got that from reading some weird thing about China investigating psychic children who can read with their armpits and feet. They tested these super psychic kids and apparently they can read with all sorts of body parts like with the back of their ears, this one kid read with his elbows. Even if the paper is folded up! I think the thing I read was about how China was breeding an army of super psychic communists X-Men to do battle with America, or something. It was crazy. And fitting too. Your dummie American can ask: "Well, what do you super heroes Do?" And there's the simple, easy to understand answer for the American Mundane: super hero praxis means shooting lasers out of your eyes, growing knife blades out of your knuckles, and wearing your undies over your leggings. Fuck culture. Super heros don't have cultures.

Isn't that telling though? Not only do most [well known] superheroes strangely come from America and work in New York, but they have zero culture. Just like the American who has no real culture, and after winning world war two, sees himself or themselves as the superhero of the world, able to meddle in other nations' affairs, to spread democracy, Coka-Cola to the furthest nooks and crannies of the earth, and save the world from evil doers! Superman didn't even have a real family, poor pathetic guy. I mean he was abandoned by his natural parents, his world blew up. Then he killed his adopted father. His adopted mother is a single mother. He has no siblings. No wonder he's socially awkward. This reflect the same psychological background in the old Andy Griffin Show. Remember Opie comes from a "famililess" home also. He has no mother, a perpetual single father, and no siblings.

Conclusion

So the question: "What do ONA people do," will have different answers depending on who is asked. Fortunately the ONA refers to itself based on AL's writings as a "kulture," the "k" to denote the word in ONA has been given a new meaning, or refers specifically to the Culture of ONA. So what is ONA culture? What's culture? It's the Cultivation of a unique combination of many, many traditions, customs, and observances, plus a shared mythos and shared worldview, the sum of which equals a culture.

Every written booklet and document ONA has produced since 1972 has a piece of the many traditions, customs, and observances. We're not talking here about the philosophical tracts of Anton Long. We're talking about what can be expressed in our life. Such as the traditional rites in the Black Book of Satan. Pathworking the Tree of Wyrd. The entire Seven Fold Way. The Sinister Tarot, making them and meditating on them. The Star Game. The magic in Naos. Insight Roles. The Sinister Dialectic. Pathei-Mathos. Sinister Honour. All of these put together is the blueprint of a culture.

It is only a blueprint of the foundation of ONA culture. As the upasika or journeyman in ONA, it is your work to take that blueprint drawn up and make it happen via your own wisdom [know-how]. The paper work, documents, manuscripts, and books are not the thing itself. Not the End of what ONA is. They are only the raw material to be used by each individual Initiate to work on his own terms, in his or her own way, to construct the culture and Way of Life. Which way of life when expressed in the real world is still in its infancy.

Like any culture, this ONA culture must be allowed to grow by metabolizing or drawing in new elements so that it can gradually evolve into something. Like any culture it needs people to be expressed and lived. Not any one or two single things "done" makes anyone "ONA." The Kulture is the "Praxis." The praxis is the way of life and growth of the individual Sinister Initiate. Not any one thing is the praxis of ONA. It is the sum of everything as a Whole. The philosophy is third in significance. Mythos is more important then philosophical ramblings. Mythos – the human imagination and creativity in allegorical expression – grows culture, is the glue of a social order.

This essay only tries to present another way of seeing things and ONA. It only tries to give others a second reference point to work with. Myopia is when we in the West only have one frame of reference, and we judge everything with that reference point. Without a culture, some people in the West may only have Occidental religions to use as reference points. And so the question of “What one does,” as an ONA Initiate is clumsily answered at times. There is more to a Way of Life than doing one or two things. And it's slightly insane to base one's self-identity on the doing of one or two things. On a membership card, on the agreement of someone's subjective standards, on the worship of some god [self or other wise], on rejecting society for whatever reason, and so on. There is an all enveloping livingness to a Culture. I can't really explain this in writing, but if you come from a country and people outside of America, you'll intuit what I mean.

One of the things I find non-constructive about a cultureless people is that because they have no Way of Life of their own – nothing to live by or for – they become shit kickers to others. Not having a business of your own to tend to, you spend your idle time minding other people's business. Not having a life – a Way – of your own, you are prone to mind and meddle in the lives of others. I like the idea of Traditionalism. I would like the ONA for the few of us into ONA to be just a private culture we share in common. One that is a Way of Life, and one which values each of our natural cultures. It shouldn't be something which supplants or replaces our indigenous cultures, but more like an extension of what we already have.

The ONA doesn't exist as an organization. It is just a pile of ideas written by a few people and saved in documents. That's all that it is. A blueprint is nothing to glorify or put up on a throne. A blueprint is simply something to help guide your own wisdom and skill into building something real with your own human potential. The “building” is the so called praxis. No Temple is built in one day. No single deed done is an ONA doing. Everything together as an integral Whole, is the Way. The stumblings, errors, and lessons learned from Pathei-Mathos on the way from Novitiate to Mastership is the genuine unwritten teachings of the Way.

SAERIAN MYSTICISM

Saerian Mysticism

The word “Saerian” comes from ONA’s Codex Saerus [BBS]. It is itself a book of traditional rites, ceremonies, and rituals of the Sinister [left] Way [path]. In the mind of a typical occultist, such a book of rites and rituals may have a limited usage and meaning. Such types – so I have encountered and observed – may begin with a novel appreciation for such rites and the performance of them. They may see such rites and rituals as being magickal. But as time passes, they may get bored or find other more colorful rites. And so one set of rites would be thrown away or lay dormant. In the generic Satanic subculture the word “ritual” conjures up the idea of magic or so called psychodrama used to release pent up feelings. Most of this subculture no longer have a place in their lofty opinionations for ritualism. It is an outer reflection of their Western American weltanschauung which has no place for rites of passage, and cultural rituals other people have had since the dawn of humanity.

In my own mind things are different. How I see things is based on what I have been exposed to in life and culture. To me, Ritualism has nothing to do with magick or making wishes come true. Ritualism in my weltanschauung is a theatrical pageantry or play enacted for an audience to watch in which is embedded a moral, or teaching. Ritualism is to the right brain and intuitive part of us [chitta] what writing is to the left brain and our faculty of reason. Inside both ritualism and writing [“riting” & writing] can be embedded the essence of an idea, teaching, notion. One – if you pay attention to the development of humanity – can be more easily passed down from generation to generation as a folk custom.

An example would be kabuki in Japan. Or traditional Thai, Balinese, Khmer, and Lao ballet/dance. It is a theatrical “dance” where each movement and gesture; each word and expression; conveys a moral lesson, esoteric teaching, aural tradition, ancestral folk wisdom, and so on, to the audience. I watched a beautiful traditional Khmer dance once about 7 apsaras descending down to the earth from the sky. The 7 dancers [girls] partly enact the descent and partly dance to traditional music played by traditional instruments. The style of the theatrical dance/music is called “Poal” which means to Wail, Cry, or Whine. This is when the music and dance goes for a bit and then the music stops while a vocalist wails a narrative verse slowly to explain the story, as the dancers continue to enact their part. Then the music starts again for a while. So the music and wailing happens one after another.

The theatrical dance told the story of 7 apsaras – celestial nymphs – coming down to the earth to bathe in a lake together after they had taken on human form. The apsaras had taken off their celestial wardrobe which includes magical scarfs they usually wear on their right shoulder [the left/female shoulder exposed]. While they were bathing a young prince/hunter with a bow and arrow nearby heard the laughter of girls playing in water. Curious, the prince set his bow and arrows down to sneak behind a bush to peek at what he hoped were naked girls bathing in a lake. The young hunter saw the 7 beautiful girls naked in a lake and was for a while captivated by their beauty.

The young prince desiring or hoping talk one of them into being his wife decided to steal the scarf of one of the 7 girls, that way, which ever girl the scarf belonged to could not run away. He did end up getting close enough to the lake to take a golden scarf. When the 7 girls saw the prince they got scared and ran to get their clothing and magical scarfs. The young hunter saw that when the girls put on their scarf they transformed into spirits and flew into the sky, except one girl who could not find her scarf, since the hunter had it. The embodied apsara was the youngest of her sisters. She asked the human man for him to give back her scarf. The prince asked what would happen if he did not give it back, and she said that without it she can't return home and is stuck on earth as a mortal. So during their conversation the young hunter tries to woo the girl whom he has figured out is a celestial being. They dance for a while. He teases her by handing her her magical scarf, but yanks it away for a kiss. In the end the young apsara falls in love with the human man. The young hunter gives her back her scarf and watches if she will stay with him or return home with her sisters. The young apsara is confused.

The singer crying or moaning the story explains that the young apsara is torn between returning to her home in the heavens where there is no karma or worries or staying on the earth where there is karma and trouble because of love. Her 6 sisters warns her that if she stays mortal and lives on the earth that she will be a subject of fate, and will never be free from the fruits of her own actions, and that if she has children with the mortal, that she condemns them also to the same life of mortal woe. In the end the young apsara chooses to be with the human. She kneels before the prince she fell in love with and with clasped hands pledged her love to her “swami” which in Khmerized Sanskrit actually is the royal register for “Husband,” in the exact same way in olden English a noble wife would refer to her husband as my “Lord.” The End.

So this ritualized dance has embedded in it an ancient myth or legend which can be found in various forms and variations across Southeast Asia. It also had many levels and ways to be esoterically interpreted. The 7 apsaras in this ritual dance represents the 7 Pleiades, the youngest apsara being the smallest star of the Pleiades. The hunter/prince represents a mortal man. In the English weltanschauung this mortal man has no visible esoteric meaning. But in the Khmer he does. Because when he and the now physical apsara gets married and have children he becomes a father. The word for father in Khmer is Ow pouk. That word itself is a variation of two other words: Owy meaning to Give or Donate, and Pouk from the word Pouch meaning Seed or Sperm. An Ow pouk literally means a Seed Giver or Sperm Donor. The Prince or hunter [man] here symbolizes the factor which makes those children mortal, the mortal seed out of which new people germinate.

Then you can go into all sorts of esoteric interpretations for why the young apsara chose love knowing she will be a subject of fate and karma. Perhaps for the physical experience of such? Perhaps Love is worth the trouble? Perhaps that love represents a captivation or enthrallment, a passion, or deep senseless desire and attachment, which causes us trouble? Perhaps the esoteric teaching tries to show that the fate and life or existence of the apsara's mortal children – yet to be born – has already been sealed and set into motion when she made her choice. That the choices we make as individuals ultimately can become the causal beginning of another individual person's fate or experiences in their life.

So that's ritualism and the esoteric essence of ritualism from my perspective. Not every ritual is a magickal rite performed to make a wish come true or to release pent up emotions. Some rituals like you world find in institutions like the Rosicrucian Orders, Freemasonry, the Martinist Orders, Traditional Christianity, etc, are ritualized pageants which actually has lessons and teachings embedded in them, meant for the audience to apprehend. The value of such Western forms of ritual pageants is that the Order or Church member as the observing audience is exposed to such insightful rituals repeatedly such that such rituals becomes a tradition and cultural mythos within each institution.

Just to give the word “esoteric” – as I am using it here – a general set meaning, it means an Insight born from Within the womb. As opposed to exoterica which are lessons inculcated to us from Outside the “womb” of our Self or being. With esoterica, there is no standard way of drawing out insight, no single truth, etc. It is person specific and at times may only have meaning to the individual person. The most an esoteric insight can do for others is to inspire in other their own understandings and insights.

The Black Mass

The first rite in the Codex is the Black Mass. The Codex suggests that the ideal place to perform this rite is in a cave, and re-enforces this cave symbolism by stating that such cave gives the sense of an “enclosure.” Significantly, a female described in the ritualized pageant as a “Mistress of Earth,” turns to a group of people and draws in the air the sign of the pentagram with her left hand. She interestingly states afterward: “I will go down to the altars in Hell.”

An esoterically significant part of this is that the female who is associated with the earthly plane of existence makes a statement that she will be descending Down to Hell. Hell being the mythical underworld, or Hades, the domain of Pluto. This domain of Pluto – this underworld – is the unconscious, the inner [enclosed] realm of psyche, the cave of primal chitta which lurks in the darkness beneath our conscious awareness. It is this same primeval “cave” wherein we will find Jung's Shadows, our demons and devils. Aspects of our own human – earthly – Nature many of us try hard to deny. What lurks in this cave is something most of us – the mundane – wish not to confront and acknowledge as being a natural living aspect of themselves. We'd rather brush it under the proverbial rug and hide it away in some dark cave. In some unconscious place, beyond our conscious awareness.

In different cultures something divine or special lays buried in this cave, hidden in the dark. In one Enochian mythos the story goes that an angel had come to Enoch to tell him of a great flood which would kill the whole world in the days of his grand children. So Enoch took a white stone and upon it he scribed the Holy Tetragramaton. He dug a cave and place the white stone in a safe place then sealed the cave off with nine arches. In India there is the mythos of a jewel closed up in a square box, which is enclosed in a box, which is enclosed in a box, and so on 7 times. The 7 boxes being the Chakras, and the box with the something hidden is the root chakra.

In Buddhism the notion of going down levels to a cave or the root or base level of ourselves takes on a different representation. Going Down in the Buddha's case was going down levels of consciousness in meditation to the realm of chitta for Enlightenment. What happens when you find the Kundalini and raise it up the 7 chakras? You obtain divine illumination. What happens when you find Enoch's cave and discover the lost stone and bring it up to the surface to read the lost name of God? The Holy Shekhinah enshrouds your body and mind with divine light.

In the mythos of Buddha, he one day had the determination to sit at the Bo Tree and obtain Enlightenment to understand the world. Something called the Miar fearing Buddha would accomplish what he set out to do tried to distract him from going into deep meditation. The Miar is the Khmer form of the thing called Mara. Miar is how we call it in Khmer. Miar as we say it rhymes with the word "Beer" as a person from Australia or London would say beer. It is not an entity or being, but is referred to as an it or a thing, and is called The Miar. Usually in Khmer when a Sanskrit word has a long "A" vowel it is pronounced as a compound vowel sound like "ier" as a Brit would pronounce the word "ear." Mier/Mar is related to the Khmer word Mir/Mer which means to See/Look. Miar/Mar may then also be related to the root in the Latin Mirare, the Old French Mirer meaning to "Look At." The English words "Mirror," and "Mirage," share the same root significantly, which should all give us a hint as to what exactly The Miar is that was distracting the Buddha.

The source of the symbolism in this mythos will never be known by anyone unfamiliar with deep meditation, or deep states of trance. There is a point in the process of going deep into a trance or meditative state where illusions and hallucinations arises. If the mind's attention is captivated by these hallucinations, it won't go past that stage or level of consciousness, and may quickly come back to beta wave consciousness. So the ancients took this phenomenon and gave it a twist to allegorically teach something.

In the mythos the Miar [the demon Mara] surrounded the Buddha with beautiful women, wealth, gold, jewelry, power, etc. Things we would in our modern grasp of this ancient mythos not give too much meaning to. The things the Miar was distracting the Buddha with has to be understood in its native time and place. During that time Brahmanism was the supreme religion and power in India. A Bhikkhu back then was a homeless person who renounced that Brahminical social order. The word Bhikkhu means Beggar, the two words can still be seen to be related. These bhikkhus became beggars because they grew disillusioned and tiresome of the the Ethos and laws of Brahmanism which controlled the cities back then. So the only option one had to Liberate oneself – Moksha/Nibbana – back then was to actually leave the cities and live in the places and spaces outside and between such cities.

"Tune in, turn on, drop out," right? Drop out of the rat race we say today. What's Nibbana means? Without [Nib] the Jungle/Forest [Bana]. You dropped out of the "jungle" of the city. Detach yourself from it in every way. Why were monks suggested not to marry? Because to marry means to be tied down to not only a woman, but to children and a family. "The old ball and chain," right? So if you know what you're looking at, you'll see that The Miar was "tempting" and distracting the Buddha's effort to go deep into himself with aspects of the mundane [anariya] world. To draw him back to that samsara of city-state life and the Brahmanical Ethos which captivates and enslaves people. The same Brahminical ethos and way of life which empowers the Brahmin priestly caste and subjugates the low ranking caste members. It's not as simple as the idea of returning to a city. If you are against that system, do not give yourself to it. That system needs you to participate in it. What happens to a public corporation if all or a majority of the stock and share holders drops out and pulls out their money? What happens to a company if all or a majority of its employees were to drop out and leave it? It collapses. The dumb unthinking majority – mundane/anariya – collectively is what upholds, supports, and gives life and power to a corporation, political party, nation-state, religious institution, and so on; because they are under the spell of the Miar: entranced and captivated by mirages. Like Sirens singing out to sailors. If you fall under their spell, your ship will crash into the rocks.

What's a really cool and understandable modern day Miar/Mirage which we can fall prey to if we believe what The Miar tempts us with? A college education. Not the type where you go to get an actual education, The type when society or companies or schools tells you over and over again that if you go to college and get a big degree that you will get a giant paying job! You might want to be doing something else with yourself in life, but hearing that you can get a big pay check and live a comfortable life – the American Dream – you buy into The Miar's distraction. So you get a student loan, commit four years, get into debt, come out with no job and in deep debt. I'm not talking smack about higher education. I'm talking smack about being fooled by this mirage that giant debt for a piece of paper can manifest a good life, the "American Dream." The word Dream in that stupid phrase should be telling. How long will it take, let's say to pay off that debt? Many years. So you must now keep a job to pay that debt off. Once that debt is paid off many years later, then you realize that you wasted a great deal of time for nothing, when you could have spent it doing something which truly brings you happiness and joy. Was the distraction of The Miar worth it in the end?

In the mythos the Buddha does go deep into meditation for a long time, and he Awakens as The Buddha. The word Buddha just means One Who Understands/Sees. The words Veda, Wit, Wise, and Vision all share the same ancestral root. To See and to Know share the same foundation. Illumination, which is the act of a light source facilitating one's Vision is equated with Enlightenment, where we can also find the word Light. The word Sight can be found in the word Insight. In the opening of the Black Mass the Mistress of Earth draws an inverted pentagram. That symbol in other esoteric places in the ONA corpus is equated with the Dark Sphere of Mercury, and also something called the "Eye of Satan." Which symbolism can be found in many ancient cultures. We have the Sufi's Ayin al-Qalb [Eye of the Heart] which Sees and Knows Allah. We have the Buddha Eye which sees and understands, and the Dhamma Eye which sees dhamma and wisdoms its ways.

The eye and vision of the ariya does not see value in things the anariya sees value in. What distracts and enthralls the anariya – mundane distractions and abstractions – does not captivate or distract the ariya who are above the mundane world and its mundane ethos, mundane paradigm, mundane abstractions, and way of life [samsara]. The Eye of Satan – Eye of the Adversary – should naturally be adverse and adversarial to the mundane distractions of the Miar. The Sacred Cows and Deified Mirages of the Mundane and their Magian Ethos.

Mercury is the Quicksilver which rises up or Elevates. Mercury is the messenger of the Gods. The middle man between Olympus and the world of mortals. The messenger between primal chitta deep in the unconscious mind and the conscious mind. It hints at “something” moving “upwards.” The murmuring of psyche hidden within the chthonic depths of self upwards to the conscious mind to decipher and know.

The Mistress of Earth in her natural state is consciously rooted in the earthly plane of awareness. She must Go Down to Hell. To Hades, with that Adversarial Eye opened, to confront the Shadows in the deep. The chattering and words of mundane society demonizing such shadows with ethical values and judgments themselves are the distractions and mirages which keeps us away from and in denial of that which lays hidden beyond those mundane mirages. Which is a living and forgotten aspect of our own being.

How does one Know Oneself, if half of oneself is rejected and denied? How do you understand this shadow self if not by first going deep to experience it? So this Mistress of Earth, before she goes down to Hell, begins her journey into the underworld with her Left Hand, tracing the pentagram. The Left is the feminine side of Shakti. The feeling and intuitive side. As opposed to the Right side of logic, reason, intellectual thinking, and doctrines. The darkness of Hades must be experience, felt, and intuited. The Left Hand Path, is the path of experience, empathic apprehension, and of the pathei-mathos that is born from the feeling and experiencing of things.

After the Mistress of Earth says her opening line in the Black Mass, another female as the acting Priestess states: “To Satan, giver of Life.”

Whatever this “Satan” is, is the Giver of Life. In the ONA one of the best places to gain an understanding of this Satan of the ONA is via Beesty Boy’s esoteric insights given in his “The Septenary Tree of Wyrd. The Sinister Tarot” book. It’s the book which lists the Sinister Tarot cards used in pathworking the Tree of Wyrd. The 15th Atu associated with the Devil/Satan [Deofel] insightfully reads as follows:

“Sinister awakening – Nature as it is, raw and unaffected. That primal awareness of the vibrance of life that possesses and creates the ‘accuser’, that provokes acts that challenge the existence of the ‘sacred’. The real meaning of liberation unchained by temporary abstract ideas; the laughter of the savage, wild god. Terror to the uninitiated.” – Christos Beest, ONA.

Sinister Awakening may be interpreted two ways. An awakening by sinister deeds/action/kamma which actions are rejected by the mundane anariya. And Enlightenment via the Left Side/Path [Sinister]. Either interpretation you take, you are bound to confront Satan: Nature as it is Raw. Which is to say that it is the realization – Buddhi – of Nature in its raw state, unaffected – pure – leads to Sinister Awakening.

This Satan in those few sentences is associated with Life in the Raw. Pure and unaffected. What do I mean by Pure? What’s Pure spring water suggest? It suggests that such spring water is entirely natural water devoid of additives and contamination. That spring water in its pure state is as Nature made it sans additions, extras, etc. Life in its Pure state is unaffected, and devoid of additives, extras, ideations, conceptualizations, intellectualizations, ethics, philosophications, goods, evils, rights, wrongs, morals, immorals, abstractions, semantics, language, and so on. Pure Life just as as it springs into existence. Remove the human mind out of the equation of life, and you have Life Unaffected, Raw, Wild and truly

Free and Pure.

This Satan is also associated with the challenging and adversarial element of Life, which challenges our Sacred Cows, but challenges us as well. It is a 'savage' meaning "wild, undomesticated, and untamed." Related to the word Silva meaning 'of the forest.' This is Rudra [Shivaya] the wild and untamed god of the hunt, of the forest. Of the Forest Doctrine. The Way of Nature. Dhammakaya. The Eternal Dharma.

The act of striving against this challenging element of life and earthly existence in ancient India was referred to as Shram, meaning Struggle. The opposite is Ashram, meaning tranquility, rest. Nature, Life in the Raw is by no means an Ashram my ignorant friends. An ashram – a peaceful abode – in which there is no struggle or challenge is not conducive to evolutionary development. It's very interesting to note that physical life mostly seems to exist only in the strata of the causal reality where things are most active and untamed. Just like in an ocean much of oceanic life can be found – oddly – in the strata near and around the surface where the light is. Which is also the most active and untamed place, with its waves and storms, etc. It's actually almost counter-intuitive don't you think? You would think that life would favour the deeper more tranquil ashrams of the ocean. But no.

In Jainism – a cousin of Buddhism – the monks are called Shramana. In the Tipitaka Buddha was called a Shramana, meaning One Who Struggles, against the adverse conditions of life. A novice monk in Theravada is called a Samanera, which is the Pali for a Little Shramana. The Buddha himself did get called a Shramana until he ditched his kingdom and lived on the streets, where he was confronted with the adverse or challenging aspects of life represented by: sickness, old age, death, and a Shramana. Only after being exposed to the pure reality of life are you primed for enlightenment. Ancient traditions such as the ancient Shramana Traditions, Jainism, and Theravada made a way of life of Shram – of learning from adversity – Patheimathos as we call it in the ONA. Satan as Lucifer gifts use with his Light if we can past the tests, trials, and ordeals of Satan the raw and untamed element of Nature.

Organisms in such an active and challenging plane of existence had better adapt to environments and conditions or die out. Simple as that. Even better is the organism that can not only adapt to its environment, but be Adept of its environment. That's evolutionary success. Like Antarctic lichen, which is actually a symbiotic fellowship between a fungus and algae, who have adapted and are adepts of their extreme environment. Over billions of years what organisms adapt and become adepts of their environment and passing conditions "develop" into new organisms. In a sense, each organism is the creative product of this same challenging/adversarial element of Life. Like the mighty camel, ye apex of desert evolution! Adepts of the desert, able to traverse deserts without much water. It's got these weird camel toes made perfectly to fit desert sand. Or birds with their wings. They adapted and became adepts of their specific environment [air] over time. Or that unknown ancestral creature who first left the ocean to crawl on land, from which all land animals may have come. That challenging element of life in Nature itself is what pushes us forward as creatures in tandem to the flow of Time and conditions, either to our doom or evolution.

We ourselves as humans – along with our human nature and humanness – are the product of 4 billion years of organic life struggling against the challenging elements of existence. We are in a very realistic sense – if we apprehend Life/Nature purely – the children and creation of Satan, the giver of Life. And just like in the East, their left path traditions is a way of adoring and venerating Life, so too is our Sinister Way – our Left Hand Path of ONA – an exeatic exultation of Life, as Anton Long once described. If Satan as we understand it esoterically here is the Giver of Life, then Satanism is simply the religion, or tradition, of Life; where Life and all of its aspects and elements, is honoured, venerated, adored, embraced as it is. Untamed, wild, and raw. Rudra-shivaya – Noctulius – the wild and untamed, the primal, the Luna-tic. And his other half, represented by the dark sphere of Saturn – Time – who is Kali, Uma-Shakti, who is the dark goddess of Time, mother of life-force. When these two come together; when what is primeval flows with Time; we have evolution. And from that union of Shiva and Shakti do we all emerge into our existence. When primal matter – prima materia – dances with Time, we have Form. All things Causal, from matter to ourselves, arises from the union of that Noctulian Primal Element with the Saturnian Element of Time. The dance and union of Satan and Baphomet.

The Altars of Hell

In my own culture our Buddhism is 90% of the time practiced in the home. The other 10% is at some wat [temple]. But there is no real point in going to a wat since both the home and the wat have altars of the Buddha on them anyways.

The altar in my own culture is used to hold sacred objects like the Buddha statue, or objects with symbolical meaning everyone should learn to focus on often, such as pictures of ancestors of elder who have passed on. And on it goes a lot of other stuff like a little vase or pot to hold sandalwood incense sticks, a candle stick holder, then we often put the much older animist fetish items on our home altars. These animistic fetish items can be anything like little statues of children which the feral spirits live in, animal bones, horns, and teeth which goes in a silver bowl of water. Candle wax is dripped into this water and certain Pali chants are chanted over the water to make it into “holy water,” which you use to sprinkle over the altar. And another fetish thing is long dreaded hair. The dreaded hair is hard to explain.

The old people in my culture believes that when a person – especially an ascetic in the forest – grows a certain type of dread or knot in their hair that a magickal spirit lives in that knot. You’re not supposed to cut the knot off. It is allowed to grow long, and the owner of the knotted lock offers food and drink to the spirit in the knot. Usually, if it is the right kind of magickal knot, the dread lock falls off on its own. This is when the elders say that the baby spirit in the knot has matured and is ready to work for you. While it is growing on your head, you give the baby spirit a name and call its name when you feed it. Every time you eat you have to set aside a little bit of the food you are eating to the knot.

When the knotted lock falls off, if is sprinkled with holy water, and it is either placed on a golden platter on the alter, or you put it inside a little doll house and place the doll house on the altar somewhere. Each day you spray perfume on it and from time to time you moisten it with oil or balm. If it is the magickal kind with a spirit inside the scary thing is that the knot of hair will continue to grow longer, and it will bud new child knots which later grow big and fall off.

Anyways the dread locks live on the altar too and you can wear the little child knots the original one spawns as a magickal amulet. Usually you have a goldsmith make a pendent which can hold the little knot in. You name your knot and feed it when you eat. Traditionally the spirits in these knots are said to protect you from harm, accidents, and so on. These knots are past down as heirlooms of sorts. I had a little knot once and I had my little mom pay a goldsmith to make a platinum coffin pendent for me which I kept my knot in. The traditional kru [animistic guru or shaman] the knot came from names it and gives it to you. Mine was named [in Khmer] the “Seven Snakes Baby.” After a year of caring for it and feeding it, the thing ditched me. It was gone out of its coffin pendent forever. It probably fell out somewhere.

But things that are meaningful and sacred to a people or group goes on the altar. And in ONA, on our altars is found the human being, naked, and natural.

The altar priest/ess is nude. No outer costumes are worn. No rich or poor clothing. No costume of a proletarian or king. Can't tell if the altar priest/ess is a plumber or lawyer, social worker or stripper. No indication of their profane abstract characters they play in profane city life. They are just human. And there is something primally inspiring and beautiful about the nude human body. Like the 19th Satanic Point says in the same Codex: "Nothing is more beautiful than man: but most beautiful of all is woman." What can be more symbolical of our human nature than a nude human being?

But this altar is in Hell, in the depths of the unconscious, where the shadow self lurks. That altar priest/ess nude, represents that Jungian shadow. That human on that altar is the end causal – wyrdful – product of 4 billion years of ruthless struggle and evolution. That human being is not only endowed by Mother Nature and Father Time with supreme intelligence, but also supreme violence. Just as we can say that on earth no creature trumps our human intelligence and creativity, so too can we accurately say that on earth no creature out does our ability to hate and kill. No other species – not even viruses – so far as I know has killed as many lived as we did in World War II. And that's only one of our human wars.

We humans are capable of doing things no other creature can do, which the Catholic Church has shown us quite well, haven't they. Unthinkable things. Confronting that shadow aspect of our own human nature means when can think about criminals in a prison and know inside that such people are human and that nothing about them or what they did is "wrong," or "unnatural." It means when we can think about Hitler or Stalin, Mao or Pol Pot and know inside with honesty that such men are human just like us, and that nothing about them or what they did was "evil," "wrong," or "unnatural." It means we are able to face such aspects of our own human nature and know that not only is it human, but that such aspects are indeed a part of each of us. But to know such is a part of us is different from realizing it is a part of us from experience. To come to an honest understanding of our own human nature is when we can look at a Mother Teresa, Buddha, Genghis Khan, Hitler, and know in our hearts what makes each of those people human is the same thing that makes us human.

That altar priest/ess symbolized the understanding that nothing is "right" or "wrong" with us. We are all as Nature created us. In fact as insane as it seems, we are the end product of 4 billions years of organic evolution. Earthly life rolled by and evolved all that time to end up making us. A creature that can hate the man next to us and kill them in cold blood one day, appreciate the smell of a rose another day, and shed tears at the beautiful star speckled heavens above us the next day. A creature which can plot and enact the genocide of an entire race, and with this same human mind the same creature can use mathematics to unlock the unfathomable mysteries of the cosmos. No other biological organism can do what we humans can do. We can use our human creativity to make weapons of mass destruction, paint a picture, and build space crafts to take us to the moon and probes to explore Mars. A creature that can dream and be imprisoned by own dreams. We are in essence nothing more than a chip off the old block. If we are children of earth and heaven, then it only makes sense that we inherited our parents' nature.

That altar priest/ess is the sacred symbol of the natural balance between the Numinous and the Sinister. Motherly and wonton. Friendly and tyrannous. This symbol reminds us that there is nothing wrong with being human, and nothing wrong with anything our nature is endowed with. Whether it is compassion or rape, fellowship or murder. It is human. Many in mundane Satanism pay lip service to being human. But mention a few unmentionables such as molestation or racism we are naturally able to do and they react violently ethical and reactionistic: to the idea/abstraction of it. Yet that very nature is their own human nature. When I say things we have in our human nature, I mean do we hibernate all winter long like bears? No, so hibernating is not “encoded” in our human nature. Do we breath water like fish? No. Do we live solitary like tigers? No. Do we live in hives like bees? No. These things aren’t “encoded” in our human nature. Do we speak language? Yes. Do we construct cities? Yes. Do we draw pictures? Yes. Do we kill? Yes? Do we rape? Yes. Do we hate other people for whatever reason? Yes. These things are “encoded” in our human nature.

The Left Hand Path – at least the Eastern one – put you in rites and situations where that you experience directly these forbidden aspects of your own self such that you are forced on your own terms to accept the cold hard truth that you are not a saintly creature. That your own human make up comes with stuff the mundane mass rejects, denies, hates, and fears. They reject, deny, hate, and fear an entire half of what it means to be human. They are divided with themselves and are not an integrated wholeness. All the good, the beautiful, the bad, and the ugly, nature has given to us, converges in the naked body of that altar priest/ess who represents the hellish, shadow side we hide in the darkness of our unconsciousness. That naked human body on that altar is the living symbol or representation of the ancient Eastern Left Hand Path. The sinister [left] path which leads to the confrontation of the shadow, then the direct experience of this shadow, then the acceptance of it, then a wholesome integration. Out of which the Initiate of the Sinister Way emerges a new person. Only to realized that what he has become for the first time is a whole Human Being.

The Ceremony Of Birth

The ritual begins with the burning of incense. Incense of Yew if the child is a boy, and incense of Black Poplar if the child is a girl. And interesting choice of trees for each gender.

The Yew tree is often associated with Longevity, Honour, Power, Victory, and Leadership. Its wood since olden times has been used to make shields and arrows. In fact, it is also used to make poison, and is associated also with the idea of assassinations, killing, and suicide. In certain places in Europe this tree is known as the “Death Tree.” Such a tree being associated with a boy child seems to suggest the idea of not only long life, but also warriorship. This tree is also associated with the Green Man. It is believed that in grave yards the roots of the Yew will spread to the mouth of each corpse.

Black Poplar on the other hand for a girl child of the ONA couple has a few different meanings in line with the ONA’s concept of the Sinister Feminine. First there is the myth of a nymph being turned into a Black Poplars. Then the leaves of the Poplar is said to be singed by the flames of Hades. But interestingly this tree is also sometimes called the “talking and whispering tree,” which seems to suggest the talkative and gossipy nature of girls. The Black Poplar is also a sacred tree of Mother Earth and is said to have been the funeral tree of ancient pre-hellenic Greece. It is also associated with the idea of transformation and vision.

Both trees are associated with Death. Strange for a ceremony of Birth, but not out of place and without meaning. The Yew tree is associated with Death in the sense that it is the cause of death, with its poison and wood for weapons and all. The boy child, born to parents who are Sinister Initiates, may be associated with such a tree as a way of “blessing” the boy with the lethal essence of the Yew.

The Black Poplar seems to be associated with death in the sense of seeing the death of family, or seeing the process of Mother Earth’s life transformational life cycle from mortal birth to mortal death. Although associated with the end of human life, the Sinister Female herself – like Mother Earth – will bare new fruit and thus be the nexion of new life.

The Initiate playing the part of the Master in this ceremony later states: “With this mark I seal wyrd.”

Each human child, born in this mortal world, is sealed to wyrd. Like the young apsara who fell in love with a mortal man, torn between freedom from the currents of fate which besets earthly existence, and to be with the one she loves. She chooses to be submerged in that current and struggle, and condemns her offspring to the same mortal – Causal – Fate. Fate is no longer the correct word to use in the English language, as this word now suggests something pre-determined which we have no choice but to be victims of. Wyrd is for us in ONA a better word to us.

Wyrd is very much a big river, made up of many strong currents. This imagery in mysticism can be found every where in ancient culture. Jesus, the Sun of Heaven, kneels before the Holy Saint John the Baptist in the River Jordon to be baptized. In effect, one who is the very Sun of God submits himself to the Water’s of the Jordon and its guardian.

Saint John is Yahya in Arabic which also means Goat. He is the Constellation Capricorn, a “creature” which is part goat, and has the lower parts of a Fish. Jesus is the Sun. During a certain season of the year it can be seen in the sky the Constellation Capricorn setting above the setting Sun which descends down seemingly into something called the Blue Nile, as if the Goat-Fish was pushing the Sun into the River of Stars. This Blue Nile is the River of Stars in our sky which is the Milky Way itself. The ancient symbolism of the Sun descending into the Waters – Kabbalistically represented by the letter Mem – is echoed in the Kabbalah. The Light of Ain Sof descends into Malkuth, the Kingdom, the World, which begins with the letter Mem. This letter in other cultures – even ours – resembles the waves of water. The ancient association of mortal birth with water is understandable if you are a woman. We say our “Water has broken,” suggesting even that the baby before its birth existed in Water inside that womb: like a Fish; that it literally passed through Water to be mortal.

The Letter Mem in Hebrew is typically drawn as a square. The same square is the symbol of the Root Chakra as well as the Taoist pictorial symbol of the Earth. In both Tantrika and Taoist alchemical cosmology the region where this root chakra is located is equated with a Sea or Ocean. In Taoist alchemical cosmology the lower regions of the earth is called the “Dark Sea,” or the “Black Ocean.” Near this chakra by the tip of the tailbone is a knot in which sleeps the Coiled Sea-Serpent: the Naga, Kundalini. Leviathan, the crooked Dragon, which was cast out of Heaven and into the dark seas of the earth. Something once born of Heaven has descended into the dark waters of mortal existence.

Even in our Tree of Wyrd this imagery is still present. Typically when working the Tree of Wyrd – such as via the Self Immolation Rite – we Ascend from the Moon to Saturn. From Earth back to Heaven from whence we came. To first have been born on this earth we traversed this Tree in the other direction, from Saturn – Time – Down to the Moon Sphere. It is the Moon that is associated with Water: Tidal ebb and flow.

Makes you wonder what is beyond the Sphere of Saturn/Time; beyond the outer limits of the ancient symbolical universe? The Acausal is what is beyond Time. In Buddhist mythos this Tree of Wyrd is a Wheel of Life we call in Pali the Bhavachakka. Bhava meaning Being/Existence and also Becoming and Chakka is the Pali of the Sanskrit Chakra meaning Wheel. This Bhavachakka is divided into 4 main parts, and together each part is divided into a sum of 32 realms or planes called Pumi. The 4 main parts are the the realm of the Sat [creature/animal] sometimes called Hell; the realm of the Sat Manuss [the Animal Who Thinks] which is our physical human world; the Rupa pumi where the Devattas – Sat Dep [Dev as in Devi] meaning the Luminescent Creature – with form exists; and the Arupa pumi where the formless Devattas exists. All beings in this Water Wheel are subject to Karma [causal action-reaction] and the current of samsara [meaning “Same-Flowing”]. In fact the entire wheel itself is Samsara. Nibbana is the Liberation from this Water Wheel. In other words, Liberation from Wyrd comes only when we penetrate beyond the Dark Sphere of Saturn/Time. Otherwise, no matter where in this wheel we exist, we are caught up in the current of Wyrd. We are NOT independent from the very causal fabric of reality we have our mortal existence within. That Fabric is made up of the Threads of Wyrd, the Three Sisters Weave with their Spinning Wheel.

The letter Mem in the languages of peoples around this area is also associated with water and fluid of some type. The ancient Egyptians had a word called Mum [moom] which meant Honey. Interestingly since Honey is incorruptible it became a symbol of Eternal Life, so these ancient Egyptians would MUMmify their dead bodies with Honey. In this same Egyptian mythos, where are humans implied to have come from? From the Tears of Ra, the Sun God. The word for Human is related to their word for Tears and Sorrow. But also interestingly in this same mythos Bees were likewise said to have been born from Ra’s Tears. Strangely enough; thousands of miles away and thousands of years later; the Khmer have a word which is Khmum – pronounced like mum [moom] with a “K” sound – means a Honey Bee. And Dtug [Water] Khmum is the term for Honey.

Kamadeva – the Cupid of Brahmanism who lends his name to the Kama Sutra – uses a bow of five arrows to make people fall in love and lust for each other. Each arrow is tipped with a flower. Kama’s symbol are two Fish, and Bees. The word Kama and Kamma [Pali & Khmer for Karma] when spoken, sound the same. Which is a play on words of sorts. To have kama is to have kamma. Or as we say in English: “Love Hurts.” Sweet and delicious like Honey, but tearfully painful like a bee-sting. So here we see the essence of the young apsara’s story again. She chose Love [Kama] and must now be subject to the flow Kamma. Like a Fish, caught in the strong current of a river.

The two Sinister Initiates in this ceremony chose Love, and have committed, co-signed, Sealed their new born child to the current of wyrd. That new born child is the fruit born from the heat and passion of Kama’s arrow. It is this same mortal passion that is what Marks the child its seal. The same passion – between Shiva & Shakti – gave birth to the cosmos, the very wyrdful river of causality.

Wyrd is not pre-determination we are victims of. Wyrd is a “river” made up of many causal currents. Each of us – and indeed everything which moves and acts – puts into motion such causal current; weaves such threads of wyrd. These threads interlink to make the Fabric of Wyrd. It is these little currents of causal chain events which is the thing that wyrdfully influences us; catches us in its causal grip, like Fish in a Net as the Mahabarata described thousands of years ago.

Every act and choice in life the Sinister Initiate as a parent makes, influences and effects their child wyrdfully. It is not “pre-determination.” For instance, if both parents are careless with their jobs and so end up living below the poverty line, although their child is humanly born to naturally be healthy, that child is caught up in a current where that it becomes difficult to get better if it gets sick, simply because the parents have no money to afford health care. That’s what I mean by being influenced wyrdfully by the actions and choices of others. The same choices these hypothetical parents made with their financial life, in Time also wyrdfully affects the child’s education. For, even though the child is humanly born intelligent, if it cannot afford a proper education, it is deprived of the chance to get a higher education. It is not fated to be impossible, but the child in later years must Struggle all the more harder just to go to college. Can he struggle and break free from that causal current of poverty his parents wyrdfully sealed him in? Poverty is merely an example.

An example of better wyrd with strong currents is the Great Depression in American history. Whatever causally brought about the wyrdful Great Depression, humans born inside this wyrdful current were influenced and affected. There were visible and real struggles in many human lives just to survive and get by. That wyrdful current makes life all the more harder to live. And if we can’t fight that current we die or commit suicide. The ambitions of an Imperial Japan as a collective, wyrdfully condemned their own people to two atomic bombs. The ambitions of a Germany, placed its people inside the wyrdful current of post World War I Germany after the treaty, where these same people were treated like crap, and where life in that current was all the more harder to live. It was a real Struggle: Kampf.

We causally react differently to wyrd. For instance the Wyrd of World War II. You had a Japan and a Russia. Same Wyrd. One generation later one nation is on its way to economically the second largest economy and becoming the world’s most technologically advanced nation, while the other nation is on its way to collapse. Why? It’s not fate in the sense of being passive victims of pre-established laws. It is a current of causal chain reactions which influences you, which you must struggle free from, or drown. But Nature rewards those who struggle free and adapt, or become adept.

Wyrd is the river each Sinister Initiate as parents co-signs their offspring to. Every action each Sinister Initiate puts into causal motion affects and influences in a real way the life of their children. Each act and choice is a real Mark which seals that child’s fate, wyrd. Each action set into motion is one more river current that child will have to struggle with. This is something the Sinister parent must be consciously aware of. In ignorance, you condemn your own child’s fate. That child – just like you – are born already struggling against the wyrdful currents of general society: other humans and environment and social conditions. In your ignorance you would only contribute to that child’s struggle.

If as an Initiate of the ONA you have come to understand such things as aeonic magic, future magic, causal mechanics, and wyrd; then as parents each Sinister Initiate should know that you are also able to help that child by creating the right flowing and current. Wind can not only capsize a sail boat, but if intelligence and intuitive understanding is used, that same wind can be used to steer that same sail boat to a destination.

And so this Dreccling, in ONA is born into mortal existence to parents who are – or should be – aware of such things as wyrd, aeonics, and causal mechanics to act accordingly such that the Dreccling has a better opportunity to elevate itself in life, rather than spend its life struggling and drowning in the currents of wyrd.

This Dreccling is born with help. For the Master in this ceremony, after asking the parents for its name says: “So shall it be. I name you [...] amongst Us.” The Dreccling is born and named amongst Us: inside the matrix of an Ordering, a Fellowship, a Community, a Kollektive, of a people who live and struggle with and for one another. Comrades on this rough and rugged road we call mortal existence, which road is beset with turmoil and struggle.

The same Love we are all born from which condemned us to this mortal struggling, is also when found between two Companions, the most beautiful and numinous aspect of Life. Just to have a shoulder to cry on, or another heart to care, in hard times. Just to know that you have someone in life who will always be by your side through thick and thin, through calm waters and rough seas. If we are born to suffer, than to suffer with a Comrade is a pleasure. Nothing brings a people together closer than shared strife, shared struggle, and mutual dependence. I need you, and you need me; and so everything else beyond that shared need is a momentary passing; so long as I have you by my side.

The mutual need is not apparent in today’s modern Western American social order, where we throw our elderly parents away out of sight and mind. But for the most part of our humanity, the mutual need was there, and still is to many cultures around the world. The child needs its parents and clan, and in Time the parents will need the child in their mortal elderly years to be taken care of. We can so easily over complicate human existence so much with extras, but in essence the basic fundamentals are just Love and Need. All other things else in our human world are built on top of that foundation of Love and Need. Think about it.

The ceremony ends with the Master charging the chosen Guardians of this new born addition with the pledge and task of teaching the child Our Ways, so that this child is born seeing and understanding Life and Existence the way adepts and long-time Initiates of Our Way has come to see things. The wisdom we have collected personally from our endeavours, failures, mistakes, struggles, accomplishments, in life, we pass down as guardians to the next generation. The wisdom and understanding each Initiate and Adept collects and learns are bits of aural teachings and ancestral wisdom. These aural teachings and ancestral wisdom is a rudder of a ship, which will in its time and season give this Child the ability to steer itself as a helmsman of its own Life, rather than be a victim of the current of this dark sea we are born in.

The Pledging

A group of Sinister Initiates gather to ritualistically bind two Initiates together. It’s an old human tradition. Not just to fall in love, but to desire to be with one another, which in real human terms is a complicated matter. Not only does it involve the lives of the two who love each other, but each of these two are connected to their own families and clans. And more importantly their union is literally a nexion through which the two bloodlines and their history merges and mingles in a new person [the offspring].

In my own culture a marriage rite takes 3 days. On the second day something weird ritually takes place. First the bride and groom are placed in the center of a circle of people. The circle of people is made of only the female relatives of the bride and groom. Three yellow or orange candles are lit and passed around this circle of females three times, and each female passes her hand over the flames. Inside the circle the bride and groom seated in the traditional mermaid position, with their hands clasped low to the floor.

There is another part where the groom is caused to prostrate before the bride's parents three times and pledges that he will love and care for them as his own parents. The wife does the same to the groom's parents. Another part has the groom pledge a vow to the bride and he prostrated before her three times, and the bride does likewise after. At the end of day two, the bride and groom are seated in the mermaid position, with their hands clasped low to the floor in front of the people. In silver bowls near both of them in which are holy water and red string 6-7 inches long. The rite which will commence now is called "Jorng [Tie/Bind] Dai [Hand] or the Tying of the Hands rite. One by one the relatives and friends of the bride and groom come up to them and tie a red string around each of their wrists, then each person whispers advice into their ears or gives them a blessing. This Tying of the Hands part of the ceremony is when the bride and groom are truly in the hearts of the relatives and friends married as husband and wife.

The elaborate ceremony is nothing more than a ritualized way for the relatives and friends to acknowledge and accept the two people's love for one another and desire to be with each other. The ceremony itself reminds the community that those two people are no longer on the market. That unmarried men in that ordering of people should take care not to do things with the girl any more, and vice versa with the females of the community with the man. The ceremony induces a type of honour in the audience where that they now know to honour the two people's love for one another, and not to break them apart. Not just for the sake of their love for each other; but more importantly for the sake of their future children. For those children humanly need both a mother and father if they are to grow up into healthy functioning adult members of the community or ordering of people.

This idea of a marriage or wedding ceremony is not "Christian." It is universally human. But the ritualism itself may have begun more simpler. In college I had a few ethnic Hmong friends once. One day I was invited to a park to toss a balls, I agreed to go since I was told it was a cultural activity. At the park where all these Hmong young people, boys on one side and girls on another tossing tennis balls to each other. So I asked my Hmong friend and guide what the hell was going on. My friend explained to me that it was some cultural thing. Boys and girls find potential mates by tossing balls around and small talking in their culture. So this brought up the conversation of marriage ceremonies. I told my Hmong friend and guide the very elaborate 3 day wedding ceremony in Khmer and Thai culture. My Hmong friend said to me: "Shit, three day? That's not how we do it." So I asked him how Hmong people get married, and my friend explains: "Well, it's like this, if I bring you a Chicken to your parents house, and you accept it and eat it, it means we're married. Wanna go get some Chicken with me?" I kindly declined the proposition by telling him I was vegetarian.

Interestingly the Pledging ceremony in ONA goes with the essential theme of causality, wyrd and aeonics embedded in the previous ceremonies. In this ritual pageant the man and woman to be pledged to each other are called "Spaeman," and "Spaewife," meaning a prophet, seer, or one who can foretell the future. This suggests that the two people are functioning Initiates of the Sinister Way who have or should have Aeonic Insight, and other esoteric skills taught in ONA. It suggests that the two are empathically developed enough to sense the causal flow of Time and Wyrd.

The two to be united then goes through a bleeding rite where their blood is merged and mingles. This symbolical bleeding rite is something which is near humanly universal. Usually two close friends will cut themselves and mingle their blood as they take a vow to love each other as blood brothers or blood sisters. The Blood itself is the most significant symbolism in this ritual.

Our Blood literally has no real discernible beginning and aeonically has no discernible end. It's a river with no starting and end point. We are born in the middle of a river and the the beginning and end points are beyond our sight and knowledge. You can literally trace your ancestry back to when humans were apes, and back further, and further, until you get to the point where you realize that the iron in your blood comes from the supernova of a Star. Even the little bits and pieces of our DNA if we look carefully can be traced back to organic stuff in space. And we don't know where this blood is flowing to.

But on a more human level, the blood in our veins is the product of our human ancestors who struggled and survived in this mortal realm well enough to make you and me. All their human history and striving, converges in our veins. And although we may not know where our blood has come from, if we are conscious of the flowing of blood, we can consciously direct the flow of our blood by breeding selectively and intelligently. By the understanding that the characteristics and traits we and our mate has are passed down to our children.

In my own culture when two people desire to marry the elders conduct research into the worthiness of the potential mate's blood and ancestry. What they do is study the girl or boy's parents and grand parents very carefully. They say that the Fruit never falls far from the tree. Whatever quality the girl or boys parents and grand parents have, most likely the boy or girl will also have. This includes even their work ethics, family/clan values, motherly or fatherly nature, and financial habits, etc.

At face value it seems out of place to call a bride and groom in a marriage rite prophets and seers of the future, but it's actually not esoterically. As a spaeman and spaewife, knowing your own blood and ancestry, your own quality and character, as well as your mate's, can you "spae" or foretell how your children will be? Can you see and predict your own children's quality as a person, and their character and abilities? If you mingle your blood with your mate's, can you spae and see what the quality and new flowing of blood will be like? The quality of your own bloodline and progeny? If we say "there are plenty of fish in the sea," then as a spaeman or speawife, can you pick out one fish in that sea which has quality blood to mate with, to breed aeonically? If you are a spaeman and spaewife pledged together, then can you know and see, and live accordingly so that you manifest the proper condition and environment to raise health children in?

Nature tries to do it. Mating season comes at the right time so that the new borns come into life in the blossom of spring. Mother Nature tries to make it so that each offspring of an animal is born according to its kind and nature inside a properly functioning environment. Little ant larva come into existence in a colony which has spent long winters collecting food. Even little lion cubs come into a proper environment which is conducive to their growth and maturity, usually. Baby birds hatch inside a nest already pre-constructed by their parents. The only earthly creature which seems to have trouble doing things naturally is the human animal. Why? Because we arrogantly or ignorantly believe ourselves to be not a part of nature. Many of us in these modern urban environments just have random sex and get pregnant never once considering the condition and environment such children will be wyrdfully raised inside of. Such people are blind to wyrd and the causal flow of Time. Blind to the very real reactions, consequences, and fruit our actions has on such children we have. They lack the skill and vision to See far, they lack Aeonic Insight. They lack the acausal knowing which animals in tune to the rhythm and beat of Nature has. These are the skills and abilities a spaeman and spaewife of the Sinister Way has, or should have, if they genuinely understand the teachings of the Tradition.

The Dying Time

The end of mortal life. Today in our urban environments death barely exists in our field of consciousness. This Western American civilization has the habit of hiding their elders away some place. We forget them. They are out of sight and mind. And the only moment we see death is if we attend the funeral of such old people. There is no intimate human connection with the process of death: the end of earthly existence. To going away of our loved ones and friends to the Mysterious Beyond. Things weren't always like this, and things still the way it was for many people around the world with a living culture and traditional extended families.

Such as my own culture and life. In any of my family's houses you'll find at least 3 generations living under the same roof. Grandmas, uncles, and cousins. Even the married live with parents or siblings together. It's just the way things have always been. The human way. And in such an arrangement of different generations something special unfolds for you to directly experience and witness: the Full cycle of human life. You see the new born additions to the family, and the death of old members. And in between the births and deaths you are actively caring for and living with those that were born and those that will die. Death is inescapable in this environment. You live your human life at home and everywhere always knowing that in a short period of time yet another of your elders will die. It's even harder when you are caring for such elders, knowing that you are literally nursing them to their own death and you will see and experience that death, of that loved one.

The statement: "So shall we lamenting remember the glorious deed still waiting to be done," opens the ritual. It is a statement which is not empathically understood unless you have experienced the process of a death. The more deaths of old ones you have experienced and witnessed, the more wordless meaning and weight that statement has.

Last year my Great Grandfather died of old age, and his wife; Great Grandma; passed just this Easter. He was perfectly well up to his last day. I remember just 2 week before he died I was with some cousins out in his field helping out with the plants, and he was lugging lumber around. He just fell asleep in the car one day in the morning and that was it. Then after living around him and knowing him you stand there at the funeral and watch him get buried in the ground, which is a surreal experience. It freaks you out because at that very moment you are consciously forced to know – realize – that he is dead, and you will also be dead in time just like that.

But when you live a familial life with such old people for a long time, you directly witness the work they put into life. All that work and the fruits of such work and effort you see at the funeral left behind. Dead men die empty handed. The special thing that happens is that you intimately realize in your heart that all the work and effort such people put into life is for the living, because we can't take anything with us. Think about it. If we are condemned to live such a short existence, knowing we will soon die, and we know we will have children, and they will have children, then what do you do with your life?

Many will say that they will live their lives to the fullest. So said the Grasshopper to the ant. Some will say that they will live for the living. Said the ants to the grasshopper. We die and we leave our deeds and works – and their Fruits – behind for the living we germinated. In the hopes that what we – or the old ones – left behind will somehow elevate their condition in life so that they suffer less and enjoy life more. But Time never stops flowing, and we die with deeds left always undone. This opening statement suggests that there is to be a continuation of effort of some type. That deeds left undone are to be picked up and worked on by the living. This concept of working for the living, and the living continuing the work of the dead is something alien to the anariya, the mundane peasant stock humans.

Where do we see this concept manifest in living expression? First in kingdoms. A kingdom is nothing more than a war lord and his friends working to dominate a territory. When the king dies, the work is left undone, and the sons of the king takes up the work, while the children of the king's friends become the aristocrats who take up the work left undone. We see this same concept in play with corporations. One person will work hard to start a company. The company may grow and the founder may die. The work is left undone, and his heir and stock holders continues the work left behind. In both cases, the work of the king or company founder profited his family and friends in some way, and when he died, the family and friends continues that work to maintain that shared profit. Only the generic peasant stock human has no care for this concept. As long as they get table scraps of democratic "rights" and a pay check every Friday, they are happy. There can be thus seen two groups or types of people defined by one concept: Coherency or lack of Coherency.

In all cases such as military, politics, business, nature, the most coherent [system, organization, cooperation] is the most successful and profitable. Is an ecosystem coherent or incoherent? Is New York City a coherent entity or an incoherent entity? Compare New York to a random city in Sub-Sahara Africa and ask yourself if such a city is coherent and incoherent. There is work to be done, work left to be continued to be done. If death does not stop or halt the deeds and work, then the work is genuinely aeonic. The elder Sinister Initiate who has passed on has left behind deeds and work the living Initiates must step up to continue in the effort of. If and when all the old people in ONA dies, then it is up to the living Initiates to continue the Great Work. If we as Sinister Initiates of this ONA really grasps Wyrð, Causality, and Aeonic Magic, then we will lamentingly remember the glorious deeds waiting to be done.

The funeral rite in written format is short with not many words spoken. But such a human event as the death of loved ones, family, and friends, needs very little words. The wordless essence, the memories, sadness, and the knowing of our own mortality is what is most important and alive at such times.

The ritual ends with a symbolic gesture of the solidarity and fellowship of the living. Goblets are raised and a libation is shared together silently, with the words "ad satanas," commencing that silent – empathic – reassurance of solidarity and fellowship. Although the elders have passed, we the living are still bound together for one another. For in the reality and realism of earthly life, nothing means more besides life itself, but family and friends who live with us and for us.

Only the earth, the sun, the moon, the stars, our folk around us are real. All else; the ideas, our beliefs, ideals, doctrines, our gods and demons, our paradigms and worldviews, our political beliefs, our religions, all these are mirages of the mind. For just like mirages these things will and do change in our mindspace in time and season. And with all that changing of mirages, nothing real ever changes. The earth is still the earth. The moon is still the moon. The sun is still the sun. And the human is still human. Some of us spend our lives chasing after phantoms and mirages, the sirenic songs of the Miar. It distracts our mind with its ghostly dance of apparitions from what is real: what really is worth living our short lives for: the Living. Our Comrades on this causal path of hardship. Our Traveling Companions in Life. All that is Real are they, and the ground we walk on: our Mother Earth; and the sky above our heads: our Father Sky. Mortal children of Heaven and Earth.

SEARCHING FOR THINGS

Searching For Things

This one time I was at Fry's (a really big electronic stuff store) searching for a new computer to buy. I was looking around their computer section and I told the employee working in that section that I did not need help. One thing I really... really... hate is somebody talking in my ear telling me things I don't understand or things I could care less over clouding my clarity. My clarity... a clear mind that is objectively focused on an intent and objective... is very important during such situations... because if I'm gunna spent $1500 on something, you need to shut the hell up so I can think straight cuz that's a lot of god damn money!

There was this guy and his wife next to me as I was walking down the isle looking at the new lap tops. This guy was just yapping on and on to his wife at every computer he stopped at. He was annoying me so I went to another isle... but it seemed like no matter where I when, he followed me and yapped off about every computer thing I was looking at. I lost track of my original intent and objective because the guy was so obnoxious that he just fascinated me. You know those moments in life when someone is just so annoying you just stop what you're doing and tell yourself – 'Are you serious? How long is he gunna keep this up... let's see?' Yeah, I was having one of those moments.

He was going on about crazy stuff like how many pixil things the screen has, the CPU, the chips, if you can shake it without hurting the hard drive, and if you can walk thru a metal detector at the air port with the lap tops even. I mean, these are things... criterion... this guy is using to make his valuated judgments on these devices, and I know his wife couldn't give a shit, because she gave me the secret sisterhood "help me" eye-roll that us girls give to each other to let everybody know our boyfriends are retarded. I truly did empathize with her... she knew it too.

I was glad he wasn't trying to sell me computers because all I really needed was a computer that turned on and off, that had something for me to write on, and that I could surf the internet with to read stuff. That's it.

So I just did what any girl would do when we shop for computers and such gadgets... I went to that section where the computers cost around what I had to spend because I figured that if they were expensive... then they weren't cheap, and if they aren't cheap computers... then they prolly work damn good. So I bought the nearest one to me that had a nice design on it. Did it have 10 big CPU's? I don't know, and I don't care, I don't even know what those are. Does the information in the hard drive get mixed up if I shook it hard? I don't know? It's just going to sit on a desk most of its life. Would it still be alive if I walked thru a metal detector with it? Who cares, I'm not going to ride airplanes anywhere with it.

My new computer ended up working fine. Was it the best on the market? I don't know... but I know enough about the tech industry to not invest a large percentage of your money in their stocks because its such a highly "mutable" industry (meaning that every month your devices gets old because another competitive company made something better) that no product or corporation is stable enough to yield consistently. So it doesn't even matter if my new computer isn't the best.

Can you imagine if I was deluded enough to be so caught up in the tech industry that I bought the latest cell phone and computer that just came out to always have the best items? Do you know how far removed from the actually reason why I NEED such things anyways? All I need computers for is to write, keep a library of PDF's, study stuff on the world wide web, and stay connected to people. If I was caught up searching for the bestest and most powerful computers, constantly shopping and upgrading, I would never genuinely actualize my basic need for a computer. In other words, what computer I use is only a MEANS for me to achieve a certain result and fulfill a certain need which I have. I know my computer will get old and that it is not the bestest one out there. But it works for me... or I mickey mouse it to make it work for me.

Mickey mousing things is a way of life for me. I got the term from working at Target way back some years ago when I was going to school. I worked at night so I could go to school during the days. I was one of the people that deconstructed a whole isle down and put up a new one with new shelf schematics, items, and price tags. Sometimes we had to tear down an entire "gondola" which is what they called the actually contraption that holds the shelves up.

I was surprised the first time we took down a gondola to notice the whole thing didn't use and nails or screws! You just knock the parts into these notches and it stays together somehow. Taking them apart was easy because you just needed a hammer and beat things apart with it. Putting one together was the hard part because sometimes things don't go back to how they were and walls are lopsided or pieces are missing... which is when you "mickey mouse" things. That means you go find gum... duck tape... a hanger... or anything you can find (I used stuffed animals once) and you use your imagination and creativity to make things go together... even if they don't so the manager of the store – your boss – thinks everything is in order, safe, and working right. You know you just mickey moused something when you stand back looking at your creation and proudly say to yourself and your team mates – ‘There... that oughta do it.’

I wouldn't walk down any isles I put together I tell you that, cuz I used a lot of folded up cardboard and cans of Coke to prop up some of the gondola. You have to be a master or mistress at mickey mousing to know the secret uses of Coke cans to hold up gondolas. Me and my team were responsible for building all of the display items too... as we use to tell each other – ‘Don't touch it! It's just good for looking at!’ Fortunately, the Target I used to work at isn't there any more. God we had a lot of law suit, and somebody died in the parking lot once. She was an old co-worker who had spent 50 years working at the same Target during the night shift stocking the isles we put together. She just was walking to her car one morning after work to go home and died of a heart attack on her way to her car... slave driver!

So what's our first point? The first point is people these days... with the first amendment and all... have the freedom to pick and choose their religions if they are so inclined. There is a major price to pay for such freedoms... coherency of the mass (or lack of it). Nobody thinks the same beliefs any more, and people hardly get along with those who have different beliefs from their own... but this is a different subject matter.

With that freedom to choose your own beliefs... religion... and gods... comes – Indecision. One thing I remember my multimillionaire tutor telling me is that indecision is the trademark of a failure in life. All successful people...no matter what their field of interest is... have the same essential quality or personality trait of stubborn determination and decisiveness. You make a decision and you stick with it till the end, and you don't change your mind in mid game. It's the most basic quality of a successful general of an army or a leader of a nation.

Like Winston Churchill during a certain episode of World War Two. It was a time when the Nazis were air raiding England. He and his generals one day made a decision to use a certain surprise maneuver on the Nazis, which if they were successful would turn the tide of the war and help them win. The only problem was that the British military intelligence had intercepted and deciphered a secret coded German communiqués about another air raiding of London... Churchill and his army had to remain clear in mind and keep their original goal in mind and they were determined to stick with that decision at all cost... and the costs were high. If the British intelligence and military had evacuated London due to that intercepted communiqué, the Germans would have known that the UK was aware of certain things which would in turn spoil the opportunity for that surprise attack.

A general that changes his mind in mid game on the battlefield will lose a war. A stock market player who is wishy-washy about his decisions on what stocks to buy, and sells and buys in mid game all over the place will not get good results. A student who cannot make up her mind as to what she wants to major in, in school will waste her time and money. You make a decision and you stick with it till the end, and if things don't seem to be working, you don't change your mind... you mickey mouse thing to make that decision work as best as possible.

This should be common knowledge. It's like geometry and rowboats. Say you are the central dot on a row boat in the middle of a circle which is a lake. The circumference of that circle is made up of an infinite number of Points in geometry... each point is a possible end destination you have the freedom to chose to row your boat to. It's only logical that if you row your boat to one point... and then change your mind and row your boat to a different one... then change your mind again and row towards a third point that althoe you seem to be moving... you are actually going nowhere at all. You pick a destination and with stubborn determination row your boat to that goal.

Life is like that circular lake. It's so vast and pointless that there is an infinite number of points and possibilities in front of you. You pick an end goal in life and you reorganize your 'becomingness' – the unfolding of life – to steer you to that end goal. Otherwise the movement you experience in life is a pointless movement which leads you nowhere.

You may ask me then, 'so what's up with "religion" and what's it got to do with a pointless life and decision making?'

Life, as it is naturally, is very "big" like outer space. When a human wants to put himself in the environment of outer space he needs to have a few essential tools to make such an experience possible. First he will need the right "personal environment" thru which he may experience such an outer environment with which he may manipulate such outer environment. This is called a space shuttle and a space suit. The shuttle gets you into space with air to breathe, and the space suit allows to a more personal experience of outer space.

Having a space shuttle and space suit does not make one an astronaut. If you sent a normal civilian into outer space with an expensive shuttle and a state of the art space suit, he will not be able to survive very long or do much, because he lacks the other essential tool to exist and survive in the outer space environment – the "software"... the knowledge of what space is, what he's doing there, how things work in zero gravity, how he will work, and how he should do things, if he desires to derive optimal experience.

This Life... this causal existence... this earth, is like that vast environment, and your causal body is that space suit by which you can more personally experience this causal environment... But just because you as an entity had a way to get here and just because you have a "state of the art" causal body (actually the Homo Sapiens body models we are using is about 200,000 years old, which IMO is incredibly outdated) does not make you an "astronaut"... or a "causalnaut (?)." Why not?

Because you lack the "Software" to function optimally in this causal environment. What do you call a millionaire who has enough money to pay Russia to take them into space? He's not an cosmonaut... he's a "space tourist"... thus without proper "causalnaut" software in your brain you are also just a tourist here on earth essentially... observing and sight seeing, but hardly functional. If you are foolish enough to believe that you are optimally functional in this causal environment then compare yourself to a billionaire like Donald Trump... or to Angelina Jolie who is very beautiful, and famous... or to that guy you secretly envy who has the hot wife and house of his dreams... or to a successful politician... or that guy you obsess over who is respected and admired by terrorists and Jihadists... and you will quickly realize that you are nobody in life and that somehow other humans have made Life work for them to manifest the Life of their dreams... while you work and toil to make enough money to just be a barely functioning tourist here... an “extra” in somebody else’s movie.

This is where Belief and Religion comes into play in the human arena. In a very real sense, these memplexes are literal bio-computer software you install in your brain which runs your “Operating System” and which influences your every thought, thinking process, feelings, how you react to stimuli, and your actions.

So this is the scene that is taking place – there are 7 billion causal environment tourists here on this earth and they all come here without the proper software, or Nature gave it to you, but over the many years you seemed to have misplaced it. So now there are all of these vendors with tables along the side of roads everywhere selling you – a tourist – every kind of imaginable Bio-Software you can think of... from the latest pirated version of the Jesus Software to Materialist Software to the Communist Software.

So you go searching for the latest junk software or the most ancient software you can find – as if ancient memetic software programmers knew how to function right in the 21st century. You go shopping for your gods and beliefs, like people go shopping for cars and computers.

These window shoppers are the most obnoxious people you can go shopping with. They spend all their time looking at all these stupid things about their memplex like are the gods pretty... do they promise godlike powers... do their life insurance policies include an after life... do they make your ego feel great and superior then others... can you use it masochistically to make yourself feel like a vile sinner that needs to be washed by some god... does it come with chaos magic, vampires, and werewolves... how about gene splicing aliens from Nibiru... can you use its impossible to follow moral codes to beat others down with?

Then you bring your memplex home and take it out of the box and what do you really have? Crap. You use it for a while, then get tired of it and go find a new one... the latest one that nobody else is using... ‘Be the first one on your block! Impress your friends! Limited supply, buy now!’ Yeah right, you know when you hear “limited supply” that they have at least 10 warehouses stocked to the roof with it. This Capitalist-Consumerist “culture” – or mindset – that plagues today’s world doesn’t help out either.

It’s all mostly junk. These memplexes don’t have anything in reality to do with life. All it takes is for you to examine where your attention and mind is being focused when you install such software into your brain. Does it focus your mind on God or Life? On Heaven or Life? On salvation or Life? On their religious beliefs or secular materialist convictions or Life? Does it teach you to function optimally to get the best experience and even to succeed in and out of Life? Or is your mind lead deeper and deeper into a maze of phantoms, beliefs, illusions, delusions, materialist denials, etc?

If you think about it, all of these bio-software do the same basic function – tells you how to interpret reality and HOW to live your Life... for whose best interest and what end results is the question. It’s the same with computers. All computers perform the same essential function – computer stuff. All religions perform the same essential function – religion stuff. The same with cars... all cars do the same basic thing – take you from here to there. It’s just that with this Capitalist-Consumerist mindset most people operate on these days, they are caught up in "Brand Names." The best known Church Brands sells the most memeplexes. What are you actually achieving in life and how are you functioning in life and how do you apprehend life, if you are too business chasing phantoms and illusions of religions, gods, and other people's sanctified opinions?

When I buy a car, I stick with it. Chloe has a cousin who trades in his car every other month for a new one. If I end up not liking something about my car, I fix it up and make it likable... I mickey mouse it until it fits me. I don't know much about cars, so I'll use a different example I'm more familiar with to explain how I see this ONA which is my second point.

The ONA is like a pair of jeans that you find at Anton Long's garage sale. They're vintage jeans that he proolly makes himself from old bits and pieces of things he has laying around. All jeans, no matter who makes it or what brand name it is do the same two basic things – covers your ass and covers your kooter. Sometimes we forget that. It's not like if I buy a pair of True Religion jeans like it'll hide my kooch better than any other kind. Well... ok, some jeans make your ass look better cuz of how they are made to lift such things. I personally like ONA jeans because my ass looks good in them.

You know how you buy a pair of jeans and you wear them so often they start to wear out? Holes will form in the knees and that part just below you ass cheeks? I guess sometimes when jeans get to this point many people will throw them away and go shopping for a new pair.

It's not that I'm cheap or anything, but I get attached to all my jeans, so for me, I think the holes gives my jeans personal character. If they get bigger in unwanted spots I can mickey mouse it and stitch it up with a cool patch. I do that anyways to personalize my jeans. Then if the holes get way to big, rather than throw the jeans away, I cut them into shorts for the beach and make paper with the cut up pieces.

For me the ONA is the same way personally. It's rare that every single part of your jeans or other clothing is 100% to your personal liking. This is something that you have to do on your own to personalize your stuff.

I haven't been in the ONA for a long time. Not 10 years or 40, but I have enough "culture" and discipline to stick with one thing. There are certain aspects about the ONA that do not fit me personally (as I am today), but I just mickey mouse these things to make them fit my personality and character. Such as one of its outer forms – old school National-Socialism. I used to like it, but I changed as a person inside. Does that mean I'm going to discard National-Socialism? No, I'll mickey mouse it until it fits who I am today... or actually David Myatt did this already with Reichsfolk NS.

Such as "Satanism" which is another outer form of the ONA. Do I believe a "Satan" exists? No, I don't. I used to when I was 5 years old... when I also believed in Santa Claus and the Easter Bunny... or when I was 13 and still really dumb... but I change inside as I grow up. Does this mean that I have thrown away Christmas and Easter? No. These things still have an emotional meaning to me, as all of my very fond childhood memories are often associated with such things. Santa Claus and the Easter Bunny still means something to me... something much different today than they did when I was 5.

How I see and understand "Satan" today is very different. I didn't throw "Satan" away just because I outgrew my belief in his existence. There is an emotional attachment to the idea of "Satan" which reminds me of my personal struggle to earn my mental and psychological freedom to genuinely think for myself by doubting what I have been told to believe. As I grew older, and as I learned more about life with this freedom to see and experience life without religious filters I just put what I learned about that Life into "Satan" to give it new meaning.

It's something I do when I go hiking or when I am at the beach. I love to stuff my pockets up with little rocks and seashells I find or strange items I come across. So in my analogy of the ONA being a pair of jeans, what we called "Satan" and "Baphomet" are the pockets of these jeans which I gradually fill up with little bits of meaning and understanding. The more meaning I personally give to these things, the more value such things have to me. Rather than go and buy somebody else's "gods" I would rather spend my time either making my own or coming into my own understandings of what "gods" are.

I do not believe that there is a creature in the acausal that calls itself "Satan" or "Baphomet" because it would be foolish to believe that creatures of such Timeless kind should have "names" we creatures of Time make up. After all, what was this "Satan" calling itself 100,000 years ago when our homo sapiens ancestors were still grunting like apes? If such an ape kind of human referred to its feeble apprehension of the Living Cosmos as "Ugh," are you telling me that some entity in the Acausal would come down and say to the caveman – "No, no, you idiot... it's Satan, not Ugh, Satan as in the proto-Hebraic "Shatan"... or the Ancient Greek "Aitan" depending on what future source your ancestors will chose to believe... so get it right!"

Same thing with "Baphomet." Does (Mother) Nature really care what her Life forms – Her form she takes on in Life – calls Her? Last time I check fruit flies, trees, and water buffalos didn't call Nature by any name at all. Nature is just something that they are a part of... that cares for them... but is beyond caring what it is called.

I don't care what the cells in my body calls me... I don't think they call me anything at all to be quite honest... but yet I still care for them by providing them with the things they need thru eating and breathing and by providing them with protection by not jumping off a cliff to my death. Why should something like me – a really smart human being so beyond the feeble intelligence of a toe cell – do so much to provide for such things that hardly acknowledge my existence?

Because I have no choice – they are me. The Living Cosmos wouldn't be "Living" if there was nothing Living in it. That Life Force must be used and manifested as Living Beings... such that what Living Beings that do develop from that Life Force is the same Life Force in different expressions and forms... in the same way that my own blood and life force gives life to and animates every single cell in my body... which in turn makes me who I am.

What then is in a name? I don't even refer to myself as Kayla when I think to myself or hold an internal dialogue with myself. Doing that is a sign of a fracture in one's personality of mental oneness somewhere, which means you are crazy. I don't believe the Living Cosmos is insane and that it calls itself "Satan" or "Jehovah," or "Brahma" or whatever when it talks to itself.

Other people call me Kayla. Even then what others call me is not constant. Some call me Mercie... some sister... some babe... some have their own nicknames for me... but whatever these people call me, I somehow am smart enough to know that they are calling me and talking to me. Who I am to these people is not also a constant. I am a daughter to some... a niece to other... a girlfriend to one... a criminal to a certain few. If I am a mere human and the many names, labels, and things other people call me and believe me to be does not confuse me in any way. Do you assume to tell me that something like a Living Universe gives a shit what you call it or whether you think it's a bearded spirit creature of a tree? How stupid must you simplify the Cosmos and Life to be to fit your own human capacity to understand shit?

I got tired of this stupid theist versus atheist thing that seems to plague mundane Satanism one day so I was meditating on the idea which led me into a thought experiment. I shrunk myself down in my mind to the size of a mitochondria and I put myself in different cell clusters in my body to see how those cells viewed this entity called "Kayla" which they cannot see.

If I were people living in my feet cells, I would think this entity "Kayla" was tyrannical for using me to carry her places. If I were people living in my gut cells I would believe this "Kayla" entity to be despicable to think of me in such a way that I have no worth then to deal with her poo. If I were people living in my hair cells (if hair has cells, I don't know, just pretend) or any cell on my face, I would believe that this "Kayla" entity really loved me a whole lot and I would see "her" as a goddess. Because "she" spends her time shampooing me and putting lipstick on me to make me really hot, and she uses all these face creams and lotions keep us face skin cells healthy.

Then I moved myself into my neurons and I asked myself how these neurons thought of me... that's when I found my "atheist" cells. My neurons don't think of me in any way, because they are doing the thinking... they are "Kayla"... all of them put together as one hive of neurons is "Kayla." So which cluster of cells has the right apprehension of me? The anti-Kayla foot and gut cells? The theist hair and face cells? Or the atheist brain cells? None and all at the same time. They each have a different understanding of who and what I am based on what they are and what their level and capacity to understand is. This entity known sometimes as "Kayla" is a hive of symbiotic co-operative cells or an integrated system of life. As all living things in Nature exists as a living part of an integrated whole – single – system.

Nothing about me remains the same forever... especially my thoughts. What I knew, understood, and thought was possible 10 years ago is very primitive and different than what I know and understand today. This fact brings up certain problems about the universe and Nature – a) Either I out grew and out understood Life and Nature and the Cosmos... or b) Those things exist independent of and way beyond my ability to grasp – understand such things."

I go with (b) and understand that what I believe, know, and apprehend about Live, existence, the Cosmos, and Nature, is not the real and actual thing. In the same sense that what other people in my life think they know about “Kayla” is not fully who I truly am inside. The only living person who can truly say that they know “Kayla” is me... and even then that’s philosophically questionable. The “Kayla” that exists in their Subjective Universe, is not me – the Objective Kayla. The Life, reality, Nature that you believe to know and understand in your Subjective Universe, is NOT the infinite Universe and reality “out there.”

So why hold onto names? Why have I kept Santa Claus and Satan as aspects of my life still? Why have I not thrown them away?

Have you ever gone shopping for food or went to the mall originally with the thought that you were only going to the supermarket to buy just what you need or that you were going to the mall just to hang out with friends... but you came back almost every time with $200 worth of junk? Now... have you ever gone to the same supermarket with a written shopping list... which helps you FOCUS on what you are looking for... and you came back from the store almost always with what you need?

Well, for me having and using the name “Satan” and a “Baphomet” is like being in the supermarket of Life and having a shopping list which helps me focus my mind and attention on what I should be looking for when I am apprehending Life so I won’t end up with a pile of junk.

The ‘god-meme’ doesn’t travel alone. The god-meme is like a really nice looking car on a car lot. You walk on the lot, see all these cool cars... the sales guy put on his fake smile... and if you buy one of them next thing you know you’re signing 20 pages of fine print and the company owns your life for 6 years. The memplex that follows the god-meme around are those 20 pages of fine print... and they do own your life if you have been infected by them in very real ways.

It’s natural for us to look up into the sky and ask ourselves what it all means. It’s a question and mystery that has been with us forever as a species and it has never been answered. The god-meme uses that natural awe and wonder of the mystery of life and sneaks its foot into your mind’s door to catch your interest. It tells you – ‘hey, come check out our god-meme, he’ll answer those questions.’ So you walk into their tent to check out their sideshow and you first see a bearded guy in a tunic and sandals if you’re in the Christianity circus tent. You’ll see deformed 4 and 8 armed people with elephant heads and blue skin if you wandered into the Hindu tent.

So they catch your interest and you say to them – ‘wow, that’s freaky, what’s your god-meme and his beard or elephant head got to do with Life?’ They’ll tell you need to walking in deeper behind the first veil to figure out. So you follow the guy behind the veil and you watch a movie about the life of Jesus or some Guru and they hook you with another meme – the meme (or idea/concept) that you are a vile and despicable creature that is inherently wrong in some way. You worry and ask them – ‘Gosh, I didn’t know that, I’m a sinner bound for hell or I’ve been here for a 1000 life times? How do I save myself and make myself right?’ They’ll say you have to go past the second veil to learn that... and you go.

That’s when they tweak your emotional buttons to manipulate your primal need to be loved and wanted by hooking you with their another meme – the meme that their god-meme loves you and wants the best for you and that their god-meme has a special gift for you like heaven or nirvana which is totally way better than mortal existence and the hear and now! Wow! No way! ‘Where do I sign’ you ask. So you get baptized... or they cut off the pointy skin of your dick off... or perform some other weird ceremony to make you one of them. Then that’s when the rest of the pile of memes – software – gets loaded into your brain.

That’s when you realize what innocently began as a cute god-meme, turned into a pile of “thou shalt, and thou shalt not,” and when you discover that that memplex or software you installed in your brain controls your life. It tells you what you can and cannot eat. Jews can’t eat a list of animals, Muslims can’t eat pigs... Hindus don’t eat beef... some sects of Buddhism don eat any animal at all. Your thoughts are no longer yours. Your pastor or guru tells you how to think and what is real and acceptable and what is fake and unreal. You discover that you live your whole life for the religion... and not for Life or yourself.

What’s all of that got to do with Life? Who do those things serve? These religion memplexes are self serving parasites. You maintain and propagate their god-meme, their memes of what life is and how it should be lives, there memes of wrong and right... you are going out of your way to think... eat... mate... live different in accordance with the dictates of such memplexes. Those memplexes are not giving you the knowledge and liberty to live as you once lived it – Free. Even the atheistic-materialistic memplex does this.

Using the name “Satan” and having a list of concepts I associate with “Satanism” is a firewall or a guard to keep me clean of these memetic parasites. I constantly add to what “Satan” and “Satanism” is to me. If your god-memes, ideas, beliefs, memplex doesn’t fit into what I know as Satan and Satanism... then get it the hell away from me.

If your god-meme says that there is a single right way to live life which was created by some personification of human emotions and human wishful thinking, then that doesn’t fit what Satan is to me and I reject your god-meme. I believe life is pointless and that there is no single right way to live life. Life is what you make of it. If your memplex says that killing is wrong, then that has nothing to do with the software I am using called “ONA Satanism version 121yf” thru which I understand that death and one animal taking another’s life in Life and Nature is a natural process. If your memplex says that caring for other people is the right thing to do... then I reject that memplex because that’s not how I personally understand life via my memplex which I chose to refer to as “Satanism.”

So there are practical reasons why I still use Satan and Satanism. It keeps me focused and it helps me maintain my mental clarity so I can clearly see my original intent and objectives in Life – doing whatever I can to succeed in life and to consciously evolve myself... at all costs.

This doesn’t mean that I worship a Satan or that what I call “Satanism” is the same thing as what others call “Satanism.” It also doesn’t mean that what is my Satanism is the same as the Satanism used in the ONA. I will mickey mouse the ONA and everything about it to fit me personally, including its Satanism. This way the ONA doesn’t stunt my personal growth. Instead it helps me grow and as I grow, I will drag it along with me whether it want to come or not... like a faithful pet dog, a companion in life, or a tapeworm, that never leaves your side but grows with you.

The ONA is just like a pair of your favorite jeans. You can dye it different colors, put glitter on it... even cut it into shorts if you want... just don't cut out the two fundamental components. In a pair of jeans if you cut a hole in the crotch area and in the ass area, your jeans are completely worthless... because you've just gotten rid of its fundamental essence – the idea that it covers your damn crotch and ass crack. In the ONA the most basic fundamental two things of the ONA are the Black Book of Satan and Naos. You get rid of those and you really don't have much of an ONA any more.

Does this mean that I have to forever believe that Satan and Baphomet are real and that performing all those rites in the BBS actually does what they do? I mickey mouse the BBS to make it fit me and work for me. Rather than throw it away because I have out grown it, I force new meaning into it to keep it relevant to me. It's not going anywhere. It's how I see things and how I interpret the BBS that makes it different to me.

What I thought long ago as fact... meaning that Satan and the Dark Gods exist and performing ceremonies to them as described actually did things to worship them, I now see and understand as Mythos. This is not to say that the BBS is "myth."

Mythos is a story, at times a mythic fiction, other times a real historic event that is used in such a way that it captivates a group of people's minds who resonates with that essence and quality and brings them together into a coherent social structure... giving birth slowly to a Culture and Living Tradition. Mythos is the resonance factor which is the glue of a collective identity. Mythos is a common foundation that is the germ of culture, regardless of its actual factual nature.

Just look at how powerful the Mythos of Lovecraft is. He never claimed his stories were fact. Every body knows his Mythos is fiction... but they have such a power to captivate people's minds – enchanting a primal nature in some of us – that it draws people of like resonance together.

Mythos doesn't always mean myth. The Aryan Mythos Hitler and his friends created enchanted an entire nation of Germans down trodden by the failure of the first world war. It gave them a sense of needed identity and self worth. It brought them up from being despised by the part of Europe that won the first world war. It gave them new meaning in their lives... and they went to war and killed for that Mythos. It took the entire world to come together to stop that Mythos.

The Mythos that we hear in school about the Founding Fathers and their fight for Liberty is another example of Mythos that is not fairy tale. That Mythos – the historic story – of some group of men all laying their lives down to fight the most powerful empire in Human history for Freedom and Human Rights is powerful and it's what makes America as a country a super power because it calls out those humans who resonate with that human desire to be Free people with rights and the same opportunities in life as any one else.

Did those “founding fathers” actually fight for people’s freedom? Most of them owned slaves... and it actually started from a disagreement on taxation without representation. Those guys just saw an opportunity of a life time and they took full advantage of that window of opportunity when the circumstances blossomed as Time develops such circumstances. What actually happened back then is less romantic and less captivating. The living Mythos we hear now, that has been told for hundreds of years is more enchanting and powerful... it is thus a reinterpretation of things. That Mythos was never thrown away one day when America changed and became its own “person.” America just took that old story and gave it new life... thus breathing magic into it to its own benefit.

To me I do that same with the BBS, Satan, and Satanism. I might have out grown the idea that an anthropomorphic devil exists and that performing a Black Mass pleases him, but I don’t throw out those things. I reinterpret these things to breathe new life into it for me to my own benefit. Do I believe that performing such rites benefits some host of demons in the acausal? No. Do I believe performing such rites helps draw down acausal energy and/or Life Force? Yes... how so?

Using “Satan” as a compass to guide me on this hiking trail of Life, I have come to see certain aspects about Life and Nature that’s not really written in books. Life Force seems to move... or is constantly in motion. The obvious example is if it stops raining in a spot on the earth for a long time, the Life Force in that spot atrophies and recede and goes to a new spot. Life Force moves around the earth in visible patterns with the seasons, with the phases of the moon, the tides the moon brings, and with sun spots even.

In my mind one day, as I was meditating on this concept of “Stargates” and “nexions” that Anton Long thought up of, I was reminded really quickly of the plumbing under my sink. This one time one of the pipe at one of my uncles houses was leaking and the leaking broke the pipe. There was all this water gushing all over the place, and my uncle ran somewhere to close off some valve in the piping system which turned off the water supply for the whole house so he could fix it.

That made me think about farmers and their irrigation systems. In ancient times, and still in many parts of rural Asia, they use gravity to water their fields, and they’ll have these flood gate things which they can open and close to control the flow of water. So I was thinking to myself how if I were a farmer, the crops in one of my fields weren’t healthy, or if I wanted to use the crop rotation technique to vitalize one of my fields, I would cut off water supply to that field and use that water to feed my other fields that yielded more Life.

Which got me to think about Life and Nature. As I apprehend Nature, it seems as thoe the further a person removes himself or herself from Nature and lives unnaturally, the sicker and more diseased they are. For instance compare our Western people with people living in rural areas in other “less developed nations” and ask yourself which group suffers from more diseases such as cancers... heart disease... tumors... etc. By removed from Life I not only mean a physical removal or eating food with man made chemicals in it, but also a conscious forcing of oneself to live against the flow of Nature. Not only do you see that humans in the west suffer from more disease and are dying more often... but you see the same effect in dogs and cats that live in these same parts of the world.

It seems as those humans, dogs, and cats who come from areas of the world that lock themselves indoors for long periods of time... bathe themselves in artificial lights most of the time... eat foods with artificial chemicals most of the time... and do everything but live life... die. As if Life Force recedes from these humans and dogs because Life does not thrive in them and thru them. The Life Force in them atrophies... like a farmer had closed their floodgates to stop the flow of Life Force and acausal energy to feed these people who are not thriving. If the basic idea of Life is to Live and thrive thru its living forms... then it is only logical that life forms that reject Life and that refuse to participate in Life cannot be a vital causal vehicle for Life to thrive thru... thus the many lethal diseases that both humans and the pets they force to adopt such anti-life styles die from.

I seriously believe that Right Hand religions, their rites, and hardcore materialism removes you from Life resulting in a atrophic recession of acausal energy and Life Force in such people. So base on how I currently understand Life and Nature, these rites and ceremonies we have in the Black Book of Satan and the Physis in Naos not only keeps a person physically connected to Life and Nature, but those Traditional Rites do call down acausal energy and Life Force because those rites gets the initiate to celebrate – exult – Life and mortal existence and all such gifts of mortal existence has to offer.

An ONA initiate who learns to practice these rites and follows the Sinister way, eventually relearns how to live life unfettered by goofy memes and idea of a right way or wrong way to live Life. The initiate in a sense rediscovers her or his primal Nature within and becomes a natural living organism like any animal capable of experiencing Life whether that experiencing is sex, killing, preying, or whatever... we end up doing what Life intended us to do – Live it and thrive.

I guess what I am saying is what has been said before with Martial Arts. You pick a style that fits you and stick with it... and change it as you progress and evolve. Like how Anton Long stuck with the ONA for 40 years and how we can visibly see thru his 30 and so years of writing how the ONA has changed as he changed... shapeshifting as he grows, progresses, evolves, and shapeshifts on his own private quest in Life.

You end up not really going anywhere in life if you do not have the nature and culture to stick with one thing and make that thing work – or succeed with that one thing. Because if you did not have it in you to succeed or make that one thing work for you... what make you thing using something else will do it for you? If the car you are driving sucks and keeps getting into car accidents... sometimes it might not be the car that is not functioning right... it just might be you – the driver. Success comes from within. It is a determination, or a burning. For most of us, the only thing that comes closest to such a burning for a single objective is the object of our infatuation. We will go to any length and measure if our passion for a person burns great enough to get that person... and to those whose passion does burn fierce with single minded determination, they often do succeed.

It's like the old Zen story – one day a student finds a monk bathing in the river and the student goes up to the monk and says – 'Master, I desire enlightenment, please teach me.' The monk tells the student to go away and stop bothering him. The student, thinking the monk was testing his desire said – ‘I will not go away, I’ll keep bugging you until you accept me as a student.’ The monk told the student to go away a second time. So the student enters the river with the monk and refuses to leave asking a third time for the monk to make him a student.

The monk got angry and grabbed the man’s head and forced him into the water sitting on his neck to drown him. The man struggles and fights for his life eventually pushing the monk off to catch his breath and he asks in a rage – ‘what’s wrong with you? I came here to ask you to teach me to find enlightenment, and you try to kill me?’ The monk says – ‘what did you desire most when you were drowning?’ ‘Air,’ says the student. The monk tells the man – ‘Unless you desire enlightenment with that same intensity and determination, you will not have the ability to achieve it. Not having the ability to become enlightened you are wasting my time, leave me alone’... and the man left, learning something valuable.

Those who genuinely resonate with the ONA – as Anton Long – have a certain objective in life, or a certain way they desire to live life which they burn for with that same intensity and determination. It drives them to go to extreme measures to live such a sinister life to the point where they will isolate themselves in the woods, go to jail and risk their lives for it. It’s not a choice, its who they are, and its what they burn for. For such people this ONA is just a way and a means – a tool – that helps such sinister individuals manifest the Life and Way they naturally determined to live anyways. As a gun is a tool for a police officer and a gangbanger... neither of these two kinds of people ever are without their guns. Someone who is genuinely Sinister, never leaves home without his Sinister Way. The indecisive who have no Way or Life, not genuinely Sinister By Nature, and burn for nothing in particular, have it in their nature to window shop.

SENTENTIA OBDUCO

Sententia Obduco

Since last year our ONA NXS blog has had a lot of people finding their way to the blog by searching “Chloe 352.” It happens at least 6 times in a day. So I thought I’d write a very long thing entirely about me and stuff about what strange and other worldly things grows in my brain! Since it appears as though at least 6 people are interested in information about me. Six is enough, I don’t need much to give me reason to talk about myself! Sententia Obduco is Latin for something like “passing thoughts.”

My Cyber Presence

Chloe is my real first name [one of two]. By our culture and/or social class’s Tradition I have two last names: my dad and mom’s. Taking both your parents last names is common in both my Asian family’s customs as well as my Mexican side. I’m not going to say it’s a custom of upper class people. It’s just that this seems regular practice amongst certain Culture people of Asian and Mexican ethnicity. My biological dad’s family name is my “middle name,” and my mom’s family name is my last name. Those two parts of my name will remain offline. “Ortega” is not my real last name, but I use it as such online. It’s a nickname.

No, I don’t have a web presence anywhere else but at our ONA NXS blog. Or at least no cyber account on the internet is specifically and exclusively me. I do not have a facebook. 90% of the people I hang out with are my own family and cousins whom I see every day in real life. I have no need to “stay connected” to them. If anything, I try to disconnect myself from them to get some me time. 99% of the people I know and hang out with are in my face everyday in some way. I have no need to “stay connected” with them via facebook. I got over that teenybopper stuff during our Myspace and Friendster days 6 years ago. It got old fast, seriously.

I don’t have a “cyber presence” in forums. What my friends and I have are things we call “portal accounts.” We usually make a single account somewhere and pass the password and log-in data around with one another. The first reason was that in the old days when we used the same portal account to talk about ONA or whatever, because all of our insights come out of one profile, it makes the profile sound extra smart and this is effective in causing resonance. After a while either these portal accounts get unused or one of us will adopt the profile and its nym and run around the internet doing whatever with it. One or two of our portal accounts have been confused for DM for some odd reason by many people. People out there are just paranoid and believe any ONA person on the internet with functioning frontal lobes must be David Myatt. While others want to believe that any ONA person online that can articulate a sentence is David Myatt so they can debate such people thinking they are out thinking or debating the Man, because they live their mundane Myatt obsessed life running around the Internet to fight and pick on DM. It's the latest craze these days. What better way to show other imbecile mundanes you have cyberballs then to attack digital paper tigers and troll legions of draconian David Myatts lurking everywhere in the most disinteresting of web forums. Yes indeed, internet trolls these days are the heroes of the mentally impaired.

My Ethnic Makeup

I am mixed with a lot of things, Mexican being one. Which is why race is no real issue to me, and why I can afford to be an equal opportunity racist. My biological dad is Mexican. Or specifically Mestizo which is a mix of indigenous people and White Europeans. From his family name, the White side of him originates from Portugal in some distant past. My parents were never married, they lived together, then spilt up.

But I do have bonds and relationships with my Mexican family. Blood is Bond. But the reason why I don't talk about my "Mexicanness" is because my dad and his family have been living in California since before California was a state. And so, my Mexican side is as American as America. Because my Mexican side is as American as any other secular American, what do I have to talk about? Tortillas? Hot dogs? Being American? Being Secular? Being Republican? Plus I'm not raised by my Mexican side. And also I look more like my aunt-mom and Asian cousins than my Mexican relatives. Why do I look like my Asian cousins and not my Mexican relatives? It's a fascinating thought.

My culture has an ancient traditional belief that when a girl is pregnant whatever or whomever she thinks about the most during her pregnancy influences how the baby will come out looking like. So in our culture, when we learn that one of our girls is pregnant she's not allow to watch TV, look at ugly picture, or listen to alarming music, or be around unsightly people – such as fat people – and she is not allow to do any kind of work or be in any situation where she gets strongly angry, scared, or freak out. Otherwise the baby may come out affected.

So if you have cousins that look like their fathers, it means that the mother during her pregnancy was either really in love with the father, or thought about him often. And this can even be a thinking about in a hating and irritated kind of way. If your cousin looks like their mom, it means the mother was thinking about her own self and her own life, etc. So why did I come out looking like people on my mom's side of the family? Because at the time my mom abandoned her family to be with her boyfriend [my dad] and during her pregnancy she said she felt very sad and missed her family, most especially her favorite sister [my aunt-mom] and she would think about them at night. It's also said that as a baby you grow to take on the look and character traits of whoever is breast feeding you, since the breast milk is also considered "blood." My mother was thinking about my aunt-mom when she was pregnant with me, and my aunt-mom raised me and breast fed me; so I actually did come out looking more like my aunt-mom or her genetic daughter.

My grandparents on my Asian side are something like 60% Han Chinese. Specifically Hokkien, Teochew, and Cantonese. If you image google Taiwan Girls, you'll get an idea of what me and my cousins look like, since most Taiwanese are Hokkien [Hoklo] people. My grandmother says her parents and their relatives spoke Hokkien when they used Chinese. I have at least 5 uncles I know whose names are Uncle Hok. I have cousins who are 90% Han Chinese of mostly Teochew stock. It's all hard to tell because of the strange fact that a lot of line-breeding has been going on over many generations. So it's hard to determine the percentage of genetic stock when no new blood is added into the mix you know? The other 40% of my Asian side is Thai, with Laotian way in the background. But my Great grandmother is mostly Thai-Chinese.

Language(s) I Speak

I honestly speak only one fluently: English. I understand spoken Khmer, but I don't know enough words in my lexicon to make a whole sentence to speak with common folk Khmer people. The Khmer my family uses is of a higher register and so we use different words, and pronouns are obsolete. How do I explain this? It's like you have a kingdom the size of New York City and 85% of your citizens speak common street grade slang, and you were born and raised by a family of Yale graduates who work as lawyers and politicians. You understand and speak the same "language" but as far as talking with the 85% commoner goes and being understood, your language skills can be considered "impaired" due to difference in lexicon/register and cultural matrix.

I can read and speak more Spanish words than Khmer. I know as much French as I do Spanish; enough to understand what I am reading half the time which doesn't mean anything. I took German in high school during my "Hitler years." I think I was the only Asian or ethnic person in the whole school to have a picture of Adolf Hitler on my folder and the White friends I had – from German class – were all either local skinheads or members of the KKK. I was even made a full fledged member of their skinhead crew called SLWB which stood for Skinny Little White Boyz. If you're a girl it's SLWG [the G for Girlz].

Everybody knew I was Asian and not white in my White group of friends, but they didn't seem to care. They actually defended my confusion, by saying: "Asian is the other White meat." So during lunch period we'd be in the library and I'd check and edit my White friends German homework and essays. Which was where we did all of our philosophical or ideological talks on National Socialism, racial supremacy, Jews, Zionism. My Aryan friends were intelligent, unlike the Nazi hillbillies you encounter in the Midwest. They were considerate enough to remember that Japan was the last of the Axis powers to hold out till the very end. It took two nukes and the world to stop the Japanese side of the Axis! Eat that Italy. The Axis shall rise again! If you're a National Socialist and you know your history, you have to at least give your props to your Asian kinfolk for trying.

Early Nazi Friend Influences

I was sort of influenced by them. But first of all what race am I? Asian or Mexican? Hokkien, Cantonese, or Aztec, or Portuguese? I do have racist feelings, but those feelings aren't some blanket world view I cover over an entire race with. If you are within my field of awareness in some way and you are stupid or bugging me, yeah, I'll treat you like you're stupid and I'll hate on your skin color, ignorance, religion, gender, whatever. But that's it. Just because I try to attack everything about you as a person, doesn't mean I dislike a person of the same skin color and nationality as you are, because they might be respectful and nice to me. I have to know you to like you, and I have to know you to hate you.

But I don't have to be influenced by my White friends to have deep prejudices about certain kinds of people. I get that from my own family and culture I was raised in. They just have a deep dislike for people called "peasants" and commoners. It's weird because for my family, they were all born and raised in a different country which was in general 80% racially homogeneous. The 80% majority were subjugated and disliked. But the "racism" or "classism" that existed in that country and culture is more extreme and volatile than the racism and supremacy thing between Whites Aryans and Blacks/Jews.

It was the same general race, but the classism was extreme. During the monarchical period upper class/strata people were extremely abusive to citizens and Vietnamese immigrants. You can kill a commoner and immigrant as an upper class person and not get in trouble in any way because of rampant nepotism in the law and judicial system. Chances are, if you were from the upper class, the lawyers, judges, cops, mayor, of your city were all relatives of yours who shared your same disgust for peasants and immigrants Vietnamese. And then the tables were turned during the Khmer Rouge revolution when all of them – peasants and Vietnamese immigrants – slaughtered 2 million people in retaliation out of simple hatred for being abused and mistreated for centuries. Cause and Effect is a bitch sometimes I guess.

Family History

What I know is based on what I hear my family talk about. Mostly my aunt-mom, mother, and great grandfather – the one who is the only one to speak English – who was an Ambassador to the US during Nixon.

The great grandfather says that his family came from China and moved to southern Thailand. The great grandfather and his brothers and sisters ended up marrying into an Oligarchic Thai family who owned large amounts of property/land in a southern province called Phra Tabong at the time. So that's where our family's Thai and Chinese comes from.

So my Thai great grandmother and her siblings are the one that comes with the status and class. The great grandmother is a third generation descendent of a king of Thailand who reigned during the mid 1800's or so. But this is pretty much meaningless to people outside our family and relatives, and it also gives us no real ties with the current House of Chakri, because this king in question had over 100 children with multiple wives. Our family traces its lineage back to one of those wives and her children she had by him. This is all just family history. It is meaningless today, but as a coherent family, it is important to have a history or to know your history and to pass that knowledge to each generation, so they know where their blood has come from and thus where it should go. If you look at the Royal Insignia of the House of Chakri and compare it to our Nexion's "Trisickle" symbol, you will see that it is the same design. The trident both insignias have are the same. The Sickle in our Triscikle is a Chakra [bladed wheel]. I got the sickle from the Reichstar or the Wheel of the Cosmos in the ONA which is a circle of 4 spinning Sickles in the shape of a swastika.

So all of those people and their children all lived on the property in Tabong province. Tabong means a Club or big Stick that you beat people with. Until during the 40-50's when that province was reverted back to the kingdom of Cambodia. Historically Thailand sacked Cambodia in the late 1300's and took that land and the whole of Cambodia. It got re-renamed "Battambang" and during the whole process the family just stayed on their property because they owned large parts of it and had farms and plantation there anyways. That's how my grandmother technically became "Khmer," but my grandmothers – every old relative granny's age is a grandmother – only speak Khmer with an accent. They can't read or write it. They all speak Thai. The great grandparents all speak Chinese.

Inside Cambodia they networked with the Khmer Oligarchic families. So eventually you end up with the Prime Minister of Cambodia at one time being my grandmother's cousin, who got shot at the airport by the Khmer Rouge trying to get into the country to look for the family. The generals that ran the military were cousins of my grandmother. Other government officials were cousins of my grandmother. One of my grandmothers uncles, whom we call great grandfather, was picked by the King of Thailand to be the Supreme Patriarch of Thailand. That's like the spiritual office of Dalai Lama, except for Thailand's Theravada Buddhism. There were others in other fields and professions, but all those people mostly got killed during the revolution.

Those that survived like my grandmother and all of her children minus one, survived because the relatives in Thailand fished them out of the insane country and they gave everybody some money and relocated them to California where it was safe. And for 20 years my grandmother forbade anybody to use the family names fearing the Khmer Rough's remnant underground sympathizers in America would find us and kill us. Like they did to one of my mom's own cousins here in the states during the 90's. His name was Uncle Hok. He had been living here for over 10 years and had children here – my second cousins – and a couple of the underground sympathizers broke into his house one night and shot him. Just because a war ends, doesn't mean the ideas and propaganda stops spreading. If you lived in my shoes you'd know first hand from intimate association and exeprience the destructive power of ideas and how they refuse to die out. It's been 70 years and there are still Nazis walking around hating Jews.

My "Feminist" Views

My views on gender role actually comes from my own culture and people. It's Matriarchal. In my own culture girls rule the nest/home. It doesn't matter what the men do for a living because you come home after work. It doesn't matter if as a man you are a king or prime minister because you still have mothers, aunts, and sisters that tell you what to do when you are at home. Grandmothers and women don't need some silly "right" printed on paper which says they can or can't vote or be in politics. They just tell you their policies when you are home which you would restate or implement. Otherwise your wife leaves you, your wife's family takes your children away, and your wife's brothers and male cousins assassinate your ass themselves or they pay someone to do it. Paperwork and "right" don't mean shit. As an oligarchic female, you don't want common females to have some paperwork "rights" so they can vote to stick their ignorant peasant noses into places they don't belong: state affairs.

Hypothetically what are you gonna do if you are some king while your wives and concubines are all blood related to two or three oligarchic families? Not only are you pussy-whooped, but those pussies that own you belong and are loyal to their families not you. Grandmothers don't care of you are some prime minister running some state. Your wife is their daughter or grand daughter. We don't use pronouns in speech, so when you want to say "she" we use words like "Girl," "Lady," etc. As a man, if they like you, you get called things like "Sir," or by your title; if the old ladies don't like you, you get called by a generic word which means "it." You literally here the old ladies talk about kings and politicians saying things like: "What can it do to us? It is married to our own daughters. We can tell our daughters to put poison into its food and kill it if it doesn't do what it is told to do. Why would our female race give birth to these men if it is disobedient to its creators? If the female race has the power to give it life, we have the power to take its life also."

In a matriarchal social order, and an aristocratic family, your son is a tool you use to get your family into higher spots in the social strata and to get you linked to more wealthier and more powerful families. Your son is only a means to an end. You work hard to train your sons to accomplish big things in life because those accomplishments are his resume you will show the other family. The goal is not to marry your son off to another family. The marriage is meaningless because they can divorce. The goal is to have your son impregnate the other family's daughter as soon as he can to produce offspring. That offspring is your blood link to the other family. Once that offspring is born, the manipulative work is all up to you as cunning grand parents to forge a strong bond with that offspring so they will love you and share their inheritance with not you but your other children and that offspring's cousins.

It's all this manipulative transgenerational inheritance plunder business. If you know how to play the game right, in a few generations your "bloodline" end up running the kingdom. Girls in this type of society don't have to do anything. But your grandparents tries to pair up their daughters with good looking mates so their grand daughters come out as pretty as possible. The prettier you look and the more traditional and cultured you are – plus a good pedigree [breed, relations, estates, connexion, status, etc] – the more prized you are, because men are stupid and think with their dicks in any culture. Which is why in such culture and/or traditional cultures being a gay male is frowned upon. Not because it's immoral, but because you would have no desire to marry and breed with a girl. You thus have no practical use in this context.

As a side note, don't ever let anybody tell you that being gay is "unnatural." That word "natural" and "unnatural" in this context has no real substantial meaning. If you look in Natural or even on youtube you will find "homosexual" behaviour and conduct in animals. I watched two guy bisons have sex with each other, penetration and all. I seen it. It is neither "natural" or "unnatural." It simply exists as an expressible potential within the Human Condition. Being Human is like being a sofa with cushions. You have a lot of junk in the cracks. All that junk is stuff you as a Human can express for whatever reason. If the junk was not there, you would not be able to express it in your humanness. War, culling, love, cannibalism, crossdressing, these are all junk under our Human sofa we have and can express. Some more reluctantly expressed than others. A tick has junk under its sofa cushion to spend its whole life sucking the blood off a horse. That's one kind of junk we don't have a people. Even if you were odd and believed yourself to be a vampire, you can't live your whole life stuck to a horse and sucking its blood. You just can't. It's not a potentiality within your Human Condition. Being emotionally, physically, or sexually attracted to different kinds of people – and sometimes animals – are.

But it's not imbalanced. Girls in my culture have a "place" and function to perform: domestic stuff. Traditionally as a girl you work the house environment, cook, and raise children. You don't work. You aren't allowed to work or leave the home. If you get married, your husband must support you so you can stay at home. It's unbecoming for a woman of our class strata to work. That's what men are made for. Why should we work? We have your kids, let you sleep with us, and cook for your ass? Fuck you, get to work.

Guys come home from work these days and they bitch about life. Girls these days, we work like you, we mother your children and you, we take care of the home, and we cook for you and you don't hear us crying and bitching telling you to get us a beer. Fuck you, get your own beer.

I was raised with my whole family teaching me things like: "A wise one of the Female Race/Kind must know to never love the male race/kind. Those "people" are worthless. You can get married, but there are thousands of men walking around. You lose one, you can find another the next day. But your sisters, brothers, children, and family, can never be replaced, and will always love you and be there to care for you. Those men are not family. Don't waste your time loving your future husband. Just like "it," as if "it" were a friend. And don't every trust "it" completely. "It" is a worthless animal, only good for working and providing for your needs. If "it" stops providing, find another one."

In my culture, the female isn't a gender, we are a race or kind, and males are their own race and kind. If I am "racist" this is the context of my "racism." Girl People are better than Man people. Girl People are closer to the Divine/God. Our mothers are living goddesses in our culture with the power to wash your "bad karma."

So I am not a feminist in the Western/American sense. I don't believe or want gender equality. Nor do I believe in gender equality. I am honestly culturally Traditional. Meaning that I believe women kind are inherently better than men. But unlike feminists I don't believe I should have equal "right" as men do. I want better rights, and I want men to have less rights. I want men to have only the right to work. And I don't believe women kind should or needs to work, especially if you are a mother. I'm not a "feminist," I'm more accurately a "Matriarchist." I like being feminine and wearing normal girl clothing. I don't want to have some stupid equal right to walk around bare chested in public like guys do. I like wearing bras, I don't want to burn them.

Even in my own Matriarchal social weltanschauung, men have their place of power. We female-folk have our own place of power where we on a human level get to make the decisions: the domestic sphere. The men by their very territorial nature have their own place of power: the terrestrial/political sphere. We each must respect our respective places of power and allow the other to naturally function in those places of power. A girl has no natural right to be territorial and be in politics. A man had no natural right to stick his nose in the domestic sphere of blood, family, and progeny. As a Traditionalist, I believe each gender has their proper place by Nature, and when you make abstract ideologies and act all politically correct where we force humans to go against what Nature had decreed by sticking girls and guys in places they don't belong you fuck shit up.

It's not you dharma. So what if you are a girl and you can shoot an AK 47, get the hell out of the military and raise your children proper. Unless that is actually what you personally are drawn to. So what if you are a guy and can wear a dress and make a banana flambé. Put that shit down and go be a fucking warrior or politician. Unless being that way is your dharma. It's about the dharma of an organic system. In a tribe some are born naturally inclines at art while others naturally are rough at play. The former in the tribe has the dharma of imbuing the tribe with inspiring works of art, the later will end up defending the tribe with his dharma as a soldier. Let each person be what they are naturally drawn to. If you are a girl and you are actually drawn to the work place and are good at it, fine. But don't make me work. I don't want to be liberated to work a job.

If you are a girl and you like walking around with no bra and hairy manlike armpits, fine. But don't turn it into a movement and call it women's liberation. No real girl wants to be free to be hairy and manlike; unless they are French. You can keep the freedom and right. Same with guys. If you are actually naturally drawn to the domestic sphere, fine. But don't make every guy gay like you. Let other's seek and express their dharma. And so collectively Nature has given female kind and man kind their own dharma or places of power they generally excel in. Let Nature do its shit. You don't need to stick your hubris noses into Mother Nature and Father Time's business and liberate shit. They know what they are doing. They have been doing it without your hubris ass for 4 billion years. I'm not a feminist or into women's lib. I am a Traditionalist and Matriarchist. I like to use what has been proven to work in nature and practice; not what sounds good in theory and policy because it makes people feel safe.

American girls are weird, in that they are easily misled or subverted by the System. They don't seem to have any real sense of self worth and value. As if they don't understand the value and power of the "Female Race" that we give birth to men, we raise and mother them, we nurture them, and we give ourselves to them, we serve them because we feel for them. And they in turn treat us like second class things. That male race is a despicable and rotten race. The Westernize girl is led to believe that struggling to be "equal" to men is the holy grail of a girl's life. And as they pursue their equality, nobody raises the children. And thus, the very foundation of humanity's future is weaken: the children. Some state ends up raising them. It's unbecoming for a girl in the West to just want to be a home maker and mother. Different cultures I guess. I like them though as sisters and fellows of a Girl Race. Western guys though to me, I have nothing but disdain for 90% of them. It's a cultural thing. Why seek to be "equal" when Nature made us better?

My Political Orientation

Conservative; Classist; Unilateralist; Elective Monarchism, and Meritocratic Aristocracy.

By Conservative I mean that I do not believe politics should have any influence or say on a people's Culture and Tradition. I believe that each people have the right to conserve their people's culture and tradition. I am therefore against this Western bullshit concept of egalitarianism and political correctness. I'm Asian by culture: don't be forcing you fucking White culture on me. You're White: don't act like you are Black or Mexican. Stay on your own fucking side of the culture fence. We're not equal. We are UNIQUE to each other. That uniqueness must be preserved. I greatly dislike those peasantile leveling of humanity in the West brought on by this political correctness. Because it weakens the cohesion and solidarity and cultural identity of each unique culture and way of life.

I highly admire and have a great amount of respect for a White person who loves his culture, is proud of his racial and ancestral heritage, and will fight to preserve those things for his children and grand children. Even if such White people may see me as "nonaryan." It's all internal cultural rhetoric/mythos each culture must use to induce our own people and young generations to maintain their cultural identity, so the culture, way of life, and ancestral traditions are not lost to decadence and abstract notions of egalitarianism. My respect goes out to any race or culture that has this same strong coherency factor.

When you have White boys disconnected from their own heritage and culture acting Black, as a White Culture, you fucked up somewhere because you failed to provide that White boy a cultural heritage and identity; one that he can be proud of and be confident of. He has to seek that identity in other people's shit? And it's not just Whites. This goes from people like me too. What is wrong with you or me as an Asian individual acting white and joining skinhead gangs? People can say: "It's a cultural melting pot. It's a good thing!" Is it? Is it factually and humanly "good." I have a Mexican friend who thinks he is a Japanese ninja. I love him to death, but what the fuck is wrong with him and his culture that he has to seek an identity and self –worth elsewhere? These types of people are called "drifters." Over time – like 100 years – with all of these drifters drifting away from that Mother Culture, the mother culture dies. When that mother culture dies, your people are absorbed into a larger and more coherent culture. Not as an "equal" but as a support to be used.

Let's look at the African brought here to America. About 300-400 years ago Africans were brought to America as slaves. In the beginning they had their own language; their own cultures and traditions, their own religions and cultus, their own world views, their own identity as a people or peoples. 4 generations – great grandparents, grand parents, etc – you have an entire race of Black people suffering from "Human Vertigo," where they can't tell left from right. They have White people names, White people world views, White people religion, White people gods, White people secular culture. But people can say: "Yes, but this is so because they are American." The question is as a Black People what do they exist as a people for now? Whose destiny do they serve now? Their own Black People's collective destiny? Or the collective destiny of White people or even some abstract "America?"

Sure they have the “freedom” to vote, but for whom? And ultimately for whose actual interests? Sure they aren’t slaves anymore and they can work, but ultimately for whose interests and WILL? Their own Black People’s interest and Sovereign Will [destiny] or White People or some abstract ideal [America].

Same goes with the other Cultures. I’m not really talking about race and skin color. I’m talking about People and their human Culture. There is a difference. I’m barely Thai by blood, but that’s my Culture and People.

When I say Classist I mean that I believe in natural human social stratification. Fuck this equality shit. It’s not a real concept. Sure we are “equal” in the eyes of law and justice, which is debatable. But it still doesn’t change our humanness and our uniqueness as human beings. If you take a room of children, and you give each child 10 pieces of candy, eventually some will have no candy left, other will have some left, some with have all 10 left, while a few somehow will end up with more than they started off with.

Same concept goes with adults and money, property, accomplishments, possession, manifestation. Stupid people don’t have much. Those that have the means, the relations, the blood, the will, and determination, the transgenerational planning will always, always out do the stupid. We each deserve our lot in life. If you are poor and a peasant fuck you, don’t be asking for equality you stupid fuck. Work for your wealth and status. If not for you, then for your future progeny. It’s Aeonic. It’s because of the wyrd of your stupid ignorant ancestors – grandparents and great grandparents – that you exist in the condition you do today. And it is your fault based on your thoughts, emotions, actions, and worldviews, that will manifest the life and condition your progeny will experience. Thus aeonically Peasant stock humans will always produce peasant stock humans.

Why did the Buddha call his Way the Noble/Honourable/Aristocratic [Ariya] Way [Magga]? Because when you understand how Causality – cause and effect – works as it is explained simply in the 8 Fold Path, and you know how to work it right as a group/family/clan/sangha over time you will produce Ariya Offspring who will rule over or guide the Anariya: Mundanes. Only the ruling class – the Ariya – with their power, religious and political influence via their kingdoms and states has the power to influence a massive amount of humans in a direction. The only real practical way to enlighten the mundane is to force them or herd them en masse like cattle.

An Emperor of China has power and influence over hundreds of millions of people in those days for example. Nothing influences our species in such large numbers as an Nation-State. Religion can’t do it. The numbers look big, but with 2 billion Christians in the world, hardly anyone is collected into a collective force to get any work done. It took a nation-state – America – and its power, resources, and synergy to put humans on the moon. If humanity as a whole is to evolve it is via Empire, and culture. And if it is by Imperium that the human species is pushed forward, the aristocracy are the movers. If it wasn’t for the ruling class and families of colonial America, no peasant today would believe in or support democracy. The mundanes are pushed forward. The Enlightened move forward on their own. The catch of the game is that you cannot move forward by yourself. Humanity as a whole must move together. In the 1600’s it was dangerous for you to believe in science of a heliocentric planetary system. You may believe as an early scientist to be evolved and enlightened, but you would be shunned and put to death. You and your early scientists had to spend centuries to enlighten the idiot mundanes, so the whole species can move forward. It's just how nature works as a System. It's how your body works as a System. When you move all the billions of your cells must move along with you in unison. It's Aeonics.

You think the kings and queens of Europe of any kingdom came into human existence privileged with status? No. They are the end product of hundreds of years of transgenerational planned effort and synergy. You go back in time 1000 years or so in Europe and remove hard working, crafty families like the Medicis, and the other war lords who fought for their worth and won't have any of those kings and queens. You're human just like these people. Why can't you struggle to do the same? Because your peasants. Because in your little pea brain peasant minds you are thinking to yourself: "Fuck 1000 years, I want immediate gratification Right Now while I'm still alive." And from that simple peasantile mentality your children, and their children will inherit that same culture and mentality and they will forever be used and exploited as you were by those at the top. You earn that shit. Don't be asking for equality. Your mentality as an Anariya makes you and your descendants mundane peasants.

By Unilateralism I mean that in a given social order or nation or culture or family there should only be one "body of policy" and one direction or one constant flowing/striving. What do I mean by this? I mean as a working organic system of trillions of cells, my organic system only has one WILL maker, one Policy maker, which is my conscious 'person.' When I Dictate: "I will cross this street to get to the other side," every one of my trillions of cells has no choice but to do their shit to get my ass to the other side like I said. As long as I have a single Direction in life, and a single Will/Policy maker in my person, I will constantly move forward. And we call that forward motion Progression. This is the same way a monarchy or dictatorship is put together. There is only one Will, or Policy maker: The King or Hitler or Gangis Khan.

But you look at democratic nations and everything is all messed up. There is no single will any where. There are multiple political parties, each with their own direction and objectives. There is no single constant pointer or director, because every 4 years we get a new head with a new set of ideas and opinions. A democracy doesn't move forward. It moves in circle, or rather it goes nowhere, because it needs to maintain its equilibrium. If it makes a move, it goes into national debt. In the old days, if your kingdom was in deep shit national debt, you simply plundered your neighboring kingdom and take their gold and wealth and land, and tax their people. Today our pussy nation-states can't do that. Once a nation-state is in deep debt, it's down hill from there. So it like a merry-go-round that digs its own grave the longer it moves in circles aimlessly. Is that productive on human terms and on the scale of centuries? The will of the people? It's the will of a weak and egalitarian people that makes rules that says the state can't kill and plunder other people's nations.

I believe in something like a monarchy is the best working system for humanity. Only because in our human history, monarchies have had impressive longevity, massive influence on humans, over long periods of time. For example Egypt, and what we refer to as the ancient "Egyptian Civilization," Imperial Russia, the British Empire, the Holy Roman Empire, and the Chinese “Civilization” with its emperors. But I believe the Monarch should be elected by a group of people with status who have proven their worth in the arena of life. Some sort of meritocratic aristocracy should elect the monarch who serves a long period of time, 25-50 years or so. The ancient Germans did this with their old Reichs, the Holy Roman Empire did this, and the monarchs of the ancient Khmer Empire was elected as well.

No political parties, no will of the people crap. Let the monarch be the Will and Driver of the ‘chariot,’ and let him do his job and work for the people or kill him. The functioning idea here is Synergy. As the body works in unison and that synergy is used by Me – the Driver of my person – to manifest things that benefits me and the rest of my body such as eat and bathe; the monarch likewise uses the pooled synergy of the empire to manifest his will, goals, aims, and objectives with mutual benefit for his citizens in mind. “But that’s impossible! It won’t work!” Says the peasant. How the hell do corporations and shareholders work then? The CEO has a job to perform, if he doesn’t do it right, cut him out and find a better CEO. As a shareholder who has CONCENTED/invested my self or resources into that corporation, all I want are benefits and profit for myself and family.

But what is the difference between now and “then?” I am aware that this idea, if we tried it in the West will not work. The difference is that back “then” in the olden days, that whole distant political system/Machine was BALANCED with personal and intimate organic tribes and clans. People back then – and still in many parts of the world – were not 100% dependent on a distant machine to take care of them and change their diapers for them, like the modern Westerner is. Back then people had huge extended families taking care of them called clans, and networks of blood related clans called Tribes. In the very same way as the first corporations in Europe existed. When you were Dutch, and some guy started a corporation called the Dutch West Indies and you invested your money into that idea to get a profit, did you have 100% of your dependence on that investment? Like you were sitting at home waiting for your hand outs? No. You had a family, to rely on, depend on, to work with, to help you get by. Nations-States nowadays in the Occident have lost that organic element and balance. As a Westerner, you have no clan, or tribe, or even functioning family to rely on. You are 100% dependent on your political system for handouts. Absolute power only corrupts when you as a people are Absolutely dependent on that power.

You think a CEO of a corporation can get away with abusing his office for long? No, the shareholders won’t put up with that shit. You think as a “dictator” of a tribalized nation you can abuse and corrupt your power given to you by a people? No. What’s happening across North Africa and the Middle East right now? Why isn’t this same thing happening in Cuba? Because there’s no damn tribes in Cuba. Cubans like Westerners have been broken down into individualized people dependent on the government. They can’t do shit.

When you are in the military of a tribalized nation, and the citizens protest and revolt, and you know those very same citizens are your cousins, sisters, parents, and grandparents or the relatives of your comrades’, what can you do? Do you shoot at your own mothers and cousins for some king or dictator’s interests? When you are the leader of a tribalized nation and your power base is your own oligarchic tribe, and that tribe defects and no longer supports you, what can you do? Shoot your granny? So that’s the real spirit of the matter: human relations.

Not just Honour. Human bonds. Human emotions. Human need. Human love.

That Human essence is what is missing in the industrialized/mechanical Occident. It's no big deal in the West for a cop to beat the shit out of a Black guy. At worst it's the cop's fault and he gets reprimanded. There's no Human connexion there. You can, as a bank or landlord evict and foreclose homes and make people homeless. There is no human connexion there. You have your own bills to pay. You can emotionally afford to treat 11 million Mexicans as illegal subhumans for being in America without papers. There is no human connexion there. And besides, it's "the law." The West has abandoned living humanness for dead dictates of laws made by fatcats up in a congress who have no real intimate human connection with anybody outside that congress. But they deify those dead laws, just like their Western ancestors glorified sectarian laws made by fatcat priests in some distant Vatican far away long ago. What do you expect really from a broken down breed of people who for centuries worshiped a dead man impaled on a stick as God?

My "Religious/Spiritual" Influences

Buddhism is my first and culturally enveloping influence. "Buddhism" is the matrix I was born and still am inside of. In quotes because in the East or to Asians – generally – what is practiced everyday and what is written in some manuscript are two very different things. As different as Voodoo is from Catholicism.

A living Human culture is never entirely supplanted by some arbitrarily introduced memplex from outside. And even with Buddhism, this idea of being influenced by ceremonies, rituals, rites, and traditions from the outside is spoken against. That's one of the interpretations or understandings of what Buddha called "Silabbata Paramasa." Silabbata meaning "Observances," Paramasa meaning something like "Touched from the Outside/Other." Touch suggesting an imposition, as your hands impresses itself on top of what it touches.

We're dealing with a people who have been around for thousands of years. And so during that long period of time such people collect their own way of doing things. It's like science in the West in that old theories aren't discarded if they are useful, but as new theories are discovered, they are piled on top of old ones. So as a scientist, you can be working with new ideas, old ideas, and ideas mixed with old and new, spanning several centuries of accumulation of ideas.

In my own culture nothing about our ancient and indigenous ancestral Ways are lost because some goofball introduced Brahmanism or Buddhism. Like the idea was so cool the ancestors threw their living traditions away for the psychotic rambling of some weirdo foreigner from India.

We/they are still Animists. We still believe and have rites and ceremonies that are animist oriented. We still believe that Nature is alive, and that things in Nature are living with something we call life [jivit] and consciousness [vinyan]. Everything that grows has those two things in their own kind of way. Then there are spirit entities that exist that can interact and communicate with people and nature. Most of these spirits live in Nature, in trees, in rocks, in rivers. Then we still believe in what the West wrongly “ancestor worship.” We traditionally believe that even though the body dies, the spirit and consciousness of these ancestors does not die and continues to exist. They can interact and communicate with us in our dreams. And so, because they still exist, we continue to give them our love, remembrance, and honour. Usually we have altars with a picture of them, and on special days the old ladies will cook their favorite food they once liked to eat, and we offer them things they once may have liked such as packs of cigarettes, coffee, fruits, etc. And we “Bon” to them, which means to talk to them inside your Heart/mind [citta]. You pay your respects to them because it is they who gave you the gift of life, and the wisdom you house in your head, which they pass onto you.

Buddhism, in my own culture is merely an extra element among many elements. It is merely a way of seeing things in a causal manner. Meaning cause and effect. If I work hard now, my grand children will be better off in life than I was. That’s Buddhism in motion to us. My cousins are in needs, so I share what I have with them. That’s Buddhism in practice for us. In such countries with huge networks of blood relations, the sangha of monks are not strangers free loading off of you. They are your own brothers, cousins, uncles, grandfathers, and great grandfathers. They have no need to deceive you with fairy tales and stories to brainwash you with. The sangha doesn’t even teach Buddhist doctrine to the people. They teach their own insights regarding life, and pass down ancestral wisdom from one generation to the next.

The Theravada Buddhism in Practice in such cultures is only superficially Theravada or Buddhism. Only in words and recitation of suttas. An outsider looking in, would not see anything unusual. But beneath the superficial chantings and quaint Buddhist moral lessons, is the much older living Tradition which your average Westerner is never aware of, unless you go out of your way to immerse yourself inside these cultures.

In my culture monks don’t become monks to be like some Buddha. They join the sangha to learn the esoteric stuff that is unwritten and passed down by word of mouth. The chants they learn in Pali are not doctrinal chants. Each Sutta is a magical chant which performs a magical act. I guess the closest thing I can think of in the West is the old idea or notion that the bible’s Book of Psalms was magical in that each Psalm had a magical effect. Then they learn the more ancient Mon-Khmer stuff such as magical yantras, mantras, making magic squares with Pali letters, etc.

The Buddhism in no real way affects the older Brahmanist weltanschauung that was prevalent in Southeast Asia. Ask a native “Theravada Buddhist” who god is and they will either say Brahma, Shiva, Naraya, or even Vishnu. Nobody actually really knows how the Buddha fits into this hodge-podge cosmology. Some say he is just a teacher. Others say he is above the gods. Nobody cares that some scriptures somewhere asserts that there is no spirit, or self. People still by Tradition believe in spirits and self.

Dhamma, which is the second Jewel of Buddhism in our culture isn’t found in no teaching of some Buddha or some book attributed to him. Dhamma –as my grandma taught me and everyone she raised – is found inside one own citta [Heart]. Not in some temple, or wat, or monk, or holy place.

Buddha in our culture is not 100% the Buddha of India or the Buddha of the Tipitaka. Most often in Theravada culture in Southeast Asia, the statue of the Buddha is accompanied by a seven-headed dragon hooding the Buddha. The naga esoterically symbolizes the more ancient and older ways. The Living Way in tune with nature and life that never dies, as a snake sheds its skin and symbolically renews itself perpetually. The Buddha himself is both a symbol of a state of being or mind: Buddha, meaning to know or have knowledge. And it/he is a symbol/icon of the culture and way of life itself.

The actual teachings of some Buddha are minor side details that old people get into and study because in their old age they contemplate about their own death more often, and they begin to wonder and search for answers. And so in their search for solace/answers they will begin on their own to read the 24,000 pages of the Tipitaka. After the fact that they have lived long fruitful lives full of personal experiences. In that moment of searching – empty and ready for knowledge, armed with a life full of experience – the elders grasp the Buddha's teaching easily, because they have no need to debate or argue with what the Buddha taught in his lessons. They have already experienced it. The Buddha's words are just confirmation.

So in my own culture it's only the elderly who are into the "doctrinal" aspect of Buddhism, the words and teachings and ideas. Things the Westerner are enamored with. Doctrines are the pastimes of the elderly who have lived a well-spent life and have organically collected and earned their wisdom from life and its suffering. The Buddha's teachings are only confirmation. If his teachings do anything for the elderly, they only help to explain what has already been experienced in a clear manner. The elders do not teach or force those teachings on anybody. Dead, lifeless doctrines should never substitute organic living and learning from life. This in itself is the most fundamental principle of Theravada Buddhism: Vibhajjavada meaning Direct Experience. Experience it first, try to analyze it on your own second, and only if you need further help in extracting insight from your own experiences do you thirdly go to an elder or the sangha for insights.

Most of the Buddha's teachings are moral praxis based on the idea of causation and causality. If such teachings are meant to be applied, put into practice, or are designed to be a praxis, then what do you do with those teachings? You DO them not study them. So if a culture and people has had 1000 years to DO Buddhism, one must expect that after a thousand years the DOING of Buddhism has embedded itself wordlessly into the fabric of the culture itself. Thus, there is no need to study anything from some book. Your entire Living culture, the language and lexicon and register you speak; how you live for, care for, and share things with others; how you treat others, are all Buddhism in living motion. You can no longer separate the person from the culture, the family, and the Buddhism. It's all one living continuum.

So that's what I mean when I say "Buddhism." This crap that the average Westerner gets an erection over after reading a few books and web pages are dead written words. They are lifeless. If you pack your head with this lifeless stuff they only become the stuff of mind games. Just words and ideas you have in your head which you juggle around. If only enlightenment were so easy. To think that one can just read the Tipitaka and nod your head in agreement to what has been written means Buddhahood. Or means that you are the living expressions of the Sasana [instructions].

The idea is like a foreigner coming to America desiring badly to be American. This foreigner runs to buy a copy of the US Constitution to study every letter and word of it. Later, he may even desire to be a “monk” of this doctrine of Liberty and so he goes to school to be a constitutional lawyer. In his studying of the Constitution, erudite knowledge of the Constitution, and scholastic authoritative understanding of this Constitution, this man believes himself to be a real American. My 9 year old cousin is more an American than he is. She doesn't need to read shit about the Constitution. It's second nature to her. Because that Constitution is fundamentally a set of instructions that was designed to put into living motion a way of DOING and LIVING, not a study. And so after 300 years of Americans doing and living the instructions of this Constitution, that Culture those instructions gave birth to is wordlessly past down to each generation as a living, breathing part of the people and their way of life. Studying the written constitution is only a means to refine ones understanding of ones culture as an American. So the Christians say: “Worship.” Then the Satanist says to that: “Study not worship.” The Buddhist says to that: “Do, not study or worship.”

My other early influence is the ideas in the Satanic Bible. Except I was never big on the last half of that book, with all the demon names and magic. The first part of the Satanic Bible which is the cut and paste of Might is Right was okay. I liked the original a lot better. The original was more parallel to my own thoughts. Might in the original book had nothing to do with Satanism. That original text was written in the declining years of the British Empire when groups of White people here and there loathed to think of a Great Britain dwindle in Power, Might, and Glory. So there were a few individuals who expressed their wishful sentiments of their era. Of how they long to see the Race [British] Mighty again to colonize every land mass on the earth. Hence: Might is Right.

The middle part of the Satanic Bible at first was thought provoking. Then after learning more about my own Buddhism, I just notice that the parts I liked was just “Buddhism” put into different words and given a dark décor. But you can say: “Oh but words have definitions. Different words can mean a whole world of difference!” Yes, true. So keep in mind that when I get my Buddhism, I get it in Khmer, Sanskrit, and Pali. How do you get your Buddhism? In what language? English? What the fuck are you looking at then? You think the fucking Buddha spoke English 2500 years ago. Is the “Buddhism” your looking at in English even Buddhism?

This is one problem I have with these Hubris Hillbillies. It's with any religion or old writing. They for some reason think that the first English translation they read which they like is either the original writing itself or the more accurate interpretation. You see them do it with the Old Testament, where they wholeheartedly believe as fundamentalist Christians that God gave Moses the Torah and Tanakh as it appears in their specific translation of the bible. And that such English version is of course way better and more accurate than the original Jew language. Same thing with Buddhism, as if the Buddha spoke English and read Nietzsche or whatever Western philosopher is the craze these days.

He didn't speak English. He didn't speak shit because he never existed to speak a language. There is no archeological sign any where that a Buddha ever existed. In fact if you follow the development of this Buddha figure back into the past, you'll see that the iconography of the “Buddha” was inspired by several different gods. The seated Buddha is mostly inspired by Shiva as Mahayogi whose statues of him in the same seated asana were found in caves older than Buddhism. Shiva was also called “Buddha” [Enlightened One]. But later/earlier still the most earliest iconographic representations of Buddha comes from Northern India, where the Buddha is often depicted in a standing position, dressed not in Brahmin garb, but a quasi-Persian, quasi-Greek, quasi-Bactrian vestment. Those earliest representations of Buddha were inspired by the Greek God Apollo. Pali during this time – as it exists in the Tipitaka at least – did not exist yet. If the Buddha ever did exist, he could not have ever spoken Pali in the same sense that one can say that Jesus – if he existed – spoke 1st century Latin and not vernacular Italian. Pali is the vernacular and common street grade speech of a dead language which came out of Sanskrit. So nobody has the exact translation of what some Buddha said. They are all approximations and the parsing of words.

I abandoned Satanism for a while because I didn’t see the point in calling myself a label like “Satanist” when all that I agree of Satanism was Buddhist principles plus common sense anyways with black makeup. But I encountered the ONA and that changed things. The ONA – and more specifically: DM – is honestly my second sectarian or philosophical influence. Now when I myself say “The ONA” – being me – I mean the Myattian triad: The Numinous Way, Reichsfolk, and the ONA stuff. I’m not going to talk about what I think of the ONA since this entire blog is me talking what I think of the ONA. I’ve written over 1000 pages worth of stuff on what I feel about the ONA, and its influence on me should show. The ONA, and specifically DM’s ideas has honestly for me, been a greater beneficial influence on my mind, thoughts, way of thinking, and way of seeing the world than Buddhism or any religion, philosophy, whatever. In fact this Myattian memplex has helped my better understand my own Buddhism, and better love my own people and culture with greater honour and pride. And that is a gift of wisdom worth respecting. But the question can be asked: “Do I believe Dark Gods or acausal entities are ‘real.’”

I’ve written about how I understand “reality” to be elsewhere. To recap, I see “reality” as a pyramid or as an iceberg in an ocean. There is a tip at the “top” and a wide base at the “bottom.” The very tip is the physical cosmos we live in. The middle part of the pyramid is what Jung calls the collective unconscious or its Buddhist parallel the hive of citta-santana. I don’t believe in a universe or realm of being beyond that causal/physical point in the pyramid. I do not believe in a supernatural realm. I believe in the reverse: a Subnatural gradation of Being. The lower down one goes in the pyramid, the deeper into the psyche and collective “unconscious mind” one goes. If entities exist, they have their root and being deep under the Unknown, which is why your ancestors when they die can interact with you in your dreams, or why as a shaman, you must go into a Deep trance state to interact with your totems and spirit guides. Does this mean I am saying these entities are “fake?” No. Fake has nothing to do with archetypes and Mindscape. There is nothing “fake” in a dream while you are immersed in a dream. That word has no substantial meaning. They exist in the deep. Are they manifestations of us? What isn’t a manifestation of “Us?” As mind stuff like thoughts? No, as things that can fuck with you. Unless you have personally experiences things of this sort, there is no point in elaborating. When one has gone through the experience, there is then no need to argue or debate.

My last influence is the Five Percent memplex. The 5% memplex is a secular quasi-atheist splinter thing of the original Nation of Islam which started back in the 1960's. It has several names it goes by and there are "rival" versions and different versions. So I won't even bother going into the petty politics of it which I absolutely have no interest in.

Even though most people outside of this subculture have never heard of Five Percenters, we all know of or use at least one meme that originates from this subculture. "What Up G!" That's 5%er cipher, the G actually stand for God, not Gangsta. "Stop trippin Sun!" "Cipher" here meaning not a group but in-group lexicon specifically used in their memplex with in-group specific meaning.. "What's your problem Sun?" That Sun part in speech is confused for the word "son." It's actually Sun, which is 5% cipher for a God, the source of life and light being the Sun. "What it do Queen?" Queen originally is cipher for an Earth, Earthbody which is a female member of the subculture. "Break it down for me," that's 5% talk originally. "Droppin science," "Do the Knowledge," that's 5% talk originally. Gangs and crews that put the word "Kings" in their name, that meme originates from this subculture. A King is cipher for a God, Godbody, which is a male member. They were pioneers in the hip hop genre and still are an influential subculture in hip hop with many artists claiming the 5% Nation in some way.

What I first liked about the 5% memplex is that it developed during a racially volatile era when Black people were coming together to struggle for social equality, so the memplex took on that revolutionary flavour and still retains that essence and racial restlessness of a people struggling to find or rediscover their lost soul, which I think is perhaps one of the most beautiful and inspiring aspects of the memplex. The memplex is Black oriented, except in the memplex the idea and word "Black" means Melanin and every shade of Black from the deepest blue black of Africa to the palest yellow of East Asian. If you are ethnic and indigenous and not Caucasian, you are a shade of Black, and "Original People." Caucasians can matriculate into the "Nation" also and many of the first 5%er were Whites, but technically they are referred to as "Muslim Sons" in the "Nation."

The enemy of the Original People, of course is then the White Devil, but not exactly the people, but symbolically what we in the ONA refer to as "Magian Ethos." You have to keep in mind the people who gave birth to this memplex were common oppressed Black people who were more street educated than library type people. Which is also another thing I like about this memplex. It was born in the streets and it still is street oriented in its words and thought process.

So the Devil [collective for an ethos] has his establishment or system called the Devilishment. And the devil has his religions called Trick Knowledge. The idea is to Build your Nation of Original People, don't fall for that Trick Knowledge, and destroy the Devilishment or at least don't support it. And don't become a pawn of the devil yourself. Esoterically in the memplex the Devil is anything quality you yourself harbour that is oppressive to your own growth and enlightenment and wellbeing. But that Devil is symbolized by the old world Causasian people that enslaved the Black people. The mythos states that Yacub made the White race/devil by "grafting" [here meaning separating] light "germs" from Black people and selectively breeding this strain of light people for 600 years. So esoterically the meme "Devil" and the in-group meme "Graft" mean the same thing. Not the white person, but the idea of separating something from its original nature. Anything that is separated from the people, Nature, Life, original condition is a “Devil.” So not sharing food is “Devil.” Thinking your are better than your own people is Devil. Using and exploiting your people is Devil. Drug abuse is devil because it’s a separation for what is Natural. Not being able to commit in a relationship to raise a healthy family is devil. Etc.

The best thing about this memeplex is that there is no coherent belief or ideology anywhere. It’s more a mythos than a memeplex. It has sets of key words attached to numbers and letters. Like 1 is Knowledge, 2 is Wisdom, 3 is Understanding, etc. You get all this by mouth from a mentor who explains to you their understanding of those key words. Then you add or Build to that by adding your own understandings to those key words. Then you Build shit from there on your own, using your own ideas, by Breaking Down things – which is where the term originates from – and Drawing Up insights.

So for example your mentor in your cipher randomly asks you for the Mathematics of the Day. You take the date and convert it into its corresponding key words. Today as of this writing is the 28, which is “Wisdom-Build.” Then you break that shit down to draw up insights and spit your knowledge of the Mathematics of the day from the top of your head base on what you know. What’s Wisdom? Wisdom is knowing shit and being able to apply that knowledge to get results. What’s Build mean? Build is constructing shit out of raw material so that your ass ends up with something you didn’t have before. What’s today’s Math teach me then? To remember that knowledge gained that just sits in my head don’t do shit for me. Might as well just have left it in the book if I ain’t gunna do shit with it. If I know shit, I have to learn to apply that shit to build tangible results out of the raw material of my knowledge. 28 reminds me that what knowledge I know is just raw material to be used for building. It’s not what I know, it’s what I do with what I know that means anything real. Any book or computer can hold information. You can scratch information like the alphabet of scientific formulas on a rock, and it don’t make the rock intelligent. Intelligence or Wisdom is knowing how to apply the shit. Knowing how to incorporate it into your life to make things happen.

So from that example, you see that nobody imposes on me a belief system. I have to make the shit up myself from scratch using basic words and basic key ideas. And what I Draw Up to make sense of those key words comes from my own insides. And so what insights I may eventually put together is all my own. If something doesn’t make superficial – “exoteric” – sense in the 5% memeplex, then you break it down to hell and parse the shit out of it until it makes “esoteric” sense. And to help you do this the memeplex has 26 extra key words assigned to each letter of the alphabet so you can backronym the hell out of any word to make it into workable things. For instance, A is Allah the All in All. B is be or Born. C is Cee or See, etc. Islam in the 5% memeplex doesn’t mean the religion, it is backronymed to mean: “I Saviour Lord And Master.”

That phrase might have no meaning to us today, and it might even be comical. But if you were Black living in the 60’s free but unliked by a people that used you and then threw you away, and you lived in the slums of Harlem. Then one day somebody came to you and told you that you don’t need those White people as your master, you are your own man and master. And you don’t need those White people’s Jesus and god, you are your own Saviour, and you don’t need the White people’s government to be your lord and power, because you are your own Lord. That was empowering. And it may have even inspired you to look past your plight and circumstances to work for something for your own self, your family, and your people.

This is the reason(s) why the 5% memeplex is a big “influence” on the way I use my mind. It has taught me a mental culture of breaking words and ideas down and twisting them every way I can to squeeze out as much insight as I can from each word. So because of that, I take that mental culture and I almost without thinking tear apart my own Buddhism, by breaking down every Sanskrit and Pali word associated with the Buddha, and I mentally walk around every idea to see it from every possible angle, then I put everything I have squeezed out together into insights. And I use the same mental culture on the ONA. As long as I get key words to look at, I can break down the words and squeeze new ideas out of them. And the ONA is rippled with key ideas and unique words. So if anybody ever wondered where I get my perspectives and insights from, it's from a simple mental culture of Breaking Down and Drawing Up.

But the real blossoming and understanding comes when you take that same mental culture of breaking down and drawing up and you apply it to the unwritten wordless stuff of your own life and experiences. When you are able to break down life, Nature, and your experiences and drawn up insights from within yourself, then build new applicable ideas with that, then Life becomes your enlightener and mentor. For example, with that mental culture of breaking down things to draw up insight from inside of your own self, can you look at a stream and draw up insight from it? Can you look at a tree of fruit growing on a tree and draw up insights from it? Can you thus Read the cipher of Nature and De-cipher it for “esoteric” wisdom? Because if you can, then you do not need anybody or any book to teach or enlighten you anymore.

My Beliefs Regarding Breeding & Blood

Whatever I “believe” of breeding and whatever I end up calling it comes from my own family and from how since the 1800's at least they have been breeding. It also comes from knowing myself, that I am – or actually my mother – is the end product of that method of breeding. In other words, when I talk about it, it is not theoretical, it has been in practice for hundreds of years and it has produced generation after generation productive people who maintain their status and place in society. When a White common person from the West talk about this subject, they can afford to debate the matter because to them the idea is just an idea. Peasants breed like peasants the world over.

Every generation in my family, since the 1800's has either retained their wealth, possessions, property, and estate, or added to what they have inherited from their elders. Even when considering that as each generation passes, you will have more blood relations to “divide” the wealth with.

That understanding that wealth and estate must eventually be divided up is what actually gives rise to an endogamic method of breeding. By endogamy I mean that two people of the same bloodline/clan are mated with each other. Which is to say that the original intent of endogamic reproduction was not to produce better genetic offspring or some super race of inbreeds. It is the greed of old people. Even after all these hundreds of years in my own family you can still here the old ladies – the Bosses of the Family – complain in anger and disappointment when one of our relations breeds with an “outsider.” The complain is usually that the hard earned wealth and possession of the family as a collective must eventually go in portion to somebody not related to us who did not help earn it.

So when you and your second cousin are arranged to marry by the old people, it is not because they have actually determined that the two of you will make the bestest genetic stock of children. It is so that their own wealth and estates remains inside a single family. Thus there is no gradual depletion of wealth; no fight over what family gets what stuff.

But in practice when such old people in some past did implement this greed based method of reproduction they will have encountered unfortunate mistakes: deformities in offspring. And so from the encounter of such errors and mistakes, there is an organic learning process where these old people from one generation to the next learn to do it “right.” This is when endogamic reproduction takes on the extra quality and purpose of not only maintaining stuff inside the same bloodline, but now the older generation purposefully mates the younger generation together to end up with specific types of looks and qualities, ultimately to compete with other families.

If your aristocratic clan back in the old days had the prettiest girls, chances are some king will make most of them wives and concubines. Thus, from that chance, there may arise power, connexions, status, privilege, etc.

When you do come from a family that gives blood high consideration and keeps mental track of the traits and qualities of past generations, your then start to see patterns arise. You’ll see that if in such a clan a Sperm-Donor three generations in the past had a set of personality traits and characteristics, that those cousins you have today directly related to that Sperm-Donor takes on different mixtures of those traits and characteristics. And here I would also mean more than phenotype and physical based traits. I also mean – more so – the internal qualities of people. Such as the way they think and process information; problem solving skills; likes and dislikes; similar gravitation to certain professions and interests; work ethics; financial ethics; family values; and so forth.

So eventually your elders learn from experience, trial and error, and wisdom past down from older generations how to work with time to breed not just to maintain wealth, but to increase it by breeding young family members with each other who have certain desirable traits that will handle wealth better, be more cooperative, and have a strong familial bond with the family naturally/instinctively inherent in their blood.

What then do you do as an elder of such a family and culture when you have a set of very young people to work with who are impressionable and can easily Drift away from the family and culture? You incorporate “propaganda” narratives to keep such younger generations from disrupting your family/class’s equilibrium. This family or class propaganda comes in the usual form of idea of prejudice for lower classes of people. You instill in those young minds a dislike for “those other people,” by attacking whatever visible trait and quality you can use. If your family and class is rich and the people you do not want your young members to breed with are poor, you make it so that poor people are “evil” and bad. If your class and family has light skin, and the people you do not want your children and grandchildren to breed with have dark skin, you use that dark skin color to your advantage. In other words, the prejudice itself is just a tool and means to an end. The end being a strong family coherency/cohesion where members stick to their own class.

Why do you want family members to stick to their own class of people and not mix with the lower classes? It's not because the mixed babies will be deluded in blood or come out bad. Mixed children are beautiful. It's not about skin color or anything superficial used in such class propaganda. It is because you know and understand that as a poor person you suffer, are abused, and exploited. Your wealth itself is only a means. It helps buy you and your children peace in life and enjoyment of life sans the worry, depression, stress, suffering, abuse, and exploitation. But to insure that your descendants live a life free from such suffering and abuse you need to insure that they inherit the proper inner quality and traits.

If they are mixed with a lower class person whose ancestry has a resume of ill management of money and property, your mixed child or grandchild risks inheriting such basal qualities, and thus end up suffering and exploited. But more importantly, that mixed child risks passing that low class Ethos, that basal culture of ignorance down to each generation that comes out of them. Time and descendents are the key ideas here. In Time how will your descendant be? If you have the power now to determine how your descendant will be in future what can you do to manifest that potential? And what must be done to prevent disruption of that potential? These are things that your common stock human just has no thought or worry over. Which is why 90% percent of the time peasants will always breed peasants for thousands of years. The 10% upward locomotion happens girls from the lower end of the social strata marry with men of top rung status. Girls move upwards easier than men.

And this Way of doing things is not unique to my family or class or culture. It is virtually the same in every nation. Even in the old days in America, the White people of the upper rung of America had the same culture and ethos. They may not have practiced endogamy as often; but the rest of the methodology of class continuity existed. You had healthy conservative, well bred WASP's from New England with a rich family history, where their children went to class specific schools and were raised inside a very strongly solid or coherent class ethos and culture. And that class continuity also incorporated in-class propaganda to retain young members from ignorantly breeding with those of the lower classes. And so you had well cultured WASP instilling prejudice in their children of other people, other races, prejudice about Black people, Immigrants, etc.

There was a time when this healthy ethos of family and culture was not unique to some elite sector of American society. Even in the 50's your average White upper middle class family in average cities and suburbs had this same Ethos. Then the stupid hippies and their decadence came and fucked everything up.

The destruction of the healthy ethos that strengthened culture across time and generation was slow and gradual. Racism and prejudices were out of fashion and "square," or not cool. These common stock humans and their new liberal weltanschauung grew up and took over politics. And then you have this stupid abstract ideology of "political correctness." Even worse, it was seen as bad to be proud of your culture, class, and people. Every time a White person showed pride of their dwindling culture other people programmed to be politically correct pointed fingers and call it White racism. Every time a Mexican expressed pride for being Mexican in via their religion or music or whatever, it was seen as either racism or a lack of desire to matriculate into the "Great Melting Pot." And it was worse for the Black people. Black people don't have to express pride to be knocked down. Every time two or more Black people stand close to each other everybody not Black points fingers and calls it a gang of criminals.

Everybody is either afraid to not be politically correct because they want to look like they believe the "melting pot" theory of America works, or they keep their racial and cultural prejudices to themselves: and we all know we do this. You're bullshitting yourself if you say you are "color blind." The only people who are "blind" to color, class, and social status are the many common stock humans at the very bottom of the human social order of a given Nation, because they have nothing to lose and everything to gain from such liberal propaganda.

To what end? Our collective actions born from mere belief manifests consequences we experience. Where is the White race today? What condition is the White race existing in? Where is you culture? What has happened to the solidarity of your own White families? If as a White person you can today see and feel that something is wrong, then what will conditions for your White people be like 100 years from now? Especially when you consider that other people still have their own culture. What will things be like 100 years from now when Mexicans will be the majority race socially and politically? What will things be like for the White people when China is the superpower and America is morbidly debt ridden? All you have to do is look at the state and condition of Black people sociologically and anthropologically to see your future fate as a White people.

The Black people in America represents a sector of humanity that has been fully dehumanized. Everything about their humanness has been stripped from them. They have no religion of their own, no culture of their own, no sense of common identity. They exist in a state of human vertigo where they can't tell right from left or front from back. They struggle to hold onto anything as a surrogate culture in the same way people from a sunken ship grasps for things to hold onto in the sea to stay afloat. They go so far as to make a genre of music and sport a surrogate culture. In their dehumanized condition, we all know and understand that not only can they not dig themselves socially, economically, or culturally out of the hole they are in, but we all know they are easily abused and exploited by the more coherent sector of American society: the state, the corporations, the banks, the law.

That is the end wyrd and result of a human race which by its very nature is inherently tribal, collective, cooperating, having been broken down and dehumanized. The difference between the Black and the White is that for the Black population, the dehumanization was intentionally imposed onto them by an outside element. Whereas for the White of America your dehumanization is an internal matter. It comes from your own abstract state policies of liberal political correctness, this ethos and attitude of being bitches treading lightly so as not to upset the nice colored people because we're all equal, progressive, and liberal. Because in this day and age such factors of cultural cohesion are backwards and un-American. America after all is the "melting pot." Nothing has melted except for you own brains, and culture! To what end?

Is it wrong and bad for me to have a culture? Is it wrong for me to be proud of my culture and ancestry? Is it wrong for me to do whatever it takes to preserve my culture for my descendents so they won't end up dehumanized? Is it wrong for me to want to breed properly to insure that my descendents have the right inner qualities to manifest what they need? Am I backwards? When my family came here in the 80's they had nothing and half their relations were murdered. But because of their ethos, culture, it only too 20 years to make what they lost back. Wealth and status are only symptomatic expressions of an inner ethos or inner condition. You can take that outward Form – the wealth and property – away, and when given the time and resource whatever has been taken away will always be reclaimed and regenerated. Why are their millions of people in America who work their whole lives – over 50 years – and end up destitute in old age in a run down nursing home? What has all those 50 years of work gone to? To make others and their descendents who are more collective and cooperative – that Ethos – than you richer.

There is a saying that goes: "You can't make a poor person rich." Of all the poor people in America who won the lotto and became multimillionaires over night, how many of them after 10 years end up poor again and in more debt than they started off with? Do the math. The money and possessions are only outward symptoms of an inner Ethos, which Ethos is culture based. If you are a person born from generations of poor people, and you were raised inside that poverty matrix, you are not a "poor person," you are a living expression of the Field of poverty, in the same way that a magnetized piece of iron is a physical expression of a magnetic Field. You are not poor, you are poverty. Every thing that you do expresses poverty. It doesn't matter what a magnet does, it will always attract metal to itself. Magnets do what magnets do. Poverty does what poverty does: express the state and condition of being poor. You give such a person charged or imbued with that ethos of poverty a million dollar and their descendents – children and grand children – will still come into existence poor. Peasants breed peasants. The Ethos is in the blood and the culture.

Why I Am ONA

Because I believe in only two breeds of humans: the Ariya and the Anariya. The Aryan and the Nonaryan. The Noble and the Ignoble. The Honourable and the Dishonourable. The Aristocracy and the mundane peasantry. The Cultured and the uncultured.

Because I believe that such breeds of people is not limited or based on skin color. In each race and color of people there will always be the Noble Aryan and the Mundane Peasantry. If the word Aryan makes you feel uncomfy or if White people want to exclusively claim it, fine. We can use the word "Ariyan." Whatever.

The point is I believe Our Kind – the Nobility and Honourable – belong at the top. I believe that the ignoble inferiors belong at the bottom as a resource of exploitation. I feel no sorrow or remorse for the condition of the poor and the dehumanization of the common stock human of any color.

I am ONA because I want to share with Our Kind – of whatever race and culture – certain insights which I may have learned either from my own people or from DM. So that Our Kind – wherever they are in that idiotic liberal melting pot of America and Europe; and Asia as well, can realize the dehumanization of their culture and people because of what we call “Magian Ethos.” I am nobody’s saviour, and I can do nothing but share my eyes and what I see. The rest is up to each of you Lost Nobles. The work of rebuilding your own cultures and tribes and cooperative living is up to you and your own efforts.

Black, White, Latino, Asian, or Indigenous. There is in each people the scion of Noble Blood, Noble Culture, and Noble Ethos. Which Nobility is being disrupted by these things we call Magian Ethos. I am ONA because I would like to see such White Nobles, such Black Nobles, such Latin Nobles, such Asian Nobles, and especially the Noble blooded of the Indigenous peoples reclaim their identities, their humanness, their cultures, their traditions, and their pride of Folk and Blood.

This is all the ONA is to me beneath its fancy dark mythos. It is a spring of inspiration, and source of insight, a template of praxis, a method of reorientation, a practical Noble – Ariyan – Way of Life, and a method of reclaiming what has been taken away from us. I care very little for the mundane peasants. As long as their despicable breed does not catch the Bubonic plague and die off en masse, I am not worried over them and what suffering they manifest for themselves due to their own stupidity. The care is in the quality and condition of our Lives and the future of our Folk, Breed, and Land. Your culture and family – as well as my culture and family – is slowly eroding and corroding from ubiquitous Mundane Menace. If we do not suffer from this erosion in our life time, our descendants will in future.

I am ONA because I believe the occupying regime and the System is the cause of this Mundane Menace eating away of our sense of racial or folk pride, of solidarity of culture, and I believe this System must eventually fall somehow. I am ONA because I believe that National-Socialism – in whatever form inspires me or us – still has the power to inspire and teach certain Folk among us how to rekindle their racial or folk pride, reclaim their ancestral and cultural identity and heritage, to thus re-establish a strong culture and folk of their own. I am ONA because I believe that Causal Forms such as Satanism still has the inspiring power to get us to reject Magian Ethos as individuals and as a folk or clan or family. I am ONA because I honestly believe that we – the Ariya/Aryan/Noble – must in each of our own unique ways and cultures strive to presence the Numen to imbue our immediate environment once more with what was lost: the Numinous.

To the mundane mental cripples it will seem as though I hate America and the West because I may seem ignorantly hell bent in a fanciful way on “destroying” it.

When a federal worker goes to inspect a prison, and sees the deplorable condition the inmates live in, and this inspector desires to Change the prison system so that the inmates can live in better conditions, this is not seen as bad. This inspector is not interpreted as one who hates the prison system?

When as a student I dislike my college because of the useless crap that it teaches me and other students, and I want to Change its educational system for my own betterment and the betterment of other students, this is not bad. I am not interpreted as one who hates the college and want to burn it down forever?

Why then do I – and perhaps the “ONA” in general – desire to dismantle “The System?” How do you progress forward as humanity, or the West, when the System are locked inside of serves only to dig your grave? I have nothing against the West. I was born and raised here. I dislike and do not want to see the East or the South or Africa or Latin America be where the West was. I want to see the West go further. But the West is sick. It is suffering from a disease, and that disease needs to be cut out, if it to be better. The disease IS NOT the mundane common stock people. They are a vital part of the “ecosystem” of our humanity: unless one of you Noble Folk wants to be my maid and gardener. The enemy is Magian Ethos, and the liberal decadence and egalitarian faggotry it glorifies and expounds. That is why I am ONA.

If you believe that the ONA is a religion or some kind of Satanism, then you need to leave and don't bother with trying to understand the ONA or DM; because you've completely missed the functioning point. It is in essence about your own numinous Human Nature, how that Numinous Humanness is slowing being dehumanized to serve the interests of an abstract State and System which has very little interest in you. It is about awakening to the realization that such degradation of our Humanness causes a great amount of our distresses, suffering, worry, anguish, and dependency. Then realizing that we must struggle not to destroy some abstract system that exists “out there” somewhere but that this abstract system parasitizing us is exists only as a construct in our own minds.

Without the belief in the State, it loses its realness and power. Remember, without the belief in the Church, Christianity lost its realness and temporal/political power over you. And we are seeing this same awakening in the Middle East with a people who have come to realize that the power and oppression of Shariah is not “out there” somewhere, but in the minds of the people all along. This is something we all should have learned from as children watching the old Neverending Story. Fantasia can't exist without your imagination and belief. The State does not exist outside the field of mind. You give it life simply by believing in it and perpetuating its policies and interests. But there are many minds that are enthralled in the belief of its existence. And it is that mass psychosis which our prison is. In the end, the ONA is about waking up to the realization that we must struggle in a practical way to remedy the deficiency and regenerate what was lost and taken away from us: Our Humanness, Our Cultures, and Our Bonds of Blood and Honour.

SINISTER BY NATURE

There's Hardware, and then there's Software. Software's those computer programs of 1's and 0's that tells a computer what to do. The Hardware's all the tangible buttons, the hard drive, the wires, and all those little things on the green boards. There's a very big difference between the two. Your computer is still a computer even without the Software. You can change software and use different programs, and your computer is still a computer.

Back in the day, when I got into High School, I hung out with all the other Cambodians and Asians in a portion of campus everybody calls "Chinatown" because, for some reason: all the Asians that went to that school, all hung out there during breaks. And if you weren't Asian and you walked through Chinatown, everybody looks at you like you done made a wrong turn somewhere and you were crazy or something. Unless you were in one of the many crews and sets [gangs].

Chinatown itself was divided into two sides. All the fobs [those skinny geeky Fresh Of the Boat Asians] who barely spoke English sat together on the left hand side by the wall, which they called "Silicone Valley." And the Hardcore Asians congregated on the right hand side by the big cum tree. That's what the tree was called. I don't know the species, but every spring it blooms these pretty white flowers with 5 petals that smell like cum [sperm] so it's call the cum tree. I asked the other girls there why it's called a cum tree and they all just laughed. I had to take everybody's word back then, since I never had the experience of smelling jizz personally at that time.

I still had some residual innocence left in me back then. So the hardcore Asians were intimidating, so I first sat with the fobs on the left side of Chinatown. But those guys on the other side can somehow smell out their own kind. One of them, a Vietnamese boy with baggy pants, shaven head, and tats, leaned forward from where he was sitting to look at me and said: "Looks like Silicone Valley got another fob." One of the younger boys who was a tagger said: "That ain't no fob, that's Scooby's cousin [Helter's street name, an OG of TRG], "Jade" from EK ["Evil Kidz," it was a very large tagger crew], she's proly getting one them software type to do her homework for her, come here and sit on the hardware side." Then one of the OG in the group said: "Oh shit, you Scooby's cousin; you don't look Khmer." So I walked over to the right side asking: "Why this called the hardware said?" And one of the other boys makes a fist and punches his open palm twice, to answer my question.

The right side of Chinatown was populated with all these, gangs, tagger crews, raver and racer crews, and their membership was all criss-crossed into each other. There were only two gangs there: Tiny Raskal Gang and their girls: LRG, Lady Raskal Gang, and all the Vietnamese boyz claimed FBZ [Fullerton Boyz]. I naturally started hanging out with the Lady Raskals, and the three OG: "A Sat" [The Animal, in Khmer], "A Vet" [short for A Svet meaning The Skinny, he was actually buff], and A Thea [The Thea, which was his name] became my best friends.

I don't know if you've ever joined a gang of some type or even a tagger crew. There's no Gang Bible, or some book called "How To Be a Gangbanger," by Mr. Pelon or something. Gang members don't really sit there with each other and talk about the philosophical mysteries of their gang and about the ontological ramifications of being a gangbanger. And they don't recruit you either. It's not like some gang member comes up to you cuz you look cool and says to you: "So yeah, I'm just representing a franchise of Tiny Raskal Gang you know. We beat people up, sometimes we shoot at them. So you wanna get sexed into our gang and, you know, sell drugs with us after school or something?"

Gangs operate on almost an instinctive, or primal human mode, which means the Essence and Way of Life that a gang may represent, does not need to be written, preached, lectured, philosophized, or pontificated. If you "get it," you get it. If you don't get it, then the shit ain't for you. You can't force or brainwash somebody who doesn't get the essence of gang-life to be a gangbanger. You can dress him up to look like one, and even teach him the subcultural lingo of a gang, so he can sound like a gangbanger when he talks. But when it comes down to the hardware of "gang-ism," will he be down for his shit? Will he slang the dope? Will he do drive-bies and kill rivals? Or is he a pussy in wolves clothing?

Being a gangbanger isn't something which you study or practice to be. It isn't an antiquarian pursuit or a college course. It's something that you already are inside. It is an aspect of your own human nature, which expresses itself, or manifests itself, as what we call "gang affiliated behaviour." You can be a total illiterate dumbass, and be the hardest gangbanger. In fact, being the "unthinking" type, makes a better gangbanger. If you were a general of an army at war, would you pick the philosophical, intellectual type to fill your ranks, or the type that just does shit and takes orders? They second type gets the work and war done. From a sociological, and urban anthropological perspective, this unwritten methodology of gangs is fascinating. Because despite the fact that nothing is written in some manuscript, a gang is always constitutionally identical in method, modus, and essence, no matter who composes the gang, or where in the world it functions.

You don't know you're "gang affiliated" until its too late. I just started hanging out with my new friends after school. And when you're in a group setting, and everybody's smoking weed, and they pass you the joint, you smoke it too. You smoke it because it's primal and instinctive. You know instinctively that if you wanna get accepted by the group, to adopt their culture and way: to do what they do, or you'll be rejected. It's not like some gang mentor told me: "Ok Chloe, the first steps to being a genuine initiate of a gang is to dress slutty, do a lot of under age drinking of alcoholic beverages, practice a lot of premarital sex, smoke a lot of dope, speak English like you were under educated, and scratch anybody's face that has letters on them that isn't TRG or LRG."

What seals the deal, isn't the initiation process. Usually a street gang's initiate process consists of members of the gang beating up the prospect member. Asian gangs may also burn you in with cigars, cigarettes, or incense. The initiation itself doesn't really make you a member. It's a psychological method by which the other members becomes emotionally aware that you desire to be a part of their subculture, thus, they emotionally are conditioned to accept you as a member. In the end, it's your actions that makes you an genuine accepted member. Not the initiation.

What seals the deal and makes you a member of any gang, is the rival gang. If you are unfamiliar with gangs, then I don't know how to explain this to you; unless you were involved in a skinhead gang? Your skinhead, swastika tats, mode of dress, and friends don't really make you skinhead. These are just the tribal markings. What makes you a member of a skinhead gang are the jews and blacks, that get into your face.

For example, when I was hanging out with my chosen gang affiliates [Tiny Raskals, Lady Raskals] one time some place. There was a set of rival gang members from Asian Boyz who noticed us. That's when a real confrontation happened. Both sides were yelling at each other. In such a situation, you have no time to think or articulate the situation. All you know instinctively is that there is a group of people hostile to you and your group, and you can either fight, or run away. That's it. Those Asian Boyz and our boyz all went at each other right on the side walk. And then some of their girls ran straight for me and the other girls in our group. There's no thinking involved. It's just a primal doing and knowing. All you know is that those people aren't "your people" and that the people you identify with is under attack. That rival group solidified my identification, subconsciously, with the group I was with. At the same time it severed any possible identification I may have with and for the rival group. I fought, and from that moment on, I "claimed" LRG. Again, this isn't an intellectual phenomenon. Or as they say: Nothing brings people together like war or a shared disaster or life risking event. It happens subconsciously, and it plays with primal human instinct. It is what you do and what kind of person you are already inside that is the genuine essence and quality.

I can say in a way, that being a gangbanger has absolutely nothing to do with anything softcore a person might have. By "softcore" I mean the software or biological programs a person's brain may be using or running on. I mean to say that the religion or atheism, the opinions and beliefs, the thoughts and ideologies, of a person has nothing to do with that person's essential nature and character of being a gangbanger. Some gangbangers are atheists, some are Catholic, some Buddhist, some racist, some don't give a shit what your skin color is, some are politically inclined, some don't give a shit about politics, some are college educates, other are high school drop outs. These softcore things are irrelevant to the internal quality and character of what a gangbanger is and the acts and deeds he lives and manifests on the streets. The Hardware and Software of a person are two very different, separate phenomena. By "Hardware" I mean to say a person's body, a persons tangible deeds and actions [his causal in put] in the causal realm of experience.

This is the background and culture our 352 came from. A culture where actions and deeds, or hardcore living speaks louder than words. A culture where debating, and thinking, and not being genuinely Sinister inside gets you killed eventually. Messing with this gang shit is no joke. You may at times believe it's a joke or not take things too seriously, but your rival gang affiliates don't give a fuck one way or the other how you are affiliated, how deep your into it, or how seriously you take your shit. If you're affiliated, there's a fist, a knife, a bullet or jail cell with your name on it somewhere out there. It's just a matter of time. There's no room in this life style for softcore bullshit. If you don't do, you die.

We "came into" the ONA with this essence and mentality: this state of being. Nothing really changed about the game. Its just that now with ONA memes, we have certain aims, goals, and objectives to direct what we do naturally towards. You get what I'm saying? Instead of just being a gang that just aimlessly bangs on the street, there is an intent or direction to that banging. Or in otherwords: that banging, becomes a means to an end.

All those ONA manuscripts to us [352] are just biological programs. All they do is deprogram one's old aeonic method of thinking which you were trained to adopt, and replaces it with a new way of seeing things. But once you've uploaded and installed the software, you get your ass back to business out there. Just because you've read ONA MSS doesn't mean you are sinister or an associate. Sinister isn't something you become after reading something. You are already a sinister predatorial individual; those manuscripts just helps you direct your already present Sinister Nature in the right direction. In the same sense that it don't require shit to make a gangbanger except that hardcore quality they inherently have naturally.

This Sinister Way isn't a religion. In the same way that gangbangng – or the "Gang Way" – isn't a religion. It's got nothing to do with an –ism or an –ology. It isn't a grabbag or cluster of new beliefs and memplexes that you carry around to make yourself feel "different" from others. It don't fucking matter what the hell kind of softcore shit you carry in your head, whether it's "Satanism," atheism, or Christianity. Either case, it don't get shit done because these are nothing more that mind toys which occupies the mind. Thinking, doesn't do shit but produce more thinking. Philosophizing and debating don't get shit done in the causal world. It just generates more shit talking. Just cuz you can talk shit, doesn't mean you are the shit when it comes down to putting the shit into physical, real world practice. Just cuz you can quote Anton Long, don't mean you are Sinister, especially if all you've been doing is talking, thinking, debating, and philosophizing the ONA.

And there's a lot of talking and debating going on these days in these ONA yahoo groups. Talks about how many Anton Longs there are; if the old school MSS have more authority than the new ones; if and where shit like National-Socialism and Satanism fits into the current ONA; how the current ONA seems to contradict what it was a decade ago; if the Law of Honour extends to the Mundanes or not; if targets for the ABC's should be tested. And somewhere in this thick useless jungle of talking and debating, the Sinister is lost; and nobody seems to give a shit. When I say "sinister" I refer to that essential and natural inner quality of a fucking predator and what sinister acts and deeds such a person will do, with or without the MSS. The MSS are just a means to refine and redirect such sinister deeds that comes naturally to such kinds of people, toward a bigger and distant goal, that even transcends the sinister individual; all for the sake of his future progeny. Since when did talking, arguing, debating, and philosophizing become evil and sinister? You can't talk a mundane to death, you can't disrupt society by presenting an unbreakable argument. You can't argue some galactic imperium into existence?!

Sure our 352 writes a great deal of stuff. But when we do right shit, it's shit that isn't meant or written to be debated on. It's meant for our Disciple to do. Don't talk about it or ask why, just do the shit and learn from your experience. If the shit don't work on the streets, then you should be smart enough to tweak it to make it work. If it works, use it; if it doesn't, abuse it. If that shit don't work, don't talk about, abuse it around and make it work. When you're out gangbanging with your homies as a junior in a gang, and you're told to punch a nigga in the face, you don't say to your senior: "Oh, hold up nigga, lets debate this like two intelligent adults..." You don't ask why or demand to know what rival gang that nigga's from and why there's beef and if such beef is valid, or if your boy's got genuine authority to call the shots. You do what you're told and punch the fucking nigga, and if your left arm is lame or crippled, you fucking use your other arm, or kick the motherfucker. Ain't no talking or debating involved in this shit!

We came online to try and duplicate our own ONA culture into other cities and areas. But how do you spread something which is essentially wordless and unwritable, because it's just something you do; something you are already. We had to find the two smartest ones out of us [me and Kayla] who could deconstruct what it is that we are and do, and somehow engineer memes, or biological software, that would duplicate our culture in those few who resonate with what we were putting out, to aeonically engineer a future network. The shit we write was never meant to be debated and argued over. And we never saw any value or worth in such softcore pursuits. It was an unpleasant surprise for us to find out that a majority of those associated with the ONA in various online groups, had nothing going for them, besides the softcore shit; the Satanism and other such outer tools and forms, which are now inadequate vehicles for The Sinister.

Just because you are a Satanist, or ascribe to Satanism, doesn't mean you are sinister. It just means you are stupid for mistaking something that is a natural essence of being, living, and doing, for a piece of shit religion. There I said it: Satanism is a piece of shit Religion. There is nothing sinister about any belief or -ism. It's all the same: just a system of belief, just another Religion your brain is entrapped in. The ONA tries to tell you time and time over again that such things like "Satanism," Racialism, National-Socialism, and now Radical Islam are just a fucking tool/means someone genuinely sinister by nature will use to get his work done. The means does not make the man. The tools don't make the builder. You can give a random person a tool belt and dress him up like an architect, but if he is not a builder inside, those tools will be absolutely useless. You got some idiot ONA people out there running around with a tool belt, thinking that they're hammers and drill bits, confusing the tools, for the inner man and his profession.

And if you consider yourself ONA and my statement somehow got you angry, then go back and read something like Hysteron Proteron and go out and make yourself useful. Being sinister is something that you are as an individual; everything else is just a means to express your sinister nature. In the same way that a gangbanger could be said to be “gangish” by his very nature; as opposed to him being a nerd boy. He didn’t have to study or read a 1000 manuscripts and ascribe to a religion to be that way. It’s just how he is. Either you are a gangbanger, or you aren’t. You either got it, or you don’t. You’re either Sinister By Nature, or your “frontin” [feigning]. Being sinister isn’t a religion or belief system. You are already sinister. It’s the type of person you are inside. In another way, it’s your dharma. It’s the quality and essence nature put in you when you were born which naturally manifests through that nature as deeds and acts people consider “bad,” “evil,” and “sinister.”

There’s nothing sinister about waving manuscripts around, chanting Latin hymn, and identifying some aspect of yourself with “Satan.” Any body can do it. Any body can read an ONA MSS. Any body can debate what the ONA has written. But can just any body go out and cull someone? Can any body kidnap someone for ransom money? Can any body use sinister cloaking to manipulate others to burn buildings down, and assassinate targets?

Being sinister has a lot in common with sex. People who talk a lot about sex, about how they’re great at it, and how they’re just so “I’m the only man you need baby,” but when it comes down to actually performing, it’s a fact [ask any girl] that the boys that talk the loudest, don’t know what the fuck they’re doing in bed. Just cuz you can get that shit up and can give yourself a great hand job, don’t mean you got what it takes to please a girl right. And it’s the same shit with these ONA boys. They do a lot of talking about being “sinister” [whatever that means to them] and they do a lot of talking in their yahoo groups, about the occult or whatever. But put your ass on the street and show me or yourself what sinister shit you can do, without shitting your pants. Go kill somebody. You don’t need to be ONA to experience killing somebody, and it can be completely legal. Go fucking join the army and shoot someone, and show me it don’t affect you psychologically. Put you fucking foot where your mouth is. Go join a gang and face some real danger on the streets. Car jack someone and chop that car up and prove that your sinister shit produces real world results, like real money. Or better yet, insight role as a common criminal and do something to get yourself in an American prison and see how long you survive, before you’re fucked up the ass by those who are really – Genuinely – Sinister By Nature.

Those who genuinely are by nature sinister, can smell out their own kind. I know what kind of boys most y’all are up in those group. It’s when you face real danger, or are being sodomized by a big black sinister motherfucker in prison, that’s when you – yourself – awaken from that piece of shit delusional state you were in to finally realize that you’re about as hardcore and sinister as a wannabe gangbanger, a “wangsta” as they are called. Motherfuckers confusing old outer forms like “Satanism” for what truly is Sinister Nature.

Some of you ONA boys are so deep in your own bullshit, and this Satanism shit, that you can’t even get yourself to shrence or shapeshift as a convincing Muslim good enough to manipulate a weak minded true believer to blow himself up. Y’all wouldn’t even know how to offer a motherfucker if the opportunity arose; let a lone pull a trigger. That’s why, despite all that internet chattering, philosophizing, talking, and debating, I don’t ever hear one of you talking about culling. Everyone is sinister, but when it comes to the subject of something like culling, its all silent. Cuz when outsiders point out the fact that there’s been no evidence of any culling done by any occult group, and that offering someone in this day and age because of current states of forensics science, is crazy and you'd be caught in a matter of months, you guys just shut up and fall silent. Or lamely rationalize this out to yourself by dismissively saying something like: "Well, that's the point, the great risk and danger; anyways about Anton Long, where were we?"

I've never heard from one of you any hint about "black holes," or "black out spots," or "red light districts," or just dropping hints that lets me – and others – know that you just might have done it, and that you just might know ways to do it. Like usual, you gotta leave it up to the Usual Suspects to say it for you, because that's how "sinister" some of you are; leave the real sinister shit for people like Myatt, and those nameless initiates out in the streets and shadows to do, while you boys talk shit:

[Quote Some Notes of Culling]

Some Notes on Culling

The interesting and sinister thing about culling is that most, if not all modern cullings – when done by a true follower of The Sinister Way – are disguised. That is, they do not appear – to the "authorities" – to be ritualistic killings. Some cullings, for example may be intentionally disguised as "accidents"; some as "suicides"; and some as having occurred due to other, apparently non-sinister, events, such as "assassinations" (political, or otherwise); gang-related violence; so-called "terrorist attacks"; part of some so-called "criminal activity", such as robbery; or as part of some so-called "lawful activity" such as combat during some conflict or war, or by someone acting "in the line of duty".

Also, a follower of The Sinister Way may use a proxy to undertake such a culling, with they themselves remaining cloaked, or hidden, behind the scenes, with this proxy being cleverly manipulated into the act, or persuaded to do the act, for a whole variety of reasons (which reasons, for example, could appear to be political, or religious, or be part of some so-called "criminal" activity which the proxy might be part of or be persuaded to be part of).

Even on the few occasions where there is a ritualistic element – for example, the performance of the complete Ceremony of Recalling – the followers of The Sinister Way, being part of an elite, will plan the culling well in advance, and use their skills, their cunning, their intelligence, to not only chose a most suitable offer – with this offer having been chosen and tested according to our sinister guidelines – but also to ensure (a) the correct disposal of the mortal remains of the offer, and (b) that the place of culling remains secure and hidden, or that there is little or no forensic evidence for the culling in such a place. Thus, and for example, the choosing and the events during and after the Ceremony would ensure that the offer is either not missed by the mundanes, or, if missed, is assumed to be just missing, with their being no clues (or false clues laid) in relation to this disappearance.

Importantly, culling – whether on an individual, or a somewhat larger, scale – is one of those really sinister acts which separates, and which serves to distinguish, the true follower of our Dark Tradition, our Sinister Way, from those who pretend to follow it, or who believe in their delusion that they are following it, or who inform others that they are following it.

For it is these really, genuinely, sinister acts – acts such as culling, such as transgressing the laws of the mundanes – that test the individual, that change them, that can evolve them; that, ultimately, makes them part of our elite.

For such acts – such sinister deeds – reveal, strengthen, and make, the sinister personal character that mark our sinister kind. They also test; they are a challenge. They test one's nerve; they test one's commitment to go, in a practical way, to and beyond the limits which the mundanes have set. They challenge because, to be successful, they require planning, cunning, and self-control; a true sinister spirit. They also and importantly – when done collectively, as part of a sinister tribe, or as a member of a nexion – bind the participants together by the very dangerous nature of the act itself; they build a true sinister esprit de corps, and also form that bond of unshakable loyalty which has served us well for centuries.

It is not for us, for those of our sinister kind, to make excuses for failing to undertake a sinister culling, for we know the mundanes for the resource they are. We know – we feel and we understand – that we are better than them; worth more than them, and that they, provided we adhere to our sinister guidelines for choosing such opfers as we need, are ours to use, to manipulate, to enjoy, as we will.

Thus do we test, with our well honed tests, each and every individual we intentionally choose as an opfer. For this gives them “a sporting chance”; it reveals their character. That is, such tests reveal whether they do indeed have a a mundane, expendable, character, or whether they might possess some potential, something that might, if developed, raise from up from the level of the mundanes.

However, be it known that there are some occasions – a few occasions – when such testing of such potential opfers is not required. One occasion is when an act of revenge is called for and necessary – for example, if the individual or the people in question have acted against us, or harmed us (personally, or harmed our tribe, or nexion) in a significant way such that deadly retaliation against them is the honorable and the necessary thing to do. Another such occasion would be if someone from among us had broken or transgressed one of our rules, our laws, such as informing on us to the “authorities”. Another such occasion would be if the cullings themselves be part of some other deed, cloaked or otherwise, with such a deed itself being designed to be a pure, unsullied, act of sinister terror – one of those reminders, to the mundanes, that they are not safe “from the likes of us”, not safe from the forces of Darkness, and that, despite all their best efforts, and all their laws, and “security”, they, the mundanes, are and will remain vulnerable, and that for their desecration of our sinister numen, and for their hubris, they can and will be punished – often without warning – “by the likes of us”.

SINISTER ENLIGHTENMENT

Sinister Enlightenment

I was going to name this “Satanic Enlightenment,” but I don’t like the word “Satanic” because it makes the “enlightenment” part seem bound to a specific “Satanic” philosophy or world view. Sinister Enlightenment as a title is not really any better. But the descriptor gives the type of “enlightenment” the “correct” feel, as I will explain later.

This essay came up due in part to several currents of thoughts and events that merged in my head and got me thinking. The first event was an argument my friends and I had at a get together. It was a usual friendly argument we usually get into after the party dies out and everyone goes home, except for the few usuals. In that atmosphere of a cool chilly night and sobering from our drinking we’ll talk about stuff, which turns into a usual exchange of ideas and argumentation.

In real life I am not the life of the party. I am the type to sit near the back of the room and just absorb everything everybody says quietly without interjecting. Just to get everybody’s point of view to measure it with my own. If asked to participate I usually say I have no opinions or ideas on the subject. But I say that so often, and my friends know me so well, they know better, but they leave me out of their drama debates. It’s only the next day or the day after the next, when the one or two people who are actually interested in understanding the subject from my perspective has come to ask me for my opinions that I share my ideas. This gives me time to actually put my thoughts together to understand my own current position better.

God & Enlightenment

The topic of the argument that night was a usual subject which pops up for other people: God. Except I have a motley crew of friends from different weltanschauungs. My atheist friends said the usual as one would expect from atheists: there is no god. My theist friends said the usual: there was a god. My pantheist friend said god exists but it is not what we think it is. My Satanist friends said the predictable, which I found boring. My Buddhist friends said the predictable which I also found stale.

But my Five Percenter friends being their own camp set the ball rolling down a very interesting course. They believe in something they call “Allah,” which is not the Islamic Allah. Allah to them is the “All in All,” as in all life in toto – wholistically – which includes the universe is “Allah.”

This led the others to agree with the basic underlying idea: that whatever exists “out there” – which we are a microcosmic part and aspect of – is a unified system of some sort. This idea brought the atheist guys into agreement who said something like, therefore science is a great way to gain an understanding of this universal system. But the Buddhist friends and my Hindu friend took the talk in a predictably distasteful turn, bringing up “Enlightenment.”

All of a sudden “enlightenment” was a penicillin: the answer and cure all agreeable to everybody. To understand Purusha – the universal soul – or the living system one had to be “enlightened” to grasp this universal thing. It was like some spiritual honey coated quest garnished with a heavy load of spiritual word patterns and ideas. And the atheist camp went off on this philosophical pseudo-spiritual quasi-quantum-physical rant and higher intelligence and how awesome the universe as a system worked.

From all this I saw in my mind a delusional upwards flow of some kind, regarding the type of “enlightenment” they were talking about. Upwards flow as in trying to paint the picture that the more philosophical everybody got, and the more about enlightenment everybody talked about, the further away from the real actual world they were.

Dellumination

The next day one of our friends hung out with me and asked me what I thought about the other day’s topic of discussion. I told him that I do agree that whatever this all is, it is one whole thing. Whether we call it Allah or Purusha, or God, is besides the point and irrelevant to the actual issue and character/nature/condition of this thing. What issue?

The issue of why the universe is inherently destructive in character. Not just in the cosmic level of giant burning suns, supernovas, huge plasma filaments, etc. But more importantly – on a real and human level – on the Earth.

Every living creature this all creative god or universe has “made” KILLS. Everything rapes and plunders. Even trees. Trees in the Amazon forest will grow upwards to hog the sun light up in the canopy and starve the smaller plants of vital light. Why? The most primitive life forms – and perhaps the most earliest – [viruses] are agents of disease. In fact viruses still kills and plagues our species today. Why? I mean if we really, really observe living organisms and their natural behaviour, without bias, we will eventually get to the point where we understand that the natural living “world” is a violent and dangerous system.

Yet there exists an incongruity between that natural “world” and what we believe to be God, Brahma, Purusha, Allah, the Oversoul, etc. By incongruity I mean it in the real geometric sense. I took geometry four times in school because I sucked at it, so after 4 rounds of geometry class, I use many concepts and words from geometry, such as Theorem, Postulate, Congruent, etc. When two angles are equal in measurement we say that they are Congruent Angles. If Angle $\angle A$ is 90 degrees, and Angle $\angle B$ is 89 degrees, $\angle A$ & $\angle B$ are Incongruent. Incongruent doesn't capture the difference between Nature as a living system, and the Universe of God right. Chasm or grand canyon is more like it. But what do I mean?

I mean, if you take a white carnation flower, and put it into a vase, then put blue food coloring into the water, something can be seen to result. The result is that after a while the tips of the white carnation will turn baby blue. How did that happened we ask. Where did that blue color come from we ask. From the fucking food dye in the water. We know there is a connection because the white petals are connected to the blue colored water by a god damn stem, and we know how the stem's capillary action works. It's not a mystery.

Then why is it a big mystery when we are dealing with life and the nature of what life springs from? All of life seems to be dependent on a single working system which each organism and species is a part of. The characteristic or inherent "quality" of this system is not "nice." Most organisms that are not plants seem to have evolved to kill and use the parts of other organisms to sustain itself. And so, we when see this, we must ask ourselves what is the characteristic or quality of the Source of this living system?

It seems as though that in general the more a mundane talks about enlightenment and philosophy the less the mundanes know about the actuality of causal things. The more these mundanes talk about enlightenment and philosophy, the more stupid shit they end up talking about. Shit that has no real connexion to the actualness of reality.

If I were to pursue a course to enlightenment, it would thus be backwards. Rather than move upwards and know more about ideas and stupid shit up in the clouds somewhere, I'd like to know more about the causal world and how it works. Why? Because I like zoology and material science? No. Gaining an understanding of causal organisms, causal phenomena, and the causal world we all have our existence in, is only a means to a deeper end. The deeper end is the understanding of that ultimate Thing "all of this" has its being in. That Thing from which all of this around us, and which we are springs from. Even the understanding of this Thing is not the end in itself. The ultimate end is an understanding of what we are.

Self & Dualism

I don't know what other people out there know of and understand of the word "Dualism" and its antonym "Nondualism," but to me I see understand that dichotomy from a Theravada angle, which is complicated and yet simple at the same time.

What do I essentially mean when I say "Dualism?" I mean let Dualism = "This & That." That is the basic formula. As I understand it, if you think dichotomies are factual and real, you are a dualist: this and that. If in your paradigm an internal and an external exists then you are a dualist: this and that. If in your weltanschauung you exist as one vector and God, Cosmos, Macrocosm exists as a second vector "somewhere" you are a dualist. You and Macrocosm makes TWO. This and That. Nondualism, as I understand it means only One Single Whole exists and there is no division. No This and That.

That concept of the nondual nature of reality is to the idea of Anatta [non-self] what the idea of understanding the topography of a landscape is to the understanding that most rivers should flow down hill. Why can we say that most rivers should flow down hill and be quiet confident in our assessment? Because we assume we understand the topography of a given place. So if reality is nondual, thus there can exist no “self,” therefore the self and reality are the same exact thing. By “reality” I would thus mean the Spectrum – Santana – Continuum/Field of Phenomena.

By Phenomena I simply mean shit that happens. That’s for you asswipe philosophical type that need to spilt hairs and play word games. Phenomena means the fucking sea of shit that is fucking happening to which you yourself are just a piece of shit happening also. Why don’t I give a flying fuck how we experience phenomena [“qualia”], or what phenomena are “beyond” our perception? Because I am a nondualist. The perceiver and that which is being perceived is the same thing. What experiences or conscious selection is taking place occurs inside the matrix of conscious perception and cannot exist independent of perception/apprehension or consciousness/reality. Meaning like, when I look at a red ball of yarn and a green ball of yarn, the differentiation I perceive between the red and green happens entirely as a process of data apprehension and interpretation. The information goes into my eyes and is turned into electric pulses. That goes to my visual cortex and is translated into “pictures” somehow. I become consciously aware of the picture. Then I recognize and discern what I see and say: “Oh look, red and green.” At no point in that entire process is anything outside the mechanism of data apprehension changed or altered. The balls of yarn are not even there on a finer quantum level, and neither am I or my neurons processing the data.

But again, I’m coming from a Theravada Buddhist weltanschauung. Or rather, at least from my own speculative understanding of the world after understanding certain Theravada concepts. Like any religion, Theravada Buddhism is steeped/lost in word games. To be fair, Theravada does not teach nonduality or dualism implicitly or explicitly in its canons. What concepts of dualism or nondualism a Theravadin gains personally is based on extrapolation of text and reality. That being said, the Buddha himself encourages the Upasika/Upasaka to challenge and question his words and teachings. It’s a given to any thinking person to not accept another person’s words at face value because of some title or because of special regard. There is a difference between Self-Enlightenment, and following someone who is supposedly enlightened, or believing his word at face value.

In this respect, if I had to choose between Sambuddhi [self-enlightenment] and Buddhism; I would choose self-enlightenment and abandon Theravada. But if I had to choose speculative thinking about shit I will never be able to confirm and the Practical essence of Theravada, I would choose Theravada. The main point is that Theravada likes to be Practical and Pragmatic -such as giving practical advice regarding life, action, and perception – with its canonical teachings and it dislikes going off the deep end and being speculative, philosophical, or metaphysical. Usually its Mahayana and Vedanta that teaches some species of dualism or non-dualism. And again, concerning Theravada, it’s all canonical word games or idea-dramas which I have no interest in. But I do understand I am speculating.

So the whole issue in regard to canonical Theravada is the meaning of the word “Self/Atma,” and goofy philosophical speculations. When I say “Self” and “Mind” or “Consciousness” I mean what the Buddha referred to as “Citta-santana” or Mind-Stream; which is a completely different animal and bug altogether. I have to explain this because there are some really stupid people out there who are so spellbound by word games that they will have an asscow over the words and superficial ideas I use to try to intimate or approximate something deeper than those words and ideas. Don’t let your memeplex think for you, think for yourself. I don’t understand there to be separation. I understand that differentiation happens only as a byproduct of conscious prehension. I don’t expect others to be coming from the vantage point I have. If there is a separation of differentiation of “things” in the fabric of reality, it exists as the act of conscious prehension/selection or as merely an intellectual mental parsing of reality by the focus and selective perception of consciousness. You don’t have to see thing like I do or agree with me. You can keep your Western dualistic interpretation of the world. And you can keep all the problems and trouble such ways of seeing the world causes to arise too.

My way is more peaceful. I have no god out there to need to follow and worship, or deny, because nondualism is beyond this primitive theism-atheism thing. Because there is no god out there and there is no me here. There is just everything as One-Thing. I have no need for goofy, spiritual, religious, philosophical myths and metanarratives. I have no need to worry about the “reality” of morals and divine retribution for acting unethically. Because how I am by Nature, how Nature is by Nature, and how the Universe is by Nature is Naturally the way the One-Thing is by its very Nature. I am “perfect” the way it is. It is “perfect” the way I am. But things can be better for “us,” and in Time, it will evolve and get better. It’s all just one thing. And what we call consciousness is merely a pin pointer, that focuses on specific areas of this one thing. As we can say that the data on our hard drive is just a big messy continuous one-thing. But to make “sense” of this big mess, there needs to be a record pin or a laser beam which is designed to simply “look” at tiny spots on this big one-thing. What this record pin “sees” or picks up in its tiny spot and how it translates what it is picking up is not the big one-thing. Does this mean the rest of the big one-thing does not exist? No. It just means you are not aware of it. Radio waves existed before we were aware of the, and so did dinosaurs, and the rest of the causal universe.

The nondual concept of reality is very much akin to a vinyl record. So on the record you have Unexpressed/Potential coherent information sequences in the form of grooves in this case. To express that Potential you need a tiny needle. The tip of that tiny needle hits the grooves and does what? Expresses or Manifests or Presences the Unexpressed music. Not all at once. The needle’s Expression of the Unexpressed Potential happens causally in the flow of Time or in sequential order one spot at a time.

And so from this vinyl record illustration we percieve or apprehend 3 supposed phenomena: 1) the record; 2) the Needle; 3) the music. So we can ask ourselves: “What is the music we hear, is it an actual “thing” separate from the other things?” No. Without the record or the needle doing it’s job giving expression or unfolding the unexpressed potential, the “music” we hear does not exist. In other words, the music exists only in causal relation to the record and the needle. The record is reality. The needle is consciousness or fixation of reality on itself. What we “experience” is that consciousness unfolding or unraveling unexpressed potential.

But people can argue: “Well, gee Chloe, if I am everywhere and all things why come I can’t feel me being everywhere.” What do you think the word focus, concentration, and fixation tries to convey? Even regarding your own physical body: Where do you Feel your consciousness to be? Everywhere enveloping your body? No. Usually we feel ourselves to be around the eyes or in between the brow. Why don’t you feel your consciousness to be in your liver? Why aren’t you consciously aware of you being a gal bladder? You got billions of neurons in your head, yet you are unconscious of their existence. Why is consciousness so fixated on a single spot on the body itself? It’s actually a habit we have. We can unlearn this habit and place our conscious awareness on other points or spots on our body or outside our body even with practice. We do it all the time when we dream and day dream.

Consciousness is just a tool – the needle – to the record which reality is. Not a tool. That gives the wrong idea. Consciousness is a function or act of focus on spots. The focusing gives rise to or expresses the unexpressed which is contained in the form of unfolded potential. Think Pi when I say “unfolded potential.” The infinite number sequence exists as unfolded potential. It requires you or a machine to unravel the sequence. The very act of conscious touching – unfolding – gives rise or expresses the unexpressed sequence of numbers for you to SEE: to Experience. The very act/function/fixation of consciousness touching something gives expression to its unexpressed potential. We focus consciousness on the pulsation of blood in our neck, and all of a sudden that blood comes into conscious focus/experience/expression. We eat an apple, and the unexpressed taste of the apple comes into being/expression. We touch a rock with our finger, and the texture comes to life for us as an experience which is the expression of unexpressed potential. We bounce a ball and its Potential Energy is expressed as Kinetic Energy, with our acting upon that ball being the defining catalyst/nexion of unfoldment/expression of potential.

Dualism and Nondualism is like the electromagnetic spectrum. As a dualist you will say something like: “I believe or perceive gamma wave, the light, and microwaves are three Things.” As a nondualist you will say something like: “I believe or perceive the spectrum to be one whole Thing, and what we refer to as gamma wave, light, and microwave IS that spectrum or continuum or field.” And so from a nondualist point of view, we can clearly understand that the memes “gamma wave,” “light,” and “microwave,” are just Words and Ideas inside our own heads which we create and use and affix to things to better understand what we are apprehending. Those Words and Ideations have absolutely nothing to do with the actual electromagnetic spectrum. Just because we name or ideate an arbitrary point in a potentially infinite vector “gamma ray,” does not physically or atomically or quantumly alter or change that actual point into anything different than what it was before we existed.

But what does all this mean? We’ve all heard this before in some way, this nondualism shit. What am I trying to say? I’m trying to bridge the chasm between nature and what we feebly understand as “God.” That chasm we all wish was there, because the connexion makes us – if we are mundane – afraid and uneasy.

From the first part of this article we are aware that Life forms in Nature are not very “friendly.” Living organisms, since the earliest moments of causal life seem to have been nasty fuckers. There is a lot of killing, eating each other, consuming other creature’s life force and body parts, etc. There is struggle in life. Struggle to survive, and struggle to reproduce, and struggle to evolve. If that is the general "Way" of living things, and as nondualists we understand reality/nature to be One-Thing, then what is the Nature, Quality, and inherent Condition of this One-Thing? Angelic? Puritanical? Saintry? Jesus-like? Blissful? Ananda? Peaceful? I doubt it. At the risk of sounding anthropocentric, I'd say that One-Thing is pretty adversarial and sinister in "nature."

Or at least it calls into mind the thought of the Amazon River struggling to get to the ocean: it's not going to be a tranquil ride, and there is an inherent "need-to-get-somewhere" Flow/Progression/Evolution to this One-Thing. It's almost as if the Cosmos is saying to every one of its parts and pieces or to itself: "You piece of shits either evolve and move with me, or you're ass is dead like the dinosaurs. I got not time for your drama. Got places to go." That is if reality or the Field we interpret as reality is indeed fractal. If we see the design and pattern of the tiny portion of a fractal pattern, we can generally hypothesize to a certain region of precision that the bigger pattern resembles or is the same as its smaller patterns.

Sulfur & Self

All this got me thinking about the notion of self and anatta. As I was thinking about anatta I was thinking about the Star Game of the ONA. Because causal reality to me reminds me of board games like the Star Game and Go [Chinese game].

So in the Star Game, of the three pieces, you have one which is the Sulfur Piece which represents the Self. Except in the Star Game, this "Self" does not exist as a constant single thing. Because when the Star Game is played and in motion, that Self Piece changes. But at the end of a game, we come to realize that the chain or flow that piece "aeonically" moved into from beginning to end, IS a single stream-thing. That what we momentarily see as a piece on a board is only a "snap shot" of a fluid event inside the framework of time. Or more precisely, what we see as a piece on a board is the faulty perception of our own consciousness not seeing the Star Game as it should be understood or as it is: a fluid whole dynamic system in causal motion. There is in fact no self piece as a separate "phenomenon" from the Star Game itself. The entire Star Game itself gives "definition" to it's parts. In the sense that each piece has an identity only in relation to other pieces, where it is at on a board, and in relation to the Game itself. Without the Other stuff, the self piece has no "definition," differentiation, or "identity." Both the Game as a fluid system and the piece is in fact one fluid indivisible Thing.

I thought to myself, what better symbol and way to represent this concept of a "self!" And the Sulfur designation of that piece adds to it all. First sulfur is associated with fire and flames, which is Promethean in quality. Second fire is the closest natural thing we have to an actual substance that "alchemically" – or rather Chemically – Transmutes things, in a cooking kind of way. You put water on it, and the fire transmutes the water into steam. You put a marshmallow on it long enough and the fire will transmute it into carbon. You add the heat of the fire to certain substances and the substance changes. With enough heat solids can become liquids, liquids can become gas, and gas can become plasma. That fire sort of reveals the "transcendental" nature, "property," and essence of the substance it is transmuting.

Matter isn't just solid, it transcends that state. That solid state is only one mere possible expression/manifestation of that "transcendental" thing. I don't mean anything spooky and metaphysical here. Ice is only a mere possible manifestation of something that transcends that solid state we perceive. Water and vapour are the other two mere state or conditions this same "transcendental" substance can take. What is that transcendental substance in question? H²O. The H²O molecule itself is only the expression or manifestation of finer "transcendental" "elements." Electrons, Protons, and Neutrons. These in turn are expressions of more finer, more transcendental elements: quarks. And so on, until we get to the point where we are at that quantum foam level of things where everything is a strange mess of blobby waves inside Fields. Or the waves and fields are the same things. In that level, we come to a refined understanding that everything – not just H²O – is an expression or manifestation or presencing of that same strange foam. It's all just the same One-Thing interacting with itself. And from that interaction of this One-Thing arise the property of Life. That Life can be observed on earth, which comes with a certain essence of quality we'd rather deny is there. We'd rather live in a reality that is moralistic in nature so we feel safe.

What better symbol to associate the notion of the Self with but with Sulfur. For the idea or notion of the Self must be burned, for there to be genuine illumination: the understanding of things as they are beyond the self-focused narcissism of the illusion of Self. Burning the Self alchemically into what it really is reminded me of the ONA's Self Immolation Rite. To burn oneself INTO existence. If consciousness was fixated on it's own illusion of self – a pin point in a sea of infinite eternity – was that consciousness [self] ever really aware of its existence?

The Point

I think the point to all of this is simple. I believe that mundanes when they pursue this nebulous thing called enlightenment, move in the wrong direction. A direction of denial or rejection of causal suchness. Rather than work to better understand the actual world they exist in, themselves, and how they fit into everything, they abandon Life and work only with mental abstractions, ideas, words, definitions, etc. Which leads them further and further away from what is real. Disconnected from the real, they lose understanding of the actual world, and become experts of words and ideas that exist only in their own mind and thought patterns.

I think, if one is to pursue any quest of better understanding of the world, one must go the other way. Away from the clouds and back to reality. By first honestly trying to understand our own human Nature sans emotive opinions and moralist apprehension. Then secondly one must try to gain a better understanding of how Nature – and Natural Life forms – actually works sans moralistic interpretation and emotive bias. If animals kill, say they kill. Then thirdly we try to ponder the common inherent quality that the Source of Nature and Life has. In other words, the direction of reality based "enlightenment" should be causal oriented, carnal oriented. In doing so we may eventually see that Nature and that which Nature arises from has a very "sinister" quality to it. It is definitely not Godlike and all-caring. There is a saying in Buddhism that goes: "The wheel of Dhamma ever turns. And if you don't keep up with it, it will run you over."

I rarely like using the word "Satanism." But because of how I see enlightenment, or the direction it must take for any genuine understanding of Nature and Reality to come into Mind, I would say that the Satanist has his/her feet in the right direction. All they must consider is take care not to do is what the Hindus did: Go up into a goofy direction. The second group of people I say may come to a realistic organic prehension of reality are grounded Theravada Buddhists. But the average Buddhist of any school has a bad habit of mentally being blind to the Sinister or the actual carnal/causal quality of things. What I mean here is that when they see "evil" they usually translate that into suffering and thus a product of karma. As if to say that 200,000 humans deserved to die in the Indonesian tsunami. As if all those people in Haiti and Japan died horrible deaths because of bad karma. How do 10,000 in the same city or area have the same bad karma that would result in such mass death? There is a quality to Life and Nature that just is "sinister" and adversarial to life.

There are pros and cons to all memeplexes. The way for us as Sinister or Traditional or Progressive Satanists is to evolve our Satanism by weeding out what cons we come across. Getting too metaphysical, spiritual, and philosophical is a con in the long term. Because we entrap ourselves inside a maze of our own words and ideas. Being entrapped, we are disconnected from the Real. We must also learn to do as DM and experience other cultures and religions to discover what pros they might have to offer each of us personally. At the end of the day, all this philosophy and religion and ideology are mind games we play on ourselves. What is Real is our causal life which is an aspect of the causal world of experience. The mind games should be tools we use to better understand that causal life we are and the causal cosmos we exist inside of. If the tools serve only to sever you from Life, the Real in its Rawness, and the Cosmos, it should be discarded for the delusional trash that it is. So that is the meaning of Sinister Enlightenment. To work backwards from the mundane way of enlightenment to gain a more refined understanding of causal/carnal Nature/Reality.

Perception

I've been in a few religions. Or at least that's how we say it in Khmer: to "Jol [go into/inside] Sasana ["religion"]]. Like you go into a supermarket to go shopping. Sasana doesn't really mean a religion. It means "Command," "Instructions," or "Orders to be followed or Observed," or a "way of practice." The American Constitution is more a Sasana because it is a list of instructions to be observed for certain reasons [End Results]. Most of the time you don't morally "believe" in a constitutional amendment. You observe it and uphold it for an End Purpose. And from the observance of such instructions, a Culture of some sort evolves over time you see? Whereas with religion such as Christianity, beliefs are believed in with no real purpose in mind. And instead of culture, a mode of blind faith and existence just to uphold the religion and propagate it comes into being.

My first religion was of course Buddhism, which I was borne into. There really is no such feeling as "growing up Buddhist." Sure we had statues of Buddhas at home, and sometimes on the full moon or special days you burn incense and offer fruits and stuff. Then on those few holidays you go to the Wat and you burn incense to a bigger statue of the Buddha for a second, then you go outside the Wat to hang out with family and friends and mingle with the hundreds of other people. That was it.

The only thing about Buddhism that was constant in my life growing up was the ivory Buddha pendent around my neck which I still have. Otherwise there was nothing "there" that looked or felt like religion growing up. Nobody read me any Buddhist books. Nobody sat me down to even teach me what a Buddhist actually believed in. Nobody even talked about it on a day to day basis at home.

Then there was that time when I remember studying with a Jehovah's Witness study buddy when I was around 12 and 13. Every Sunday my study buddy would come over for an hour, have lunch and we'd read out of their bible together and our of these books of different colors. That was when I first actually learned about God or a God of some type. At that time I suppose the Jehovah's Witness stuff explained things for me. So I went to my favorite bhikkhu grandpa and told him about my new religion I found that explained everything in a neat book called the bible!

I said something like: "So grandpa, I learned from the study buddy and the bible that Jehovah – who is God – made the universe in 6 days, and that soon we'll all live forever in paradise and if you worship Jehovah, you can live in his paradise." And my grandpa said something like: "That's wonderful grand daughter. What exactly is the Nature of this bible? Where did it come from?"

That question set me off on a long quest to figure out where the bible came from. I eventually stopped studying with the study buddy. And after I learned that people wrote the bible, and that there were many Christian denominations, and many interpretations of the bible, I figured that if God inspired it, he didn't do a great job, because everybody is getting something different.

The second religion I ever had was Satanism. My friends in junior high school got me into it. I read the Satanic Bible and it made better sense to me at the time. I was 14 at the time. I stopped believing a god existed and thought the idea that I was my own god was nice. So I went to my favorite bhikkhu grandpa to tell him about my new Satanic religion!

I explained to my grandpa that I was now smarter enough to know that Jehovah isn't real, that the Christian religion is based on blind faith, and that I now worship myself as my own god. And my grandpas said to me: "Before I was a monk, I did many bad and illegal things as a young man. As I grew older the way I see things changed. Because how I see and understand things changed I am now a monk. Do you understand?" I said: "No, I don't." And he explained: "You have only gone from one god to another. One worship to another. One blindness to another. And you believe this to be change and growth. If you are not blind, then what is the Nature of this Self you now worship? Where is it? What does it look like? How did it come to be?"

Being a Satanist to me was kind of dumb. There really wasn't anything to do with it in real life. It was just something you believe, and a label or identity tag you carry around. Other than that I was just me for most of the day. And after a year of contemplating on my grandpa's question on the Nature of my Self, I figured out I really was clueless about its nature and I was as blind to its nature as I was to the nature of god, and everything. I figured out that beneath the trinkets of beliefs I had, I actually knew nothing about the Nature of anything.

That's when I began to seriously study Buddhism. But in a Buddhist culture, with monks in your family, studying Buddhism isn't like having a Buddhist study buddy indoctrinate you with superficial beliefs. It's frustrating because there seems to be nothing to believe in, and when you ask a question, the answer is given in the form of a question and you're suppose to figure things out on your own.

So I spent most of my time as a Buddhist not learning any teachings or doctrines, but learning how to see things. Which was totally bizarre if you compare it to the act of learning and being a Christian or Satanist where you believed in different things but you see things in the same essential way.

And there were other odd things I did as a Buddhist like Sati [mindfulness]. It's a form of "meditation" which eventually helps you see things. You can sati with anything, like eating and walking. For example with eating it goes like this for me: [There is a fork in my left hand. There are muscles in my left hand holding the fork. My left hand moves the fork to the plate. There is a piece of meat on the end of my fork. There is a brain in my head that moved my left hand to the plate. My left hand moves the fork to my mouth. I am chewing the meat which used to be a cow. There is a reason why I am eating the cow. The cow probably came from Texas. I wonder how far into the past its DNA goes? I swallowed the cow meat. My stomach will break it down. My intestines will absorb it into my blood stream. The cow will become a part of me.]

So from something so simple as eating, when you become mindful of the act of eating, you gain new vantage points of seeing things that you would not have taken notice of before. For example I know that my hand moved to the plate because that movement was initiated by an impulse from my brain. But now I can ask myself: What initiated the brain to initiate the impulse in the first place? Or after being mindfully aware that the cow's protein is used by my body to rebuild its parts, and that the cow ate grass and that the grass ate sunlight, I now see that there is a real interconnection between me, the cow, grass, and the sun.

So that's how I "studied" Buddhism. What I am trying to say is that Buddhism – as I learned it – was never a holy book, or teachings, or a prefabricated set of beliefs you blanket over some reality you lack an understanding of. It wasn't some label I wore or some label I identified with. It wasn't some ritual or ceremony I perform occasionally here and there. It was just a way of seeing things, and gaining better vantage points, and thus greater insight, and as you progress in vantage points and insight you develop what Buddhism called Sambuddhi: Self Enlightenment. And it's this mode or function of Mind that I grew to value and appreciate above religion, facts, truths, and conventional knowledge.

Nobody teaches you anything. If I had a question, my bhikkhu grandpa would just grin a toothless smile and answer me with a question, which forced me to go learn to think for myself and go find my own answers. And to find those answers to questions I had, I only had two sources to go to: Nature or the World of Phenomena; and the experiences in my own Life. There is no belief involved in all of it. There is nothing to believe. There are only things perceived, and that can change later with a change in mental capacity, level of understanding, and angle of perception.

The Nature Of Truth

I dislike the English word “truth.” No such term or idea exists in Khmer or Buddhism. The closest Khmer word to “truth” we have is “Bhidt.” Bhidt is the etymological opposite of “Krohawk” which means a Lie or Fib. Bhidt basically means “Honest,” “Authentic,” “Accurate.” For example my mom went to a psychic fortuneteller once [many times] and when the readings were very accurate she’d gossip about it to her sisters and my aunts would say: “Wow, bhidt [Accurate] main [Indeed]!” It didn’t mean that what the psychic was saying was absolute fact or spiritual truth. It just meant she was pretty accurate. So an idea or belief that is Bhidt doesn’t mean it is absolute fact and cosmically true. It just means that such idea or belief is your Honest Opinion or your Honest Belief or knowledge you believe to be accurate.

In Buddhism [Pali] the word most often mistranslated as “truth” or “fact” is Sacca [pronounced Saccha or Sajhak]. Saccha actually means: “That which you have come to know to be accurate,” or “knowledge which is assumed to be accurate.” The Accuracy of saccha actually depends on how you see and understand things. Truth or Fact in English seems to suggest that it is so truly true that it is beyond doubt and absolute and anything else is false.

For example, there was a time when Europeans believed that the entire universe was a flat Europe. It was truth and anything else was just poppycock. But then Africa and Asian came into the picture due to trade. So the Truth changed to the whole universe beings Europe, Africa, and Asia, but everything was still flat, and anything else was uneducated. But then Columbus came and messed the Truth up. So then the whole universe was a whole round world, but the Truth was this round world was the center of the universe and anything else was heretical!

But then Copernicus, Galileo, and Newton came and messed things up. So the Fact was now changed to the round world was going around the sun which was in some galaxy, that came about by gravity, but the galaxy was it! And anything else was just unscientific. But then somebody discovered there were billions of galaxies. So now the Fact is that the universe is really big, filled with many galaxies yes, but surely we’re the only intelligent anythings in the whole universe: and anything beyond this is ludicrous. It’s almost as if the mundane mind never really learns that Truth doesn’t really exist. Or that when some authority figure sets a limit to Truth, that these mundane minds lacks the intelligence and wit to go beyond such limits to see what’s on the other side. But for the sake of convenience, I’ll use the word truth anyways.

From a daily mindfulness of Life: from the mindful awareness of Nature, and the Vantage Points gained, there arises the understanding that there exists two sets of understandings [or facts, or truths]: 1) conventional/relative; and 2) “supra-conventional.” This also isn’t a belief. It’s just that when you are in the business of seeing the Nature of things [Physis] you eventually will make these two categories to stick your insights into.

For example to me the idea or fact, or theory, or belief, or truth that men and women are different is real and true [accurate]: conventionally. Guys and girls are very different from one another in mind and body. But ultimately or “supra-conventionally” they are both expressions of the same Humanness or Humanity you see?

So it can be said that this supra-conventional way of understanding something is the state in which that something is apprehended in its Complete, or Whole state. Whereas the conventional way of seeing things is when one sees instead that same Wholeness in its separate parts or pieces. And it is when Mind or Consciousness is attached to or fixated on a certain aspect of these separate parts or pieces – oblivious or blind to the Whole – that problems arises. It's like you were looking through a peek hole in a wooden fence and you base your entire worldview and belief system on the limited things you can see through that peek hole, never realizing that there could be more; or sometimes actually passionately denying and fighting the possibility of there being more then your peek hole perspective.

I have this expensive watch I wear sometimes. To me the most important parts about this watch are its face and the battery inside. One day my watch stopped working. I assumed it stopped working because the hands stopped moving. So I figured it that the battery was dead. I took it to the repair guy to change my battery for me. He puts on one of those eye pieces and looks around inside and said that it wasn't the battery, but that a little gear needed to be replaced. Which was when I actually realized in Heart that there was more to the Nature of a watch then just its face and battery.

So in my Buddhist way I asked the repair guy how he sees a watch. My repair guy said to me that a watch and a clock or something as big as Big Ben were all the same: the intricate system of gears and parts working together as a single system. So all that time my perception of that watch was Limited to a mere two parts: a face and a battery. That's called ignorance. Ignorant because I was unaware of the bigger picture: the Complete Perception of the Total Nature of that watch.

It's easy for us to understand this watch example, because it's easy to step back and see the bigger picture in which the watch is actually made of many, many little gears and sprockets that all work together as a single system. But it's hard to maintain this mindfulness of the Wholeness of things regarding the many aspects of life. And that's where many of our human problems come from.

For example, the Belief in Moral Absolutes or Moral Truths. Many of us have this idea that evil exists in the world, and we Believe that the existence of such evil is fact and truth and universal. So we invent religions and worldviews based on such Beliefs. But such people never realize that such beliefs are relative and conventional. What one social group of people judge and valuate to be evil may not be perceived as such in other social groups [cultures, nations].

For instance in America is it wrong, and a crime for a grown man to have sex with a 13 year old girl. Lawmakers right now have this idea of locking up men that do this in prison for life and chemically castrating them. But on the other side of the world in Yemen, Muslim Clerics are pressuring the government to maintain laws that allow grown men to marry child brides as young as 13. Or even in the same social group of people such as Christians, evils and morals are not quite absolute. It's morally heinous and evil from a Christian perspective and worldview to abort babies, because killing is evil. But these same people see nothing wrong with supporting capital punishment and wars that kills millions of Iraqis and Afghans.

A better example for us is something I personally experience. When I was in my early teens and more ignorant, I had read the Satanic Bible and believed that Might Is Right was a Fact of Nature. Only because I thought Darwin's theory of evolutions stated something like: "survival of the fittest." I never personally seen or witnessed any species fight and compete with anything to survive, but that didn't matter. The idea itself made sense to me at the time. Only so because of my limited perspective of things. But as I started being more mindful of Life, and trying to gain new and higher vantage points to see the Wholer side of the Nature of things, I started to disagree with this Might Is Right idea.

Nothing in Nature competes or fights to survive. Everything co-exists in a symbiotic interconnectedness with everything else. Which is why it's called an ecosystem. We now know that even if one part of Nature – an ecosystem – is removed or goes extinct, that the System is upset and can have catastrophic end results. So after I gained this more Wholer perspective of the Nature of Nature, I realized that I had based my identity and entire worldview and understanding of who and what I was on a very limited perception or interpretation of Life which was not accurate: not Bhidit, not Saccha. When I did realize this, I was Free and Liberated from my fixation or attachment to that limited understanding. And from that Liberation of Mind, I was able to grow and progress to different vantage points.

And these aren't "Buddhist" perspectives I am sharing. Any fool with half a brain that works, who takes the time to go beyond their limits of conventional mundane perception will eventually See this. But it takes mental discipline. I use this mental discipline on a daily basis, and it's this Discipline of Mind that I find hard to compromise, so that it is near impossible for me to devolve back to some Materialistic-Atheistic Satanist or some Theistic Christian.

The Crime Of Perception

It used to be – not to long ago – that belief was a crime. Meaning that when a sectarian regime or political regime has set a standard of belief and truth, that if you deviated from such beliefs and truths you were a heretic, shunned by society, and punished by the law, often with death.

We assume that because we have the freedom today to believe and worship what we want that things have changed with our ruling regimes, society, and the law but have things changed? If there was a standard perception of things, what would happen if you deviated from this established standard?

During the 70's it was believed – or the standard perception of things were – that being Human was unique, and that as a zoologist or biologist studying animals you cannot see in animal life Human nature. This was sometimes called Anthropomorphication or Anthropomorphic Interpretation/Projectionism. If you did See Humanness in animals such as "Culture" you were ridiculed by your peers, shunned from your scientific community, and lost your job. But today, we now know that animals have culture. The easiest example on I can give on the fly are chimps who have a culture of inserting twigs in termite mounds to fish for termites. This cultural meme is something they are instinctively born with. It is learned and acquired via observation and trial.

Not to long ago there lived a mad scientist named Wilhelm Reich who had unorthodox modes of perception that deviated from established views. Mr. Reich for one, observed under his microscope that under certain conditions – when orgone was present – dead matter, or decomposed biomatter produced these little life forms he called “Bions.” He had this unorthodox idea that some kind of naturally present life force in the ether he called “Orgone” was the difference between dead matter and living matter. Mr. Reich started to invent a technology based on this Orgone energy.

But he had been studying his Bions and how these bions came to life from dead matter. And from this observation he theorized that perhaps these things were the agents of disease. That perhaps when cells in a body dies and decomposes [which happens every second in your body] that if negative orgone affected this dead matter, those harmful bions would be produced, which caused diseases. This theory of his lead him to study a relatively new disease during his time called Cancer.

Wilhelm Reich’s unorthodox perception of what cancer was did not go well with the authorities. Especially when Mr. Reich was stating that Cancer can be cured based on his research. Nobody knows what his research discovered or if his theories were accurate. But what is known is that his government arrested him, seized all of his books and research papers, and burned everything. He was shunned and rejected by mundane society, and died a poor and forgotten man.

Are you free as an individual to deviate from a standard way of perceiving something which your government has established? For example, if you were living in a Capitalist nation during a Cold War, and you deviated from this standard Capitalist worldview, what would happen to you? Or if you were a doctor and you challenged the views of the FDA and pharmaceutical corporations? Or if you were a scientist and you challenged the views of mainstream Gravity-Cosmology and Big-Bangers?

Gods, Truths, and beliefs these days are cheap. It affects the government and state and status quo very little what gods and religious beliefs you have. What is important these days is perception, views, and established Facts.

We laugh at the idea of the stupidity of people back then in the “Dark Ages” who were dumb enough to follow religious laws and belief in their religious perceptions. Some group of men can just interpret some bible and make laws to govern, gain wealth, and power over the lives of people from cradle to grave and all they have to do is wave their bibles and writs in the air and those olden day morons believed every word of it didn’t they?

Now we have these guys in bureaucracies and scientific institutions, and pharmaceutical industries making laws that run your life, get rich from you, and gain power over you from cradle to grave, waving their writs and research papers based on Facts in the air and ain’t nobody morons anymore huh? Some of you mundanes just believe every word and writ and suck it all up like gay boys to a dick don’t you?

Mundane Perception

Mundanes can be understood as “Extremophiles.” They just love extremes; you can say they suffer from Extremophilia. Their attention and eyes only see extreme views. It’s like their visual cortex in the back of their brain has only two Reality Color Cones and Rods: one for “This Extreme,” and the other for “That Extreme,” ain’t nothing in between. Things gotta be either black or white. If it’s grey or some other shade, it just don’t make any sense to them. If you want to find Mundanes, all you have to do is go to an extreme views point: Materialist-Atheists or Spiritual-Theists, they’re all there, the billions of them; can’t miss them. They’re the people that actually passionately believe the peek hole perception of reality they are fixated on is the only thing real.

They see the whole world and universe with their half brained, crosseyed, halfassed binary perception. There’s a Good god and an Evil god, nothing in between or nothing more. The universe is either finite or infinite. It’s either got to be one universe or an infinity number of multiverses. Some invisible god either made them miraculously or some swamp gas made them miraculously; there just exist no other possible option for them. Human civilization either has to be capitalist or communist; totalitarian or democratic; no other possibility or potential exists for them. They go to sleep and dream and then they wake up, and from that mundane experience they interpret life as being either real like waking life or an illusion like dream life.

Mundanes are also perceptually lazy. They have no views of their own. You have to spoon feed shit to them, and if it isn’t an extreme view then it won’t stimulate their two brain cones to fire so they can make any sense of it. Your views you spoon feed these mental cripples either have to make them feel like cosmically miserable self-loathing sinful creatures or like they are their own supergods with cosmic powers to control the universe and hordes of lesser spirit gods and demons.

Their eyeballs work; they see stuff; but they don’t know what they are looking at. You have to tell them. That’s why religion has been the best selling business in human history.

It doesn’t even matter if they never seen the shit you sell them: heaven, hell, paradise with 72 virgins. Whatever, as long as it’s extreme: Live Forever in the Highest heaven at the most tippy toppest place or burn for eternity in the lowest pits of hell. Not 1 or 2 virgins, 72 virgins! These people are so limited in their power of perception that if you’re a Jew then so is God. If you’re black, then you worship a Black Jesus. If you’re Chinese, you’re gods got slanty eyes too.

If you’re a materialist then your god is a symbol. If you’re a spiritualist then your god is a spirit human. But your religion has to be extreme. It must either be extremely restrictive or the whole opposite and be extreme mindlessly liberal. And your religion must have an exciting extreme plot. Like a good looking good god battling an ugly evil god, with angels with nice teeth warring with demons with bad teeth, all fighting for the souls of humans, because we’re so special, and because gods just have nothing else better to do with their eternity. And there needs to be at least a cataclysmic end of the world at the turn of every century because mundanes love to fret over extreme scenarios. Or your religion isn’t going to attract adherents. Which is why things like Zen Buddhism isn’t all that popular with Mundanes, because zazen is just sitting still in an unexciting way.

They see a sun, and they grass, but they're too stupid and lazy to perceive the bigger picture of there being a causal connection of some sort. Things they see in their barely functioning brains are permanently separated. If there is no wire or tether connecting anything, then it ain't connected and have nothing to do with each other. Nature isn't an integrated system of symbiotic co-dependent life forms and parts. It's a war zone where everything is out for itself, and where it doesn't matter if you use just one or two species into extinction.

Most of these Mundanes today are born, bred, raised, and conditions in industrialized cities. Like chickens born, bred, raised, and conditioned their entire lives inside industrial chicken coops: Used for their meat and eggs. So they know of no other "reality" but what urban "stuff" their minds are born and conditioned to see. So you have these idiot urbanite Satanists who invent some "law of the jungle" to follow and believe in as fact when the closest thing to a jungle they've experienced is a city park or the local zoo. Most have ADD so they can't even sit through a nature show on PBS to learn shit.

They take their chicken coop perspective and superimpose it onto everything. It's a struggle and a fight to survive in the city. Every other human begin in a city is competition. You gotta compete for food, for jobs, for houses, for wives, for retirement pension plans. Only the strong survive. So they project that chicken coop conditioning onto Nature and either worship and follow some Darwinian Struggle law or some god figure that will somehow save them from the fucked up chicken coop they made for themselves.

They project their chicken coop worldview onto the whole universe. Just watch their stupid science fiction movies. Every alien creature is ugly and is out to kill and use humans or compete with humans for the earth, like the whole universe with its billions of galaxies lacks an uninhabited habitable planet, so they just have to come to this one and bug us. The whole universe to these stupid idiots is a big Darwinian chicken coop. No wonder 6 billion of them believe in some God! You need to have a saviour to save your ass if you believe you live in a cut throat evil filled chicken coop.

They move from one extreme to another in life. From one god to another. From one belief to another. From one set of abstractions to another. From one set of authority figures to another. And they think this movement is change and evolution. It's about as evolutionary as a mental institute resident being moved from one room on one end of the asylum to the other end. Nothing changed because you're still in the same fucked up building! You still got the same delusional worldviews, you're still in the same paradigm, you still see things in extremes and opposites.

Pigeon Brains

Most mundandes hate B.F. Skinner and those weird guys into Behavioural Science; who make them feel like dumb machines with pigeon brains that are easily manipulated and programmed.

So basically you have a pigeon in a cage, and you give the dumb pigeon two buttons to peck at: a red one and a green one. You make the red one do something negative like shock the bird, and the green one dispenses food. After a while the pigeon will "learn" to avoid the red button and peck only the green one. This is significant because when you look closely, you see that the pigeon was incapable of making for itself a “third” option or its own option. It made its choice of which button to peck at based only on what options were given to it. But Mundanes are smarter than pigeons right?

Mundanes don't have their own views of anything. They are incapable of figuring out things for themselves. As Kayla says: “The Market does not have opinions of its own.” If the Market had their own opinions, or if Mundanes actually had the ability to formulate their own views, then marketing and advertising would not be a multi-trillion dollar business; and religion and politics would not work or exist. You give these people their opinions and views. They are incapable of thinking for themselves or determining their own world.

Nowhere do Mundanes express their inherent stupidity and lack of view then in marketing and advertising. You have companies that come out with new products. New product meaning nobody has ever seen it or tried it. The company hires a company that specializes in marketing and advertising to sell their new product. If the advertisement for the new product is convincing enough, the people will buy the product. In other words, they trust whoever is convincing enough as an authority figure and even though they have never directly tried or experienced that new product before, they will buy. If your product lacks the quality to sell by a convincing argument, then you do a smear campaign on the product's nearest competition, and if your smear campaign is convincing enough, then the new product sells.

The same pigeon brain game is used in religion. You give the Market two buttons to peck: Red Button = Burn in hell forever; Green Button = Go to heaven. If your religion lacks attributes that makes it sellable, you bring in a competing religion as the second option and make that second option look negative. In this scenario the Mundane – the billions of them – all lack the ability to create for themselves a “third” button to peck, or they lack the power to make themselves their own option. The less options you give to these pigeon brained Mundanes, the easier it is to manipulate them. You give them their opinions and their views, but you make it appear as if they have some free will to choose what they like and want to do. Just like the government gives you the free will to choose to pay taxes or go to jail, but you give wonderful reasons why taxation is good.

Politics uses the same pigeon brained game. Give these people as few options as possible. Make the options you do not want them to choose sound bad, and make the option you want them to pick sound good. Dictatorship or Democracy? Communism or Capitalism? Anarchy or Statism? These Mundanes lack the ability to invent their own options. They pick what between what options are given. You tell them you do not believe in the State and want to eradicate Nations and governments, and they become confused and ask you what you will live in and what you will replace it with; because they were never given such an option to peck at. They lack the power to create their own ideas and opinions.

Facts and science now unfortunately work in the same way. Science is no longer based on empirical research and experimentation. If your argument and math is most convincing, it is Fact. Give a smartass materialist Mundane these two options: 1) Pick Creationism and look like a fool; or 2) Darwinian evolution and look smart and which would they choose? If you do a good job ridiculing the first option, and making the second option Convincing, they will predictably pick the second. The less options you give them, the more predictable their choices are; the more predictable they are, the easier it is to control and maneuver them en mass into a direction of your choice.

Facts or Truths don't exist. Mundanes will Believe in anything as long as the options are few and as long as you can Convince them to agree. Belief and Truth for Mundanes is an agreement. Mundanes go to school, or read books, or listen to authority figures, and if what they read, or hear is agreeable they call it "learning," and "believing." They do not learn or believe in things from direct experience and insights gains from experience. The most they will gain from an experience is a pigeon brained approach where they will learn to avoid things and experiences which yields negative [hurtful] results. If the results of an experience does not hurt physically or emotionally they will not learn to avoid it. Which is why such people become easily addicted to drugs, alcohol, and gambling, and not even ever realize that such addiction is harmful or destructive to themselves and their loved ones until it's too late.

If you were a group of wealthy Oligarchies and some king was getting in your way to power, what would you do? You give the people – who lack a view and opinion of their own – two options: Tyranny under monarchism, or Liberty with Democracy. The worse you make the first choice sound, and the better you make the second one seem, the more they will believe the second choice is their own opinion. And just like pigeons, these Mundanes lack the ability to make for themselves a third option, or their own extra option.

This is what I mean by perception and lack of perception. This is what I mean when I say that problems arises when we base our beliefs and worldviews on limited fields of perception. You cause problems when you cannot see or apprehend the Complete Nature or state of something. You limit not only your own growth and evolution when you limit your perception to only fractions of the Totality of something, but you mess up other people's lives to, and fuck up the world. Instead of learning to see and understand the nature and way of what is the Totality of Life, you fixate your mind on a single fraction of it blind to everything else.

There is more to Life then just killing and sex, but most of us can only see such extremes, and we make such a big deal out of them in our lives, our religions, our politics, and our worldviews. When there is so much more to Life in its Whole state of being. Most of us can't even get ourselves to understand that we are not an independent fractional aspect of Nature, but that we are a living indivisible part of what is the Complete state or Totality of Nature. And from that inability to understand our place and relationship to Nature, we abuse it, not understanding what wyrdful results we weave for those generations of people to come after us.

Disciplining your Mind to teach it to see the Whole picture or the Complete nature of something is not exclusive to Buddhist, or to any single culture. Those people who have the natural ability to ascend above Mundanity and Mundane Perception have created countless methods of coming to a higher or greater understanding of the nature of things. There are many names and methods. Sometimes it's called dialectics, sometimes mindful analysis, sometimes the method is Vibhajjavada, other times the Socratic Method, and yet other times the Hegelian Dialectics. Some may work better for different people. Whatever the method, this is something that the ONA and its Initiates cannot do without for many reasons. The first and obvious reason being to transcend Mundaneness. The second most relevant reason being that the study and understanding of Nature and the nature of things is an integral aspect of the ONA Way.

The ONA Way

“The epistemology of the Esoteric Philosophy of the ONA asserts that there are two distinct types of knowing – causal and acausal – and that:

“A) knowledge of the causal continuum can be obtained by causal Science which is based on the following foundations:

“(i) the causal, phenomenal, universe exists independently of us and our consciousness, and thus independent of our senses; (ii) our limited understanding of this causal ‘external world’ depends for the most part upon our senses – that is, on what we can see, hear or touch; that is, on what we can observe or come to know via our senses and by practical scientific experiments; (iii) logical argument, or reason, is the basic means to knowledge and understanding of and about this ‘external world’; (iv) the cosmos is, of itself, a reasoned order subject to rational laws; (v) that, in competing explanations of events or observations, the simplest and most logical explanation is to be preferred.” – Guide To The Esoteric Philosophy Of The ONA

Before an epistemological anything can be “knowledged” or extracted from this causal, phenomenal universe, by logical argument or reason, certain basic and causal things must first be understood. The first Question is where does that “logic” or “reason” come from in the first place? Or another way to ask this question is: Where does what we know come from or what are we reasoning?

I think one of the most frustrating things is getting into an argument about the existence of other Gods or the “trueness” of other religions with a Christian. So you ask them to explain to give to you the logical reasons why they believe their god is real and why their religion is the right one. They will start to name things out of the bible to logically back their argument up. Then you present your argument to explain how another religion or god may be better and truer. And these Christians will usually invalidate your argument by saying: “But the bible says [...]” Which is to suggest that they use, and they want you to use Ideas from the bible to measure things with.

So the notion that we dislike Mundanes and Mundane perception and Mundane worldviews, the idea that we should ascend above such Mundane understandings, and the implication that we use Mundane logic and Mundane facts, and Mundane reason to measure and figure out the mysteries of the universe is the same deal. Wherever a Mundane gets their logic and reason from, it is where we do not want to go shopping for tools to measure the world with.

Usually a Mundane will read a text book for their logic and reason. And if an argument or idea is in agreement with their worldviews and level of understanding they will Believe it and use it as a means to see and understand their world, and we already know how they see and understand the world.

And understanding this world is an important aspect of the ONA because it is restated again in different manuscripts in different ways. Such as the following ONA MSS which provides a clue as to where the Dreccian will get their understandings, logic, and reason from:

“The essence of the Traditional Satanism perspective about our origins in the causal Universe is reason – or rather, what used to be called Natural Philosophy: through observation, experiment and the use of reason, or logic, we can understand our world, the causal Cosmos, and ourselves. Thus, Traditional Satanism is, in one important respect, a rationalist Way of Life which accepts: (1) that the Causal Universe (or Causal Reality) exists independently of us and our consciousness, and thus independent of our senses; (2) our limited understanding of this causal ‘external world’ depends for the most part upon our senses – that is, on what we can see, hear or touch; that is, on what we can observe or come to know via our senses; (3) logical argument – reason – and experiment are the best means to knowledge and understanding of and about this ‘external world’; (4) the Causal Universe is, of itself, a reasoned order subject to rational laws; (5) our faculty of acausal-empathy is a means for us to know the nexion we are, and how we can discover our correct relationship to all other life. Thus, practical reason – Natural Philosophy – enables us to comprehend the external, physical, causal, Universe.” –
Ontology and Theology of Traditional Satanism

It’s from Natural Philosophy that what we know comes from, or it is this that we are reasoning. Natural Philosophy is essentially the study of Nature and the physical universe. Most importantly via Observation of Nature and the Causal Universe. So we come to the very opening subject of this essay: Perception.

Our Perception – how we see things – is the foundation of our beliefs and worldviews. How we see things, or what our consciousness is fixated on, influences how we see and understand the world. For example, if you were hiking in a forest along a trail with the intent on coming to an understanding of the Nature of that forest, and your Mind becomes fixated on a bear or a snake obstructing your path, the forest you are in suddenly vanishes out of your awareness doesn’t it? And this is what extreme views or attention grabbing aspects of Life does to us. It distracts consciousness so that you are only aware of that which has attracted your mind’s fixation [attention].

Your Conscious Mind is a tool of limited power. It is like a magnifying glass. It brings into clear detail only what it fixates on and blurs everything else. It is like holding your hand in front of a painting. If you fixate your conscious awareness on a line on your hand, you lose perspective and a clear – detailed – of the painting. Except on our Human level of things, that painting is Reality, and the hand in front is literally what we are fixated on that is most often in front of our face. The Mundane – Anariya – thing is to turn what you fixate your Mind on and see clearly as a factual conviction, and use it to measure reality with oblivious to every other potential and possibility: the rest of the 99% of reality your Mind has blurred.

So back to our forest analogy. On your left side of your trail there was a big pine tree with a sign on it that said “atheism,” and on your right side there was a pine tree with a sign that said “theism” on it. If your mind – mindful awareness – is fixated on one of these trees, it cannot see the other. But when you train your mind to be mindful of its surroundings and you learn to shift your mind around so that it mindfully apprehends both trees and the forest such that you Realize inside that both trees are only a fraction of what is the Complete forest.

For the sake of convenient we will call the first form of perception in which consciousness is fixated on a single tree “Relative Perception,” since it is fixated on a single relative aspect of a Complete whole. The second form of higher perception can be called “Epirelative Perception,” where the Mind has ascended above all relative parts or aspects of a Complete whole and is aware of the Whole in its Complete state.

Aside from Observation of Nature and the Causal Universe, Experimentation is also a practical method for extracting insight from Nature. To this category of apprehension of knowledge belongs Pathei-Mathos because there is an aspect relative to Causal Reality called Life where Direct Experience works best to extract insight and a deeper understanding of things.

As Dreccians, we either trouble ourselves with the struggle of gaining a deeper and clearer apprehension of Nature, and our Reality, by our own direct observation of Nature, experimentation in Nature, and direct experience of Life to gain insights. Or we do it the lazy way mundanes do it by just reading some text book, or going to some authority figure and asking questions, and agreeing with the most convincing text or argument. One way actually involves logic and reason, while the other involves only agreement to other people’s ideas and opinions about something they have no direct apprehension or experience of.

Sinister Exetasis

Sinister Exetasis is essentially the process of using Epirelative Perception to explicate inner insight regarding Nature, Reality, Life, and ourselves in relation to everything. By the word “Sinister” we mean to say that there is a Mundane way of coming to know something which is either conventional or based on peek hole relative perception. The actually meaning of the word “Conventional” is the enememe of “Sinister.” A Conventional “something” is a “something” that has been established as a standard, model, truth, or fact. In the general case with Mundanes, they will read or be told a conventional fact, such as the Big Bang theory, and when the conventional idea is accepted, their thinking stops. But there was no thinking on their part in the first place. There was just agreement to a conventional idea.

By the word “Exetasis” we mean to say that there are certain methods of Examination and Logical Analysis used to get from Relative Perception and conscious fixation of relative articles of perception to a higher state of understanding of the Complete Nature of things via an Epirelative Awareness and Perception which includes reason, Doubt and Questioning of conventional models, and critical thinking, but also intuition, and inner insight. We can say that to go through the process of apprehending a higher state of understanding the Nature of things is to “Exetize” conventional relative articles of perception such that a bigger picture – Epirelative Perception – is obtained.

There are three steps or landmarks to Sinister Exetasis thus are as follows:

1. Complete Mindfulness
2. Complete Apprehension
3. Complete Understanding

By “Complete Mindfulness” we mean the process where the Mind of the Dreccian acts to transcend or ascend above Mundane fixation of an extreme view, or fixation of a single relative article of perception by striving and training or disciplining the Mind to become Mindfully Aware of all relative articles of perception or all aspects of the Totality of a subject being observed.

It's harder then it sounds to become consciously mindful of something, and it's even harder to be mindful of many somethings together. But it's this struggle of becoming mindfully aware of things in life that causes one to ascend Mundane awareness. Most Mundanes spend their entire existence numb to Life, and are only aware of a minute fraction of what is the Totality of Life; such as American Idol, the latest teen heart throb, the latest celebrity gossip, their car, random girls with big breasts, their favorite music band; you know: stuff that are very important in Mundanity.

Becoming Mindfully Aware of the Complete Nature of things is difficult and takes discipline. It is much harder then reading a text book for pre-fabricated answers. Answers and insights come from within. But from my own experience, the Mind is highly adaptable and when you have trained your Mind to become mindfully aware of the Complete picture of something, it will Naturally go through its process of generating inner insights to come to a deeper understanding. And it is that insight generated from within that we want to cultivate. Because in such a condition where insights comes from within based on direct and personal observation, nothing or nobody comes int between you and reality as some interpreter or middle man.

Complete mindfulness suggests that there is an Incomplete Mindfulness of things. Incomplete Mindfulness is the usual process by which a Mundane comes to know something. Generally a Mundane will fixate its awareness on the first attention grabbing thing and construct an entire worldview and cosmology on it. For example if Materialism jumps out at a Mundane and is convincing or in agreement with this Mundane's level of perception and understanding, he will hold onto this single conventional mode of relative perception, fixate his Mind onto it, and become oblivious or passionately reject anything else. By the word “Relative” we mean to suggest that there exists in such or all cases multiple models or articles of conventional perception relative to the one a Mundane has lost itself in.

Complete Apprehension is the state in which when you have learned to become mindfully aware of your surroundings, minute details, causation and interconnection of things, the various relative articles perception, are pieced together like pieces of a puzzle so that one becomes Aware that there does indeed exist a bigger or Complete state of Nature of something.

To obtain Complete Apprehension we first have to examine things closely for their Epirelative nature [Physis]. This act of mindfully analyzing and examining things for their Epirelative essential nature depends of Reason and Insight. Complete Apprehension does not demand or depend on conjecture or supposition; it demands that we Reason and Think in accord with our own inner insights, rather than take another's word for it. Direct apprehension and direct experience are crucial. The practice of Sinister Exetasis is designed to reveal to us how things really are. To see things in complete clarity is to attain Complete Understanding.

Complete Understanding of the Nature of something is more a Realization than a learning. By "learning" I mean how a Mundane acquires new "knowledge," which is from an act of agreeing to an outside source or opinion or some sort: books or experts.

Coming to a Complete Understanding of a subject matter isn't just a different view of something. It is the act of the Mind Liberating itself from a prison of delusion. And we already have explained above the many problems and consequences a Mundane experiences and causes when its Mind is captivated and imprisoned in delusions brought about by a total fixation of relative perception. By "Liberation" we mean the act of Mind overcoming or going beyond limitations and becoming Self Enlightened. You do not need books or some expert to tell you what is real or true. You have the potential to figure things out on your own.

A quick example of coming to a more complete understanding of something is being straight or gay. Mundanes really make a big deal out of sex when its just one aspect of what is the Totality of Life. They will grab hold of the most agreeable attention grabbing model: being straight, and from that fixation of relative perception, they incriminate everything else that does not fit into their little box of conventionally "accepted sex."

These Mundanes lack the ability to step back to gain a greater understanding of things to ever realize that on a Human level – considering all 7 billion Humans – being straight is just one mere point in a much wholer or completer spectrum of human sexual expression. So that we see that such a fixation and glorification of a mere single pint of a spectrum not only causes limitations but also generates very real problems that are experienced. How many gay people have been murdered just for a mode of human sexual expression? How much money and time and energy does the conservative establishment spend on this subject as if it's a matter of life and death to a nation?

One other example of Sinister Exetasis is when I observe my Self aeonically. When I step back and become aware of my whole existence thus far. I see that in my beginning I began as a very primitive and helpless baby and as I grew, my awareness, and conscious mind grew sharper and more sophisticated. And I realize that like a flowing river, I am never the same thing twice. As I flow, everything about me changes: my memories, my opinions, my perception, my thoughts, my feelings, my age, my body, and my cells of my body. So when I "Exetize" all this together, the insight that there exists a process in which consciousness is in a state of evolution is explicated you see. And this knowing, or insight, did not come from any book or from some expert. It came from inside myself.

Another example of Exetizing relative articles of perception is when I step back to become mindfully aware on an aeonic level causal life from it's earliest beginnings to the present. I don't know where life came from. All I know is that over the course of time causal life evolves or changes in spurts collectively to become more advanced and sophisticated, such that we humans have come into existence as very unique organisms.

And when I consider our level of intelligence, and our technological advancements, and the near future possibility of our species colonizing space in relation to other causal life on earth, I see or understand a greater picture or vision in which Humanity will one day not just colonize space, but will spread the germ of Earthly causal Life across the vast expanse of the galaxy.

From being able to see a greater perception of something, you are then able to see greater potential and to actually work to actualize that higher potential, which is what I mean when I say that Complete Understanding is the Liberation – and evolution – of Mind. It is via the willed effort and struggle for higher potential that we and all things evolve and become new things. His evolution can't happen when you are blind to such greater possibilities because your Mundane mind is mired in peek hole delusions. Small Minds become lost in small things.

This Sinister Exetasis and the cultivation of it along with Pathei-Mathos are two things which the Dreccian can actually use and practice in daily life in the real world that is uniquely ONA and Sinister, in the sense that it helps the Dreccian evolve in Mind and Being from the state of mind and state of being of Mundane conventionalism. Sinister Exetasis, Pathei-Mathos, The Sinister Method, Natural Philosophy, The Dark Tradition, and the Seven Fold Way together as a Complete System becomes not only the ONA Way of Life, but the ONA Science – the Knowledge of the Nature of – Mind and Life as well. Mind is a central and fundamental element of Reality. Without it there can be no perception or experience. Yet, we often leave this quintessential element out of the equation when we do study Nature, Life, and Reality.

As Time passes, the more we learn about the nature of things on a quantum physical level, the more we will realize this: that Mind wyrdfully determines what is Real to us. The ONA's main objectives is the evolution of humanity and human civilization to its highest wyrd and potential. The evolution of both begins with Mind. You cannot neglect Mind, and hope to genuinely change anything ignorant of the Nature of Mind and its Role it plays on Reality. Sinister Exetasis is not the final solution to the Science of Mind; but it's a good place to start. It adds a new dimension and level of understanding things to the ONA. With Sinister Exetasis, an epistemology that ascends above the conventionalism of Mundanity becomes possible.

SINISTER MOVEMENTS

Gangs

Call it what you want: gang, tribe, clan, ethnic group, nation, political party, political regime, or a Nation-State. It's all the same thing: a social ordering of people. It is an ordering, or structuring of people. And the more organized this social structure is, the more power and force such a social ordering has to assert and exert on its environment. This is the basic or Primal name of the human game of causal life: the creation of such social structures, and competition or rivalry between such social orderings. It doesn't matter what word you call this thing. It's the same organism. The only difference is the size and who's calling the shots.

A State is just an over grown gang. It takes someone intimately aware of such street gang culture to understand that a State is just a large gang. What nation-state on this earth did not come into existence by using the same ruthless tactics a street gang uses? The murder of rival social orders; the acquisition of loyal members; and the acquisition of wealth. The more wealth and loyal membership such social orders have, the more real means of power and force it has to assert and exert dominion over a territory and/or hapless group of people.

In street terms a gang will utilize primitive means of social cohesion such as the use of colors, letters, and racial identity, sometimes religion; primitive forms of common culture, traditions, and rites such as hand signs, hazing, test of loyalty. Such means of social cohesion is what calls out "drifters" – or those free floating individual human units – who resonate with such coherency factors, which binds them as a part of the social order. In the same exact way that ice crystals will attract free floating water molecules in the air to add to its coherent formation. Once the structure is coherent enough, it is a matter of utilizing such gang members to sell dope and kill rivals. Thus in turn such a gang gains control of a given territory and cash flow. The common residents within such controlled territories are the conquered or hapless people, who may and often are used as sources of more money in the form of "taxation."

Even on the internet, cyber-social orderings of humans will form, and will work to attract by various means a loyal membership. Once the cyber-social ordering has coherently organized a functioning amount of internet members, the cyber-social ordering will engage in the same kind of primal game: competing with rival cyber-social orders of people in various ways. To gain more people, and more psychological territory which adds up to Power and Influence.

A State is absolutely no different. A State will utilize colors [flags], symbols [standards, seals], letters [US, UK, EU], racial/ethnic identity, language, religion, common rites, culture, and traditions, and anything else at its disposal to materialize a coherent social structure in the form of loyal members [citizens]. Once the citizens are there, it's a matter of collecting those citizens who have a natural inclination towards killing to make an "army." In gang talk, such specialized members are called "foot-soldiers." Most States might not openly sell and trade dope, but all States engage in commerce to gain wealth. And with that wealth, and army, the State can and will dominate a territory and hapless people. On such a Nation-State level, we are talking about entire continents and whole tribes of helpless people being dominated.

Ranks

Every social ordering of humans has its social rank, even so called communist social structures which claims to not believe in social class. Simply because its human/primate nature. You cannot intellectually undo the works of Nature. You can only deny it.

In gang terms you got the gang boss and his close associates who are the OG's of the gang. Below them are those ass kissers who hope to be OG someday by proving themselves to such OG's, these are the managers or lieutenants of a gang; in State terms these are the Legislators or Law Makers. Below these ass kissers are those members who agree with the policies of the ass kissers in exchange for some kind of benefit and reward; in State terms this class would be called a "political party." Below these are the gangs "juniors" those boys between the ages of 10-26 or so that follow the rules and do the dirty work, often called "regulators" in gang terms, which are the gang's means of executing its policies. The juniors in a gang is the actual extent and causal limits of the social structure of the gang. But there is a class of people even below a common junior: the Vanquished neighborhood residents [re: "citizens"] within a gang's territory who pay taxes to the gang via threats and/or who must participate in the gang's commercial interests: drugs. The gangs sell the drugs, the Vanquished consumes.

A Nation-State is no different from a gang in its ranking. You have the boss or Executive Officer, called a "President," a "Prime Minister," or a Monarch and his close associates who represents the core of a Political Regime. You have the ass kissers who hope for power that make the policies as the State's law makers. You have the yes-men and yuppies who support such policies, which is the State's Political Party. And lastly you have the "juniors" of the State, those who enforce and execute the rule, law, and policies of the State: the military, and police force. Then you have the Vanquished, the Conquered, the "Citizens" of a State who are force to pay taxes at the threat of imprisonment and who work for wages to support the State's commercial interests.

Your Rank

Now the question the Sinister Initiate must ask themselves is: Where the hell am I in this ranking system? Because if you are not a policy enforcer [foot-soldier], not a political party yuppy; not a law maker, and not an OG; then you are a mere resource of the State. A resource like minerals, live stock, forest and lumber, money. You are being used by the State to sustain itself. In the same way that a gang must sustain itself by selling dope to drug addicts in their territory. Those drug addicts are a resource of a gang, a source of the gang's cash flow. Which cash flow translates into power: Power to control you.

Hypocrisy Of The Vanquished

If you asked me if I cared about the vanquished, my answer is NO. Because them mundanes are hypocrites. How you gunna sit there and cry, bitch, and complain that gangs are terrorizing your neighborhoods, that gang members are beating your sons up at school, innocent residents getting killed by stray bullets, stealing your cars, and robbing your homes, when it's YOU that's doing the dope, and when it's YOU that's buying their dope, and when it's YOU that don't have the guts to come together and take care of the problem?

How are you gunna sit there and complain about how your Government, State, and its State Stooges are oppressing you or being too controlling in your everyday lives, when it's YOU that pays the taxes, when it's YOU that agrees to play along with their money game by seeing value in their money; when it's YOU that allows them to make laws, when it's YOU that joins their army and police force.

How long will it take these mundanes to wake up and realize that a State is not only abstract, but that the State is a predator which preys on people. I'm a Drecc. I have and can already see through the flimsy veil of the State. I already know and understand where I am in the social rank, and all I know is I don't want to be here and I know my way out.

The Way Out

I use to know this one girl in high school that once teased me and talked shit about me with her friends. I made my own group of friends and we beat the living shit of them bitches, and ever since then, that group never again messed with me.

I witness the OG's in the gang clique I am affiliated with Liberate themselves in a certain neighborhood from a rival gang controlling that area by spreading propaganda about this rival gang in the local high school there and then initiating a group of boys from that high school and neighborhood into our own clique which then went on a shooting spree killing that rival gang, thus freeing their neighborhood, and liberating themselves.

Of course I learned in high school that George Washington and his associates organized a group to fight the British Empire to liberate his colonial ass from British Rule. And after much murdering, America gained full control of its own destiny and territory. And this is the most important factor of liberation: In whose hands is your destiny?

The only way out of this prison we now call a State is by organizing into our own social orders and destroying the State from the inside out. And to commit ourselves and posterity to this work of destruction and liberation, no matter how long it takes. The Germanic Barbarians didn't take a single lifetime to destroy the Roman Empire. It was a gradual process which took many generations, and many shifts of strategy and tactics.

Destiny

By destiny, I mean the idea or concept that my own life, how I choose to live it, what I shall make of it, and that my own future and the future of my children are in my sovereign hands to mold. I don't mean "wyrd" when I say destiny, because I use the word "wyrd" in a different way.

You can argue with me and say: "Well gee Chloe, I'm a citizen of such and such country and I love paying my taxes, and I control my destiny because I wanted to be a fire fighter when I was a boy and now I am one, see." Shut up! That's not what I'm talking about! Your fucking destiny is Retirement in a Nursing Home! Remember I said that when you get too old to work for your State and they throw you away like a used douche bag that you are.

People just don't get it. You're born into Life, and the State immediate tells you that you aren't fully human and that you got to work for it. So they dangle this Imaginary Thing in your face and tell you got to work for it and earn it to be fully human like everybody else.

So you go to grade school. And when you finish grade school, they tell you: "Oh, you're not there. Not fully human yet, keep trying." So you go to high school and finish all four years. And they tell you: "Oh almost, but not quite there yet. Keep working for it, it'll come, good girl."

So you borrow money and go to college for 4 years. And they tell you: "Oh, not there yet. Now you have to take that diploma and do what everybody else is doing and get a job, because adult humans work!"

So you get a job thinking you're a bona fide human or true citizen, and they tell you: "Oh nope, sorry. See now there's a corporate ladder you gotta climb, start climbing, and go borrow money from a bank to get a house, humans live in houses, and get married to breed children, because humans have children you know."

So you get into debt, have children, buy a house you can't every pay off, and climb some invisible corporate ladder to some glorious treasure at the tippy top. Like that dumb treasure the whole reason why you were born in the first place.

Then your dumb ass turns old. You got grey hair. Your testicles, dick, or ovaries don't work no more. You're ugly and wrinkly. But who cares now, cuz it's not like you're gunna enjoy sex anyways or like anybody is gunna want you. You smell like medicine and Bengay. You're joints hurt. All those years of eating man made chemical saturated food has preserved your body already into a wax sculpture. Half your internal organs in your body don't work because the pesticides and toxins in the food you ate caused diseases in your body. And in that state you ask the State: "Ok, where is? I'm gunna fucking die soon, just fucking give the shit to me already." And they tell you: "That was it! There you are: The "human" experience of a good citizen! Was that a ride or what?! Now sense you're too old to be of any use to Us, why don't you go live in that there old folks home; and we'll just take your children and grand children. Thank You, come again."

It's only then, when you are that old, that you realize that "freedom" you had was fake. That what "destiny" you thought was yours was an illusion. It's then that you begin to realize that you gave the best years of your life, energy, free time, and genuine freedom, to the State. For what? Retirement? Was it your will and destiny to end up a useless old person in some nursing home having really accomplished very little? Was it your destiny to live some crappy life where you got only 1 week out of a year to do what you wanted? Was it your destiny to have never traveled the world, or spend the best years of your life with people you actually loved and cared about, doing what you wanted with your short life? Or have you Realized that you gave that destiny to the State to mold and use?

But you can say: "But Chloe, we're all going to grow old and retire some day." Shut up! That's not the point. The point is what the hell are you doing with you Life between birth and old age. In whose hands is your Life and Destiny in during those wonderful years? Think about it?

Reichsfolk Culture

This perspective of Destiny and in whose hands such Destiny is in that I went through up there is just an extension of certain concepts found in David Myatt's Reichfolk Ethical National Socialism. Specifically the concept of each "race" having it's own Destiny.

When you are a black minority living in a State of white majority, do you really think, the white mob will hear your voice, needs, humanness, and allow you to fulfill your destiny? Or to even allow you to shape the destiny of the State? And vice versa. If you are white minority living in an ethnic majority, what true freedom do you have to manifest your "racial" destiny? In a State of mixed ethnicities, the lives, humanness, and destinies of some whole ethnic groups of people will be silenced and those people used to fulfill the destiny of the ruling group and their progeny. In this light, a racially mixed "democracy" is not so great. It shows itself as a parasitic and abusive form of usury.

But this must go far deeper then just the superficialities of skin color. Because even in China, where the people there are obviously a homogeneous "Asian" population, there is the matter of the State Destiny, the Destiny of the Political Regime and the Destiny of their Stooges, which is more important and overshadows that destiny of the common citizen, whose destiny is either neglected, or used to sustain the State.

How long will you allow something so lifeless, and abstract as a "race" or a "State" to use you, abuse you, and neglect your own Life and Sovereign Destiny? How long will you allow yourself to be the pawn of a race or State or political party; or a pawn in life? Before you understand that Nature made you a Sovereign person, with your own unique Life and Destiny to experience, live, and fulfill? Before you fight and struggle to reclaim that Life and Destiny, or die trying. Because it's not just your life and destiny that is at stake. It's the life and destiny of your progeny, which is also in your hands.

Fear As A Factor Of Control

It is the mundane fear of death that docilizes us into compliancy. We are not born fearing death. You let a baby crawl around a sidewalk and she'll crawl herself into traffic. We become death defiant teenagers, and from our hormones running amok, we are fearless in those years. Which is why in any State or gang army/foot-soldier the membership of such armies are of the same youthful, death defiant age.

It's only after years of religious and/or atheistic brainwashing that we come to fear dying. Because of our beliefs. The silly belief that there is an afterlife. Which means there must be a system of salvation to be worthy of such an afterlife. And the uncertainty in you over whether you are saved to be able to go to heaven, is what makes you a docile – fearful – pawn. It is the silly materialist belief that Nature is a dead accident and that this accident spent all of its energy over billions of years to evolve you only to have you exist a mere 90 years before you are snuffed out like a candle flame forever.

It's that fear of death alone that gives State, gangs, and anything with a weapon, sharp fangs or big claws Power over you. You are so afraid of being harmed, mangled, mutilated, tortured, imprisoned that you even fail to realize that you can kill just like they can and that there is more of you than them.

Why is it that a Nation-State such as America does not fear China, which has the world's largest army, a work force 3 times the size of America's to bother to concentrate on China. But yet this same America, which is the worlds mightiest military force, would care so much about a group of rebels like Al Qaeda who are virtually cave dwellers?

It's because of the Fear Factor. Because China's economy depends on America and it's allies. Because China knows it has no real experience in military logistics. Such that the size of its army is irrelevant to America because the damn Chinese proly don't even know how to effectively move their army around. But Al Qaeda is not dependent on America in any way. It does not play this bullshit "State" game. It does not require a lot of money to strike. Because something like Al Qaeda has access to Fearless individuals. Because Al Qaeda has the power to manufacture Death Defiant members. Such people who have no fear of death and dying, who live and will die for a cause; even if that cause will take many generations to materialize, is a great threat to even the most powerful Nation on Earth.

Which is why America is sticking it's nose in some god forsaken desert of a backwards people, and why America doesn't even give a shit about China, or even North Korea with that midget Korean threatening to nuke America ever other week. It only takes a CIA agent who has covertly threatened this midget's life to shut him up. No amount of propaganda, money, or threats with bribe or scare something like Al Qaeda. One fearless death defiant Al Qaeda cell can – as we have often seen – devastate a Nation-State in many ways.

The future of human warfare is not between two Nation-States, because these Nation-States that exist today have evolved together into a dependent integrated system of mutual dependency. The future of war from now on, will be between the Nation-State and clandestine rebel forces such as Al Qaeda. In this sense, something like Al Qaeda is a pioneer in the fight for Liberation from the State. A model, worthy of our Sinister Posterity to study and emulate.

When I think of Al Qaeda, I often think of one of my all time favorite sci-fi movies [and book]: Dune. Where "Muad-dib" and his band of desert rebels fight and takes down a Galactic Empire by controlling "Spice" [re: Oil]. Is it any surprise to us who can "see" what is going on, why countries like America is running frantic trying to wean itself from Oil by legislating all these Green Energy bills, and stuff? Like the British Empire has demonstrated in the case of China: you control something a nation's people needs [opium] and you control that empire.

Magick

It's useless: As it is believed to be by mundanes and their watered down new age movement. To think that Chaos Magick Sorcerers can magickally destroy a State by invoking some demon is absolutely ridiculous. I don't remember hearing how the Taliban, Hezbollah, or Al Qaeda, having some top ranking guy who was the rebel chaos sorcerer, do you? All I've ever heard come out of these rebel forces were death defiant warriors who killed themselves as martyrs for a cause, along with other. Which is the ultimate Opfer any person can give to his Tribe and Cause: his own life. How does this even compare to some Chaos Magickian in some black robe, throwing spells at the "New World Order," in the safety of his bedroom? It's a joke. Magick, as the mundanes apprehend it is a joke.

If it isn't, then explain to me why such a country like Haiti is still poor when most of its people practice Voodoo. Explain to me why Amazonian tribes are still backwards and primitive when they have shamans. Explain to me why countries whose people are the most superstitious when it comes to such beliefs as magic, miracles, demons, angles, are the one most prone to Magian control and Magian exploitation? Such as the entire continent of Africa.

There is something very wrong with your ability to comprehend the written word if you read Anton Long's writings, and Naos, and you think the "Magick" the ONA has and teaches, is the same kind of superstitious mumbo jumbo found in Wicca or something.

And I bring the subject of magick up because if Dreccians continue to sink further into the illusion of the superstition of magic and miracles, that the ONA will generate more and more superstitious magickians to become what the I.O.T. is, and will generate less and less Dark Warriors to become in future a significant rebel force of any kind.

What has Crowley and his "magicians" ever done to and for society Causally, besides introduce another mind puzzle to keep people's minds busy? And LaVey with his stagnant rip off "Satanism?" What has LaVey made beside people lost in the delusions of egotistic grandeur, who are more than willing to serve the State their whole lives in exchange of a few hours of self Indulgence and self worship? Can you ever realistically see that something like the IOT will ever evolve into a rebel force that will wage war with a State to manifest a new kind of civilization? Because if you can't, then keep the ONA from becoming another IOT; or another Thelema; or another Church of Satan. Keep that crappy superstition based Junk Magick out of the ONA, and stick with the practical "magick" of the ONA; such as Aeonics and Future Magick to name two.

Our Generations

We've reached that strange point in our human evolution where what we call the State – or how human civilization is presently – has reached a dead end where it's past and its causal actions have finally caught up to it and it's wyrdful results is beginning to take affect. From now on, every year that passes by for a State will only mean more destruction of nature, more dehumanization of human lives, more control, more war, more pollution, more things which we can see clearly as signs that this "State" thing is not doing it for us as a species any more.

Our tango with Nation-States has come to an end. The Nation-State as we knew it has taken our species as far as it can causally take us, and if we continue to hold onto it, it will be prolonged stagnation. We all know all things must change, even human civilization.

But it is a way of Nature, that all living things in Nature shall have a will to survive. That all things in Nature, even if such things are no longer needed, will fight and struggle for it's survival. It is a way of nature that a new worthy challenger to old established things challenged and destroys the old. Such as an old alpha male silver back gorilla. In his group there will be many contenders who desires for the coveted power. It is out of Nature's own will to survive as a whole, that only the most worthy – physically, genetically – should have such power. So that, of all the contenders, only one will be the new alpha male who will reap the benefit of passing its genetic material down to its progeny.

A social ordering of humans is no different from this primate ordering of gorillas. The whole earth can be seen as a forest in which are hundreds of primates called "States." The most powerful, will by Nature's Law, have the power to influence the rest of the world. Each State is in turn a group of primate [humans], wherein only the most worthy group of humans by Nature, gets to have the power to influence the others by passing the genetic information of their memplexes to the next generations of humans. But Progression is also a law of Nature. Therefore what once was favored by Nature, when such is no longer an adequate means to further evolve and progress humanity and causal earth life, Nature will allow a replacement to fight for that coveted alpha position.

Thus what was once a most influential Roman Empire which truly progress humanity forward, was eventually replaced by the British Empire later, which took humanity further. When the British Empire stagnated, it was replaced by America, which did its job. Now America has grown stagnant, and such stagnation is anti-evolutionary. It would seem as though the European Union or China were poised to replace America. But such is not the case.

We have reached a transitional aeon in which the current format of human civilization, being so focused on fighting for domination of terrestrial territory and other humans, is not doing our species any good. As David Myatt states, humankind's next step in evolution is Galactic. And so, we see even the Earth changing in such a way such that a state like China or even the EU will not be able to sustain themselves due to the fact that natural resources are depleting rapidly, and our species has become morbidly over populated. Which is to say that Mother Nature is gradually kicking us out of our childhood home. And if we don't leave, we will self destruct into extinction. The next type of human civilization must be the type which will spread humanity and earthly causal life forms across the galaxy.

So we exist at this moment of 121 year of fuyen in what may be seen as those years just before the fall of the Roman Empire. Where rebel forces of barbaric tribes begin invading, and other rebel forces begins forming within the Empire. Except in our case this "empire" is all of the world's States, and such pioneer rebel forces as Al Qaeda are the barbarians. Al Qaeda isn't the only rebel force. It is just one of the first and so far the most successful. As time passes, there will be others which will form to work at destroying these old Nation-States, marked by Nature for liquidation, and which will fight with each other for that coveted alpha position.

It is "prophetic" that the ONA has come into existence in this transitioning aeon. It would seem that we are very small. But size in Nature has no meaning. Some times the smallest of germs can cause the most causal damage. What matters in nature – if you understand the basic mechanics of nature – is: Genetic Information. In a non-biological level, the memes which are the Genetic Information of a memplex of a social ordering of humans: their Traditions, Culture, Weltanschauung, Hopes, Dreams, Visions is what ultimately is meaningful to Nature. As the most strong and worthy genes makes the new generations of causal organisms strong and continues and evolves causal life. So too does the most strong and worthy memplex imbue the generations of mankind to continue and evolve the human species forward toward its collective Destiny: That of midwife to the Cosmos, in which we spread the germ or earthly causal life across the Living Cosmos.

What memes we manufacture today, and what we each pass down to our children, will determine our future progeny's success in the destruction of these old aeonic civilizations, and will determine their successful birth into a Star Born Civilization. As David Myatt struggles to get across, we must as an Order learn to use time Aeomically to our advantage. By passing our Dark Tradition and Sinister Way down to Our Generations: Our Sinister Posterity; so that each generation of Dreccians will inheret the essence of what is or was the Order of Nine Angles. So that each generation inherits this Myattian Weltanschauung of reality, human evolution, and the State. So that each generation of our bloodlines will in their own time, and by their own means fight and struggle to Liberate themselves and shed such old aeonic Nation-States as a snake sheds old skin, into a new regenerated organism. And organism collectively reaching upwards for the stars beyond the limits of this dying world.

If it's one thing that I have learned from studying these social orders from a sociological perspective, and from the gangs and religions that I have been involved with is that: People Believe In Ideas, But They Live For Movements. People just believe in a religion. They devote their lives to a Movement. People will just believe in an ideology. They will die for a cause. Islam is just something to believe in. Al Qaeda is a movement to fight for. Socialism is just something to believe in. Hitler's National-Socialism was a Movement to fight and kill for. The ONA must learn to transform our memplex from a system of beliefs and traditions, into a mythos imbued Movement. If we are to inspire and captivate the hearts and minds of our future generations. This ONA must be a Movement, if we hope those in the future will devote their lives to our Sinister Cause.

Bullies

I have a little 9 year old cousin named Ariana. I was over at my grand mother's house whom she and her mother lives with this one day. I was sitting on the sofa next to her mom, who is a favourite auntie of mine as she was drawing and coloring at the coffee table. So I asked Ariana how she likes school. She reluctantly just said it was "ok."

Her mom softly laughs and says softly to me: "She has a bully." I thought it was both cute and funny in an ironic way. Ironic because of the meaning of her name. Ariana is a conjunction of two Pali words: "Ariya" meaning "Aryan," "Noble," or "High," and "Ana" meaning "Power," "Might," "Authority," "Force," and "Privilege." It was unbecoming for someone with that name, and someone with our family history and sanguineous pedigree to be bullied.

I asked her about her bully problem and she explained to me that she really likes school, but some boy was bugging her and teasing her. One of our boy cousins who was listening in on us – after laughing at Ariana – told her to kick the bully in the shin and push him. I quickly interjected: "Yeah, just do it in front of the teacher, so he can't hurt you."

Her mom then said to her: "You should do what they say Ariana, or he'll bully you forever. She asked her mom: "But won't I get in trouble?" And her mom answered: "Yes, but only for a day. Would you rather be bullied forever at school?" She didn't say anything. But she's a very smart girl. At nine she already reads and writes English fluently, surfs the internet by herself, has a dozen Facebook profiles where she pretends to be different older people, and speaks two languages.

There is a word for what the bully in this scenario has. In high register Khmer it's called "Nachak," and in high register Thai it is called "Anachak." The root word being the same "Ana" in her name "Ariana." In common every day Khmer it's called "Anach" which is the word we'll use, which basically has the same meaning as "Ana" – power, privilege, might, force.

Anach is something you earn or gain, usually by several means, such as via respect, with honour, or by force. Anach is the opposite of being passive, obedient, receptive, and abiding: characteristics of a common stock peasant. What Anach you earn can be lost to someone with more Anach than you.

I forgot about Ariana's bully problem because she doesn't speak about it. So after about a month I asked her casually how her bully problem was. She says to me: "Oh I took care of it like you guys said. He got me mad one day, so I kicked him in the shin and pushed him to the floor in front of the teacher. He doesn't bully anybody anymore." That's my nine year old girl cousin.

Anachak

So way back in circa 1200AD there was this illiterate hillbilly Mongol named Temujin. Temujin was the son of a chief of some nomadic tribe, which meant practically nothing in the eyes of Imperial China. He was a nobody, and his people were nobodies to Imperial China.

The Mongols were a worthless stock of people. They were divided into incoherent nomadic clans and tribes that spent their time fighting with each other. But that changed when Temujin came. Temujin had successfully forced the many clans and tribes into a single Coherent entity with a single vision, and their unified sight was set on Imperial China down south.

The synergy of Temujin's Horde quickly liquidated Imperial China. The Mongols slaughtered every Chinese in their path and burned down every city. Looting, plundering, and raping their way across China. Completely disregarding the status quo and laws of Imperial China.

From the perspective of the Imperial China, this Temujin guy was a terrorist, a barbarian, and a criminal who has absolutely no respect for the law and order of the Empire. From the perspective of the peasants of Imperial China, Temujin and his men were thieves, pirates, murderers, rapists, and just plain bad people one would hate and despise. I would hate them too if they raped my daughters, killed my men, and took my things and land.

But Temujin was different in the eyes of the Emperor of China. On that level, Temujin was a very real threat to the Emperor's Anach – his Power, his Privilege, his Dominion – over an entire civilization. On this level, Temujin and the Emperor were on equal terms, because the Emperor himself – and his ancestors – used the SAME "criminal" – Sinister – methodologies to gain their Imperial Status – their Anach.

China was quickly subdued into passive obedience under the Anach of Temujin, who came to be known as Genghis Khan.

Meanwhile in southern China at the time there lived two different feral ethnic tribes, one called the Tai tribes, and the other called the Yu tribes. Temujin's horde had entered southern China and made the lives of the Tai and Yu people miserable. Not wanting to live under such misery the Tai and Yu people migrated en masse into the Southeast Asian peninsula. The Yu people became known as the Viet who would later found the Vietnamese nation. The Tai people would later split into the Thai and the Lao who would found Thailand and Laos.

But the peninsula at the time was completely occupied by another empire, one called the Khmer Empire, based in the city of Angkor. The Tai and the Yu had observed the Mongols for some time and many of them were inspired becoming criminal War Lords.

The Khmer word for a "Pirate," or "Thief" or "Robber" is "Siam," which they called the Tai who – inspired by the Mongols – began to slaughter as many Khmers as they could, rape as many woman as they could, and take as much land as they could. About one hundred years later one of the Tai kingdoms that carved itself territory in the peninsula called Ayutthaya obliterated the Khmer Empire. The Khmer "Empire" fell. Most of their land was taken by the Tai, and the men loyal to Ayutthaya were put in power of the vanquished Cambodians.

Eventually the Tai kingdoms merged [by force] and became what is today called Thailand. The proper name of Thailand in Thai is: Ratcha [Realm] Anachak [Imperial/Regal] Thai, which would mean The Imperial Realm of the Thai. The proper name of what is today the kingdom of Cambodia in Khmer is: Preah [Worshipful] Reachea [Realm] Nachak [Imperial/Regal] Kampuchea [Cambodia], which means the Worshipful Imperial Realm of Cambodia.

So the words Anachak, and Nachak here properly has the quality of Imperial or Royal Authority/Power. The two words are themselves shortened forms of a conjunction of two Pali words: Anachakka, or in Sanskrit it is: Anachakra.

We already know what the word "Ana" means: Power, Authority, Privilege, Might, Force. But what does the word Chakka/Chakra in the word mean? Chakra means "Wheel," and in the West this word is most often profanely associated with some sort of occult centers found in the body.

In its native cultural/mythos matrix a Chakra was a weapon many devas/gods used to kill and enforce their divine authority with. It is a bladed disc which spins, and they throw it like a ninja star. Thus the word "chakra" in Anachakra symbolizes the Ultimate Authority, since nothing is more powerful than a chakra baring Deva. Anachakra is unchallenged Power or absolute Authority. In every day usage this word is truncated into "Anach."

Imperium

In Khmer the word Anach is not exclusive to political matters. As in a king with Anach has unchallenged Power. The word is also used with the military. An army with Anach is an army with the power and means to do whatever they want unchallenged, or if they are challenged, they quickly liquidate the challenger.

But Anach is also used in other ways. I sometimes get into arguments with my mother and try to talk back to her. She'll get upset and point a finger at me and say something like: "Watch it! I gave you life. I'm you're mother. I have Anach over you." That's the only time she'll use the pronoun "I" with me.

Or my feeble 80 year old grandmother. She has a hard time walking at her age, but that matriarch has Anach over about 50 people. It doesn't matter if your 50 years old. If you talk back to her or don't do what she says, or look at her funny, she'll beat you with her walking cane. But for as long as I have been alive, I have never seen anybody in my family even raise a voice at her or complain when she gives orders.

And they aren't orders as in daily chores either. They are orders like: "Me and my sisters found you a wife – she's related – you're getting married next month." Or something like: "Me and my sisters don't like how your husband has become, let's get you a divorce and find you a new mate." Or one of my boy cousins was doing bad in school and getting into trouble. So she ordered his mom: "Pull my grand son out of school. I hear school isn't his path. Put him to work." And the following month – to my cousin's glee – his mom let him drop out of high school and he went to work for a family business.

Cops also have Anach. When you ride a car with my mom you'll hear her complain every time she sees a cop car: "Look at them, these peasants in uniform act high and mighty like they have Anach. God I hate them. If we were in the old country I'd shoot their heads off." I'd have to remind her: "But mom, there is no more 'old country.' Some revolution destroyed it remember? Beside they keep us safe." Then she'll say angrily: "Don't you talk back to me. Keep us safe my ass. Is giving me tickets keeping me safe?"

In a given city the police force does have Anach, in the sense that they can run red lights, drive over the speed limit, and get away with breaking the law, because in that given city, they are the law. So Anach also has the feel or value of one who is beyond or above the law. One who makes rules and enforces rules, but don't need to live by such rules themselves.

Gangbangers in a city also have Anach. Especially in neighborhoods they dominate and control. In some cities gangs are the power and law and who cops fear. In other words their rule, power, authority over a people – residence – is the highest in what domain they control.

So these are the many meanings of Anachakra. The ancient Romans had a word of similar essence to this word. It was Imperium which had the exact same essential meaning referring to a person's "Power," "Status," and "Authority." We will use the word Imperium or Personal Imperium interchangeably with Anach hereon.

From Gangs To Empires

All empires begin as the assertion of somebody's Anach or Personal Imperium over a group of others. Usually by force. Most empires also begin very small as "seeds." This seed usually consists of a coherent group of people with a certain amount of ambition and disregard for established law, order, and orthodoxy; and who are willing to use whatever force to actualize and materialize their ambitions.

I have a few years of personal experience with gangs. Back in the day when I was still in high school, we started a gang from scratch. It was technically a tagger crew which at first we called "SFA" standing for "Strictly For Asians."

We made it an Asian crew for a reason. When you start up a group of any kind, you need to attract people that resonate with the vibe of your group. You use things people strongly identify with to attract them. And sense there were quite a few Asians at our school, we wanted to bring all of those Asians into a coherent ordering of people. In other words, the "Asian" part was only a means to an end.

We all lived in a certain area in the city, which unfortunately already had two other tagger crews who each controlled half of the area we lived at. As soon as the other kids found out we had organized into a crew, the two big crews told us we can't be tagging in their territories or they'll bomb on us, which meant they'd regulate or enforce their Anach by kicking our asses. This meant our SFA crew had no Anach in the area.

So in this beginning scenario, you have a territory dominated by a regime which has established and implemented its rule via its law and order, which had the power to regulate and enforce those laws. It sounds like a stupid law – not being able to scribble three letters on walls in areas they control – but that law gives these crews benefits. In the world of high school tagging, getting your letters up translates to Fame and Popularity at school. This Fame translates into Social Capital at school, which means that the boys in the crew get to have sex with any girls they want, and the girls in the crew sets trends, gets admired and attention, and their pick of top status boyfriends on campus.

So you can see that there is in fact a human social order present with the same basic natural-sociological rules at play that you would see in a troop of apes or any social animal. The tagging in itself is just a means to a natural end. In the same sense that many animals will tag their pheromone sent in a territory for the same benefits.

This means two important things. Those at school or in this social order who are passive, obedient to the established rules and laws or are afraid to challenge the rule of the reigning crew don't get the sex, the fame, the attention, and the power. This also means that those who do challenge and disregard such arbitrary rules and laws, may gain that same Privilege and power if they have it in their nature to challenge such establishments.

Thus we can say that in this scenario there exists three sets of people: 1) The Ruling Regime; 2) The Peasantry (the passive and abiding population/students), and 3) the Coherent threats to the regime's power, security, and interests.

How does a start up crew gain the favor and attention of the peasantry to generate enough Glamour to appear in their eyes as a potential new regime of overlords? By challenging the ruling regime.

Our start up SFA crew one night all went out and crossed out the tags of one of the ruling crews of the area we lived at, called DOSK which stood for "Destroying Other Spray Kingz." We place above their crossed tags our SFA.

The next day at school our SFA and the kids from DOSK almost got into a big fight. After an exchange of vulgarities the leaders of both crews agreed to have a Battle. It was agreed that the winner of the Battle would absorb the losing crew, which would not exist anymore. To prepare for a potential win we changed SFA to mean "Sent From Above" so that it would be open to all races. It was agreed that the other crew DTH [Destroying The Heavens] would judge the Battle which would be for two nights. A Battle in tagger talk is when two crews go out at night to vandalize as many walls and freeway dividers and everything else. The more area you cover the more points and the better your graffiti style is the more points also. You can lose a Battle if you get your crew name up everywhere, but the letters and writing looks like shit.

The next day all of us in SFA made phone calls for back up. All of us had cousins who had friends in very large Asian gangs. We told them when the Battle days were and that we needed skilled writers to tag up SFA with us. Our back up agreed.

We won. DOSK was liquidated and their membership was absorbed into SFA. Their leader became Co-leader with our leader. This was a strategic move because we needed more members to Battle DTH, and having DOSK's leader still in joint power meant that he and his crew would still benefit from the Fame, popularity, and sex.

A month later our new and bigger SFA crew had a meeting. Our plan was to take out DTH to take their turf. But DTH was what is called a tag-banger crew, which meant that they were a cross between a graffiti crew and a gang that used guns and street gang methodology. This meant that battling DTH would take more than vandalizing walls. We'd risk getting into fist fights, and getting shot at. So before we challenged DTH we all made our diplomatic phone calls to all the gangs our friends and cousins were affiliated with to see if they would back us up if DTH shooting at us. Our Asian gang contacts said they would have no problems donating their boyz to regulate. The bigger Mexican gangs wanted a deal. They were interested in having the area as a market for their drugs. The leaders said that with DTH out of the way, our SFA can monopolize the whole area and sell their drugs for them. They liked the idea and said that if one of our SFA guys gets shot at, they'll declare a gang war on DTH and kill them all.

In this case, when you have back up, and you challenge a crew, you cross their tags out, and you put your crews name up make a plus sign, then list your back ups. This is a tagger way of informing your enemy crew you declare war on what kind of fire power you are working with. We had a list of the biggest Asian and Mexican gangs surrounding the area when we cross out DTH.

At school there was a confrontation and the boyz in SFA went into their intimidation mode threatening that every body in DTH would be killed back our back ups if they brought guns into this Battle. DTH was scared, so they agreed to a clean tagger battle. The winner takes the whole area. The loser stops tagging for any crew besides ours or we'd kick they're asses or kill them. We won domination of the whole area and prospered. Our members at school got the first pick of girlfriends or boyfriends, became the most popular kids on camps, we set the trends and called the shots.

If you look closely at this very simple scenario you will notice that during all the battles and negotiations, the peasantry – all the other kids at school – were never brought up. They were never a factor in anything. Regimes and crews can fall and change, but as a people those students/peasants remain the same passive and obedient people, abiding by the rules set by whatever ruling party comes to power.

This is because it is in the very nature of the Peasant stock common mundane to be passive law abiding subjects because they want to be safe and unharmed. It is in a peasants very inner nature to just want to be left alone to eek out his mundane living in safety. If that means to follow a set of rules and laws, so be it, as long as they are not molested or bothered. If they are bothered they cry and beg to be left alone. Peasant students just want to be left alone to do their school work in peace and ace a test. It's their only few ambitions in life they have, besides maybe finding a girlfriend or boyfriend. Such mundane ambitions.

Peasant stock common citizens just want to be left alone to work on their farms in peace. Just to labour and toil for some State, Church, or whatever Power comes and goes without being harmed and molested or bothered.

As a common peasant student at school, taggers and gangbangers are indeed unlawful kids who are the bad influencing kids their mothers tell them not to be friends with. But when such bad kids use their unlawful ambitions to dominate a school, it's the same peasant kids that submit passively without much complaint to the change of social regimes.

And it is the same way in the much larger arena of politics and empires. From the mundane peasant perspective, Genghis Khan and the Thai War Lords were indeed outlaws and criminals who has no regards or respect for other people's religious traditions and time honoured imperial laws of the land.

But it is the ambition for Anach – for Imperium – in people like Ganghis Khan and War Lords that drive them to risk their freedom and lives to be more than what they are, and to have more than what life has allotted them by default. In their unlawful struggle against arbitrary established empires and laws, they may often succeed in annihilating old power regimes. And in so doing, it's the same peasant stock mundanes that passively submit to such new Imperium as good, obedient, law abiding subjects/citizens.

Ganghis Khan didn't come out of his mother's womb as Emperor of humanity's largest empire. He was born poor, unknown, and uneducated. But he came out with something a common peasant doesn't have: Noble Ambitions and the Will and Determination to materialize those Ambitions with whatever force or die trying. Noble as above the petty ambitions of a mundane.

We don't hear too often in our modern era of terrorists, criminals, and outlaws fulfilling their Noble Ambitions and carving out their own countries, nations, and empires. But just because we don't here about such things, doesn't mean it doesn't happen. Hamas and Hezbollah are fine examples.

The FARC is an even better example. Back in the 80's the FARC began as a group of outlaws selling Columbian cocaine. Over 20 years of business, they invested their money into the proper venues to emerge as a militarized rebel movement which controls a third of Columbia.

The drug cartels in Mexico are another fine example of the illusion of the Invincible State, and a criminal organizations transmutation from a group of outlaws to a future political regime. Last year the Mexican gangs killed over 27,000 people, which included state officials. This years they used their first car bomb. When the money slows, the crime flows. Each year that passes, the Mexican government has less money to fight off the gangs. These gangs have also infiltrated government branches. In our life time, we will see the failed state of Mexico fall into the hands of a new regime which once began as a street and prison gang of dope dealers.

Even the Oligarchies of America don't have a clean ancestral record. Many of the past Presidents of the US are related in some way to the Delano-Roosevelts. In olden times the Delanos were pirates and privateers.

Peasant Social Order

If I could invent a motto that reflects peasant social order it would be: "To serve, sustain and maintain." Those three things are what a peasant is born and bred to be good at, as it is their inner nature to serve, sustain, and maintain.

When I say "to serve" I don't really mean as a slave. I mean that you can pay these people money and they will work for you and your interests. If you had the ambition and Will To Power in life to be a millionaire businessman, you can pay a peasant barely enough per day to get by and you'd make him the happiest creature in the world. Because just getting by in life makes peasants happy, and having extra money after bills are paid to buy new commercial items, beer, a chocolate bar, new car, house or wife, or whatever they buy, is about as high as their ambitions go.

If it weren't for the fact that they are enticed like donkeys following a carrot on a stick with a certificate that gives them two or three dollars extra in their pay checks, I doubt your common mundane-peasant would even see any use in college. It isn't like they graduate college smarter then when they went into college. Most seem to come out stupider, in debt up to their eye balls, and most don't even get a career in their field because they don't know how to. I know a peasant girl who went to college to study as a biologist. She is the daughter of one of my aunt's friends. I told her she was a peasant and so it wasn't like she would become a real biologist anyways. But she didn't listen. She thought she was all special because she got accepted in a big college. She did major in biology at this big college. Today she is a receptionist working for a little over minimum wage, and she is near bankruptcy.

When I say “to sustain” what I mean is that when somebody creative comes up with a new idea, concept, religion, or whatever, it’s these peasants that will BELIEVE and thus give life/sustenance to that new idea. Without peasants willing to believe in anything, we wouldn’t have a Moses, Muhammad, Marx, or Mao.

Give them an idea and they will Believe in it without even bothering to question you. Pull as many gods and spirit creatures out of your ass and there is always a peasant out there willing to believe in them. You can make believe an entire fantasy world or 12 heavens, with fairies, dragons, aliens, and unicorns, and Nature has provided you a peasant out there somewhere who will give life to your crazy ideas. In essence, Mother Nature has made it very easy for shysters, con-artists, crooks, criminals, and charlatans to make it big in life and become rich. Because peasants exist.

When I say “to maintain” I mean that when you make a rule and shake your fist at them or threaten them with jail time, peasants will obediently maintain your laws you make up indefinitely without ever breaking them. They don’t consider the fact that such rules you make up is implemented to maintain status quo – your Status – at their expense. They will just follow whatever laws are forced on them because these peasants have weak hearts where they are afraid of everything, especially guns, violence, and risk of harm.

Peasant social order is pretty much the same wherever you go. Things are very simple. Beliefs in the form of religion, gods, truths, and facts plays a big central role in peasant society. Just like there is a Catholic Church in every corner of Latin America, there is a Pagoda in ever corner of Buddhist Asia.

Religion to such peasantile humans is simplified into a panhandling relationship of a beggar asking gods for things like protection, money, and love. It doesn’t matter what the religion is, or how sophisticated the religion may be. The peasant mind will always reduce it into a security blanket that makes them feel safe, and into pitiful beggary.

Even science isn’t safe from peasantification. There aren’t any gods to beg in empirical science for protection, money, and love. But those peasants have found away around that. With a little misunderstanding of quantum physics, the universe can be begged at for gifts. And like the maintainers they naturally are, if scientific theories are written down, it automatically becomes an unbreakable law that is Believed and Followed.

If you observe peasants in their natural mundane habitats, you will notice that they love being given ideas to believe. They make Beliefs the center of their lives. Beliefs in peasant social order is the glue that loosely holds them together. This gives them some sort of emotional sense of belonging to something which appeases our primal needs as a social animal. They huddle together in these powerless incoherent social groups based on shared belief. If you believe in UFO, there is a group for that. If you believe in gods, there’s a group for that. If you believe in no gods, there also a group for that. If you are conservative or liberal, there are groups for those too. And when Peasants get together in their incoherent social groups all they do is talk and preach about their beliefs for hours, debating, arguing, interpreting signs and wonders.

Peasants can make a religion out of anything. Throw a metal disc in the sky and take a picture of it, and peasants will make a UFO religion out of it. Wear big footed feet things and leave big foot impressions on the ground, and they will make a big foot religion out of it. Float a log in Loch Ness, and it will become a cult icon of a new Belief system. Draw pictures in your corn field, and your crop circles automatically become holy messages from gods and intergalactic space brothers. Look at India: deformed girls with two heads and eight legs instantly become gods. The craziest most unkempt ascetic instantly becomes a mahaguru. The more bizarre your ideas are, the more peasants will believe it. Even deformed animals aren't spared from the beggary and deification of peasants. If a cow is born with feet growing out of its head, it's most definitely a god that answers prayers.

Peasants are self loathing by default. One of the things that makes them forget about hating themselves is hating others around them. Make your beliefs and religions so that they can bigot and hate other people with, and it will become a world religion. This is because when others are bigoted and made to look stupider than them, they look and feel better about their mundane selves. Nobody wants to be a worthless peasant, not even peasants. That's why the stupid idea of democracy does so well. Because it gives these peasants the impression that they are kings ruling themselves. Even though they actually never get to vote for anything significant. And when they do get to vote, it's usually them picking between two different policies that equally subjugates them further.

In peasant society Beliefs are the essence of their worldview. It is from beliefs that their actions in life arises. So when you observe peasants in their natural habitat, you see that their Beliefs dictates how they act, behave, and how they interact with others in life. For example if they believe in gods they will physically meet to pray together. Or if they share a belief system on morals and conservatism, they will meet to actually debate and argue with each other. And the actions that arises from their Beliefs are incoherent and aimless. By that I mean that it is a lose assembly of individual who get together just close enough to mingle and talk with, but far enough so that nothing wyrdfully useful ever materializes.

And when a rule or dictation or law of behaviour or conduct arises in their social groups, their peasant alarm will go off. This is because although a peasant mindlessly accepts any Belief that sounds pleasing to it, peasants do not like to be told what to do. You have to force them to do things with threats of violence, assault and death, for them to accept rules and maintain them. Like stubborn cows inertly standing in one place must be kicked and pushed with force to move. And it is their natural aversion to rules that regulate their actions and behaviour that actually differs them from the Aristocracy.

Aristocratic Social Order

Unfortunately, the only aristocratic group of people I have to study and observe are my family and other families related to me; and from what books I have read, and the historical people I have studied about. The very essential difference between a peasant family/group and an aristocratic or oligarchic family is incoherency and coherency. That's as best as I can break it down into simple terms.

So in a peasant family things are incoherent and aimless. Belief is the bond. But in that peasant family you run into family problems if you are the husband and you try to tell your wife what to do. Your children will rebel if you try to tell them what to do. Everybody in a peasant family resists being told what to do, but the peasant family happily goes to church together to be indoctrinated. This is what I mean by "incoherency" in this context. Like carbon atoms resisting rules and structure that would turn them into a diamond. Instead they resist rules and structure, insisting they are free and independent, turning themselves into useless coal, that has no other value but to be burned for heat.

In my own family things are different. Beliefs don't play any significant role in the family. You can believe whatever you want or in nothing at all, as long as such beliefs don't affect the traditions and customs [rules and regulations] of the family. And there are hundreds of rules and traditions to be observed and followed. If you resist following such established rules or do not wish to live by them, then you are out of the family. Because these time tested rules were set into place for reasons: End Results from which all members benefit. You learn these traditions and customs as you grow and progress in the family.

One of the first things you are taught to do – as soon as you can barely speak – is to properly answer your elders. When ever any body older in age then you calls you, you say "yes" properly, not "what" or "huh?" Girls say "Jah" [yes] and boys say "bat" [yes]. The other thing you are taught before you can walk and speak is how to "Sapisuah" or it's called "Sadhu," or "Anjali" in Sanskrit. Sapisuah is the proper way to salute or greet an elder. It's when you clasp your palms together in front of your face. At nose level for people older than you. At eyebrow level when greeting your mother or grandmother or monk. Up to your forehead for the Buddha. By the time you are one year old, you can say jah or bat, and anjali your elders.

Other example of rules children learn to observe would be, if two people older than you are standing close to each other and you have to pass between them, you must do so by bowing your head lower then their heads and excuse yourself. If older people are talking, you don't. If the grandparents are in one room talking, you stay out of that room unless they call you. If an aunt or uncle, grandmother or grandfather asks you to do something, you must do it without complaining. If your mom tells you to do something and it's different from what one of the grandmothers tells you, you do what the older one said.

Each age grouping also have their own basic essential function or core duties. Kids go to school to learn to read and write. If you are 16 years and older and you suck at school you got to work for the family. If you graduate school and have no goals in life, you immediately go work at one of the family businesses until you are 30 or have learned a skill. When you graduate or if you turn around 30 you will start your own business with cousins or other family members. When you are ready to start your own business, the family will consider your business idea, and if approved the elders go around to other family members to collect money to give to you. You pay everybody back with your revenue. If you are family or married into the family and a member desired to start their own business, it is your duty to facilitate in any way either financially or by providing contacts. All family members must try to not work jobs not owned by family or friends. 50 year olds retire and take care of the old ones. The old ones cook and take care of the very little ones [the children].

Interfamilial coherency is also present in an aristocratic style social order. When most of my family first came to America during the 80's they came with nothing. They lost half of their relatives to murder, they lost all of their land [most of the land of Batambang province], they lost all of their political power. But they had one thing: Coherency or Organization.

One of the first things the family did when they came here was seek out certain clubs and join them. These are private social clubs that families are invited to join. Different clubs have different requirements for affiliation. Most require a large membership fee, but since we had respected members of our family inside some of these social clubs, the family joined easily.

Some other groups and races have similar social clubs. The Filipinos have one of their own. I have friends who are Filipinos, and the rich and well to do are usually almost always members of these social clubs, while the poor Filipinos don't even know they exist. What these clubs do is they are based on Mutual Aid and Mutual Prosperity. They will first help you get jobs, if you have skills they help you start up businesses. They help you learn how to borrow money from banks. They find you contacts. Then when you prosper you invest your money and time into collective club projects like joint businesses, mutual investment projects, etc.

These clubs are not religions or cults. But they have a lot of rules to follow. This is the difference between a peasant gathering and a gathering of aristocrats. One is entirely based on beliefs which is devoid of rules and regulations. The other is the opposite where they could care less for beliefs, but enforce rules and behavioural regulations for End Results.

So on any level of society, whether it's the familial level, the club level, the city level, or the national/imperial level, the social ordering of peasants and aristocrats are essentially different down to the core. Peasants preoccupy themselves with beliefs, opinions, and aimless ideas. Their gatherings are gatherings which expresses their inclination for their beliefs. Whereas for those of a high social class, such people are more preoccupied with Traditions, Customs, Modes of Conduct, Organization, Rules, and Regulations, all of which have been constructed so that the following of such rules and customs manifests mutual benefit and End Results.

The closest thing in Western society that is like these social clubs I know, which my family also joined for the same reasons is Freemasonry. A long time ago Freemasonry was open exclusively to the Nobility and Aristocracy, and it still is in many parts of the world. Unlike an association of peasants where Beliefs dominate. Freemasonry is almost devoid of beliefs. But Freemasonry is riddled with strict rules, regulations, traditions, customs, and oaths. There are a lot of rules to follow, but the following of those oaths and rules is what makes Freemasonry work to the benefit and advantage of all members. It has nothing to do with Belief. It has to do with aims and objectives set down, and rules and regulations members must follow if those aims and objectives are to be actualized. There is coherency, organization, order, and direction present.

Even something like Buddhism, which is a religious philosophy, in my family becomes a system of rules, regulations, traditions, and customs devoid of Belief. And these rules of action and deeds have been set in place by family ancestors because they manifest real world results that the family benefits from collectively and the individual adherent benefits from personally.

Where Buddhism to a peasant is a religion where one begs the Buddha for gifts of good karma, an auspicious future life, gifts of money, good fortune, and lovers. Buddhism to a noble person – who has an innate will and ambition to be more than he/she is – is a system of rules, regulations, customs and traditions to be followed and applied, such that the Noble Person develops in mind, perception, and evolves into a new and better type of person. For the aristocracy Buddhism is a means to transmute basal society into ever Noble ideal states. Simply stated, for the peasant Buddhism is the submission and worship of the Buddha. For the Aristocrat Buddhism is a means to become a Buddha.

It is only from a peasant's perspective that religion may sometimes be interpreted to be some tool of mass control. This is because it is in the peasant's very nature to resist rules and regulations that controls their actions and behaviour. They will resist all rules and laws unless under threat of punishment. Which is why old world religions and secular politics dedicates so much energy in punishing people, because to a peasants mind, you aren't their boss and you can't tell them what to do unless they work for your for money, or unless you have a gun. It is this resistance and inability to understand the wyrdful and aeonic End Result and purpose of rules or action, and regulations of behaviour that is the natural difference between a peasant and a Nobleman.

In the same exact sense that the following of rules and regulations of placement or the rejection of such rules by carbon atoms wyrdfully materializes either coal or diamond. In the very same exact way that a group of anarchists that jibber jabber, debate, philosophize, and intellectualize anarchists Beliefs and opinions is worthless when compared to an army with no beliefs but with potent coherency and organization via the strict observance and execution of strict rules and regulation.

Traditions and rules are hard to follow, whereas Beliefs are easy to adopt and agree with, but an army exerts more causal force onto the world, and has more power and synergetic force to manifest its Will to the benefit of the whole. It doesn't take much intelligence and mental effort to agree with an opinion. It takes the Will of a god to engineer an Empire.

One way of life, or one species of ethos: Peasantile Ethos, produces useless mundanes. The other produces people who can actualize their Will, their highest self image, and their highest image of an ideal social order.

Even in something like Satanism, you can see and feel the difference between the Peasantile Satanism and the Aristocratic Satanism. Peasantile Satanism is more concerned exclusively with Beliefs. Peasant Satanists will accept any belief in agreement with their world views without much fuss, but tell them how to live their lives and what to do, and they will cry, bitch, complain, and resist, claiming that they have a right to do as they please.

The Satanism of the ONA is a breed apart and has the characteristics of a Noble and Aristocratic institution. It is not based on or does not preoccupy itself with Beliefs and opinions. It concentrates itself on action, praxis, methodology, ways of life. It focuses its energy on rule, regulations, Traditions, Customs, and Kulture, such as the Law of the Sinister-Numen which is a set of rules of act, duty, and deeds.

It has set itself aims, objectives, and goals, and understands that its Sinister Dialectic and rules of life when followed will gradually actualize such aims, objectives, and directives. It is not a religion or even philosophy with a set of theistic or atheistic beliefs. It is a means with which the Initiate expresses his or her natural and inner Noble Ambition of self evolution. Simply stated, peasantile Satanism is the deification and worship of Belief of a Satan – whether that Satan is a symbol or god. The Aristocratic Satanism of the ONA is a means whereby the Initiate Becomes Satan.

If you understand the essence of this difference, then you will begin to realize that a peasantile social order, such as a democracy, republic, or whatever is aimless, pointless, and preoccupied with Beliefs, Ideologies, and personal rights and liberties, which does nothing more than perpetuate its own existence and status quo. Just as the simpleton peasants are resistant to rules and traditions and declares how they have the right to do as they please. But they willingly Believe in the most agreeable and convenient dogma. Can you imagine what an ant colony would be if every ant demanded its right to do as it pleased? Ants make up roughly 25% of the earth's biomass. They are nature's most successful organism.

A Noble or Aristocratic social order, such as a kingdom, inherently seeks to become more than it is. A little territory isn't enough for a war lord after a while. He will struggle to make it a kingdom. A kingdom isn't enough for a king after a while. He will struggle to make it an empire. And empire isn't enough for an emperor after a while. Like Genghis Khan and Alexander the Great, they will struggle to take the world. The world won't be enough after a while. We will – because of our Noble Will and Ambition – struggle for more: the solar system, the galaxy. A democracy and republic is happy with itself as long as its status quo is safe. Usually democracies end up dying and not achieving anything great to be replaced by another political organism.

Sinister Kindred

If I could put the essence of our Sinister Ethos into one easy statement it would be: "Total disregard of peasant world order for self interest."

As a member of a gang, all I could see when looking over the city I once lived in were my self interests and my little crew's interests. I could care less if those peasants, or citizens believe my interests and ambitions were "criminal," "bad," or pointless to them. I didn't give a shit one way or the other what those other students thought about my interests and ambitions. My crew and I went after our aims and goals anyways, and we ended up dominating the entire school.

Do you think Al Capone actually gave a shit about what affects alcohol has on people's morals? You think he gave a shit about mundane prohibition laws. All that was burning inside of him were his interests and ambitions, and he used ruthless power of Will to materialize his ambitions and interests by any means. From that Will came power and wealth and domination of an entire state and its underground economy.

Do you think Temujin gave a shit about laws dictated by some Chinese Emperor? Or the law and order Chinese peasants lived by? He just burned for his interests and ambition, and he skillfully and ruthlessly materialized them becoming the leader of one of the largest empires our species has known. One in 200 humans alive today are genetically descendents of this one ambitious criminal who burned down entire cities, slaughtered whole masses of people, plundered, and raped his way to the top of the human pile. Rather than be punished by some god or karma, Nature rewarded him with absolute power, and gave him the power to influence and steer the human race via his empire, and he got to pass his genes down to 1 out of 200 humans today.

Crime only exists to peasants who are forced to live such laws. Laws and order which are designed to perpetuate and benefit old power structures and oligarchic families. To a king, there is no such thing as a criminal, there is only a threat to his law and order and thus his status, power, and privilege: his Imperium. All that talk about "crime" is negative rhetoric aimed at his subjects to keep them from engaging in such criminal activities: the same criminal activities he or his ancestors used to gain power and domination.

How many States or Kingdoms today did not come into existence from acts of crime? From murdering natives. From enslaving humans. From plunder. From stealing land. From military rape and slaughter campaigns. How many Kingdoms and States fell to the same acts whereby another regime came into power by murdering, raping, stealing. Of all the States and Empires to have ever existed, the two most ruthless, most murderous, most enslaving, most plunderous: the British Empire and the United States have evolved and progressed our human species forward ahead into higher states of being, standards of living, possibilities, and greater potential than any other civilization our species has known. Such irony.

So we see that sinister ethos – that ethos or inner essence within certain people – to ambitiously actualize one's interest for oneself and one's descendents by any force and means necessary produces human civilization on this large scale. And we see on this scale that such civilizations often become kingdoms and empires. So we see that the section of humanity we refer to as royalty their warriors, and descendents – the Nobility – are given a certain kind of high status and respect. When they are in fact nothing more than successful criminals with unchallenged power and authority. This is the essential secret and difference between the Nobility and Peasants.

We can also see that in such times – for the majority of our human species – that peasants remain fixed in one place due to lack of locomotive means, thus their genes stagnate. It is the genes of the Nobility – those who advance humanity gradually with their civilizations – that introduces their Noble genes and blood to other sections of humanity. In the same sense that the most sinister Alpha Male ape – who has proven the worthiness of his genes by gaining such status – is rewarded by Mother Nature to imbue her next generation of apes with his Noble genes and blood.

It can be said thus that the sinister, the criminal, the ambitious, those who dare to transcend above mundaneness to become more than they are, are rewarded by Nature with the power to evolve humanity forward and upwards to new heights and potential. The peasantry have remain the same basal breed of subjects, servants, sustainers, and maintainers. Both are needed. We each just need to Realize which we are.

Which of these two breeds of humans are we who are of the ONA? We may be human, but are we peasants? Do we understand the nature and essence of what a mundane – a peasant – is, and do we know we are different? Does it really matter if they do not understand us? Have they every understood? Should it matter that they do not agree with our Sinister Ethos, our Sinister Way, and our Sinister Methodologies? Would we as a species have come this far if it weren't for our ancient sinister kindred and their bloody campaigns? What then will push our posterity and the rest of human kind further to greater ideals, greater potential, and greater heights?

Regardless of what we call ourselves, or what we call our Way of Life, we are as we are: each blood progeny of past great men, great warriors, great criminals, and the Sinister Elite of the human species. It is the way of nature that such kinds of individuals who have proven their blood and genes in the arena of life, should sire the next generation, if Nature's Imperative is to exist continuously for so many billions of years in the past, and for countless more in the future.

Every Noble Warrior, King, and Queen's Blood – the best bred of the species – converges and flows in our Sinister veins. This inner quality, essence, will, drive – this Sinister Nature – did not comes out of nowhere. It is in your blood and ancestry. Peasants breed peasants. We are a breed apart. This isn't just rhetoric. Study Nature and the world. Pay attention closely to people, their ancestry, and quality. Study closely how States and Nations come into existence and observe what tactics are used. You will also soon come to Realize that the most successful of criminals in the past, became the greatest of kings and emperors whose blood flows now in you. And their criminal and Sinister Nature expresses itself through you, as it does through all of us. Because in essence we are all aeonically related by blood to the few ruthless sinister criminals of the past.

Such that we – of the ONA and our kindred – do in fact represent a Sinister Nobility. Thus we each possess or should Realize our own personal Imperium. To understand that we are our own power and authority. And that it is demeaning and unbecoming of our kind to be subjects of and obedient to another House's rules.

THE PACK

9352 bf (before fayen)

South of the Caucus Mountains

They were waiting for Frata and Rich to pack their horses and camels.

“Come on, damn.” Said Chloepatra. She was an impatient person. Red Rich was slow and was the type to over kill or over plan things.

“Alright, alright... let me pack a second camel with more arrows...” Said Rich irritated.

“Dude, Rich, we’re just going over them hills to scope out the Hebrew tribe there... you’re acting like we’re going to battle them.” Chloepatra says.

“Alright, fine... better safe then sorry.” Rich mumbles.

Kayla the Merciless just looks at Frata the Barbarian, who just shrugged his shoulders. Frata had packed his horse with his two swords and a lot of water. It was a semi-desert you know... where the tribe was camped out for the moment.

Aryanopolis sort of fell to ruin a hundred years ago because of a freak drought, and all of the citizens migrated away going their separate ways. There were the three major groups that went to Europe, Russia, and India respectively.

The Longmen Clan thought the Europe and Russia bound fellows were crazy, since it was the ice ages so they followed the India bound people... but along the way the Longmen Tribe was rejected en mass because they had a weird religion where they were culling people left and right for their Dark Gods.

The Progenitor of the Tribe – Marc Anthony the Longshanks... said to the Aryans nations – “Fine, whatever, we’ll just go our own way and find our own place thru Arabia! Maybe to Egypt or something... I hear there is a nice river their.” Now we’re lost in this god forsaken desert.

The Longshanks has a hazy history. Legend has it that long ago his father was a son of Uther Pendragon. At his death bed Uther gave his kingdom to his eldest son Arthur, while Marc Anthony’s father and mum got Shropshire... a mere rural fief thingy at the border of the illiterate lands of the Welsh barbarians. Unhappy Old Longshanks set out to top his brother by taking the whole world. Thus they left Shrops and with a band of loyal Old Guards slaughtered foreign kingdoms and established a civilization called Aryanopolis far in the Afghan highlands; which Anthony Longshanks had inherited.

The Great Drought had destroyed the once great city-state of Aryanopolis. And the Clansmen wandered in the wilderness. What’s worse is the Longmen Clan is mostly composed of the once great army men of Aryanopolis and its secret agents... which meant the Tribe had a weird shortage of female folk to breed with... and women were needed... if the Clan is to survive the ice age.

“Wait for me guys... wait, you need me...”

The Critter ran with his skinny sword in hand... which most doubt he even knows how to use... and mounted one of Rich’s camels.

Critter was this weirdo. He’s one of those guys who hangs out with you and nobody in your cool group knows quite why, but we’re all to nice to tell him to go away and the only reason why you let him tag along was because of who he knows... yeah. That’s the Critter. The Critter was best friends with Longshanks himself.

We call him the Critter because he can make these raccoon and duck noises with his mouth when we go hunting... so it’s like he talks to animals. He wants us to call him by his proper Tribe name – “The Beast Master...” but we just call him Beasty Boy or Critter. He has this natural proclivity for making music with tree stumps and drawing these nice cave paintings... but hardly the killer type.

“Awe, no, not you Critter...” Chloepatra whines.

“Well, we do need somebody to translate Frata’s foreign speech anyways. Beasty Boy is one of very few people that understands besides me...” Kayla said.

“See...” Critter says, looking at Chloepatra. Chloepatra just rolls her eyes at him.

“Let’s go then.” Says Chloepatra.

And the pack set off to the land beyond the mountains to check out the local tribe there for intelligence.

Chloepatra rides a horse with the Merciless One... Kayla. Both in chinchilla fur ugg boots and stylish cavemen wardrobe. Chloepatra is decked out in gold and jade.

She and Red Richard the Sinistar aren’t natives of Aryanopolis. They came with the Mongol Hoard that nearly destroyed Aryanopolis, but she and Red Richard had defected from the Eastern Barbarians and fought under the banner of Longshanks in the midst of the great war. Red Rich was a uniform lieutenant of the Hoard. Thru her ruthless campaign, foreign yet effective tactics and Red Richard’s military wisdom they had chased the Mongols out, gaining them favor among the Clan.

It wasn’t Chloepatra’s tactical maneuvers that caught the attention of Longshanks and his Old Guards tho. Chloepatra was literate and came with the brilliant wisdom of those Eastern peoples... something Marc Anthony saw a great value in. As such fresh insights would help the Clan. She quickly gained herself an audience and bond with the one they call El Darko Loco the Bruce... the Generalissimo and Vizier of the Longmen... even being spiritually adopted by Longshanks himself as his Dark Princess.

El Darko Loco the Bruce was a gentleman barbarian. Draped in black grizzly bear fur, a wolverine head dress and a penetrating stare. Soft spoken, and always thinking in the sinister. He was generalissimo of the Clan’s Phantom Hoard... himself a mysterious shadow or phantom of sorts... as all the ancients of the Clan were... are... his war campaigns earned him the name El Darko Loco... the Evil and Crazy One.

Thus, as satellites around Longshanks was the heart of the Clan that kept the wandering Tribe alive, which calls itself “The Pack”... the Vizier El Darko Loco the Bruce and his men... the Teacher Thoth-Aten-Ra who is the Light House of the Clan... Chloepatra the Princess of Darkness and her men... and the peculiar Kayla the Merciless and her faction.

Kayla the Merciless... much like Chloepatra was not a native of Aryanopolis. She and Frata the Barbarian with their people merged with the remnants of the Longmen during their wandering. An enigma who stubbornly does things on her own terms with an opaque stare not ever revealing what true intentions she may have. Like Chloepatra, the Merciless One somehow caught the eye of the shadowy Longshanks and was adopted as his dark daughter. With her title, she works for The Pack alone, as she wills... but sees no worth in the common Longmen that follow behind... whom she despises as the true cause of the ruin of Aryanopolis.

Only the Longshanks, with his ancient eyes and second sight, knows where the Merciless One’s loyalty lies, and understands what she does and for whom. She and her faction looks up to the old mad man of White Star Mountain for their spiritual guidance. She looks to a future in which Aryanopolis will one day rise again for the Pack to a greater glory... for Longshanks, so that, before he passes away of old age, that he might see what he once made blossom into a living seed of a future empire.

Amongst the Clan there is divisions and factions. Some of the Longmen wish for a new king. Some wish to usurp the throne and be king. Other believe El Darko Loco should lead the people. Chloepatra herself wishes to immortalize Longshanks as a the eternal figure head but desires an oligarchy of The Pack... but there broods among some of the Merciless One's faction who wish to make the Dark Princess a Living Goddess for a future people. What thinks the Merciless One herself? "Give me gold... and I care not who is King." She says.

As they rode off towards the hills, Kayla heard the gallop of a horse from behind and looked. She whispers in Chloepatra's ear – "Your boy friend is coming."

"Ukh...great... not my stalker."

It was Zoophilip the Berserk One. A despised critic among the Longmen. The Berserk One is like an annoying fly that won't go away. A major vocal critic who condemns and attacks the common citizens (in a trollish manner) of Aryanopolis for the degeneration and ruin of Aryanopolis... out of an uncommon passion for the once great kingdom perhaps... which gains him much hatred. Chloepatra and Kayla secretly values his criticism, as they believes the common Longmen are blinded by a false sense of greatness... even in times of obvious ruin of the old kingdom. He is annoying nonetheless. He has the superpower of totally destroying meeting forums with his sidekick Jimmy the Jumping Bean.

"Good morning Chloe... how are you today?" Says Zoophilip. Chloepatra just rolls her eyes, as she usually does. He laughs to himself, pleased inside that he successfully annoyed Chloepatra so quickly.

"Hey best mate!" Critter says excited, holding his hand up for a hi five from Zooboy. Zooboy has his moronic grin and hi fives his buddy Beasty Boy.

"Retars... I swear." Chloepatra says quietly to Kayla the Merciless.

"Come Sta Fratello Frata?" He says to Frata the Barbarian.

"Se il mio cavallo fosse vicino a voi, farei passare la mia spada attraverso il vostro occhio." Frata replies to Zooboy.

Zooboy snickers to himself... "Hey Critter, can you translate that for me?"

"He said – If my horse was any closer to you I'd shove my sword in your eye." Critter translates.

ZIONIST FRONT

After much riding the small scouting party had entered a big crack in between the walls of a cliff... like a passage way, and stuff or something.

The girls and Red Rich were up in the front, while the other three were chattering way in the back about utter crap... as they have been for the past 3 hours non stop... oblivious to the Zoggish danger that lurked unseen.

“What’s this I see?” Rich said, riding up to scribbles on the passage wall... “Come here guys?”

Chloepatra and Kayla hops off their horse to look, carefully... so as not to get dirt on their chinchilla uggs which were hella expensive, even for caveman days.

“OMG! It’s in ancient Yiddish!” Said Chloe.

The three look at each other and said together at the same time – “The ZOG!”

“Can you read it Rich? You once lived near a tribe of Hebrews.” Asked Kayla.

“Yes.. of course... hold on... This... Here... Place... Belongs... To... A... Tribe... of... Armenians.”

Both Rich and Kayla snicker and begin to laugh with each other.

“What? I don’t get it.” Said Chloe. She didn’t have the same sense of humor Red Rich and the Merciless One had.

“Chloe... we’re scouting for womenfolk for our tribe and we stumbled upon Armenians... their women are hella hairy... they even have goatees them Armenian women.” Explains Kayla... as she usually does... which ruins the humor... but Kayla and Rich continue to laugh some more anyways.

“They should wear sheets over themselves, sense nobody’s invented the razor yet.’ Says Rich.

“Lmao... That’s a good one Rich.” Returns Kayla.

“Hey I shave... with obsidian blades.” Chloe interjects.

The other three had caught up and were still yapping loudly.

“Shoosh you ninnies!” Chloe says to the other three... “The ZOG is here!”

“What ZOG?” Asked Frata the Barbarian.

As soon as the Barbarian had said that some caveman has thrown a rock at Frata causing everyone to look into the general direction.

“Fucking shit!” Yells Frata. He dismounts his horse with his sword and runs towards the side of the passage as more rock come flying towards the group.

“Hide bitch!” Kayla said grabbing Chloe behind a camel, so as not to get their face hit.

There were a group of several Armenian cavemen on the cliff. Rich had already busted out his 45 caliber bow and arrows and had already killed one. Zooboy was slinging rocks with his sling shot. He was annoying and a critic... but he helped out.

Frata the Barbarian fearlessly scaled the cliff towards the Armenians risking life and limb... fearless, or just not aware of the perilous danger. Beasty Boy was hyperventilating behind Kayla, in a fetal position.

“Go fight god dammit!” says Chloe as she kicks Critter.

“I can’t... my sword is way over there on the camel.” He replies.

“They’re just rocks Critter.” Kayla said.

“Then you go fight if they’re just rocks.” Protested Critter.

“Sh’yeah, and get hit in the face with one!” Says Kayla.

“Sh’yeah... exactly.” Responds Critter.

“Then start chanting and do some of your magic or something!” Yells Chloepatra.

“Agios O Nythra...” Chants Beasty Boy... in a surprisingly enchanting and melodic voice; yet still crouched behind Kayla.

Kayla looks at Chloe – “Wow... he can sing.”

As the boys were fighting the Armenian contingent... or what was left of them... something happened. As Beasty Boy had hit one of his high notes, the high pitch vibration must have dislodged many of the boulders above the ledge just above the enemy contingent still hurling rocks and crushes all of them to death. The boulders come tumbling down and the boys run out of the way.

“Run for your life motherfuckers!” Screams Zooboy.

Startled, Critter stops – “What... what did I do?”

“Fucking run bitches!” Kayla screams grabbing Chloe and Critter.

They all ran abandoning the horses and camels... and a plume of dust flew into the air everywhere in the passage as the big boulders hit the ground.

It was silent for a while, until the dust began to settle.

“Great... my hair.” Chloe said, breaking the silence.

“I know.” Said Critter in agreement, dusting his hair off.

“Never mind your hair... half the livestock is squashed! Are you guys ok?” Kayla inquired?

“Yeah,” yelled Rich, “But the camels are dead.”

“Somebody’s walking...” Interjected Zooboy.

“Meh... the Longmeister is gunna kill us for getting his camels smashed.” Chloe said worrisomely.

PART TWO

INTELLIGENCE

There were only two horses left. Kayla and Chloepatra were on one. The other carried a heap of supplies. The others were walking.

The passage way gave way to open sky. A hundred yards away can be seen the edge of the cliff... the party stopped in their tracks to the shock of the view.

“Do you guys see what I see?” Said Kayla.

“A big ass river and fields of green trees?” Answered Zooboy. Kayla look at him because they were both thinking the same thing.

“What is that in the far distance... a town?” Inquired Rich.

“Yeah,” Said Chloe, “It doesn’t look like a big one from here... maybe a hundred houses or so.”

Zooboy had walked to the very edge of the cliff – “No... it’s a straight up vertical fall.”

Rich had joined him – “Yeah... there’s no way we can get an army of men down... unless you take what looks like the long way.”

Rich pointed towards the left of the mountain side, where there appeared to be a long, twisty path.

“Send Frata...” Kayla whispered to Chloe.

“Frata... go down there and spy on them... bring back intelligence... punch one of them in the face and knock him out so you can take his clothes and dress like them.” Chloe ordered.

“Ok,” Frata says, “I’ll be back.”

Zooboy gave a whistle from above somewhere, and the party looked up. – “It’s a cave... make camp?”

Rich, Chloe, and Kayla climb up to join Zooboy to check out the cave.

“This must be where that contingent were staying.” Rich said.

“Where is brother Frata going?” Asked Zooboy.

“Chloe sent him to gather intelligence.” Kayla answered, as she looked in the cave.

Zooboy snickered – “Frata? Chloe...” he looked at Chloe in disbelief.

“What?” She said, at the mouth of the cave, “There’s only a few hundred houses, he’ll be safe.”

“Right... that’s not what I’m worried about... what sort of intelligence will Frata be bringing back?” Zooboy looks at Chloe with his left eyebrow raise... she feels him a bit.

And looks at Rich.

“I’m going... I’m going...” Says Rich.

“I’ll come too...” Zooboy says, “You girls gunna be ok?”

“Yeah,” the girls said together.

“And guy...” Interjected Critter.

“Well,” says Kayla, “Guess it’s just us girls, huh?”

“And guy... I’m here too.” Says Critter.

The girls look at each other holding back their snickers.

“Well... guess it’s just us girls huh?” Repeats Kayla.

“Alright...” Critter had one hand on his hip, and the other shaking his pointing finger, “I am getting sick and tired of being treated like this. I’ve had it!”

“Oh, boo hoo, go draw something!” Chloe said, taunting Critter.

“Ok, who the hell do you think you are ‘miss Prima Donna’,” Critter bitches, “I was here in the beginning with Longshanks. I put this shit together with him, way before you were born. Then you just come along out of nowhere one fucking day and think you run this shit.”

“What shit Critter?” Replies Chloe, “Your ‘Aryanopolis?!’ Your Crayola drawings? Your singing?!”

“There is a place at the very heart and core of Aryanopolis for the shit I added!”

“There is no Aryanopolis!” Chloe yells, “It’s gone! What’s left of it huh? A rag tag band of wandering men? It’s your fault... you and your generation, Critter!”

“Oh please... miss ‘pretty little I just came out of nowhere princess’... do tell how me and my generation cause the down fall of Aryanopolis.”

“Chloe, stop it... Critter, go outside and take a break or something.” Said Kayla.

“You know what, fuck you guys...” Critter storms out of the cave.

“Whatever!” Added Chloe.

“Chloe...” Said Kayla irritated.

CRYING ARTIST

Kayla and Chloe just sat there not talking for a while next to each other. Chloe has her arms crossed over her chest and is staring pensively at the dusty walls of the cave.

She looks at Kayla for some feedback or something.

“Maybe you should go talk to him. You prolly hurt his feelings.” Kayla suggested.

She sighs... “Yeah... guess so.”

Chloe wanders outside to look for Critter. Knowing him, she figures he behind a rock somewhere tracing things on the dirt.

She walks a bit and follows the sound of sniffing coming from behind a big boulder a hundred yards from the cave by the horses. She sees him sadly sitting by himself... tracing things on the dirt. Her gaze falls to her ugs as she begins to feel bad... kicking the pebbles. With a deep breath she walks towards Critter... then sits next to him, facing him, watching him wipe his tears and snotty nose.

“I’m sorry for going off on you back there... I didn’t mean any of it... I was just being mean out of frustration.” She said.

“It’s not fair, “ He sniffles, “Some of us have an appreciation for the finer things in life, not just to run around like a lunatic and kill people. Longshanks can leave the kingdom for a while to another and he’s a hero... but when I leave I’m a traitor and my face is erased out of the kingdom’s records. I put my heart and soul into Aryanopolis, just like Longshanks did. Nobody appreciates what I did.”

“I do Beasty...” She says, “I think Aryanopolis lost it’s spirit when you left. Art is the language of the spirit, that evokes a primordial essence in us. Without art, music, poetry, and dreams... there is only an empty shell, that will soon wither. We’re born dreaming... and we spend half our causal existence asleep and dreaming.”

“How can you contradict yourself in such a way Chloe? How can you condemn me for ruining Aryanopolis in one breath, and say that I was it’s spirit in the next?”

“Because we all must learn things the hard way... the way of Wyrd... even kingdoms as a collective... and we must allow such things to play out. Longshanks and you, were like the brain and heart of Aryanopolis... the Intelligence and the Emotions... in conflict. In the beginning the intellect always wins. Aryanopolis intellectually desired a powerful militia long ago, to fight the Magian or whatever/whoever they saw as the Enemy. Words, and intellectual lectures never have the power to excite the human spirit to inspire it to achieve greatness or growth. It’s the spirit... the breath... the imagination... the emotion that sets passion on fire. Like resonates with like. You’re a gifted and wonderful person... it’s just that your timing was not right.”

“Then why not tell them... the others? If you feel this way, why continue to condemn me publicly?”

Chloe gets up and brushes the dirt from her ass. She looks forward expressionless for a moment... “Because, the Longmen believe Aryanopolis belonged to Longshanks and not you. Because he used you for what he needed from you. Because I see no place in what is to become of us... for you... collectively. My private sentiments, are irrelevant to the collective. Because your generation ruined Aryanopolis.”

“How so Chloe... How did I and my generation ruin the kingdom that once was?”

“Because time changes and people evolve. You and your generation represented the politics of a bygone aeon which refused to change to entice the emotions and passions of the emerging generation of people and what is relevant to them. Because you and your generation put what YOU and your bygone aeonic political wants, before my needs, and my new generation’s needs and hopes. You and your generation itself caused the fall of Aryanopolis. It is the weaving of Wyrd... that the old must perish... to give life to a newer and better form. Some of us learn from our mistakes... some of us learn from the mistakes of others. What new form is to come... will be balanced. Good bye Critter.”

“Good Bye?”

From the small of her back she pulls out her Obsidian Blade... holding it firmly in her right hand. She lunges forward swiftly and penetrates his neck... forcing herself on top of him, and drawing the blade across his throat and left jugular vein... and when his blood began to gush out she twisted the blade in his neck until it cracked... lodged inside him. She kicks his convulsing body off of herself which had found itself on top of her, as he was struggling to fight. Having loosened herself from his corpse's grip she stands back... covered in blood... watching him choke in his own blood.

Chloe walks slowly back to Kayla in the cave... and finds Kayla laying on a slab of stone taking a cat nap. She bites her nail, not knowing how Kayla would react after learning that she had killed Longshanks number two.

Kayla opens her eyes hearing Chloe beside her, shocked to see her drenched in blood.

"OMG Chloe! Are you ok! Is that your blood!? Shit!"

"I'm fine... I accidentally killed Critter. Help me throw his body over the cliff?"

"That's Longshanks best friend ever! Great, you killed his camels and his best friend! You're on a roll today."

"I know... I know. Just tell him Critter fell of a cliff."

"Come on." She grabs Chloe's arm.

They each grab one of Critter's wrists and drag him over to the ledge to throw him over.

"Chloe... there is a pool of blood over there."

"I know, just... just kill one of the horses there... and eat it... tell them we got hungry or something."

They both get on their asses and using their feet kick Critter off the edge of the cliff... then carefully get on their tummies to peek over the edge to see. The body had fallen straight down about 300 feet, and landed in some trees. They look at each other.

"Horse huh?" Said Kayla.

"I can't wash myself."

"Come on."

"Ok, you ride the horse to the bloody spot, and I'll shoot it with one of Rich's arrows."

"Not with me on it!"

BRIEFING

Frata the Barbarian had returned. He ran into the cave. The sun was setting.

"Fucking shit! Santa Lucia! You bloody! What happened? Where I kill him! Shit fuck!"

“Oh hi Frata.” Said Chloe.

“No... no... we're fine Frata. We just got hungry and ate one of the horses.”

“Did you want some?” Chloe holds a piece of the horse up towards Frata.

“No thank you my lovely sister. Are you sure you ok.”

“Yes, of course, we just got hungry and killed one of the horses... and Critter fell off the cliff.” Chloe assures.

“Oh yeah... Critter fell of the cliff. The other two went to follow you to see if you were safe.”

“Right... anyways, what did you see... sit!” Chloe said, grabbing his arm.

“Oh, many young bambini.”

“Many girls... yeah?” Said Kayla.

“Oh yeah... 16... 15... 14... many.”

“Wow! That's perfetto for you! Good job! What about for the other Longmen... the other men in our Clan... you know, the ones that prefer them slightly older.” Asked Chloe.

“Oh yeah, for them, many old ladies too. Hairy old ladies. Look like Scottish men.”

“Holy shit that's ugly Frata.” Kayla exclaimed.

The three of them laugh. Althoe Chloepatra's laugh was more a laugh of relief.

“Ya, that is ugly LOL...” Says Frata.

“Anyways, did you see anything else... like if they had an army, what kind of weapons, who their leader is... you know, other things.” Kayla inquired.

“Oh, piece of shit village... but nice young girls. We take it no?”

“Absolutely we'll take it. They have a big river to fish in, and fertile land to farm with.” Said Chloe.

“Yeah... let's wait for Rich and Zooboy to return and see what they saw... then we'll go tell Longshanks the great news!”

“Oh... Frata... can you do us a favor?” Asked Chloe.

“Anyting, just ask.”

“When the other two come back can you tell them some Armenian came and killed Critter and pushed him off the cliff, then you killed the Armenian and pushed him off the cliff?”

“Ok, sure. I do, like you ask.”

“Great... thanks Frata ” Said Chloe, with a nice smile.

“Give us a hug... we miss you.” Added Kayla.

The three of them decided to take a short cat nap as they waited for what remained of the scout party.

Red Rich and Zoophilip the Berserk entered the dark cave with a potato sack of things... or whatever kind of bags they had in those times, waking the trio from their cat nap with their ass slapping buddy talk.

“Damn it gets dark in here at night, thank god we have a torch.” Says Rich.

“Totally... boy, am I tired, I’m a sleep like a corpse tonight.”

“We brought cheese and bread, amongst other things... holy shit! You two are covered in blood!” Screamed Rich.

“Oh, the Dark Princess and the Merciless One is not hungry, they ate one of the horse, and an Armenian pushed Critter off a cliff and I pushed him off a cliff.” Informs Frata.

“Oh but it’s been a while... we’ll take the cheese and bread!” Says Kayla.

“What, a horse... Critter dead!” Zooboy said.

“Shit happens dude?” Said Chloe.

“No! Not my boy Critter! That was Longshanks’ best friend! You let Longshanks’ best friend die! I can’t believe he’s dead. Marc Anthony’s gonna kill somebody!” Says Zooboy.

“Not me...” said Chloe.

“A horse,” Says Rich, “You mean one of our last two horses... you slaughtered a horse LOL?”

“I know huh? LOL” Kayla says, joining in on the humor.

“That’s gonna be an idiomatic expression of some sort in the future.” Said Kayla.

Zooboy passes around the cheese and break the bread – “Anyways children. There’s no more than 200 people in the piece of shit village. More women than men, which is good. The men have multiple wives. Army is almost nonexistent...”

“About 50 armed men... crude bows and arrows...” Rich added.

“Right... BUT it’s controlled by the ZOG. They pay taxes to a Zionist city-state about 50 miles down the river.”

“Have you seen the Zionist city-state?” Asked Kayla.

“No, too far.” Rich said, with his mouth full of bread.

“Is it worth it, that’s the question.” States Zooboy.

“Yeah,” Says Rich, “We can take out this village, but will have to deal with the Zionists up the river later.”

“Frata, what did you discover?” Zooboy asks.

“Same thing you guys did...” Kayla says, speaking for Frata.

Zooboy bites into his last piece of bread – “I bet he did. I’m off to bed. Keep it down. Somebody’s gunna get it tomorrow.”

Chloe back hands Zooboy on his shoulder – “I’m not getting shit.”

“I’m off to bed to.” Said Frata the Barbarian.

“Goon Night, Frata.” The three said.

“Cigarette?” Said Rich.

Kayla gets up – “Hell yeah, I’ve been dying for one.”

“I’ll just hang out for some fresh air.” Chloe blurted.

“Where did you get this at?” Asked Kayla.

“They grow Indian tobacco down there and corn. I snatched some and wrapped it in corn husk... no filter... think I’ll call them Camels.” Rich says as he exhales his drag, passing it to Kayla.

She takes a drag... “Goes down easy... like Brandy Alexander...”

“What song is that?” Asks Rich?

“Feist.” Chloe answers.

“Oh Feist! What did Frata report anyways?”

“Usual... girls... young ones.” Says Chloe.

“Is that legal here?” Kayla ponders out loud.

“Not where I’m from... but seeing as our civilization has fallen – what the hell. Isn’t my cup of tea personally, but we love him the same.” Said Rich.

“True dat homie... true dat.” Kayla said, as she takes a drag.

“I can’t wait to get home and take a whore bath for reals.” Chloe said randomly.

“No shit, you homies are covered in blood.” Says Rich, “What really happened?”

“I sort of killed him. I shanked him in the neck... and asked Kayla to help me toss him over the edge. Frata was covering for us.”

“That’s Anthony Longshanks homie... what do we do if he retaliates?”

Kayla takes a drag. She gives Rich a look... and exhales the smoke into the crisp autumn air... Nothing has to be ever be said, between the Acception.

THE TELLING

With only one horse left the party walks back to the temporary settlement where their kinsmen are camped out, waiting for their return for information.

Chloe has been quite during the return trip. She is quite when she thinks to much, perhaps worried what Longshanks will do when he learns about the loss of his livestock and best friend.

The tribesmen give them a weird look as they see the party return with only one horse, and bloody... they move out of the way, since everybody knows they are in The Pack.

“Well, see ya Chloe.” Says Zoophilip, as they approach the Tent of Marc Anthony Longshanks. The Vizier El Darko Loco comes out, as he was awaiting their return.

Chloe looks back at Kayla to see if she will follow her in.

“They like you more...” Says Kayla.

Kayla look at Rich and Frata. The boys rise an inconspicuous sign in the air, and half of the crowd of Longmen step forward with their swords and bows at the ready... giving Chloe a little comfort.

“Welcome back... you made the return safely I see, with some losses?” Said El Darko Loco, as he guides her into the Tent of the Great Sinister One.

“Thank You generalissimo, it was perilous.”

“Ah... Chloe... dear god, you're all bloody, are you hurt or maimed?” Inquired Longshanks.

“No sir, I'm fine... we've had some tragic losses thoe...”

“Oh... sit... tell me about it.”

Longshanks was a bearded fellow. He was smoking tobacco out of his corn cob pipe – “Tobacco Chloe?” He offered.

“Oh, no thank you. I don't smoke. We lost all but one horse?”

“All my camels? On a 20 mile journey?”

“It was perilously dangerous. There is a pass way thru the mountains controlled by a tribe of Armenians-Jews.”

Longshanks and El Darko look at each other and say together – “The ZOG!”

“Yes sir. We were ambushed as we were passing thru the passages way. They were throwing rocks at us...”

“As usual.” El Darko quickly interjected.

“Uhm.” Hummed Longshanks in agreement.

“We returned fire, but were out numbered. The Beast Master then began to sing...”

“As usual.” El Darko quickly interjected.

“Uhm.” Hummed Longshanks in agreement.

“The Beast Master had hit a freakish high harmonics that it dislodged many of the large boulders above...”

“He tends to do that.” States El Darko.

“Uhm.” Hummed Longshanks in agreement.

“So anyways, the boulders tumbled down and magically killed the enemy contingent, but came down and squashed most of the live stock, we barely escaped with our lives.”

“Dear god... camels and all?” Asked Longshanks, as he smokes out of his pipe, stroking his beard.

“Yes sir, camels and all. Two horses were left. We made it to the other side, and discovered a small village of 200 or so inhabitants. They live beside a large river and fertile green lands. Only 50 armed soldiers, and mostly women folk. They are farmers, and pay taxes to a larger Zionist city-state 50 miles down the river.”

“Hmm...” Longshanks smokes his pipe and strokes his beard looking into their air in deep thought... “I say El Darko, have we enough men to take the village?”

“Yes sir, more than enough. I’m worried about the Zionist city-state.” Answers El Darko.

“Indeed. Do you have any intelligence on this city-state my dear?” Asked Longshanks.

“No sir, it was too far to walk with what little supplies we had.”

“Yes, I see... is it worth a battle? Our numbers are dwindling as it is.” Ponders Longshanks.

“Do we have a choice sir? If they are 50 miles away from said village, they are only 70 miles from us... only a quarter days journey on horse.” Informs El Darko.

Longshanks nods as he puffs his pipe – “Yes, yes... damned if you do... damned if you don’t.”

“I have an idea sir. Since the Zionist city-state is located on the river, it means they are depended on its water supply...”

Longshanks takes his pipe out his mouth to concentrate, and leans a bit closer – “Go on...”

“If we force all the men and women to re-irrigate the river, to make it flow in a different direction... they will lose their water supply, and thus their farms and livestock will die. Without water and food, they cannot support an army. We can relocate the village, as we settle the land, over near the tall cliff; where we can station soldiers, to keep us safe. The cliff is about 300 feet high, and the whole area can be seen from it... giving us the higher ground at all times.”

“Brilliant!” Exclaims Longshanks. – “El Darko my friend, do we have the man power to “re-irrigate” a river.”

“We do sir, if the river is within a reasonable width.”

“The river is only about 6 meters wide, but deep. Althoe, from the cliff I did see a natural depression to the right of the land where we can direct the flow to make a lake or reservoir, or something.”

“Then it is quite possible sir to redirect the river as the Dark Princess said.”

“Excellent then. You must want a bath Chloe... go, and touch base with El Darko for whatever the morrow. We leave en mass as soon as the Vizier believes we are ready.”

“Thank you sir. I do need a bath.” She says, as she walks backwards to the Tent opening and turns around to exit.

“Oh, and Chloe...” Longshanks adds.

She can see Rich and Frata and her loyalist faction on the ready... but her heart felt like flying out of her throat because she knew what he was going to ask. She reluctantly turns around to face Longshanks and El Darko Loco.

“Yes sir?”

“How is the Beast Master... safe I assume?”

She was careful not to twirl her fingers or let out a sign of low confidence and unsureness – “He’s dead sir.”

“Dead?” Both of the men said together... staring at her.

“I killed him sir.”

“Killed him?” They both said together.

“Dear god... my best friend ever... dead.” Said Longshanks.

“I’m sorry. We got into an argument and I felt like he was no longer needed... like he was a ball and chain to us. So I cut his throat open.”

“Who will write for us... inspire us. He was our Tribes greatest scribe. Have you read some of the sinister stories some of our other Clansmen put out!”

“Tedium is the word sir.” Said El Darko.

“Yes, indeed... why I barely can make sense of some of them myself... no plot, no excitement. No fresh presencing of the Dark in new ways... you’ve killed our essence.”

“Concider Kayla the Merciless your new best friend sir. She can write better.” Suggested Chloe to Longshanks himself.

El Darko nods in agreement, and shrugs at Longshanks – “She is good sir... and of the emerging generation. If anyone knows the new aeon, its her generation. That is if we desire to be relevant in the new aeon and its people... sir...”

“You will pass on one day sir, as we all do. If you desire a future empire sir... for the progression of the individual human and our human civilization... and not for your own profiteering... then you must let it go and give it to the future. I and my generation are that future... and what children we will have.” Adds Chloe.

Anthony Longshanks claps his hands over his lips and stares ponderously at Chloepatra for a long time... "In time... my Dark Princess... in it's season... go take your bath... we celebrate tonight."

SINISTER TALES PT3

THE CAMP

The Camp doesn't have much to offer. It is just a valley between two rows of mountains. Mostly desert, sparsely populated with shrubs and desert bloom. The mountain range in the north side is covered in pine forest. Which is where the common Longmen must daily go to hunt for animals. There is a small creek that pools into several ponds closely hugging the northern range; where all the Tribe makes camp.

The Camp is clustered into its cliques and factions of the remnants of Aryanopolis. The old blood of the kingdom have all left during the dark ages and fall of Aryanopolis for other kingdoms. Most migrating into a kingdom called the BN and suchlike far away... leaving Aryanopolis to die with its illiterate commoners. And its few hardliners who still see a glimmer of hope – somewhere; somehow.

Among the Camp, the faction of Thoth-Aten-Ra's – called "The Temple" – men are the most respected and well known. Their leader – Thoth, is a librarian of sorts who, with his men, went about collecting the kingdom's secret and sacred manuscripts. From his massive collection; dedication; and knowledge, his faction kept the torch of Baphomet burning in the darkest of hours.

The largest faction, by far is the Acception. Whose own number is nearly the same size as all of the original Longmen remnants itself. They are neither scholars or librarians. More like a aimless band of thieves, bandits, and pirates that owe their allegiance to no-one but themselves. Unlike the Others, the Acception has no real objectives other than to profit. Unlike the Others, the Acception is heavily organized and structured, with obedience to it's Erheneide – it's Law – as their Supreme Law.

Some of the Longmen; seeing the Acceptionites to be a brute band of thugs, profiteers, and those who do not take much of anything seriously; look upon them with suspicious. For what would a band of pirates want with the wisdom and dream of once great Aryanopolis. If not for their own profit?

Such a dramatic difference caused the Temple and the Acception in olden days to fight as rivals. These were back in olden days when the Acception had emerged out of the wilderness to merge with their distant Longmen kith and cousins. The Progenitor of the Acception in ancient times was a noble blooded Aryanopolite who had migrated far away and founded his own Clan in a distant land. The time that passed, and blood that flowed, which grew distant from Mother Aryanopolis caused the Acception to develop it's own culture and collective identity.

As soon as she merged with the Longmen Tribe, Kayla of the Acception, and Thoath of the Temple went at each other and bitterly fought briefly. Seeing how the Tribe was in such a doomed state, El Darko and his men stopped the infighting, for the sake of Solidarity. There is yet among both factions unspoken tension. There are other factions among the Longmen; none which the Acception considers significant. They have little respect for the common Longmen.

There are those Old Bloods that belong to no faction – those who mostly hail from the inner circle of Longshanks. These float around amongst the Longmen and their factions; spreading propaganda of the wonder and mystery that is Longshanks to maintain coherency of the Tribe – if it is to survive.

REBIRTH

Many years have they traveled, these Longmen – those left who are still loyal to the dream. Lost in the desert. At times of hopelessness the Longmen vent their frustrations. They reveal hidden opinions. Speaking of times when Longshanks abandoned Aryanopolis. When he left it for ruin, only to come back, far too late. Some of the Longmen leave the Tribe – fed up with Longshanks – saying things like: It serves him right, the state things are in!

This was the state of things when the Longmen's kindred – the Acception – merged to join the wandering. Kayla and Chloepatra had never seen the glory that was Aryanopolis with there own eyes, for they are far too young. To them it is just a fable – a legend – in their young minds.

But the wise ones say that it is in hard times such as these, that one's loyalties and allegiances are tested – and genuine companionship revealed. Even in the most hopeless of hours; when all seem lost and pointless; Longshanks still has a few who never leave his side. Sworn like shipmates to their ship and captain, to endure unto the end, and go down with their ship. But these are few. Far too few, to which Kayla and Chloe have joined ranks – unto the end.

Longshanks and Generalissimo El Darko had given Chloe the command of 100 of Aryanopolis' remnant army soldier to take the land of the village beyond the pass.

With relative ease, Chloepatra, Kayla, Rich, Frata, and the Centinals captured the small village successfully and had sent word to El Darko to send the entire Tribe migrating to their new land.

But there was little time for celebration. For in the short distance was a great Zionist city-state – that threatened the existence of this fledgling nation. The river had to be redirected; forts built along the river. These projects overseen by Chloepatra and her men – as Longshanks and El Darko watch in the shadows – the rebirth of a kingdom.

And in the Tent of Longshanks they planned regarding the looming threat of the Zionist city-state.

"I'll take Frata the Barbarian, and a few others to gather intelligence of the city tonight." Said Red Rich to Longshanks.

"Good. We cannot act or plan anything concrete without knowing the enemy..." Longshanks said.

"They are much bigger." States Kayla.

"It's not always the size that matters..." Enlightens Thoth, "A battle can be won with deception and intelligence."

Both Rich, and El Darko seem to notice that Chloepatra was not all that interested that night. As if her mind was someplace else or frustrated?

"Why!" Interrupts Chloe, as she stares at Longshanks.

The chamber silences, as Longshanks looks up shocked.

"Chloe..." Rich says nervously as he takes a few steps backwards; trying to wake her to her senses.

"Why are you doing this!" Chloe demands, staring at Longshanks.

The others in the chamber have all taken a few steps back, fearing for Chloepatra.

"I'm sorry; doing what?" Asks Longshanks.

“When is enough, enough for you – us. What’s wrong with what we have now? All I have ever heard about Aryanopolis was wars and fights. That’s why it fell. Because you built it on a bloody foundation of war – a false foundation. And when that war stopped, and there was no-one to fight. The kingdom fell. Can’t you see you haven’t learned from your mistakes! Can’t you see we have something good going here – now. Why can’t we just make peace with that city-state. You’re going to ruin what we have now, again!”

She turns around and walks quickly out of the Tent. Away towards the river to be alone.

The chamber was silent. Kayla broke it: “I’ll go talk to her. She’s proly on her rag or something.”

“Or something, indeed.” Said Longshanks.

Kayla had found her skipping rocks by herself.

“Are you ok?” She asked Chloe.

“Our numbers are low. We worked hard to get this far. All we need now is just what we have. Each other and time. We can grow that way. We’ll be something in time. He wants to war and send off what people we have to their death. It’s not going to stop Kayla. It ruined Aryanopolis. It got out of hand. They lost sight of what truly mattered. And it all just became pointless hatred for phantom enemies.”

“What do you want? Just tell me. You know everything I do, I do for you.”

“I just want something to give to you, to Rich, Frata, our future progeny. I don’t want this to go to ruin, like Aryanopolis. Those others don’t understand. They think I’m incapable of thinking for others. Of wanting things for people I love and care about. They think I want to take it all over for my own self.”

Kayla just silently holds her from behind and comforts her. Resting her nose on her shoulder; as Chloe looks at the flow of the stream passing by in silence.

DARK STAR RISING

He’s an empathetic soul. Just approaches her and stares at the setting sun. She was sitting alone.

“May I?” Longshanks said to Chloe.

“I’m sorry I went off on you back there like that. I didn’t mean any of it. I was just frustrated; PMSing or something.” She said, feeling bad; as he sat his graying self beside her.

He leans back a little to look at the small of her back: “I hear, last time you gave a similar apology, someone got their throat cut.”

She softly laughs to herself as she traces circle in the dirt.

“Sometime I feel like you are on a one man journey to find yourself; and we’re just foolishly following behind.” She said to herself out loud.

“Is life really that simple Chloe? No man is an island. Wyrd brings many lives with the same quality together. And like a loom of many strings, weaves them together. Our destinies entwined. For some distant purpose. A purpose which will bare fruit, long after we have expired.” He looks into the darkening sky, towards the stars the Evening Star, which shine bright over a distant mountain.

“What do you see with those old eyes of your when you looks up?” She question him.

“My hopes and dreams Chloe... my hopes and dreams – somewhere in those stars. What else is their to live for?” He said in deep reflection. Lost somewhere in the star decked sky.

“It’s not your writings or speeches that enchanted me or brought me here. It’s because my eyes are lost in the same distant sky. Perhaps inside you and I are kindred spirits, reaching for the same impossible dream.”

“Kindred souls Chloe, woven together... each affecting and influencing the other.” He said.

She looks at the Dark Star, just above the horizon in the East; shining its dark twilight onto the leaves and her skin: “What is that Dark Star Rising Longshanks?”

“Where?” He inquired.

“There,” she pointed, “In the East, just above the horizon.” She looks into his eyes, to see a graying film covering his pupils.

“I see only little star my dear?”

“Do you not see it’s light? On the leaves, and my skin? The new colors and subtle changes it brings?” She asked, deeply curious that he cannot see.

Longshanks has a slightly puzzled look. He holds up his hands in front of his face and inspects them. And at Chloe and the leaves: “I’m afraid my old eyes cannot see the New Aeon, like your young eyes... fayen comes. What future there is to come Chloe, belongs to you and those to come. Soon, when the Dark Star Rises higher; I will see no more.”

THE SEEING

Kayla and Chloepatra had spend the day pensive, walking back and forth. A night earlier Red Rich, Frata and some of the men had left to gather intelligence in the big city-state they nick named “Jewpopolis” and they had not yet returned.

They had spent most of the night awake waiting. But fell a sleep together underneath an acorn tree in a section their men established as camp by the side of the river.

“Kayla. Chloe. Psst.” Rich was whispering in the distance.

“Under the big acorn tree sir, they are safe.” Said one of their brothers.

They had awoken to the rustling. As Rich came near with his torch, to notice they were naked, he turn around: “Sorry.”

“It’s ok, what is it? Your safe, thank god. Frata?” Asked Kayla.

“You can turn around, we don’t care.” Said Chloe.

“Don’t have to ask me twice.” Rich mumbled below his breath.

“What?” Chloe said.

“Nothing. I said it happened around twelve thirty. Anyways Frata’s fine. We all made it back safe. It’s big. There was a small confrontation with our men and their guards. They took Zooboy.” Rich said, as he fixed his gaze on their toes; so as not to wander any where they shouldn’t!

“Zooboy!?” Kayla says, looking at Chloe.

“What, why are you guys looking at me?” She said irritated.

Chloe lays back down. Kayla shrugs her shoulders at Rich.

“Just thought you’d want to know. That’s all. I’ll be asleep near by with Frata if you need me.” Rich said walking off. He stops to add: “That didn’t come out right. Next to Frata, not with Frata.”

Kayla looks at him confused and whispered: “Homo say what?”

Rich says in return, not quite hearing it: “What?”

“Nothing, go to sleep.” She says, laughing to herself.

Kayla sits there for a moment looking at Chloe.

“What?” She said to Kayla, “I’m sleepy. It’s just Zooboy.”

Kayla lays back down also and goes back to sleep.

Chloe tried to go back to sleep. But she couldn’t. She was growing mad at herself; or something.

She had got up to put her close on and walked off alone into the shadows of the night towards the horses. Mumbling to herself: "God I hate you! I hate you Zooboy! You owe me big time!"

Chloe had gotten on her horse, and rode by herself towards Jewpopolis alone. To get find Zooboy.

It had taken her three hours and a half to ride along the side of the river to get to the city. But before she could enter the city itself she was met up by soldiers. They shoot her horse and grab her: "I'm Chloepatra. I wanna negotiate."

They had forced her onto one of there horses and rode her off towards the center of the city. Where their was a huge walled inner city, in the middle of which towered a great and mighty tower. There was no sense in her fighting back, since she was out numbered.

Into a dungeon cell, matted with hay and straw they tossed her, and shut the iron bared door in front of her, without saying a word. "I wanna negotiate god dammit!" She said, trying one last time.

She was afraid. Thinking that she had made a terrible mistake, and would never see Kayla ever again she crouched into a corner to cry. She was crying for a while.

"lol... someone has fallled under the love spell of the Zobobalicious. Oh, I knew it. She loves me!" Said a voice just behind her in the other cell.

She turns around mortified: "You stupid," she back hands him, "How long were you sitting there." She said wiping the snot from her nose: "You're an idiot. I hope you don't think I was crying for you."

"You want me. Admit it. You came for me. I don't blame you. I'm quite frankly irresistible; if I don't say so myself." He said, sticking his face against the bars.

"Don't you take anything seriously. You're in a dungeon, and they're going to kill you?"

"No. Why, as long as you're here with me. Listen, since we're both going to die: do you wanna make love between the bars?"

"Get the hell away from me." She said, tossing hay at him, and going to the other side.

The guards had returned and unlocked her door: "Lets go. The king will negotiate."

She looks back at Zooboy: "You owe me one."

They took her up a flight of spiral stairs. Up the tower no doubt she thought to herself. She wasn't quite sure what to offer the emperor in exchange for Zooboy's freedom. Certainly not herself.

It was a large, cold room, lit with torches. Opulent with marble pillars, and gold. In the distance she could make out a large golden throne and a man on it – which they were walking her towards.

She looked back and noticed the guards were gone, and that she was along with the king.

“Come... sit.” Said a familiar voice.

She scrunched her brows. Puzzled at the familiar voice and walked to the golden chairs in front of the throne.

Her eyes first saw etched above the man’s head: DM and as they fell onto his face she was horrified, and stepped back.

“David the Moor.” Said Longshanks, or whoever she thought he was.

“Who are you?!” She asked, in disbelief or disgust.

He laughs a sinister laughter, at himself or something.

“You think this is funny? Like it’s a game to you? Making a fool of me? Play god with people?” She felt suckered. Ashamed for being stupid, and began to cry again.

She added: “You left Aryanopolis because you have other kingdoms? You abandoned them because they were no longer useful? You let Aryanopolis die. All that wandering? All the searching? The battles? You’re insane! What are you doing?”

“Chloe,” He said, “If I gave you something which you did not earn or work for – strive for – how much value would you see in it? Sit.”

“Not much.” She answered, realizing inside, this man was more than what he assumes to be. She sits to listen.

“That’s right. That which we do not put effort into gaining; creating; has no deep intrinsic value to us. Aryanopolis meant something deep and real to me. I made it. With my efforts it became. I left it, in hopes, foolishly believing that my Longmen were mature human beings who saw – felt – the same value in Aryanopolis. I desired them to rule themselves, to take what I have made for them, and make something of their lives, without preacher or profit. I left to see what would happened to Aryanopolis in the hands of those who were given it. What happen to it Chloe?”

“It fell to ruin. Many left it for other kingdoms. You let Aryanopolis fall to ruin; and had us wander, struggle, to rebuild it with our own efforts – that it might have genuine meaning to us?” She speculated out loud.

“Yes. How else should I weed out the undeserving but to let them weed themselves out? Through your own efforts. As you each struggle to recreate and rebuild Aryanopolis – what you create for the New Aeon – will have genuine meaning to you, in each of your hearts, forever. As it once had meaning, to me. It is the only way I can give your generation something meaningful and lasting – to have each of you build it; regenerate it; with your own personal struggle and effort. In this way, will it mean something to you. Walk with me...”

They walk together down the tower and towards the gate of the walled city. Past stone architecture that caught her eyes.

“Someday I want what I am building to look like this.” She said.

“And it shall, my dear, in time – with your efforts.”

“What of the enemies – this city? What should I tell the others.” She asked, whatever his name was.

“Struggle Chloe. Fight for it, or it will slip out of your fingers like sand. There is no growth without struggle. Without challenges. Without movement and effort. It is the law of nature that what lives must struggle to live. Only through struggling – the effort put in – does life have its meaning... do we hold onto it with dear life.” He said, smiling to her.

She looked down from where she was standing and saw two horses. And looked back at him, understanding it all within herself. She walks down to the horses looking back: “I will come for this kingdom someday Moor.”

He laughs, that sinister laugh; pleased inside: “Come! I dare you. It’s yours if you can take it.”

She gets on her horse. The guards throw Zooboy out of the gate.

“Come on, lets go home.” She said to Zooboy, riding off back home.

“How did you get us out of that anyways?” He asked her.

“I have real superpowers.” She said.

The two ride along the river together. And shortly meet up with Kayla, Rich, Frata, and many of their men who had come to get Chloe. They look at her for some feed back.

“Lets go home. It’s time.” She said riding.

“Time for what?” Frata the Barbarian asked her, for the group.

“For war.”

THE END.

SMOKE AND MIRRORS

Smoke And Mirrors

It's often said that the "ONA" is all smoke and mirrors. This may be true. Why was smoke used out in the battlefield in the old days? To hide something. What do you see in a mirror? Your own fucking ego looking back at you. Think about that for a moment.

There is this Arabic word "Haram" which I like. I like the word because it reveals the idiotic mentality of mundanes. Haram means "Forbidden," or "Taboo." Except the word Haram does not necessarily mean that what is Haram is "bad" it may also allude to something sacred which the profane cannot touch. Thus you have words from the "HRM" root like "Haram" meaning a "Sanctuary," and "Harem," meaning a "Women's Quarters." Of course a king's harem of wives and concubines was forbidden for the public and outside people to "partake of." But because someone somewhere with authority designates something to be Haram, the mundanes – in the billions – Follow and stay away from what is Forbidden, usually in a religiously fanatic manner.

They never ask themselves what is "inside" that taboo sanctuary, and most often, the mundanes never have the intestinal fortitude to venture inside to see and experience for themselves what is Forbidden. So with mundanes and their mundane mentality, what is in the Dark, usually stays safely hidden in the Dark.

You can literally hide 5000 pages worth of stuff in plain view, and you put up smoke and mirrors and these mundanes will never touch a single page. All it takes is a few simple opinionated statements from random mundanes such as: "The ONA is a hoax," "The ONA was an experiment," "The ONA never existed," "The ONA condones human sacrifice!" And with those "authoritative" opinions issued from the fingertips of contemporary mundane Cyberculture Satanists, most of their idiot peers never question the smoke and mirrors to see for their own selves what is on the other side.

Degeneracy of Satanism

There are about 500 million Buddhists on the Planet Earth and many of them have internet access such as myself and my cousins. I've been online for several years and at no point in time did I ever join a "Buddhist" website to debate and talk "Buddhism" with other "Buddhists." None of my 30 cousins online do either. In fact when a Buddhist is online, they usually don't even make it known. I'm talking about the majority of us Asian Buddhists who were born, bred, and raised in one of our Buddhist Cultures.

The Point is that most Buddhists – as well as other people of different memplexes – can keep their Real Life and real-life religion separate from their internet activities. Why? Nobody associated with a Living Tradition in the Real World, has a real need to validate that Living Tradition or Way of Life in some way on the internet. How do I explain this phenomenon?

During my high school years I wasn't allowed to hang out with friends. My aunt-mom would either make me hang out at the university campus with my youngest aunt, or I had to work all day after school at my aunt-mom's donut/coffee shop and do my homework. After 4 years of daily smelling coffee and donuts, drinking all the coffee I can drink and gorging myself with all the free donuts I could eat: I am fucking sick to my eyeballs of donuts and coffee! In college my friends would take us to the local donut shop nearby, and I'd order just green tea while all our friends ordered coffee and donuts. They'd ask me why I never buy donuts and coffee. What was my answer? "Fuck that shit, I had that shit 4 years straight!"

When you are born into a Buddhist culture, and see Buddhist shit every single day, and you meditate on Buddhist dhamma and hear Buddhist teachings lectured to you for 18 straight years, why the hell do you want to come online and do some more "Buddhisting" like you didn't get enough of it in real life!? I can't even stand reading a book on Buddhism. Of my 800-ish books only one is a book on Buddhism which only presents the basics of Buddhism for a Western market. This book comes in handy when you are born and raised in America and you are an Asian Buddhist. Because as an Asian Buddhist you get your boring Buddhism in your culture's own language and according to the living tradition of your own people, which the average Western person is completely alien to. So if you want to be understood by a Westerner who is interested in Buddhism, you have to use words and ideas such Western people are familiar with.

I have a very hard time relating and understanding why Born Buddhists would even want to come online to get into philosophical debates and argument after getting all this junk in real life boringly for decades. When we come online it's a break from all that shit that pertains to Real Life in toto. I just wanna watch my youtube videos, keep up with current events, answer a few emails, do a little research, read some articles, and chill in forums that have nothing to do with Buddhism for a while to read their posts as a way to entertain myself.

In general when you do chance upon a Buddhist forum online, the average user in such forums are White people. There is nothing wrong with that. I can understand why White people genuinely interested in Buddhism would have a desire or need to mingle with others of like interests in a forum. Why? Because they weren't born and raised in a boring Buddhist culture their whole life. They perhaps need to fellowship in this regard. And I have met plenty of cool White Buddhist and Black Buddhists as well online that are well centered and genuinely interested in Buddhism.

But occasionally I find a White Hubris American Mundane [WHAM] claiming Buddhism in these forums. It doesn't matter what these ego-centered WHAM's are into, they always think they got it all down and know everything. Fuck 24,000 pages of Tipitakas, monks, culture. These WHAM's read a Wikipedia entry about Buddhism, a book by the Dalai Lama maybe, and a bunch of posts in some forum, and they are ready to take on the Buddha himself in a debate. These WHAM's will usually go off philosophizing in a Western-Hubris way how the act of desiring not to desire is a desire in itself or some other shit like that.

These mundanes are so culturally myopic, so White-centric that they project their ignorant White weltanschauung and just automatically assume that the Buddha spoke White people English 2500 years ago. Or they'll bring up a debate topic about a subject already covered in the Tipitaka like they know what they are talking. Shut the hell up and go do something "Buddhist" in real life with your ass.

It doesn't matter what religions these mundanes get themselves into. They generally always use such religions as a means to feed their egos or as a means to make themselves look better, smarter, Whiter, more logical than others. And "Satanism" has become the same way.

Satanism has officially devolved into the world's first internet religion. It now only exists as a "real" concept in forums dedicated to Satanism. It's not even a religion anymore, it's a "philosophy." But a special kind of philosophy: the kind that is just a pre-requisite for posting and mingling with other Satanists in Satanic Forums. Like speakeasies way back in the gangster days where if you wanted to get in, you had to be "cool" and be into the gangster culture. If you want to join and be accepted into these internet Satanic speakeasies you need to be a "Satanist." And then what? What's the next step in the religion of Cybersatanism? The cool thing to do if you were a cybersatanist in the 90's was give yourself a giant title like "Supreme Grand Magister," and make yourself a website selling your dumb shit wack ass worldviews to ignorant prepubescent rebels that don't even have hair on their balls yet, let alone a brain to Think with.

But those pretentious days of cybersatanism are over. Having a make believe title these days in the 2011's is silly. Cybersatanism has evolved to be more humble these days. Just be your dumbass self with your real name and adopt contemporary cybersatanic culture. These days the new pretentious game is debating about who understands "Satanism" better in the forums.

Except because of the Satanic internet boom of the 90's there are dozens of different "Satanisms," and every other Satanist seems to think they are the boss and some authority on all of Satanism. So after joining a Satanic forum, a cybersatanist must work on being a posting predator and out debate others about an incoherent and fractured memeplex. Fuck Real Life. A True cybersatanist shuns Real Life, because you can be boss online in those forums and shit, whereas in Real Life, your just a dumb fuck nobody.

Wicca outdid Satanism. Satanists like to talk shit about things like Wicca. "It's white light," they say. What's wrong with being "white" white boy? Who made all those "white" light religions white boy? Whose ancestors and parents sold out their ancestral pre-christian pagan Culture for those "white" light religions white boy? Ever think about that Whitie? All the religions you designate as "Right Hand Path," who invented them, and who bought that "white" light snake oil like a heroin junkie on a mission to get a fix? White people. Satanists dislike Wicca. But at least Wicca actually took root in the Real World and is alive in that Real World. In fact most of the other religions a Satanist dislikes – unlike Satanism – has thousand year old roots, with branches and numinous cultures and living traditions that stretches across time. How do you take something as lifeless as Satanism and compare it to Living Trees. Work on trying to get Satanism out of the book pages, out of your own heads, and off the internet first, then maybe start talking shit about other religions. Prove in action and manifestation that Satanism is "better" than memeplexes that have manifested entire civilizations.

Talk is cheap, and debating is bitching in a smart way. Winning an argument doesn't prove shit in real life. The Fruit of your memeplex's actions proves its Shit. Who once said: "By their fruits ye shall know them"? But you WHAM's into Satanism will not understand what I'm trying to say between the lines I write, because most of you are so enchanted by the awesomeness of your own egos and so lost in the internet culture, that you don't have a face, a spirit, a name, a self, an identity sans cybersatanism. What you got besides pretentious ego assertions of opinions?

From what I have read, Satanism used to be cool, as it was back in the 70's and 80's. Back then it was a real psychological and emotional rebellion that liberated an awakened portion of a small portion of the West's "collective mind." A collective mind breaking away from a stale and lifeless post-war conservative age. What happened to Satanism? Easy answer: the Bitches, Faggots, and Egghead social rejects got to it. What do I mean by that? I'll drop the knowledge SubGenius style. Before I was a "Satanist" online, I was a "member" of the Church of the SubGenius 7 years ago. I actually read every pamphlet they had and read every book they published.

So the mythos is that there are a race of aliens that feed off of human souls by injecting these souls into their veins like heroin. These aliens were bullying a machine-god named JHVH-1, since he owns this shit hole earth which had humans on it. To save the human race J.R. Bob Dobbs makes a special deal with JHVH-1. The deal was to let Bob deal human souls to these alien drug fiends, but they were going to deal junk human souls and save a race of humans called the SubGeni who were descendents of the mighty Yeti. Bob establish a Church for these Subgeni which was actually a secret Pink production factory.

“Pinks” are what Bob calls the “bitches, faggots, and eggheads.” Bob secretly makes Pinks to sell their souls to the aliens. The thing with the Pinks is that they are a part of something heinous called The Con! Which is short for the Conspiracy Of Normalcy. The CON is used by Bob’s enemies to destroy potentially liberating religions so that they can keep the human race in bondage. The CON sends its Pinks into every religion and life style that was once cool and unique to make it Pink and NORMAL aka Pretty and faggoty. The CON can’t help it. It’s in the CON’s nature to Normalize everything it touches into a basket of daisies that even your grandparents and the Red Hat society ladies can appreciate.

Bob Dobbs is a master of Psycho Analysis. He knows the science of analyzing and understanding psychos. He understands the nature of the CON which is why he created the Church of the SubGenius. Because as soon as the CON senses something out there is new, cool, DIFFERENT, and not Normal, it will send in its zombie agents to infiltrate the group and faggotize it for the CON. So you have/had all these CON fags and bitches joining the Church of the SubGenius thinking they are SubGeniuses and cool. These wannabes are the Pinks.

Pink is what went wrong with Satanism. The CON got to it. Satanism had potential to grow up to be a powerfully liberating religion. But like the FBI did to the Black Panthers, faggot saboteurs and agent provocateurs infiltrated Satanism during the 90’s and turned Satanism into a dysfunctional internet group of sissies that bitch at each other.

I’m not saying every Satanist is a bitch. I know many intelligent Satanists who boss dumbasses in forums with a mighty Mind. But I am a Buddhist and live in an Oriental weltanschauung. I naturally can discern the difference between a memeplex and the Living Human/Person behind the memeplex. Doesn’t matter what memeplex you put a Boss behind, they’ll wield that memeplex like a master swordsman works a sword. Having said that most of you Satanists are punk ass bitches. And it’s not your inanimate memeplex’s fault either. It’s just how you are as a person: a Fuck Up.

Why did the FBI infiltrate the Black Panthers? Coherency. Just as the tactics British intelligence used to disrupt Combat 18’s old Coherency. They simply had to spread rumors that it was infiltrated and the group bitched [infighting] itself to death. Back in the 60’s organizations like the Panthers, and the Nation of Islam brought together a subjugated and lost people [Blacks] and gave them a common culture, common identity, common “spirit,” and common struggle. That coherency of a race of millions of Blacks who knew for sure that the white race and white government fucked them and their ancestors over was a real threat to the Status Quo of the Nation-State at the time. Something had to be done.

What happened a few years after the Panthers and such coherent pro-Black movements fell apart? Young Black people started to try and create some sense of culture and identity for themselves so they started to form their own groups in their high schools and neighborhoods that emulated the Panthers and other such movements of that era. Then what happened? Provocateurs went in and divided them up. One of these old day groups spilt in the 70’s as two factions known as the “crips,” and “bloods.”

At first they were minor gangs that fought with fists and bats like gangs did in the 50’s. But strange things started to happen. What? Abandoned train yards would once in a while get a train with a cargo of military grade arms. Where did they come from? What were they doing in the ghettos? Doesn't matter. What matters is the End Result and aftermath.

What was and is the aftermath? Strategy: Permanently disable the threat. You got crips armed with AK's and rival Bloods armed with AK's. What happened? Black on black war. Instead of a Black people United for a single purpose "unseen influence" caused these Black people to turn on each other. How easy is it to perpetuate this permanent disabling of a threat? Easy: just find the most popular ghettos stars in a hood, and make him a rap star. He'll rap about gangbanging and inspire those that look up to him to continue to perpetuate the self destruction. And its been 40 years and these people can't get themselves out of their economic and social traps.

Satanism isn't anywhere near the real world organization and sophistication of the Black Panther Party or even the old time Nation of Islam. But it's original ideological essence is still a threat to the Status Quo. But with something as unorganized as Satanism, its easy for an anonymous saboteur in the 90's and 2000's to come online and start rival memplexes. Why? To disable a potential threat by causing self destruction. So what do we all know and see about Satanism today? It is divided into different groups, every Satanist thinks they got the shit, every other Satanist is programmed to reject the idea of coming together for any project, and internet Satanism generates what? Bitchery, faggotry, Egghead debates. Satanism has become a group of generic WalMart Intellectuals congregating online to measure their dick sizes and point out each others grammatical errors and logical fallacies. What is the End Product of WalMart-Intellectual dick measuring online? When your ass is to busy trying to out dick everybody online: Nobody manifests shit in the Real World. And you people don't See this shit.

Lock Down

It's clear – if you open your eyes – to objectively see that having your group/memplex infiltrated by the CON of Bitches, Faggots, and WalMart-Intellectuals that such Undesirables fuck up a system/coherency more than they can contribute to the coherency of a group. It's a positive and productive thing that the ONA is rejected and dismissed by the mundanes and their Walmart-Intellectual post-gurus.

How do you put your memplex on lock down to guard it from being liked by Mundanes who would just fuck shit up, or fuck up a memplexes potential? You put up smoke and mirrors. Condoning things like Human Sacrifice, Killing, and Crime also does the trick very well. Those mundane clowns have a natural aversive reaction to things like human sacrifice, murder, and crime. For such things goes against their bitch-ethos. Such things are rejected by the WalMart-Intellectual because you simply can't debate the philosophical ramifications of human sacrifice, murder, and crime to out intellectualize others. Walmart-Intellectuals like doctrines, texts, and posts. Juggling words around and pointing out fallacious arguments is their forte. It makes them look smart and good to the mental cripples that make up 90% of most Satanic groups.

As much lip service as they pay to “non-conformity” when some random Walmart-Intellectual posts an dismissive opinion about a religion or rival memplex, the mental cripples of the little Satanic social order Follows in agreement. Do they investigate shit on their own terms and time? Fuck no, it ain’t in their nature to do so.

When somebody like Blackwood tells his Joy of Satan rejects that the ONA is fake and a hoax, do his Followers go thru the 5000 pages worth of written ONA stuff on their own to validate such opinions? When Aquino proscribes and dismisses the ONA do his Followers investigate what’s behind the smoke and mirrors? ONA may “make” the smoke and mirrors, but you mundanes put the shit up yourselves and believe your own bullshit you put up. But it works to the ONA’s advantage. Why? Because you won’t find a Pink Bitch, Faggot, or WalMart-Intellectual associated with the ONA in any way. For 40 years whatever the ONA is it has been free of Pinks and the CON. That’s something to be proud of if your are affiliated!

What Is The ONA?

Fuck you, it doesn’t matter what it is. If you were genuinely interested in it you’d investigate the shit on your own. There are thousands of pages written about the Order of Nine Angles, mostly by “Anton Long,” over a period of 40 years. Having read such material if you resonate with the shit, you’d know what to do on your own. It’s all spelt out in literally thousands of pages.

Where did the ONA come from? Who gives a shit. The question is where can it be taken?

Who made the ONA? Who gives a fuck. The question is what can you make out of it?

Is the ONA as hoax? Who cares, the question is: Who is falling for it? The mundane “Satanists” or those that put the ONA shit into practice in their daily lives and reap results and those behind the written material?

Does the ONA have real members? If you had to ask, you failed to read material available all over the internet written by the handful of individuals behind the written material.

How can I join it? Fuck you. If you have to ask, you don’t have IT or get IT. Go join one of those Satanic forums.

Whose behind the ONA? Same people for the past 40 years. “Anton Long,” “Beesty Boy,” their close associates, and “friends of friends.” The ONA was never big in numbers, and has always been a semi-private affair concerning “friends of friends,” meaning you know someone who knows “Anton Long.”

But I thought “Anton Long” left for Jihad? Says internet chattering, rumors, and speculations of Walmart-Intellectuals. Or maybe he “did” but “he” never left the ONA. Most often those with an opinion about the man behind “Anton Long” don’t actually know Him personally in real life. Such WalMart-Intellectuals base their egghead opinions on what they have read written by others on the internet.

Who is the current leader of the ONA? No god damn body is. Even Anton Long states in several writings that he is not The Leader. The question should be: If you resonate with this shit, how can you lead the ONA to where you want it to go?

But I'm not a Nazi? So, I'm not White. I am into Reichsfolk aka Ethical National-Socialism though. But I would encourage any Caucasian associate of the ONA to be Nazi or join a skinhead gang and learn to put in real work in the real world for something. As opposed to debating platitudes. If you are Black go restart a racist Black movement, or go plants seeds that will help free your people in the future. Fuck this internet culture shit. The internet is good only for 5 things: 1) Staying connected with family and friends; 2) Researching; 3) Transmitting information; 4) Internet commerce; 5) Youtube. If you are on the internet for some other reason then you need to make friends in the real world and lay off the porn.

Do you have to be a Traditional Satanist to be ONA? I'm a Buddhist. I have a feeling "Anton Long" doesn't worship the devil either. In fact many associates I know into the ONA thing [Friends of Friends] are not Satanists or have abandoned Satanism. How many times must it be written that the ONA is not the Outer Forms it makes? Dhamma is not any vehicle of Buddhism. The vehicle carries or transmits the Dhamma to a specific target audience.

General Data About ONA

The ONA's foundation is something called the Sinister Way, which is a Way of Life but which also alluded to the practical system of seven initiation grades found in Naos. The Sinister Way itself is an expression of what may be called the Sinister Ethos. If you have to ask what the "Sinister Ethos" is then you don't have it, and so the ONA was not made for you. If you have it, then you'll naturally know what to do with it and how the ONA may fit into your repertoire or refine your skills.

There is a difference between "Satanism" or "Satanic" and being "Sinister." Usually the word Satanism refers to a principle or belief system [-ism] related to the meme "Satan." Sometimes this meme "Satan" in some schools of thought is parsed to mean "Adversarial." In the sense that its basic ethos is "adversarial," "adverse to," "antagonistic with," "reactionistic to" something else. Not every philosophical system which is "adversarial" in nature is "Satanic." Like what? Like Theravada Buddhism was to Brahmanism. Life is only "adversarial" depending on where you exist and what end of the stick you exist on. In an Urban setting, at the lowest end of the social totem pole? Sure, life is a bitch. In Nature, Life is a symbiotic whole system-organism. On the very top of the urban totem pole, life is easy because you bitches make their lives easy.

The meme "Sinister" is used often by the ONA to allude to an ethos, physis, inner nature, quality of Being certain individuals natural have which is not acceptable to mundane people, and conventional social behaviour. "Sinister" does not always mean "against" something. You need "something" to react to, to be "adversely" affected by it enough to be "adversarial" to this "something." You don't need anything to be "Sinister." You may just require the right opportunities and means to put that Sinister Nature to use. Such as a lone man in a dark street; lone girl in a quiet place; a neighborhood of dope fiends looking for a fix; a group of people looking for a new religion; an enemy in your face; etc.

If you are the type of person to know what to do in such situations, then you are “Sinister” by Nature. But not every human with a sinister ethos is “ONA.” People with a sinister ethos usually come together to form their own “associations.” For example gangs, mobs, criminal enterprises, bankers, politicians and the cliques, are a number of such “associations.” In every case such sinister “associations” have one common “work ethics”: exploiting the mundane public for personal and/or group interest, power, and wealth, regardless of law and order. The ONA is just one of thousands which has a training system [The Seven Fold Way] for its initiates to refine their Sinister Nature, and provides a common mythos to engineer a common Sinister Way and Culture.

Thus, if you understand the above paragraphs in Heart, you will understand that there is no such thing as “membership” in some ONA nor some belief system to adopt. You are either Sinister By Nature or not. If you are Sinister and you resonate with the Mythos, Way, and Culture of the ONA, you affiliate yourself with it and Live it in your daily Life. If you come across something in the ONA you are not too crazy about that does not reflect your personal Sinister character, then you should be smart enough to tweak and customize the ONA to fit your own personal nature. What is written “out there” by Anton Long and friends are just sign posts and templates; or Raw Material with which you use to Build your own thing with. Don’t debate raw material, Build something with it! If some of the raw material is hard to work with change the mutherfucker and make the bitch work! In this way there is a gradual “Ordering” or collecting of like Natured individuals over time crystalizing within the same memplex as a coherent structure. As a Quartz crystal grows slowly in a coherently structured manner by gradually adding only those specific atoms that resonates with its acausal membrane. Thus the word “Order.” “Nine Angles” refers to key aspects of this amalgamation of Sinister Associates. You don’t “join” the ONA, you Live it as a means or vehicle to help express your Sinister Ethos.

Sinister Ethos does not necessarily denote crime and outlaw behaviour. It may also allude to a certain way of thinking or weltanschauung. It may allude to a dark spirited artistic talent you have such as the making of music, writing, and artwork which inspires good ole fashion sinister activities. Thus, the ONA is not in the business of converting Occultniks and Satanists. You can’t give somebody devoid of the Sinister Ethos, the Sinister Ethos. It’s just how you are as a person. You either have it or you don’t. If you don’t have it, you will see the ONA as an undesirable and despicable thing. Good. Go away. Go join an internet forum and debate.

The ONA is the collective “project” of a small handful of people. It was initially started by “Anton Long” with “Beesty Boy” in the old days. Since then many others have joined this “project” and have helped evolve the ONA over the past 40 years. Anton Long still to this day writes for the ONA as does Beesty Boy: although not as often as some of us would like. But Beesty Boy has his art and music to nurture.

Because there are always people behind this “Project” – or as some of us calls it: the Family Business – the ONA is like a person. A person in real life is not a static entity. A person grows, makes mistakes, learns from those mistakes, changes their minds, grows in understanding, etc. The ONA is just like this. It literally grows and changes with those people constantly behind the Family Business. The ONA of the 70's is thus not the ONA of the 80's. The ONA of the 90's is not the ONA of the moment. And in a few years it will be different still. As it should be, for a living and evolving memplex.

This constant change make it hard for a mundane to grasp and understand the ONA. Why? Because mundanes are looking for things to believe in, such as doctrines, dogmas, ideas that tickle their egos. Something that constantly morphs and changes confuses the mundane mind because as soon as they think the ONA teaches and believes in one thing, it may completely be abandoned later. For example the old 21 Satanic Points are non applicable in the ONA today.

Why does the ONA morph and change? Because it isn't a belief system. There is nothing to believe. Sinister Ethos is not a set of doctrines. Ethos has nothing to do with doctrine. It is one's physis and Physis itself, which is in a constant state of change. A Way of Life moves in tandem with That Which Lives It: the Person. A belief system stays put in the text of a defied book. One who has the Sinister Ethos when living the Sinister Way will develop their own belief system [if they need one] or continue to maintain the numinous living traditions of their ancestors. A Way of Life is not a way of believing or thinking. It is nothing to be debated or intellectualized. It is Lived, and if some parts of the Sinister Way as developed by the ONA does not work in the Lab of Human experience, the Sinister Initiate should be pragmatic and practical enough to make the necessary changes. Thus over time the ONA changes.

What is written by those involved in this ONA "Project" is not doctrine, infallible, or group Law. Most of the time when those into this ONA Project writes we just share insights and thoughts with each other via this internet medium. Sometimes such insights will inspire us to act, think, write, draw, paint, do, compose our own things. If it did, then it did its job. Sometimes what we write we just ramble on about nothing in particular that makes any coherent sense. Which is something I tend to do. These writings of ours isn't meant to be bibles, scriptures, college discourses, or thesis papers. They were meant to share insights, personal experiences, and inspire not indoctrinate or even teach. There is a difference.

What is the difference? The written ideology of German Nationalsozialismus is the Doctrine. Hitler and his speeches, and the collective ceremonies is the Inspiring Factor. Doctrines rarely captures the Hearts of the mass and drive them to slaughter, suicide, and self destruction. Inspiration does. The down trodden German people of post-WWI had lost there dignity and pride as a people. German NS ideology could have been written in Hebrew or Pig Latin for all it mattered to the Germans of that era. Hitler breathed Life and Hope back into them and from that "resurrection" a once despised people became the most feared in Europe at the time.

More power can be created and manifested in people when their inner Being is inspired by Life. The breath and feel of inspiration is what gives birth to change and evolution. Texts books and academic papers didn't drive the Earth's creatures to evolve. The environment or opportunity inspired the evolution. You were either inspired to evolve over time and adapt or die out. There are no words, abstractions, doctrines, or debates involved.

If somebody's writings in the Family Business are faulty or lacking don't argue and bitch about it. Take the initiative to change it for the better, if you believe you can do better, by all means. The way that this ONA Project works is like a Memetic Meritocracy, where memes go through this process of natural peer review and where such memes either drift their way to the bottom of the pile where they are left to grow outdated, or where they climb to the Top of the pile where they infect and inspire.

Thus names and faces in the ONA rarely matter. Many in the Family Business change or use pseudonyms and various personas which constantly changes. What matters are the memes and the inspiration. Not the names, the glory, the hope of some group of people looking up to you as some leader or authority figure. "Anton Long" is perhaps one of few exceptions. Out of Honour for what insights he has presented continuously for the past 40 years.

Because of the man behind "Anton Long," there is more to the ONA then what is generally assumed to be "ONA." There are also Reichsfolk and the Numinous Way. Beneath the causal shell or Outer Form, all three are basically the same Essence. If the ONA were likened to a Lake, Reichsfolk National-Socialism and the Numinous Way are two Rivers that feeds this Lake replenishing it with New Water.

Thus there is a Form or type of ONA Initiate called a "Drecc," or "Dreccian" who has the Sinister Nature and Lives the Sinister Way, but is not a Satanist, such as myself. A Drecc usually does not use the ONA's outer form of Satanism, and instead uses Reichsfolk NS and the Numinous Way to supplement their Sinister Seven Fold Way. Not every person associated with the ONA is a Satanist, some are better described as just "Myattian" which will one day be a real demonym of a small group of people.

This means that for a Drecc, there are more than 5000 pages of ONA stuff to study; but thousands of more pages written my Myatt regarding Reichsfolk and his Philosophy of the Numen. I am one person who believes that only after thoroughly familiarizing oneself with the entirety of a memeplex and all of its writings and practices can one make a meaningful assessment of the memeplex and/or its author[s]. I can honestly say after reading page after page that I like Myatt and that I think whatever his is creating is something I also would like to help create. And his writings have inspired me to think differently, to see the world differently, and to write my own thoughts here, which written thoughts may now number a thousand pages of its own. Which is a "gift" to be honoured, according to my own culture [the gift of and elder's insights.]

Closing Comments

Ironically David Myatt over the years has not converted me to being a "better" Satanist. Quiet the opposite. His writings have distanced me away from "Satanism," and has genuinely caused me to better understand my own indigenous Buddhism, and his writings have also inspired me to deeply appreciate my own indigenous culture and ancestral Living Traditions. Which in itself is another "gift" worth honouring. Because many first and second generation immigrants to America lose their indigenous identity and ancestral culture to this ubiquitous mundane secularism. A Tree without Roots is Fruitless.

I don't know what to say the "ONA" is really. So many pages have been written about it, yet its essence remains wordless. All I know personally is that for many years I have been reading and still do read Myatt's writings, which has inspired me, not only in how I see Life and myself, not only in giving me a sense of pride for who and what I am as an ethnic person, but also has inspired me to Live my own life in a more Numinous and Natural way in Harmony to my own inner nature and the Nature that Flows outside and around me.

It has never mattered to me what the ONA is or was. And I doubt it really matters to Myatt, Beesty Boy, the Old Guards, or anybody associated with their ideas. What has always mattered to me, or what I devote my attention and time to is What I can help make the ONA into and Where I can help take the ONA. And Why I should desire to do such a thing. Why is the Final question.

Anybody who has devoted time and effort to reading Myatt's 40 years worth of writing knows Why [if they are still alive inside]. It has nothing to do with some silly Satanism. It never did. It's one man's Quest to dis-cover himself, and during that Quest he may have dis-covered that there is a distant and cold abstract state watching over a population of people who have lost their Humanness, roots, their indigenous, Numinous, "pagan," Culture and Way of Life. And so what long ago may have begun as a clumsy side project, has over the years – form Pathei Mathos and the Ripening of Age – blossomed into a Fathering of a new Mythos, Culture, and Numinous Way of Life for an Unborn Generation that may come long after us who will search in the distant past for something to breath Life into their people once more.

SOME ANSWERS TO SEARCH TERMS

Answers To Some Search Terms

This blog gets a few reoccurring search terms that people look up as if they are trying to get more info on these searched terms? By reoccurring I mean the same wording of search terms shows up on our stats at least once every other week repeatedly for months and years. Most of these don't have anything to do with ONA. But I feel bad for whoever is looking for answers searching over and over again so I'll just gather the most frequent ones and try to answer them here for whoever.

First Search Term:

“What is the difference between a tribe and a clan?”

Answer: One envelops the other. A “clan” just means a big extended family. This clan usually exists “inside” of a much larger grouping of people which we would call a “tribe.”

If we were to take 1000 Americans and stick them in the middle of the amazon jungle, inside that jungle these Americans would anthropologically be considered a “tribe” of people. Why? Because they share common customs, traditions, views and dialect of language distinguishable from other groups of people in this jungle. So that is technically what a “tribe” is.

A clan a word that usually tries to mean – at least in my culture – your great grandparents and every human that came out of them down to the tiniest baby and their spouses. All of that is a “clan.”

So what happens in this culture is say your great grandma – since we are socially and domestically matriarchal – has 5 siblings who each have progeny of their own. Each of those siblings of your great grandma is the Pillar or starting point of another clan which is a sister clan to yours. In this case a “tribe” is all clans that share a common history and ancestry.

Some real tribes here in America get all legal and specific. I found this out way back during my college years when me and a few of my friends had this idea of experiencing a hallucinogenic plant called Peyote. We had heard that it gives you a mind blowing trip, so we planned to go buy some “buttons” of Peyote. Except its a federally controlled plant we learned. Only Indians are technically allowed to grow and use Peyote. Then we learned that such Indian tribes actually have tribal rules for who and what constitutes a member of their tribe. Usually their rule states that to be considered “Indian,” or “Native American” you have to be at least 1/8th Native American. Meaning – if I’m doing my math right – one of your 4 grand parents has to be Indian to be considered Indian.

We found away around this legality though. There is this own “church” located on an Indian reservation out in Arizona by Kingstown which offers Peyote buttons as “holy” Native American sacraments lol. My friend actually called this church and asked for information on “church services,” and what the holy sacrament can do to you. The “minister” told my friends some info and added that the buttons have to be peeled right or you can be poisoned and die a horrible death. The minister also said that when you eat the button it makes you very sick in your stomach and you will vomit during the whole experience and may even shit on yourself. My friends got all excited. They were like: “Fuck yeah! It’s camping out and trippin on good shit!” Once they told me the finer details of barfing and defecating on yourself, I naturally opted out. I’d rather take a wafer.

The Scottish and Irish make these things called clans and tribes harder to understand, for me at least. When they say “clan” it seems like they mean everyone with the same last name. Like every McMullet belongs to Clan McMullet. That could be tens of thousands. You know how many MacDonalds there are in America. If that’s how big their clans are, then where are their tribes at?

In my culture marrying people outside of our own culture and tradition is a cause for great confusion. It’s not a tragic confusion, just old folks not knowing who is family and who is not. I like teasing old people in my family. For example when the elders gather to eat and hang out together I’ll show them a picture of a Penguin from Antarctica. In the Khmer, Thai, indigenous [folk] “science” of zoology a “fish” [trey] actually means any aquatic animal with fins or flippers. So I’ll go up to them with a Penguin picture and show them youtube videos of Penguins in the sea and asked them: “Grandpas what do you call this creature in Khmer, is it a fish or a bird?” The funny part is to just sit there after you ask that question because all these 70 year old men actually get into these long winded and heated debated on whether the creature I showed them is a fish or a bird. Since they’ve never seen a penguin what they usually say which is funny to me and my cousins is usually: “We’ve never seen anything like that in our country. What is that. It’s a fish with a beak and feet? What country do they live in?” If I laugh too much they’ll shake a fist at me and say: “Bad karma for you grandchild! Just wait and see. You’ll get old some day too.”

But with their confusion with clans, it’s based on how we live as a people by ancient tradition. In Thai, Khmer, and Lao culture daughters stay with their parents when they marry and the sons are the ones that leave to live with their wives parents. In our culture you never “move out.” You either live with your parents or your spouses parents forever. So in a clan you will always have many generations living together, sometimes in the same house.

So the way things works is that when a girl in our family marries her husband lives with us and so their children is “one of us,” or a member of our clan. If a boy in our family marries he goes to live with his wife and her parents and their children are members of that family/clan. Because traditionally since ancient times, the girl stays put, it becomes that what clan you belong to depends on what clan your mother belongs to. But this is ancient unwritten common law that only works inside a people who share that same way of life.

The confusion can happen when one of us – Thai, Khmer, Lao – even marries a Vietnamese. The Vietnamese do this the opposite way around. Their sons stays put with their parents and their wives moves in, and vise versa. So what happens is that if a girl from our clan/family loves a Vietnamese man, she goes to move in with her husband, and that is what challenges these old people’s ancient traditional way of counting relations. Because when the girl has a baby, which clan/family does that baby belong to? It’s worse with those of my generation who do things like Americans and just get married with somebody of a different culture and move out on their own, cuz when they are on their own they aren’t living with any clan, so the child is clanless, or considered to be family-less, since a family and a clan in this culture is the same thing.

But the old people have a back up method of tell who is what. In our culture, your “ethnicity” is not based on skin color but Language you speak. I think – if I remember right – that the ancient Greeks and Romans saw “ethnicity” in the same or similar way? Meaning you are Greek if you speak Greek.

So with my family and culture, by blood we are Thai/Chinese, but since most speak the Khmer language we are “ethnically” Khmer, by this way of reckoning. This means that if a girl from our family moves in with her Vietnamese family and that child speaks Vietnamese, the child is Vietnamese and rightfully belongs to that Vietnamese people and culture who raises it. But if it’s mother teaches it Thai or Khmer and our culture, than it is Us and thus a member of our clan and family. If it speaks Both languages and practices Both traditions and culture, than it is considered to be a “mixed” child. This has nothing to do with blood and genetics.

This is different from a Western way of reckoning Race and ethnicity. In the West you are whatever you were born in and/or whatever your parents are. If you were born inside of China you are Chinese, even if you don't speak a word of Chinese or know its culture. If you are Black, than you are eternally identified as being “African,” even though most “African”-Americans here have not seen Africa or has anything to do with Africa in 300-400 or so years. Which is the same amount of time the Europeans have been living in America. Yet they don't call themselves European-Americans. They call themselves just Americans. Whereas Other people are forever Mexican-American, Asian-American, and African-American. Why? That causes a subtle psychological effect on the psyche of some people. It makes some of us feel like we are not fully American, as if we are second class citizens. Wouldn't it be funny if women here were referred to as Women-Americans. How about Gay-American too. Why just be half considerate, let's just call them Fudgepacker-Americans.

I brought this topic up in a debate of some sort with the old people in my family once. It wasn't a debate, more like getting clarification. I asked some of the grandpas: “If the grandfathers are by blood Thai and Chinese but consider themselves to be Khmer because you speak Khmer; then what are me and my cousins if we don't speak Khmer, or Thai, or Chinese. Are we Thai people?”

I tried to explain to the old people there how the Americans see this. Technically since me and most of my cousins were not born in Cambodia, and technically since nobody in the family is racially mixed with Khmer, than me and my cousins technically are ethnically Thai and Chinese. But the old people shook their heads and disagreed. One of the grandpas said: “Do you speak Thai or understand spoken Chinese?” I said: “No.” And he said: “Then you are not Thai or Chinese. How can you claim to be of a people if you don't know the people's language or culture? You are whatever you and your kin speaks. We speak Khmer. Thus you are Khmer.” But I added: “I only understand Khmer. Us cousins speak only English.” So another grandpa adds to that: “Then you are in between our race and theirs. You little ones are thus half whatever we are and whatever they are.”

If we take one country in Southeast Asia like Cambodia and study its population, we'll see something interesting. The Southwestern region of this country is inhabited by what we might call “Negroid” people. These people have a skin tone slightly darker than that of a Dravidian and African. Genetically they are related to the humans found on the Andaman and Nicobar Islands. The Khmer and Mon languages themselves are related to the language spoken on those islands. But those islanders speak a much more isolated and ancient dialect of Mon-Khmer. I don't know if you have ever image googled “Andaman and Nicobar” to see the people on these islands, but they are so dark they look blue. These people are also via DNA related to the Aborigines of Australia.

The Southeast of this country is inhabited by a people brown skinned in complexion who are descendents Islanders from Malaysia, Indonesia, the Philippines, and Papua New Guinea. The Khmer language still has words it shares in common with languages found on all of these islands.

The word “Khmer” itself has variations in the Southeast Asian Peninsula. In Thailand there is a tribe of hill people of a brown complexion not of “Mongoloid” stock that call themselves the Khmu [k-moo]. And then in Thailand there is a different ethnicity of non-tribal people called the Kham/Khom who speak a language related and intelligible to Khmer. The Thais used the alphabet of the Kham to create theirs. The word “Khmer” as it is spelled like that with European letters is a French rendering and should be pronounced as a Frenchman would say it, as “K-may(r)” with their weird R that the Germans make to. The old French colonialists had to render it like that because their language actually lacks the vowel sound the “-er” represents. The word when spoken sounds like we’re saying “K-my” like the English word “My” with a K sound at the beginning. It’s not a long ‘l’ sound. It’s an “AE” sound which Old English once had, and which the Portuguese still have in their word “Mae” meaning mom/mother.

All those variations: Kham, Khmu, Khmy, Khmi; are variations of the word “Khmau” the -AU sounding like the OW in Cow. The word Khmau is the Khmer word for the color “Black.” Interestingly enough, way back in Ancient Egypt the word “Kemu” [and its variations] also means Black. The MtDNA of these dark skinned people of this country via the Monda/Munda which is an older group of people Mon-Khmer came out of is genetically linked to the mummies found in the Valley of Kings in Egypt. Many of the mummies in that valley were of Monda stock. This Monda group of people exists in pockets from India, into the Arabian Peninsula, into Ethiopia [Nubia]. Monda has the root word “Mon/Mun” in it from where you get Mon-Khmer. Mon meaning “First” and “Original,” very similar – if not the same root – in the Greek word Mono, as in the word “Monogamy” etc. The Khmer word for “One” being “Muy.”

The Monda/Munda language is important to any person interested in the Indic Civilization. Monda and its sister – unrelated – language Dravidian had a huge influence on what we know of today as “Sanskrit.” In fact most of all the high profile words we assume to be native genetic Sanskrit such as Karma, Dharma, Shiva, etc, are genetically Dravidian words not native to Sanskrit. The Monda language in early times mostly contributed to Sanskrit’s grammar and low profile words. The Dravidian language – if you like language like I do – shares words in common with Bantu languages in Africa.

In the northern region of this country [Cambodia] are a completely different kind of people whom we might call “Mongoloid.” These people migrated from China with the Tai-Kradai [ancient Thai-Lao people]. Later they mixed with the Mon and Khmer. This is the base stock I come from. We have very light if not pale skin, like our northern Chinese ancestors who mostly came down to this peninsula to escape the horde of Genghis Khan. We have different facial structures, thinner and taller noses, and our eyes are slightly slanted, unlike the people down south.

So in this little country alone which is smaller than LA County you have at least 3 different so called “races” according how Westerners defines a “race.” But to these people, since ancient times, every person I have described are authentically Khmer in Race because these people reckon Race or Ethnicity by the Language you speak. In our Minds or “weltanschauung” when we see or meet another person of a different skin color and physical feature from us, if they speak Khmer, we feel them to be Khmer. It’s just that they might be of a darker complexion and look different. If you were Caucasian and you lived in this country with these people for several generations so that your grandchildren spoke Khmer, they would be – felt to be – Khmer by Race and Ethnicity based on the Language they speak, and long-time close familiarity. The skin tone to these ancient people has nothing to do with the “race” you are and the people you “belong” to. It’s only in this Western civilization that race is based on look and skin tone. The point is, it is ignorant and myopic to believe and assume that just because you as a Westerner sees Race the way you do, that all humans on earth [7 billion] sees Race in the same way. This simply is not true and not a constant in the real human world. If you would just venture out beyond that myopia, you just might realized that you are alone in the way you reckon race and ethnicity in the human world: Backwards from the rest of us, since ancient times.

Even with something like the old Cherokee tribe in old days this was the case if you would just snap out of that myopic view of the world. Back in the old days when Black slaves ran away, sometimes they ended up living with the native Cherokees. After these exslaves learned to speak Cherokee and lived like they do, they were considered – Empathed – by the tribe to be full Cherorkee. And the same with White people that abandoned their cities to live with the Cherokee in the past. You are Cherokee if you speak and live like everyone else who considers themselves of be Cherokee. And when there was a war between two tribes, what usually happened is the Cherokees would take some of the other tribe’s people and absorb them into their tribe as full Cherokee. Race to ancient people had nothing to do with skin color. What can be more Superficial than to judge a person by the superficial hue of their skin? Do you know what the word “Superficial” means? It’s from the word “Superfice,” which is the old word for a 2 dimensional shape. A triangle is a superfice, a square is a superfice, so is a rombus. When you add depth to a superfice you get what? A Solid. The Solid of a superficial circle is a Sphere. Some of you people literally see the world and humanity in 2 dimensions: just the surface and no Depth. What is below the superficial layer of human skin? The human Heart [chitta]. The Heart is the Depth of a person. It is with the Human Heart [chitta] that we Understand [buddhi] the Depth of things, not with the eyes.

A Tribe is a grouping of people that live in close proximity to each other such that over time they have interbred, and have come to hare a common history, ancestry, culture, tradition, customs, observances, dialect, and world-model-view. A clan is an big family inside the tribe which makes up a tribe. Color of skin and facial feature has nothing to do with clans and tribes. It’s just that after hundreds of years living and breeding together, all of your tribe people end up looking the same, and different from other tribes of people.

Second Search Term:

“Black Sun.”

Answer: Black Sun is the second most searched term used to find this blog for some reason. I don’t know much of anything about how the imagery of the Black Sun was used by the Nazi Party back in old Germany. So I can’t say anything about that. But there are two different other uses of the term.

The first use is a technical astronomical extrapolation used as a tool or device. So first what you do is imagine a perfect circle. At the center of that perfect circle you imagine a dot. Around at the circumference of is swirling another dot. In this case, since the circle is Perfectly round, the central dot can logically and mathematically be denoted as the "Center" of the outer circle's orbit.

So now you imagine an Oval and around that Oval orbits a planet. Inside this uneven orbit which is not perfectly round is a Sun. This Sun is not at the center. So where is the central point in this case? In this case the Oval has two central loci. The first is the Sun itself, and the second is a reification or mathematically defines spot relative to the Sun and the Orbiting planet. Usually this second spot is very near the Sun. In this case astronomically that second spot is referred to as the "Black Sun" in olden days.

The other usage of the term Black Sun is more ancient. Oddly enough several ancient cultures share similar myths. Specifically Greece and India. In ancient times in the mythos of these two people the planet Saturn is referred to as the Black Sun. The myth via the Greek goes that Saturn was once the reign God during which time Saturn shined like the Sun. When he was dethroned he lost his fire and went dark and so he is called the black sun. In civilizations like ancient China Saturn may not have been called the black sun, but it was associated with the metal Lead, which for some weird reason is also an alchemical constant in India, old Jewish mysticism, and even European alchemy.

Even stranger is that within the growing theory of Plasma Cosmology there is a part of that theory which posits that the planet Saturn may have been a brown dwarf that got captured by the sun, and that our Earth was at one time a moon of this brown dwarf. After the brown dwarf was captured the sun's gravitation pulled away a couple moons from what would be Saturn. One large icy moon ran amok, crashed into a dwarf planet in what is the asteroid belt. The collision of Saturn's rogue moon and this planet caused the rogue moon to split into molten matter which later became the Earth and its moon. The other rogue moon is posited to be Pluto.

It's a crazy idea, but not original. Before Plasma Cosmology ever coalesced into a coherent theory, there was a Russian scientist with a very long name which started with a V [I can't remember] who had already come up with that theory or a slightly different version of that Saturnian theory.

This Russian scientist believed that the planet Venus is a rogue moon of Saturn which flew out of Saturn's orbit circa ~50,000 or so years ago and which recently just found its home orbit. This scientist said that during Venus's chaotic period of finding its equilibrium it acted like a giant comet and produced a tail which to this day is still called the "Beard of Venus." This Russian scientist says that it's because of Venus's chaotic period that the ancient referred to Venus as Lucifer, the shining star and often drew it with a beard or tail like a comet. This scientist was naturally vilified by the scientific community of his day and era. And also quite naturally, many scientists of today are now ripping off this man they once vilified as a freak. I love how some of these mundane people vilify and dehumanize creative people, then later take their ideas and pass it off as theirs.

You see that with ONA if you watch closely and study the movement and trends of the subculture. You'll see in the liberal theistic and modern camps of satanism a few attack ONA and David Myatt. Then liberally borrow concepts and words ONA and DM put together. What I find funny is to watch these Traditional Satanist [here meaning Theists] attack ONA and DM, while they use a descriptor coined by ONA and DM. Its real funny – in a pitiful way – how ONA since 1970 whatever has been teaching that Satanism is a quest of self-development and self-enlightenment while the CoS taught Satanism was liberal indulgence, and the ToS taught some Egyptian spirit being is Satan. Then now in these liberal modern satanist camp you see all these satanists talk about how Satanist is some way of self development and self enlightenment like they found buried treasure, and they attack ONA. It's funny when these liberal moderns in their cyberspaces openly use words first used by ONA such as The Sinister Way, Acausal, Causal, Numinous, etc, etc, with one breath, and dismiss and talk shit about ONA. I'm just waiting for the moment when these liberal modern satanisms in their cyberspaces to start claiming that their satanism is a quest for Pathei-Mathos and that they first used the term as they talk shit about ONA. Give it a few months.

I'm telling you, you cannot trust a breed who has no family, no culture, and knows no honour because they will turn on you. In my own culture and family if you want to marry a person one of the first things they look for in the person you want to marry is if they are orphans or if they have any family. If the person is an orphan or has no real family, then you can marry the person, can't be friends with them, and can't bring them to the house. The old folks will tell you over and over again: "A breed without a mother or culture will turn on you, your family, and children."

If you do an actual thought experiment and research about this subject, you'll see things in a different point of view. Take America and Europe. Consider both their people and population. Generally we can say that is very roughly the same size in population, the EU being bigger in population. Both of these countries are made up of the "same" "ethnic" mix of people, with Caucasians as the majority in most cases. Then you input the factor Religion into both and what do you see?

Tell me why religion and Christianity is actually dying out very fast in Europe, but Christian fundamentalism is on the rise in America? Tell me why all manners of religious sects and cults can so easily take up root in America as opposed to Europe. I'm sure Europe has its crazy cults, but count the number of crazy cults. And then think like a social scientist and ask yourself why is it that in America during the 50's era 1 out of ever 4 men belonged to a fraternal society like the Odd Fellows, Masons, Elks, etc. The question is: What is the difference between America and Europe which would cause such a noticeable variation of numbers? Especially when the EU has more people in it! Why is one gradually giving up this religion crap and the other is a cesspool of satanists, mormons, wackos and nuttjobs?

When you as a people lack your own native culture and ancestral roots, that lack causes a "hole" or empty spot in the psyche. So you run around finding a substitute culture to fill in that empty spot. In place of a real culture you see Americans substitute that lack with ideologies, idealisms, religious sects of all and every type, and so on. Why is it that these same religious sects ["cults"] and fanatic ideologies seem to not have a responsive market outside the West [mostly America]? Why don't you see Chinese and African cyberspace filled with thousands of devil worshipers, sumerianites, thelemites, rosicrucians, etc? Because they have their own cultures and traditions to satisfy that human spot. Even when things like Christianity and Mormonism takes root in a place like Southeast Asian [which it has] such religions BELIEFS in no way displaces the people's living cultures and traditions.

When Brahmanism was brought to Southeast Asian via the silk road thousands of years ago, it was adopted by the natives, but in no way did it displace the ancient animism. When Buddhism was brought over 900-1000 years ago, the natives adopted it. But that Buddhism has never and still does not displace the ancient Brahmanism and even more older folk animism.

These European-Americans here are sell outs. They cut ties with their ancestral European cultures and living history for dead things like Webster and a document call the Constitution and its ideals. Great ideals, but certainly not substitutes for human culture. And you collectively see these Americans desperately grasp for some semblance of a culture. They either reach out for other people's cultures and traditions, or they buy into sects and cults as substitute "cultures." You see them hold onto these political things like Capitalism with a death grip. Capitalism is a part of the identity pack of what an "American" is. Just like Kilts help define the identity of Irish and Scots, like Fat Buddhas is an aspect of Chinese culture, like gumbo is an aspect of Black Southern culture. God, I love gumbo with crayfish. And it's not even Capitalism that they are talking about. It's consumerism.

My once business mentor broke this topic down in baby talk for me to understand. Say you have an apple tree and you are the farmer. I come along and tell you: "Mister, I will offer my services to you and sell your apples for you so you don't have to for 5 cents an apple." You agree to the deal. So I go around selling your apples – which I didn't grow or work hard on myself – and I sell it to people who like eating apples. Only 5 cents an apples, but the market demand and its size makes me rich. In this scenario the farmer is the factory or producer of a product. The Middle Man who did not make the stuff is the Capitalist. The people buying the apples from the Middle Man is called the what? The Consumers. What is Capital? Basically money. If you are not making capital and all you do is work a wage job and buy shit, you are not a Capitalist, you are a consumer participating in a Capitalist system. And that consumerism – working a wage job and buying shit from rich people, corporations – is your culture and all that you have, besides your occultism, satanism, etc. Not even your cults, religions, ideologies, ideals, are yours. You simply Consumed them and bought them from Other who made it. At least I have all of that AND my own culture and traditions. At least the European, African, Islander, Middle Easterner, Russian has that AND their own cultures, roots, traditions.

The Black Sun is sometimes used in association with Reichsfolk National-Socialism, along with the Odal Rune and Flag. I personally really like Reicksfolk and append it to my own culture as an add-on or plug-in. Of all the "garage inventions" DM made, from my perspective Reichsfolk is the most Fruitful. I say that from a Buddhist point of view.

In Buddhism – Theravada at least – you ignore what is said, who says it, and what is done, and you focus on the Vipaka which means Fruit [End Result], or the possible future yield. Reichsfolk is simple, but its concepts actually help keep a person grounded in their culture and tradition. I've always liked Reichsfolk for its pragmatic yields in my own life and culture. Secondly I like the Numinous Way. Which is why I work at migrating Reichsfolk and Numinous Way memes into ONA. Because I like ONA and I want to have all of these things in "one place."

So the most basic principles in Reichsfolk is that one's Culture is an expression of Nature. The corollary I add to that is, because Nature is diverse in her makeup, then human Culture is most Natural when it too is diverse. So that Diversity of our many Cultures is "sacred" in Reichsfolk. This does not in any way mean that one race or folk or culture is better than any other. It just means that the diversity itself is Natural, Numinous, and Beautiful. There is room in a forest for all kinds of animals and plants. And when you look closely at each individual species you notice that they each have their own "culture," or way of life, or way of doing, or praxis.

Vultures scavenge, lions kill, leaf cutter ants farm. Tigers live as solitary animals, bees live collectively in hives. Beavers make dams out of wood, termites eats and destroys things made of wood. Penguins are monogamous, coral just squirt their stuff out in a huge cloud. Chimps are patriarchal, bonobos are matriarchal. Diversity also makes since in business. The more you are able to diversify your options and investments, the less likely you will lose your capital/investment. Can Mother Nature risk putting everything She has into one single type of creature and one single modality of? I don't believe Nature would have lasted 4 billions years if it did. With diversity, if on species fails to take Life further, others exist to try. When the reptiles of the dinosaur age could take Nature's Life any further, the Mammals stepped up and and brought us this far. Can Mother Nature really afford to invest all of her option into one single human modality of existence?

We no from business that monopoly as far as causal results goes is destructive because it decreases the chance of innovation and creative development [evolution]. And we know that when an ecosystem's balance is upset by the "monopolization" [over population] of a species, the rest of the ecosystem is destructively effected. What happens when we apply that same concept of monopolization in the Human world where only one human way of Life is the "right" or "acceptable" way? Aeonically what will happen?

Reichsfolk teaches you to just simple be mindful of your own roots, traditions, and cultures. To not give it up so easily for substitutes such as magian ethos etc. To do your children a human favour and pass them into mortal earthly existence with a firm ground to stand on, and with roots that run deep into their ancestral history. Who we are today is literally built on – or grows out of – the lives, stories, and wyrd of our ancestors in the past. We are literally a Fruit [vipaka] and end product of our past ancestors. Do you want your children to come into this world with an empty spot in their psyche like many of these Americans? Do you want them to whore themselves around with every ideology and cult to fill that empty spot? Isn't it like whoredom? Is a nympho really practicing her liberty ot have sex, or is she suffering from a deep lack and need of something? These mundane Americans, do they join the cults and believe in the ideologies they do out of natural freedom, or because of a much deeper want, need, and lack within their soul and psyche? It is a psyche of a people without culture, who literally lives their human life working 5 days a week 9-5 for wages. It's not their fault though. They are the product of decades of the untested ideals of Capitalism/Consumerism. Zombies that exist only to work and make others rich.

And so aeonically, or as a people with long-time sight, is the end Fruit of being liberal and cultureless worth it? Are we able to learn from the mistakes of others, before we ourselves commit the same acts? Can we learn from these many Americans. With something as simple as Reichsfolk, all that Dukkha of our future children and grand children's quality of life is decreased in the Now. Which is why I personally consider Reichsfolk National-Socialism to be pragmatic in character over any set of ideals or ideologies. It's simply learning to honour your blood and to strive to stay firmly rooted. A tree with shallow roots is easily felled by a mild breeze. With simple word play in a debate you can sway a cultureless person to adopt your cults, ideologies, buy your products, vote for your party, etc.

But you look at the lessons learned from the genocide committed in the past. We see that no force of genocide and mass death has the power to wipe out the culture and spirit of a people. No Communist murdering 2 million Khmers, all of their monks, was able to destroy their culture. No Mao and the 50 or so million murdered was able to wipe out the folk spirit of the Chinese people, their Confucianism, their Taoism, and Buddhism. Not even the 50 or so million slaughtered in Russia was able to wipe the minds of the Russian people clean of their imperial past, their spirit, or their faith and culture. They are still here. And the Jews. 7 million murdered and that was not able to rid the Jew of his Jewry. They are still here, and they have their own State. But yet, a simply and sly play of words in some debate or a convincing speech can sway the common cultureless American in every direction, to give up their ancestral roots and culture for lifeless ideologies, theories, and beliefs. You don't have to genocide America. They aeonically do it themselves. The only real way to get rid of a people is to make them get rid of themselves. Study your history. The Maya is a good place to start, where a people turn on itself and self destructed. Stupidity kills aeonically more efficiently than genocide. What happened to a tree without roots? It dies in Time.

Saturn in those olden days was the God of the Harvest, the original Reaper. He has the Sickle or Scythe as his symbol. The seeds have been sown. The saplings grown. Now the Fruit is born and ready to be Harvested. We all wyrdfully reap what we sow. And more importantly just as we wyrdfully reap what our ancestors have sown, so to do those in our future reap what wyrd we have woven together now. Because of the amount of National debt we today have created, the lives of our grand children will not be any better than things are today. If we think times are tough now, wait 50 more years or so. Today we see these individualized Americans exploited by corporations and political parties were they must struggle 40-50 hours of work just to barely get by. How tougher will things be for the cultureless scoundrels with no one to depend on 50 years from now? Father Saturn is Black and cold. His scythe cuts everyone their due share in Time my friends. It's just a matter of Time.

Third Search Term:

“Death”

Death is another top 10 search term and constant reoccurring search term. Death is real scary for me. Not the idea of myself dying, but of those I love around me dying. When you are raised your whole life constantly around grandpas, grandmothers, mothers, uncles, etc, the thought of them dying is scary.

Jan 22nd was the death of an old year and the start of a new one. Or at least it was the eve day of the Chinese New Year. Traditionally on the eve the whole family gathers all together at one house to eat together and hang out, catch up, etc.

The family observance of Chinese New Years starts in the morning of the eve. In our culture when the Year of the Dragon comes you shouldn't do anything on its first day, but since the Chinese go by the Lunar calander, just to be safe you don't do much all week. The traditional belief is that the Dragon represents hard work, struggle, striving, complications, things like that. So on the first day the old people warn you not to start anything or you'll get stuck working hard at it all year long. So that day every single person in our family did not go to work, called out sick, did not drive anywhere, and just spent the whole day lazy. For example my oldest cousin flew to Brazil that day for a month, so for the rest of the year he'll be stuck flying all over the place.

Then your grandmother and her siblings gather to start cooking all this food for dead people [ancestors]. The aunts and uncles stuff red envelopes with money and give them to us cousins. We bring out all these picture frames of all of our dead family members and offer the food to them, burn incense to them, and pray or ask them to watch over us and bless us with a peaceful and fruitful years. The pure ethnic Chinese spend around 14 or 15 days celebrating it, but that's too much for us. In my family we celebrate 3 new year days: the American one, the Chinese one after that, and the Khmer/Thai/Lao Theravada one in April 13 or so when the Buddha's passing.

I was hanging out with people in my age range talking about the death of famous people we knew and grew up with, which caused this whole family talks about one of the most bizarre topics you'd never hear in a lifetime in a White-American household.

I started the bizarre and interesting whole family talk when I asked my aunt-mom what famous person she knew who died and which shocked her. After she gave her answer I changed the subject because I suddenly remembered something a friend of mine had told me about death and I wanted my grandmother to confirm it for me. So I asked my aunt-mom to translate my curiosity for me to granny. I had said to my big mom: "I had an older Mexican lady friend once tell me that in her culture they say that when we die we know we will be going. Can you ask grandmother if it's true?" The question started this big old people talk of recalling stories from their youth, talks of dying, and the bizarre talks of rebirth, which to me uncovered the even more bizarre realization that these old people have been friends and family for several life times and they have the stories and proofs to share.

The Flow Of Mindstream

My grandmother answered: "Mmm, so I hear the old people say. It's interesting that a different people and culture shares our beliefs, do you siblings agree?" My last great grandpa [great uncle in American] Great Grandpa Savout quickly responded to that in his dry witty humour to us: "She [granny] says that as if she wasn't one of the 'old people.' If what the grand daughter said is true then I'm nowhere near death! I can barely remember what happened yesterday, never mind what will happen tomorrow."

The only family story of this nature I have heard was the first story to come up. One of my aunts said that according to her own experience, what I asked was true. During the revolution she had a daughter [would be my oldest cousin] named Aran. The Khmer Rouge had killed all of the doctors and two year old Aran was very sick. Aran had already become blind from her sickness and she was having intestinal bleeding. This auntie was fortunate enough to have normal Khmer Rouge people to oversee the camp she was put in as she was separated from the rest of the family during this time. Her Khmer Rouge friends felt sorry for the 2 year old Aran so they put this auntie [mother's sister] onto the back of their military truck with the baby and they would take them all the way to Thailand to see a doctor.

On the way to Thailand little Aran died in her mother's arms, but in a very weird way. My auntie explained to everyone that she had Aran when she was only 19 and so she was terribly ignorant of motherhood and child stuff. She explained that she grew up with maids like her siblings when the kingdom was good, so that she grew up ignorant of such matters in life.

She explained that on the back of the truck after a while of driving little Aran – only two years of age – started to say over and over again to her: “Mother, I’ll be leaving soon far away. I’ll be leaving soon.” Curious my auntie said she said to Aran: “Where are you going if you are blind, and how far can it be with such little feet?” She said Aran just said quietly: “I’m going away soon. It’s far away, and I won’t come back. I have to go now, I love you.” My auntie said Aran had asked where her father was because she wanted to kiss him good bye one last time before she left for wherever she was going. But her father was far away, so the auntie just told Aran that he was far away and for her to go to sleep. She said Aran just closed her eyes half way and never woke up. I’ve always found this story very fascinating because Aran was only 2 years old. I can’t believe that a 2 year old knows anything about death to know that she is dying or to make up stories about going places as she is dying. But what I have always wondered was not how she knew she was dying, but Where she knew she was going?

My other aunt we all call Mien [auntie] Oonh [Oon~] means the Char-black Auntie because she is dark in complexion told the second story which I have not heard before. Her story made my grandma and a few other cry.

The story is that during the revolution mien Oonh was 8 years old and her father – my late grandfather – was sick. It was just around the time when the KR had taken the Capital of the kingdom. My grandfather [still young] was too sick to care for himself so 8 year old auntie Blackie was nursing him and bathing him. The auntie said that on the day of his death he had said to her: “May all you wish for come true for caring for me. Father is leaving. They’ve come to take me.”

Looking around the room the auntie saw nobody and asked her father what people had come to take him where. She said grandpa said that a group of people in white were in the room waiting for him. Before he died he told her to tell grandma that he loves her.

There is an old belief in my culture these old people have where they believe that there are these wild spirits that make your children sick, cause misfortune, and sometimes kill you children. And so to ward off or trick these spirits to not bother your children you “hide” their birth name and call your children nick names that are ugly. So I have an uncle nymed Uncle Chubby [who is thin], there is an Auntie Blackie, and so on. The peasants don’t even bother giving their children real words for names, they just give them meaningless sounds. Like for instance of a peasant family had 6 children the children would just be named: “Ma, Me, Mi, Mo, Mu, and Mao.” That’s suppose to detere the bad spirits somehow.

Or if a person in my culture constantly gets sick or has constant bad luck what they do is go to the temple and have a monk give them a new name. Then they have a mock funeral for their old name and from that moment on they go by their new name. And this sort of refreshes your life, keeps you from getting constantly sick again, and gets rid of the bad luck or something. Monks are useful in a Buddhist culture for other uses too. For instance sometimes to protect trees, statues, and animals from being logged, sold in the black market or eaten monks will ordain the trees, statues, and animals and put an orange cloth on them. It would be the same idea as to ordain an endangered Spotted Owl as a Catholic Bishop to keep the ignorant lay people from harming it LMAO. This is one reason why if you look at picture of Angkor Wat you’ll see statues with orange or gold cloth on them. Those statues are technically really ordained Bhkhus, and this keeps fools from taking them to sell them in the black market.

Auntie Oonh herself her story was the first subject of the more fascinating and less depressing topic. My oldest aunt, who is the oldest of her siblings told the story of Auntie Oonh’s past life.

My oldest aunty told us that in town before auntie Oonh was ever born their was an old lady they called Yay [granmother] Lach. Lach is short for a “Talach” which is the name of a melon called Wintermelon in English. The folks around town called her that because she grew lots of wintermelon and gave them out. She was a distant kin of my grandmother [as everyone in that town was]. The oldest auntie asked grandma if she remembers Yay Lach laughing. My grandma said she did and explained how this lady was related to us.

The oldest auntie then told us that as a child after school she use to go over to Grandmother Lach’s house to massage and need her muscles. At the time she was 80 something. The auntie explained that Yay Lach’s breasts sagged all the way to her stomach and that she use to play with them to tease Yay Lach. Yay Lach was noble born, but dark skinned, so people in town teased her by saying that her mother slept with a peasant labourer. The oldest auntie said that when she [the auntie] was that young her nose would run continuously and it would cause sore for her. Yay Lach cured this by rubbing her Slah and Maloo [betelnut] on the sores.

One time the auntie said that old lady Lach told her that she was going to die soon and that she picked who she wanted to be reborn with. The old lady told my auntie: “I’m going to rebirth with your mother. We can be sisters. I love you like my own flesh and blood. I would rebirth with your mother’s cousin, but she’s too mean. Your mother is more kinder. I love your mother like close kin.”

When the old lady died my grandmother said that she had a dream in which old lady Lach had come to ask her if she can live with her, and my grandmother said yes, since the house was big with plenty of rooms. More strangely my grandmother said that half the kinfolk in town all had dreams at different times about old lady Lach telling them that she would reborn with my grandmother. When my auntie Oonh was born she came out with dark skin just like old lady Lach, and nobody in our family has dark skin. The tons people knew my auntie Oonh was old lady Lach.

My oldest auntie told us of habits and traits old lady Lach and auntie Oonh share. The oldest auntie said that old lady Lach was a clean freak and used to wash her dishes with only one finger so as to keep her other fingers clean, and when she ate she had the habit of putting very little food in her spoon and nibbled at the food carefully so as not to touch the utensil to her mouth. My auntie Blackie has the same two weird habits. I've watched her – and mocked her for it – washing the dishes and eating.

That's when my step dad – who is a distant relative of my grandmother – told the story of his uncle who is a relative of mine, who was at the house with the other elders. My step dad said after auntie Blackie's story: "What about my own uncle here. He remembers his past life." So the two of them talked about it. We call an uncle of an uncle or step dad a Grandfather.

This grandfather's story was that he had an awful bad mouth when he was 2 years old. He used profanity all over the place with his parents and siblings. The grandfather's father told his 2 year old son to stop cussing or he'll be punished. So the grandpa [2 year old boy] said to his dad: "You bastard, you know who your talking to!? I'm your friend not your son. I came back to hang out with you again."

Confused the grandfather's father tested the 2 year old by asking him questions about the person the boy claimed to be, such as the names of his past life parents and how he died. The 2 year old boy [grandfather] explained accurately that he was killed by thugs because he owed them money. The 2 year old boy grandfather was even able to tell his father/friend where his past life dead body was found. Then the 2 year old boy grandfather said in Khmer the equivalent to his dad and uncle: "If you fuckers want to get rich just go under a certain bridge where I buried the gold and money. I knew they were coming after me in advance. Nobody better have found it. I'll show you where its at, bring a shovel."

Everything the 2 year old boy said was accurate, and he was able to take his father and uncle who were his best friends in his past life to the spot where he hid the gold and money.

One of the grandmothers who is a cousin of my grandma told her story. She has what the old people call a "Dao [rhymes with Cow] Mark." I had never heard the word or term before that evening. It looks like a normal red colored birth mark. The elders at the house that evening were talking about these Dao Marks as if its just every day common knowledge. I did not know what they were talking about, so I had to ask my aunt-mom what a Dao Mark is. They were using the term as a verb.

My aunt-mom said that sometimes when a person dies their family and kin will rub a colored dye made of balm consecrated by a monk on the dead body just as the person had died. That act of rubbing the colored balm is called "Dao-ing" and the resultant mark in the next life caused by the Dao-ing is called a Dao Mark.

My aunt-mom explained that they "dao" a colored mark on the dead body somewhere so that they can tell who this person will be reborn as in their next life. The dao color on the dead body becomes a birth mark on the new reborn body appearing in the same place and in the general same shape.

So this grandmother was calmly explaining this bizarre cultural tradition as it happened to her. She shows us all her Dao Mark, which is a light reddish streak on her left shoulder. The reddish birth mark is about an inch and a half long and half an inch wide at its thickest area. The grandmother explained to the aunts and uncles that the color of the balm used to dao a dead body has to be dark. Black colored balm leaves a faint reddish birthmark, and red colored balm leaves a white colored birthmark. I guess this is because the coloring fades during the "transition" period?

The grandmother said that she remembers everything. She told us all that she died of old age and that she was standing by her dead body watching people cry. She said she then saw her surviving siblings dao the upper part of her left shoulder and said to the dead body [or her] to remember where the dao was marked so they can tell who she is in her next birthing.

The old people of her age group nodded their head and added that in their days when a grand child was born they would inspect the new born babies' whole body for any marks they may have dao-ed. They said that many times you don't always rebirth with your past family. In the old days they said, when a baby is born with an unusual birth mark the word would be past around the kinfolk, extended families, and friends about the baby's birthmark, so as to find who in town made the dao mark.

The grandmother said that she picked a son of her favourite brother to rebirth with and had gone into their dream to ask them if she can live with them. When she was born her family saw the dao mark and knew who she was. Rebirth in Khmer is "Jab [Capture] Gannad [Nativity]," literally meaning to catch a birth. Like a surfer would say to catch a wave or something, or when we say to catch the bus or to catch a cold. In my mind the term makes me think of people waiting in some line to catch the next available fetus with whomever you picked.

This other grandpa in the elder group retold his story. He said that back in the home province when the kingdom was good his family owned a large plantation with many servants and labourers who worked and lived on the land. Like my grandmother's parents, this grandfather's family treated their peasants very nice and only took 10% of each peasant family's harvest.

Each year when the leaves of some trees fell the grandpa said that the peasants had a custom of gathering these fallen leaves in a big pile to burn it. This was to clean the land up, but they also put yams and other foodstuff into the pile of leaves they gathered to share amongst themselves. The occasion was a seasonal peasant celebration of sorts.

Unfortunately during one of these leaf burning things one of the female workers got too close to the fire and her clothes caught fire. The lady was very badly burned and later she died of her burn wounds from an infection.

The grandfather remembers several nights after the death of this lady worker of his that both he and his wife had a dream in the same night. In the grandfather's dream he said the lady had come to him and in the night saying that she has spent her time faithfully working for him, and with nowhere to go would like to be born as his daughter. The grandfather said he told the lady in his dream that he felt very bad for her death and that it was his fault not doing all he could to help her. He told the lady that to rid this bad karma of his that he would accept her as his daughter and raise her so that she will never have to work again.

His daughter was born who is an aunt of mine. Technically she is a cousin of my blood aunts and uncles. This aunt remembers her past life as a servant worker of this grandpa. This aunt says that she remembers dying and seeing people cry around her grave they had dug for her. She remembers being on a tree close by her own grave screaming to her siblings, and friends to stop crying because she was still "alive" and up in the tree, but nobody heard her. As a child she was – and still is – deathly afraid of fire.

A cousin of my blood uncle we call uncle also told his story about his daughter I call a “cousin.” This cousin was not at the house that day. The uncle explained that in her past life his daughter was a man who was his close friend. They worked together when the country was good.

In that life this man worked at a car garage fixing cars with the young uncle. Both this man and this uncle were in love with the same girl [an aunt of mine], but they never fought each other over her. They agreed that they would not let a girl destroy their friendship and that they will let the girl pick which of the two of them she liked. So they ended up making a game or competition out of it to see who can win her heart and out do the other.

One day this man tells my aunt [cousin of by blood aunts] that if she does not pick him it would be okay because he loves his friend and wants him to be happy. But that she should know that she will be the only girl he will ever love. He made a promise with her that he will never marry or love anyone if not her. My aunt picked the uncle and not the guy.

So to keep his promise this man joined the national army which was fighting the Khmer Rouge. Before he joined he told his best friend – this uncle – that should anything happen to him, he will catch a birth with him and the girl he loves to be with the both of them again.

The man was captured by the KR one day and they killed him by tying him to a palm tree and swung an ax to the back of his head. His head was busted open and face crushed.

The uncle told us that when my cousin – his daughter – was born she had a huge birth mark on the back of her head. The birth mark looked like a red scare and the area was very soft. The face of the baby also looked uneven at the time. Is cousin remembers her past life to this day. The uncle says that as a baby this cousin would stop crying when he held her. She only stopped crying when her mother held her and was breast feeding her. Growing up as a child the uncle said that my cousin used foul language just like his dead best friend, drank coffee and beer and even stole cigarettes from him all at the age of 3. At 3 she also refused to call her father father, but by his nickname he used to call him, and the 3 year old referred to her mother as her “wife.” The uncle told us all that this cousin as a little 3 year old also had the strange habit of peeing at the toilet standing up, or at least trying to pee into the toilet standing up.

The most convincing proof this cousin has is the unbelievable details of her past life. In her past life she died a very young man of only 20 something. At the age of 5 this cousin named her past life parents and described in detail where they used to live. At 5 she also demanded and cried to be taken to see what she called her “real parents” because she missed them. So the cousin’s parents did take her to see her past life parents who lived all the way out in Boston.

The uncle had tracked down his late best friend’s parents and had explained to them that their son had caught a birth with him and his wife and was demanding and crying to see them. They said they did not know what to do because it was such a bizarre experience for them being new parents. The Boston based parents [past life ones] agreed to the visit. So my cousin at the age of 5 was taken to Boston to see her “real parents.”

At her “real parents” house she gave detailed information about thing that only this man and his family knew about which the uncle was not aware of. This was when she explained to her two sets of parents the details of how she died, which explained the huge birth mark she was born with. The birth mark by that age was gone and her face had long gone to normal. After the visit the Boston parents were convinced that this cousin was indeed their dead son.

To this day this cousin has a parent child bond and relationship with her Boston parents from her past life. She goes to visit them from time to time. Growing up as a teen she would actually use her Boston pair of parents as a threat against her present life parents. She'd threaten to run away to Boston and live with her other parents if they mistreated her.

At the house that evening you had all of these people of different generations telling their stories and memories of a past life and those that remember lived a past life with the same people in the same family. And as they talk among themselves of these memories they have, it all sounds like a timeless family reunion of a group of people who have been living together for several lifetimes.

I asked the Great Grandpa Savout since he was the witty and funny one what he was going to reborn as if he died unfortunately. He said: "It's not a matter of if I'm going to die some day grandchild! Soon! I'm tired of being human. Too much dukkh. I'm going to stay a ghost. All you young people seem to feed the dead better than the living. You have to be dead in this family to get good eating!"

I've always been fascinated with this topic. Especially with the cases of very young children who die and know they are going to die. And those children who seem to come into the world with memories intact of a past life. It's not a topic you usually hear thrown around in the West. But being of an Asian family it's everywhere and when you do hear about it there are verifiable things. Like those dao marks. They talk about it like its an ancient practice everybody should know about.

Several weeks ago I had a dream where my late Great Grandfather who recently passed came to visit they house. In the dream my little mom had open the door and he just stepped inside and told us that he only came to tell us that he was okay and for us not not worry, especially me. Then he wished us peace and happiness and said he had to go.

Do I personally believe the Stories I hear about death and some afterlife? No. I think I have matured beyond the need to believe anything. I can for example believe as hard as I can that when people die we go to a big purple shoe box in the sky, and no matter how hard I believe, no matter how debate the issue, my believe does not in any way change the realism/reality of the nature of things.

I come to the point in my Life where I now just Consider what others have to share, and I Consider the person sharing such insights and stories. In that, I see a cultural value. But personally I can't believe anything until I myself go through the Experience of death. Which will come it's Time and Season.

I once read a children's story in the kid section of a bookstore I used to go to often and I read a beautiful little story that actually changed the way I think and see things about such subjects as this.

The story goes that there was once in a forest a pond of fish. On that pond were lily pads. And on one lily pad there lives a mother frog. One day she laid many eggs in the pond. After her little tadpoles had hatched and were swimming and playing in the pond with their new guppy friends the mother frog hopped away deep into the forest to find her food.

During the mother frog's absence the tadpoles grew bigger and began to become curious about their little world. They started to ponder and ask questions. Some began to believe that they were fish like their guppy friends because they looked similar to fish. Some after sticking their heads out of the pond noticed that there was a whole different world beyond the pond.

One day the mother frog returns to her lily pad to check on her tadpole. The tadpoles swam to their mother to ask her their many questions about the world She lived in. The mother frog tried to explain to them what air was, what trees were, what the sun was, but she could find the right words to make her tadpoles Understand these things.

She thought a while and in her heart knew that she also was once a tadpole who was ignorant about the world beyond the pond and once asked the same questions. Then when she grew into a frog, she grew into her Understandings of the world beyond the pond in its time and season.

So with that Wisdom of age and experience she said to her many tadpoles: "Nothing I say will even make sense to you. All that you need to know is to enjoy your time in that pond for in Time you will change and leave it behind. And when you change, you will know and understand things out here inin time and season. Nothing has to be explained."

And what that mother frog said was true, even for us Humans in our human existence, if we pay close attention. As small children we were ignorant of sex and sexual nature. Even if our peers taught us the word, being so small we simply cannot grasp or relate in a realistic way to the reality of sex. In our teen age years – in it's Time and Season – during our puberty, we grew naturally into our sexual nature. Nothing had to be explained to us.

And young adults even if we lived with a mother and father we were not able to Understand what it is like to be a mother or father. Only when some of us grew in age to become ourself mothers and fathers with our own children, did we come to Understand inside [Buddhi/Gnosis] the Nature of motherhood and fatherhood: in its own Time and Season. And nothing had to be explained to us.

And so I now in this second decade of my Life see Death in the same manner. As a mortal creature alive with a body on this earth I am at the moment very far from my season of death. Such that, even if I knew the words and have seen the deaths of loved ones, the Nature and Reality of death will always be beyond my grasp. Not having the experience of such death, whatever I say, think, intellectualize, speculate, ponder, assume, believe, are simply superficial abstractions: the juggling or empty words and opinions. When the proper Time and Season comes, then the "mystery" of death will naturally unfold for me. And when that fated moment comes, no one will need to explain anything to me. All I need to know for now is to enjoy my brief moment here, for soon, things will change. All things must change. It is the Dharma of dhamma to change.

Which is why I find something like ONA – and satanism – to be of a realistic value. Something like a satanism – when used with Balance – helps ground you and helps bring your wondering mind down from the speculative clouds of "what ifs" and abstractions back to this moment: This World of Mortal Existence. To enjoy the moment while it is here, in this Kamasukkha Pumi, in this World of Peace & Pleasure, as the Buddha calls it.

This is not to say that we should be willfully ignorant of such things. Just that out of time and season, such subjects of human life is neither here nor there. About as valueless and out of season as children talking and opinionating about sex, as teenagers speaking about parenthood, of students in a classroom speaking of the virtues of war, of a single man giving advice to his married friend, or rich politicians speaking of knowing the condition of life, needs, and worries, of the common citizen. I once asked my bhikkhu grandfather what Buddhahood is like. He said something back like: “How should I know grand daughter, I’m just an old man in an orange robe? The only way to buddhi the Nature of Buddha is to first become a Buddha.”

The only way to Know-Gnosis Motherhood is to first become a mother. The only way to Know-Buddhi Death is to first die. Personally I’d rather wait as long as I can to “Know” the nature and mystery of death. Something like satanism helps you ground yourself and brings you back down into the human world of experience. If it is used intelligently with balance. I personally prefer the ONA’s Traditional Satanism for it’s balanced nature. Where the Sinister [Left] is balanced and integrated with the Numinous. If find the other schools of Satanism to be imbalanced and too Left Handed. Too “dichotomized.” Too unnaturally divided into an extreme.

If you were to do a thought experiment and stand yourself at the equator then walk the Left Path around the world all 25,000 miles to the same point you started, look behind you. What do you realize? That you came from the Right Path. Too much ice cream makes you sick. Too much good food makes you fat. Too much Freedom leads into tyranny. How so? Tyranny of the Mob. Too much tyranny leads to freedom. How so? Revolution. Too much freedom of religion leads back into ideological tyranny. How so? Look close at the satanic subculture and watch how whenever a person is not a satanaist as the mob of satanists define it they are rejected and vilified. Too much religious tyrrany leads to religious liberty. How so? There must be balance for things to be Whole: Wholesome: Healthy.

And so this earthly or carnal Life of ours must be balanced with that Numinous or Spiritual element. Too much of one leads into division – self division – and extremism. I fear the West has lost its balance.

Fourth Search Term:

“Buddhism”

I find it very hard to share technical Buddhist concepts with people who only speak English. It’s not because the people I am speaking or writing to is “ignorant.” It’s because I got my Buddhism first in a non-English language, and secondly as a cultural phenomenon. When I say “cultural phenomenon” I’m trying to say what Islam is to an Arab living in Arabia versus Islam written in some book, website, or in the America where it is some religion. To better grasp what I mean you take Judaism and the Torah, Islam and the Quran, and Christianity and the Bible. The three books talk about the same stories and teach nearly the same things. But Jewish Culture, Islamic Culture, and Catholic Culture are extremely different. Which culture goes beyond what was or is written. That’s the difference between something written and dead theory/belief, and a living expression/culture/cultivation of it.

In it’s “home soil” there is more to Islam then just a book and beliefs. It is a people wide cultural phenomenon that is practiced by everyone. You are surrounded by Islamic culture in full practice everyday. You pray 5 times a day with everybody etc. It is something you are immersed in. You don’t have to read a book to get Islam. And the living culture over the thousand years has spawned it's own unique customs and cultural traditions to such people. It is the same way with Buddhism to a Southeast Asian. It has nothing to do with a written book. 90% of us have never ever seen or read a book on Buddhism. The teachings is passed own verbally. The Practice is embedded right into the culture. This is what makes it very hard to explain Buddhism to someone not of that living culture who needs or expects citations, academic papers, doctrines, and so on.

I am culturally Asian, and those people in my big family not of my age or peer group don't speak English. They either speak Khmer or Thai. I understand Khmer and a little Thai, but I can't speak either. Pragmatically I know more religious Pali words than I do every day Khmer words. This is because my family's line of descent comes from a line of religious leaders and monks, so that religious nature is inherited by each generation. For instance a blood uncle of my own grandmother – whom I would refer to as a Great Grandfather – was the Supreme Patriarch of Thailand until his passing in the 90's. The Supreme Patriarch in Thailand's Theravada Buddhism is kinda like a Dalai Lama or the Pope is to his Church, except in Thailand [75 million Buddhists] the reigning King of Thailand appoints the Holy Patriarch who serves that post for life, just like how our Presidents will pick a Supreme Justice who serves for life. So before he was a monk he was married and had children. These children eventually intermarried with my grandmother and her line of descent. Then so in each generation we have all of these men in our family feel the urge to be monks. Then many of our elder women in our family go to be "nuns." I put "nun's" in quotations because they technically are not since the nun lineage in Theravada died out centuries ago. One of my young cousins at the age of 21 went to get ordained to do something we call "Song Gun" which means to pay your debts to your parents in honour of them giving birth to you and caring for you. He's still in robes right now.

If the people in my family don't have the dharma to be monks they are what we call a "Nik Pratch," which means One who is Prone to Preach and Teach ancestral wisdom. Those are the older guys and women that breaks down for you our history and myths and explains to you their meaning and they go on and on and on and ramble insight after insight. That's what the word "Pratch" literally means, to "Ramble." The word "Nik" means "One Who Is/Does/Person," very similar to the Scottish "suffix" -Nach like when they call the deplorable English "Sassenach" [sasunnach in Gaelic]. It's just that we stick our Nik in the front and they in the back of their words. Don't ask me why those words sound similar and have similar meanings, cuz I don't know. I remember one other word in Scottish that is similar to a Khmer word. In Khmer we call it "Ach," which sounds like your saying "Ah," plus a Ch sound as in Chair. Ach is the word for Shit, Excrement, Feces. Ach Go [cow] means Manure as well Bullshit which is used idiomatically as how we do in English. I think I remember the Scottish word "Ach" pronounced like Ahkhh also means Shit. Just thought I'd share.

So anyways. Being raised in such a non-English speaking family with many monks and Ramblers [my grandmother claims I am a Rambler] means that I got my Buddhism all in a non-English language, and thus also in a non-English weltanschauung. I wish some of you reader were able to speak or understand or think in two languages so you'll feel what I mean when I say non-English Weltanschauung. I don't simply mean a "world view" or "paradigm" or world model. I have no other way to explain the difference of seeing everything based on language. And if you are interested interested in such subjects then there are plenty of much more intelligent resources to go to than me. You can start with the theories behind something like E Prime and try it. E Prime is just English without all forms of the word/idea "is/be." You take something like Khmer and keep in mind that not only does it not have a word/idea for is/be but the word for ‘The,’ ‘a,’ ‘an,’ ‘exist,’ and a whole list of other words and suffixes we take for granted in English just do not exist. For example in Khmer there is no such thing as a plural ending to nouns or a suffix for verbs like -ing or -ed. In Khmer the sentences 1) I run with a dog, 2) I ran with dogs, 3) I am running with dogs, are all the same wording. You have to unconsciously [almost beyond your awareness] extrapolate the essence of the meaning based on context.

To make it worse in the dialect of Khmer my family speaks [higher register] it is wrong to use personal pronouns. There is in our dialect or form of Khmer we use no such thing as words for “I,” “me,” “you,” “he,” “she,” etc. It is impossible to literally – word for word – translate the simple English sentence “I exist” into the register of Khmer I understand and my family uses because neither of those words/ideations actually exists in the our weltanschauung. And again this goes beyond the language to a sociolinguistic phenomenon. No I or you as an idea/word exist because it is wrong to see yourself as an Other person separate from whom you are talking to. You divide Self into two parts the minute you say I and you. There is no division period. Not in the language, not in the culture, not in the religion, not in the worldmodel, not in how you see yourself, not in anything. You are not given a means via language to express division. There is no such thing as an I and a you.

For instance if I wanted to say “I love you” to my mom I have no other means but to say: Gon [child] Srolanh [love] Mae [mom]. That statement forces you to be consciously aware – to know – that there exist a living relationship between you the speaker you and whom you are speaking with. One being is a Child of the other being who is a mother or the birther of the speaker. If I met a new friend older than me who is a male and I wanted to say the simple English sentence: “I like you,” I have to say: “Khnyom [one who serves] Jol Jet [go into chitta] Bong [older sibling] Pros [male/man/boy]. That statement forces you to become aware that there exist a relationship between you and the other person. He is to you and Older Brother and should be honoured as such and you are to him a Servant who must do as he asks. As soon as you open your mouth in Khmer with someone and refer to yourself, you call yourself a Khnyom of the other person, meaning a servant, worker, helper. The word actually literally means “Subject” as in a King’s subjects. In ancient Imperial times if you were not the God-King of the empire, you were his Khnyom. There is no other word in the proper lower and middle dialects for I/Me but Khnyom.

And so with my Theravada Buddhism I get it from first being obviously immersed in its living culture and following examples of it in practice, and secondly I get my Buddhism in Khmer and Pali. Because of this inside the Western English weltanschauung I am handicapped.

If an American Buddhist came up to me and said: “Can you show me where in the Tipitaka Buddha teaches about Metta?” I wouldn’t be able to help him or point to any quotes because I have never read any teachings about Metta. I’ve only seen it done every day. I can show you how it is done, but not refer you to scriptures and quote stuff for you. Metta [compassion] is when you obey those older than you. Metta is when stick together as a family. Metta is when you are true to a friend you love and never turn on them. Metta is caring for your old ones until they pass away naturally in your home around those they loved. The teaching is easy to read agree or disagree with. The practice of Metta is hard and makes you cry sometimes. To spend your free time taking care of old people, and to watch them die with your own eyes. To know that one day your own grandmother will need care and will pass away in front of you. To know that you will care for your parents until they die in front of you. It’s not easy, and its not a philosophical debate. It’s pitiful to watch these pretentious Americans in their forums and internet places debate and talk about the merits of Buddhism when they have never known what it’s like to live it.

If an American Buddhist who got his Buddhism from the Northern Schools [Mahayana] came up to me and asked me: “So can you share a few things about the Three Bodies doctrine?” I would not double know what you are talking about because for one, I didn’t get my Buddhism in the English language. For two, the Three Bodies doctrine is a Mahayana teaching via the Sanskrit which does not exist in the Theravada via the Pali. I absolutely don’t know what that is. All I know is that in Theravada Buddhism no such doctrine exists. What exists is what we might call a “primordial” seed of such doctrine, in which the Buddha said in Pali that he is “Dhammakaya,” which simply either means the corpus of teachings and/or the Body of Natural Phenomena. Theravada does not go any further to explain what Buddha meant.

If an American Buddhist were to ask me: “So what do you think about the doctrine of Emptiness [Sunyata]?” I actually won’t know what he was talking about because in the Pali and Theravada no such doctrine really exists. Emptiness [Sunyata] is a Northern doctrine via the Sanskrit. Us Southerners get our Buddhism in the Pali. I like the idea of Sunyata and use it, but it’s not Theravada proper. This word appears in the Theravada, but it is not a formal or fully formed doctrine or concept. It is like I tried to explain an idea which is only Hinted at. So when I use that word, I use it in line of that hinting. In other words I use that word to carry my extrapolations of what may be hinted at. In the same way that Mayahaya took the hint and manifested a complete kick ass doctrine out of it, which I honest do not know about. I’m not Mahayana. Folk Chan is as close I get ancestrally to Mahayana. The Northerners extrapolated an entire – superb – doctrine of Sunyata from Anicca. How so?

Let’s say you have a Theravada monk and a Zen monk standing at a train station together and they are looking at the train tracks. The Train wizzes by fast passed them. In that instant the Theravada monk says to his Zen friend: “Did you see that Train which passed by? It was impermanent because it was only here for a brief moment and now it is gone.” The Zen monk says back to his friend: “Hmm, you’re right. It was impermanent. But what do you call that Stuff in front and behind of that changing impermanence. You know this non-trainness which is now in front of us?” So the Mahayanas call that stuffiness Sunyata meaning Void or Emptiness. Not literally, but just to refer to that something all the changing is being impermanent inside of. Remember those Mahayanas cured like wet cement inside a Chinese culture which comes with an ancient something called Taoism. That Taoism “contaminates” [not in a bad way] their Buddhism. What is Tao Taoing in? Wu Wei [emptiness/stillness]. Is the cup half empty or half full? The Theravadin would say the cup is half full but that the nature of that fullness is impermanent. The Mahayana says the cup was always empty and is just temporarily half full.

Even if a American Buddhist were to ask me: “So what Buddha say about Dharma,” I won’t be able to tell him, because that word Dharma is the Sanskrit and now English ideation, and not the Pali Dhamma. They mean two different things to very different peoples, even though they are clearly dialects of each other. It would be ignorant of me to say that because French is a dialect of old Latin, that those two languages’ words and thus weltanschauung are the same because the words are similar. Is that statement true or false? If I were to say: “English and German are the same shit because half of the words sound the same. They see the world in the same way as the Brits.” Is that statement true or false?

Pali like French is more rounded, feminized, and softer versions of its parent language. They say Dharma in Sanskrit while we say Dhamma in Pali. They say Karma we say Kamma. They say Dharma to mean the natural way of things as in the natural order of the universe, and your natural inclinations. I use Dharma in the Sanskrit to mean this. It is my Dharma to write and share ideas and teach. It is not my Dhamma to write and share and teach. Dhamma in Pali means natural way of thing too, but it goes off into its own dialectal tangent. Dhamma means Natural Phenomena and secondly a teaching. They say Karma to mean cosmic retribution. We say Kamma to mean the Act which we set into motion, as in the Pali term Samma Kammanta which is one of the 8 steps in the eight fold path wrongly translated as “Right Action.” It should be “Complete Acting.” What do these ancient people mean when they say to Act Totally or Act Completely?

It means to first review ALL of your option. You are a farmer in 500BC India. You are lazy. You don't want to work and want to take a month break. What are your options? After you review ALL of your option you review ALL of the consequences of each option you have. If you take a month break, your field may die. If your field dies you have no money. If you have no money your family starves. If your family starves they too will die. After you have reviewed ALL and EVERY possible consequence [Vipaka] of ALL your options then you pick the one you really want to set into motion. Do you want to kill your family? If not: get your ass to work and give it ALL you got for the future FRUIT. You are poor. Your children are hungry and haven't eaten in days. You know if they don't eat now they will soon die. Your country is being run by the Khmer Rouge. You are in a labour camp. Stealing food not provided for you by Big Brother Pol Pot means they will kill you. What do you do? Do you break their laws and risk being killed to feed your children? You must first Completely [samma] think of all your option. Then think of all their consequences. Then you commit the act into motion which best fits you. It isn't about some silly notion of right or wrong, left hand or right hand, good or bad. It's real live human life and real live human situations and real live human needs.

Every action you do or don't do has its Fruit [Vipaka]. You are Tibet. You believe in nonviolence. You have a pathetic army due to your beliefs in nonviolence. It is 1950. The Chinese Commies are invading your country. What do you do? Fight or bitch out and give Big brother Mao your country? What are your options and the consequences of your actions or failure to Act? This scene does not have to be hypothetical. Just google shit about Tibet. How their culture and way of life is dying. How their people are abused and losing their freedom, etc. Was it worth not fighting? Do you like the Fruit of your lack of Action? Now that your entire people suffer [Dukkha] can you look at yourselves in the mirror and say you are proud Buddhists, that you have done well for your grand children who are subjects of a foreign regime? That's Kamma. It is different from Karma. It has nothing to do with some stupid ideation of right or wrong, Himsa or Ahimsa. It's about real Life. Real human situations. And real consequences of our actions or lack of actions. Think twice before you act or not act. That's kamma.

So getting my Buddhism from the Khmer and Pali, and seeing most of its teachings expressed in culture, traditions, and practice, my Buddhism is very different and alien to the Buddhism you would find in a book store or a website. It is also different from all those Northern Schools. This is something the well meaning Westerner most often fails to understand or realize. There are different schools of Buddhism with very different ways of doing things and seeing things. Most often when I say I am a Buddhist these Westerners just group me into this stupid group of Yoga classes, New Agers meditating on their chakra, burning perfumed incense [which we don't do], chanting OM or some special word guru gave you, zen koans, fat Buddha, vegetarianism, non-violence, and so on. I have nothing to do with any of those things and I don't know shit about them. The only Buddhism I know is the stuff I get from my family which is both only Khmer/Thai Theravada and folk Chinese Chan Buddhism. And I got my Buddhism is Khmer and Pali not English or Sanskrit. There is nothing wrong with those languages. It's just that you have to literally speak "my Buddhist language" for me to understand you.

This is where something like the ONA and DM came in. As I write here at this blog I often try to explain how I grasp ONA by first using in my own mind my Buddhism. The unfortunate thing is I have no way of expressing what exists in my head because I don't have the right English and Sanskrit terms for these things. This is because like I said, I didn't not get my Buddhism from a book, in English or Sanskrit. I had only one real choice which was to pirate ONA and DM words to try to express myself. So at first what happens is you see this mess of ONA mixed with Buddhism and you wonder what I'm trying to do or synthesize. I'm not trying to do anything besides ramble about my ideas and insights. Unfortunately all I have to work with are Theravada-Khmer-Pali-Buddhist inner ideas and ONA-DM outer words. Which was the challenging part for me.

After training myself all these years to express myself using Myattian words and concepts something happened. The more I figured out how to use Myattian words to explain my Buddhism to whoever reads this stuff, the more I gained a better grasp of my own Buddhism. It became that writing here for a ONA audience was a mental trick I used to tease out a better understanding of my own Buddhism for myself. And then all that Reichsfolk stuff and Numinous Way stuff got me to better appreciate my own culture and history [roots].

So DM and ONA honestly do have an immense influence on me. And I mean that when I say immense. I've written elsewhere or hinted at, just how immense this is and how seductive words and language are. I tried to say in in a not so obvious way, but I don't think people caught on to what I was trying to say when I said that ONA next stage in development was to develop and refine its lexicon. I was suggesting something from personal experience and personal analysis. I'm not going to spell it out in plain English.

I think the Muslim got it right. They say that the Holy Quran is the Classican Arabic text and all translations of that Quran are only merely translations of the Quran. With Buddhism, the minute you process it into Sanskrit you change it into a Sanskrit weltanschauung, where each Sanskrit word has its own meaning. The same thing has now happened to Buddhism in English. It now becomes that in the English, Buddhism is not the same thing as it is in the Sanskrit or the Pali. I'll give an exaple.

Did the Buddha say life was suffering and that we should work to get rid of suffering? In the English, sure. And so you see very well meaning spiritual English Buddhist work in their own ways to get rid of human suffering, which is wonderful and I wouldn't wish it to stop.

Pali Buddhism is slightly different. The word is "Dukkha," which does not mean suffering. Dukkha means Un-Ease, Dis-Comfort, Worry, and that's it. Like when my grandma says that her head "does Dukkha" to her, it simply means she has a headache. Like when finals week comes and I say the week "does Dukkha" to me, it means finals week makes me worried.

Dukkha is when you have a hobby as a toy collector. A Thanksgiving sale is putting a toy item you collect on sale so you make a tent and camp outside a Walmart all night. When you finally get inside the toy runs out. You stress out, get angry, cry, throw a tantrum. That's Dukkha. Your obsession or gross attachment to that hobby or want for that toy has caused you Dukkha. You are upset and un-easy. In Theravada, the Buddha simply wants to tap you on the back and say: “Calm down. It’s okay. It’s not the end of the world. Wait a while and come back. When you are in a state of Dukkha, you don’t Think Straight.” Did Buddha in Pali say to be a superhero and save the human race from doom and suffering? Not in Pali. He simply said to “Chill,” “Simmer Down,” “Don’t Worry, Be Happy.”

In Pali and Khmer it’s actually insane to use the word Dukkha to describe 1000 children dying of starvation in Africa. It expresses a dismissiveness because the word does not describe the weight of the condition. It’s just like that part in Monty Python’s Holy Grail movie where that King Arthur is sword fighting the bridge keeper in the dark armour and King Arthur chops his arm off and thinks he won, then the knight goes: “What this, ’tis but a flesh wound!” It’s not “just” a flesh wound. Your arm is on the ground! The word to use for something as tragic as genocide and thousands of people dying is “Apap.” In English this word most often is badly translated as simply “evil” which is completely meaningless. Apap is very huge tragedy of a big kind that involves tons of people dying. The tsunami that hit Japan and ripped up half their country, killed thousands, and messed up their nuclear power plants is Apap, which does not simply mean “evil,” or “bad.”

When you translate something like a Buddhism or Torah from one language into another you don’t just get a new set of words. You get an entire new “weltanschauung” contaminating the original. Which isn’t “bad” if you are smart enough to understand this and then try to go figure out what the original actually meant. But as the Christians of the world have proven, a majority of the people can’t bother with that. They take the Bible as is in English as if God really actually spoke English to Moses and God used common English idioms and expressions and Webster defines words.

Nobody really question what the ancient Israelites may have idiomatically meant when they used the term “Burning Bush” thousands and thousands of years ago. It is taken literally as if Moses spoke to a plant being consumed by fire. We know that before the Israelites scrapped their Canaanite pantheon for Yahweh and Ha-Satan, that Zoroastrianism existed before which had an influence on the paradigm of these ancient Israelites. In Zoroastrianism there is a sacred or divine plant they call “Haoma,” which is their equivalent of the Brahmanical Soma. If you were to simply google Haoma and look for its picture, you’d see that it is a little bushy shrub and its flowers is a flaming red color. It’s a hallucinogen. The little bush actually looks like it’s got flames on it. But people just can’t be bothered to transgress their sacred beliefs to do a google and research. This topic of ancient Israelites has always made me ask about what time period the Hebrews threw out their Canaanite gods and adopted Yehweh and Satan. Satan itself – as far as I have seen – is not a carry over of any pantheon of that area. Like we can assume Yehweh to be a carry over of the Canaanite God El from the Hebrew’s use of the God names Eli and Elohim. But no god or deity, or demon from a pantheon I have seen in this area fits the Ha-Satan character. The average person is just mentally lazy. It’s just easier to make an assumption, and to Believe one’s own assumptions to be true.

I personally consider Buddhism as it exists in the English language to be rightfully its own Vehicle. And just like I can say with all honesty that I am not a Mahayana Buddhist and do not know any real thing about Mahayana; I also am not an Anglayana Buddhist and don’t really know anything about its teachings and scriptures. It’s not a “bad” thing that something like Anglayana exist. I think it is wonderful and I’d like to try and be helpful and explain things. But we all have to learn to understand that we’re all coming from very different paradigms and worldmodels. Which is why what I understand of Buddhism might not always make sense to you and might not always match up to your great Western scholars and vice versa. Your understandings of Buddhism at times makes no real sense to me either. There is more to definitions of words in a language. It's highly unfortunate that the average person doesn't understand that. Language is our "reality." In my reality something we call Chitta exists. In yours it does not. In mine Chitta is a very important aspect of our Buddhism. In your reality Chitta is totally absent from your Buddhism. In my reality Buddhi just simply means to Understand or be "educated" in some way. In yours Buddhi means a great and sacred enlightenment, which nobody can seem to every reach or define. Whose right or wrong? Nobody. The only person right with Buddhism was Buddha, if he ever existed at all. Otherwise, it's all good.

What should be kept in the mind of the Theravada Buddhist is not what was taught and by whom, or what should, could, would, must be done. The most important thing to concentrate [samadhi] on is the end results of such beliefs, teachings, and action.

In the Western Vehicle, Buddhism is a spiritual philosophy and that is the End of it. In Southeast Asia It is an Upaya: a trick meant to give rise to a desired End Goal. What is the Upaya trying to manifest? The way of life we have been living for the 1000 years we have had our Buddhism. It is just Bullshit and Tricks to make a people learn to think, and learn to practice Metta with at least their own family. To care for each other, raise our young properly, take care of our elders, maintain our traditions and culture, and pass our ancestral wisdom down to the next generation, as it was given to us. The way of life of the people is the Fruit and End Result. Today this doesn't seem significant. Who the hell cares if a bunch of Asian people have a culture and their own way of life right? What's the Big Deal?

The Big Deal IN CONTEXT was Brahminical India in which social order you had – and have – something called a caste system. The Big Deal was what Buddhism taught completely challenged that system. It was trying to free those untouchables and lowly ranking people suffering from the samrara of the belief in that system. To free them so they can live in peace and have their own culture and tradition more productive and happy. That desired End Goal took 2500 years to manifest. It eventually did what it set out to do. It made a living culture of 500 million Buddhists in Asia who do not live as subjects of some goofy caste system subservient to Brahmins. So today many of us can afford to take such long term end goals for granted in the luxnry of our modern 21st century.

The End Fruit is that now you have 500 million humans trained for 2500 years to practice Buddhism with each other. To live Compassion with each other, meaning to actually care for our oen families and fellows, like nursing our elders instead of throwing them away. That's Metta in living pracice. It is beyond a belief and an opinion. It is a doing. In the Western vehicle metta is a pretty New Age belief which makes you feel all warn inside when you agree with it. If such folks put it into pracitice it means giving a sandwich to a bum on Christnmas, but negelecing to have compassion for anybody the other 364 days, and your elders are still in their nursing homes. That's the actually difference between a Belief you ascribe to and a Praxis you must do without believing or thinking.

The ignorant can ask me: "Well what do you do as a Buddhist? What have you done?" I don't write self published books or make videos or make forums on the shit. No person related to me no matter how old they are live away from me. That includes all my elders 50 years and up. The praxis of Metta for my family and me means taking care of these elders, great aunts, great uncles, old in law, until they die. That includes spending your free time feeding them, bathing them, cleaning afte rthem when they use the restoom, and sleeping by their side at night. Don't deflect and ask me what I am doing. Look at yourself, you family [or lack thereof], your kin, your sangha [community or lack thereof], and the old people you lock up out of sight and mind, and ask yourselves what you are NOT doing. It's easy to believe [in anything]. It's hard to do. And it takes centuries and sometimes a thousand years to bare Fruit. It's all bullshit – upaya – and that bullshit is needed as fertilizer to give birth to Sasana: Culture. Something America is missing. Don't ask me what I'm doing. The question is: What are you as an "individual" and people NOT doing that got you the way you are today.

Anybody can Believe ONA ideas, or argue them. It's harder to put ONA into Living Praxis somehow. Praxis here simply means anything and everything in and of ONA that can be practices and cultivated. I'm not talking about blowing up bridges, hijacking planes, burning federal structures, acting like Rambo Commando in some jungle, plotting world war 3. I just mean realistic ONA things as simple as a chant, as trying to forge a clan or tribe, as trying to re-create a culture, as trying to maintain your own people's culture, as passing ONA's Tradition down to your children, as trying to breed with a person that is or can be or will be ONA. A Living Culture is made up of thousands of very little Cultavatable memes called Customs and Traditional Observances.

But we keep in mind that the Light must be integrated with the Shadow nature. We can't be too goofy where we reject the productive use of the Shadow element of our Human nature. What I mean is as an ONA person just stealing shit and considering that Sinister Praxis don't make you any better than random petty criminal. Productive meaning if your folk or children are hungry and you got no money, then steal. If the Chinese are trying to subjugate your Tibetan people, then militarize and kill the fuckers. By "Sinister Praxis" I don't mean wicked doings. Sinister as in Latin for Left Hand. What's Left Hand Practice, or Left Handed Observance suggest, imply and mean in the ancient Oriental way of reckoning "sides," as in Vama Marga? What and more importantly why do the Aghori do what they do? If we're gonna be talking about Roots, than lets not forget that ONA considers itself to be a Left Hand [Sinister] Path [Way]. If this is so than the Left Hand has roots into that Oriental soil in the ancient past. Start digging.

Before you can put an ONA into any kind of real "praxis," you first have to what what the hell it is inside and out. It is more than the philosophical tracks of AL, and more than Anti-Statism as assumed. There is the Traditional Satanism, the Code of Honour, Renunciation of Magian Ethos and their way of life, which includes the rejection of Nuclear Family structure for the more Human Clan family structure. All of this is actual ONA Kulture which is Cultivatable, which takes Time and Effort to manifest. No amount of belief, intellectualization, debate, philosophication, will ever materialize and actualize a Living Culture and Tradition. It will take a thousand years to Bare Fruit. Are you down with the aeonics of it. Or is it just a pass time. Are you down to play the game all the way, or is it just a Belief, a philosophy, or whatever? If Buddhism can do it: liberate a group of people from the samsara prison of Brahminical Ethos and have them manifest their own Living Culture where they cooperatively care for each other, can ONA liberate a few people from the samsara prison of Magian Ethos and have these few people over Time aeonically materialize their own cultures to care for their own people? It has nothing to do with believing and intellectualizing. Are you down with going all the way with the game – upaya – or is it just a belief and identity tag you wear, yet you Do and Live life the exact same way as everybody else in America, don't you?

End Remarks

I didn't realize 4 subjects made 27 pages of stuff. I'll close this essay. No institution – not even ONA – has the answers to everything about Life. Life is just too big. Only Life itself has it's own answers. Things like ONA or Buddhism or Catholicism, or whatever are only wagons. They carry you to the source. It is up to you to drink. Like the saying that goes: "You can lead a horse to water, but you can't make it drink." Or as it is stated in the Hermetic mythos. In the beginning the Universal Mind after creating the world placed a cup of water in the center so that all who drank of it will Understand the mysteries of the world. Hermes asks the Universal Mind: "Why then is not everyone enlightened?" The Universal Mind said back: "Because I can make the world, and the cup, but I can't make everyone drink from it."

Something like the ONA is only and merely a feeble commentary of the Book of Life. It slaps some sense into you and sets your feet firmly on the ground and tries to lead you in the experience of the Living World of Human Experience. The rest it up to you. Sambuddhi means to Educate Oneself to an Understanding of things. The Buddha can lead you into the forest and set you down by the river he sat by. But the rest is up to you. I can lead you to the college I went to where I learned many things, but the enrollment, the sticking to it for 4 years, and your own will to learn, is all up to you. That is all something like the ONA, or some Buddhism, or some "religion" should ever be: a Wagon [yana] which simply and merely leads you the Living person to the Living Source. You yourself must do the drinking. The Yana leads you to the Dhamma. The Wagon lead you to the Natural Phenomenon. Science is not the natural phenomenon itself. It leads the scientist to the Natural Phenomenon face to face. What becomes of you after that point is entirely up to you. Just make sure that the Wagon you are riding actually leads you to the Source. As opposed to leading you in a circle jerk of abstractions, idealisms, ideologies, and opinions given in lieu of Life Born Gnosis. Only Life Herself has Her own answers.

Nexion WSA352, Order of Nine Angles

SPAWN OF A GENIUS

We had always admired this Genius which expresses itself as Anton Long. Like a mushroom that scatters spores into the wind to spawn new mycellium, his Genius spawn many works, thoughts, systems, identities, which the Order of Nine Angles is but one.

I suppose we had long been infected with one of these spores, and found ourselves in awe and admiration of his mind. For a while we followed the Way he Precenced which was given to him. But we soon felt an urge to follow his Genius, and carve out our own unique trail to that common summit. If we truly admired him we should aspire to be like him; just as Satan aspired to be like god. So we tapped into his Genius, and did what he would have done- spawn a new exoteric expression, with a new name, to Presence the Dark, to help manifest his Dreams and Visions.

This humble little Nexion of ours, isn't just another order, or temple, or group, amidst so many other orders, temples, and groups. It is a living tribute to the Genius of Anton Long, which is a spawn of that vast mind of his. It is something that we are proud of. In which every thought and word which we have written, was an inspiration of the Genius we never met. But hope that someday, he will silently look our way, and smile.

There are those who seeing only the glamour and exoterica of the Order of Nine Angles, will look at this Acception of ours and question it's "authenticity." Then there are those Geniune Adepts who understanding the essence of the Dark Tradition and its esoterica, will look our way, as Anton Long would himself, and silently smile; knowing that the Dark Ones have found another Way into the Causal. 352 exist only because we followed his Genius. Beneath our superficial differences, we are ONA, and as a genuine initiate with true sinister insight, we see no difference, and make no attempt to distance ourselves from that which we emanate from. How can a ray of light distance itself from the sun it emanates from; and are the two truly two different things, or just different manifestations of the same unseen essence:

Return To The Dark: Esoteric Notes XVII

The Sinister, Archetypes, Forms and Aeons:

All genuine Adepts understand the simple truth that all causal forms – propounded/described by whatever esoteric Order or group, or manifest by the creativity/discovery of whomsoever – are but intimations, and that this especially true of attempts to define/understand The Sinister/The Acausal/The Dark Gods, all of which are but terms which attempt to describe Some-thing beyond the four-dimensional matrix.

Magick, the Occult, and especially a genuine Sinister Way, are a means to move toward experience of this Some-thing, and this experience – which alone is the basis for a true Knowing – is only and ever individual: that is, unique to the individual, with such a Knowing being the essence of the stage beyond what has been called Internal Adept.

Thus, even such things as archetypes, and the division of our outward and inner Change into Aeons, are such an intimation, such a symbol or symbols, which attempt to make accessible to our consciousness what was not accessible (and thus not-knowable) before. That is, such intimations, such symbols, are useful and indeed still necessary – until the stage of Adept is reached. There is then a moving-away from such things toward an experiencing of the essence. Of course there may (and should) arise a time when such things are not required, when the Seventh Way of Five-Dimensional Magick is understood and practised by many – but that is indeed many centuries from now, given the rather low level of the majority in terms of genuine understanding and the lack of use, lack of control and lack of development, of their faculties. In the meanwhile, genuine esoteric Orders will continue to guide the few of promise, the few who can be bothered to change and master themselves, breeding thus an evolved type.

Learning by Experience:

As has been stressed again and again in Order MSS, the only way to evolve is to experience: to strive forth and undertake practical magick, practical deeds. To experience magickal energies, and to have a plethora of both Light and Dark practical experiences.

All words, whether written or spoken – indeed, all forms presented in the causal – are only guides; intimations; inspiration, and this applies to all Order MSS. Some-things have not been said or written about; some other-things have only been hinted at, while other-things have been described or symbolized in detail. There is intent here, which those of genuine insight and genuine magickal skill will perceive or come to perceive, just as the genuine ones – who do strive forth via practical experience of the “two worlds” – will be able to work out certain things for themselves, and thus correct the few “mistakes” or “omissions” they may/will find in some ONA MSS. If they are not able to do this, then they have not advanced far enough; or they are among the failures.

Hence, there will always be some things left unsaid, left unwritten about, in “public” – and some-things which will only ever be revealed from individual to individual, or experienced/discovered anew by each genuine new Adept and each new genuine Master/Mistress.

Beyond the ONA:

Twenty or so years after the ONA first came to “public attention” by the decision to distribute various Order MSS, there are now several Sinister/Occult organizations and groups who have derived their inspiration, their knowledge, and such like, from the ONA, even though some of these organizations and groups may not publicly acknowledge this, and even may, sometimes, attempt to distance themselves from their source by such things as criticising the ONA, or what they see/mis-understand as its “teachings”. Of course, this applies just as much to those individuals inspired or otherwise guided by the outer, publicly-known, ONA.

This is a natural and expected process, for – as several ONA MSS have stated – the ONA is in some ways akin to a living-being, in the causal, imbued as it is with aspects of the acausal (Adepts and even some gifted Initiates will understand what is meant here). It was given its current form (and even its name) to be this, among other things.

From these and other emanations, from such other often unacknowledged presencings of the ONA, there will be new understandings born, new changes wrought – that is, new causal presencings of the acausal, of The Sinister, which is all as it should and must be, for the ONA has indeed opened certain nexions, which openings The Dark Gods have been waiting for...

Even my own life – rich, diverse, sinister, of both Light and Dark and thus perplexing to others – is only some new guide, one inspiration, one intimation of what all genuine Adepts should be. It, like that outer ONA which is now “known”, can and should be surpassed, by others.

The ONA will continue, evolving, changing, in its own way, for the stage has now been reached when the life that is the sinister presencing manifest in the outer ONA is a life of-itself, and can thus be left (exoterically/publicly) without any new writings or any open guidance being provided, for the “public/exoteric” work has been done. Thus there will be soon, a return to the dark, to the secrecy of the past – to that which is the slow, genuine, hidden, and individual, guidance there has been, for thousands of years. All that needs to be known, for others to continue along the Way, has now been made accessible, known – and there are hints enough, especially in some of the more recent Order MSS, for the gifted to go beyond what-is-publicly-known to what-must-be. Thus, it is natural and necessary that others are inspired by the ONA – and natural and necessary that they try to surpass it; that they strive to create some-thing of their own inspired by the ONA.

Of course, we can expect some, or many, to try and appropriate exoterically and in public (and probably even in secret) the name of the ONA, but those of insight, those of genuine magickal ability, will see them for the impostors, the liars, the weaklings, that they are, just as the genuine Adepts will – if they have the genius – create some-thing unique, and perchance describe it by some new name.

As for the inner essence, manifest in the inner, hidden, ONA, it will continue – reached, accessed, by the very few who have the ability, the desire, to find it, despite the obstacles they will encounter.

SPOILS OF VICTORY

“Seek happiness in victory – but never in peace.” – 3rd Satanic Point, BBS, ONA

Ever since some 200,000 years ago when our species suddenly came into existence, there has never been a time in which our species did not war, struggle or experience strife. In fact, the opposite is happening. We came into existence fighting and struggling against Neanderthals. And to the Victor, Mother Nature gives the Spoils.

Back in tribal days, wars were small and petty occurring between local tribes. As we progressed, and our technology and societies grew bigger and more sophisticated, guess what also grew bigger and more sophisticated? War. The more advanced as a species we become, the bigger our civilizations becomes, thus the more bigger and advanced our wars will become. We are a species born of war.

War is Nature’s way of destroying the weak, the ineffective. Some of the most illustrious – immortal – members of our species have been extreme war heroes, and warmongers: Alexander the Great, George Washington, Genghis Khan, Lafayette, Bolivar... nearly all kings and royal houses are the blood progeny of a past warmonger who fought for domination of land, which became kingdoms.

Of all the forms of governments we as a species can devise, only the Kingdom lead by Warriors King has endured the test of time. Where democracies and republics failed and never lasted long. Kingdoms made up 99% of the form of government humankind knows.

As kingdoms grow into Empires, such Empires truly change, alter, and move humankind forward to new heights. The Empire of Great Egypt left us pyramids still standing to day. The Great British Empire was the largest and most influential in our species' history. We all speak English because of the past war mongering of Anglo-Saxon.

America was born out of war. Suffice it to say; we – all humans – are children of Mars, born from Bloodshed. What Mother does not give new life without pain and the shedding of Blood? The Victorious Children of Baphomet, Mother of Blood. That will never change. War is a part of our human nature. If you hate war, you hate a part of yourself, a vital – primal – aspect of your own human nature. You can hate it and deny it, but it will always still be there.

What we do not put effort into, what we do not fight or struggle for, has no value or meaning to us intrinsically. What is given to us freely without strife, is taken for granted and forgotten. If strife gives birth to life, then peace is death.

War itself is just a form of force applied to a struggle. Struggle is the very essence of life in this causal world of phenomena. The plants in the Amazon Jungle are in a constant state of struggle/war, vying for sunlight. Those plants which persevere toward the canopy will reap the benefit of not only the sun's light, but also the reward of passing it Tested and Proven Genes down to the next generation. Those plants at peace with their default lot in life are strangled in darkness and die. Thus, Nature insures that her living parts and pieces in each consecutive age gradually progresses and evolves. The future always belongs to the Victor.

The animal kingdom would not be able to exist without struggle and strife. Each Alpha Male of any group of animals earned his position from battles, and his reward is command over the males, and sex with all the females – thus passing his tested genes down. Those at peace with their default lot in life, become Nature's second class citizens – insignificant long term wise, whose genes have been marked for discontinuation. The future belongs to the Victor. Those at peace remain in the past. If you doubt this compare the peaceful San Bushmen of sub-Sahara Africa to the warmongering Anglo-Saxon. Which of the two hold and influences the future of our species with a strong grip?

Not even in the financial arena is peace favorable. Those who struggle and war with the economic elements, who fearlessly take risks and even utilize failure as a means to become more determined to succeed are amply rewarded with wealth and power. Those at peace with their default lot in life, those who do not struggle and wage war with the economic forces holding them down, end up slaves to the Machine. The pleasures and spoils of life go to the Victor. The pain and toil of life goes to the peaceful. Such is the Wyrld we each weave. This is, after all, a causal system we exist in. A causal system is one which gives you what you put into it. In the end, we all deserve what we fight for.

Being Sinister Initiates of the Order of Nine Angles, we must each learn to understand the Mysteries of Wyrd and the mechanism of this causal system we exist within and utilize it to our people and future progeny's benefit. Always struggle for Victory in all areas of Life and never let peace cross your mind. Your successes and spoils in Life – that which you have Victorious warred for – is your genuine mark of Honour in the ONA, not these grade titles or how many ONA manuscripts you have collected.

For if the ONA is a school, a boot camp, a way of life, which has the intent of bettering its progeny and society; and all it has been producing are no different causally from the Mundanes; then why have an ONA in the first place? If a Mundane has fought for wealth and free time to live his life and travel the world and have whatever woman he desires. And all you have are a 1000 strange occult MSS, a wage earning job that barely pays the bills, and a fat goth heifer of a girlfriend: What has the ONA done for you? How has it taught you to Master Life. What occult knowledge do you know, if your life sucks.

If you are at peace with your life as is, then you are not of the ONA, you are merely posing and dabbling. As an Initiate of the Sinister Way you are taught to surmount yourself and struggle to become a new person. This does not imply just an internal alchemy. Because what we give life and form to in our minds subjectively [acausal], ultimately manifests as our objective world of experience [causal].

Thus the life you live, what you objectively have such as status, money, friends, influence, possessions, is a direct gauge of the quality of what you have subjectively. If you are nothing and nobody in life; if you have nothing to show for your years of existence than your insides are lead – there has been no inner alchemy going on. If you cannot change your own life, and influence your own friends, how do you expect to influence society and change civilization. You're kidding yourself.

If you are at peace with society as it is, and this current state of human civilization, then you are not of the ONA. The gradual and Numinous progression and evolution of our civilization is the ONA's second objective. Working towards manifesting a stellar civilization actually goes beyond reading and collecting occult tomes. It actually implies apprehension and mastery of life first, then getting an education in fields of interest to the Order, and laboring with organized synergy, toward that distant dream over many generations.

In other words: Put the occult crap and anarchist cook book down, and go to college! Besides, all that "analog" disruption tactics is old aeon. The future of disruption of society has already begun: Digital Warfare. While Chinese and North Korean Computer jocks are engaging in real world 21st century disruption tactics with Amerika and its allies. Meanwhile we have some guys in the ONA that seem to literally be stuck in the stone ages of disruption dialectics, throwing rocks, vandalizing churches, beating yuppies with sticks, tarring and feathering Jews, as if that's going to do anything. What's even more pathetic is I've actually encounters a few "ONA initiates" who seem to be spelling their words with random tosses of Yahtzee dice [illiteracy]. Stay in school dammit!

If you are at peace with how the ONA is then you do not understand the essence of the ONA and are not of the ONA. It's not for nothing that Myatt and/or Anton Long has continuously striven/struggled to produce Manuscripts over the course of 30 years. This ONA is like Empirical Science.

There is a Methodology which is the essential core. It is this Method which gives birth to outer forms – new theories and disciplines as they are referred to in science. Empirical Science is not a static phenomenon like the orthodoxy and dogma of religion. Empirical Science is dynamic and fluid. Old theories are discarded over time or expanded upon as time passes according to the growth of our understandings of things. New disciplines arises over time, each progressively more advanced.

Compare today's infant discipline of nanotechnology with the pseudo-science of alchemy of 300 years ago. Or today's theory on genetics with the simple theories of Darwin's finches. There is a clear progression and evolution of Science. Progression and evolution does not mean replacing the old with something novel. It implies a building upon, a growing from; in the same way that who you are today is not a replacement for what you were at the age of 5. That early part of you and its experiences and memories still remains, but you have gradually – empirically – progressed into something more.

This ONA of ours works in the same way. There is the core methodology; which gives birth to theories and disciplines. These theories must be applied and tested in the real word and refined, thus giving rise to disciplines [outer forms]. As time progresses, old discipline may not be as effective anymore. Thus the ONA must ever be allowed to gradually evolve over time. In this way will the ONA be able to jump the generation gap. Which is something many old aeonic religions and institutions are having a hard time with currently.

The reward of our victory – victory in our struggle to keep up with the progression of time and the passing of generations – we remain relevant to each newly emerging generation. Thus do we maintain our inspiration and influence in each passing era. In their peace and acceptance of things as is, these Stagnant Satanisms grow ever irrelevant to each coming generation, doomed to eventually fall into that generation gap into extinction. Think about it a while. Where has the ToSers gone? And the Creepy Crawly Crowleyans? What has become of Avon Book's Clown [LaVey] and their Wal-Mart Satanism?

The Sinister Way of the ONA never stays the same for long, for it's fountainhead of Sinister Insights: "Anton Long" never stays in one place for long either. On his personal journey – personal victory to surmount himself – of Self Enlightenment the man we know sometimes as Anton Long has entered into many various roles, religions, and ways of life. From Taoist to Buddhism, from Christian monk to Muslim, from street thug to Nazi to Numinous Empath. Thus the ONA from its causal beginnings has always been imbued with an ethos of amorphous fluidity. It gradually grows and changes like a living organism metabolizing and discarding waste. Discarding old tried, tested, useless theories; for new insights and dialectics, to get it to its established destination.

Along its way as it progresses forward, it inspires and influence people, and whole genres of Stagnant Satanism. Anyone who has an intimate knowledge of the religious phenomenon of Satanism, cannot deny the impact and influence the Order of Nine Angles has had; to which no credit is given. The ONA was the first to coin and use the term: Traditional Satanism; which has now unfortunately been hijacked for quite some time by the stagnant freestyle Theistic Satanist.

It was the first to make the central focus of its Initiates their own personal illumination and progression according to that Nietzschean ethos; instead of making some High Priest, Temple or Church the focus. It was and still is the first to make the Progression of Man from an earth bound Homo Sapiens to a Stellar Homo Galactica. It was and still is the first to make the Progression of Human Civilization towards its highest conceivable potential its second aim. From its very beginning the aims of the ONA has always been a Faustian Vision. If there was one word which aptly captures the fundamental essence, ethos, quintessence, esprit, of the Order of Nine Angles it would indeed be: Progressive.

Unlike the many generic genres of Stagnant Satanism which remains dogmatically the same in their orthodoxy over many decades; the Order of Nine Angles has remained true to its essential Progressive Nature. The ONA of the 60's was nothing like the ONA of the 70's. The ONA of a past 20th century is nothing like what it has evolved into and become in this 21st Century. And like a living acausal entity, it will continue to evolve and gradually Progress over causal time reaching for its collective dreams and visions in the great distance – never at peace with what it is – always reaching and struggling forward and upward.

In its struggling, its ability to evolve, change, shapeshift, adapt to the times and climate of each era, it remains relevant, meaningful, and valuable to each emerging generation. Whereas these generic Stagnant Satanism grows old and irrelevant, to die in time with its original generation. Such Stagnant Religions quickly lose touch with reality, for reality is nothing more than the weltanschauung, perception, and understanding of the objective world of each generation. Such Stagnant genres of Satanism quickly become irrelevant to each new generation, unable to fulfill the specific needs of each new generation. Peace and stagnation clearly culls the weak. Weak genes and weak memes.

Thus Life and Time is Nature's testing arena, laboratory, and battle field for the genuinely fit, mighty, Noble – the Victorious – who are justly rewarded. Just as stagnant organisms in life, over time, become extinct from their inability to change, evolve, and adapt so to will all stagnant religions grow irrelevant and die out in time. The Strong memplexes survive to inspire and shape the next generation. The weak Stagnant ones are forgotten or become breeding ground for poisonous scum, much like a stagnant pool of water is a home to harmful microbes.

After 40 years of battles, disruption, struggles, inspiring, influencing, evolving, and progressing, the Order of Nine Angles is still alive and kicking in the 21st Century. As the generic genres of Stagnant Satanism are gradually falling off the generation cliff; the ONA has managed to jump the Generation Gap into a new Aeon... a new world, and into the minds of a new generation of Sinister Nobility. The future always belongs to the Victor. Always fight and struggle for Victory in all areas of Life and: May you never be at peace. Agia H Baphomet.

SUBVERSIVE UPAYA

Subversive Upaya

What is an Upaya? Basically ((etymologically as opposed to sectarian interpretation)) “Upaya” is the Sanskrit word for a “Trick,” a “Scheme,” a “Ploy,” a “Devised Plan/Plot,” an “Approach,” a “Useful Means,” or an “Expedient Method.” In modern English the word “Methodology” would best explain what an “Upaya” is. But I’ve heard a better word used by a subculture which better grasps the essential utilitarian quality of Upaya: “Tricknology,” which was a word invented by Master Fard Muhammad to explain certain things.

Zen uses a fist and a baby to explain Upaya. To illustrate, your baby is crying and won’t stop, so you devise a way/means to stop the baby from crying. You make a fist and pretend that you have candy or something inside, and say to the baby, “Ooh look what I got... what’s this? I wonder what’s inside?? Candy; Nirvana maybe???” If you get the baby’s attention, she stops crying and looks at the fist. That’s Upaya. The mother/father knows there is nothing in the fist, they know it’s a trick, but that trick has a productive ((Kosala/kaushalya)) intent/Fruit; the intent/Fruit being the cessation of the baby’s crying/dukkha. This would be called “Upaya Kosala” in Pali. Actually the inside joke among Buddhists is that there is Nothing in the Fist ((Sunyata = Nothingness/emptiness))! That’s only funny to a certain crowd.

The Buddha ((Mr. Gautama)) took the concept of Upaya and turned it into a viable and acceptable Buddhist Method of teaching Dhamma. In this context – as the Buddha used it – an Upaya was only a means to an End. The End being that the specific person or upasika/upasaka he was teaching grasped Dhamma, Enlightenment, and the Ariyamagga ((Noble Way)). The means was anything at the Buddha's disposal.

Thus, it is said that the Buddha taught 84,000 teachings of Dhamma. The symbolical number represents the diverse backgrounds, level of understanding, cognitive skills, and such of each individual person he was teaching. In other words, for each person he taught, the Buddha devised a different Upaya. Which is why you will find many contradictions within the 25,000 pages of the Tipitaka. Such teachings of Buddha are "dialectical," having developed in context to a dialogue with a specific person or pupil in a specific time and place, in specific cultural and social conditions. To take such "anchored" dialogues/dialectics out of its native contextual matrix it is rooted in, would obscure 90% of its value and would generate more confusion and misunderstanding than insight.

For example we do know that the Buddha wasn't very big on the Brahmanistic concept/doctrine of Atma ((an immortal soul)). But there was a time when he had met a Charvaka ((rabid materialist)) who argued with the Buddha stating that the body was made of only the 4 elements and that one stops existing at death and that moral laws were thus not worth following.

Although the Buddha agreed with many of the Charvaka's statements, the Buddha did not like the fact that the Charvaka was not morally inclined for certain immoral acts will cause unskillful ((akosala)) or negative effects in his life ((dukkha)). Thus, the Buddha devised an upaya where he himself would teach a teaching that completely contradicted his own personal beliefs. The Buddha taught the Charvaka that the Brahmans were right and that there was indeed an immortal Atman in all people which was subject to karma. After much leg twisting, debating, and upaya-ing; the Charvaka renounced his materialist beliefs and lived a spiritual and moral life instead.

So the moral of that story is that the teachings superficially are meaningless, because it is the desired End Result the teachings or upaya bares that is more important. The teachings – the spoken Dhamma – are thus only a MEANS to manifest an END. ((Further reading))

The Mahayana Buddhists have a saying that goes, "The Dharma that is spoken is not the true Dharma." Which is to say that one should not fixate one's mind on a teaching or deify a teaching as infallible doctrines to be followed by the literal letter. Because such teachings/dharma are only mental or subjective approximations of the Dharma – or Way/Law of Things – that has existed long before mankind and language. And sometimes – as with many upayas – such teachings are "expedient" teachings or simply ploys to get the student to go in a certain direction. As per the Buddha, it doesn't matter what the expedient method is that is used, even if such upayas contradicts teachings, conventionalism, and is amoral, what matters is that Buddhi and Nirvana is the End Result... that the Anariya ((ignorant fool)) learns to transcend his idiocy and become an Ariya ((a Noble/Lofty minded person)).

When in ancient times the now extinct Hinayana school and the still living and evolving Mahayana school of Buddhism were in some ideological war, the Hinayanas accused the Mahayanas of not being genuine Buddhists because they created their own sutras and doctrines as they went along. To end the debate and arguments, the Mahayanas just pointed out that their whole Approach and Methods were an entire Upaya to get their followers to manifest the same Illumination and Liberation.

The “missionaries” that spread Buddhism across Asia in ancient times used a subspecies of Upaya called Upaya Panya meaning “Clever/Wise ((Panya/pan~n~a in Pali or Prajna in Sanskrit)) Tricks,” or Upaya Kosala meaning “Constructive ((Kosala/kaushalya)) Trickery (Upaya) to mass convert an entire native population. In Vajrayana Upaya Panya is depicted symbolically as a male Buddha ((Upaya)) in sexual union with a female deity ((Panya))... the female of course symbolizing the subtle feminine craftiness, cunningness, which most of us ((girls and you gay boys too)) have... either that or boys are just easily tricked ((upaya)).

Basically Upaya Panya is something the Jesuit Priests are/were very skilled at doing. The Jesuits in olden times would travel into a foreign country, learn the language of the natives, learn the religions, the gods, and world views of the natives, then report their intelligence to the Vatican. The schemers in the Vatican will then devise the best Expedient Method of mass converting the native population. Usually this is done by “morphing” Catholicism in such a way that it becomes a hybrid synthesis of the original Catholicism and native spiritual beliefs, practices, rites, and such. This is also when the gods and/or cultural iconic figures of a native population are conveniently beatified as Catholic saints. So the idea here is the Vatican desires the native population to be Catholics (by any means), which is the desired End Result. How that End Result is achieved is based on intelligence, craftiness and trickery which are the subversive (re: nonviolent) means.

The Buddhist “missionaries” utilized the same subversive tactics, they just gave it pretty names that sound all mystical and spiritual like “Upaya Panya,” and “Upaya Kosala,” and they translate it into foreign languages to sound all transcendent and fluffy. Here I used the word “subversive” to mean that an external/foreign entity ((missionaries)) subverts a native people’s established culture, world views, and indigenous sectarian beliefs by introducing foreign memes with the intent of manipulating, coercing, or influencing a desired change in the native population. And so as with China, the gods of the indigenous peoples such as the fat guy ((Budai)) and a goddess ((Kuan Yin)) become “Bodhisattvas,” and the native Taoism is absorbed to create hybrid “Buddhisms” such as “Chan Buddhism.” And we have hybrid Buddhisms in Japan merged with much older indigenous belief systems like Shintoism. Of course Tibetan Buddhism is not “pure” Buddhism, it’s a mix of Buddhism and the indigenous Bon religion.

All of these different kinds of “Buddhisms” were/are not bastardizations of some “purer,” more “genuine” Buddhism. They were/are accepted Upayas and recognized as legitimate, because in the end, all the natives become Buddhists. There is no such thing as a pure and genuine Buddhism, especially in the real world of living cultures and traditions. The ancient animism and such of a living culture and its time honored traditions are not thrown away for some new collective identity as a Buddhist. The Buddhism is just piled on top of their already ancient cultural “repertoire.” And you can see the same process happening with Buddhism in regards to the Occident where there is emerging a very noticeable new form of Buddhism some have called the Western Vehicle, where the post-Christian, secular, neo-rationalism of Australia ((where Buddhism is a major religion among Caucasians)), Europe, and America are not replaced by weirdly mystical, myth riddled Buddhisms, but that Buddhism is acquired as an accessory or add-on to what they already have and are.

“The Dharma that is spoken is not the true Dharma.” Or as my grandma says, “Dhamma is not in any temple or book or monk. It is inside each of us. We just may initially need help finding it.” There is no such thing as “pure” Buddhism because of upaya and the need to reformat Buddhism in such a way that your audience understands it. Even when Buddhism is apprehended in the West it “morphs” to take on the world views and scientific rationalism of the Occident. But this is a good thing because it causes us to understand that what is written or taught is NOT the END but only a MEANS. Whereas with a dogmatic and rigid religion as Christianity the doctrine, dogma, and beliefs are the End. Which is how many Western religious/sectarian memplexes are, even Satanism, where the “Satanic” beliefs, doctrine, statements, and ideology ((Atheism/Theism)) are the definitive End. “Definitive End” here meaning that such doctrines, beliefs, and world views actually is used to define your Self/Person/Ego as the final End Product. For example, if you are a “LaVeyan” Satanist ((under the Gilmore Doctrine)) you must be an atheist-materialist and if you adopt a theist-supernatural world view, then you are no longer “LaVeyan” but something fake and unreal and perhaps not even human; and vice versa. In this context – of judging other based on their intangible reified ideas – I would say that racism is far better and more rational because at least skin color, ethnicity, and nationality are tangible and real.

You simply do not have this tunnel vision fixation of mind and self identity on Outer Forms ((Upaya)), reifications, and world views, in any Dharmic religions. For instance Hinduism. On an exoteric ((superficial)) level, Hinduism ((as is Buddhism)) is a big mess. There are monotheist Hindus, polytheist Hindus, atheist Hindus, theist Hindus, materialist Hindus, and supernatural/spiritual Hindus. The Outer Dharma they use is not the End, only a means to and End. The End being Sambodhi ((Self Realization)) and Moksha ((Liberation from Samsara)). As an enlightened Guru or Bhikkhu who knows and understands Dharma ((Logos/Tao)), you should be able to assess your students’ cognitive capacity and their unique level of understandings and needs to know that if your student need to believe in gods, rites, magic and such, or he can not yet grasp the idea of he being the living infinite cosmos, that you must be able to restate or reformat Dharma into something your student can not only comprehend but use – for his own advancement and progressive development towards his own greater potential. You never hear a sect of Hindus claim to be the “real” Hindus while others are “fake” Hindus because they believe differently. You don’t ever hear different vehicles of Buddhism claim to be “real” Buddhism while others are “fake” Buddhist because they believe differently.

What is written and taught is not infallible divine doctrines, it is just a Method of teaching/conveying ideas between one who has “seen” and one who desires to “see.” To a skilled teacher, how you convey what you have seen all depends on who you are teaching. You would teach the same wisdom you have extracted out of your many years of life to a child very differently then what you would teach a college level adult because the child and adult each have their own level of understanding and inner needs. The words and ideas used are only approximations, clever articulations, naked essence dressed up to entertain the minds of a specific audience. The “real” Dhamma is that which existed way before humanity and human language. It is wordless in its own existence like Nature, the sun, the stars, and the cosmos. The real Dharma is the Way or “Law” of Things, which the Buddha discovered and observed during his meditations in the forest, which he tried to teach in different ways to different people.

Upaya can take on bizarre forms. Vajrayana Buddhism is a good example of an upaya gone wild. Vajrayana is sometimes called Tantric Buddhism or Esoteric Buddhism. Some sects of Vajrayana have secret or private teachings given only to initiates. These teachings are diverse depending on the sects. Most deal with things the West would call “magic,” some deal with tantric practices that incorporate sex, and as with the Drukpas, the Left Hand Path ((certain forms of vamachara)) are used. They’re all acceptable upayas which are just different Methods utilized to get the student to Realize and Actualize the same End Result. Different hiking trails... same lofty summit and illumined vantage point.

Of course therefore, no one demonstrates Upaya in practice better than the “mahamonk” of Vajrayana Tibetan Buddhism the Dalai Lama. To his own school and sect and people he is the leader of a very bizarre species of Buddhism with pantheons of gods, spiritual mysticism, rabid supernaturalism, magical rites, and religious imagery of Buddhas and goddesses in coitus. But to his Occidental audience in the West he teaches and presents a Buddhism which is very rational, pro-science, congruent to contemporary quantum physics, concentrated on secular methods of meditation and stress relief for the modern age, etc... that is Appealing to his Occidental Market; that’s upaya. Same holy guy... two completely different “Buddhisms.” Which is the “real Buddhism?” Neither are. Each superficial form of Buddhism is only a methodology or method of cultivating the desired end Fruit. It doesn’t matter what methods or procedures is used by a wine grower in viticulture, because in the end the same Fruit grows. You want to pay Mind/attention to the perfection of the grapes you desire to grow, not to the of perfection of the manure you or your neighbor are using.

So what if we were clever and crafty ((panya)) sectarian “subverters,” and we found ourselves in a nation populated with newly disenfranchised people from a post-christian age grasping for something new to hold on to, to give them meaning in their lives? How would we get such easy prey to End up working for Self Enlightenment and Liberation? The how or means ((upaya)) is irrelevant, so long as the End Result is constructive ((Kosala/kaushalya)). The answer is that it would depend on the specific audience and as an “adept” of our craft, trade, or Way, one should be cunning enough to outsmart an idiot. See that puts things into perspective for those in the Game. What kind of adept, occult teacher, coven leader, or grand magister are you when you can’t even convince an idiot to like you let alone accept your ideas? Ideas are just ideas... gods are just gods... why do people “favor” one set and one teacher over another? It’s because of Panya ((cunningness)). We’re essentially dealing with a form of psychological or memetic warfare when we talk about religion and/or ideology and the spread of religion/ideology. The battlefield is your Mind. Upaya ((the means and method whereby memes are virally implanted into a target population/Mind)) is the weapon. The winner owns the lives of people. The losers lose their own will, autonomy, and existence. In this war there are only three real positions you can take: fight as a warrior on the offensive; stand your ground in the defensive with a strong will and mind; or be vanquished and subjugated.

One thing I love about the ONA is the First Satanic Creed ((BBS)) which goes, "Satan in particular and the Dark Gods in general are a means to self-fulfillment and self-understanding." Call it what you want: Self Enlightenment or Self-Understanding; Liberation or Self-Fulfillment, these are the END FRUIT we desire to Cultivate. How we do it, whether with Buddhism, Satanism, music, art, or voodoo or whatever is of no relevant concern. If one method fails, engineer a better one. The essence of the Way – whatever you call it – must be able and allowed to shapeshift to reflect the conditions and capacity of each person. This is one reason why I personally find the ONA to be very practical and useful in some subcultures of the Western Market, because it is already understanding of the use and "mutability" of Outer Forms ((National-Socialism, Traditional Satanism, Dreccian Nexions, Balobians)) and wordless Inner Essence. David Myatt demonstrates this as a true subversive adept. Whether it's the Numinous Way, Reichsfolk National-Socialism, or the Order of Nine Angles, the Inner Essence of all three are the same. Only the Outer Form, the manufactured formatted Method of conveying that Inner Essence is different: because it is created to target different audiences.

To end this, all I can say and hope for is that the ONA continues to value its Inner Essence and to not be so fixated or attached to Outer Forms. These Outer Forms are only Vehicles that are manufactured to move us towards the same End Destination/Destiny ((Wyrd)).

dilapidated...

unwanted...

unneded...

i was once used...

to shelter a people...

wherein they went about their business...

from which they built their cities...

and expanded their civilizations away from me...

they have gone their way...

having fallen...

what lives i once housed...

what minds once beheld me...

are lost now in time...

yet i remain...

a shelter to phantoms and memories...

evocative...

provocative...

dark...

haunting...

more alive then i was to them...

these damp walls...

my earthly sent...

my crawling darkness...

my cold silence...

wherein your thoughts and fears echos...

here, in me is your atonement...

atonement with Living Darkness...

let then burn, your myrrh and incense of mars...

and take your place among the shadows.

TESSARAE SPLENDENS

Tessarae Splendens

I'll try to answer Question floating around cyberspace about subjects and topics either related to ONA or me or just things I might be able to answer. These are just my opinions and for a majority of the answers putting in some time researching will generate answers too. Unless such questions actually has something to do with my person. I was trying to find the Latin for "Sugar Cubes is Smart," but could not find the word Sugar in Latin as – so I learned – sugar had not yet been invented. So I named this essay just Tessarae Splendens which is supposed mean Brilliant Cubes. Tessara, if you look deeper into its means it had back in ancient Roman times is a word pregnant of meaning. One of it's meanings besides a cube is a mosaic pattern of checked squares. Such as the black and white squares of a chess board. Which to me was a fine symbol of the Light and the Dark of the ONA and the Numinous Way. Which when put together with Reichsfolk, makes a beautiful mosaic... if you can See the pattern from the little squares. If we can appreciate the Bigger Picture minus the micromanaging of little ideas. Sometimes it's all in what we are focusing on isn't it?

Q. Why not have WSA go it's own way? Or why hitch a ride with ONA? Or why not make your own "paradigm?"

A. It's a good question. First reason was that what we were making was very similar to the ONA in many ways and after finding the ONA material we discovered that Anton Long had done a better job at trying to make what we were wanting to make. So we just went with the better one. Second reason is for Myatt and his other stuff such as Reichsfolk and the Numinous Way. When WSA says "ONA" we actually means Reichsfolk, the Numinous Way, and the Myattian ideas in the ONA. There is a lot of things about that Triad we really like, so rather than steal or borrow ideas from Myatt, we tried to do things the honorable way and be a "nexion" to the ONA, absorb its Myattian ideas, and pay our respects to the Man for providing the insights we were using. And in return we try to put out our own insights to help build on the ONA.

During the late 90's and 2000's I think it was regular practice for random people and groups to be inspired by the ONA writings such as the Black Book of Satan and Naos and then borrow from them to create their own things. And so in this period we gradually had all these new Satanic Orders and Temples that were inspired by ONA.

I suppose this was regular practice because when WSA found Thoth and the Old Guard DL they told us in their own words to just "steal from the ONA" and use whatever we needed from it. I know they meant well by it. At the time Chloe was our project manager and she said that it's dishonorable to steal from a person if we in fact feel that such person is admirable or worth learning from. It's just not in our native culture to be so lame as to steal other people's ideas, say it's ours, shrug off the originator, and not give them credit or something. If in our culture you see some one as an elder or kru ((teacher)) because they have insights and teachings to impart which you want, then there is a sort of social protocol or system of etiquette we follow, which is a relationship based on a pupil honoring a master. The term is "Garob Kru" meaning to Honour/Revere the Teacher.

It's like Asian Martial Arts. You find a style you think is cool and want to learn it. There is a protocol to follow or social etiquette, or way of gaining access to that style. You don't steal the style and say it is yours. You make yourself a student to the sensei and learn the entire style, and as a student you pay your honour and respects to the man teaching you. Then after learning that style you may continue the Legacy of your teacher by teaching his style you learned, or you make a new style of your own to teach. But in either case you still pay respects to your teacher and honour your lineage. So we see something like the ONA to be a Mental Martial Arts style of sorts which Anton Long developed and taught. And we chose to continue this lineage and continue to teach this style, and to give credit to where it is due; but at the same time we work to build on it.

Other two Reasons are based on two points of consideration on our side. These two points of consideration we call the "Kayla Directive" ((KD)) and the "Chloe Directive" ((CD)). Everything that we ((WSA)) do goes to help actualize those two directives. Basically the KD is to use a pre-existing entity rooted in a Target Niche Market as a syringe to gradually inject memes into said Niche Market, for certain long term reasons. Basic purpose is to generate something we ((WSA)) call "Social Commodity," "Social Revenue," and "Collateral Property," with things we call "Intellectual Capital."

Say you got 1 Million dollars to spend and you are business oriented. Two options are given to you:

Option A: Use the 1 Million to start up a small business and perhaps make a steady $1000 per month profit to ride on.

Option B: Use the 1 Million to invest in a pre-existing corporation such as say an Apple Inc or Yahoo shares ((when yahoo first went public)).

Each option has it's pros and cons. Pros for Option A would be being your own boss, be independent, run your own shit. Cons for Option A would be generate your own market, do your own work.

Pros for Option B would be have others do the work, kick back, support the parent corporation to help increase dividend returns, simple PR work. Cons for Option B would be high risk, work under an existing corporate structure, it takes time to see any real profit. But a Pro is that you have others to put in their effort to spread your co-signed product.

WSA went with Option B. In assessing a parent company to invest Intellectual Capital in we look for certain things. First thing we look for is if the parent company has a fanbase or market, this we call Social Commodity. The more SC the more valuable the organization.

Second thing we look for in a parent company to merge with is what we call Collateral Property. When my family buys a Chinese restaurant from a friend, what does that business transaction actually come with? The tables, the stoves, the cooks, the employees, all that shit is Collateral Property. As a business person when you buy a business like a restaurant you need Collateral Property so the restaurant is up and running on the get-go. You can't afford to run around buying tables and new stoves and kitchenware, search for reliable cooks, and hire trustworthy employees.

With organizations Collateral Property is everything from books, manuscripts, yes men, internal infrastructure, and product distribution methods, everything that has been used that can continue to be used to keep the business running. The more CP an organization has, the more valuable the org.

Third thing we look for in a parent company to invest in is what we call Turn Over Rate. Who's coming... who's going... who's joining... who's quitting... who's staying? What's the RATIO between joiners and quitters like? Are there regular customers ((Retention of users/membership)). If your org Turn Over rate is high, your org is Socially Worthless.

Why go through all this? Why not just go with option A? Because of the end value of your Capital. What's the difference between pennystock shares per OTC and shares of Apple Inc on the stock exchange? The Value, and the potential high return. Same capital... different Value. $1 buys a lot of pennystocks, but it can't buy shit from a double digit corporation on the exchange. Double digit meaning long reputable companies with two letters in their stock symbol.

We work with something we call "Intellectual Capital." These are memes/ideas that have either a market already or can easily generate a niche market. We use that IC to invest in what we call "Memeshares." Just like in a merger or partnership one company will use capital to buy shares of a another company, then put in their people on the executive board.

An organization or culture is a memeplex. A memeplex is a complex of memes. In other words an organization is composed of ideas. You invest your IC into an org to get your memes into that memeplex, when your IC has been incorporated into said memeplex, you thus OWN a real percentage of the memeplex, which is what a memeshare is.

The point is to increase the value of your IC. Penny stocks aren't worth as much as stocks and shares of a well known corporation with a market and with prime Awareness- Real Estate ((ARE)).

ARE is like corporate symbols flashing on a reputable stock exchange and adds on billboards and prime time TV. If an org is unheard of and people aren't aware of its existence, or chattering about it, that org is Socially Worthless. Meaning it has no power to generate Social Commodity and your IC will be worthless. An org which is in people's heads, which people talk about in whatever way has more value. Meaning it can generate SC and in time increase the value and Fluidity of your Intellectual Capital. Fluidity means when your IC – your memes – moves, spreads, inspires, influences. Inside a market and beyond.

Just because a person may have a website, or a book, or an organization with users, does not actually mean their IC and memes have Fluidity. Memes without Fluidity has no value. It's like money. Money must Flow and circulate or the economy is negatively effected. Capital must Flow. Don't matter if you have money sitting in a bank vault. The bank must use that money and keep it Flowing, or go bankrupt. Just because there are books written, doesn't mean the IC has Fluidity Potential.

To us, ONA meets all those needs and therefore will help us actualize the Kayla Directive.

The Chloe Directive is a long term project of first adapting ONA to an Eastern worldview, then merging it with Reichsfolk and the Numinous Way to transplant the Myattian Triad in Asia. 1 Billion Chinese... 1 Billion Indians... 500 million Southeast Asians. In 20-50 years Asia will have the biggest economies with China as top dog, then Japan, and South Korea as tech giants, then India will be a economic giant also. 50 years from now the Future will belong to Asia. Any colonization of the ocean or space or anything that has to do with a Future will happen thru Asia. The Chloe Directive is to reconfigure ONA/Reichsfolk/TNW to fit our ancestral Asian people and market. We call it Transplantation. The things we write now and tests we do with our Buddhist IC are just Research & development.

WSA has no intention of selling or operating in the West. It matters very little to us what a generic Westerner has to say about the ONA, or what product we 'engineer' since they are not the intended market. They are just a test market. The West only serves as recruiting grounds to find Business Partners called Associates.

Which will explain why WSA is so into language and weltanschauung. Transplanting ONA to Asia isn't easy. The English the ONA and Myattian ideas come in has to go. But at the same time, as much of the essence and Myattian spirit must be retained. How do we do that? We don't know yet. Still in R&D. How do we translate the Myattian word/concept of Acausal or Pathei-Mathos into an Asian Language and retain as much of the original essence and spirit as possible is what is being considered. How do we shapeshift the Myattian Triad in such a way that it reflects and mirrors Asian weltanschauung and also retain as much of the original spirit and essence as possible?

The satanism form has to go. It's pseudo-marketable in the West, but that whole concept is going to have no significant Fluidity in the East. For the past 3 years we've been experimenting with hybrid "Asiatic" memes/IC where we mix Buddhism and other Eastern stuff we know with the core essence of the Sinister Tradition of ONA, Reichsfolk, and The Numinous Way. Then we distribute what test memes we make to a test market thru this blog to watch for feedback and end results. I've already dropped plenty of hints and overtly stated the rewards and benefits of memetic fluidity and a large Social Commodity holding elsewhere.

Q. Why gangs?

A. East Asian "gangs" are slightly different from normal gangs. One good example of an East Asian gang would be Wah Ching. Ethnic Chinese, the words mean something like Wild Youth, or Youth Gone Wild, or Mischievous Youth. WC doesn't claim hoods or streets. Don't dress like cholos. People in WC come from rich families and live in upper middle class plus "hoods." Usual cars driven by most WC would be Mercedes, BMW's, Lexus, or some other high end brand. Most WC are college students by day who actually get good grades. Most WC are born and raised in well to do house holds. Parents are hard working business oriented Chinese folk who own big houses and family businesses.

So not all gangs are Dirt Bangers. You know what a Dirt banger is? It's when your dirt poor banging to make a living because you're too stupid to get a college education, too stupid to own a business, so you have to bang petty crime to feed yourself. You born in a dirt-hood and if you don't die in prison, you will die in a dirt-hood.

WSA approach gangs and gang culture from "Age-Out" perspective. You get to a certain point where you age out of a gang because you're too old for the shit. Why? Because gangs are for juveniles. It's cool banging between 13-25. When 30 comes, you got an old lady or a man, and kids. Your attention and energy should be put on that family. There is a time to do your ABC's. And a time where you understand that doing your ABC's is juvenile. But your past experiences as a juvenile in a gang of some type teaches you valuable lesson for later. You take those lessons and apply the wisdom gained in life for your own Self-Development.

Things like gangs are only a means to and end. And mostly for a certain certain type of person. The type who was born and raised inside a culture that instills the ethos of a nuclear family. The intent is to physically be apart of a Corporatist and Collective entity. To pragmatically learn to function in such a Corporatist Way of Life as a part of something bigger then yourself. To learn to work together for a common end goal and common shared profit. Which is a Clan Ethos.

Gangs are not the only way to gain the end lessons. Go join or start a skinhead crew and do something. Go join the girl scouts for a few years. Marry an Asian girl or a Mexican girl. Join an army. Live as a Mormon for 5 years in an all Mormon county. Be Amish for 5 years. Live in Thailand or the Philippines for a while. Who cares how you get your lessons. But the intent is causal. To get you to live a different way in such a way that you will stop the Magian ethos of nuclear family culture. Divide and conquer. Why have you been divided and segregated into dysfunctional nuclear family units? Who benefits in the end? Whose Interests are you actually living to serve?

Q. Why tribes and clans?

A. Only a generic urbanized Westerner will ask that question. Because they come from nuclear families and from an urban culture that conditions its people to live in nuclear families.

I say urban because in the southern parts of America, Appalachia, and parts of the East Coast you actually have White people who are born and raised in the more natural and older clans and communal inter-clan social order and familial structure like the Amish and other Mennonites live and exist in.

Is it possible to live in clans? I don't know, ask some clan from the south. Is communitarian life possible? I don't know ask the Mennonites or anybody in an all Mormon county. Are tribes backwards subhumans? I don't now, go to Casino Morongo and ask the tribe who owns it if they are backwards and anti-technology. The answers are actually all "out there." The word tribe in the urbanized mind of a common Westerner conjures up images of naked dark skinned people in loin cloths living in a jungle somewhere. And tribes might not always be like that in real life.

Out side of urban Japan, in most of Asia people live in clans and not nuclear families. A clan is a large extended family. I really don't know how to explain what a clan is which has already been explained in detail by even wikipedia. Mundanes today just can't be bothered to transcend their preconceived assumptions by doing a little research, because that would require effort and a potential challenge to their hallowed assumptions.

I grew up in a clan and not a family, but we call it a family still. You live differently then nuclear families live. In a nuclear family you turn 18, move out on your own, start your own nuclear family, kick your kids out when they are 18, and the whole culture starts over again.

In a clan, nobody moves out, unless they want to. And in the country side where clans live together in communities, there is no such thing as "moving out" because everyone in the community is related, so you're still living with your family anyways. In my house you have 3 generations living together grandma is there, aunts in their 50?s live there, cousins like me and some other live there. We live together, help each other pay the bills, and work business together. Which to me is way better for a number of reasons.

One reason is that a nuclear family struggles to pay bills. If you can buy a house later, the house is a small one and you and your spouse work your ass off just to pay for the house. You end up having no time to spend with each other or with your own children. That creates Stress. And Stress kills and tears apart families.

With a clan like mine, a bunch of grown ups who all love each other and have been raised up with each other continue to live together. They pool their money to buy a huge house to raise their kids in and the old people have a place to live in until they die naturally around people they love.

Since your have many adults helping out with the bills and working together to own family businesses, you actually have a lot of free time for yourself, for your spouse, and for your children. There is less stress and yes, less responsibilities, and less worries. I only work part time at various businesses my family owns and that is enough to pay my "bills" which is phone and gas and shopping money. That's a few hours a day or so. The rest of the time is free time.

I don't have to get a job or worry about unemployment. And then when I am ready because I was raised in a clan culture where I see my elders live together, work together and pool money to start up businesses, I will do the same. When I am 30 or something. When that time comes, because of the clan, I don't have to go to a bank to borrow money, my huge family and grandma will provide the money for me and my cousins.

Each way of life has its pros and cons. I'm not saying one is better than the other. What I am saying is that Asians and most of Asia naturally live in a clan based family order. Which is one very big reason why as WSA, we value the concept of tribes and clans found in the Myattian Triad. There is a natural and cultural market out in Asian for that. Here in America such ideas are laughed at. But that's cool. Die of stress. Be unemployed. Worry about your bills. Die alone when you are old. Spend the best years of your life working for others to make them rich and to feed their kids. Have the state raise your kids. Have no time for your spouse and get divorced. I don't care. But that isn't how I live, and it sure won't be how I want my future children to live.

Also when ONA uses the word "tribe" as in Sinister Tribe, it doesn't mean naked people living in the bush. It usually means an Urban Tribe, which is a euphemism for a gang or crew or firm.

Q. What is the ONA?

A. Outside looking in – who cares? If you knew what it was would that make you ONA? Would you love it? Be it's best friend? I doubt it.

ONA Describes a certain type of person, as one Niner puts it. What people is it describing you may ask. LOOK. Take ONA people and list what qualities and characteristics and things they all share in common. What common points you end up is what the ONA is Describing and intended to attract. Because it describes the way a person is, if what you see or read about ONA is not to your liking, then you are not what is being describes, and therefore the ONA was not for you. So don't worry about it. We're actually not interested in you. We're interested in Our Kind, who will Resonate with the Essence beneath the Form.

Q. Who is Anton Long? Why come he don't have a history online which is googlable? Why is his name attached to only essays? What has he done?

A. Certain types of people who are literate and like to write call it a "Pen Name," a "Nom De Plume," or a "Pseudonym." In most real life cases, a Pen Name is not an actual real human person. A Pen Name is just a random name used to affix to written things... hence Pen Name. And so because Pen Names are not actual people, usually it would mean that Pen Names don't have histories. And usually you'll only find Pen Names at the end of written documents... hence Pen Name.

Anton Long has not done anything. There is a redundant reason for this... because "Anton Long" is a Pen Name. Pen Names are a literary device used by authors. And so because Pen names aren't real people born from mothers and so on, they don't do anything, because a Pen Name isn't a real person.

I use a number of Names and Pen Names depending on what I write and for what audience. For example if I write letters to my cousins and friends I use Lynzie. If I write emails to my aunties and uncles I use Jessiddha which is my family first name my dad gave me. If I write emails or things for my church I use Jeslyn. If I write letters or things for my old high school friends I use Jessica, Jessy, or Jess which is what they know me by. All of my elders call me Lyn which is my second first name their peer group knows me by. If I write articles for a Buddhist group I am associated with I use Lyn and my Last Names, which is my professional name. If I ghostwrite articles for one of my cousins ((used to)) to put into his Lodge news letter I don't use a name at all and he would put their name on it instead. If I am making random posts online I use SugaCubez. If I am writing ONA stuff I use Shugz which my associated audience knows me by. And I have a different email account for most of those name, pseudonyms and Pen names I use.

This then becomes interesting if you think about it. For instance, "are" Jeslyn and Shugz the same "person?" No they are not. Jeslyn is Catholic, she writes very Christian oriented things for a deeply religious church audience of friends and peers. Whereas Shugz writes for the ONA endorsing everything from crime and rape to murder, Nazism, and Devil Worship. But they are both Me. Is Lyn the same "person" as Jeslyn and SugaCubez? No, Lyn is a grand daughter who also writes things for a Buddhist community. Lyn isn't a Christian or a Satanist, she is known to be a devout Buddhist. But all three are just Me.

Professional authors also use pen names for purpose of differentiating their work to an established audience. You can have an author who spends a lot of their time writing Fiction novels under one name. Then this author may be inspired to write a serious non fiction book. He or she would use a different name. In order to keep the name known and associated with Fictional stores from the serious non-fiction work. Otherwise you can make a big mess in public like say Ron Hubbard did. He wrote mostly wacky science fiction under his name, then write Dianetics with the same name I think. It becomes slightly confusing you see, because what's Hubbard trying to do... is Dianetics serious or fiction or creative writing, what market is he trying to tap into, etc.

Whoever Anton Long is, is Anton Long to whoever. That statement made sense to me. To the audience and people the person using the pen name Anton Long is trying to communicate with he is Anton Long and should remain known as Anton Long when associated with the ONA and ONA people.

For people on the inside of the ONA thing, who have read all 5000 pages of Anton Long's ONA MSS from the earliest scribbles circa 1974 to the present, we've acquired an eye of recognition of his style of writing and "unique" grammar. Read 5000 pages of your favorite author or listen to every song every done and written by your musical artist you are obsessed with and you'll understand what I mean when I say you can recognize that person's style, rhythm, inflections, catch phrases, and glitches.

Grammatical glitches are cool. Their like finger prints. Most times when you are writing you do so in a semi-unconscious state of mind where you don't actually pre-think each word before you write them. The words just come out, so with that flow, comes unconscious glitches in grammar, spelling, style, though-process, though lay-out, chose of lexicon and vocabulary, etc.

All that crap I just listed are also memes. Memes are anything that can be transferred from one person and adopted by another. Like bits of culture. Punctuation are memes. The smiley face icon is a meme. You use it, it passes around. LOL is a meme. Memes like to travel in groups or clusters. These are called memecusters. For example the meme LOL usually travels with humor. You rarely see LOL out side of the cultural meme of what is considered by that culture to be humorous or amusing.

So we take a real person like Blackwood and look at his memecuster for signature glitches. One set of memes is his paragraph structure is always fucked up. Another meme he uses often is the word "alas," which normally is not used. Another meme is his persona of being some important leader talking to a wide audience which expresses itself in the set of words he uses and style of writing. An finally the obvious glitch of him oddly spelling the word "Satanists" or any plural as – Satanist's.

Each of those memes by themselves means nothing and can't reasonably be a Blackwood glitch. But memes travel in packs. It's when you learn to see all those memes Together as a group that you can tell the same mind is doing the writing. So regardless of whether Tom is Blackwood, or Von Hess, or Candace, or any of his "clergy" that signature memecuster is always present.

It's the same way with Anton Long. Anton Long has memecuster glitches, as well as a easy style to recognize. You compare all that from a current Longian ONA MS with the earliest essays written by Anton Long in the old days and you'll see that it is the same mind, with the same glitches, the same lexicon and vocabulary, the same thought lay-out on paper/writing. That's just if all you have to work with are 5000 pages of essays. Plus there is the issue of personal life details. Which means details only AL would know and also general details about environment and surrounding only the same mind living in Shropshire would know. But Anton Long has no real history because it is a pen name. The Life details are only familiar with a certain group of people who are in some way really familiar with the detailing of the person behind the pen name's Life and personal environment. If all my pen names talked about the same environmental details, the same set of people and names, the same life history... chances are they are all the same person. Or at least they all live in the same city and know the same set of people, and have bizarrely the same experiences in life.

But that all takes work and a level of interest beyond casual dabbling. Meaning that Anton Long actually has to be some weird hobby of yours for you to dedicate so much time to analyze as much life detailing and 5000 pages of text to gain an ability to smell out Anton Long in his writings. Most people do this with their favorite celebrities or cultural icons or whatever. I do this with AL.

This isn't considering exo-textual patterns such as real life things. In real life the person using the pen name AL is a living breathing person with a long time best friend, who is a fixture in both the AL persona and the real life person's life. That best friend alone is the most obvious clue. The person behind the pen name AL also has friends and associates in real life in his shire or whatever. Some of those friends are what we call Old Guards in/of the ONA. These Old Guards have their friends and associates. And those associates have associates. So at any given time in the real world, there is always a set of people who know who the real person behind the pen name is. If such group of people support or endorse or talk about a certain body of documents attributed to Anton Long, chances are Anton Long wrote it. If they protest and say that the person they know who uses the pen name Anton Long didn't write it, chances are it's not by Anton Long.

So regarding Anton Long, those actually IN the ONA who have the connects and the lineage knows who Anton Long is, what is written by him, and so on. There is no confusion, in the same way that my close friends and associates, knows I use different nyms and personas, knows my writing style, my body of vocabulary and lexicon, my body of thoughts I work with, where they can call me out no matter what troll screen name or character I assume. After hanging out with me for a long time my friends and cousins know from intimate association that I am not my beliefs and worldviews. I am a living person who may use bits and pieces of beliefs and worldviews to grasp a better understanding of my world and myself. And they end up learning from intimate association that I am not confused because when I do speak or teach or share my insights, what comes out ends up making sense. And so in my case my memplexes do not control me or my mind and life, because I give no single on my all my Mind and Life. I control my memplexes and use them. I am not used by them. We pay attention to the Man behind Anton Long we'll notice the same.

I have all these uncles and cousins and a few grandfathers ((great uncles)) who are Freemasons. It's for a number of reasons... cultural and financial. So at our homes we have piles and piles of all these books on Freemasonry. My uncles have this one cultural glitch they inherited from old school masons from their Lodge where they will hit up bookstores and buy every masonic book off the shelf. So at home we have walls of books on Freemasonry.

I wasn't interested in it until I started reading the Satanic Bible. The way I read the Satanic Bible and other books is I use them as road maps. Meaning that I want to tap into the mind of the author and try to re-create their mental condition as close as I can to think like them. So whenever the Satanic Bible mentions anything, I'll stop reading and ransack book stores, colleges libraries, and the internet for as much information on what was mentions. So when the Satanic Bible mentioned the Golden Dawn, I bought every book on it by Israel Rigardi, studied its grade system, learned Hebrew ((the alphabet at least)), learned bits and pieces of the Shishkabbalah, and made friends with members of it. When the Satanic Bible mentions the OTO I sack my sources for as much data, got their degree ritual, made OTO friends, and so on. I secretly have membership in so many orders and groups its funny. Self Realization Fellowship? Yep, that too. I'm also a baptized Catholic Charismatic, and I do my Hail Maries, Pray, and have a statuette of Mary, candles, and a rosary in my room... near Kuan Yin and the Buddha. So when the Satanic Bible and Satanic Rituals mentioned Freemasonry and the Templars, I sacked our home library for info, read every book, hit up a college campus reading every old locked up book they had on Freemasonry, then on Deism and anything remotely relative to the era Freemasonry came from.

Meanwhile one of my older cousins in his Lodge was setting to go thru the chairs. That's when you start as a Junior Steward and gradually work your way up in the Offices to Master of the Lodge, which takes about 7ish years of commitment. In his Lodge, each officer had a little section in their news letter to write articles. My older cousin wasn't a writer. So a long time ago he said he'd pay me $20 for each article I ghostwrote for him, since I had sacked the house and read all the Masonic books and knew his degree rituals better than him.

My "cousin's" articles started off simple Lodge rhetoric based on answers to question I asked about his meetings and things of that sort. But then as I gained confidence, I started to drop memes covertly in my writings. At first to see how far I can go and take things before I ((or my cousin)) got called out for being insane.

With Freemasonry it's easy. You have a pile of raw symbolism and allegory that have no real established meaning. I had noticed that every author I read had their own interpretations. So I slowly started to insert my own ideas beneath these symbols and allegories by twisting and parsing into them new meaning. Which in certain circles is called the esoterica of the Craft.

The thing with Freemasonry is that meanings of symbols can't just have stand alone meanings. It all has to fit like a puzzle with a few other symbols. You can't say for instance that the Compass represents Reason and Logic, and have it not puzzle connected to another symbol where reason and logic fits into the other symbol's meaning. For example you can say that the Sun represents Beauty, Strength, and Wisdom. Why? Because the master, senior and junior wardens are associated with those things and also with the sun in different positions. Then you can say that same Sun symbolized Hiram Abiff. Why? Because Hiram was cut down as the sun falls in the west. Then you can say both the Sun and Hiram represents the Middle Pillar of the Tree of Life. Why?

Because it's the pillar of Beauty and the Sun is the Glory of the Crown Kether and the light of the unmanifested Ain Sof Aur which descends into the dark Malkuth, just as Hiram Abiff was felled into his earthly grave. Then you can say the Sun and the new Apprentice Mason is the resurrection of Hiram Abiff and the restoration of the fallen Middle Pillar which provides a Pathway from Malkuth back to Kether. Why? Because as the Sun sets in the West, the Apprentice Enters the Lodge from the West and Travels East by taking a total of 6 steps over his own Grave, to Return to his Original Glory as the Living Middle Pillar of Life. It's all bullshit, but each interpretation is made to connect like lego pieces to other symbols. This gives your esoteric BS the impression of continuity. Like it gives the impression that it all fits together into one big secret body of ancient wisdom... when in fact it's just a hodge podge of Buddhism, Taoist, Christian, Satanism, Holy Kababble, and anything else I can pull out of my ass stated thru Masonic lexicon and paradigm schematics.

A few months later my cousin gets his usual Office spot in the news letter, and the lodge enthusiastically gave him an entire back section to write whatever he wanted. That meant I made $40 dollars a month from my cousin! Each Grand Lodge divvies their jurisdiction into things called "Districts." Every two months or so the officers from every Lodge in a District meet at a chosen Lodge to practice their ritual work. This is the Grand Lodge's way of controlling the rituals to make sure every Lodge is working the same exact ritual, wording, and gesturing. At each District meeting is a District Inspector who is an agent of the Grand Lodge who sits there and makes sure every officer is doing things exactly as the Grand Lodge want it done. So at these District meetings all the officers from many Lodges hang out and talk. This is when my cousin's name and reputation started to grow in the District. Eventually he was asked if he could give lectures at their Lodge meeting... he said sure.

So then I had to write his lectures and speeches and draft data note for him and he'd practice giving the lectures in front of me and the other cousins, and we'd bomb him with questions to make sure he can convincingly answer them.

This went on for almost two years. I ghostwrote his articles and lectures, and in them I kept on stuffing my own twisted Satanic-Buddhist memes into everything. My cousin had an agenda. You need an agenda in the Lodge if you are going to dedicate so much time to it. The agenda was he wanted to gain fame in his District with his name, so that way he can transfer to the coveted "Lodge Over The Hill" as they called it.

This "Lodge Over The Hill" was the biggest Lodge in their district and it was composed of mostly old people over 60... which is why the other Lodges called it the "Lodge Over The Hill." It was actually also over yonder hills geographically. Hills as in the rich side of the county. This Lodge Over The Hill was the oldest, biggest, and richest Lodge in the county, known for its combines wealth and "A list membership."

This Lodge is an exclusive Lodge with over 1300 members... all are exclusively judges, lawyers, mayors, past mayors, police officers, sheriffs, military officials from the nearby base, and the top heads of the richest business families in the county. The membership included the son of Gillette, the same family/name associated with the razor blade; one family that owned 13 radio stations around the area, and an Italian Family that owned contracting rights with the city to work on the Freeways. When this Lodge does Charity, it's not petty money, you're talking about shelling hundreds of thousands of dollars to hundreds of Charities. When this Lodge meets, it's not always about Masonry, they do business together, start up mutual funds etc. It's impossible to get into this Lodge unless you came from the exclusive "demographic" sector they came from, but if you get in, you have a jack pot of business partners. That's how you work Freemasonry... it all in the Lodge you go to.

When my cousin put in his application for a transfer to get into the Lodge Over The Hill, the officers and key people at that Lodge already knew my cousin from "his" articles in his mother lodge's news letter and from the frequent lectures he gave around the District. For those circa two years of doing lectures he was already working his social skills to tap into the right peer group. Getting in a lodge is hard, and getting into this one was harder.

They take your application which is three pages long, stick your picture on it, affix a "resume" of your "sources of charity funds" which meant what businesses you own, and your general income. On their meeting night the Master informs the lodge that there is a new transfer app, and the application is passed around to everyone present to look over. The lodge has one month to think things over. The next month the voting takes place. They have a box with a drawer. Underneath the drawer is a hole which leads into an empty spot filled with white marbles and black cubes. A hand fits inside the hole, and a marble or cube is placed inside the empty drawer. That's how they vote. White round marbles means a yes vote, black cubes means a no vote. This is where the English expression "getting black balled" comes from... accept its a cube and not a marble. If the drawer is drawn out and one black cube is seen, you are rejected. The vote has to be unanimous. My cousin got all white marbles.

After his transfer to his new Lodge, he was given a place in their news letter and was told to take up as much room as he wanted... which meant I would now make more money each month. During this whole period of ghostwriting, I go to visit Lodges during their monthly dinners that my uncles and other cousins go to. I was actually a member of one of their auxiliary groups for girls related to Masons when I was 13-21... so I was and still am active in their community. I can't say which girls group I came from. Most of the time I just go to eat and help out in the Lodge kitchen and clean up. Other times we visit a list of the old ladies and Masons who are sick to hang out with them and run errands like grocery shop for them, or drive them places. But as I do my usual hang outs at their dinners before their monthly meeting at these Lodges, I listen to every conversation as I mingle with my sisters and the ladies, serving dinner. Slowly as the years pass, I hear more and more Masons use my ideas and spread them. As the mother of your memes, you recognize your babies, even if they change a little. Which built up my confidence level.

I've always thought it was funny. After 5 years of this I was a familiar face at the monthly dinners over at the Lodge Over The Hill doing my usual in the kitchen with the ladies helping out. Me and some of the old ladies and kitchen helpers stay during their meeting. The boys will go into their secret lodge room and lock themselves in there for 2 hours. And we'd just sit there talking. Then after the boys' meeting they have a night snack of some type, usually cake or pie and ice cream. We'd be slowly setting the rows of tables and fixing up the pie and ice cream. So there was this one time after 5 years of my memes spreading everywhere in that Lodge and District where I was eating my cake and ice cream surrounded by hundreds of people, small talking, teasing each other, laughing.

I was sitting next to the Master of the Lodge Over The Hill who is really nice and crusty rich, and he asked me how my cake was. I said it was great, and to continue our small talk I asked him what exactly Freemasonry was, pretending I knew nothing. The master first says the usual and expected, "Well now, if I told you, we'd have to take you out back and kill you." But then he fumbles with his thoughts and says a prewritten definition of Freemasonry I have read and heard a million times before. I asked him why a girl can't be one, because I would probably make a really smart one. He fumbles a while with his thoughts, just trying to tell me without hurting my feelings that its a men's only thing. He said it in such a way that it was nice, "I'm sure you would! But, Freemasonry takes good men and makes them better... girls don't need that, they're already perfect... I have to say that or the wife will put me out on the couch!" That was the end of our casual conversation. Little did he know that I own the minds of every thinking esoterically inclined Mason in the District at the time.

I learned a few very valuable things from that life experience. The first is that organizations or institutions each have two faces, an inner face and an outer face. The outer face of an organization is what you get and see as an outsider. This includes simple and generic definitions of such groups. "We're a Charity"... "We believe in Jesus"... and so on. The inner face of many institutions is different. It's faceless. The reason why Masons say the same pre-written definition of what Freemasonry is, is because on the inside, they really have no idea what it is. It's just easier to tell people that its just a charity that makes good men better. Inside they don't know if it is a frat, a club, a philosophy, a religion, a spirituality, if it came from stone masons, or templars, or what.

It's the same thing with any religion. If religion or philosophical institutions were well defined, it would have a clear meaning and nobody would be talking or preach about it or debating and arguing. It's easy to tell an outsider what Satanism is compared to telling yourself and peers in satanism what exactly Satanism is. So with that idea I one time wrote an article expounding "Masonic Esoterica." They have this symbolism call the Three Lesser Light which is the Sun, Moon, and Master of the Lodge. Nothing else is explained of this besides that the sun and moon governed that world as the Master governs his Lodge. So I took my memes and built on that idea and explained that basically the Master to a person is the conscious mind, the sun is this person's visible face and public identity, and the moon is what is in the dark or on the inside which is always changing. And the same concept applies to institutions. There is a mastermind – or collective mind – the public face is the sun which is constant and regular, but the inner essence is constantly changing like the face of the moon. I can't remember how I worded it back then.

For example, as a shopper, it's easy to tell what a WalMart is. It's a blue building with cheap stuff and cheap looking people in it. But on an inside perspective of say an executive board member, WalMart looks very different from day to day. Everything is constantly changing. Distributors and partners are changing... investors are coming and going... CEO's and other officers are resigning or retiring and being replaced. Nothing on the inside is constant... it must change and always strive to be better as the faces of the moon works at being fuller... only to decrease. And we each, and every organization and nation must keep up with that inner tidal ebb and flow of change. Or a sports team is a better example. You have the coach who is the "Master." The sun is the familiar public face of the team... the logos... the team name... the mascot... the colors... the home city which are constant like the face of the sun. But on the inside the team members come and go. New ones replace old ones... investors come and go... nothing is regular and constant. But despite the internal changes, the outer face remains recognizable.

The ONA will always be ONA, as the sun is the sun. But it's inner essence is always – and must – change like the face of the moon, always working toward that Fullness of Potential. And as soon as a fullness is reached, we realize that in the distant horizon there is a higher fullness to reach after and work toward. Like the moon always diminishes and works toward a new fullness.

The other thing my past experience with ghostwriting and "shapeshifting" taught me is this concept some people call "manifesting," which is sometimes generically referred to as "Doing Something." We bump into this concept when people ask us thing like, "What are you Doing?"

Or “what is the ONA Doing?” Or “what is Anton Long Doing?”

First define “Doing.” meaning how far down the causal chain reaction of an act initially committed is a “Doing?” Is a “Doing” counted from the initial act all the way to when fruits that act causally bore?

If so, what did I end up “Doing” and “manifesting” with my 5 years of ghostwriting for my cousin? From my first initial act to it’s last fruits that act’s causal chain BORE? I started off writing and sharing simple ideas to an audience thirsty for fresh new ideas. Just ideas, written in some news letter or as a lecture. Nothing big and eventful or earth changing. Gradually those ideas spread to change a few people’s perception of how they saw what they were deeply into and loved. It inspired some people to act. Like my cousin was inspired to act. He did act and pretending my ideas were his, used his social skills to get into a set or clique of people for business purposes to help our family out. Those ideas changed the way this group of people saw my cousin. They had a certain liking for him and admired “his” insights “he” was sharing. Which inspired them to let him into their exclusive clique. This ended up helping our family later make not only business partners but “powerful” friends in the county. In the end, after business and a lot of work, people made money. Lots of money, which added income to my family. Does all that count as a “Doing” and the Fruits a “Doing Something” manifests?

If the answer is yes, then an idea can potentially be worth a lot of money. If the answer is no, and you want to say that a Doing has to be with your hands and fingers, then all I really “Did” was ghostwrite and share ideas. But did my energy and time ever amount to anything in the end... yes it did in more ways then money-wise. When your familiar to a Lodge 1300 deep packing every third cop in the district, you don’t get ticket when cops pull you over just by driving a car with the right symbols on it. They look at your face, recognize you as that girl that served them ice cream, ask how your family is and tell you to please slow down form my own safety and the safety of others. Work... what work? Interviews what interviews? You got a whole county full of places that will give you a job the same day you smile at the old guy you visited in hospital. Cars need fixing? Cousins can’t fix it cuz they’re too busy? I had an album pack full of business cards of people I met doing my circuits in the Lodge dinners and visiting old masons and their ladies. 15 or so of them are owners of car garages in the county who tell me to just drop off my car at their house so they can fix it for free as long as I buy the parts. Need lawyers? There’s 100 of them in the Lodge a phone call away. Want to talk to your judge first before a case in the county? Hit up the Lodge. Wanna climb rank in your military or air force fast? Introduce your old army friend you met at the Lodge to your cousin who is a mason from another Lodge. All that from the circulation and Fluidity of ideas... memes. Symbiosis right? You help me, I help you, we all benefit. That’s what a Business Partner – Associate – is.

So what’s it mean when it is asked “what have you done?” What exactly does the word “done/do” mean and how far down the causal chain of physical real world manifestation does that “done” include? Because in real life, actions and things done is more complicated then writing out in a post what was done or what can speculatively be done. In the real world “done” and “doing” is a complicated matter. The Asians invented an entire religion of 25,000 pages based on the idea of “Doing.” It’s called Buddhism, and the essential concepts are called Kamma ((Work)) and Vipaka ((Fruit)), Kosala Kamma ((or Kamm-Kosal)), and Akosala Kamma ((or Kamm-Akosal)).

What did Anton Long Do? I don't know what does that word mean? How far does it go. Does it include the causal chain reaction arising from it? Does it include the Vipaka of the Kamma? Vipaka is not always a precisely linear manifestation of it's initial Kamma. Who knew my ghostwriting of ideas would in 6 years or so end up manifesting money in the form of business partners and new businesses? That initial presencing of ideas from me, causally branched out to bare several different Vipakas.

So when we ask what AL or ONA has done in real life? What does that actual all mean and include? Am I making things complicated? Cuz I'm Buddhist and I pay attention to little details with how Life unfolds and happened. "Do" isn't as simple as robbing somebody or making bomb. If so then we're only talking about the initial act of a causal event. Do we understand what manifesting is? Where it starts and how far down the causal chain the Process of Manifestation happens? Do we mean the initial act or the end results or both and everything in between? Whose keeping a collective tab on every end result since 1972 the ONA has ever produced as Vipaka, considering that Vipaka does not unfold linearly? I'm not. I wasn't even born back then, and I sure as hell don't know how many people were collectively involved, who did what, and what end results their kmmas bore. Does AL know? Who knows.

One last thing my experience of being me has taught me is that knowing who and what I am, actually helps me understand the person behind Anton Long. I might not have it all right, but I can guess that we're alike in many ways.

Can I be fitted into a single cubby hole? Am I a Buddhist Lyn? Am I a Catholic Charismatic Jeslyn? Am I a Satanist Jessy? Am I a culturally conservative and traditionalist Jessiddha? Am I a liberal Lynzie? Am I a Sinister ONA Shugz? Am I a Vietnamese Lyn like my mom? Am I Thai because of one of my last names? Am I Chinese because my other last name? Am I Khmer because the second language I speak? Am I American because I was born here? Am I a Reichsfolk Nazi? Am I a communist because of friends I have and socialist parties I am a member of? Am I a capitalist because I come from a business oriented family that believes in free enterprise? Am I a patriot because I love America and think its the greatest country in the world? Am I treasonous because I think the government should be torn down to be made better like the constitution says we can do?

I'm just me. People who know me know me. And they understand that a person is a dynamic entity always in a state of flux. But beneath the lunar flux is an solar essence of being that is always the same. No matter how old you grew to become, how many birthdays past, how often your mind changed, how more memories were added, there is a part of you that remains the same. Which is the Self beneath the outer forms. The Self beneath the social memes and flux. The Self which is a Property of the aggregation our 6 senses ((here consciousness being a 6th)), and its codependent arising and interaction ((feedback loop)) with its environment which includes other people, ideas, and society in general.

There is outer form which changes and then there is formless essence remains relatively constant. Who is Anton Long? Just an outer form of a living person. Who is this living person? It's impossible to know unless you live with him or know him for a long time in person directly. Otherwise all we have in our knowing of this person – or any person – are what faces we see on the outside presented. In such cases where the outer faces are many like mine, the shortest answer is that all faces of the moon is the same moon.

I read somewhere that you can tell the level of sophistication of a language by counting how many words for colors it has. I read about one language somewhere in Africa I think which only had words for "Black," "White," and "Red." English has the basic words for the 7 colors in the rainbow, then brown, black and white. Then there is the whole list of other shades of colors we have. I hate Khmer and think it's primitive because it only has 6 words/names for colors: Khmau for Black; Sor ((say it as a Brit or Frenchmen or Bostonian would read it)) meaning White; Krahom for Red; Swy ((sounds like Why with an S)) meaning both mango and purple; Lueng ((the ue makes a japanese flat U sound)) for yellow, and Kiew for both Green and Blue. For the other colors you have to say the word color and attach it to a something of which has the color you want to convey. Like Per Dey means "Brown" but literally means Color ((Per)) of Dirt ((Dey)). Per Kroach means Orange but actually means the Color of Orange Fruit.

Anyways, ever since I learned this when I study or look into a language I first check to see how many single words they have for colors and how many adjective and descriptors the language has to work with. The more colors and the more words as a means of expression, generally the more sophisticated the language is. Descriptors are things like words that give other words new meaning. For example some native American languages instead of having verbal endings like -ing and stuff have descriptors to describe if an act has manifested already, if it is in the process of manifesting, and if it shall manifest in future. Or Quechua has all these awesome descriptor words that captures ever feeling and emotion imaginable.

So since I love language, I end up seeing people in the same way. English is a sophisticated language which is always growing and fluctuating. Some languages like Latin don't grow or fluctuate. One is living and dynamic and the other is actually dead. People are the same way. Do they stay the same in mind and mentality and worldview or do the change and fluctuate in a living and dynamic way. Stagnant or Progressive Mind? A person or mind that is primitive in mental capacity will not change mentally as often as one that is constantly out growing and growing From their old ideas. Like how crustaceans and bugs have to break out of their old shell to grow. When I hear a person say, "I've been a satanist for 25 years!" My first reaction is, "The fuck is wrong with you?" That statement is only "bad" if it meant that for 25 years his understanding of the word and worldviews have not changed, as in nothing has changed since he was 13 when he first became a satanist. I see angles of perception ((paradigm, etc)) a person has to be my color code in judging the sophisticated nature of a person.

Angles of Perception are things we would intimate by words and terms like worldview, paradigm, perspective, "my understanding," and so on. Having only one angle of perception, or one Way of Seeing the world and universe is like a language with only one working word for one single color. It's like your literally seeing the entire world with a single color lens. If for 25 years you've been seeing the world with the same monochrome perception, then something is wrong with your mental capacity. Don't even lie to yourself and say you even see the world in “black and white” because that technically is two colors which adds up to two paradigms or two contrasting worldviews. You just see the world in just black. And some people are proud of that?

Can you see the world as a girl, as a guy, as a child once did, as an adult, as a liberal, as a conservative, as a Communist, as a capitalist, as a friend, as a foe, as a Christian, as a Buddhist, as a poor person, as a rich person, as a slave, as a master, as a theist, as an atheist, as a deeply spiritual person, and as a material girl? Or are you limited to just one paradigm... just one color lens... just one “right” worldview?

But seeing the world in different ways requires empathy and becoming. It requires you to sit down next to a liberal or a spiritualist, and to empathize that person than to become that person to see and feel the world the way they do. And most of us aren't willing to do that because our superficial identities ((our Self)) is so entwined or attached or lost in our own signal self glorified worldviews that its fearful to let go and empathically become another person or to gain a different solid perspective. We fear that such an act would dissolve who and what we are. If I was a Buddhist all my life and I change my paradigm or worldview what would I then be we fret? If I was a Satanist for 25 years and I see and feel the world with a second worldview and a third, then what will my Self be? As if to imply that we are how we perceive things.

And so we become similarly confused when a person like the one behind Anton Long has many faces and many angles of perception. What is he we ask? A Muslim who sees the world as a Muslim? A Satanist who sees the world as a Satanist? A Nazi who has a Nazi paradigm? A Numinous Wayer who sees the world in his own way? As if to imply to ourselves that we can't possibly have more than one paradigm or worldview... like humans can't possibly see the same world in many different ways. Even though we know we can, because many of our wars and battles are fought over how different we see the same world. But surely multiple worldviews or ways of understanding the world can't exist in the same mind trying to gain a better understanding of it?

I'll give a living example, myself. I call myself a Buddhist most of the time and refer to my Buddhist “paradigm” as my native weltanschauung or my default worldview, because it's what I was raised inside of. But I have in Life come to realize that there are phenomena in Nature which have no name or word or idea in that default paradigm which exist in a beautiful form in Christianity, specifically the Charismatic Catholic variety to be technical.

The phenomenon is called “Redemption” in the Christian weltanschauung. You see, when I step on a blade of grass to depress it, suppress it, repress it, impress it, oppress it, the blade bends. But that blade of grass has an inherent Nature inside of its being to understand that it had an Original Nature which it must try to get back to. And so gradually that blade will Redeem itself and rise back up to as close as possible to its Original Nature. We call that inherent knowing of an original divine/numinous state of being and the will to bounce back to that state Redemption, beautifully symbolized by the Christ. Who is in the Catholic Paradigm not only the Son who is we – the Body of Christ – but also God, and the Holy Spirit. The Christ is the divine remembering or knowing of our original divine or Godnature, the understanding of which we are redeemed from our lost and fallen state to what we once were.

All things in Nature redeems itself, even ecosystems if let-be. Wounded animals will over time redeem them their original state of health and well being or at least as close as possible. The word Redeem suggests or implies also a giving up of something in exchange for something that was lost or taken away. You give up your grip and hold. You let go of what is holding you down. Your loss of self in what is holding you down. What do I mean by that? I mean to say that if you are a Shudra who is hated and despised by an entire system created to hate and despise you, Let Go. You weren't born a shudra. You believe in a caste system and hold on to it. When you hold on and don't let go, don't give that up, you can't redeem what was lost or taken from you. Your redemption can't be given to you until you give what is holding you down up, until you surrender... ((islam))... to the Natural Way of Things. To how you were made by your Creator... by Creation, to the Way of its Peace. If you are poor or your whole country is poor it is not because Nature or Creation made you that way. There is no poverty or wealth in Nature or in the Natural order of things. Poverty is a byproduct of an economy... a human imposition or superimposition or impression on the world. You can never Redeem the Natural and Numinous/Divine state you came into the world with by default so long as you/we hold onto that economic system. We must give it up and surrender to the Numinous Flow of Creation... Charismata right? The Divine Flow of God the Holy Spirit, the Essence of Creation, which imbues all of Creation. Which Creation – Cosmos – you are a living child and manifestation of ((Jesus who is God the Son, the Born/Manifested)).

And with that same Charismatic worldview I can see the world and understand thing from the stand point of Genesis and Taoism. The Creator made Adam/Eve in his likeness and placed him in a Garden of Eden. Before they ate the Fruit of a certain tree they everything in their human life was fine. When they ate the Fruit of the Tree of Good and Evil and then the Tao of Eden or the Unity of Creation becomes yin and yang, abstract Goods and Evils... Rights and Wrongs... when such valuations are not present naturally in Creation. Nothing written or expressed in the Living Book of Nature is right or wrong, good or evil. Nature just is... as in how a child would see the world as just being neither good or evil, right or wrong... “Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.”

So for me, even thoe I am seeing the same world, I have a set of different paradigmatic goggles to see this same world with. I can see it as a Buddhist, as a Christian, as a Myattian person, as a rational materialist, or a Satanist, a liberal and a Conservative. Then I can take all those different worldviews and patch them together to see a “bigger picture” and thus gain a wider understanding of what I am looking at which I am a living part of. There is a cliché Buddhist allegory that is told so many times, yet nobody understands or puts it into actual practice. The cliché allegory is the one with 4 blind monks feeling up an elephant and each are thinking the elephant is a different Thing. Yeah, we whine and say that story is sooo cliché and soo over told... yes, yes, yes, I've heard it 20 times already... and those that heard it still take pride that they still have but one paradigm or worldviews... still see and understand the world in monochrome.

And the funny thing with many people is when they say they are having a “paradigm shift.” In the mundane pop-occulture a “paradigm shift” actually means that their opinions about something is changing. Like their old monochrome monocle got broke or scratched up and they're switching monocles. Their going to throw away their old blue filter lens for a yellow one this time. For surely a yellow filtered world is way better than a blue one. When it's just one filter again! Just one perspective again! Just one worldview again! And this one has got to be the really true and right one! The old one was believed to be the truth, but now we know better because the new yellow lens will make us see the truth.

Then I love how these people stuck in monochrome with one barely functioning wetlanschuing or paradigm or whatever will say things like, "Oh I've been a Wiccan High Priest for 30 years!" Or, "I went to Church for 50 years!" Or, "I was a Satanist since I was 8!" Then they list you all these books they have read and work really hard to master their vocab, punctuation, and grammar. And they sound superficially smart, with big words, and perfect grammar, and many books. But why bother reading? You read and see and filter shit with the same single lens. Doesn't matter what a Satanist or Buddhist will read or look at, because they will always see things as a Satanist or Buddhist. A perfect example of this monochrome filter effect happening is you just give a well thought out essay written by a Theist to an Atheist and I guarantee that no matter how educated and erudite the Theist was the Atheists isn't going to see shit and will spend time talking himself into rejecting that Theistic paradigm re-ground himself in his own atheistic comfort zone.

You can only see and gain an understanding of the world with what mindset you are working with, that's why it's called a worldview, or a paradigm. From the Greek word Paradigma meaning Patterns. If you are conditioned to only see vertical stripes, you will not be able to compute or register horizontal stripes, because it is not in your system. They did that test with pigeons where the birds were raised in stripped cages that move in say a vertical direction, and the birds ended up not able to see horizontal ones. There's accounts of native South Americans from the time of Columbus who said that their people could not at first see Columbus' three ships, even when the ships were parked in the harbor. Because their brains were conditioned in a world where the Patterns of a ship of the European size and type just simple did not exist. But of course their eyes and brains got used to the new patterning of the ship and they eventually saw them.

And so we judge our own selves and others based on the one single lens we are using to see the world, in such a way that what lens and filter we see the world and universe with defines our very ego, self, and very being. In the copulative, "I AM a such and such." AM meaning to Be, to exist, to have an Isness... I exist or have my being because I am a such and such, and if I am not a such and such I therefore AM not. Many of us can understand that we are not our ideas, but it's hard for us to understand that we are not our worldviews, our way we see and interpret or understand the world, or paradigm, or whatever.

We try to categorize people into how they see the world. And so somebody like the person behind the pen name Anton Long is confusing to some of us. He doesn't fit into any one box. He seems to jump around and not stay still. Like he can't make up his mind as to how to see the world and which angle to stay at. So we begin to mentally dismiss him from our minds to rid our minds of that source of confusion. We tell ourselves that such person is confused, crazy, wishy-washy, insane, a troll, just a fake, etc. Anything we can say and believe to cause our mental perception of the world to go back to the way it was before such person ruined our worldview and understanding.

Can't he just be a person? With many different ways of seeing the same world? But as they say, It takes one to know one. I'm not saying that my long ass spiel about AL is right and that I understand the Man. But I can see and understand him using myself as a reference point. I know I am not crazy or confused about the world, and I know and understand that it is because I allow myself to have many and contrasting "paradigms" or whatever that I have my understandings of Life and the World. And so when I see another person with many "color lenses" I assume that person is like me too. And I unfortunately interpret such people to be of a more mentally or psychologically sophisticated state. In the same way that I interpret a language with many names for colors to be a sign or mark of a sophisticated language.

Q. What about States and so forth? How come the State isn't dead yet? What is ONA doing to annihilate the State? What will be put in its place?

A. Taking out a State is not the raison d'etre or the Prime Objective or supreme essence of the ONA. There are thousands and thousands of pages worth of stuff written by AL and not all of them talk about destroying some State or Nation.

There is a "platform" in ONA called the Sinister Dialectics. This Sinister Dialectic in business talk is like the overview of what the business is and what the end goal should approximately look like. So when we all look and it we are on the same basic page and can work from there.

Say I have some money and my cousins and I would like to start up our own business. So we go to more experienced aunts and uncles who gives us the "Chinese Food Dialectics." This "dialectics" contains a general outline off the power points of what the business of a Chinese Food joint is all about. First it gives us an over view of the general cost, then the general monthly money needed to put into such a business, then a list of common food items, then an estimate of common yearly profit, then an over view of what a customer is, and what competition is and how such customers and competition will effect our business. Then the aunts and uncles tell us after we have gotten the "dialectics" down, "Good luck, call us when you need us, otherwise, yo guys are on your own."

The thing is the dialectics does not explain or micromanage the minute details. It has to be open and flexible and thus mutable to time and clime. The detail is up to us. When my cousins and I argue over location and search for a good location, that is the dialectics in motion. Our locations might always be good. What about generating customers? That is also up to us. One of us can come up with the agenda of making fliers with menus and putting them on car windshields in parking lots. That is the dialectics in action. That agenda may fail and not produce the desired result. If it does, we try an new approach.

What about competition? The Dialectics did not name a list of what would be competition, we have to figure that out. One of us can say that the near by Mexican and Sushi eateries are competition. Ok... next step is how do we deal with such competition? One of us might say to hire some of their friends in gangs to burn the competition down. Is it a good idea? Who knows. Whats the risks? Another can say that we spread rumors about the competition's food quality. We pick the second one since in both proposals the customers of the competition would search out a new place to eat anyways. The second seems less risque. We try it, it may fail.

The point is that with this Chinese Food Dialectics, the minor detail of how to get from point A to point Z is not set. It is left open ended. What we chose to do to get us to point Z is not the Business or raison d'être of a Chinese restaurant. If a strategy or tactic fails or is not generating the desired end results the dialectics must be open to change. You have to change course. There are more than one way to skin a cat as they say. If one way fails, you must learn to try the other ways.

Burning the State down is not thus the end all and be all of the ONA. It is a proposed method to executing the Sinister Dialectics.

I have my own mind and objections to the notion of burning down or destroying some state. In the old school days people connected with the ONA did try to “destroy” the State and they tried this other method of trying to cause a race war. They tried – at least they tried – and Business was quickly shut down. But Time makes us forgetful, and so today most people can't remember such acts and deeds done. They tried.

My personal objection is that I don't even think the State exists. It's not like you can walk up to a state and poke a stick at it. Where is it? If you can't poke a stick at it, then what exactly should be burned down or blown up actually? What do you “destroy” if there seems to be nothing concrete to destroy? It's not impossible. It's been done before. But what exactly is anatomy The Enemy?

Is the State the white house? If we get rid of that will the State go away? Is the State capitol hill? If we nuke the hill will the State go away? Are the people in public office the State? If we exile all of them will the State go away? Is the infrastructure the State? So what we burn asphalt and bridges and semitrucks? We don't even know what the Enemy is or what it looks like, so what are we suppose to poke our sticks at? Know your enemy is one of the first of Sun Tzu's admonishments. What is a State? A State is a “samsara” or a product of mass psychosis.

Samsara in Theravada is not a place you are stuck in as it means in Hinduism where it is interpreted to mean some cycle of birth and death. In Tharavada samsara is basically a Sama and a Sara and explains what you do over and over again which you can't stop doing. Sama means Common, Shared, Together, Collective. Its actually the ancient root in the word Sangha, althoe you'd never see it. The “M” is nasalized as an NG in Sanskrit, and the last “A” is actually not a letter but an inherent vowel of the M not usually pronounced if it is a soft “A.” So Sam is pronounced as Sang. The older spelling for Sangham would be Sam.Gam where Sam/sang means Together or Shared and Gam/gang means a group... which if you notice can be found in the English language as the word “Gang” which still retains much of its ancient meaning. A sam.gam is a Together-Group, a Common-Group a set of people share. A sangha thus means an Association, an Order, a Society, a Club, a Fraternity, a Brotherhood. Sara means everything from Soup, a Pond, a Lake, and a Flow or Current.

So together Sam.Sara comes to mean a Common Flow, or a Shared Flow. If people were running a marathon and you were running in it too, that is samsara. Every one is Flowing together or everyone is sharing a common flow. Everyone is a fish caught in the same current of the same shared pond or river. When you are on the freeway, that is samsara. You are flowing with traffic along with everybody else and everyone shares that flow in common. If everyone believed in UFO's and you did too, that is samsara. If Lenin says that communism is good and everyone believed it and tried to live it and you did to, that whole communism and what you do collectively because of it is samsara. Which is where the shit happens in samsara. Because communism is just a belief. But everyone around you believes in it and their beliefs influences their actions in life which generates consequences. In such conditions, even if you did not believe like them or did like them, the collective fruit of their actions is what you end up being caught in. That is samsara. Can you escape it? No. You're stuck in why. Id everybody believes in a caste system and in such caste system dark skinned people were shudras, and you were dark skinned, can you escape the current or flow of their collective belief and Vipaka ((Fruit of action))? No. You're fucked.

But lets say that you were a shudra and you wanted to be free to be human and to just live a normal happy life. How would you destroy the samsara of this caste system? Blow it up? Burn it down? Damage it's infrastructure? Attack it's economy? First, where is it? Point to this oppressive caste system with a finger. The Illusion of samsara is in the belief that it is real... and so long as you believe that it is real – a real phenomenon is the real world – you will be lost in that Illusion. That caste system is in the heads of 1 billion people.

Is it easy to wake – Awaken/Buddha – people from the Illusion of samsara? I don't know, tell 10 random people on the street one day that the State they were born and live in is an illusion, and of the 10, how many will awaken and actually see thru that illusion? It's hard as it is to convince a Theist to see the world as being a material thing.

Once you're stuck in the current of a river, it's very hard to free yourself, especially if the river is strong. Like money is a current in the rover of a State. We can jive all we want about how evil money is, and how it is the cause of human suffering and how fiat currency is fake and based on debt. So what. What are you gunna do about it? Free yourself from its current? Stop paying bills? How would you eat? Where will you live? How would you support your wife and children? How do you provide for their needs and well being? When everyone around you uses money? You can't free yourself from an Illusion, which is not in your mind. The illusion is in other people's minds. The illusion or Belief itself is not the problem. The problem comes into being when such people acts out their beliefs because our acts in this causal world manifests Vipaka ((Fruit)). 300 Million people in America all acting out their belief in a State and money, means 300 million people are inputting Kamma ((work/act/deed)) into a casual system, and that system is going to out put a big shit load of reactions, consequences, fruit, end results, and so on. And you are caught in that wyrdful collective manifestation. How do you free yourself? And what do you destroy if the source of it all is in the minds of 300 million people? What do you burn down is the question. It's not impossible, but fighting a phantom will be hard.

I think focusing our energy on a different aeonic method of eroding the State is more doable. By aeonic I mean very long term wise as in 500 years or so, give or take a century. The time would be spent doing two things, subverting the mental orientation of the people slowly to see things differently, and working to balance the States monopoly of dependency with self-reliant clans and urban tribes and communitarian oriented communities. Each community would then create or agree on their own currency to use with each other. The Mormon church actually has a great example that I find to be fascinating. Last time I was at a Ward my Mormon friends were telling me about their church welfare system. Its when you apply for financial help from the main church, and they send you these coupons. Then you can take those coupons and use them to buy food and supplies at church owned stores or stores own my Mormons that agree to accept the coupons. I just thought that was a brilliant idea. By subvert I mean to Subtly Turn their mental orientation so that they see things aligned to how we see things.

Whatever ONA does, we shouldn't allow ourselves to get to the point where we can't admit we made a mistake or that we failed. Because when we can't admit failure or mistakes made, then we will continue to fail and never learn from our mistakes. It's good to make mistakes and fail. It's the only real way to learn anything – from trial and error... research and development as they call it in business. The best type of honesty is self honesty, which is hard to do. Actually anything that involves one self is hard. Self development is hard, because we as people in general tend to pay our attention on others and try to develop them instead. Which is why we argue and debate and assert our opinions onto others. Because we know better for others. Because we're already perfect and always right. That's why everyone is wrong and needs us to correct them. Not us an in ONA, just us in general as humans minding everyone's business but our own.

But there is actually more to the ONA then just blowing up people and countries. Mundanes are extremophiles they tend to gravitate toward one of two extremes and they'll see the world in their polarized way. So their mundane minds when looking at things and organizations actually only computes the extreme and exciting violent stuff, especially if you are American and raised on a lot of violent video games and violent movies. You never hear anything good about nazis when a Mundane talkes about them. Nazis always don't do anything but kills Jews and skin niggers. Muslims eat sand and will all eventually be anti-American terrorists some day. Cubans are evil Commies that kill Capitalists. China exists just to plot on taking over America. ONA is about nothing but destroying the system. It's gotta be action packed extremism for mundanes, or you're not even real.

Q. Who is SugaCubez?

A. Not "who," but "what." That's not a real important question, but I should say a few things to clarify a few things. SugaCubez isn't a who. It's a what. It's a pen name or pseudonym and not a person.

It was originally a nym of a portal account we used 3 years ago to troll Blackwood and Chloe first made it. And again, the reasoning behind it's original purpose is that of a pen name. Because you have someone like Chloe who uses her real second first name to write serious ONA essays, and that same name and person/a can't run around the internet goofing off with some fat bastard.

With our WSA you have to be familiar with what a "Portal Account" is or you will be confused. We picked up the habit of using Portal Accounts 6 years ago on Myspace when we were trolling people. A portal account is just an account one of us make, then we give the User Name and Password to a handful of our friends to log into and use.

For example way back in the days when Myspace still had that new car smell and youtube had not hitched a ride with Myspace yet we were on it riding whore trains and making troll groups. Troll groups is a fake group you make to call in people you troll rather than go find them. So we'd make a troll group, fill it with fake profiles which use the same passwords whose User name is the screen name, and wait. Believe it or not, the only person in cyberspace to ever know Kayla 352 from 6-7 years ago when she and the rest of us were on Myspace is Knife Sotelo. That's a weird fact. Back then Kayla was caught up in the whore contest with the other people. She had 10,000 friends at one time before she got tired of getting banned from Myspace. But she made a Satanism group and went around looking for Satanists to join it, and Knife was one person she just added and asked to join. She said at the time he was using that sepia picture of him wearing the sunglasses, which he still uses today. To this day Kayla is still a bona fide member of Knife's Satanic Chapel. If you ever wonder where WSA got its influence to mix Satanism with gangsta culture... there it is, Knifer. 3 years ago he even made a rap song for WSA.

Our idea of a Portal Account also came from something we did during our Myspace days also. What happened was we'd meet certain new friends interested in reading more information about something. So since we didn't know how to make websites to write things in and there were no blogs at the time we had this "novel" idea of making these email accounts which we can all share or have access to and then we write our essays and save them as drafts in the draft folder. Or we'd write out our essays in our emails and just send it to this Portal Account. So then when we do meet people who want to get more info we just give these people the User Name and Password to these joint accounts so they can read the draft notes and emails.

During the 6 or so years of us sharing accounts with people we met, we never had a fool play tricks on us and change the password or anything. Everybody was cool. But we saved all of our essays... which today have become the older Chapters of Opus Vrilis. So the pen name Caligula attached to Opus Vrilis is also a joint pen name we use. No single person is Caligula. It's just easier and more effective to use one single pen name for one audience. Why so? Rapport. Over time your target audience evolves a connective rapport with that name or persona or image. Why rapport? Because when rapport exists between two people there is resonance between the target audience and the focal person. In such case the audience loses the ability to question what information/meme they are given. Do you question your new casters when they tell you things? No.

SugaCubez originally was used as a moving pen name online to troll Blackwood. It was made by Chloe, but Kayla used it most of the time. Then 3 years ago one of us made a Portal Account under the SugaCubez nym to access Mysatan and answer questions in. This was the time when I started using the SugaCubez nym to troll fatty at first with some other friends via the same portal account. Eventually I hijacked that nym and it's now mine. But I actually am a real person with a real name.

All this trolling and fake profiles and joint accounts, and one can wonder just how we can tell if a profile is somebody we know. We had that covered since 7 years ago. We actually have a set catechism in the form of a weird question which should be answered by an even weirder answer. If the writing style and words used by an account does not look familiar to us we just ask the catechism question and if the person reacts to it or gives an incorrect answer, we know it's nobody we know. Then also because we do use joint account to answer question and don't leave our names at the end of what we post, we have a system of grammar glitches we use which helps us tell each other who actually wrote what, using the joint account. We each use a group of signature glitches. Kayla uses the three dots a lot... in conjunction with her intentionally misspelling a certain word or two and she also will capitalize certain words. I may use the dots in informal writings but my visible trademark glitch is using ((double open and double closed parentheses.)) I also have a set of words I capitalize and misspell. Chloe she uses [square brackets] in conjunction with her own set of glitches. So this way when we read a post, we can tell who logged on and made what posts. But those glitches includes lexicon, vocabulary, rhythm, and personality, which you just have to get use to. If for example in some random form some profile uses double parentheses and is dropping and breaking down Khmer and Sanskrit words to explain Buddhism... more then likely it's me.

Q. Didn't the real Anton Long ditch the ONA? Would the real Anton Long use the internet? Isn't this Anton Long a different person?

A. It's confusing if you're on the outside looking in. But there is one sure way to kill this question or issue – Go ask Richard Moulton.

The person behind the pen name Anton Long is a real person who has a best friend and roommate named Richard Moulton. Go ask RM. He has a myspace and his own wordpress which is now his website. All you would have to say is, "Excuse me sir, I just have a question that is bugging me, is the Anton Long in those blogs the real AL?" If RM says, no I don't who that is, it's a faker... then it's not the real deal. Why so? Because they are fucking best friends and roommates. The person behind AL literally takes showers and uses the same toilet and shave in the same sink as RM does when RM is not on tour promoting his art and music and doing gigs. Those two guys eat in the same kitchen and share the same fridge and watch the same TV set and feed the same dogs.

Which also, if you ((in general)) even have half a working brain, you'd be able to tell who is actually behind the pen name Anton Long because the SAME RM is associated with both AL and the person behind that pen name! Even if the person behind AL denies being AL in public. I'll publicly deny being whatever pen name and pseudonyms I use for whatever audience to preserve my game. But if you were on the inside of the ONA and just mingles with certain sets of people you'd get it too and not even have to ask RM.

For example go ask Kayla. Many years ago we all thought that AL abandoned the ONA too. So when Kayla was corresponding with RM under his nym Audun, she stated several times that AL ditched the ONA. She said RM one time got upset and asked her why she thought AL abandoned the ONA because he never did, he was still there.

Or go ask Thoth from the Temple of THEM. Thoth has been ONA for over 10 years and worked with AL and RM. Thoth just recently did a project called Emanation which is a gift package of tarot cards made by RM and a music CD by RM. Who gave him the green light to sell the cards and CD? RM did. How did that go about? The two of them talk. Has RM ever told Thoth that the AL in the blogs is a fake? No... the issue is sooo of no concern that nobody brings it up.

Or go ask the Fenrir team who creates ONA's news letter Fenrir. They are connected with RM. Or go ask Sinister Moon who is directly associated with both RM and AL who's who. Or go find ask Chloe who's who cuz she can ask a number of other Old Guards if this AL online is the "real" pen name. Actually nobody cares on the inside of the ONA because this subject is just not a matter to anyone.

There is another way to verify who's who if you are soo interested and don't mind doing a little detective work. Run a background check on all the ONA websites and blogs active online and see who its all coming from...

There is an anti-Myatt guy and blog/site associated with Searchlight who did this for you already. I'll say right now that of all the ONA websites and blogs online ((AFAIK)) as of now 2011 all trace back to 5 people. FIVE... between 4&6. 1+1+1+1+1. Five fucking people. 1,2,3,4,5. 2+3=5. FIVE PEOPLE!

What 5? Richard Stirling... Thoth... Chloe... ANUS.COM... L316. I'm being liberal here. The guys at Searchlight will tell you every website and blog is one person: Myatt. Nobody in that delusional camp really knows how to fit WSA into the picture because its hard to claim that Myatt is Chloe, unless Myatt learn to speak Khmer and his brain is on estrogen haha. I've also heard that Kayla was RM. But I have bumped into many people who said that Myatt is behind onanxs blog. Check the IP for pete's sake. All of the major ONA websites and blogs they go to 3/4 IP locations on this Earth: England, Australia, & California. With L316?s new orderofnineangles.net being a 4th addition.

Actually I got into a fight or debate with some fool in this one forum a couple years ago when I was using my SugaCubez nym to answer questions about Buddhism and the ONA. So in a long ONA thread some fool came in and accused me of being Myatt. He started to get excited thinking he was talking to the Man himself and began to debate about the validity of ONA ideas. I kept telling this dumb fuck that I was not Myatt. And he wouldn't believe me. I had to tell the guy to go find me somebody that speaks Khmer and have them chat with me, because I doubt Myatt knows how to speak it. This fool was so delusional he said that Myatt is intelligent and it's possible that does know Khmer since he also knows Greek haha. Whatever.

Blogs and webites that can be traced back to Chloe and our team here in California is this blog ((onanxs)) or Tumblr; ordernineangles.webs.com, ona.soup.com, and maybe also o9a.org.

L316?s new orderofnineangles.net is the new addition and I don't know where their IP is located... and I'm frankly not the least bit interested or worried where in the world they are. It doesn't change the value of their contribution and insights.

Thoth of THEM has a number of his own blogs hailing from Australia.

The website o9a.org is a joint site not “owned” by any one person. Associates from ANUS – American Nihilist Underground Society – gave that site to the ONA c/o Chloe. Chloe asked for them to give two other sets of people access to that site. One set is the Fenrir Team in England/Scandinavia. The other is the Usual Suspects.

Most people active in the satanic forums online who tune into ONA stuff for whatever reasons will generally know the above named individuals or group ((ANUS)). None of them are Anton Long, but they are people with real connections or connectivity to the two key faces of ONA via Old Guards or directly...

This leaves Richard Stirling. Nineangles.info is under his name, and so were a few sites now off line. Who is he?

RS is or was the Outer Rep of Reichsfolk, and I still think he is. We know Myatt and Moulton are or were connected with Reichsfolk. He was or still is the Outer rep/Head of the ONA at one time I think. We know that AL and RM are associated with ONA. He wrote a lengthy introduction to an underground autobiography written by “somebody” at the center of what we are talking about. So I would say that RS is worth considering when trying to figure out who’s who in ONA. RS from time to time writes blogs over at Pointhat’s blog too...

So we know that RS is connected since old days to both Reichsfolk and ONA. And we know he is connected with AL, DM, RM, and PointyHat. Then we know he is connected with nineangles.info the closest thing ONA has to an “official” site.

That site in question is just a place to dump ONA MSS written by Anton Long. You’ll find manuscripts by AL from back in the day to the present. What you will also find at that website are current ONA MSS written by AL from the wordpress blogs... what does that tell us or imply or suggest? If AL in the blogs is not AL, what’s Richard Stirling doing as the old skool rep for Reichsfolk and ONA putting up fake AL ONA MSS at his websites connected to him? Are we to assume that RS is ignorant and can tell who’s who?

At the bottom of the nineangles.info site you will see links to ONA wordpress blogs, some of which are connected to RS which are nineangles.wordpress.com... antonlong.wordpress.com which is AL’s personal blog... and satanicheresy.wordpress.com.

All three links are wordpress blogs. All three are ONA. One is Anton Long’s personal ONA blog. What is Richard Stirling doing linking a fake pretender AL’s blog if it is not the real and original AL? Does he not know? Why is it that every ONA MSS by AL from those blogs can be found on every websites run by RS and Chloe? How come none of the old skool ONA people like Thoth and the Old Guards have ever warned any one in the Backroom or via emails that any of those Blogs is suspect and not kindred or genuine? How come Richard Moulton doesn’t say anything about there being a fake or imposter Anton Long? In fact he got upset and stated the opposite to Kayla.

So there is your basic easy answer, go ask Richard Moulton & Richard Stirling who is who in the ONA and if there an imposter Anton Long behind any of those blogs recognized by any of us as being kinfolk blogs. Or you can ask people like Chloe, Kayla, Thoth, SinisterMoon, about 90 people in the Backroom, or MF316 and Dan Dread and Diavolo who all have access or connections with these two and any Old Guard or are themselves talking with and connected to these people in question. I'm dropping names because those are Niners I personally know to be kinfolk who are active "out there." Or simple run every ONA website and do your own detective work. Check for IP locations and names.

Nobody on the inside with connections even cares about this subject. It's the people on the outside looking in with assumption that care and theorize and speculate. You can end all that speculation just by simply asking the people closest to the Man himself: Moulton & Stirling. I would recommend asking Stirling since most sites go back to him. But you don't have to ask him. You just need to keep an eye out for who or what articles written by whom makes the Circuit. Circuit as in travels from key site to key site. You'll see something RS wrote make it to Pointy's blog, then quoted over at Julie Wright's websites. Then you'll see things written by Julie Wright make it to the ONA blogs and websites. Then you see Articles from the ONA blog and RS websites make it to Julie Wright's websites... Oh! That's when we can ask – Who is Julie Wright? Why she's David Myatt's personal Historiographer, there was a different word used but I can't remember what it was.

Enter Julie Wright: <http://www.davidmyatt.ws/>

This is like playing connect the dots. Who is Julie and what does she do? She is a personal friend of David Myatt's, who collects personal information about him and put them into a collection. She has a collection of personal and private correspondences with David Myatt based on several years of being pen pals of sorts.

See now it all becomes really bizarre. Because many of the ONA MSS found at Richard Stirling's websites are also found on Julie Wright's Myatt websites... and then many of the articles written over at the Myatt and Long wordpress blogs makes the circuit to RS and Julie's websites... it's all traveling in a big loop orbiting a single person. Who is that single person we ask? Why, it's David Myatt.

So now with our detective work we singled out a Julie who for many years has directly been friends with and corresponds with Myatt. We can assume that Julie and Myatt thus talk to each other in some way. We can also assume that Julie may know Myatt better than any of us on the internet. Then WHY does Julie never mention, say, or warn RS or anybody in the ONA that there is an imposter Anton Long blogging?

The answer is a simple one, We are dealing with the same small group of people all orbiting David Myatt. With people like Julie, Moulton, and RS having the actual direct face to face connection with David Myatt and/or Anton Long. Then you have key ONA personalities who talk to or have access to these three. And nowhere or nowhen in that circuit of key people is the topic of an imposter AL ever mentioned or even a concern. Why not? We can theorize that it's all a conspiracy. That Julie, Moulton, and RS, the Old Guards and New Guards are all faking an Anton Long as some leader of the ONA and they make wordpress blogs for their fake Anton Long. Would it really matter? No, because Myatt is still the central personality all of these people have in common.

You know when you babysit a bunch of little baby cousins and one of them does something bad like break like spill water on the floor? Then you say, "Okay... who did that?" And everyone who didn't do it says, "Not me." Who do we know is the guilty one? The quietest one... in the back... pretending to be invisible so he won't get in trouble. It's like that with the ONA too. Just look for the sneaky one.

Q. What's the ONA about I don't get it? I thought ONA was satanism? Why are people associated with ONA like RM all mystical and Christian? Why was DM a Muslim and not a Satanist? Hagur was a Catholic Priest? Chloe is a Buddhist? Where did all the Satanists go? I thought ONA was Nazi, why is Shugz Chinese or Asian or whatever? What's going on?

A. The Traditional Satanists of ONA are all still around. They just keep to themselves. ONA is like a large parent company... ONA Inc. So to diversify its Options... first what does that term mean, to diversify your Options?

Let's say I have $1000 to invest in penny stocks. I buy $1000 worth of OTC Pennystocks of 1 start up company. That 1 start up company fails a year later. I lost all my money. That's putting all your eggs into one basket. The potential return dividends with such a singular investment may be big, but that is rare. Other was is to diversify your options or play the field. I put in $100 in 10 OTC start ups. Some will fail, while one might steadily grow. In such case I don't lose all my money and I have an OTC which might go somewhere.

The ONA is the same way. It's like a parent company that is playing the field. It's got it Intellectual Capital invested into an OTC subsidiary called Traditional Satanism. But the same Intellectual Capital is invested in the OTC company called Reichsfolk, and The Numinous Way. Then the same Intellectual Capital is invested into new start up subsidiaries called the Way of the Drecc, the Niners, the Balobians, and so on.

Not all of those subsidiaries are Satanic or Satanism oriented. Only Traditional Satanism based on the ONA's Codex Saerus and Naos are. If as an ONA Associate you want to go work in the subsidiary then you will be into the Satanism. If Satanism is not your thing, you can go work in the Numinous Way subsidiary. If philosophy is not your forte, you might go with Reichsfolk. It all doesn't matter because the same Intellectual Capital is the base capital of each subsidiary. The Way of the Drecc is not religious and not concerned with Satanism or the Sevenfold Way, or any of the Traditional stuff. WSA is a Drecc thing, we're Buddhists. Niners are ONA but their thing isn't connected with Traditional Satanism, although many Niners are Satanists of different kinds.

Or another way to see ONA is ONA is a Federal Entity composed of Constituent Member States like the United States is. So in the US you have Boston Massachusetts who have their own Culture and way of life, which differs from the people and culture of the Appalachia, which is different from the people and culture of the Deep South such as New Orleans, which is different from the people and culture of Utah, which is different from the people and culture of California. But all those States and people belong to the same Federal Entity and share a common Federal Identity and Federal Culture defined by documents such as the US Constitution. And so on. The member states of the ONA Federation are like the Outer Forms such as Traditional Satanism, the Dreccs, Niners, and the various Nexions with their own mixture or style. This ONA Federation is open ended, meaning that new nexions or forms can be added at any time by whoever. It's ONA if it shares certain constitutional elements such as Anton Long as the Mascot, his writings as a foundation to further build on, the 5 Core Principles, the Sinister Dialectic, and the Sinister Code of Honour, etc. It's exactly like the British Commonwealth also where each Commonwealth Nation recognizes the Queen as their figurative head of state, and where English is a common shared language in many cases, and where a certain amount of history with England is shared. But this doesn't mean the Queen exercises any real temporal power in all those Commonwealths Nations. Each Nation is independent and have their own government and culture and history and people and ways of life.

ONA as a corpus of ideas and practical wisdom can be complex... but no more complex than Science. In science you have a leaderless institution with composed of fellow scientists. Each scientist shares a common praxis called the Scientific Method. From their praxis new disciplines and fields of study are born such as biology, chemistry, astronomy, nanotechnology, and so forth. Is a botanist a scientist, yes, one that specializes in botany. Is a cosmologist a scientist, yes, one that specializes in cosmology. Old scientific theories that no longer work to explain anything are discarded. Old theories such as Newton's theory of gravity may be kept. Gradual with Time, new theories emerge which is built on top of the old theories kept. The whole institution is open ended meaning that there is no limit or direction imposed on what science can become. It is evolving and dynamic... but the institution does have its Peerage. And it is the Peerage that reviews new theories and debates and critiques them. Thus althoe open ended, not every scientist's crack pot theories will pass the Peer Review Process. Nobody elects this Peerage. They are just well respected peers in the Scientific Community.

ONA is the same way. Old theories and idea can be abandoned, some will be kept if still useful, new ideas will be added, its open ended with no imposed limit or direction, but it also has a Peer Group. Not every idea an ONA person makes will pass this Peer Group's review process. Nobody elects this Peer Group. It's just a loose body of peers... hence Peer Group... who are respected or have earned a certain amount of influence. This Peer Group consists of the Old Guards and the New Guards. Most of all the Old Guards are very well mannered when reviewing new ideas and when rejecting them. New Guards like Chloe on the other hand if she doesn't like an idea and rejects it will chew your ass out. But her peer opinions – or anybody else's – doesn't matter because its the Top Peer Anton Long's reviews and opinions that matter. And these are just opinions and reviews not judgments, sentences and laws dictated. And idea can get completely rejected by most of the current Peer Group and still find its way into general ONA circulation and usage.

Anton Long is considered the Peer of Peers simply because of all and any ONA person living today, he has been ONA the longest – he made it and continues to make it – and he's the only one to have attained the 6th Degree in the Sevenfold Way. Unless somebody beats his 39 years as a Niner and also makes it the the 6th Degree, AL will be Top Peer and will always be given proper respect and honour by the Peer Group and ONA Associates who live by the ONA Code of Honour. Most of the Old Guards in the Peer Group just lurk in the background and their main job is to just make sure that the Essence of the ONA remains the foundation of the ONA as it grows and mutates and adds onto itself. They are also there in the background to point out and call out imposters and pretenders which happens often actually.

Conclusion

There. I think I got most of the questions floating around in cyberspace. Most of those question have been asked a hundred times and answered 2 hundred time already. The battle with ignorance and assumptions is never over. But I don't mind answering the same old questions asked by mundanes. Actually if you know me by now, I spent my time answering these same old questions not to enlighten or teach these mundanes anything new. I am the least bit interested in convincing a mundane satanist to live the ONA. Why do I take the time to write 25 pages worth of answers to old questions? Memes... like dandelion puffs blown in the winds of cyberspace. It just helps my try to get my Niner kinfolks to perhaps see their ONA in a different way... and if I somehow get them to see life in Many different ways... with many lenses, then what little work I have put in has bore fruit. And such fruit will – has as I have see – grow in perspective and in self development, to duplicate my efforts and bare their own fruits.

Duplication of Effort is the key to wealth and prosperity. You can work your ass off all day marketing a product to people and generate real profit by yourself. But being only one person your potential has a limit. Thus your potential for wealth has a limit. You learn to Duplicate your Effort right? By teaching 10 others how to be your equals, how to do what you do. How to work for their own wealth and prosperity and send them out, but take a cut of what they make. That then creates what we call Residual Income. That's when you can play golf on Mondays and spend time with your friends while others work and you collect that residual income. Then those people learn to Duplicate the Efforts and generate a system of residual income to be your peers and equals. And in that whole process of duplication of effort the company grows in productive peers who know how to get things done, and in influence. But those who know me, knows that what Residual Income I work to generate isn't for me. I make no claim to any ONA fame or fortune. Those who know me, knows me and my friends work to develop the residual income for AL and the ONA as a Kollektive.

Rather than have an ONA run by one "Anton Long" I would much more like to see an ONA made of an army of Anton Longs. Where each of us do what AL does, the time dedicated to nurture the ONA, the sharing of insights and practical skills learned, the sharing of painful lessons from Pathei Mathos, the evolution of the ONA. For whatever reason and in whatever direction. As someone said it recently regarding AL and the ONA, "The center is well defined... the circumference has infinite potential."

A long while ago me and some of my family were having dinner with a family business partner who is very successful at what he does and his wife. I was still in high school then. A conversation about business and corporations in context to "the future" came up. So naturally the fathers and uncles and this family friend started talking about “the future market.” One of us cousins confused asked the family friend what was meant by “the future market,” and if that meant groups of people you can in future get to buy your service or product.

The family friend said, no, no, no, not that. Then he said to us to imagine if we were take a marker and we were to put a green dot on all the people’s foreheads alive today... all the billions of them. Then we come back in 100 years what would we see? We would see that none of the billions of people have the green dot. What happened he asked? And we answered that the people with the green dots had all died. He said to us, Exactly, the people you see are New People of the Future. That is The Future Market. They have not yet been born. I remembered that idea ever since, and see it alive in many different ways. Hitler once said, “He who owns the Youth, own the Future.”

And from my own life long experience with my own living culture and ancestral tradition, I see and understand that what our family friend said and what Hitler said rings true even for human culture. A living culture must be able to impress in the new minds of its young progeny the traditions, culture, language, and worldviews, or that culture will have no Future. Cultural continuity depends on a culture’s ability to impress on the minds yet to be born its culture or it will die. Those yet-to-be-born Minds are light rays of white light that passes when born into a color filter to take on shape and form, but also such new minds are blank slates wired to acquire a mental form and worldview of what people such Minds are intimately connected with. It is just the way of nature. We either give our unborn progeny a culture, or someone else will. They either are given your ancestral culture or Numinous Way of Life, or they will be impressed and stamped with Magian Ethos. The choice is yours as a parent.

But more in line with ONA that concept of The Future Market is also applicable. If there was one thing I could or wish to teach or get across to other Niners it is the realization of whom they are writing and working for.

The people alive today with the symbolic green dot on their foreheads will all die in a short 100 years. And with their death they will take all of their opinions, convictions, paradigms, worldviews, gods, philosophical interpretations, religious concepts, and ideological beliefs. All of that goes into the grave with them. It is a waste of time to try to convince these mundane marked for death to see the world in a different way, to live life in a different way, and to believe other than their convictions they will hold onto until they die. And they will die.

But there is a Future Market of billions and billions of Unborn Minds not many of us consider writing for and sharing our insights with. For just as we of today look back to perhaps a Myatt of the 70?s, a LaVey of the 60?s... a Jesus of the 1?s... or a Buddha of some 2500 years ago for answers to the same ancient and eternal questions, for insights to better the world we have come into, so too will those Unborn Minds look to us and our people and generations and those in more ancient times for answers and insights.

The Audience that I write for – if and when I write – and the Audience I would wish for those of the ONA to learn to write for is this Unborn Future Market. Everyone alive today is literally marked for death. That Future Audience does not have any convictions yet. Their hearts and minds have not yet turned to stone. And there are Billions of them, and the Time frame goes on and on. Just billions and Billions and Billions of Unborn Minds that will look for insights and culture and practical wisdom of how to just see and understand the world, and get the best out of it.

I personally could care less if every human alive today hated ONA or rejected it and made whatever claims they make. Because I know they and I will all die and they will take their convictions and assumptions with them. But I have something they will never have – Aeonie Insight... the ability to see far ahead and act, and write accordingly. Not to convince anybody alive today, to but speak to what people will come tomorrow... my children and grand children, and their grandchildren and peers of some distant Future of some Future time and world. If Anton Long can by himself presence the ONA for us of today – his Future – then so long as I have my Aeonie Insight and write for my Unborn Market, I will have the potential to own a piece of the Future... a piece of Future real estate for the ONA and its Myattian Dream. Just one nexion is all it takes. But to have more would be even better.

THE ABC RITE

THE ABC RITE

Introduction:

The aim of this Initiatory rite is twofold: 1) It is a means of drawing Dark Forces to the Disciple, and binding them to the Sinister Path; 2) And is a means to “activate” the Disciple; meaning to extricate the Disciple out of his own head so he/she can become used to being productively active in the outside world. The Sinister Way, as we understand it is a Way of Living, Doing, and Being. This rite Initiates the Disciple onto that Sinister Path.

The ABC Rite is undertaken soon after the Disciple’s Initiation; or before as a test of loyalty if the Nexus he desires to join demands. The rite is usually preformed by the Disciple with 3 other Disciples; as his helpers and witnesses; who have practiced this rite before. The more often the rite is preformed, the more Dark Forces are drawn into the Sinister Predator. The rite may be preformed by a solitary Disciple who honestly desires to become a genuine Sinister Predator. Or it may be practiced by an entire nexion of Sinister Predators.

ABC stands for: Assault; Business; and Criminal organization.

The Voiding (Preliminary Ritual):

The Disciple first researches abandoned and derelict buildings in a suitably urban area.

Then on a night of the full Moon, they break into this building and aim to conduct the ritual on the top floor, or most inaccessible part of the building (researched beforehand during a practice run). They are not allowed any means of light to guide them through the building.

Once in the chosen space, the Disciple lights incense of Mars. They must also have a crystal with them suitable for ritual use. No candles are permitted.

They then walk a circle anti-clockwise three times, saying "Ad Satanus qui laetificat juventutem meam".

They then stand in the centre of the circle, holding the crystal, and vibrate, with force, "Agios o Shugara" seven times whilst visualizing the sigil of Shugara.

Then the Diabolus is sung three times.

The Disciple then places the crystal on the floor, and sits near to it, within the circle. They visualize the crystal becoming black, which spreads out to engulf them.

Once visualization is over, the Disciple departs the building, and prepares themselves for the performance of the ABC's the following day.

The ABC's:

1) Assault

The Disciple must first perform the act of Assault. Three witnesses are involved to aid the Disciple and to observe all is done correctly.

Two acts of assault are most commonly recommended: lynching, and sexual assault.

Usually if a lynching is chosen, Disciples in the past have found it easier to do a drive by lynch in a quiet street and beat the shit out of an unsuspecting bystander. The bystander must bleed from the lynching. This is called a "Blood Opfering".

If the option is to be a sexual assault, previous Disciples have found it easier and less risky to wait for a 'wiccan' holiday, and then find a suitable victim in their places of gathering – usually held at night in places favorable to the assault. This is called a "Sex Opfering".

If a female Disciple is performing the Sex Opfering, she must use whatever means available to sexually offer her victim, while her 3 witnesses holds the Opfer down. Safety and stealth here is of utmost importance. We do not want our brothers and sisters' liberty and safety jeopardized or compromised in any way. Intelligence, planning, concealment of identity, and use of "mottos" is standard protocol. Each Disciple is given a motto or nickname by the group, which they will be then known by.

2) Business

Once again, the Disciple is accompanied by three witnesses. 'Business' is defined as "the art and science of transferring other people's money into your pocket or bank account". Business is broken down into the three B's (BBB): "Beggery;" "Burglary;" and "Bluffery", which we affectionately refer to as the "Better Business Bureau".

The Disciple first begins their Beggery by being taken to a highly populated area. They are then required to beg for money all day until they have raised $100 dollars. The Disciple must share what they make equally with their 3 witnesses. "Beggery" also includes: Extortion, Racketeering, and Tax Collecting, which are all different forms of Begging. The Disciple may choose which form of begging they will use to collect the required amount.

Next the Disciple must pass the Burglary test. The Disciple must steal something which can be sold or pawned for money. The Disciple must raise $100 to past the test. Again, whatever money is made must be divided equally.

Next the Disciple must demonstrate their skills in "Bluffery". By Bluffery we mean "the art of conning stupid people out of their money". The Disciple must use and devise a suitable means – eg. selling trinkets like pens, or magazines, or pamphlets; or create a business commodity of their own, and selling it for profit. The Disciple again must raise at least $100 to pass the test, and the money must be shared equally.

By going through the Better Business Bureau the Disciple learns to hustle for money, and discovers that they are not so dependent on jobs to make a decent living. They will learn to see that every person is an opportunity, and that which looks like a street of busy cars is a river of money and opportunity waiting to be networked with and exploited for personal gain. Thus the Disciple gains a sense of liberation, and begins to realize that financial independence is possible. The Disciple also learns to work and co-operate in a collective group.

3) Criminal Organization

This is where the Disciple displays their intelligence, creativity, and organizational skills. The Disciple must organize a small group, and plan out a very organized and stealth criminal act, which in some way will benefit the small group. In the past, Disciples have organized small groups of new Disciples and put them though the A and B stage – themselves acting as a witness and leader of the group.

THE ART OF REAPING

The Art of Reaping

“Come as a Reaper, for thus will you sow.” – 5th Satanic Point; Codex Saerus; ONA

Destruction

The first thing that comes to Mind in most of us when we read the sixth Satanic Point is hell cracking open and destruction running amok annihilating everything. Or the image of the grim reaper running around killing city people left and right. Somehow that's suppose to sow something... something new born from the ashes of something old. So we mislead ourselves into thinking that one must kill and destroy to give birth to something new. Creation does not always comes from destruction.

In a way, the seeds of something new are sown in the death of the old. As we see in Nature. Old trees and plants, and old animals which die are processed by bacteria and fungus into nitrogen rich fertilizer from which grows a new forest.

Old useless alpha male lions in the Serengeti who have grown old and useless are taken down by new younger males... thus the Pride gets an influx of new genes. This may seem 'not right' from a localized Time perspective, but on a chromorphic level, the old replaced by the new insures Nature that Her parts (a species) continues to exist in great stretches of Time. For Nature – as eternal as She is – deals in increments of great Time... in the millions and billions of years. From such great increments of Time, Nature must test and try life forms and genes to insure that each successive generation inherits the means needed to continue across that great stretch of Time.

Civilization, like a forest or pride of lions, from an aeonic perspective, works in the same way over large chunks of Time. Ancient prehistoric civilizations lost in Time rise and fall... and their people disperse taking their wisdom, knowledge, and experiences with them, from whom eventually is borne new kinds of civilizations. So here we see that the death and destruction of a civilization itself is not the foundation of a new civilization. It is actually the creativity, experience, and intelligence of the people. The destruction – like a blank canvas – only gives them the freedom to express their Minds and creativity. Anyway, from the fall of an old civilization, arises new forms of civilization... and from this there is Progression of Humanity. From the ancient ashes and ancestral wisdom of ancient civilizations came in Time, the kingdoms and empires of Europe. These in turn were disrupted, and destroyed... and from the ashes of these old empires sprouted republics – a new form and species of human civilization. No doubt the civilizations we presently know of such as America, have brought our species very far into the future.

If our species is to continue Progressing forward to actualize our full human potential, we must understand that there must come a Time when what civilizations we know of today shall become Old, Stagnant and Useless... no longer having the potency, inspiration, and influence to captivate our Minds and Dreams... like a stagnant and inert religion. Such civilizational stagnation is like an artery that has become blocked, where the Flow forward has stopped. As cells – which we each are – of such a blocked artery and heart, such blockage of Flow kills us en masse – if not in bodily death, then death in Mind, Creativity, and Potential. The Old and Useless must be destroyed... its citizens (seeds) must be dispersed, and from the casting of such seeds – and the knowledge they each carry – will sprout new kinds of civilizations which will thus keep the Flow of our Progression moving forward.

So we see that in the old ONA of many years back often times pre-occupies its time with designing and strategizing the Hows of such an act of destruction is to be accomplished... like an underground rebel force plotting and planning. Yet, hardly is there ever a manuscript which details the images and visions of the End Result of such dreams and goals that inspires and captivates our minds and emotions. This is an important misdirection of ‘psychic’ energy, which will be talked about later.

The Reaper

This big perspective of Nature, and Civilization, is beyond the individual person. Thus, in a way, the ideation of destroying a civilization to materialize a new one is almost – if not – impersonal... or beyond our direct touch. This concept of being a Reaper to sow and create must be brought down to a more direct, personal, and practical level. Brought down to a level imbued with personal experience, rather than theoretical strategy.

A “Reaper” does not actually denote or suggest someone that kills, terrorizes, and destroys. A Reaper is a Harvester. Harvesting crops takes intelligences, wisdom, and planning. Crops aren’t senselessly cut up and killed. Only the Ripe ones are harvested. What is harvested is usually divided into three portions – a part to be used, a part to be sold, and a part to be sown. A skilled and wise farmer who knows when and how to harvest his crops right, can continue his crops year after year, and season after season. This skilled farmer can take one single corn seed, and when given enough time, he can make it grow into an entire field of corn, to benefit himself, his family, and the market.

To “come as a reaper,” on a personal and practical level, means to think as a harvester... to think first of the End Result – that which shall be reaped – and thus to sow in such a way that yields the desired End Result. As that skilled farmer with that single corn seed does not think of the uselessness of the single seed he has, but rather envisions – aeonically – the End Result he desires... which is a field of corn. So he will sow that seed, with that End Result in Mind, and when that seeds becomes a plant he takes the many seeds it gave and uses it wisely – in tune – to the End Result he has in Mind. This End Result is Wyrđ – Fate... Destiny.

Men are subject to or mastered by Fate, whereas Gods are masters of their own Fate and Destiny. In other words, the command of wyrđ (or lack thereof) is the “birth mark” of a Mundane/Anariya (cow herder of the gods) and the Drecc/Ariya (the gods... in training). So this is the esoteric and practical meaning of coming as a Reaper – to learn to master our own destiny, by not senselessly sowing seeds aimlessly in life, but to have an End Result always in Mind, and to work accordingly in Life to Reap that envisioned End Result... the Fruition our acts and deeds in Life bares.

Since we exist in a Causal Universe, there is a logical science and mechanics to how causality unravels and to how Wyrđ Becomes. There is a Cause – seed-cause – to every Fruit, or End Result, or Fate. The mechanics of the causal unfoldment of Wyrđ has been expressed in many ancient culture in many ways. The ONA has its own way of expressing the mechanics of Wyrđ, which is rarely spoken about. This subject is something which I personally deem of paramount importance, because when we each understand how Destiny unravels, we can take advantage of the mechanics of causality to manifest in Life a Life we desire to live. Personally, I do not want my future children to be mastered by Fate... tossed around by circumstances like drift wood. I want my future children to have an intelligent conscious control over their innate power to create their own Life... to be Masters of their own Destiny and Reality.

Wyrđ

The causal mechanics of Wyrđ is esoterically hidden in the Tree of Wyrđ of the ONA. The imagery of the “Tree” itself symbolizes the Brain. The Brain itself is the upper branches of this Tree, while the nerves that stretch down thru the spinal column are this Tree’s root system. This Tree is the center of its own universe. This Tree is the center thru which the cosmos literally comes into being. In other words, the Fruit this Great Tree bares, is that which we as living beings experience and observe.

Everything and every aspect of our modern existences once first began as a mere thought – seed-cause – in somebody’s Mind. Everything from the airplanes in our sky, to the internet we use, to the nations we are a part of all first began as an ideation. That seed – ideation – is sown, which grows and causally bares Fruit as experience and observable reality. By “observable reality” I don’t mean to denote the “backdrop” of the jungle, mountains, earth, stars, planets, and galaxies. I mean to suggest the “furnishings” of this kabuki stage we call life that we directly experience and directly observe. It is we who decorate and fill this stage with the furniture and props.

This Tree of Wyrd comes with seven spheres, each sphere representing a planet of some kind, and perhaps the archetypes associated with each planet. So we have as the first sphere the Moon, then Mercury, then Venus, then the Sun, then Mars, and Jupiter, then last we have Saturn. Saturn is the End of Wyrd. Saturn is the Reaper or Harvester. In ancient times Saturn was the god of the Harvest and his symbol was the reaping sickle. These seven spheres of the Tree of Wyrd, thus esoterically explains to us in detail the mechanics of Wyrd... how a seed-thought causally materializes into Fruit ready to be reaped by the Harvester.

The Moon is silent and awe inspiring. Its face, its size, and waxing and waning captivates our Minds. By its changing of faces we are able to figure out the seasons and months. By its orbit, we have the phenomenon of the ebb and flow of the Tides on earth. Thus we may symbolize the Moon with Poseidon/Neptune's trident, who is the archetype of the Dark Sea of our Psyche, from which all our words and thoughts arises. The Moon also represents the night season, during which we sleep dreaming away under its subtle light. The sphere of the Moon represents Inspiration, Initial Thought that comes to our attention, and dreams or visualization.

Mercury is the messenger of the gods. He carries the words and decree of one party to another. By him, the intentions of the gods are made known. The sphere of Mercury represents Intention or Intent. Here the initial inspirational thought is intentionalized.

Venus is the goddess of Love and Beauty. The sphere of Venus represents Desire & Passion. Desire is the fuel that backs up and moves the intentionalized thought forward. Passion is the Force which makes the impossible possible. Love and Beauty to our species – and all species – is the greatest and most enchanting driving force. How many wars have been fought for Beauty (over a woman). What would we each not do for Love. In other animals, when the season is ripe, no male can resist the sent of a female in heat. It is Desire that drives Nature forward from one generation to the next.

The Sun burns and casts heat. The sphere of the Sun represents the Force of Will and Determination. Here the lunar seed thought, after being empowered by Intention, and fueled by Desire, now burns with Will and Determination. This sphere is the alchemical crucible where the unmanifested seed-thought begins to become a causal phenomenon.

Mars is the god of war. The sphere of Mars is the first stage where the seed-thought takes root in the real world of experience. War, if you think about it is Thought materialized as causal phenomena. War first begins in the Minds of generals ideating, scheming, strategizing, and intelligently planning. Only after such Minds have come to a workable strategy that will yield a desired End Result are the orders given to the soldiers. Then the soldiers executes what were once thoughts, and thru their execution of duties, the thoughts of lofty Minds materializes as reality. How many kingdoms, empires, and republics has our species known that have been born of war? These civilizations born of war once began as a thought in a lofty Mind. The sphere of Mars thus represents Action and the transition of thought-stuff into reality and experience.

Jupiter is king of the gods. His Word is Wyrd. By this I mean that what a King says, orders, commands, wishes, he will get one way or another. As king, what you say and desire, you can expect to receive. It doesn't matter How to a king. The How is the responsibility of the servants and subjects. All a King is concerned with is getting what he wants. The sphere of Jupiter represents Regal Expectation. That initial lunar thought after coupling with a burning will, and actualized with action and deed, can be Expected to manifest. By regal expectation, I mean to suggest that we each must learn to expect what we wyrdfully set into motion as a King/Queen who has spoken. A King or Queen who has total dominion in their domain, should have no doubt that what they speak, decree, and command should not come to them. It must.

Saturn is the Reaper... Lord of the Harvest. Under his watchful guide and auspice crops grow and bare fruit. The sphere of Saturn represents the Fruition of our thoughts... now ready to be reaped by Saturn's sickle.

The Work

First the architect is inspired in his Heart to build a Temple. He spends his time Visualizing as best as he can in his Mind's Eye what he wants his Temple to look like. He will make his Intent to build this Temple. The stronger his visualization and intent, the more Desire is born, which leads into Will and Determination.

This architect then draws his vision of his Temple on his trestle board or blue print. He then Acts by collecting the tools and material and workers needed. He then hands over his vision to his team of workers, and Trusts or Expects his vision to manifest. It doesn't matter How the workers will do it. All that matters is that the End Results of the finished Temple will look exactly like the envisioned drawing. How is irrelevant. If this architect micromanages the How he only gets in the way of the workers and actually impedes a quick materialization. The Saturnian End Result when the workers are entrusted, is a completed Temple built in the real world of experience which mirrors what once was in the architect's Mind. This is the causal process of Thought alchemically transmuting into experiential reality.

The How does not matter. Causality is the workmen of Wyrd. Nobody knows "how" causality works in the causal universe. It just does... in the same sense that we know that there are a number of cosmic laws and things that exist such as gravity, electricity, and magnetism. We really don't know how these things work or why. We have theories, but you don't have to know how electricity works to use it. You can be a total fool and plug in a lamp and always expect the electricity to turn the lamp on. Who cares How that electricity becomes light... it might be fascinating to electricians, but your average person just wants the End Result – Light.

How and why causality works and exists in our universe may never be known but you don't have to know how and why to use the natural process of causality. In fact it causes a lot of suffering in Life when you don't use causality wisely. The causal-seeds you sow – no matter what they are – will bare fruit as your Fate. You each have a choice to either be lame ducks mastered by Fate, or gods who are masters of Fate. When using the natural causal system of the cosmos to materialize your thoughts, no "god of the causal" is used, abused, ordered, or commanded. It is just a natural process. Like jizzing in a girl, you're not using or controlling some demon of Life to make a baby. When jizz is up in a girl, a natural process just takes place, and you can always Expect the same End Result – a baby. It's nothing magical, it's Natural.

That's the cool thing about Nature – it's smarter than us. Can you imagine if Nature entrusted us with the secrets of how sperm and egg becomes a living baby... if we had to sit there and consciously divide that zygote into billions of cells, and magically make the baby's eyes, nose, mouth, and guts? Our species would be extinct in a few years because we are actually not as smart as we claim to be. So who cares – besides biologists – how a baby is made, if you want a baby, you put sperm in a girl and nature just does Her things. Causality works in the same Natural way – stick the sperm-thought of what you want in the womb of Nature and you'll get what you asked for in a few months. Who cares how it works.

People will ask for proof that causality can be used to manifest thought into experience. The proof – your own Life's past experiences. Take the time to seriously and Mindfully meditate for a moment on all of your experiences in Life, and everything that you have from your clothes you wear, to your car, and friends, to your job and wife, or a built body. Take one of those things you Reaped such as your car and work backwards like a detective to figure out what you did to get it. If you honestly do this, you will come to Realize that what thoughts you spend your day time visualizing and imaging, which is backed up by Intention, Desire, Determination, Action, and Expectation, ultimately becomes real.

If you Desire something bad enough, and the Determination is there, you will act it out by seeking it. If it's a car you will drive around car lots to find the right one. If it's a girlfriend you will act it out by doing what needs to be done to attract a girl. Likewise, what you spend your time worried about... negatively visualizing and imaging... telling yourself over and over (making the Intention) that you are broke, poor, unhealthy, unloved, will also naturally manifest into your Fate. The Norns are blind, they just weave Wyrd... your own Mind, what visualizations and intentions you fill it with during your waking moments, is the pattern and design that will be woven into the fabric the norns spin.

As A Reaper

As a skilled reaper you begin the Tree of Wyrd backwards with Saturn and determine the End Result you want in Life. Figure out what actions need to be taken... any action or deed that will bring you closer to your goals suffices. Understand that each deed and act bares better fruit when backed up by emotion (Venus). Once you have figured out what each sphere needs to be filled with, you work your way from the sphere of the Moon on up.

Spend about 5 minutes a day vividly visualizing you already having or experiencing the End Result. How it comes to be is not your concern. Don't try to micromanage something you don't even understand, you'll just get in the way. Usually, what we are most Obsessed over (Sun = Determination/Will) is what we will experience and encounter in Life most often. This requires no rites or rituals, although such things may serve to enhance your emotions and visualizations, determination, action, and expectations. The time just before you go to bed is the best time to do the 5 minutes of visualization, because when you are asleep, you have up to 8 hours of your conscious mind not getting in the way by doubting. The more doubt you have, the less expectation, will, determination, you will have, which affects your actions and desires.

I've personally tested this system out over and over again in the real world to know that it works, so I'm not pulling some magical bullshit out of my ass or some book. It's not magical, it just happens. When it does happen, things come to you thru other people, thru coincidences, and coincidental circumstances. I personally experience these intuitive hunches in my gut after I visualize for something to wyrdfully get it. I'll feel a pull or tug in my heart area which cause me to think about a place or to go or do something. So I usually follow these tugs which leads me to a person or situation that eventually gives me what I want.

For instance, I get 90% of my books by using this method of visualization and waiting for these tugs. It's something I have been doing since when I first started college. I would do research and when I get stuck needing more relevant information or reference, I put everything away and spend a few minutes vividly visualizing myself with a stack of books and finishing my research and papers. Then I literally take myself to the library on campus and wait as often as I can. In the beginning I won't feel anything, but the more obsessed I get over the topic of research, the quicker the tugs come. To help get the tugs coming I sometimes walk aimlessly up and down each isle in a state of obsession.

Then I'd pick up a tug... it's like a gut feeling, but is a physical sensation in the heart area, as if the area were tightening up or swirling, and this "pulls" you or your Mind in certain directions. So I follow these tugs and pulls, and always – 100% of the time – I end up picking up a book – which usually seems to have nothing to do with my subject... but when I open it and read it, it always has some information that I needed or wanted. I buy all of my books using the same technique. I obsess over a subject for a time, and the tugs makes me drive around different cities to different books stores, and after a while I collect a pile of books all relevant to the subject.

Conclusion

I think this process of Wyrd and Pathei-Mathos together makes a Complete Way of Life. One which is not based on any dogma or doctrine, but on Life and direct Experience. I've had the direct experience of making this process of Wyrd work for me. I was originally taught this by a few mentors, a couple of whom were successful millionaires, who learned to make Life work for them thru their own discoveries, tests, and experimentations in life. I want to pass this art and science of Life to my own children someday as a Living Tradition, so that they will have the tools they need to make the best out of Life, and to manifest their full potential in Life. This is the real reason why I stick around the ONA. It offers a fresh medium, with which I can use and work with to pass what I have learned as a Living Tradition, in the same way that it has become DM's medium which he impregnates with his own Pathei-Mathos – from which we all benefit.

In this sense, the ONA is a very unique system because it is based on the 40 year insights of a living person's gradual unfoldment, and a culture of sharing insights from personal pathei-mathos in life can be seen being born in the ONA. Slowly the ONA becomes an Ordering of people of like Minds who share their personally insights with other Dreccian – thus creating a real culture and living tradition which has the potential to pass our collective wisdom obtained from direct experience of Life down across the generations.

This process of Wyrđ is only one such experience of life. It's a shame that more people who have experienced this process of thought coalescing into form and experience does not share their experiences with others. I hope that as Time passes, each Dreccian of the ONA will be open to sharing their personal experiences – as DM does – so that a Living Tradition can genuinely be born from which we all can benefit. If anything, it adds a new practical layer to what is already the Tree of Wyrđ.

The more you put this process to trial in real life, the more it works, and the more you realize that there is more to Life than meets the eye, and the more you realize that your Thoughts Become Things. It's as if Life... or the Cosmos reflects what you entertain in your Mind. Or as if there is a place somewhere "out there" where the Mind and Cosmos blurs in a sea of infinite potential, and what you fixate your mind on, becomes real. This must be directly experienced to be meaningful. Reading about it and believing or disbelieving in it will do nothing. Put it to the test.

THE BUSINESS OF ONA

The Business of ONA

It's been 3 years and we've seen the Vipaka of our actions we set in motion in the past Bare Fruit which is pleasing. Since all of the talks that went down between me, Kayla, and our Liaisons were mostly private and Behind The Scenes or off the record, very few people of the ONA can fully appreciate the visual of the 3 year long Unfoldment of Vipaka. One thing I liked about my Liaison DarkLogos was that he was on the same wave length as me. I could just give him rudimentary "memetic equations" like {ONA=Apple Inc} & {WSA=iPod} and without having to explain anything, DL would get it, and get to work with AL to make things happen. He never questioned me and always understood what I was trying to say.

Most of our business talks were literal business talks based on things I know about business and marketing from my little experience and from several books I base my strategies on. So this little essay will be an overview of the key points and concepts I used. Then at the end I'll try and articulate the next step since I can barely put the next step into words right now.

It maybe wondered why the ONA needs to be dealt with behind the scenes as a business or corporation with some "product" if the Essence is natural and everywhere. Or if we are born sinister by nature. Sure you may be born human by nature, but the various peculiarities of human stuff like the language we speak, the culture we live, and our worldviews are learned. Unless you are suggesting to me that as a baby you came out into the world with a fully functioning lexicon, culture, and worldview? You're full of shit if you tell me so. I know otherwise because there are cases of Feral Children who are raised without proper human influence who can hardly be considered human. It would be more accurate to say that we are born with the Potential to be human, which Potentiality must be nurtured or unfolded.

Another way to put it is if you in one breath told me that you wanted to go to LA to go shopping, and in another breath say to me in a confused manner: "But I don't understand why I need to use a vehicle to get to LA?" The answer is that you need a vehicle to get your ass to LA in the first place. Dharma is everywhere, but you need the Yanas to lead you to come to an awareness of it. Why do you need scientific fields such as biology and chemistry or mathematics if all that shit is everywhere in the universe? Because without the Field to lead you to the awareness of such things, you'd be ignorant of it consciously. And so we can say that the more refined our Vehicle is, the more effective it is in helping us develop an understanding of our world. The more refined science is, the more powerful and accurate the theories we can make may become to help us dis-cover a more refined understanding of the nature of actual reality.

Primal Coding

The most influential book in my business and marketing arsenal is a book called "Primal Branding." The author is a mentor to executives of very large international corporations. Basically what the author did was in the old days he actually studied different human tribes anthropologically. He was trying to figure out what these tribes had in common, what makes a tribe a tribe, and what holds a tribe into a coherent group. He also shifted his research on what we might call "urban tribes" such as sports teams and their fanbase, etc. His idea was that if he could isolate the functioning variables that makes these tribal groups coherent, he can turn companies and their market into tribes to produce zealot customers that transcends generations, class, etc.

The author came up with 7 things all tribes share in common which he named the Primal Codings. These codings are what the corporations will implement to induce tribalization of its market base. The obvious reason why as a company you want your market base to be tribalized is because of an idea we can call "Market Vaporization," which is when over time your consumers or market disappears. If this market vaporization continues unchecked the consequences for a corporation are bankruptcy and debt. A good example of total market vaporization would be the very old consumer market for a gaming system called Atari. Overtime as new and better gaming systems came our the market abandoned Atari because this Atari company never took the initiative to evolve their product to meet the progressive needs and movements of its market. So in the end they lost their market and fell off the earth into total irrelevancy. I think I vaguely recall another old gaming system that died out called Sega or something? They're gone too. In cult and ideological lingo we call market vaporization: Turn Over Rate. Thus tribalization induces and insures retention over long periods of time. If your venture business can't retain people, and has a massive turn over rate, then it must be understood that there is something wrong.

The functioning premise of Primal Branding is that Business is a Belief System, therefore Primal Coding will make zealots. There are 7 simple Primal Codings: 1. Creation Story; 2. Creed; 3. Icons; 4. Rituals; 5. Pagans; 6. Sacred Words; 7. Leader. This book was not written for cults and actually written for business people, so you have to know what those Primal Codings means on the corporate end. In the same way how you would read Sun Tzu's Art of War and know how to incorporate it into the business arena.

Your Creation Story is a typical story of how your company was founded so your market can relate to your company. It's better if your creation story resonates with your target audience/market. Apple Inc was founded in a humble garage by geeks; America was founded by rebels fighting for Liberty. Creed of a corporation would be things like: "Save more, pay less," "Your way right away," "Inn -n- Out, Inn -n- Out, that's what a hamburger's all about." "Be all you can be, in the army," "Liberty, Fraternity, Equality!" Icons are logos since people are more mentally structured to deal with pictures than written words. People can better and quickly identify Islam from its iconic Crescent and Star rather than by staring at the many pages of the Koran. One of the best and most pregnant with meaning icons: the Playboy bunny. A picture is worth a thousand words.

Rituals in business terms is like standing in a line at Starbucks; dressing up in formal attire; struggling with California traffic to get to work or to Rodeo Dr.; the ritual of shopping at a WalMart so often you know where everything is; and so on. You know your friend is a hardcore WalMart shopper when you talk about lipstick and he says: "Oh yeah, WalMart, $2.98, Health & Beauty Aid department, aisle G20. Fridays is double coupon day!" Pagans in Primal Coding for business is the "Us & Them" rhetoric. You have the cool crowd who uses Apple product and the heathens who use IBM compatibles [Generics]. You have those who use Linux Versus those who use Windows [Windorks]; people loyal to McDonald's versus Burger Queens; Target shoppers are classier than WalMart shoppers who are fat slobby trailer park trash [WalSchmucks]; one sports team fan versus another. It's more psychologically effective and demeaning to invent cool derogatory words to refer to your pagans like Nigger, Wigger, Honky, Chink, Nip, Gook, Beaner, that's all I know. Bloods call Crips "Crabs" as in pubic lice. Crips call Bloods "Slobs." TRG calls Asian Boyz "Apples." Everybody calls TRG members "Roaches." Americans call Mexicans "Wetbacks." Mexicans call Americans "Gringos." Tribes of descent looking pretty girls will invent exonyms for other tribes of girls such as: fat bitch, whore, slut, skank, and so on. Getting a manicure and going shopping at the mall or an outlet is Ritual which you don't do with skanks.

Sacred Words in business talk are group specific Lexicon. In real tribes one tribe can tell another tribe apart by the dialect they use. So if somebody is using a list of words like: Congruent, Variable, Means, Parallel, Angle, Vector, Tangent, etc you know such person is coming from a "tribe" working with Geometry and Mathematics and not the military. If you have a group of people using words like: Enemy, Tactic, Strategy, Recon, Intelligence Gathering, Weak Spots, etc, you know your dealing with a military oriented "tribe." In business Sacred Word are like: Tall Latte, Short Regular which are special to Starbucks users. Animal Style, which is a "secret" Inn -n- Out order. Tom Yum Ga Gai, Thai Ice Tea, Padt Thai, are Sacred Word anybody will know if you frequent Thai restaurants. What tribe [social group] does a person come from who knows these Sacred Words: "Long Island on the rocks," or "give me a Screw Driver, make it virgin." How about this one: Bodacious, Radical, Tubular Man! Words like Invest, Capital, Shares, Mutual, Trusts, Dividends, Returns, Residual, are Sacred Words in the business sector. If a guy uses such words, and you say: "Huh? I don't understand?" Then he knows you're not in his social group of businessmen because you don't understand those words. People who use Linux have a completely alien set of Lexicon from those that use Window, etc. In other words, you ain't cool if you don't talk like the in crowd. Best examples of real "tribes" with very sophisticated in group Sacred Words are the tribe of Scientists with their technical lexicon and the tribe of lawyers with their Legal Latin mumbo-jumbo.

The last Primal Coding “Leader” is not what it sounds like in the cult sector. A Lead in business terms may be a CEO like Bill Gates or Steve Jobs were/are. Or they can be “Mascots” or Central Figures your tribal people can look at or know. The old Ronald McDonald is a tribal leader. Mickey Mouse was tribal leader. But the most important qualities such a leader of Figure Person must have are Charisma, Popularity [within the target market], and Rapport with the tribe. Old fart Nazi hardliners lack these three qualities, but Hitler had them. Walt Disney playing with little children may look questionable and he lack the Heart Grabbing power Mickey Mouse had on his target market: Children. Some High Priests or “Ipsissimuses” have a hard time understanding this most basic Primal Code. They have zero charisma, no real market likes their ass, and they have no rapport with anybody but the same 4 active users at their website. When you put a loser like that as the Face and Figure of your Venue, you are going to fail. What social group does a person come from who uses the word “Venue?”

So back in the old days me and DarkLogos deconstructed the ONA to see how many things matched up with these Primal Codings. Where there was a lack, we fixed that. One thing which ONA lacked was a well defined “pagan.” So all I had to do was give DL the “memetic equation” {Pagan=Mundane}, and he understood what that meant and went to work on his side. Then afterward you see everybody like me, Anton Long, and the Usual Suspects all flood every new ONA MSS with the meme Mundane and at every chance we got we debased them and vilified them. Mundane became the ONA’s exonym for Outsiders. To such an extent now that this meme is ubiquitous in the Satanic Subculture where even some non-ONA Satanists know they are Mundane. I love it.

I love it more to hear people get seriously asshurt over how We ONA have split people into two camps Us or Mundanes. They’ll cry out how it’s not fair, we’re just doing what Christians are doing, etc. Yeah it’s not fair, deal with it. Buddhism did it before with the whole Ariya versus Anariya and nobody is trashing Buddhism for it. Our species – because of our human nature – has been doing it forever. Animals know “us from them.” ONA just like Corporations and Brands have learned to take advantage of that human nature. I thought Satanism was based on Human Nature? Go figure that one out. People might object intellectually. But as Buddhists understanding Vipaka and as ONA understanding that earned Pathei-Mathos of experience we should pay attention the the actual causal Fruit of such tactics and we must learn to judge the actual END RESULTS of such actions only. Three years and those of us in ONA who were tuning in before and after knows the difference. The End Fruit does the speaking. The intellectual throwing around of contentious opinions is empty hot air blowing out of asshurt people.

But I also saw that the reverse was true: ONA did not have a demonym for our in crowd. So we fixed that. At first me and DL were throwing around ideas back and forth. DL had the idea of having a word which was associated with the illegal or outlaw sector of society but not an English word. I first said I really like the word Siam. Siam means Thai, but originally it is a Khmer exonym meaning a Pirate. Interestingly the Khmer word for a Vietnamese – Yuan – originally was a derogatory exonym meaning a Barbarian. I said too bad there is already a people called Siam. DL suggested I might look for a cool single syllable word in Khmer for a demonym for us, but with a K since he likes word with K in it. I could think of nothing at the time but the word "Krom." Krom in Khmer has a number of meanings from Company, Business, Society, Gang, Organization, to a group of outlaws. So he tossed the phrase "We Are Krom" around back and forth to see if it sounded right. I didn't like it because to me with the English words it sounded like we were saying "We Are Crumbs." A few days later AL had found us a nice unused word from Old English: Drecc. I loved it, DL did too. Then after that you see AL, me, and all of the Usual Suspects flood the ONA with our new demonym. Later AL came up with "Niner."

The major flaw I noticed in the ONA's primal coding was its leader figure or mascot: Anton Long. AL was a leader, but he was also just a pen name with no face or life story where people can actually relate with. This was a serious flaw. My idea back then was to bring in DM as an unofficial mascot or Figure Person. This was because DM was a real person, with a face and name, and a real life story we can relate to. The more rapport you have with your audience, the more Fluid your memes flow in and around that audience. So to fix this primal coding we had to demote AL from leader to top peer and unofficially use DM as the central person. This was done by me and others using his name over and over again, talking about his life, and also importing many DM "memes" from Reichsfolk and The Numinous Way into the ONA.

I would say that AL is very good at building up the ONA primal coding of Sacred Words. Each few months that passes a few new creative and original words are added to the ONA Lexicon. I'll talk about this subject more in detail later since I believe that this Primal Coding is one of our most influential and psychologically seductive tools we as the ONA can refine and use to our advantage. In my other essay I dropped a big clew as to why these Sacred Words and Lexicon is very important to a group: it offers the user a personal means of Self-Expression. Let your most passionate fans sell your product for you with their natural desire to express themselves with your product. We're not selling people a worldview, paradigm, belief system, ideology, or whatever. We are giving to those who resonates with our service the Means to develop such things, using our Product. In the same way that Adobe does not sell files and corporate presentations with their PDF software and Pdf making programs. They offer a Service or Means for corporations to express themselves using Adobe product. That's the little trick or twist. Google Android, Apple iPhone, and now Windows sell a service whereby their market can express themselves with that service and product. Why is this primal coding important? Because what are we all in the business of doing? Why do many of us get into arguments and debates? To sell and distribute OUR MEMES. To make Our Memes circulate. Thus, the best subtle way to make those memes circulate is to engineer memes with meanings which are used as expressive words in Language. Think about the power of Language has on us and our perception.

Brand Hijack

Knowing how to primal code your business and customers into a tribe to generate more coherency, residual consumption, and a stronger collective identity is all great and insures to a certain extent that your market does not vaporize so easily; but it does not guarantee Longevity and Market Domination. A different marketing strategy must be used to generate those. It's called Brand Hijacking. "Brand Hijack" is the title of the second book which had the most influence on me and how I work with the ONA from behind the scene with the other "Family Business Associates." Brand Hijacking and its marketing strategy actually referred to as "Tribal Marketing," is the current corporate method of marketing and advertizing. Think about how much money the advertizing industry generates a year and you'll understand why I would rather take the advice of a very knowledgeable and experience marketer and advertizing industry than from anybody in the occult.

It would be hard to understand the concept of Brand Hijack and Tribal Marketing without first understanding the very old and outdated way of marketing and advertizing. Now you know were I get all my tribal influences and views from: my own culture, Tribal Primal Coding, & Tribal Marketing.

The old and outdated way of selling product is say you have made 10 coffee mugs and you want to sell your shit to make money. You have two or three outdated options to use. You can sell your mugs door to door. You can buy ads advertising your mugs and hope that a few people will bite and buy. Or you can hire others to sell your mugs. The basic idea to pay attention to is that the "traffic" is either directed at singled out people or to a generic crowd where you just hope for the best. This became costly for intelligent corporation. God doesn't play with dice as Einstein said, and neither do filthy rich corporations. Buying random ads to sell your product to a undefined market hoping for a bite means eventual bankruptcy in business.

This outdated 1980's way of marketing also corresponds with the "strategy" many failure internet cult leaders use also. Typically their "marketing strategy" consists of registering an account at MySatan and then trolling people's profiles leaving random people with invites to join their supercool cult! This strategy is also utilized by Aquino of the now technically defunct Temple of Set over at a large Satanic Forum. Usually Aquino's "marketing strategy" is to put all ONA users in the site on ignore, put all users who debate him on ignore, call people stooges, and talk about his eBooks and the cosmic significance of the year 1975 every chance he gets, even if the posts have nothing to do with anything his eBooks talks about. So much for the Aeon of Set.

Tribal Marketing is the opposite of this out dated way of selling stuff. In current business talk a "tribe" is a Brand Tribe, meaning a visibly cohesive or coherent social order or Subculture which has formed around a specific Brand. You don't market your shit to individual people. You sell your shit to the entire Brand Tribe.

A quick example of a Brand Tribe is the very real and visible Subculture build around basketball. You have the tribal warriors who are the actual team players, the tribal colors, the tribal markings, the tribal wardrobe, tribal cheerleaders, this Brand Tribe has its own collective identity, way of life, language/dialect, taste in music, etc. So as a modern corporation like say NIKE, you make shoes and instead of selling them to individuals or putting up generic ads, what you do is pay the most popular figures in this Subculture to wear your shoes. The whole social order and human nature literally does the rest of the work for you. The popular guy's people sees him wearing Nike shoes and something happens called a Brand Hijack, which is when the entire Tribe literally Hijacks that shoe brand to use as a Extension or add-on to their already existing Tribal Repertoire/Identity. Another example with Nike is cross market venues like when Nike makes Golf balls, and Gold gloves, and Gold wardrobe. How do you induce a Brand Hijack in your desired market? First of all what would be the desired Brand Tribe [subculture] in this case? The Golfing people. Who's the most well known, well respected, or popular figure in this Brand Tribe? Tiger Woods. Pay him to use your balls, gloves, and attire, and the social dynamics of that subculture will do the rest.

The other half of tribal marketing is the concept of Brand Hijacking itself. The idea of brand hijacking has a lot to do with Relevancy of Service or Product. The more irrelevant you are to a market, the more bankrupt you will be as a company. In the business sector Irrelevancy means you and your executives will be eating shit. What causes Irrelevancy is something called Market Trends. When there is a significant Shift in Demographics a corporation knows there will be a shift in market trends. What do we mean by a "shift in demographics" in plain usable English? It's when an old generation dies out and a new generation emerges with their own needs. Or when a significant subculture or market vaporizes and a new subculture or market emerges. If as a corporation you don't keep up with the dynamic shifts and needs of each generation, and/or subculture, then as time passes you grow more irrelevant and will be replaced by more relevant corporations and their products and services. Two great examples of real high profile products and services that are struggling and fighting to be Relevant to the people and mindset of today are Newspapers and the Yellowpages.

An example of this phenomenon would be say we owned RCA which makes televisions. The year is 1970. Our television sets are top of the line black and white TV sets, with those knobs you have to manually turn. You can be the CEO. So as I wander about the general public I hear about some company who has the crazy idea of making color screen TV sets, and this other corporation has made all these posters and ads hyping their novel idea with pictures of TV screens with color. I notice this has generated a significant or visible change in the market which is a potential shift in the market. So I go to tell you as the CEO: "Sir, there's a small group of young punks who want color screen TV sets, I think that might be a shift in the market. Perhaps we should make color screen TV's?" Then you say: "Fuck that shit! Since when did emo kids dictate our product line? Only gay people like color! RCA is a traditional family business! We make traditional black and white TV's. There will be plenty of people out there to buy our great products forever." What do you predict will happen when the 80's comes to our RCA business? That's irrelevancy and relevancy of Product or Service to a Market and Mindset.

Brand Hijack is when you allow your most passionate fanbased market to literally hijack your service or product where they are able to take that service or product into a direction which they want and need. This helps keep relevance. They don't run your company, they just help transform some of your product into new things they want or need. An example I used with DL was Apple Inc. For a very long time they were second rate and competing in a sea of IBM compatible computer stuff. There were times when they were just barely above bankruptcy. But then they caught a trend which was this new market for mp3 players. From this they produced the iPod. The iPod is not a "traditional" Apple computer product, but that "new" product kept Apple relevant to a market and led those interested to gradually buy the more “traditional” items. Then when they allowed their fanbase market to take their iPod in their own direction gradually the iPhone was made to meet the desires and needs of their growing market. Today, Apple has beat Exxon as the Top corporation. I think MicroSuck is third or something?

So me and DL were talking about this idea of Brand Hijack to keep things moving and evolving and relevant. He understood and did what he had to do on his end. Which was when AL allowed me and WSA to literally Hijack the ONA. I tried to explain to DL that the WSA to the ONA was just an iPod to Apple. It's weird, it's novel, it's not very Satanic or Traditional, but it's an ONA Product/Nexion which will lead the market to the more Traditional stuff, as well as to the Reichsfolk and Numinous Way items. Sometimes when I wrote something, AL would be nice enough to show his support by writing a new ONA MS supporting the ideas I shared, but making them more Traditional sounding and adding his own novel ideas to the mix.

If you understand the power of Relevancy and Irrelevancy, then you'll get to know how a company – within the flow of Time – can eventually dominate a market. I'll use China as a quick example to balance my talk about 'markets' and stuff. Those are just word I am using to covey an essence that does not actually have to do with selling stuff to customers. In ancient times you have a group of people living along the Yellow River, who became a coherent culture. Around the area were many other people and tribes. But this Yellow River culture over time spread its memes to a target market. When I use the word meme I don't always mean an “ideation.” They are two different things. An ideation would be an idea, a thought, a belief, a constituent part of an ideology. A “meme” is a word used to describe ‘bits or constituent aspects of a Culture,’ and the Culture would be described as a ‘memplex.’ A meme is the act of waving ‘hello,’ nodding your head to mean yes, carrying baskets and things on your head, using mortar to lay brick, feeding scraps to your pigs, shaking hands, driving on the right or left side, styles of art such as calligraphy, styles of martial arts of a culture, in door plumbing is a meme, flushing toilets is a meme, the act of making silk from worms is a cultural meme. None of these things I named is something you Believe in. They are “doable” or cultivatable aspects of a culture which make up a living culture.

So you have this very coherent culture of early “Han” Chinese form. They come with their own memplex which means everything for their culture to their “civilization.” They sell or market their cities, its benefits, and such to their market which are the ‘feral’ tribes/people. They also spread their memplex via war. Both acts spread Han Memes. Until after 4000 years we have an entire something called the “Sinosphere,” which is all of East Asia and Southeast Asia that is Influenced and Inspired by those Han Memes. In groups of people and countries closest to the Han Epicenter, Han Memes displaced these people's native cultural memes. So you have Japanese people using Chinese characters, using Chinese style calligraphy; while other Han memes were adopted and adapted, like the Japanese kimono being an adaptation of the older Chinese ‘Hanfu.’ What's a Han meme that went all the way to India in ancient times? Silk, where do you think saris come from: Hanfu? If the Han memplex were a Corporation we can say that they dominate the market of their sector which is the Sinosphere. Where did all the hundreds of ancient memplexes go over time? They got dismantled, they became irrelevant, couldn't compete with Han Memes. We see this same phenomenon with the American secularist memplex, which we sometimes call Americanism. Everybody wants to be America around the world. This has shit to do with a belief system and the spreading of ideology. That's not what a "memplex" is. Unless you believe blue jeans, coka cola, rap music, basketball, hot dogs, Bay Watch, and secular way of life, are belief sets of some American ideological cult.

Which brings us to a possible question some dense people might ask: Why bother bother spreading memplexes? A memplex is a VEHICLE that transmits the Cultural meme to people. Do you value your secular way of life in America? That's a meme, without the memplex that brought that way of life to your awareness, would you even have a means to Do or Act out this secularist way of life? As a Southeast Asian Culture do you value the practice or greeting people by clasping your hands? Where would that practice be if the culture itself is gone to convey that practice to you? Do you like the Act of making money? Would you still have a means to make that money without the functioning memplex developed by Corporations and banking world? Do you like fishing? That's a meme. How do you do or act out that meme without a boat to put your ass into a lake or the memplex of fishing hobbyists that evolved you your fishing line, fishing hooks, sinker, and canned bait? When I use the word meme and memplex I don't mean always an ideation and ideological belief system. How do you do something, if the MEANS to get your ass to even be aware that you can do it were not there?

We can talk about the practical nature and side of ONA and pathei-mathos and sinister this and sinister that all we want, but none of us Dreccians or Niners doing and living this way, would have ever been aware of such ways/memes if the ONA as a memplex did not exist, along with its sister memplexes Reichsfolk and The Numinous Way. How do you tell yourself that you are going to cultivate pathei-mathos to generate personal gnosis, if DM didn't exist, or more importantly if the Vehicle presencing his memes did not exist to get those memes to you? And this is why we are talking about all this business and marketing stuff. RA of the Temple of THEM came up with a single word to describe what I/WSA does with and for the ONA: Expansive. I thought that was a very accurate descriptor. Since the very beginning my entire passion and focus on the ONA is strictly expansive.

Why as an expansionist Dreccian do I give a shit about growing and marketing and keeping the ONA relevant? Besides it being a personal project, I personally understand that there are valuable cultural memes in the ONA that guides us into the awareness of such practices, doings, activities as cultivation of Pathei-Mathos, etc. I would like my future children and a future unborn market to also have access to these things. I know many in ONA don't care for this aspect of ONA. But I know key people who do. It's to these key associates that will see the value of what information I drop in this essay.

So Brand Hijack in context to the ONA is the flexibility of the ONA as a thing to allow the ONA's most zealot or passionate Niners, Dreccs, users, whatever to take the ONA and develop their own product that fits their needs, world-models, and state of mind. That's half of Brand Hijacking. Best example of a company is very good and Tribal/Brand Marketing their Brand is Harley-Davidson. Who's their Tribal Market? The Motorbike clubs and 1%ers. They have engineered a trans-generational loyal market. Harleys are now a fixed accessory of this Tribal Market's group identity. Can you imagine pulling up to a group of Hell's Angels or their rivals the Mongols on a yellow Yamaha or Kawasaki motorcycle and asking them if you can join their biker gang? You wouldn't fit in their Tribe. I wonder if you can make a Jet Ski ocean gang. You know like a biker gang except they ride Kawasaki jet skis up and down the California coast marauding? Those Somali "Pirates" might like the idea.

The other half of Brand Hijacking is the production end. You watch your market try to make new shit and listen to them Express themselves and their needs or new interests carefully. You may allow them to take a product of yours and perhaps influence what it should be, but you compete with that item by making an even better product out of it for this same market. A real example with me was that 3 years ago nobody in the Satanic Subculture had anything good to say about Buddhism. Most of the demographics – as it is today – were idiots anyways. But even among the very few "intellegencia" of the subculture there was no interest.

Since high school I've used my friends to spy on other people and report data back to me for certain reasons, and out of habit I still have friends pass me intelligence I might like. Around 2.5 or so years ago a few of my spies in cyber space emailed me on different occasions that they had seen in the various occult and western tradition oriented forums they visit that a few of the more smarter ones were talking about Buddhism as if they were extracting insights from it to incorporate into what we call their "repertoire." I didn't waste any time in trying to corner a market that wasn't even formed yet. Before my spies, I was keeping close to Satanism. If you look at WSA's older Opus Vrilis writings you'll actually see that its all entirely using our own form of Satanism we called Progressive Satanism. So after my spies told me their data, I fucking flooded the shit out of the ONA with everything I have on Buddhism and other stuff I know from my eastern side. I ended up telling DL that what we were doing was merging the best of the West with the best of the East into the ONA. Unfortunately I got that idea from Deepak Chopra. Another unfortunate thing is I like Deepak Chopra because he really knows how to mix the Western Psychology with his Eastern Hindu bullshit.

He's full of shit, but sometimes even excrement is inspiring. I was watching some boring anthropological documentary on PBS this one time about these scientists who study ancient cave people in Europe. And this one anthropologist guy with an English accent said to his friend in the cave with him – it's like English people only make documentaries – said in his English accent which can make anything sound horribly intelligent and sophisticated: "Oh look Chuck! Come here, look what what I just found!" His friend says: "What type of rock do you think that is?" And he goes as he holds the rock in his hand in admiration: "Chuck, this is a real treat. You see what we have here is a real Coprolite specimen! That means it's ancient petrified feces of the people that used to live here! With this back at the lab when we break it down we can discover all of the wonderful things such cave people ate in there diet, hunted, and perhaps even cultivated! Shall we go to the lab?" His friends says: "Yes, Let's!" I was thinking to myself during the whole scene: "My god, that's interesting and shit, but damn, it's a piece of shit. How do you get excited over that?"

With all this business talk on tribes, brand or tribal markets, brand hijacking, and primal coding, the very dense might ask what this is all good for why bother with it. It's good for engineering Popularity. What's the one thing we should have learned in school? That the Popular group sets the trends and stays relevant in the minds of the other students. They talk about us, argue about us, debate about us, hate us, like us, etc. But all that attention is directed at us. At the end of the day as the popular crowd we still get thunk about by those other loser kids. Whereas at the end of the day those kids stop existing to us. We can't even remember their names. We do the same thing with the Popular group in ANY social setting from your job place, to sports team members, to celebrities, etc, so don't act like you don't do this.

All that Popularity goes into the realm of politics. What's the important points to look at in general politics? The most Popular, with the most Popular ideas wins the Hearts of the people, wins the support of the people, and most importantly gains the Power and sets the Policies. What's the most Popular country right now? America. How far does our Americanism, US influence, and Foreign policies in the world? Popularity in business is easy to figure out the practical use of. What the most popular computer ecosystem right now? Apple. What's the most Popular motorcycle brand in any 1%er motorcycle gang? What's the most Popular brand clothing right now? What's "Popularity" essentially mean? It means people can't stop talking or thinking about you. It means you are always on their mind. It means in their mindfield you will be relevant.

What's it mean when you have a shit load of people talking and thinking about you or your Brand? It means big money, big influence, big inspiration, and big power. What the whole functioning concept of memes? The spreading of them around. Like money, memes are worthless when they are not circulating. Which would you rather have or is actually worth something: A frozen bank account with 1 million dollars; or a normal checking account with 1000 dollars? Is a 17 trillion dollar economy worth anything frozen? Just put two and two together. The more those mundanes and outsiders can't stop talking and thinking about ONA, the more ONA will be in their field of awareness and the more our memes will spread and circulate. You pay very close attention to the current rise in the popularity of the ONA in the Satanic Subculture and you'll notice that this rise in Popularity, influx of old and new members, and influence, and power of inspiration actually coincides with the increase of third party talk. In the very beginning when nobody gave a shit about ONA, Shugz and her friends and some of us actually had to make fake profiles to pretend to be other people to talk about ONA. It's an old tactic many of us used in high school to get people talking about us. I know the majority of ONA people are in the ONA for their own reasons. But for me and a few others, the work of spreading memes, i.e.: Influence, Inspiration, Meme Fluidity, is what we're in it for.

Speaking In Tongues

There was a time when Tesla as a young man was working with Edison. The senior was telling the young Tesla that the he would like a light bulb of some sort sense he felt a growing market and demand for such a technological contraption that made artificial light with electricity his company made. So the young Tesla went to R&D on the first light bulb. Later he perfected the glass tube and plug to create a vacuum, but his problem was the Filament. Every material burned up after a while from the heat, or just fell apart. After discovering a secret mixture of metals and minerals Tesla got excited because he had made a filament that would never burn out. He ran to tell Edison the wonderful news! But Edison, being a prudential businessman said that Tesla's idea was a failure in business terms because if the filament were incorruptible, then the light bulb would last for a very long time. Which obviously meant nobody would have a need to return to buy more light bulbs! So Tesla was ordered to throw his idea away and to go find one of those other filaments he used that lasted a while but burned out. This way, the satisfied customers who had become used to the lights came back for more bulbs, and the company thus would have continued jobs to make new bulbs to redeploy into the market. Regular Customers are created in other words.

But that is not be best example of something we all use everyday, that is a ploy – trick on our minds – that we have gotten so accustom to that we can't go a day without using or employing it. What is it? Our human Language. More specifically and significantly: the Words we use to Express ourselves with and through! What's a Brand Hijack again? It's when a brand or tribe market adopts something as an accessory to its tribal identity and uses such items as a means to EXPRESS such tribal identity. Our Language is an aspect of what we believe makes us Human. We use our words as a means to express ourselves. And those of us who knows, understands that Language fucks up with our perception or reality. The thing to seriously consider is that we can put so much time attacking other people's religious, cultural, philosophical, and ideological paradigms or world-models; but yet such same people never come to realize that their very own language gives them a world-model and paradigm which they are never aware to attack. If only we could harness the trickery and tactics of Language and use it in the ONA! But first we need to deconstruct the process of language to better understand what exactly is happening.

I always thought language was telepathic in nature. Some person speaks to me and thoughts waves hit my mind and I understood. Or at least they were electrical: I heard words and they tickled my audiocenter in my brain and got translated to thoughts? I love language and I like to sometime ponder on the weird "mysteries" of language. There was this one time when my grandma had said something to me in Khmer, and not quite understanding I asked an older cousin to translate it for me. She did and I objected and said that she had given me an inaccurate translation because I could have thunk of a better one. So she asked my why I even bothered to ask her for a translation if I understood what she said.

The thing I didn't know how to explain to my older cousin at the time was that I heard the words our granny spoke, and I knew what each one meant by themselves, but as they were coming out they made no real sense. But with my cousin's translation I was able to grasp the Essence of what our granny was trying to say, but with my own better understanding of each individual word she used, I was afterward able to put together a better meaning. I actually broke what I understood granny had said to me in my own words and pictures back to her and had her pick between which one of us – me or my older cousin – had the better grasp of what she had said. I won, granny said that I had it more precisely.

Later I was thinking about this "glitch" I uncovered in my communication process with granny. Why did I not understand initially? So I began to seriously wonder where exactly in the process of language and/or communication, Comprehension actually took place. I was fooling around with simple childish statement in English which I translated in different ways into Khmer or Spanish. Which was when I stumbled upon another glitch in communication that was actually revealing, to me at least.

My simple English sentence was: "The very white cats ate many things," which makes sense to me. Then I translated this sentence into its Khmer equivalent which looks like this: "Jhma sor sor nyam sa'ey sa'ey chraun chraun," which in my Khmer weltanschauung makes complete sense and has the same exact meaning as the English statement. But I noticed that something bizarre happens if I backtranslate the Khmer sentence into English directly Word for Word, which yields this third sentence: "Cat white white eat what what many many." The third sentence had completely lost its Meaning in both my English and Khmer mindscape, even though they were English words, and even though I know the meanings of each word. This is what was wrong with me and my granny. All the words are there, it just does not compute or make any real sense. This little problem helped me get closer to where in the process of language Comprehension took place. I ruled out that Comprehension had to do with the words themselves or their meanings because of this. But why was syntax or word order or word groupings important? I couldn't answer this to myself until later when I had finally discovered how to install and used something DarkLogos suggested I give a try: PGP Encryption.

Basically PGP Encryption is an entire Process that takes place between two people usually. Each person has a private key and the public key of the other person. Person A writes something and using Person B's public key encrypts it. Then the message goes to Person B who uses his private key to decrypt it. And that's it. It doesn't work if Person A used Person B's public key to encrypt something and gave this coded message to other people because they don't have the proper private key to decode it. The interesting thing about this whole process to me is that 99% of the whole process that transacts between Person A & Person B takes place out of their conscious awareness and inside the PGP software. The software has all the data to actually do the encrypting and decrypting. The only thing the two parties take part in within the process of this Communication is the encoding and passing of such coded information to the other and decoding.

So from that process of PGP encryption I learned to see the process of language in the same way. There is an entire unseen "something" which is 99% of the whole process that takes place between two people communicating I did not become aware of. And I'm not talking about body language. The string of words we speak are like an encrypted message. If we have the right lingual or lexical keys we can decrypt it and Comprehend it. But again the entire transaction of the two parties sharing a statement and Comprehending what was said is only 1% of the entire process. Something very big and unseen is doing the actual "encryption" of such streams of words spoken and written. What is it? Weltanschauung.

Weltanschauung is a word I abusively use to mean the "world-ideation-model" we each have inside of us. This is something that we get from our people while we are children. It is not made of pictures and words. It is wordless and must be encoded in words and pictures. I know at least my weltanschauung is wordless because I can consciously take its wordless essence all by myself and encrypt that essence into English, Khmer, and Spanish and when I decrypt it, all three makes sense within me. But we can test this encryption and decryption thing very easily. Each person rooted in a different culture and people has a different mindscape or weltanschauung. This means that sometimes what exists as a "Constituent Particle" in my weltanschauung might not have a correspondence in yours and vice versa. So right now I can feel in my weltanschauung that there is a type of cultural thing I want to encrypt into Written English for you to Decrypt with your Weltanschauung: LARB. What is it? It doesn't matter if you have the right Alphabetical key to unlock how that word is pronounced. It still won't make any since to you unless you are Thai or very familiar with Thai cuisine.

Familiarity is the key to acquiring something new inside our mindscape or weltanschauung. Meaning it is from directly experiencing something. Larb is a "constituent particle" that exists in my weltanschauung because I've eaten it a thousand times. It's one of my favourite dishes. Every Thai person and those influenced by Thai cooking also has a corresponding constituent particle for this. If you don't have this as a constituent particle in the fabric of your weltanschauung, even if you saw a picture of it and read about it, you may intellectually Know [epistemology] but you still will not have an Understanding or genuine Comprehension on it from level of gnosis [experience/gnosiology]. Your mind can't break that code unless you go eat Larb to acquire an experience of it. Larb is ground chicken which you either steam or boil, the meet is usually crumbled into little pieces. When the meet is white you mix Thai seasoning to it and place it on a bed of salad. Then you squeeze a lime or half a lemon into the meet. Larb is supposed to be sour and spicy.

So PGP turned out to have been useful for me. It helped me isolate exactly where Comprehension takes place and in discovering where the Feeling of Understanding takes place I realized that one's weltanschauung is 99% of the process of Communication. The 1% of spoken and written words was just the inner mind's [chitta] way of literally encrypting its wordless Essence [constituent particles] into either audible transmission or visual transmission. So when I say the English word Fish, you hear that aural noise and your weltanschauung registers it as something familiar and what it does it it Draws Up into your field of awareness anything related to a Fish you may have experienced or absorbed from your people/culture, with the most relevant "Draw-Up Results" at the top of the memetic chain.

Something I love to do with my friends is use their brains as a google search. You know when you give google a word and image search? Google will give you pages of relevant results. Different races of people, people of different ages, of different cultures, and experiences, will yield a very different memetic chain of "search results," which is the part I find fascinating. In my mindscape when I hear the word Fish, the very first Image result my weltanschauung Draws Up is the visual and smell of fried fish, then the next is a plate of baked pink salmon, third is sushi with raw fish on in in the trash since I don't eat that shit, and fourth is a dolphin. I know they aren't fish in an English weltanschauung, but in Khmer they are called "Trey" which means a Fish or technically any water animal with fins. I did this Fish weltanschauung query with an older man friend I have who is in his 50 and the first result that comes to his awareness which made him smile was swordfish fishing! His first search result wasn't even a still picture, it was a 20 minute "youtube" video because he drifted into this nostalgic mindset and described to us the feel of sea water being thrown in his face, pulling that monster with your life, the boat is moving, etc. His second query result was snorkeling in in a tropical reef with colorful fish.

If you are a writer or a poet or an artist/musician you'll understand that there is first within you something wordless in Essence you feel which you desire to Express. So I'll scramble for whatever words I have at my fingertips to use to dress that wordless Essence in, in order to Express that inner stuff. If I read over it sometimes I'll say: "No, that's not the right word," and I'll go through my word list to find a word which better Captures the Essence. And you know we Feel that Essence as it should be, which is why as a writer you know some words you use don't quite Express what wordless essence you feel. I'm not an artist or musician so I don't know how they go about wrapping their wordless inner stuff. Which briefly lead me to our species three longest companion: Language, Music, and Art; in no particular order. For as long as we have been on the earth as a species, we have used those three things as a Means to Express that which is wordless and Felt within.

But I see the bigger picture very differently, so to me Language is not an end in itself. Or rather, Language; like our light spectrum; is only a small part of a much larger encompassing continuum. It certainly "looks" like a spectrum. You have the wordless weltanschauung at the far right where the waves are very wide apart. That wordless stuff becomes more orderly, or coherent, or structured. We call this our spoken language. That spoken language coagulates further into something more structured, orderly, and "denser," which is the Written part of language. Because first you start off with a wordless something felt, then you have aural frequencies, then the condensation of written words to physically see. So what's the next step in the spectrum? Experience. You see, Language [spoken & written] along with the other mediums of Expression: Art & Music; are the fabric from which our Human Cultures form. A memeplex is a Complex of memes. But this word "Culture" includes the people as component and member of such Culture.

But this continuum is a circular continuum, where one end Flows into the other. Because you have People at the very most densest/physical part of this spectrum procreate and produce new born babies with blank mind. How do those babies acquire a Weltanschauung? From being exposed to their People and Culture, the language, the music, the art, the dance, the traditional costumes, the myths, the legends, the proverbs of old people, etc, etc. All that exposure to experiential things are seeds which adds a constituent particle to that baby's developing weltanschauung. And then the cycle or spectrum starts over from the Formless to the Formful. From the Wordless to the Wyrdful.

A great example of how as children we absorb our people and culture's weltanschauung briefly took place in a forum post I found very interesting. It was about the word/idea of "Honour." So being a word of a language, where in our Human Continuum does language fall in? Somewhere in the middle. When I here the word Honour what I know, feel, and understand of it comes from my own culture and people. It is something very hard to put into words, but if you were in front of me, I can show you what Honour is, and if you lived inside my culture, you would also comes to understand what it is. But there was a Westerner of the Satanic variety who – perhaps from a culturally myopic perspective – said that Satanists should have no need for honour because honour is when you get put on a pedestal above others for something you did. And I understand what he was saying. I am half Western. You are "Honoured" in grade school with rewards for being never absent, for having good grades, for never being late; and so on. Then in things like the military you have medals and decorations to honour various things. But even though the word may be encrypted in English to look the same, is the Essence the same in the weltanschauung of different peoples and cultures? If you "look" at our Human Spectrum again, where does spoken language arise from? From Weltanschauung.

Where did that come from? From people/culture.

There is a good example to illustrate how a people seeds new particles into weltanschauung regarding the ONA and our miniature Kulture, with our own minilanguage [lexicon]. The word is Pathei-Mathos. It is a word DM uses to mean a certain thing which is experienced or cultivated for wisdom and gnosis. Those of us who found the ONA after DM did not have this Essence of Pathei-Mathos inside our weltanschauungs. It did not exist. It was “planted” and like a vine wrapping itself deep around anything in our personal past that would feel like Pathei-Mathos it that seed took root. Then we went about our lived and cultivated Pathei-Mathos. From that personal experience the corresponding particle to the word grew into a formless, wordless part of our weltanschauung make up. Such that now, we lack a proper word to even try to explain that wordless Essence inside our mindscape without the word “Pathei-Mathos.” That word for some of us as become a means to Express something inside which is Felt and wordless.

So, we put everything all together. We know that language is Deceptive and fools with our perception. But because language is convenient and allows us to express our inner weltanschauung just as music or art can, we still use it. In other words, the human desire of Self-Expression overwrites the knowing that language and words are deceptive. Some of us know that smoking and doing drugs, heavy drinking, and gambling is bad for us, but we are addicted and can't stop using the shit. We can't stop Self Expressing. It's a basic M.O. of any living organism. But now we also know that a group of people's language – words, ideas, memes, concepts, lexicon, understandings – plus their culture seeds this silint weltanschauung. So knowing all this, how do we as the ONA devise a way to spread our ONA in the medium of men? With “replayable” words, ideas, memes, concepts, lexicon, etc to use as a means for they themselves to Express their weltanschauung. “Replayable” meaning words and ideas and such that are used over and over again. The more these things are used and circulated, the better of a chance we have to remain relevant to a market or people long term wise. The more these things are used and circulated, the more Fluidity ONA memes gains, which means the more influence and power of inspiration it has on other people's minds.

The other aspect of language I find fascinating and useful is how language stays relevant to each group of people and each generation. Specifically the English language since I only have books on the history of the English language. Have you ever gone through a list of archaic words? You'll find all these words once used that have dropped off with whatever generations used them. Each decade that passes also has its own set of era specific lexicon. Some words get recycled and gain new meaning as it passes into other generations and eras. We use words today to describe our world and express ourself that people in the 50's did not. Words like: cyberspace, email, blog. The old words have been given new means, what the word “Tether” mean in current 21st English? It has something to do with tethering your computer with your Android phone. A long time ago when I was in the Fourth Grade, a Tether was a robe that links a ball to a pole and the whole thing was called tether ball. I never played it, it looked stupid.

Language also cleverly shapeshifts itself inside little groups and subcultures to stay relevant. Each subculture will develop their own add-on lexicon to the English language. Most of the time these subculture specific words stays in their subculture, but sometimes such words seeps abroad into the main body of the language. If you know your tribes, you can trace the origins of words used. How many words do we use today that originated from the old Beatnik subculture and Hippy, Free Love thing? "Score," what subculture does that come from? "Right on," where did that one come from? "Epic & Fail," where did that come from? "Wat up G?" That came from the Five Percenters, G means God originally which is what a male 5%er is called. "On the level," what tribe did that come from? Freemasonry. What subculture did, "that's how we roll," come from? "Guru," as an English word, where did that come from? From the Beatles and the market for the nouveau Hindu mysticism they were into. All these Indian smelt opportunity, left their broke ass country and reincarnated in America as Gurus with divine ancient psychedelic wisdom. Have you ever heard of TM? It's supposed to be some Transcendental Meditation where it does all sorts of mystical and magical stuff for you. You can just meditate, you need your Guru to give you a sacred Mantra to chant, because the power is in the Mantra. But that Guru relationship requires love gifts and money. Then it turns out that the fucking Punjabi fucker after getting your money simply whispered the word "Apple" in Sanskrit in your ear.

But we can see that language works like a corporation in tune to market shifts. As soon as one generation goes, English is busy making a new set of vocabulary for the new generation. When a new subculture emerges, English offers that their own set of in group word. So we can see that English grows and evolves gradually and slowly with its market. And that market has grow bigger and bigger over 500 years or so ago when its Modern Prototype appeared in England.

Other languages have a hard time competing with English. Since I understand and speak two languages, I can understand why I neglect one and almost exclusively use the other. Khmer for me just does not have all the Words I need to Express my insides and mind. It's as simple as that. There there are the "billboard attractions" that draws people's attention to English such as the English music, English books, and English movies or TV shows. Then there are the popular iconic figures that "represents" English, like all the celebrities in the entertainment and political industries. Do you ever wonder what growth effects Obama's Black face has on expanding English in Africa? How about the money, fame, and power of America? How does that effect the growth and expansion of English? Then there is the mutual benefit of speaking English, where say a Businessman from Saudi Arabia and one from Taiwan can speak English to make deals and do business?

If we say that language is all language, where any language has basic words as tools to describe the same basic things: people, boy, girl, sun, sky, eat, and so on; how is it that one language ends up growing, expanding, gaining new users, and Dominating the planet? Why do other languages drift into extinction? Besides the Popularity, power, and wealth of America, which is a big factor; English floods every corner of human interest with its own list of words and ideas; cornering the market if you will, such as: Entertainment, Politics, Science, Medicine, Spirituality/Religion, Warcraft, Diplomacy, Technology, Trade, Aerospace, etc, etc. If it's something a group of people can get interested in, the English language will make for that group their own personalized Lexicon. Gardening? Sure. Crime? That too. Hate? Yes. Love? Yes but not as much as hate. This way, it doesn't matter what you are into, or who you are because English offers you the service of Self-Expression. Whatever makes English work, all I know is that over the 500 years since the 1500's English has managed to stay relevant to the market. There were times when it had mad competition and was second or third dog for a while, but with time – aeonics – it made its way to the top of the pile.

How do we do that for the ONA? How do we learn to follow the example of a language? What is a language? It's a big mess of types of memes. What is that called a memeplex. It's not crazy for a memeplex of ONA to try and learn a few skills from the very successful memeplex of English as a language and mind culture [culture or way of thinking and seeing]. Both memeplexes are in this game for the same basic things: to spread its memes into the minds of people. How the hell does English spread 250,000 memes to 1 billion people, and ONA can't? What are the problems ONA is facing. Personally I'd like to isolate these problems too look at them so I can figure out a way around these issues. But I do know that AL or DM is playing the game right with the ONA because he is very good and creative with engineering for the ONA a Lexicon, which as we have seen is used more often for the personal Self-Expression of the User, rather than be as a used as an ideological paper weights as most ideations/memes from our closest competitors have.

You know what I mean by "ideological paperweights?" Stuff like: Shemhamphorash! The fuck is that shit and what do you do with it? Like this: la la Cthulhu F'aggits! What do you do with that shit? Paint it? Here's a semiformal ideological paper weight: Satan represents indulgence! Or this one: The LHP = Nonconformity! They call them "axioms" sometimes. They are basically idealistic clever sayings such people pull out of their asses because they sound great, or because they'd made great brick and mortar to construct a cult or new satanic religion out of. Most you can do with these "axioms" is emptily argue and debate in a circle of meaningless nothing. Another way to describe such sequences of ideations is: Empty Opinions. And these are nothing to build a religion out of. Or at least understand to keep junk like this in the mythos department.

One reason why I like my indigenous Buddhism is because the Buddha – or whoever invented proto-buddhism – tried in the Tipitaka to state that Dhamma has requirements and qualities which are Testable. Such that if and when the Buddha give you a dhamma [little d for teaching based on Dhamma] you must Test the shit just like you must Test a Theorem in Geometry. When Buddha says Kamma [work/action] produces Vipaka [fruit/result] its not just an empty opinion or ideological paper weight. It should be Testable and Provable to be Accurate. So you go out and commit a kamma and watch to see if that kamma manifests a Vipaka. If it does it is not a something you Believe in. It is an Understanding and a Knowing. And in the Knowing you are thus able to adjust your kamma to produce the fruit or results you needs or want in life. In geometry we had this Postulate which states that "Right angles are Congruent." And in our work books we had to prove them true or false. If they were false or inaccurate you throw the Postulate out. If they prove to be true, they become a Theorem. But a Theorem is not "Fact," it's just Accurate where we can use such Theorem to Predict things with. So with my Right angles are congruent Theorem, I can make the prediction: "All right angles in the universe are equally 90 degrees everywhere!" And I can be sure to a certain extent that my prediction might be accurate. I don't Believe in the Theorem. I use it to try and gain a better understanding of things.

It's the same way with something in ONA like "Pathei-Mathos," according to how DM and ONA have come to understand this term. It's not an empty opinion or axiom out of anybody's ass pull out because it sounds really cool. It simply means Learning From Hardship, Trial, Suffering, Adversity, and Experience. And it is Testable. If you think it's a crapshoot and you say to yourself: "Yeah right you can't learn nothing from experiencing tough times." You can Test it out and experiment with it to come to your own conclusions. It's not idealistic or some random empty opinion somebody put together just to give ONA some meet. So this is what I would call Practical Wisdom. Look up the word wisdom if you don't know what it actually means. It's a knowing or statement shared which has been born from a practical application of knowledge in life. Practical Wisdom is when your uncle or dad sits you down and tells you: "If you want to know how a guy will treat you in a relationship, watch closely how he behaves with his own mother. It'll save you a lot of heartache." See this wasn't a simple opinion an uncle or dad was telling you. It's born from them knowing themselves as men, knowing how they behave with their mothers, knowing how they treat their wives, and knowing the nature of other men. It is a bit of wisdom born from practical experience. And it is Testable. Unfortunately we don't test such things out. We disregard them and learn our lessons the hard way.

Constructing a whole cult or religion on empty opinions, clever sounding axioms, and ideological paper weights is pretty much like building a big and cool looking sand sculpture on the beach. It'll attract a large crowd for a while, but that crown will die down, and then the tide will come and wash it away. Since 1969 when the Satanic Bible came out how many would be LaVey clones and Church of Satan clone organizations have come, beefed up their org with great sounding paperweights, which have all lost the interest of a market and were washed away by the ebb and flow of the tide of relevancy and irrelevancy? Thousands. None have out lived and out done the same three OG's that first dominated this subcultural skyline: the CoS, ToS, and ONA. ONA has withstood the test of Time. It has been 40 years and a new generation has come while an old one gone, and people today still cannot stop talking in some way about David Myatt and ONA. 40 years and those people still can't stop talking and thinking about DM and ONA. ONA isn't going anywhere. We just need to figure out how to go further. Why isn't anybody talking about any of the thousands of Satanic organizations that came and gone? Because they are all irrelevant to the minds of the market. We need to stay in their Minds and figure out ways to grow deeper into their Minds. Even if they don't become ONA, those people are walking, living, billboards and ad campaigns. Before you can tap the Resonance of a goblet, you first have to broadcast your Frequency.

Supplantation

I don't think 'supplantation' is a real word. It just means the Tion of Supplanting. That's the one other tactic I learned for studying English over the years. English has a way of not only absorbing other languages words like a sponge, in fact it freely does so unlike many other languages. But English has a sneaky way of supplanting native words of other languages with its own words. It gets to the point where there's no point in speaking your native language anyways when half of its words came from English. Reminds me of this documentary I once watched on the Discovery Channel about birds. There was this one bird that was so lazy to make her own nest she just laid her two eggs into some other species of bird's nest with eggs in it already. The eggs looked the same, except the nest robber's eggs were a tad bit bigger.

As I watched all four eggs hatched together, but the robber's babies were visibly bigger than the native babies. Then the robber babies started kicking their feet and pushing the native babies up over the edge of the nest until they both fell out of the nest and died. And the poor mother and father bird who owned the nest had no idea those weren't their babies. They just kept feeding the killer chicks. The really weird part was when the chicks were a couple months old. They could barely fit in their nest, and they were already twice as big as their "parents," who now had to work double as hard to find food to feed their giant babies.

As ONA, how would we learn from language in this regard? How do we rob nests and kick the babies out? How do we supplant native memes with our memes? So that we dominate a market or subculture in 10 years? By chipping gradually away at the memes that makes up the memplex of the target subculture. One meme supplanted at a time. The more irrelevant memes a subculture has – its old extra baggage – the easier it is to replace better ones in their. The more discoherent a subculture is the easier it is for an organized and coherent memplex to spread its influence inside. The only way to "destroy" a memplex is to work at replacing its memes over time. Or bleed its body base. Or wait with patients for them to die out all the while staying one step ahead of competition.

From what I have personally come to understand of the two languages I know and understand, the most Expressive one is the one I end up using. But this can be either you see. English and Khmer can be used to Express my wordless insides in different arenas. I use the English language to think in, contemplate with, and express myself on a daily basis because it is chalk full of descriptive, pliable words I can almost customize with my own means to actually in a satisfying way Express my inner Essence. But there are places even the English language can't touch to satisfy me. On a much deeper spiritual level of striving to understand and better grasp the world and myself, I fall back on Khmer and Pali words. To me these old "primitive" languages may not do as well in the outside modern world, but things like Pali and Khmer and their roots are ancient and still living. So much older than English. English may be young, vibrant, beautiful, expressive, and fast moving, fast evolving like a young person. But Pali and Khmer are like slow moving old people, aged with wisdom, whose lingusitical eyes have gazed out at the cosmos for thousands of years, whose bodies have walked thru ancient forests, temple ruins when they were freshly built. They have a wisdom of their own to impart. So I think there is a nice balance. But in both cases the reoccurring key factor I have noticed is that words and ideas I use from any of my languages I draw from don't tell me how to think, believe, and see things, but rather instead only give themselves up as a means to Express my inner wordless Essence.

But Art and Music also is Expressive isn't it? The beauty about art and music is that its very hard to force such things to mean like they are telling us how to think, act, believe, worship, and see things. Art and Music – unlike language – is more purely a means for a person to Express their inner wordless Being. I'm not an artist, but I love art, specifically black and white photography. I am drawn beyond words to some black and white pictures taken, perhaps of some trees and how a light twists, or a freckle on someone's face; something I see "behind" or "within" that picture draw me to it and makes me feel something attachful inside because it feels almost as those such pictures in someway is a reflection of a formless "something" from within me. These are pictures you find yourself losing yourself in, where the world and surrounds around you fade. But even art is not really free from the fool. A fool who is empathy deaf and blind can't feel or apprehend the essence beneath words, poetry, art, or music. They will grasp only the superficial and so they will intellectualize it, philosophize it, and wave their superficialisms around at people. It's like staring at the real Venus de Milo standing right in front of it lost in the ancient history and beauty and essence of it. Then some superficial guy comes along and stands by you looking at it for a while and looks at you because he wants to tell you his thoughts, and he says: "I don't see what the big deal is do you? You wanna know my thoughts? It's telling you love hurts. That's why her arms fell off. And it's true! Love hurt, ain't that the truth. Just stay away from it."

The thing is once the mind has found itself a means to express its laden insides, it'll reuse the means over and over again. You watch a real artist and you'll see over and over again they are obsessed with Expressing "something" wordless and capturing that something right somehow in pictures of different kinds. Musicians are the same way. They develop a obsession or passion to Express something within through their music. It must be heard with their ears. They'll spend year after year composing their symphonies or modern music. Poets are the same way. Writers likewise. Some of the most fantastic fiction writers were also insane in that writing simple fiction wasn't enough for people like Tolkien. He had to invent an entire world full of people and entire languages. All this were Expressions of something wordless, alive, yearning, and desiring to be given form and Expressed. Language – if we pay attention – is our easier and every day way for this invisible and formless something to wrap its wordless essence into spoken words and written words in diaries or journals or blogs. Just to be Expressed. And the more useful these means are for us to express that inner formless thing, the more relevant it is to us.

I'm trying to say something that feels simple inside across this essay, about the ONA and another potential and possibility that it has at its disposal which no other institution resembling any kind of competition has ventured into yet. The ONA already has a large list of vocabulary in its Lexicon. Everyone of these words can and have been used not so much to dictate what anybody should believe, but rather these words and ideas are used most often by us to dress up or give form to what is wordless and formless inside of us. So that these inner things are Expressible. And so the more words, ideas, concepts, ONA has in its Lexicon the more ONA offers a 'service' for ONA Users to Express their own personal weltanschauung or whatever you chose to call it. This way there is a balance between the outer [exoteric] Kulture presented to the User with the medium of expression of each of our inner [esoteric] Essence.

I learned how to balance the Outside stuff of Buddhism with the Innerside stuff of the Buddhist I am from a friend of mine I met in college. He was was Japanese and was going to school out here. He spoke very good English. We had Buddhism in common. He was curious about my Theravada Buddhism so he would have me explain things to him as he asked me questions. Then I was curious about his form of Buddhism. He gave me a technical Japanese name of the form and school but I can't remember. He just said it was Minimalist Zen. He said it was very, very different from how I teach him about Theravada. Minimalist Zen he says has nothing, absolutely nothing. No beliefs, no writings, no teachings, nothing! You must start from the very beginning of everything he says to me. He draws a character of a Sun on a paper and says his teacher drew this character and told him to sit and meditate [zazen] and ponder on the Sun for 1 year. Then on the moon for 1 year. Then on the space between the sun and moon for one year. Then on the sky for one year. Then on the ground for one year. So on till you meditate on a tree for one year, and a fruit for one year. So on until you grow old or run out of things to meditate on. As you do that though, in that deep silence there is something inside that will subtly gives you “feelings” about what you are meditating on for that year. Not thoughts and ideas. But feelings from the Heart-Mind. A Knowing beyond knowing. Then you move on to the next thing. And if you need to teach or share ideas with others, you just find words to express what you have mediated on.

There are teachings, ideologies, philosophies, written scriptures, culture even, etc, which all come from a source outside of You. But there are things just as valuable – if not more so – that are born from within. If you ever mindfully pay attention to how you actually learn from experience, you realize that the outer circumstance or situation only triggers an Inner Apprehension and an Innerside born Understanding. That thing my Minimalist Zen friend taught me was a long and dedicated training technique to shut the conscious mind’s chattering down, and to learn to once again allow the Heart-Mind to speak. It’s this Heart-Mind that our realizations or experience born Understandings arises. We know that the conscious mind is not very smart, even if it is smart. But we often go ahead and allow another person to give us scriptures, teachings, their intellectual rambling to us, when we know such people are no more smarter and aware about reality than we are. Just because some guy has written a book doesn’t mean he’s uncovered the mysteries of the universe. It’s just a book. There are great insights to be found Outside. But there is a source of insight and understanding inside we most oftentimes neglect and aren’t even aware of.

So what I do is use that minimalist zen method of shutting mind, and going inside to dwell on a single idea or key word in Buddhism. Dwell on meaning if you strike a bell it first rings. You let go of the ring and dwell on the resonance afterward that. When you dwell on the word or idea of Vipaka you think of what it means real quick. Let that first ring/thought go, and then dwell on the resonance after the thought. You want to stop the thought process and only draw out the Essence of the idea. You feel it, not think it. There is nothing to think or believe. No more than you can believe in anger. It is felt and experienced inside as whatever it is. When you are familiar with that essence or feeling of anger, then you may figure out how exactly to put it into words later. You may describe it as being hot and red or something for example. Just to “know” it in your own Heart-Mind is enough. But what’s all this got to do with the ONA? Nothing directly. But learn to balance your shit with the Outer Kulture and with your own inner Cultivation. Beside we have a word that approximates this in ONA anyways: Acausal Knowing. There are a few other words that captures the essence of this also elsewhere in the ONA. Some schools of Buddhism turn simple concepts similar to Acausal Knowing into their entire school praxis.

There is a use for acausal knowing: balance of the outer memeplex with inner personal reflection. You learn to turn inward for insights rather than outward. Over time when you get better at it, all that wordless knowing will bubble out wanting to be Expressed somehow. That’s when you go find all of your words, pictures, music, ideas, concepts to dress these things in. That’s when you are forced to be creative to make your own words up to convey that formless stuff. That’s when our ONA words will find more uses to help us Express that inner stuff. If we put into a fighting ring a Living Insight born in this way or born from experience with a ideological meme some person pulled out of their asses to give superficial meet to their venue, which would win? The dead one or the Living one? That's where this leads back to. Our closest "competitor institutions" are constructed with nothing but ideological idealistic paperweights. And that shit for the past 50 years has been the staple of Satanism in its many forms and the larger "occult," Western Tradition thing. They have nothing on ONA as long as we're working with practical wisdom, living insights, pathei-mathos. If we fire blanks like they are, then nobody is going any where.

Over the past 3 years, when I write I share or express my own personal inner born insights of things. They are not super duper illuminating. But I just try to share living stuff to balance all the make believe stuff out there in Satanism Land. As opposed to what? What's the other stuff? Stuff people jobble together like: "A true Satanist of the real Left Hand Path is his own God foreva!" That's sounds nice doesn't it, but where did these guys get this from? Did it come from experience? Did it come from deep personal reflection of Life? Was that statement born from some occult grasping of the Cosmos? Is it testable? Did the originator test it? Maybe it was partly born from a reacting to a bitter feeling against Christianity? Perhaps it's born from a desire to believe it to compensate for a lack of something? Or maybe some guy was trying to write a book, start his own internet religion, and be a high priest to look good in the eyes of mental cripples. There are plenty of these trash ideations laying around the LHP Subculture. Here's one: "Luciferians are on a quest for Enlightenment and Apotheosis!" Or this one has and its relatives: "Satan was a Sumerian king from Nibiru!" makes one seriously wonder if people in the occult and LHP subculture are out looking to be "enlightened" with shit like this. Maybe.

But that's okay. There was a time when people believed the word was flat and when the childish stories out of the bible satisfied their hunger for wisdom. We see that today we are smarter and so all that old world ideations, myths, empty opinions, are all dead and irrelevant. It's the same with people today and their occult, LHP, mundane Satanism bullshit. They are retarded now. But they are not our audience. The next generation and the next one after them, and so on – those who will want more than bullshit empty opinions– will search for the meaningful living insights born from people's experiences and living, and a real quest of striving to apprehend the Cosmos & themselves. As long as ONA keeps doing what we are collectively doing; keeping the numinous balanced with the sinister, struggling to dis-cover what we are, what the Cosmos is, and working toward that New Humanity, and New Way of Life. We'll be fine. Let these retards be retarded. They will die in 100 years. ONA has long term objective. We've been around for 40 years. If we keep on our toes, we'll be here for another generation who will add their insights and add to our Kulture.

What I would like to see – or maybe I have been seeing it – is for the ONA to learn to slowly and naturally evolve like a living language and living culture does. With a language like English you'll see that it unashamedly exfoliates old words into some Archaic word space, then it borrows words and generates neologisms and allows its most passionate users to create their own words or reuse old words with new meanings. So slowly the language does change drastically over time. Today's English and the English of King James [the bible guy] are very different. But thought all that change there is the Core of English which has faithfully remained very much the same since ancient times. This would be the Core Anglo-Saxon words we still us today like: Should, Not, Sky, Father, Home, Mother, House, I, Me, And, Knife, Ugly, Husband, etc.

Over time a culture will also move across Time like language. Some observances and practices will fall out of usage, while new ones are borrowed or developed. But no matter what changes there is a Core to that Culture that remains stable and unchanged. Africa, Russia and China would be great example since those places underwent frequent social, economic, cultural, and political upheaval and change. Even though China has changed outfits often first being an empire, then Mao Ching Chong came and had his Cultural Revolution where they all became communists. Now they're doing capitalism? But through all that change there is still a Core part of Chinese Culture that is Chinese since ancient times like its writing, its cuisine, its architecture, its family life, its folk ways, its musical instruments, its martial arts, etc.

And so the ONA as a living acausal entity should also slowly evolve unashamedly. Old ideas no longer relevant should become Archaic and saved for historical review; new words, ideas, concepts, should be added; it's most creative and passionate Users should add their own things to it. But a Core something should remain constant. Not just the 5 Core Principles, but more stuff that is ONA since olden times that will always make it ONA.

We've already seen over the 40 [39] years that as long as ONA exists it has no problem inspiring into existence new orders and temples. I'm not knowledgeable with this, but others can make a long list of organizations that came and gone who were inspired into being because of the ONA. We've also seen ONA having no problem Influencing people outside of its sphere. We've also seen over the years that ONA does not have trouble spreading its words, ideas, and concepts. The idea that Satanism is a personal struggle towards self enlightenment and self betterment was an ONA concept since day one. This was a time when Satanism in the popculture's Satanism has to do with indulgence and being your own god. Now most of the Satanic Subculture has come to understand that self betterment and self enlightenment is their Satanism. I'd say that ONA was or is ahead of its time, but nothing is ahead of Time. It's more accurate to say that ONA is and will always be ahead of the people: the mundanes. So as long as we keep doing what we have been doing, work on balancing the ONA's teaching with praxis and means of Self-Expression; we'll continue to influence, inspire, induce talk, and spread our memes.

I really like what the ONA has become. It's come along way in only 4 years. All that planing and setting into motion change has bore Fruit for everyone involved. The coolest part about ONA is that it is all Ours. It's a private Association of a small group of people. A private country club. And the "vetting" process for "membership" seems to work very well, because 'looking' around, I see equals and those better, more talented, and more intelligent then me. Nobody has any goofy titles. Everyone is unique. Some Niners are Traditional Satanists, some just Satanists, some are Buddhists, some just mystics, some are liberal, I'm conservative, some Nazi, some Ethnic, some fascists, some more into enlightened aristocracy. But we all have something 'Myattian' in common. Let's hope this goes on for another 40 years. If DM by himself and a few others can bring the ONA across Time for us in our present; all we need is one or two equally dedicated Dreccs and Niners to carry this ONA 40 years into our future for the next generation to take it into a direction they will need.

THE ESSENCE OF REICHSFOLK CULTURE

The Essence of Reichsfolk Culture

The term “Reichsfolk Culture” was put together by Chloe 352 of ONA from merging the concept of the Reichsfolk Declaration of Ethical National Socialism with what David Myatt once called the Numinous Way of Folk Culture. Reichsfolk Culture is the Foundation of the Sinister Tribe of the White Star (WSA352), while the ONA is its Cornerstone.

Viewing Ethical National Socialism from a Numinous Way perspective thus causes incongruities to be seen – that is to say that the two systems outwardly do not fit together so well. From a Numinous Way perspective the two words in “National-Socialism” are immoral because it describes an actual abstract thing – a Nation-State.

At first we opted to get rid of the word “National-Socialism” altogether, but being ONA we recognized that those two words still have a certain useful heretical stigma and essence associated with it which can be used as a tool for sinister subversion, nonetheless. So instead of getting rid of the terminology, we brought the term from its abstract – old aeonic state, down to a tribal state by using the actual and original definition of the word “Nation.”

As the New Oxford American Dictionary states – “A nation is a body of people who share a real or imagined common history, culture, language or ethnic origin.” The word itself comes from the Latin “Natio” which meant ‘the act of being born;’ ‘the goddess of birth;’ a ‘breed, stock, kind, or species;’ or a ‘tribe or group of people.’

Thus Reichsfolk Culture is the common culture of this Sinister Tribe (a nation), which also commonly shares the Sinister Tradition of the ONA. The word “Socialism” in National-Socialism would therefore describe a certain world view of this Sinister Tribe of ours or it describes how this Sinister Tribe functions – its “tribal politics” of our ONA nation, if you will.

The basic concepts of “Socialism” is that each member of society or a nation/tribe which is bound together for mutual aid, mutual relief, mutual dependency, and mutual prosperity, should and must have a natural and equal access to resources and means to such prosperity. Here we not only mean access to machines and manufacturing plants, but from a more sinister angle we also mean the Mundanes – their possessions, life, energy, money – which are our resources to be commonly shared and utilized by our ONA nation/tribe... with our future sinister progeny – those of our national/tribal blood.

Socialism also believes that Capitalism concentrates power and wealth in a small group of people we call the Ten Percenters. Dreccian Socialism believes that Capitalism is a means and method of human exploitation... more importantly – OUR people’s exploitation. When we say “our people” we mean Dreccians of the Sinister Tradition. There is something inherently wrong from a Numinous Way perspective of exploiting people with Capitalism and that is it creates the condition of mass human suffering in a large segment of humanity. Such suffering often manifests wyrdfully as extreme poverty of millions, and the destruction of nature.

Our Dreccian National-Socialism also believes that Communism is just pathetic. It’s not even worth mentioning, but we’ll briefly talk about it anyways. We Dreccians do not believe in some gay ass universal equality, nor do we believe that mundanes have it in their nature to share everything, give up property (thus we have to steal it from them), or work for the common good of some abstraction referred to as “The People.” Althoe some concepts annexed by Magian Communism is noble, it is overall stupid none the less – the same kind of ignorant very silly stupidity that is found in the Magian Christian “axiom” “Love Thy Neighbor.” No Christian fool has ever lived up to those simple three words. It is foolish to believe that mundanes are inherently all loving and all sharing. Communism is just a political memeplex created by Jews and utilized by a political regime to enchant the mass of mundanes by telling them what they want to believe – by feeding their fantasies. The strategy of those Communist stooges is worthy to note, but in the end the mundane fools end up used, abused, and exploited as they are used, abused, and exploited in Magian Capitalism.

Then you ask – what is the difference between “utilizing” mundanes and exploiting them? The difference is in whose hands the mundanes are in and to what end these mundanes are used. The difference is the End. Where we as Dreccians naturally come together to form cooperative tribes to pool our resources and synergy to planned Ends, these mundanes do not. Thus, it is the responsibility of the Noble Ariya – the Enlightened and Superior Breed of Humanity – to utilize the synergic or collective force of the Anariya/mundanes to the same planned End, Aim, or Goal. That End being the conscious evolution of humanity and human civilization toward its greatest conceivable numinous potential.

The Means To The End

Reichsfolk Culture states that the anariya are naturally incapable of thinking for themselves – in a sense, it can be simply said that the anariya are stupid, or Idiot Humans. Did mother nature make a mistake? Why did nature allow for stupidity to exist if She works towards evolving her animals to become intelligent? The first answer to this question is that intelligence – the mental ability to think and solve problems – does not mean shit to Nature. To prove this statement, we must perform a thought experiment.

If you were mother nature, and you planned for the earth and its species to continually exist for 3 billions years then your most important duty is to see that the most proven and effective DNA – not intelligence – is passed down to each new generation. Now, there are two methods of passing genes down – a) the solitary method, and b) the collective method.

The solitary method is a lone creature living by itself and sporadically passing its genes down if and when it finds a mate. The collective method is a group of organisms living together circulating their genes with each other and passing those genes down to other groups. Which method is nature life insurance policy? A solitary organism is dependent on solely itself for survival. It must feed itself, protect itself from climate and predators. If it dies for some reason, its DNA is not passed down. A group of organisms mutually depend on each other for survival. If you were nature, and you wanted 3 billion or more years of continuous causal life, which method would you place your bet on?

It is the collective or cooperative nature of a species or even an ecosystem which insures its continual survival not intelligence. Intelligence is a luxury enjoyed after survival is insured. This is why ants make up 25% of the entire earth's biomass. Based on biomass alone, the coherency of ants makes them officially the earth's most organized, most successful, dominant, and lucrative species.

The second reason why nature has allowed so many stupid people to exist is because humanity as a whole superorganism is in itself an integrated system, very much like an ant colony is. Equality is an abstract illusion. Not every one is a shoemaker. Not everyone is a scientist. Not every ant is a queen, not every ant a soldier. There will be those in the human collective that have no worth other than their force of labor, while others are born with the brilliant mind to use that collective force to bring humanity forward.

No individual human has ever single handedly evolved humanity. Not Buddha, not Hitler. It has always been a collective effort of a few able minds utilizing the collective force of the many to manifest certain aims and objective. The sectarian Dharma of Buddhism, or the secular ideology of German NS were only the Cohesion or Coherency Factor, which manifested such collective force needed to accomplish the same ends – Civilization... or more specifically – Empire/Imperium.

Reichfolk Culture believes that it is via civilization or imperium that the human species is progressed and gradually evolved forward to greater heights. It is thru empire that major sections of humanity is impressed and imprinted with new concepts and ideas that permanently changes our species and gradually brings it toward its highest potential. Civilization, or empire, or what is also known as a Kalifa (Caliphate) is the most effective means of collective human progression.

Thus the word “Reich” in our Reichfolk Culture has a specific meaning and essence to it. It esoterically is a pageantry or costume party in which the Sinister Nobility becomes scripted characters or living mythos even, to magically, collectively, religiously, and or politically enchant the mass. Exoterically – as it is seen by the mundane mass – a “Reich” takes on the basic meaning of its Germanic essence.

A Reich wasn't just an empire or monarchal system. The ancient Germanic tribes had a certain democratic quality to them during ancient times when they would each elect a Graf or tribal leader. Within certain related tribes of kinfolk, these grafes in turn would elect a king from qualified people. This same essentially Germanic style of electing their executive leaders was even present and practiced in the Germanic Holy Roman Empire, where the Emperor of the Reich was elected from qualified people.

Thus in Reichfolk Culture, the word Reich describes an imperium, empire, or caliphate, which is governed by an elected executive officer, and is managed by an enlightened aristocracy – the Ariya. It must be kept in mind that the executive officer of a Reich is not the leader of the enlightened aristocracy, but only one of the Ariya who owes his or her loyalty to the enlightened aristocracy who has the power to captivate, enchant, and enthrall the anariya to the benefit of the ariya... a Vindex if you will.

It can be argued that no matter how we define and redefine the word, “empire” is still an immoral abstract nation-state; which is true... to a certain extent depending on which end of the telescope you are seeing thing with and to what End. For example, to a common believer “God” and religion is indeed abstract and impersonal, but to a pope and a priesthood, “God” and religion is a tangible – personal means of power, influence, wealth, and sex. A nation-state is the same way. To us as common 90 Percenters, the State is indeed an impersonal monstrosity of exploitation – as we should see it if we are to Liberate our enlightened selves and work our way to where we belong. To the 10 Percenters thoe, the State is a very tangible – personal means of power, influence, wealth, and sex.

It is one thing for our sinister folk to awaken from such abstract slave camps as a State. It's another thing – a silly one – to reject the usefulness and practicality of a State. How else is the ONA of the future to progress the whole of humanity forward into Galactic Imperium? Culling all the billions of them is not a rational option because it would destroy our work force to even make such a star born civilization possible? The anariya must be collectively lead by the Enlightened towards their full potential and out of suffering by a Reich which is the most effective method; for althoe we ariya can consciously evolve ourselves with our own efforts, will, and determination, to become a new type of human being, the anariya are barely conscious of their own numinous Self, nor have they the will to even quit smoking or lose weight, to evolve anything with conscious determination and will.

It is out of chromomorphic compassion, aeonic humanitarianism, and the desire for the human species as a whole to evolve towards its full potential that we Dreccians kill, support terrorism, disrupt States, destroy the status quo, instigate revolution, engage in so-called “antinomian”

“criminal” activities, and seek to forever mass annihilate the Magian and their heinous ethos off the face of the earth. It just looks bad if you see it within just one static frame of time that’s all. For surely, we cannot say that all the war, death, slaughter, and criminal acts perpetrated during the American and French Revolutions against the Crown and Papal Mitre were “bad” and pointless rebellion and slaughter. It is just the game of power struggle, the transition of an old and outdated aeon to a new aeon, and the laws of physics that the old must die to give rise to the new. What is static and in a state of inertia, as these religions and political regimes are in, requires force to move it.

Thus The Drecc must learn to keep secrets. Not everyone is intelligent enough to be enlightened. Not everyone will sacrifice their lives for a cause, not even for freedom and progression. Not everyone should be awakened. Not everyone should be ONA. Not every subject of the British Colonies in America fought for their liberation and progression. In the end a few sinister individuals utilized what religious, and political tools they had to collect enough mundane force to raise a revolution and when it was all over, the mundanes remained mundanes, while a new conglomeration of men came to power and created a new kind of civilization which still has an immense affect and influence globally... on a collective human scale.

Race and Folk

Both 352 and Myatt’s Numinous Way agrees that “race” and “folk” are themselves abstract and meaningless. It does not matter if a billion people share the same skin color and “ethnicity” as you – it’s abstract and these billions of people have absolutely nothing to do with you personally. These other people who belong to your “race” wouldn’t give two shits and a biscuit if you went hungry or homeless. What matters – what is personal – is our family and our close companions and associates with whom we share a common culture, tradition, and essence – Our clan.

The race is a product of an old aeon in which people did not have the means of locomotion to easily mingle with other groups of people. Over thousands of years the environment acts on gene selection which alters the look of a given group of humans.

Racial inferiority and superiority is thus relative due to the very fact that each “race” evolved out of adaptation to survive, dominate, and thrive in their “native” or ancestral environment. For example, I don’t care how superior the white race thinks it is, put them in Africa and they will die out of skin cancer or eventually turn dark skinned due to the high levels of ultraviolet light. Same goes with black people, put them in Viking Scandinavia and they will freeze to death or eventually turn light skinned due to the low levels of ultraviolet radiation.

Genetically white people branched out of Asians, while Asians branched out of Africans. As our Dreccian Cosmology states – we each inherit the genes of our ancestors. Thus both Asians and whites have inherited ancestral African genes. So it doesn’t matter what color your skin is. You’re just a human and we all have African genes.

Racial differentiation is only due to lack of genetic locomotion. By this we mean to say that our pre-historic human ancestors living in one part of the world... say Africa, had no way of sending their sperm to fertilize the egg of some proto-Chinese girl in the Mongol steps... it was a lack of a means, rather than an act of nature. If we observe our modern world where we have countless means of mass locomotion and migration, we see that it is actually natural and inevitable for races to mix. To what race, ethnicity, or folk does a person of mixed race belong to such as Chloe? Is she Asian or Mexican, to which ethnic group does she owe her racial allegiance to?

It's stupid to assume – given our technology and human nature – that 300 years from now this race thing will even be relevant. Especially when we take into consideration that there are 2 billion Asians (1 billion Chinese and 1 billion Asian Indians). If the Irish couldn't keep their genes to themselves in the 20th century, what makes you think any ethnic race will keep their jizz in their pants in the 24th century?

Thus unlike the political shenaniganry of old aeon German NS, Reichsfolk Culture sees race and folk as being abstract, impersonal, and un-numinous. This is not to say that the concept of race is useless. It still can be used by the Initiate of the Sinister Tradition to create racial violence and hate crime. There are a lot of stupid people out there in Mundaneland who are lost and enthralled in such abstractions as race who could be influenced via Sinister Cloaking to cull people to our advantage.

Same goes for folk. Even in a single race – such as Africans – Tutsi folks and Rwanda folks engage in mutual folk genocide. Which is fine... who are we to complain when whole masses of mundanes wish to mass cull each other off? More of this should happen to reduce the human population. Set up Uigurs against Han Chinese; Palestinians against Jews; Bosnians against Croats; bloods against crips; Muslims against the white devils. Fuck em. The more dead the better. Just as long as we Dreccians understand that this race thing is an abstraction of an old aeon which has no place among our sinister kind.

What does the mundane Homo Hubris concept of a race or ethnicity have anything to do with a sinister breed of people who claims to be emancipated from mundane thinking and mundane weltanschauung? If you are ONA and you actually believe in the racial bullshit you are using as a subversive strategy of your sinister dialectic then you need to take a close look at the mundanes you claim to be your enemy and realize you aren't no different or better.

Our Reichsfolk Culture recognizes only two breeds of humans – the superior, enlightened Ariya/Aryan and the subhuman idiot Anariya/Mundane. The essential difference and quality is not based on skin color, what plot of land one was conceived or born on, what State you were born in or what language you grew up speaking. This perspective is causal, materialistic, and fundamentally limiting. The essential difference between the Ariya and the Anariya is one of Inner Acausal Essence, "Spirit," "mental superiority."

Reichsfolk Culture uses the word "Ariya" (Pali) and "Arya" (Sanskrit) in its pre-Euro-bastardation of the word. Apparently sometime during the early 1900's some Europeans hijacked the word "Aryan" from an ethnic people not understanding its origins and essential idiomatic meaning, took it to mean the Nordic Race. When in fact many ethnic folks in ancient history have, and still do identify themselves with the term Ariya/Arya.

The first usage of the word Arya (Sanskrit), Airya (Avestan), Ariya (Old Persian), and Ariya (Pali) was among the Asian Indians and Zoroastrian Iranians in religious context meaning a person of noble spirit, high spirit, or a spiritually evolved person as opposed to the concept of "Anarya" (Sanskrit) meaning the unevolved, materialistic worldlings. The Shaivites and Shaktas also used the term to denote the same meaning – the spiritually evolved and the materialistic worldlings respectively. The Buddha and Buddhism beginning in 500bc began using the term to describe the Enlightened (Ariya) and the Unenlightened Worldlings (Anariya). In Chinese Buddhism the word Ariya is translated as "Holy" denoting a spiritually evolved and enlightened person.

Thus in every ancient usage of the term, it was never ever associated with a specific race, ethnicity, or skin color. It was always used to denote a mental capacity (enlightenment) and a state of spiritual evolution. Reichsfolk Culture uses the word Ariya/Aryan in the same spiritual way – to denote an evolved person who has the ability to think for themselves, who is spiritually awake and or enlightened to understand the Numinous Way, the nature and essence of Nature, the nature and reality of the Acausal, and the essence and reality of the Living Cosmos... what Sasna Shakta calls a Siddhi sometimes, or what Nietzsche calls the Übermensch. Anariya as is used by Reichsfolk Culture refers to the inferior breed of humanity who are asleep or enthralled in materialism and the causal World and its urban illusions; what we in the ONA calls the Mundane, or the Untermenschen to Nietzsche.

Wyrd Is The Word

The essential defining difference between the Ariya and the Anariya is not their weltanschauung – or what aspect of the cosmos they are fixated on (causal/materialism or acausal/spiritual). A difference in perspective of reality does not constitute enlightenment. The original word Arya as it was used in its native Asian Indian cultures and religious philosophies essentially describes the behavior of a person. Wyrd, or what is bastardly known as "fate" or "karma" is the essential dividing line between the superior and the inferior – the Enlightened and the Stupid.

The tantric/esoteric understanding of "karma" is that our actions manifests reactions and consequences. The word "karma" coming from the root "KiR" meaning "Action." Thus what actions we do and the reactions and consequences of these actions weaves together to manifest as our fate in life. By fate here we mean to say "that which we will inevitably experience."

The Buddha esoterically taught this concept via the 8 spoke wheel of Dharma. Each spoke representing a Step in the Eightfold Path. Right/Correct Understanding/Perception gives rise to Right Intent/Emotion. Correct Intentions/Emotions gives rise to Right Speech. What we speak is our thoughts and intent expressed verbally, which affects and influences not only our actions in the world, but the actions of others. Right action morphs as Right Living – meaning the way in which we live our lives in the causal realm. Right or Correct Living gives rise to Right Effort, that is the energy or effort we exert or contribute in our lives. Right Effort in turn gives birth to and influences Right Mindfulness or Awareness – that is what we put effort into in life becomes what we are aware of in life because we tune out everything else. Correct Awareness morphs into and influences Right Concentration – that is Awareness refines itself into focus of mind. This in turn gives birth to what we experience in life.

The Wheel is still a symbolic and esoteric symbol associated with the Old English concept of Wyrð. The word Wyrð comes from the old Norse word meaning “to become.” Wyrð itself is the name of one of the Norns, sometimes known as the Sisters of Fate; which means fate itself. The norns work their magic and influence the lives of mortals with their spindle thread. Which esoterically expresses the same thing – that what we do in this causal realm and the reactions and consequences of those actions weaves itself like the threads of a loom, which will BECOME that which we will inevitably experience – thus the entire essential meaning of the word “Causal.”

Altho the thread associated with Wyrð is more insightful and enlightening because it suggests that we are tied together by the actions we commit in life. Meaning that no person and his or her actions in life is an island which affects only them and their individual life. It ripples out and affects the lives of others around you, like the vibrations rippling thru a spider’s web affects the whole web.

So thus, the Enlightened will know that what thoughts they think, and how they perceive the world ultimately will become the reality they will experience. Such that right or correct perception becomes right or correct experience, while wrong perception becomes wrong or negative experience, i.e. Suffering.

To illustrate we can take the simple materlistic perception of the world being dead and a thing to be capitalistically exploited for personal gain and corporate wealth. That way of perceiving the world dictates or gives rise to our intent or emotions – the intent or emotion that it is ok to exploit nature. This intent manifest as what we say and how we say it to ourselves and to people around us – convincing and justifying our emotions verbally with ourselves and others. This in turn gives birth to our action – the physical exploitation of the earth. Eventually this weaves reactions and consequences as our fate or experience – environmental collapse and a possible future extinction of the human species.

Thus, it can be seen that the Anariya – stupid people – due to their ignorance and inability to grasp this simple concept ultimately are themselves responsible for their own suffering and lot in life. Thus it can be understood why vise verse, those who understand Wyrð or the esoteric steps of the Wheel, and knows how to use it, will manifest for themselves wealth, power, privilege, influence, and dominion over the anariya. We each, according to our kind, like water finding its own level, eventually find our lot and place in life to be on the Level with our own kind. The Results of our actions, in Reichsfolk Culture, speaks louder than words. For altho we can lie and bullshit our selves and each other – the Causal Results in our lives is the badge or mark of which breed we belong to. Do not judge a person or institution by what they say, teach, or preach, but rather by what Causal Results that person or institution has manifested.

The Clan

In our Reichsfolk Culture, it is our own personal Clan/Tribe – our family, our blood, our companions in life, our enclave, and loyal oath and blooded associates – is our Numinous Nation. It is not based on a hair color, eye color, or skin color, for such things are superficial, and our tribe is not one based on superficial trappings.

Our Clan is a numinous presencing of our own natural human nature. The nature of the human animal as a social organism to band together into cooperative groups. This was the way of life of our human ancestors since even before we were humans. Even the great apes and monkeys live in such cooperative clans.

We have lost that humanness due to Magian Ethos, in which the tribe was broken down into a small family – which makes it all the more easier for religion to control the family, because without an organic tribe of kin and loyal associates to depend on, the religion becomes the surrogate tribe – and that religions priests in turn become usurpers of your natural feral sovereignty. Thus your ego takes on the abstract identity of this surrogate clan – the religion you now “belong to” – expressed every time you claim “I AM Christian;” “I AM a Satanist;” rather than the numinous identity which had evolved over time that once was – “I AM Meshica;” “I AM Khmer;” “I AM Saxon...” “We were Thiuda, but now we ARE Lutheran.”

We have further lost our numinous humanness in this modern abstract secular capitalist world of ours in which even the family has been broken down into individual self reliant units who barely trusts their own mothers. In such a segregated state – without any group, clan, or tribe to belong to and depend on – the State and Corporation becomes your surrogate clan which you will depend on and slave for the rest of your life. Thus you take on the abstract superficial identity of your surrogate tribe – “I AM American;” “I AM British;” “I AM Chinese.”

These abstract surrogate tribes and their labels have no essential meaning nor relevance to you on a personal level. Just as you were mislead into believing that you belonged to the religion you were born into, so are you mislead into believing that you belong – and shall pay taxes to – the State in which you were born into. It is not the ideology of either a religion or political regime that is to be noticed and judged, for these are merely misdirective smoke and mirrors. It is there Causal Results and affect on your personally life – your happiness, your liberty, your humanness, you reconnection with the Living Cosmos; or lack thereof – that is the measure to determine the worth and value and Numinosity of such things.

Our Reichsfolk Culture, as David Myatt has written in his Numinous Way and his Ethical National-Socialism hold all religion and nation-states in contempt, guilty of the destruction of our very feral humanness; which must be destroyed by Vindex and replaced by a new, more evolved kind of civilization. In time as each Clanmate intelligently breeds with each other to eugenically give birth to each new generation, our modern tribes will gradually evolve into one that is genuinely bond not only by tradition and culture, but by blood.

This clannish nature of our organic humanness has never really left us. We humans form groups and associations based on virtually anything usable and excusable. What we called gangs today, were the disgruntled tribes of a once multiracial empire. As time passes onward, we can see these clans – whatever they are called – grow more numerous. Weather it is skinhead gangs in Europe, or street gangs in urban America, or the criminal organizations reeking havoc in Columbia, Russia, or Mexico; a change in the psyche of our species is slowly taking place, where each new generations becomes increasingly more aware and in tune with their numinous primal human nature and the pulsations of the new aeon, to join and form tribes once more. The New Aeon will be a Tribal Aeon, in which mankind rediscovers his own lost human nature. Wherein his heart beats once more, to the primal undulations of the Dark Cosmos, to once again take his place amongst the celestial and terrestrial marvels of Nature which we are an indissoluble living aspect of.

The Grand Strategy of the Great Work

The Grand Strategy of Reichsfolk Culture is based on Wyrđ, and its esoteric practical use as explained above. The key players of the Grand Strategy are the Sinister Aryan Breed. The duration is 300-400 years of chromomorphic incubation in which each successive generation of our progeny inherits our Culture and Sinister Tradition, our aims and objectives, to continue the Great Work in their own time frame, according to their means. The First and most vital step of aeonically materializing this future Reich – if you understand Wyrđ esoterically – is our perception of the world, our thoughts, our beliefs, our thinking; for these things give rise to intent, emotion, determination, and will. The clearer our initial thoughts or “envisionment” of the end result is, the better a chance it has to manifest, for as our Dreccian Cosmology states – coherency allows acausal force to flow. Coherency of thought transmutes that thought into a potent force.

Like the birth and establishment of any new world religion of political regime, the Grand Strategy of the Great Work will not be peaceful and bloodless. When Vindex comes, it will be mass genocide and red horror – a mass offer to Baphomet, our Mother of Blood. It must be kept in mind that we are not forcing our Reichsfolk Culture or Sinister Tradition onto the mundane mass, for these are our private possessions. We are instead forcing the mundanes to progress and evolve, or the collective causal results of their ignorance and stupidity will eventually destroy the earth and cause our species to suffer extinction.

In the End, after the Sickle has cut its harvest and the Trident has put the age of pisces to death, the Black Sun Saturn will once again radiate its light and reign over the prophesied Golden Age of Saturn, and things will be as it once was in the first age of Saturn, when Mankind was new on the earth, where we and nature exists in harmony, and our needs met by the bounteous abundance of that same Nature. Where each man and woman is empathetic enough with each other to not require government, laws, state, or empire. Where the only law that governs us all is the Law of Honor, Loyalty, and Duty.

Honor, Loyalty, Duty

Quote David Myatt

A Personal Revolution

The fundamental personal values of National-Socialism – the foundation of National-Socialist morality – are honour, loyalty, and duty. A National-Socialist is someone who upholds, or who strives to uphold, these personal values: someone whose personal life is governed by these values. Thus, a true or genuine National-Socialist is someone who strives to be honourable, who is loyal to those they have sworn to be loyal to, and who does their National-Socialist duty.

The purpose of these values is to civilize, for it is these values which make a person civilized and noble. That is, these values express the essence of nobility and civilization; they create, or can create, a person who possesses a civilized, a noble, a strong character. In effect, these values create or can create a better individual; they are means whereby a personal, inner, revolution can be achieved through a triumph of individual will.

Honour:

Honour is basically the natural instinct for nobility made conscious and this is done through a Code of Honour

(2). Some things are fair, and some other things are unfair. A person of noble character – someone with an inborn sense of fairness – knows or feels what is fair and what is unfair. Honour thus determines personal behaviour, and the high standards of personal behaviour which honour demands are set out by a Code of Honour. Most fundamental of all, an honourable person is prepared to die – if necessary by their own hand – rather than be dishonoured. If someone is not prepared to do this, or does not do this for the sake of their own honour, then they are not living in an honourable way. Honour is thus a hard, and simple, standard to live by, and those who are honourable thus possess a strong personal character and a purity of purpose. They are better, more noble, more civilized, more evolved individuals because of this.

Loyalty:

Loyalty, like honour, is simple to understand, and simple in practice. Loyalty is being true to a person you have sworn to be loyal to. True loyalty means taking an oath of loyalty, an oath of allegiance, to a particular person and never breaking that oath. An oath of loyalty can only be ended in two ways: (i) by the death of the person to whom you have sworn to be loyal, and (ii) by mutual agreement between you and the person given loyalty.

Thus, true loyalty, like honour, sets a high personal standard, and requires personal discipline. Fundamentally, loyalty means Comradeship – true loyalty means being a Comrade to those you have sworn to be loyal to, and never letting those Comrades down. True loyalty means aiding and assisting those Comrades even when it is personally difficult to do so – or even if it might mean one's own death. True loyalty often means placing one own self – one's own opinions for instance – second, after the person to whom you have pledged your loyalty.

Duty:

Duty is the obligation an individual has to do what is necessary and honourable. Thus, there is a duty to be loyal to those given loyalty. There is a duty to strive to live in an honourable way. For a National-Socialist, there is also the duty to promote National-Socialism, the duty to strive to act in accord with Nature's will by preserving, defending and evolving one's own folk, and the duty to strive for personal excellence.

Neglect of one's duty is a dishonourable act, and the sign of a weak personal character.

The Fundamentals of Reichsfolk Culture

Quote David Myatt

The fundamental tenets, or principles, of this way of life (or religion) are:

- 1) That there exists a supra-human Being – called the Cosmic Being – and that this Cosmic Being creates, or can create, Order from Chaos. Order is the very life of this Being. Order itself is a new, a better, more evolved, or more excellent, arrangement of things.*
- 2) That organic life itself is an expression, or manifestation, of the Order which this Cosmic Being creates, and is thus an expression of the life, the spirit, of this Being.*
- 3) That change is a natural part of the evolution of Order from Chaos and that this, for organic life, involves the organic process of birth-life-death-renewal.*
- 4) That death is not the final end of life, but the beginning of further change, a renewal of the cosmic order itself.*
- 5) That what we call Nature is the Cosmic Being – the Order created by this Being – made manifest on this planet we call Earth. The creative force, or energy, which is present in Nature, and which produces, and causes changes in, living things – including ourselves – is this Cosmic Being, living and evolving, that is, creating more Order.*
- 6) That we, as individuals, are this Cosmic Being – the very cosmos itself – made manifest. We sentient (that is, conscious and aware) beings are the striving of the Cosmic Being for more cosmic Order.*
- 7) That our evolution, as human beings, is an increase in the cosmic Order and expresses the* purpose, the life, or the will of the Cosmic Being. Thus the striving, or struggle, for order (or excellence) – for evolution toward higher forms – here on this planet, is how the Cosmic Being works on this planet of ours, and is thus natural and necessary, for without it, there would be no order and no evolution toward higher forms.

8) That the Cosmic Being exists, or functions, in us through honour (or fairness), through curiosity (or reason) and through striving (or the triumph of individual will). Thus, an honourable individual is someone who is doing the will, or accomplishing the work, of this Cosmic Being.

9) That culture, race and excellence of individual character express the will of this Being – of this Being working through Nature to bring about more Order, more diversity and more difference through evolution. Thus, culture is one way in which this Cosmic Being is manifest to us, as human beings on this planet of ours. Culture thus expresses the essence of our humanity – of what makes us human. To preserve, and to further evolve, each culture – and to seek to allow these cultures to change – is to act in accord with the will, the purpose, of the divine creator, while to undermine or seek to destroy culture and cultural difference and diversity, is to act against the will of the divine creator. Each unique culture can and should evolve, according to its own unique nature: each unique culture should have the freedom to develop of itself.

A culture is a combination of : (1) the unique customs, outlook, traditions and achievements of a particular community, group, people or society, with this community, group, people or society sharing a common racial heritage; and (2) having a certain civilized way of life – the way of manners, reason, fairness, honour, and excellence. Culture is essentially an expression of our humanity – of what makes us human, and different from animals. A cultured person is thus a person who is civilized, and who possesses a sense of identity – who belongs to a particular culture and who lives the way of life of that culture.

10) That the human species has a special character, and a Destiny. This character is expressed in our honour, curiosity and striving, and is made manifest by the civilization which humans create when they live according to their divine nature. The Destiny of the human species is to bring the light of diverse civilizations into the world, and to spread this light – the honour and the reason of civilization – out into the cosmos itself by venturing forth to explore and settle the star-systems of the cosmos.

The Reichsfolk Declaration

Quote David Myatt

Reichsfolk is committed to presenting the truthful reality of National-Socialism. The truth is that National-Socialism is an idealistic and noble way of life based upon the principles of honour, reason, fairness, loyalty, duty to one's own people, and to Nature, and respect for and understanding of other cultures and other ways of life.

Reichsfolk is committed to introducing others to the civilized reality of National-Socialism, and to striving to implement the idealism of National-Socialism in practical ways, through civilized, cultured, reasonable means, without using any kind of force or coercion.

It should also be made clear that the kind of National-Socialism that Reichsfolk seeks to establish – and all pure, genuine, National-Socialist organizations seek to establish – is a civilized and rational National-Socialism that rejects and opposes any kind of oppression, subjugation and intolerance toward others on account of culture, belief or race. Reichsfolk also opens its arms in friendship to all the peoples of the world, on the basis of mutual respect and honour.

The enemies of Reichsfolk are corrupt politicians and those – of any race, culture and belief – who use dishonourable means to oppress, tyrannize and subjugate others, or who do dishonourable, ignoble things which take away or restrict the freedom, dignity and honour of others, and/or which take away the right of people to respect the ways of their own culture and live among their own kind according to their own honourable laws and customs.

Reichsfolk expresses the view that all who call themselves National-Socialists should reform themselves, and adopt the true and genuine National-Socialism which Reichsfolk upholds: a National-Socialism which, being based upon honour, asserts that National-Socialists must treat all people with courtesy and respect, regardless of their race, their culture, their way of life or their beliefs.

One of the fundamental aims of this true and genuine National-Socialism is the creation of free and independent nations, co-operating with each other on the basis of equal partnership, where the people of a particular culture and race can live, among their own kind according to their own honourable laws, traditions and customs, thus enabling the different cultures of the peoples of the world to survive and flourish.

Genuine National-Socialist organizations do not wish to implement National-Socialism forcibly but only in a peaceful, fair, cultural and educational way thus allowing the majority to walk upon the true path of honour, reason and liberty. If National-Socialism becomes the choice of the majority only then will it be implemented in a political way. If it does not become the choice of the majority, then National-Socialist movements, groups and organizations will strive to co-exist with other religions, ways of living, and beliefs, on the basis of mutual respect, tolerance, freedom and understanding. National-Socialism seeks to use methods which are fair, just, rational and honourable to find and implement solutions to all the complicated and difficult problems which confront our species.

This mutual respect, tolerance and understanding is how others should treat National-Socialists, and if they do not treat National-Socialists in this way, then they are acting dishonourably and accordingly are our enemies and the enemies of all those who uphold honour, reason, liberty and true justice.

THE FLOW OF CULTURE

The Flow of Culture

At the funeral some of the cousins closely related to me got into an argument. I had expressed in a low tone my displeasure in seeing how our own people lost their cultural traditions, had uprooted themselves, cut those roots off, and Grafted themselves into a culture that wasn't there's. Many of my cousins nodded in agreement. Others shook their head in disagreement.

Some of my other cousins asked us how we can dislike how that side of the family lost their culture and adopted Christian-American culture, when we ourselves can't even speak the language ((Khmer or Thai)). We only know English. I had to point out that the other side of the family speaks nothing but Khmer and they have an alien culture, while us cousins on our side speak only English, but are still rooted in our ancestral traditions and culture of Brahmanism, Buddhism, Animism, and indigenous Shamanism. Many of us have Buddhas made of ivory and animal bone, magical charms, magical tattoos, magical scrolls, and so on.

I had to explain to them that I saw nothing wrong with adopting or incorporating new elements into one's culture, but that what I did not favor was removing everything out besides the new elements, and also to reject your ancestral culture. I guess that is the difference between Buddhism and Christianity. Buddhism is adaptable to a people's native and indigenous culture. Buddhism in this case grows like how Ivy gradually grows around a tree or structure taking on the shape of the tree and structure. While Christianity uproots the whole tree and forces itself in the tree's place.

Presencing

Everything that day inspired in me thoughts to think about. I was thinking about how Great Grandpa lived only 89 human years, and then he died. At first there seemed to be no visible purpose for why he existed in the first place. But being an ONA person, I eventually came to realize that Great Grandpa was indeed a "nexion" two important thing "presenced" themselves thru into the causal realm. I did come to realize observing everything that day that he did "leave a mark" on this world vicariously thru what he did presence: Progeny & Culture.

It is aurally said in the ONA that Our children are not ours to own, but only loaned to us for a short time. We are to such loans only guardians, providers, until they are old enough to be their own person and to make their own life's choices. Which time we and what children have been loaned to us become comrades and equals.

This aural teaching in the ONA makes a lot of sense to me. I have many cousins who were never raised by their birth mothers, who were given to a sister to raise until their coming of age. As a guardian of such children loaned to you, you do have a sacred duty to fulfill. You were given that child because of your own abilities and capabilities. Your duty your knowledge, wisdom, and those abilities and capabilities down to such loaned children so that when they do grow up and come of age to be their own person, such young new adults have the means to make it it Life, so that they in turn can fulfill their duties to their Mother: Nature, by spawning new humans. And so in this way Nature moves forward as a living system, as She has been for billions of years.

Great Grandpa in the end did fulfill his duties. He did care for his children and saw to it that they all even survived a genocidal revolution. He did do his duty of teaching them the skills they needs to live Life productively and successfully, so that they in turn can fulfill their duties to Nature by caring for Children loaned to them of their own. As they have. All of his children are happy and successful in Life in their own ways. I might not agree with their choice of religion; but I am happy that as a clan of 7 children and 16 grandchildren, they are a functioning family with a deep love and spirit of devotion, honor, and service for one another. In this, I believe Great Grandpa did a wonderful job. As opposed to the dysfunctional families typical in America.

Great Grandpa was the first and only person in our whole family to become Christian. Before, when he was younger he was a Buddhist and he did become a monk for a while, but becoming a monk the way he did it was a traditional act a son did in honor of his parents. He later was baptized a Christian. He ended up having 7 children and 16 grandchildren. I noticed that every human being that issued out of him, was a Christian like he was.

It's so funny because I was talking to one of his grand daughters who was way younger than me about her religion and Jesus and she had asked me what my religion was. I said Buddhism, and she says back, "Buddhism? Oh yeah we learned about that in school!" It was funny to me from an aeonic perspective, because for over a thousand years her very own people and bloodline has been Buddhist, and it was only recently that her little branch of the family became Christian. She had to learn a little piece of her own people's history and roots from school.

Anyways, so Great Grandpa found himself a wife who also became Christian. They had 7 children whom they raised all Christian. Those children had their own offspring who where then also raised Christian. It becomes visible that out of two original people came not only a large group of people but also a culture.

I was laying in bed that night thinking about this idea. How only two people over time can presence into the world new peoples and new cultures. Which led me to think about my own self. I want children of my own someday. Someday I will give birth to new humans. What culture do I want my future children to be, and how would I pass that culture to them. This made me think about not only how I got my culture, but also I thought about the ONA and how I would pass that Myattian culture down to them.

The Next Generation

Fortunately for me, I have my littlest cousin to observe. She is 2 years old. She has a long ass name, but everybody calls her "Srey Peach." "Peach" being my phonetic Anglicization of her nick name which means a "jewel" or "gem;" and "srey" meaning "girl." That's actually what she calls herself instead of a pronoun, since we don't use pronouns in our family. They're really cute and amazing at that age.

She's only 2 years old, she has already traveled the world. She's been to Angkor Wat, and she was taken to India on a Buddhist pilgrimage to see the places the Buddha was at. My aunt ((not Srey Peach's mother)) after showing us a slide show of their time in India ask Srey Peach to tells us what she experienced and saw. At 2 she can barely talk, but when she talks she speaks Khmer. The only English words she knows right now is "Okay," and "one, two three."

Amazingly she came back from India knowing how to chant/sing the Three Jewels in Pali because she had seen monks doing it. But she does it in a 2 year old way. She'd pick up her hand and clasp them and start with "Namo tassa bhagavato..." She can also sing this other Buddhist-Brahmanist song in Khmer about paying homage and honor to the the Buddha and devattas.

So watching her grow into her culture helped me understand how I myself am in the culture that I am in, and how such culture and traditional observances were past down to me by the generation that came before me.

When we as human beings come into the world, we come into it exposed initially – and very importantly – two 3 things: Our own family members, Language, and what such family does in their daily lives.

After the funeral we had a little family reunion of sorts with all of grandma's sibilings and cousins over. The 2 year old Srey Peach was most of the time the source of entertainment that evening. They're barely alive and only 2 fingers old, but they can talk by themselves, they say the weirdest things, and this one ((my little cousin)) already knows the culture and customs of honor in our family.

Some of the aunts were laughing at the 2 year old cousin and said to themselves, "Where does she know all this from?" And one of my grandmother's uncles – whom we also call Great Grandpa – said to this, "Where do you think it all comes from? From her two parents. They are smart creatures. They listen to every word said, and they see everything done, and they copy what they see and hear. That's why they say and orange tree grows only orange fruit. It's your responsibility as young parents to be careful what you say and do to raise these little ones right according to our ways so they can be cultured and good people, and not savages. It's up to each of us as parents to pass our way to our children.”

Then the Great Grandpa went on and on with his fellow elders about how my generation has lost so much of the old ways and culture because of the carelessness of our parents. This other elder during their complaints interjected, “Why would god grow us as our own people, if we just end up speaking other people’s languages, going into other people’s sasana, observing other people’s customs? It’s nobody’s fault but the parents’ if a child grows up losing its culture. It’s not just one generation in jeopardy of being lost. It’s our whole bpooch, our people’s whole way of life since ancient Time that is threatened by such carelessness.”

Like all of my cousins, I was born exposed to the language my mother spoke ((Khmer)). Because our minds at that age is wired to almost magically absorb language, our human language is actually a very important bridge and vehicle to transmit human culture. Every little word each language has acts like a hook and seed that is literally embedded into a baby’s brain.

Besides language, our eyes is the other major bridge by which culture crosses over naturally from one generation to the next. As children, we spend our entire childhood copying and mimicking everything we see done. You don’t have to force culture or a way of doing things onto a child. They pick anything and everything you do up by default.

I have this Black friend who is in his late 20’s. He lives in an apartment complex with his girlfriend and they have a 3 year old boy nicknamed “Boobis.” Boobis is probably the cutest little boy I have ever seen. He’s half Black half Mexican. Cute because of the “culture” he expresses in his little 3 year old way. Boobis calls everybody “nigga.” That’s how he address you and says hi when you go over to his place. He says in his 3 year old voice, “Ey nigga what you be doing, wanna play bitch?” And his dad think that’s funny. You’ll hear his mom; who is a good friend of mine; yell at Boobis’s dad, “Ey quit fucking raising him a nigga like you! I don’t want him gangbangng at 3 years old motherfucker!”

Needless to say, 3 year old Boobis knows and freely uses every bad word his “parents” use in front of him. And the sad part is that Boobis is unaware that he is using bad words. He’s just a boy using whatever words he has to communicate normal boy stuff thru. It’s actually really funny when we watch little Boobis go to play with kids his around his age, because the other kids have a hard time understanding what Boobis is trying to communicate because none of them understand cuss words and the broken gangsta-English Boobis uses. At 3 years old, he knows how to break dance, and he can sing you his favorite rap songs. If you ask Boobis where he is from, he’ll hold his hands up and try to bend his fingers to throw a gang hand sign and he’ll say the name of his dad’s gang. Ask Boobis who his “gang” has “beef” with, and that 3 year old boy is able to name you a list of other gangs around the area his dad doesn’t get along with.

And so, because language is one of the first things a child picks up, stories are a powerful tool to pass down culture. Stories as in history, narratives, mythos, legends, etc. My 2 year old cousin can tell you the simple story of how the Buddha sat under a tree. When her mom asks her what the Buddha is doing under a tree Srey Peach says in her 2 year old way, “Samadhi!”

You ask 3 year old Boobis why his “gang” gots beef with some other gang, and Boobis is able to retell you why his dad’s gang hates the other gang about who shot who and what colors they wear, etc. I grew up hearing a ton of stories. Some out of the Ramayana, most were stories of family history.

Besides language, we see and become a part of what we see being done as children growing up. I grew up seeing Brahmanist-Buddhist rites and ceremonies at home. Where every ceremony has monks chanting. Then you offer food to the monks. So my mom would hold a bowl of rice and tell me to use a spoon to put rice into the monks begging bowl. I didn’t know what I was doing or why. But the whats and whys are irrelevant. Because in a living culture, you don’t learn about such culture intellectually. You naturally literally Flow into the Culture. Sometimes you grow up still not knowing why things are done. I have cousins and uncles older than me who are into their culture and proud of it, but they still don’t know why they feed monks, why monks wear rags, and why they have begging bowls. Cultural praxis/tradition/observance is independent of intellectual apprehension. It was only on my own terms; after much curiosity; that I began to research the actual history of Buddhism and the actual meanings of Pali and Sanskrit that I learned why myself.

My grandmother is 80. She’s been practicing her culture and tradition for 80 years. She doesn’t know why she does what she does, and she doesn’t even know the meaning of the word “Bhikkhu.” I spent a lot of time asking every monk I meet when I get the chance the meaning of the Pali chants they are chanting. 90% of the monks I have met, don’t know the meanings of what they are chanting. They admit that they do not know the meanings of the words. They only learn such chants in context to ceremonies, rituals, and magical uses. Culture is not an intellectual phenomenon that you “learn” from study. If it were so children would not be able to take to a culture like a duck to water.

Culture is first past down via language, then the seeing of rites and activities observed repetitively over and over, then hearing stories and mythos. For as long as I have lived every April 13th we celebrate and go to the Wat. Year after year. It’s a habit. It’s practice. It’s a something we just do. Every fool moon we burn incense at our home altar and offer Moon Cake, clasp our hands, and in the evening we eat the Moon Cake. Month after month. Year after year. For my whole life. It’s a habit. It’s a practice. It’s something we do. And we call that habitual practice or habitual observance a “Cultivation,” an “Ethos,” a “Tradition,” a “Custom,” and a “Culture.”

That little simple rite of offering incense and moon cake to a statue of Buddha and picture of your ancestors is a powerful tool, and I would say the most effective method of passing down Buddhism, as it worked for me and all of my cousins. It’s simple, but it is a gateway into a complex Way of Life. Because seeing the face of Buddha your while life in that way, causes you to grow up desiring to actually understand what exactly Buddha may have taught. And those lessons drips little by little into your head as you grow up. So that by the time you are 18, you are a practicing Buddhist. There is no choice involved as you just grow into the sasana. Sasana as my grandma and the elders use it in my family means both a people’s culture and their religion. I eat at the table with a fork while everybody else older than me eats with a spoon, and my grandma shook her head once and said to one of here elder peers, “Strange the way she eats. She's gone into the Sasana of the White People."

As you grow older, the language becomes more sophisticated and religion or culture specific. Generally it is the same Khmer language; but you learn that there are specific words only associated with Buddhism and the culture, which you hear used over and over. Such memeplex specific words act as seeds that carry a raveled up teachings. Those seeds are just waiting for you to get curious enough to ask an elder what they mean. Once you ask, then the elders unravels their meaning, and that seed Germinates in your mind as another piece to your culture and tradition. Pictorial symbols and allegories are also memetic seeds of a culture. Growing up being exposed to a picture of a Dharma Wheel you whole life causes that symbol to be very familiar to you. The symbol for so many years has already had the time to dig itself into your mind. The symbol gains more power if it is seen during moments of emotional excitation such as at fun family gatherings or at large gatherings at a Wat, because then the symbol is anchored to memories, and thus has the power of nostalgia. All it takes to unravel the meaning of the symbol is to ask someone what it means. I only had to ask once what the Dharma Wheel meant. The meaning was accompanied by a teaching. And that was it. I didn't have to accept the teaching, because the symbol representing what was taught was already a part of me.

It's always amazed me how a religion of 24,000 pages can effortlessly be past down as a culture from one generation to the next. In such a way that even my 2 year old cousin can Flow into the sasana and Culture. It's because of the use of language, progressive teaching, and direct exposure of repetitive praxis and traditions.

Things ((memeplexes)) like living cultures, living traditions; and religions like Buddhism and Christianity has had thousands of years of trial and error of learning how to propagate itself aeonically for thousands of years. In my mind I see the growth of culture and very old religions happening in two different ways or directions. One I call Horizontal Propagation and the other is called Vertical Propagation.

If you picture an escalator, you can better understand the difference. Each "step" in the escalator is a Generation. Death is when the steps goes under, since the escalator is constantly moving backwards. Backwards meaning we are constantly aging.

New religions, such as something like Satanism at the moment only propagates itself "Horizontally." meaning that if we consider the escalator again, the memes of Satanism at the moment only knows how to spread itself horizontally on the plane of a step on that escalator. As that escalator step sinks under, all the work of propagation must start over on the next step's generational plane. Horizontal propagation is when a 40 year old reads some Satanic Bible, then tells his friend who are around his same age about it. As each each step passes under, there is no guarantee that the next step will have the same number of adherents on its horizontal plane.

And this is a visible problem we can see happening in institutions which relies heavily on horizontal propagation such as Freemasonry. During the hey-days of social clubs like this back in the 40's-50's one out of every 10 Americans was either a Mason, Odd fellow, Elk, Moose, or one of the other social clubs. As each generation passes, membership numbers decreased. Many of these social clubs are dead. There are now only about 2 million Masons in America from the huge numbers only 60 years ago. This is because with horizontal propagation, Time is a neglected factor. As Time passes and new generations emerges, such memplexes lose their power of relevance to such new generations. It's not a living culture. It's just something you adopt because you like it and perhaps tell a friend about.

Vertical propagation does not spread horizontally on a plane. It happened from one lower plane to the next step above it. It's like a frog hopping each step as the step goes under. Except as each generation passes, numbers multiply. So as our frog jumps each step, it divides itself in two. Then as each of those frogs jumps to the next escalator step they each divide themselves in two. So that the higher the frogs go up the escalator, the more frogs there are. Vertical propagation doesn't care if people on the same plane of the escalator step likes the memplex or not. It's not interested in spreading. It's interested in jumping.

This is the way my late Great Grandpa did it. In the beginning there was only him who became a Christian. He represents one lower step in that escalator. He had 7 children who represents the next step above him whom he raised Christians. That's like our frog jumping a step and splitting up into 7 frogs. His children had a total of 16 children of their own who were all raised and brought up in that Christian culture and practice. 16 is a very small number, but its a coherent number which works with Time instead of against Time, because now that culture has acquired the ability to continue to jump generations into the future and grow exponentially across Time.

The difference in directions of propagation is discipline. If you ask the average Satanist if they will raise their children as Satanists, you will get the generic liberal answer, "No way, my kids will have the freedom to chose their own religion." That right there disallows vertical propagation. If this belief is standard in this Satanism memplex, than the memplex itself will be incapable of aeonic coherency and aeonic continuity. We can predict that as Time passes this thing we call Satanism will dwindle. We can already see this decreasing factor in conjunction with Time and the passing of generations, in things like the Church of Satan, and more so in the Temple of Set.

The Challenge

I can't change or "fix" Satanism. It's not in my place to butt in and attempt to fix something which its adherents blissfully believes to be not broke. I'm not that into Satanism to want to fix shit for Satanists. If I do desire to fix things, it's only because I dislike Christianity so much, Satanism is the nearest stick at hand I can use to beat Christianity with.

Unlike mundane Satanism, the ONA is pliable and malleable like clay. Plus my friends here over the years have gain a certain amount of respect by those that matter in the ONA. So a while ago we took on the challenge of figuring out how to make the ONA jump the escalator steps, so that ONA can move itself thru each generation into the future.

It's not an easy task. The easiest part is that our Nexion ((WSA352)) is connected to a living tradition and culture we were all raised in, which we are able to analyze and breakdown to understand into practical insights. The most difficult part is to explain those insights to every ONA person.

In the early days 3 years ago we thought it would just be easy to share our insights and have other ONA people work together to evolve the ONA into an aeonic organism that jumps generations rather than depend on horizontal spreading to live. But as we learned people don't like any kind of change. So instead of working together to evolve the ONA into a direction, we spent our first 2 years fighting and stepping on ONA people. We've since then abandoned the idea of having friendly talks and just took matters into our own hands by subtly changing things slowly. As long as one person "up there" in the ONA rank and file and the OG's understand what we are doing, then we'll continue to plow down every ONA person in our way to evolve the ONA.

Our first step in evolving the ONA was to cut out the religious sentiments for ONA causal forms such as its Traditional Satanism. Causal Forms, are causal forms. They are a useful tool to get work done. They are not the essence. Then we had to gradually work on phasing up the ONA's cultural rhetoric. ONA Kulture as Anton Long puts it. Reichsfolk Culture as we put it. Culture this... Tradition that. Then we worked on gradually phasing up the Tribal and Clan talk. Sinister Tribes as Anton Long puts it. Numinous Clans as DM puts it. Progeny... Blood... Breeding... etc.

Now since the little components are in place – Way of Life, Culture, Tradition, Tribes, Progeny, Blood, Breeding – we can move onto the next step which is to figure out how we as Dreccs/Niners will pass such Kulture down to our Blood and Progeny you see. One subtle step at a time into a direction set in motion over 3 years ago. Like playing the Star Game with ONA with a wyrdful end pattern in mind.

Vertical propagation first requires as a tool: Language, or in-group specific language. This is because we Dreccs should know by now that our language is our reality in our minds. Because we should know that language is the very first thing a baby or child acquires magically. By group specific language I would mean a unique set of vocabulary and lexicon specific to ONA. This is something Anton Long has already been doing. ONA already has unique and original vocabulary.

Think gangs and the military. Each gang culturally has its own set of vocabulary and way of talk. In linguistics we call this variation "dialects." The military also employs military specific vocabulary. Just like Starbucks uses Starbucks specific vocabulary. If language defines in words and ideas our world we exist in, our 'weltanschauung,' our worldviews, and our paradigm, then what world does a mind which knows and uses military words exist in? A military one. What kind of world does a mind live in which uses a dialect specific to Bloods? A bloods world.

Language itself is a powerful tool that kills. When you exist in a Nazi world, and a group of humans have been designated with the word/ideation "Jew," you kill. When as a mind you exist in a military world a group of people has been designated with the word/ideation “Terrorist,” you kill. When as a crip you exist in a world where a group of people has been designated as “bloods,” you kill. When as a Christian you psychologically exist in a world where a group of people has been designated as “heathen/pagan” you stay within the boundaries of your psychological territory. Because those words and that language creates the feel and perception of “us and them,” and such language defines identity. As they say in psychology: we know who we are by knowing what we are not. We are not Mundanes. We are ONA Dreccs.

I would say that we need more ONA specific vocabulary. More seed vocabulary that have raveled up essence and teachings in them like “Exeatic,” “Dark-Empathy,” “Aeonic-Insight,” and “Acausal-Knowing.” Loaded ONA specific words like these in the mind act like seeds. When the conditions are right, you just unravel their meaning by simple explanations and mythos. This way the young Dreccling doesn’t get their Kulture as a college discourse.

Loaded words like “Dhamma.” Whats it mean we ask our elders? The elder will explain that word to you according to their own understandings. What’s sangha and Sambuddhi mean we ask our uncles? They give us their own understandings of each seed word. In this way each generation end up evolving the entire memeplex according to the worldviews of their generations. This is how a living memeplex stays alive for over a thousand years. It shapeshifts. If it does not have the ability to shapeshift to reflect the weltanschauung of its current host generation, then it dies of irrelevancy. “Original Sin” today in the Christian worldview does not mean the same thing it did 600 years ago. Our challenge it to breakdown the essence of the ONA and manufacture such loaded seed words so that we can embben such words into the language our Drecclings will naturally flow into using.

The next thing needed for vertical propagation is mythos. This is something I have always found attractive of the ONA, is that it uses and is not afraid to use mythos, stories, and fiction. Mythos and stories is important because of its obvious connection to language. You can’t really tell a story without a language to tell the story in. Mythos is also important because kids aren’t mentally and emotionally inspired and stimulated by college lectures and academic statistics. I know I sure wasn’t.

Every boy cousins of mine when they were small was inspired by Batman to pretend to be Batman. None of my cousins thus far has yet to play pretend to be Donald Trump or Stephen Hawking; even if they are super rich and super smart. All of by boy cousins played pretend games with stick words and guns. None of them played pretend to be bold monks, religious nutters, and book worms. Us girl cousins as children were more sensible and refined at play, whereas the boys were just barbaric.

If you’ve ever noticed, when girls of any age gets together and plays pretend, its less action based and more talking or telling or narration based. Even my 2 year old cousin, when I play with her its language and communication based. Srey Peach at 2 only knows a literal handful of words which she can use to express herself. But she understand us fluently. So when I’m playing with her, she narrates our play thru words she just makes up that don’t mean anything. She’ll also grab dolls and stuffed animals, sit them down together, give them names, then pretend to read a picture book to them.

So it's just human nature, from our earliest beginnings to be mythos and story oriented, and to be stimulated by stories. Every living culture has a set of stories or cultural narratives it uses to imbue each new generation with its culture. Such stories are usually age specific with certain aspects of the culture embedded into each story.

I grew up hearing my mom tell me stories about a character named "A-Jey." This is a Khmer thing, or the character and stories are culture specific. A is like the word "the" but used specifically for males, and only used by an older person speaking of a younger person. Jey is his name. Culturally this "A-Jey" character and the name itself is equated with ignorance and stupidity. It's an insult to call people A-Jey. His stories are short and they teach some sort of culture specific moral or lesson.

For instance, my mom was telling me how this one time the king had called A-Jey to the palace to ask him to send a note to a girl he was in love with in a town nearby, and to come back and tell the king what this girl had to say regarding the note. A-Jey was told by the king that this was an important favor, and told him not to read the note. The king before sending A-Jey on his way reminded him saying, "Oh, and another thing A-Jey, there are a lot of bad people out there, be careful. Don't listen to or believe what anybody tells you. I'd like you back safely because her answer is very important!"

The town was only a few miles away from the palace but A-Jey was so stupid he got lost. After three days of not seeing A-Jey return the king became worried and sent his sena ((army people)) to go find A-Jey and bring him back to be punished for abandoning the king's favor.

The sena found A-Jey and brought him back to the king. The king asks A-Jey what happened because he had been gone for 3 days. A-Jey said, "I got lost your majesty, and remembering your advice, I refused to ask people for direction. It took me several days to find the girl you liked, but I gave her the note sire!" And the king said, "Okay good! So what did she say?" A-Jey replied, "How should I know sir, I wasn't listening!?" The moral of the story is don't be stupid like A-Jey and take people's words literally.

Telling a child a string of lectures of not listening and believing what others say is stale and doesn't work. We know it doesn't work because as children, when we are told not to do something, we go and do it usually. But telling children the essence of that lesson or practical wisdom in the outer form of a story works, because the child can put herself or himself into the story, mentally maneuver around in the story, and use their own understandings of the story's events and situation to understand the essence.

The Vindex Mythos is a great example of a loaded mythos. Because from this we get the Vindex Ethos, which is the Warrior Ethos. The old Deofel Quintet is another great example of a loaded and useful mythos. We may each learn something slightly different from the Deofels, but one thing we do eventually learn from them is that the Essence of the ONA is not Satanism.

Another thing and one of the most important things is based on the innate human nature of seeing and learning from example. I didn't have to read anything or go to a school to learn to be a “member” of Khmer Brahmanist-Buddhist culture. I literally Flowed and grew into the culture by just doing what I saw others around me do. And what I was able to do depends on how old I am and what I am capable of doing. My little 2 year old cousin can't really do anything yet in our culture except “sapis sua” ((clasp her hands together)). But she knows when to do it as a way of paying her respects to anybody she sees that looks old, and she knows to do it when she sees a Buddha or monk.

Habit and repetition is important. Cultures, very old religions, and now Nation-States have learned to set special days aside as an excuse to have people come together to perform and practice shared observances. These observances are repetitive and predictable in that we always know what will happen during Christmas. Go buy a tree, decorate the tree, wrap gifts, cook a feast, eat with family etc. We always know what will happen during a Rose Bowl Parade, as well as a gay pride parade. We always know what will go on on labor day or memorial day, have a BBQ with friends and family. We always knew what is going to happen at a Wat, or at a military boot camp, or at a Catholic Mass. It's repetitive and predictable. About as repetitive and predictable as agriculture. It's the same thing over and over. Plant the seeds, water, harvest, plant the seeds, water, harvest, plant the seeds, water, harvest. But we call such repetitive observance in agriculture “cultivation” of crops.

It from being exposed to such repetition that a culture is actually manufactured. You take a group of strangers, pack them into a common place, make them repetitively experience the same observances at boot camp, day after day. A few months later those strangers are no longer strangers. They are members of a culture, a military culture. One that is highly coherent and disciplined. You simply cannot actualize that same organized and disciplined military culture if you put everything that took place at boot camp in text format and gave it to a body of college students. It doesn't matter how smart or literate the students are. Reading and text does not materialize culture. The most numinous aspects of a living culture or ancient religion isn't its doctrines. It's the culture and religion's ancient observances. It can be something as wordless and simple as a Japanese green tea ceremony of making green tea, holding the cup in a certain way, twisting the cup, and mindfully sipping. There is just something feelably numinous about old customs which have been faithfully and repetitively observed over time.

Writing and doctrines don't create the culture. Nothing about the 24,000 pages of the Tipitaka makes my culture. The written text isn't even a real part of the Buddhist culture and tradition. It only plays a supportive role. Culture is what a person and people habitually cultivate. If the cultivation of observances is faithfully and repetitively kept over time, and your children flow into that culture because they pick up what you do, then that culture gains the ability to break the barrier of Time.

This isn't just a human thing either. I've seen chimps pass their culture of fishing for ants and termites with thin twigs to their children. There is a weird group of crows who live near my place that have developed the culture of washing dirty food and dropping nuts you give them from the air to crack them. There are these fat squirrels that live at this one lake near my place that come out of their trees when you walk by and follow you for food. I looked back once and I had 7 fucking fat squirrels following me, babies an all. They wobble when they run behind you across the field. You kick at them and they still follow. And when you do give them food, they literally just wobble up to your hands and take it. Especially the small baby squirrels because they see how others squirrels do this, and they are too young to be untrusting of humans.

Observances in the ONA like the full moon fests and sunedrions are good examples of something that can be repeatedly observed month after month, year after year, and generation after generation. Another good example is the idea of places of Black Pilgrimages. The "central" place in Shropshire and more importantly places special to each individual nexion. It's a simple idea to just have a place where you can gather, hang out, share food, and perform simple rites, but observed repetitively at the same spot not only develops culture but also roots or grounds you in the real world. ONA has thousands of pages of manuscripts and unfortunately not as much that establishes repetition over time besides the Sevenfold Way, the rites in Codex Saerus, and Naos. We need more everyday observances, monthly observances, and annual observances. If not collectively that it is something each nexion, or sinister tribe must learn to consider and incorporate.

Another thing useful in forging culture is differentiation of association and group identity. Growing up, whenever I did something wrong, one of the elders would admonish me saying, "That is not Our way of doing things..." Growing up with so many cousins popping out of your many aunts, there is a lot of babysitting and helping raise your young cousins. You'll hear me and all of my cousins say, "No! We don't that!" whenever we see one of the younger one do something we know they shouldn't do, such as walk over somebody older than them. The use of the words "us," "we," and "our," over and over again is simple, but with Time, those words help forge a group identity.

The other factor in forging a group identity is by being taught to understand what We are not. For instance in my family we have a certain group identity we associate with not only because of family history we hear, but also because we are raised hearing statements like, "Only barbarians do that," "Only peasants say that," "We're not barbarians, we have manners." So growing up our world is divided into two camps, Us and barbarians. And people talk so much negative stuff about those barbarians that nobody wants to do what they do. And so over Time, we develop a crisp psychological boundary of knowing or having a group identity.

This works with gang culture also. A crip knows he is a crip psychologically not so because of the blue he wears, but more so because of what he knows and hears about bloods. How some bloods gang killed one of their boys, how bloods are toys and wannabe gangbangers. You hear all of that, and experience antagonistic behavior from rival gangs and that Others defines what you are. We know what we are by knowing what we are not. Then in such gang cultures you'll hear a lot of hating on other rival gangs. They'll talk about how the girls from such and such gangs are skanks; and how the guys from such and such gangs are bitches and pussies. These are all rhetorical narratives to keep those who have identified themselves with one group from breeding with rival from another group. It's basic human nature. If a girl is a promiscuous skank, then you can't tell if the baby she is carrying is yours. If the rival group's guys are bitches how the hell is he going to provide for you as his lady or protect you?

The more the Other is spoken about, the more clearer one's group identity and group association becomes. September 11th was the best thing to happen to America because it then gave Americans a rhetorical “Other” to hate on, thus forging stronger feeling of Patriotism, Nationalism, and group solidarity in the general population. This is the same “Us & Them” human/tribal mentality. If people are not kinfolk of your tribe in olden days, they are potential enemies, potential killers of your people, they may compete for resources and not share, they may take your females, and your males may go for their females. If your tribe is to remain alive across Time, you need to psychologically define the boundaries between Us & Them. This is one thing the ONA is really good at. ONA is so good at this that now, mundanes, even know they are mundane.

Another thing that is needed is a figurehead. This is again human nature. In my family it is my Grandmother. In our Clan it is the most senior elder. In our culture/religion it is the Buddha. This isn't a person you necessarily follow and obey. This person is only a landmark to help you figure out where in the family, clan, tribe, or culture you are at relative to such figureheads as your landmark example. The further away I am from my grandmother ((what she says and does)) I am, the further away from the family I know myself to be. The further away from some Buddha I am, the further I know I am from the culture. The Nazis during WWII spared a very significant cathedral in London only because their bomber were using this structure as a landmark to tell where they were at so they can bomb the hell out of the area.

This landmark person doesn't have to be a real person. It is better aeonically to have this landmark person not even be real but a character in the over all mythos, such as the Buddha. Not only is the Buddha the founder of Buddhism, but he is an eternal part of the overall mythos. So even if a personality cult develops around him, that personality does not die, because he is simply a part of the mythos. Anton Long to the ONA would be such a character. Not only is Anton Long the founder of the ONA, but he is also a living aspect of the overall ONA mythos. In the long run it would be beneficial to keep Anton Long and DM psychologically apart.

A story of how the culture came into being is also important because we can humanly relate to things that have a very simple human beginning. Muhammad was an illiterate desert dweller, he was met up by an angle of god who gave him the Koran. Jesus was a carpenter's son who died for people sins. A prince from the Kambuja tribe in India saw a mermaid bathing, they got married had kids and the kids became known as the Khmer. A Chinese guy came from china, got married with a Thai aristocrat lady and founded our family in the 1800's. These historical narratives – fictional or actual or both – helps solidify psychological boundaries inside. You know emotionally where your people starts and stops.

It's also just simple human nature to want to know our history. I still here my mom and aunts ask my grandmother about family history. My cousins come to me and ask me about their own family history and ethnic roots. A month ago or so one of my uncles came to me and asked me about his own ethnic background. He had always thought he was at least half Khmer because he spoke the language. I had to tell him he doesn't have a drop of Khmer in him. He's ethnically Han Chinese, Thai, and Lao. After that he went around went on a quest to search for his root by asking every old person he knew our about family's ancestry. Now he has a stronger – more solid sense – of who he is, what is family is and he now more proud of his family, ancestry, and heritage. If our family were a nation, we'd call the new feelings he found things like nationalism and patriotism.

So the challenge is to breakdown the essence of the ONA into the above mentioned things so that we can use those things to help ONA jump vertically rather than aimlessly spread horizontally. From my own personal aeonic perspective, I would rather have 10 Dreccs who know exactly how to pass ONA Kulture down to their Drecclings and are dedicated to such aeonic task, than have 1000 random initiates to whom the ONA is just some belief system they assume. Vertical transmission takes Time and the numbers aren't initially impressive. But with just one single quality Niner devoted to passing her or his Drecc Kulture down to their children and grandchildren, the ONA will have gained the valuable ability of aeonic continuity.

In the same way that some families such as my own stay coherent as an organized entity since the 1800's; as opposed to other families that becomes discoherent and dissipates into generic mundane population over time. Our family collective culture and identity began with a mere two people 200 years ago, and over the passing of Time those two people presenced in the causal realm a real tribe of many clans spread in at least 5 different countries. If we has just 2 Dreccs devoted to manifesting a real tribe and they had the resources and skills needed to do so, what who the ONA have 200 years from now? Vertical growth is slow and takes Time, but with that Time, the organization learns to actually transcend Time. Horizontal growth is fast and random, but growth happened inside a framework of Time. I think both methods are needed.

My Future Offspring

This is probably an unusual topic for somebody in the ONA to want to write about. One often thinks about subversion, culling, ethnic wars, and such "dark" and sinister activities when one thinks of the ONA. But like my boy cousins who as children play fought as Batman with swords and guns; boys do boy things with whatever they get their hands on.

And like my girl cousins, if a girl touches the ONA, she will naturally do girl things with it. I suppose talking about family and raising children isn't "sinister," but if it makes the male Dreccs feel better, the killers and warriors of the future are born from the wombs of mothers. Vindex when she or he comes, will first need to be a baby that is born out of a woman who raises that future Vindex in a certain culture imbued with a certain Ethos that is not Magian or mundane. Think about it.

I would like to – or will – have children some day. In this matter, I an ultraconservative. I must be. Like myself, my future children will have no choice but to be raised in my ancestral culture, a Brahmanist-Buddhist of the Khmer-Thai indigenous variety. It is something that the will Flow into, guided by me over Time. But I also want them to grow up ONA Dreccs and to pass that Kulture to their children also. With this in mind, I have come up with a step by step plan to raise them Myattian.

Reichsfolk is what I will first use because it has certain parts I find useful and connectable with my own indigenous culture. I would raise my future children Reichsfolk in the sense that they will grow up proud of their own culture, people, and ancestral ways. The reverence of Nature found in Reichsfolk also goes well with my own culture's animism and reverence for Nature.

The most important part of Reichsfolk is its inherent idea of clans and tribes. Other useful parts of Reichsfolk is the code of Honor.

While I raise my future children as Reichsfolk, I'll familiarize them with every key word used in the ONA. Reichsfolk National-Socialism will also serve as a gate way to tell stories about the Magian Forces who in "ancient times" united to battle against the Numinous Axis of the Noble Germans and Japanese. I'll probably have to create Reichsfolk oriented observances to use.

ONA would be introduced in bits and pieces, appropriate for their age and level of mental development. First the simple things such as the monthly feasts each fullmoon. Besides cultural holidays and major holidays like Halloween and Christmas, each special day mentioned in Naos and other Traditional ONA writings based on the alchemical season, will also be special days of the year where they will observe and then participate in simple rites during those Traditional days. Such as the Traditional chants, since children pick up such things very easily. Black Pilgrimages to our local nexion's special spot every now and then would also be incorporated.

Art work can also be employed at an early age. In that I can give them paint and have them paint their own sinister tarot, by quickly telling them what Naos says they should generally look like. This way they can express their own creativity and become familiar also with the names and word of each card.

Most of the Sinister Fiction would also be useful at this early age. You would just read them the stories, and/or make your own which teaches ONA, Reichsfolk, and Numinous Way things.

I've also thought about DM's Physis Martial Arts. I think this is a fantastic concept, especially from an Asian perspective, because so much culture can be transmitted with things like Martial Arts. The moves and regular practice of Physis Martial Arts in itself would be a repetitive practice. A certain oriental element or approach would have to be incorporated where the moves themselves are associated with a philosophical and cultural meme. This would be easy because Physis Martial Arts shares the name Physis Magic in Naos. The general philosophical stuff from Physis Magic can be linked to Physis Martial Arts. Being an "empty form" I can also later give such empty form style its own philosophical Drecc understanding concerning the difference Essence and Form, in a similar way Bruce Lee turned his Jeet Kun Do into a hybrid philosophical system.

My future children can begin learning their Physis Martial Arts very young. I would first have to learn it, work out what bugs it may have, and then work from there before I can teach them it. The key idea is to ritualize it like we ritualize many things in the East. The ritual would consist of dressing them up in all black loose fitting clothes. Having them burn incense to an altar or something simple like that. And then they would practice their moves. This would be a routine observance. This would also be when the name DM or Anton Long is introduced in as the Father of that style and philosophy. They would also be informed that this same person is the Father of Reichsfolk.

At around age 9 then the Star Game would be used. I think the Star game is a great idea because it must be built from scratch. Like art, this would give the children a means to express their creativity, but it would also be a family project. Once the Star Game parts and pieces are made, I could then begin to teach them how to play simple versions of the game. The SG would also open the door to other ONA ideas such as aeonics and wyrd, etc. Being raised Buddhist, they'd be familiar with meditation. So after age 9 when their minds have developed, I would also introduce the Tree of Wyrd and pathworking into their routine. This will stimulate their imagination, but also introduce them to a bulk of other ONA ideas and concepts.

Lots of nature hikes, camping, hunting with them, and out doors activity to get them used to that "culture" of physical activity. I'll probably have them join the boy scouts and/or girl scouts just to further develop that 'culture' of working in organizations and being active out doors and working in groups. This is for later when they begin their Sevenfold Way.

After the age of 13 when their minds have further developed to understand more sophisticated thought, I'd introduce the Numinous Way philosophy into their routine, associating each lesson that teaches the Philosophy of the Numen with what cultural observances they already have.

Then at 14 ((7x2)), I'd give them some sort of rite of passage ceremony recognizing them as young adults. Part of the rite of passage would be handing down to them hand made copies of Codex Saerus and Naos or something. Then a charge would be given to them in which the Sevenfold Way is briefly explained and they'd be charged to work at observing the tests, trials, ordeals, and tasks associated with the Sevenfold Way in time. And gift of some type of jewelry like crystals would be given to mark the occasion. The first parts of their task for their first degree in the Sevenfold Way would be easy. It would require – or I would suggest to them – that they initiate their own selves into the ONA. Then they'd just work at collecting every ONA MSS they can find.

So that would be a general outline of the first 14 years of a Dreccling's life. In the end, I find the Traditional aspects of the ONA very useful in engineering culture and Tradition. Hopefully as time passes the ONA will develop more such aspects needed to generate culture and tradition. The more, the better. From an early age they would know that there is an essence to the ONA, and what outer forms ONA uses is not the ONA. As long as they grow up understanding that crucial concept, and as long as they understand that the ONA evolves thru them, the ONA will pass thru them, shapeshift thru them, and therefore remain relevant to their future needs and worldviews. If done right, and if the simple observance of the monthly fests and sunedrions at each full moon is observed and becomes a family tradition, the ONA will have the ability to not just spread horizontally, but to also jump into the future vertically.

THE HIDDEN MEANING

The Hidden Meaning

Life has no meaning, so the nihilists say. Such people either aren't looking hard enough, or are looking in the wrong places for the Obvious purpose and meaning to Life. The best kept secret is the secret that is out in the open. I have an aunt who hides her gold jewelry in a clean diaper she wraps up like a dirty one and she just tosses it to the side of her bedroom. The meaning of Life is both obviously simple and complex, as it should be for a Living Cosmos with very few rules. Like the whole Star Game of the ONA. Can you see the meaning and purpose of it? It is the same meaning and purpose of Life and of all things that exist.

The meaning of Life is: To Live.

An obviously simple answer. But meaningful and not meaningless when you contemplate on the matter a little deeper. For, now we can ask ourselves: "If the meaning of Life is to Live; then what is the Nature of Living?"

The Nature of Living is: Change.

All things that Exist [Live] Change. Change is inescapable as a Thing That Exists. Your entire Life as a Human is a 100 year Process of Change. You start off as a zygote and from there you successively Change like a shapeshifter into childhood, adulthood, elderhood, and causal death. Even things that is not alive that Exist must Change as well. Land in time will change its shape and condition. Mountains in time will Change in shape and appearance. Everything in heaven, from suns to planets will in time Change. Nothing does not Change. Thus the Buddha said once: "All things are impermanent." Sunyata is the Nature of all things. Just as we can say that the Nature of the Star Game is Sunyata. Every piece existing inside the Game is a Flowing Change. But then we can now ask ourselves: "If all things Change, and if I am Living with Volition, then WHERE am I changing to?" In other words, if we are alive and have Will to choose, then what are we becoming or changing into?

And thus, the terrifying answer is: Causality.

Causality meaning there is no set direction or course. As it should be for a Cosmos with very few rules. Just as the Star Game. We can ask that if the Nature of the pieces is to change, then where are the pieces going in the Star Game? The answer is that there is no set direction or course, there is only Cause and Effect; or as Buddha called it: Kamma, meaning to Build, Work, Act. Which action bares Fruit, Wyrd, Fate, Destiny. And there lays the complexity of things.

The meaning of life isn't just a boring and simple obvious answer. To Live comes with a raveled potential, which you and I must each Unravel. We in a sense Unfold our Wyrd with causality. In the very same way that the end Wyrd of the Star Game has a folded potential nestled or embedded acausally "in" it, which must be causally unfolded with each move. And there is the Meaning and Purpose of the Game. The entire Game itself is an aspect of the Unfoldment of Wyrd. And you and I are the Unfolders. The nexions of the acausal unfolding into the causal. Acausal meaning in one sense "without cause." What in existence is without cause? Pi. What caused the infinite potential sequence of Pi? Where is Pi's infinite sequence of numbers when such numbers are not unraveled? This is just one example to help us better understand a meaning of "acausal."

But the Game of Life is far more complicated then a Star Game. The Earth is our Board. One single Board, but with Infinite Potential folded up acausally "in" you and I, for us to Unfold causally. Looking at Life in a zen way is like looking at a Circle. A circle is plain and boring. It's just a meaningless circle with no point. There is nothing special about a circle. It's not until a Greek mathematician with a clever eye comes along and discovers Pi in the circle, and the Infinite Potential of that Pi, that the circle's mystery begins to Unfold. What was once seen as meaningless now houses a number sequence that is as potentially infinite as the cosmos itself.

It's because of causality that thus gives our Life the feel of its ups and downs. In the same exact way as causal mechanics of a Board Game gives the players the feel of the ups and downs. You lose pieces, you take out pieces. In Life the causal actions we commit manifests our ups and downs, our joy and suffering, our pain and pleasure, our ignorance and intelligence, our having and our wanting. All of these things are not the purpose of Life. They are only symptomatic causal fruits of the Essential Meaning. In the same way that we can say taking out a Knight piece in a game of Chess is not the Meaning of the Game. Or not having any room left to move in a game of Go is not the meaning or purpose of the game. These are only results or fruits of the game as it is being played.

Therefore, it is incorrect to say that the meaning and purpose of Life is to have pleasure or love and not pain or suffering. Because the causal results of how we act today may produce pain later, and without such pleasure, we say to ourselves that life is meaningless. Or if you indulge in too much pleasure, it will lose its meaning, and thus you fall into the thinking that life has lost its meaning. No it didn't. You were looking for meaning in the wrong place. You only assumed that a symptomatic fruit of Life is the meaning. The Meaning is beneath or beyond the Causal: the Folded Potential embedded in the Acausal. Which our own Life and its Flow of Change is in itself a part of that Unfoldment of potential.

I've personally met many people who point to the causal fruits of Life and mistake them for the meaning of Life. They will say things like: the meaning of life is to love and be loved in return; to self actualize; to own a house; to pass our DNA down; to dominate; to economize; to be saintly; to know god; or to be gods. These are all byproducts of Life, not the foundation and Meaning of Life. If we attach ourselves to such resultant fruits of our Flow of Change, then such meaning we hold onto; as the meaning of Life; quickly fades, and when this happens we lose such meaning.

Losing such temporal meaning in Life causes problems to arise in our Human condition. For example I know a family friend – we all know one like this – who was happily married. This family friend truly believed that the meaning in his life had been found in his wife, or the love his wife offered. Everything was fine. But then she cheated on him, and his heart was terribly broken. He eventually left her. In his state of misery and heartache – and having lost his superficial meaning to Life – he was lost, in a state of psychological vertigo. Didn't know where to go or what to do with himself any more. Then along came a friend of his who invited him to church. The preacher gave him solace in his preaching about Jesus. And so he is now a devout Christian when before his religion was his wife. The problem here with my friend is that now he is under the control – a prey – to religion and preachers. He is not free.

But this same situation of having our hearts broken and thus our meaning in Life lost, causes others to React in many different Destructive ways: drugs, alcoholism, other forms of addiction, depression, and even suicide. That's what I mean by "problems" arising from being attached to fleeting fruits of our Causal Flow. Those things are impermanent and the byproducts of our Lives, not the inherent meaning of Life itself. We can't see the meaning and purpose of Life because it's so obvious and simply we force ourselves to over look it and dismiss it, and so we pay no mind to it. The inherent meaning is to Live/Change/Unfold in the matrix of Causality.

And so because some of us come to realize the Essential Meaning, and we understand the Nature of Cause and Effect, we can thus work on become Game Masters. To work on making the right moves in life to manifest the right fruit according to our Will. What is the most basic definition of magick? The manipulation of things according to our Will. As Game Master of Life we don't live Life as a passive passenger tossed and thrown about by circumstances and the results of our own ignorant actions/work. We live Life for the win. Whatever "The Win" is we each have designated.

So as Game Masters of Life, we understand that what we manifest by our Will is in itself not the meaning of Life, but only a fruit of our work. Thus if we lose it – and we will – we are not affected by such loss. Not affected, we can continue to input more work to manifest more fruit.

And this whole process of becoming aware of ourselves and the Essential Meaning of Life, and the simple rules of Causality we exist in, the succession of harvesting fruit, working to reach our Wyrld is this process of us Unfolding our Potential. Like a flower opening its petals slowly. Like the unraveling of coiled DNA into strings of mRNA for genetic replication. The Potential for Life does not lay in the raveled up DNA. It lays in the Unraveling and replication of DNA. The raveled up DNA is just a seed of potential information that must be Unfolded and expressed. Which is the Whole Point: Expression. Life is worthless and meaningless if we don't Express it. If we don't Unfold it.

But the Unfolding of Life like the unraveling of DNA for replication is not a static thing we can point at. It – like all things – is Sunyata: Change, Impermanent, “Emptiness In Motion.” Therefore, when we have the inability to understand Change, we lack the ability to even recognize the meaning of Life itself, because that meaning is the motion and movement of Change itself.

If you ask random people what they believe the meaning of life is they will most often pick “static” things or conditions they can point out: sex, love, music, shopping, eating, money, wealth, girls, boys, cars, shoes, religion, etc. You can point sex out to other people; there it is: sex, this is it, the meaning of Life. But you can't point to Emptiness in Motion to tell a friend that such Change is the meaning of Life. It's like being at a concert and trying to point at a part of melody of a symphony. You can't do it, because it vanishes the minute you try to point at it. You must experience it and speak of it as a Whole. Life as a Whole – which is the Flow of Change in the matrix of Causality – is the Meaning. What we do in that Flow is entirely up to us. And so we literally miss the point when we try to point to it. You get it?

I thought I would try and explain how I saw Life and Meaning of Life is to me, as I have come to Understand Life. Because nihilists just bug me. I have met tons of them but after the 101st one, I felt like sharing my ideas on Life. The intent is specifically for those of us associated with the ONA and its teachings in some way. So that we Dreccs might not be so blind to the Emptiness in Motion that is the Meaning in Life. So that we Dreccians may in our own ways come to Understand that Life as a holistic Whole, with its Flow of Change, and the Unfoldment within its causal matrix; is the very Meaning. There is meaning inherent in Life, if we truly and genuinely Understand Life as the process it is: Acausal Potential unfolding thru a nexion into Causal Expression. You and I are each a nexion of Acausal Unfoldment.

Like many answers given by the ONA, the meaning of Life is both simple and complex. Yes there is a beautiful meaning of Life as a whole. No there isn't a meaning to Life, because the moment we point to one, it fades. The Meaning is in the fading, the passing, the unfolding, the symphony in play. The trick is to not hold onto a single note, but to Let-Go – Let-Be – and just let the music pass and fade. Just to experience that passing and fading in that mindful moment of Letting-Be. Thus, having allowed the symphony to pass to its end, we are able to realize that the music as a whole, as one thing, is Meaningful and Beautiful. The trick is to not dwell our eyes and mind on a spot on a painting, but to instead realize the painting as a whole and to let the painting be. And when we have done that we can come to realize the Meaning and Beauty of that painting.

If we could each just Let-Go and let Life Unravel, mindful of every passing moment and every fading detail, Life's Meaning and Beauty will also touch is in the same intimate way. The Meaning is in the Unfolding and Fading. Life's Meaning and Beauty cannot be known. There is nothing to know. It is wordless Nothing in Motion. It must be experience and felt. In the end it is the Heart which sees the wordless Meaning. Like Love. The Beauty of Love is not the holding onto the one you love. Not dwelling on any moment of the relationship and time spent together. Not in any touch or caress. Not in any kiss or smiling of eyes. But in the Letting-Be. In the succession of moments that Unfolds and Fades. And from that Flow of Change – sunyata – we are brought to tears and elevated in Heart by Love and its unspeakable Beauty.

THE NEXT GENERATION

The Next Generation

Last month our family had the 100th day Rite for our late Great Grandpa. It's a weird cultural tradition where a person who has passed away gets two funeral rites or ceremonies. The First funeral ceremony is the usual time of the burial like normal people have. The theme of the First rite is morning. And then 100 days after the burial is the Second funerary rite, which has the theme of Closure and Reassurance.

Usually for the Second rite we have 5 monks come to the house of the children of the past away person and they chant and do their thing. Then after that we do bindbat and feed the monks. Then afterward every little family related in some way to the passed person offers the children of the passed person gifts of money and a reassurance that we're all still family, bound to help and support each other, even with the passing of this person. Just to verbally speak it to them to let them know that just because a person who linked our blood together is no longer with us that we all are still one family, one blood. The money gifts mostly are to cover the cost of the funeral service and whatever expenses has been incurred due to that death. It's another way to say that whoever has died is also our kin, and thus we are also responsible to help pay for that death. It is a great great great dishonour to be related in some way to such a passed person and be at the 100th day rite and not give a gift of money or some kind of token of solidarity.

I've been to plenty 100th day rites. They usually aren't as sad and painful. It's more somber. Everyone has had a hundred days to let the death sink into actual realization. Everyone has cried their eyes out for 100 days. Everyone has taken their deep breaths and are ready to start to move on. And so it not as sad, and actually fun. It's like a huge family reunion where those that lived too far to make it to the actual burial rite can come and do their clan diplomatic stuff. So for our family these 100th day rites usually calls out around 100-200 people. Usually every person at these ceremonies with access to money gives their gifts of honour and solidarity. Just us cousins alone we each give around $100 in an envelope. The older you are the more you give. So if you do the math, you'll get a feel for how much money is being transacted. Also if you can't make it because you are on the other side of the planet, then you send your offerings and gifts by airmail. Our family is about 500 people deep worldwide in 5 different countries: America, France; Australia; Thailand, and Cambodia.

But my late Great Grandpa and his private family were/are Christian. So this 100th day rite was very different for most of us. There was a group of church people there who did their religious stuff. Church songs were song, Bible verses read for solace, the preacher went on and on about how Great Grandpa was in heaven. Things like that. Then after the offering of gifts which takes a while because you stand in a line and one by one or in little groups give your gifts to the children of the dead person, there is the big feast. Little Grandma's house is pretty big, you can fit 20 big tables in the back yard and still have room for the little kids to run around and play.

Me, my little mom, little sister, and grandma were very early to help out. But there was really nothing to do since it had all been done, so we just talked with the other early birds there. The Great Grandpa Savudt and his wife were there joking around and teasing my grandma like usual. Savudt is not his name. It's the name of the village he was born in. So it's like calling someone in English the "Orange County Grandpa" or something. We don't use names with anybody older than us. Great Grandpa Savudt's wife is a older cousin of my own grandmother.

Our very last Great Granny was upstairs also. She is blind and can't move or eat by herself, and she talks very quietly because she doesn't have the force to speak loud. Even though she is blind and can't move, Little Grandma takes her places to get her out of the house. When Great Grandpa past away, Little Grandma took Great Granny to the casino to gamble to get some fresh air. Great Grandpa forbade it when he was alive. He's old school so he used to discipline Great Granny with force like he did with his children. You don't mess with Great Grandpa, he'll beat the shit out you, wife, children, whoever and all, when he was young. Little Grandma said Great Granny liked playing the slot machines so much she asked to be brought to the casino every day!

My aunt-mom tells me that late Great Grandpa was the son of a normal Chinese family of immigrants who forced their children to work very hard until each of Great Grandpa's sibling and he got jobs working in both the Thai and Cambodian government. So one of late Grate Grandpas aristocratic friends and business partner gave him as a gift his one of his daughters who is my grandmother's blood aunt, so that way his blood and family can be grafted into our family. My aunt-mom says that the late Great Grandpa used to beat his wife silly because she was stupid and didn't know how to do anything, being a spoiled aristocrat. He forced her to do all her own work and told her that unlike her, he had to work his ass off to be who he is in life, that he did not comes from a privileged, and that he did not want his children being incapable of working hard like him to make themselves into something. So he disciplined her, taught her how to work and do labour, and forbade her to raise his children fearing that they might grow up spoiled or incapable of working hard like he did.

I was just sitting there bored as hell since nobody was there yet and the church service wasn't going to start for another 3 hours. I had already went around and greeted all of the older people, like you're supposed to, then found a chair in the sitting room to sit and wait. So this one unfamiliar grandfather came to sit beside me to keep me company. Generally in the family anybody with grey hair you call a grandfather or grandmother, and anybody who seems around your own mother's age is an uncle or aunt, then people your own age are called brothers and sisters, not cousins. We don't the word "cousin."

I had heard my grandma wave at this unfamiliar grandpa and called him "Big Brother Stak," and then they hugged each other, then I heard my little mom greet him properly as Uncle Stak, so I figured that at least he was related to me and that "Stak" must be a nickname of some sort. My grandma had called me over and told me to clasp my hands together and properly greet "my Grandpa," and she explained to him that I was the daughter of her youngest daughter.

So I was sitting there bore since everybody was outside and it was windy. I was watching youtube on my phone and this unfamiliar grandpa Stak sits next to me and asks me in English what kind of phone I had. So I said that it was an android phone and handed it to him. He said that he had an iPhone and pulled his phone out of his pocket to give to me to look at. I said: "An iPhone huh? What's wrong with Android?" He goes: "iPhone service is more available back in Cambodia. All of my associates use Apple. It's very popular there. Did you know the Prime Minister has an iPhone and an iPad?" I told him I really didn't like Apple stuff. So we had our small talk about phones and we spent our time showing each other our favourite youtube videos. He was showing me youtube videos of his daughter, whom he informs me should be my older cousin/sister, where she was playing the guitar and singing.

I ended up spending half the day with this unfamiliar grandpa and our talks drifted into Buddhism and politics. After an hour of talking an unfamiliar uncle [whom I properly greeted] had come to join our conversation about Apple Inc, iPhones, Buddhism, and politics, and we were speaking in mostly English, but also Khmer. It wasn't like we had deep spectacular conversations or anything. Just light conversations mixed with joking around with each other. The grandpa and uncle were more interested in how I understood my Buddhism so they asked me a lot of questions and gave me great feedback. I was interested in their political views about things since they lived in a different country outside of America, so I asked them random stupid questions about how things were like outside America politically, economically, socially; and also how they saw America and its role in the world. They were very nice and said that I was very smart for my age and the uncle jokingly said that I should relocate to their their country and be a politician.

So anyways, after the feast ended we properly went all around and greet everybody goodbye, which takes an hour because there's a lot of people. I road with my aunt-mom and big dad and cousin-brother since I was going to spend the night at there house.

On the way to my other house my cousin-brother asked me who I was talking to all day. I told him I really didn't know, all I knew was that they were related to grandma; they just sat by me and we started talking. My big mom and big dad started to laugh, and my big mom says in Khmer: "The grandpa is your Great Grandpa Savudt's son and the uncle you were talking to is the son of one of my uncles who is a younger brother of your late Grandfather that just past away. They both work in Cambodia and flew here for the week for the ceremony." My big dad was still laughing, he laughs at anything. He really likes to laugh and he has one of those high pitched loud laughs. So my big dad stops laughing and says chuckling in English to me: "You did all that talking and never stopped to ask who you were talking to?" Then he started his loud squeaky laugh again for another minute. But you're not culturally supposed to ask elders such questions because its rude and offensive, so I couldn't, which was why my big dad found it funny. It's almost like how in English you were to come up and talk to me, and then I stopped you and asked you: "And you are? Who are you that you're talking to me again? Can I have a resume?" Then he stops laughing and gets into his normal serious voice and said: "You know what those two do in Cambodia?" I answered no. So he says back: "They're Members of Parliament, they work in the government. You were talking to real politicians about politics and didn't even know it!" Then he starts cracking up to himself again.

Which was when something hit me like a brick. All this talk and thoughts about revolutions and destroying some state I have done. And the general belief in me was that using force to destroy a state does not change anything all got confirmed physically that night. It was a shock to see it with my own eyes. Because the Khmer Rouge in 1975 had this communist revolt where they did actually destroy a State or Kingdom, and they did murder as best as they could every blood member of oligarchic families to get rid of competition. They did this, successfully. And I knew that Great Grandpa Savudt and his brother were working politics before the revolution, and I knew that our late Great Grandpa work public offices also and became an ambassador to the US during the Nixon administration. Now only ONE generation later – only about 35 years after the revolution – their sons/relatives are back in government! One generation.

Just out of bizarre curiosity I asked my big mom and big dad if they knew of any other people from other families who may have worked in the government before the revolution and now have their children back in politics. What I was trying to see was if other former oligarchic families did the same thing. And my big dad – who is really into politics [he's a Conservative Republican like all of us] – just started to name a list of name of current politicians in that country he knew of whose father or grandfather worked in government before the revolution. He named about 7 names he knew of. Then he started laughing to himself again and jokingly said: "Guess the Khmer Rouge didn't do a good job huh?" But he switches tone to a serious note and added: "No, seriously, we have a saying in our culture where it is said, 'we often become what our parents were in life, because the fruit never falls far from its tree.' We follow the example of our family. So if children come from a family of musicians, they will be musicians. If a child comes from a family of politicians, they are more than likely to become politicians themselves." So I jokingly said back: "Oh, you know what my little mom was when she had me?" My big dad gives a nervous laugh and says: "There's exceptions to every rule." My little mom had me when she was still in high school.

I was shocked during the whole ride home in my mind. The Khmer Rouge were meticulous in their work. To make sure they killed every member of the oligarchic families they hated, they first killed every one who wore glasses, they had lists of people who worked high professions like teaching to doctors whom they ended up killing, anyone light skinned was automatically executed, same for anybody who spoke a dialect or register higher than what commoners use, and they murdered everyone who could read. Two million all together, just to be safe. They had this trick they used to figure out if you could read by taping a cut out of a newspaper or a magazine to the end of their rifles. You were tied up with your hand behind your back and brought to kneel before the rifle and the guy at the end of the rifle screams at you to read the paper or he'll kill you. His helpers yell at you that if you don't read what's on the paper the party will kill you for being stupid because you're worthless to the party. If you read the paper they shoot your face and head off on the spot. You have to beg for your life and tell them that you're an uneducated peasant and can't read. If you do that, and they believe you, then they take you away and untie you and give you a hug can call you "Mit" which means "Comrade" and they tell you that you passed the Test because the party loves the peasants and working class and that the party is fighting to kill the oligarchic and upper Vanna [Caste in Pali-Khmer] people who abuse them with poverty and no freedom.

Pol Pot and his inner circle had all these tricks to weed out upper Vanna people slowly. One trick was they had forced the entire population to live in the forests and in forest side work camps. Every city was abandoned and everyone wore black. In the camps the Khmer Rouge would walk around and watch how you acclimated to the camps and to life in the forest. If you were fine and had no problem living off the land you were safe. But if you show in any way that you had trouble cooking food, adjusting to life in the forest or the camps then they knew you came from a privileged class. They'll come and call you Mit if they see you not adjusting and they act very nice and sweet and say to you: "Beloved Mit, I see you have trouble adjusting, the party is here to help you, please tell us if there is anything the party or big brother Pol Pot can do for you or give to you to help you adjust?" If you fall for their trick and actually ask for creature comforts which confirms your class and vanna, they tell you to meet them in a place later that evening when they will "give it" to you. And you never return.

Another trick they use is speaking French. Pol Pot and his inner circle were actually all intellectuals educated in France so they actually spoke French. To further weed out oligarchs and high vanna people they watch you carefully to see how you carry yourself, how your thinking process works, if you are unusually enthusiastic about party ideology. If you show signs of being an intellectual or being capable of thinking better than a peasant where you try to climb rank to be better than others, then they approach you quietly with a trick. The trick is they act very friendly with you and make it seem as though they are giving you an opportunity to climb their social rank to be in their "in crowd," and when you are off guard one of them will speak French to you or ask you a question in French in a friendly manner. If you show the slightest sign of understanding what they said or if you are stupid and actually talk French back at them, they cut your throat so you don't make a noise. This way the others don't know and they can reuse this trick with others. Peasants and farmers don't or shouldn't know French, only the upper vanna and privileged would.

Another trick or method of weeding out upper vanna people which they used early in their take over of the country was to check your hands. If they were soft and looked like they have never done any labour, they shoot you on the spot. Another trick is they read your face. This is something our elders do too to assess a person. You divide a person's face into three parts: 1) the top of the forehead to the bridge of the nose; 2) the bridge of the nose to the bottom of the nose, & 3) the bottom of the nose to the chin. In general, people with the top part longer in length than the lower part are intellectually inclined and are shot dead on sight. People with the lower part of their face longer than the top part are more emotionally inclined and are safe. Also the shape of your forehead gives you away. People with visible squareness to their foreheads in general are thinkers, problem solvers, philosophers, have intellectual abilities, and usually do very well in business, mathematics, government or offices or work that involves thinking. You're automatically dead if you have a square shaped forehead. Round shaped foreheads are safe. Also the way you behave socially around others gives you away. People who are introverted are usually thinkers who spend their time thinking in their heads. You're shot dead on the spot when they notice you are an introvert. People who are extroverted, who talk a lot and those people who think out loud by speaking and narrating their thoughts are more emotionally inclined/influenced and less deep thinkers, so they are safe.

Their reasoning behind killing off intellectuals and saving emotive people is obvious. If you are a thinker, you will pick at their ideology, think yourself out of their grip, mentally challenge what they tell you to yourself. And so you are a threat to their party and regime. Emotive people since they are driven or influenced by their emotions and not ideas, can be emotionally manipulated to be loyal. This is the same tricks cults use if you ever truly insight roll on an amateur anthropological mission. When you join something like the Mormon Church for the first time you are surrounded by smiles and welcomes. As soon as you give signs that you are the intellectual type by questioning their theology and dogma, they set you aside and have a specially trained group of people work with you to answer your questions far away from other new comers. If you are a new comer and you show signs that you are stimulated by their emotional hooks such as their friendliness, smiles, sweet words, and you are responsive like when they ask you if you want to hang out with them at a church gathering and you nod your head and said: "I'd love that!" They put you as an emotive type around everyone else to bombard you with their friendship and emotional stimulus. You take a serious demographics analysis of the church membership of major churches or just watch TBN for a few days, and you will see that 99% of the time the people you see are obvious emotive types who are crying for Jesus, in tears because of the holy spirit, waling their arms about, and are absolutely irrational, incapable of intellectually questioning or analyzing ideology or dogma. Where did all the intellectual types go? They got systematically weeded out.

As an intellectual, you are a threat to any power structure and regime. Your ideas are actually, not you the person. As an intellectual you lack a nature that actually makes you a real threat: the ability to Act or execute your ideas. The party or church owns your other half. It is the emotive type which easily becomes excited, "empassioned," driven to Act and Deed by powerful emotionally charged speeches – think HITLER – who becomes inspired by mythos, God [think Jihad], words, and ideas, that is the half of humanity that DOES. But these two types are not two separate points. They are points of a human spectrum and we all will be somewhere in that spectrum. There are two major kinds of people that make up humanity and both types must work together as one cooperative whole, if anything is to be actualized or materialized. "Divide & Conquer" does not always mean somebody is separating or isolating you from some group to brainwash you. Divide & Conquer in politics and situations such as revolutions and mass control of a populous or cults has more to do with the regime dividing the intellectuals away from the emotive types, so they can't effect and stimulate the other.

The regime is the only allowable thinkers for the emotives. You know you have been psychologically conditioned – divided – by a regime or a power structure when you have been trained to not trust your fellows, especially if they are thinkers and share their thoughts. Read that sentence very carefully many times. If you are the type of person who REACTS negatively with another person in such a way that when another person expresses an idea, a thought, a thinking process, and you react to that by wanting to Argue, debate, doubt, tell others not to listen or believe what is said; to fight to maintain some idea of individuality, then you have been conditioned by a regime to psychologically reject your fellow citizens who are the intellectual types. Ask yourself this question and seriously think about its implications: "Whom do I trust, the Authorities who tells me something, or my fellow citizen who tells me something?" Then ask yourself what class or strata the people you deem to be trustworthy authorities come from, and learn to understand that you have been trained to reject and not trust your own fellows from your own common class and strata for a reason.

The fact that you are born into the human species which is a social organism, and the fact that you are dependent on others for your first 21 years of life should tell you that "individuality" is a fabricated delusion. The fact that nothing about the way you live, dress, eat, work, and believe, and nothing about your opinions, ideas, thoughts and worldviews is individually unique should tell you otherwise. Then after your 21st year when you have been tricked into thinking you are "independent" you are actually dependent on the State. Can't see it? Go look at the case of Hurricane Katrina, the Haitian Earthquake, and the Japanese Tsunami. When the infrastructure of the State falls and the police don't exist, the water stops flowing in your pipes, and the grocery stores are empty can you truly say that you are a self-reliant, independent, individual, and not dependent on your State for handouts and sustenance?

What do you think "politics" means in practical actuality? The science of exerting your policies onto a population. How do you assert and exert your policies onto a population and expect a people to follow them if the emotive doers are connected or influenced to their fellow intellectuals not in your party or on your regime? You have to induce distrust in the population. Cause the emotive doers to distrust their fellows who are thinkers. Can't see it? Go ask 100 people in America from different classes who feel dis-empowered or enslaved by their government and state, and ask those same individuals if they each believe in "individuality," and tally up the correspondence and correlation between those who feel dis-empowered and those who believe in individuality/individualism. Then go to any Middle Eastern or North African country where the populous topples their government once every generation if they believe in individuality. I will bet you my little sisters virginity that the answer you will get most often is that they are individuals within a cooperative collective called a Tribe. Even secularism has its cult creeds: Personal Liberty, Independence, and Individualism.

The population or church membership has been caused to exist in a state of disorganization with each other. Like an electrical circuit which has been cut. The thinkers can't influence the emotives. The regime is the only allowable influencer of those emotives. The laws exist to keep the thinkers in check. Can't see it? Pay attention to how any government reacts and handles any group of people who Organized themselves. Especially when the Organization consists of a working circuit of thinkers and emotive doers. Do some history.

Anyways, a few years of this stuff and the Khmer Rouge had murdered 2 million suspect high vanna people and they had themselves a labour camp state where the "citizens" they had were completely powerless. Half of that powerlessness came from the peasant half of the population who truly believed in their ideology and rhetoric or out of spite for the upper class treating them so bad they just became fanatic party members. The other have of the powerlessness came from the other half of the population working who know they were enslaved. You see that half of the population got the bad end of the deal, and they were kept powerless with two methods. The first method the Khmer Rouge used was division of intellectuals from emotives. You can't kill every intellectual since that's irrational and a waste of time, money, and energy. You kill to set examples and to induce fear. Your intellectuals are now afraid to think and open their mouths. The second method the Khmer Rouge used was something we can call "Docilization." Emotive types are stimulated into action by their emotions. To docilized these type you simply don't stimulate them. No more cool fun speeches of proletarian revolutions, no more pats on the back by the chairman, no more music even. It was actually against the party's law to sing and make songs about love, punishable by death. The only songs allowed were songs about how cool the party was and how utopian it is to work for the party.

How would you neutralize these two types of people in a democracy like America? You cause the public to not trust the thinkers, and you induce apathy in the emotive type to docilize the public. You give the emotive type stimulus that directs their energy into useless outlets: sports, casual sex, vicarious living through the entertainment industry, whatever. Or you direct their actions by giving them stimulus that supports your power structure: political correctness, egalitarianism, etc. You may allow your intellectual types to congregate in their intellectual groups, but you first train your emotive types to think such endeavours are stupid. You know how stupid Nazism is? If you think so you have been desensitized, thus rendering most Nazi groups a non-threat. You know how stupid racism is? If you think so you have been docilized. Thus rendering any pro-African movement a worthless stupid ideology of a few disgruntled Black People.

You ever wondered what the hell happened to the Black Power/Social movement of the 1960's? You ever wonder how convenient Black street gang developed during the 70's just in time to divide Blacks into warring factions? If you know your street gang history you'll know that the first Crip gang started out not as a gang but as a group of students who tried to recreate the social structure of the Black Panther movement to give their lives some order and discipline. It was a well meaning group. Then this group was infiltrated by the FBI and later the Bloods broke off becoming a rival. Conveniently later in ghettos around Los Angeles, unused train stations started getting trains coming in carrying military grade weapons. What were those weapons doing in LA? What happened in the 80's? Street gangs started warring with each other with military grade weapons. So you analyze this over carefully and ask yourself, well who were those Black Power movements against originally? Not White people, the mostly White power structure that abused them. And you see them organizing into very coherent organizations where intellectuals like Malcolm X and emotional bards like MLK Jr were singing the emotive types into a dance. Then you see the younger generation of Black kids in the 70's start to continue this movement by creating their own organizations. But after that you see "something" external fracture that coherency causing street gangs wars where Blacks kill Blacks. And then finally you ask yourself, well if the Blacks are too busy killing Blacks, who are they not fighting? The White power structure they originally hated. Then take a look at the depraved conditions of the ghettos, the incredible number of drug addiction in Black hoods, and the peculiar large number of Blacks in America's prison population, and you should begin to see something "interesting."

As good a job as they did in dismantling a feudal kingdom and State regime, the Khmer Rouge didn't do a good enough job because many of the families with their tentacles in the power structure escaped into the safety of other countries. This same thing happened in Russia and China during their communist revolution. Before and during the revolution in Russia all most of the intellectuals, artists, and aristocracy had fled the country. Then we see that families who survived the Khmer Rouge revolution after only one generation have relatives back in government. Between the period of WWII and the Cultural Revolution many families with relatives in the Chinese government apparatus fled to either Taiwan or Southeast Asia, and interestingly many of these families ended up having their kin marry into oligarchic families in their new countries. The king of Thailand and his relatives; as are many of the upper strata of Southeast Asia; are part Teochew which is a major ethnic group from china who made a mass exodus southward.

I was watching this one documentary I think called "Hitler's England." It was about the Nazi's plan on invading and taking over Great Britain. The first half of the documentary shows you the way the Nazi's worked behind the scenes when they took over a country. Before they took over a country they sent spies in to gather the names and information on every known person inside that country that were public officials, intellectual, thinker, artist, writer, journalist, entertainers, and such types. These became their "black list." When they took over that country the very first thing they would do is send out a secret group of soldiers to quietly locate and execute every person on that black list as fast as they can. This took place while the Nazi party gathered all intellectuals and politicians in that country who supported them into a new government. Then the Nazi propaganda machine would induce the populous to accept the new government. And they'd move to the next country. The Nazis never took over Great Britain, but the interesting thing for me was that after the war paperwork of the Nazis were collected and the British discovered that the Nazis already had a black list of people in the UK they were going to execute. Some of the people on this list were well known authors and entertainers.

The reason why such types were targeted by the Nazis is simple. As a regime of intellectuals hoping to control a populous, you simply don't want any rival group of "meme makers" introducing stimulus into your emotive sector. Meme makers include artists and musicians and orators who are potentially more dangerous than thinkers, because these types act like emotional bards. One Hilter with great emotional barding skills can do a lot of damage. He was in his youth an aspiring artist. The Prophet Muhammad was this type who was known for his poetic barding skills. Vindex, must be this type. I encourage the ONA collectively to serious consider the importance of such tools of soft power as art, music, and poetry.

Ancient Walls

A week or so after the 100th day rite I went into one of my brief Islam spells where for a few days I obsessively collect information and read everything I can on a subject like Islam. What triggered it was how my late Great Grandpa had successfully by himself cause a large portion of our family to have a new family tradition which had now been adopted by his direct grand children. So I was wondering how the Prophet Muhammad may have done this back in his day. I started out by chasing down a nice PDF of the Qur'an and read it. The one I found was a thousand paged one complete with hadith quotes relevant to each Surah in the footnotes. Culture and Tradition by the way are two different things. People of the same Culture can and often do have different unique Traditions of doing things.

The only thing of use I extracted from reading this translation of the Holy Qur'an was something written in the beginning which defines for you what the Qur'an is technically. I learned that what is considered the Holy Qur'an is the verses in Classical Arabic or the classical language the Prophet actually used and spoke in which the original verses were written in. Everything else outside of that classical Arabic is only deemed an inaccurate translation of the Holy Qur'an. Meaning that if you had a Koran in English, or French, or even a modern dialect of Bedouin Arabic, it is not accurate to consider or refer to those books as "the Qur'an." They are only inaccurate translations of The Holy Qur'an!

I thought that concept was linguistically genius! You know how much trouble Christianity would have saved if the Church was smart enough to say that The Holy Bible is only the verses written in the original ancient Hebrew, Aramaic, and Ko'in Greek and that all other bibles are merely inaccurate translations of The Holy Bible? This gave me an idea for later. When the time comes to translate ONA and Myttian writings into Asian languages, I have to keep an original English verse near the translated one, and in the footnotes try to explain key words and ideas as best as I can. This Qur'an I had gives you both the classical Arabic and English Surahs side by side, and it keeps every important word in Arabic, but spelled phonetically in English. I actually learned all these cool derogatory words to call an infidel like al-Fasiqun, Zalimun, and my favourite: al-Mushrikun.

But reading a translation of the Qur'an didn't show me the politics of how Islam came into being which is what I was interested in. The Qur'an only showed me the propaganda devised used my Muhammad to forge his empire. So I searched for documentaries to watch to find the historic and political side of the birth and growth of Islam. I ended up finding finding a great 2 hour documentary I watched twice because it was so informative called "Islam: Empire of Faith," which I found on youtube. I haven't watched TV in 10 years. I only turn my TV on to watch documentaries. Otherwise I have been mentally disconnected from TV, newspapers, magazines, and even movies for 10 straight years. On youtube I only listen to music and watch documentaries. I figure if I am going to vege-out I might as well learn something while doing it.

If it weren't for the Yahoo news that is in front of me when I check my mail, I'd be completely shut off and oblivious from the outside world. I'm very possessive of my brain and very, very selective about what memes and data goes into my head. On the internet I just mostly read selected forums and then 90% of the time do research by reading documents. The world outside my door is where I go find my entertainment and pass times, with friends and family. I'm also very selective with who I hang out with, you have to either be family or a close friend I know in person for many years. Otherwise I won't talk to you or hang out with you. I don't care if you are a friend of a friend. If I don't know you or you are not related to me, then you have no business talking to me or wanting to hang out. This makes it so that up to 90% of everything in my head, and around me such as my environment and people I interact with are under my control at all times. You know how hard it is to be Master of your own Mind and Domain? Very. It's a Buddhist practice often called Renunciation. When you renounce the world [loka: populous], it means to renounce the world [the mundane] and everything of it. When you seek to gain Mastery of your own Mind, Heart, and Body/Life, it means total self-control. The only thing that should exist in your life are the Three Jewels: Buddha which represents Mind; Dhamma which represents Natural Phenomena; and Sangha which represents your association of monks, family and friends. Everything else beyond that is a distraction.

So the first thing about that documentary that stuck out in my mind was that Islam counts the year 622 as its year 1 and not 611 which was the time when Muhammad started getting psychic transmissions from his invisible friend. Which transmissions were actually retellings of the Torah mixed with 700th century political laws. In 622 Muhammad and his followers were kicked out of Mecca or they left because their lives were threatened. So Muhammad with his followers traveled to Medina. This was considered the birth of Islam because now for the first time in these people's history a new tribe emerged which was not based on blood kinship, but on Faith.

Muhammad's life was threatened for political reasons. At first he was just treated as a nutter, but as he gained followers he became a visible threat to the status quo of Mecca. During that era the Arabian peninsula was inhabited by many different tribes, each warring with the other. Each tribe had their own animistic religion and gods. In Mecca was a cube shaped structure the elders of the different tribes used to house the gods of each of the major tribes. The cube structure was used for political purposes. The gods inside induced the tribes people to not fight in the area of Mecca. This allowed something vital: Trade. And with Trade comes money and wealth for the ruling class. Muhammad had become a threat to Mecca's status quo because he was preaching about a one god and demanding the discontinue of worship of all other gods. Without the other petty tribal gods, the ruling families of Mecca feared that peace would not be possible in Mecca which thus prevented Trade between tribes. So Muhammad left for Medina to brood.

Shortly after Muhammad settled in Medina the first war which would spark the birth of an Islamic Empire broke out. The ruling families of Mecca had sent a thousand of their sons and warriors to Medina to kill Muhammad and his followers. Muhammad could only collect 300 out of Medina to fight for him, which included every male from young boys to old men. His little rag tag army kept the Meccan army at bay for a while and slowly Muhammad started to gain the upper hand. When the neighboring non-islamized Bedouin tribes heard of a war against Mecca and learned that Muhammad's army was tough enough to slowly gain the upper hand, the Bedouin tribes gradually came to help Muhammad fight for a share of the future profit: power and influence of over a new regime. This first war to expand Islam technically never stopped.

When Muhammad took over Mecca he institutionalized something called a Hajj which was a bit of genius. It's basically a rule that states that every Muslim should at least come to Mecca to see the Kaaba at least once in their life. The genius of this comes later. In only a decade after this initial fight Muhammad's Islamic army had forged an empire that stretched from Arabia to southern Spain. One hundred years later the political genius of the hajj started to bare fruit. Because now you had Muslims of different skin color, nationalities, tribes, nations, classes, all traveling at least once in their life to Mecca. This first made Mecca a lucrative center of Trade within the empire. The genius part is that IDEAS from different people and areas all converged and mingled at Mecca, and so when these pilgrims went back home, they left with new ideas. This gave birth to the Renaissance of Islam or the Golden Age of Islam.

So when Europe was in this thing called the "dark ages" and retarded, the Islamic civilization was experiencing a productive Golden Age of learning and science. Baghdad at the time was the cultural center of this Islamic Renaissance. You had all these thinkers, artists, inventors, philosophers from different places of a massive empire all come to Mecca to Trade items and exchange ideas, and they'd bring those ideas back to innovate them. Then the elite of the learned of that empire all met in Baghdad to translate their ancient Greek together, work on their inventions together, and all that good stuff, which would later find its way slowly into Europe.

I thought it was fascinating how a simple trek to a box in the desert could end up engineering a 1400 year old tradition for many people of different ethnicity and more importantly for clans and tribes or families across one generation after the next. But all that wasn't the best part of the documentary that hit me like a load of bricks!

The best part comes later during the end of Islam's Golden Age during the 1400's. What initiated the decline of Islamic civilization was the Mongol invasion that swept across the Islamosphere. Most of the Mongols eventually would end up becoming Muslims, but they had nonetheless set the decline into motion. A tribe of nomads in the mountains of Anatolia [modern Turkey] were inspired by the Mongols. So they came down from their mountains to settle and carve themselves an empire. These became known as the Ottomans and their empire was the Ottoman Empire. This is where things get interesting, at least for me. These Ottomans ended up taking a big chunk of the aging Byzantine Empire, but that's boring.

The good stuff happens with a young Ottoman Sultan named Suleiman. After Suleiman inherited the throne he set out to conquer the most desired city to be conquered: Constantinople! Other past Ottoman Sultans tried before but failed. This was because the actual city was a huge walled fortress. The documentary showed you a layout of what the ancient walls of Constantinople looked like, with all its towers and forts. Even with gun power cannons shooting at the huge wall the Ottomans could not breach the 1000 year old wall!

That briefly made me think because I emotionally realized something. The people and families living in that city had remained in one place and each generation that past had seen the same 1000 year old wall! What a concept. I realized that in our modern times because our jobs and business and just the moving around of family members, we will never settle in one place for a 1000 years in such a way that our generations sees the same something for 100 life times. I quickly thought about The Numinous Way and how DM says that a Numinous culture develops over Time when a people are settled down in one place where they connect with their land.

Suleiman had this great idea to take Constantinople, he would strangle it to weaken it. To strangle it Suleiman constructed a fortress by the water side of the Bosphorus thing right across the way from Constantinople. Then he used ships from his water side fortress to sink every ship that goes near the desired city. Eventually he conquers it and turns the Hagia Sofia into a Mosque and becomes one of the Ottoman empire's most famous rulers. I think the Hagia Sofia is one of the most beautiful architectural structures on earth. The Hagia would end up being the model of all mosques.

So back at home Suleiman became very famous for taking over Rome and conquering a coveted city in Europe. But his life wasn't all great. The documentary switches a while to tell you about what the life of a Sultan was like. Usually when a crown prince has been named and that prince has taken the throne it was usual practice to kill your male sibling to prevent anyone of them from killing you for the throne. There were also different tribal families of power in the empire who eyed the throne and who many times used whatever means they could to get close to you and kill you. This meant as a Sultan you can't even trust your wife, concubines, generals, or vizirs, because any one could be secretly loyal to one of these other powerful families or tribes.

The problem for the Sultan were the tribes and families and ties of loyalty you see. Everybody in his empire came from a family and tribe and so they were naturally loyal more to their blood than to him. Sultan Suleiman had to do something about this to gain absolute power. It's what he did that is the most fascinating part of this documentary for me, if you understand the implications as I do. How did he fix this problem of loyalty and gain total power? Easily actually.

Sultan Suleiman established an institution in which he set up orphan guardians and teachers. He then went to Constantinople and other places where there were Christian families that had nothing to do with Islam or Ottoman Tribes. Then he took very young children away from these Christian families and raised thousands and thousands of them in his orphanages. They were to be raised strictly as orphans with no kind of parents or tribes and clans or anything that like that. They were completely individualized. His appointed orphanage teacher were to raise these orphans as Muslims. But Suleiman treated his orphans like gold. They got the best education in the empire, ate the best food, lived in his buildings. As these children grew up if some of them showed signs of being intellectually inclined, Suleiman would train them in government. If they were interested in military science, Suleiman trained them in the military. Whatever they had a natural desire to lean toward, he trained them in. In only a few years when his orphans grew up, Suleiman had himself something bizarre never seen before in the empire. He had thousands and thousands of men and women who owned no loyalty or allegiance to any family, clan, or tribe, but he himself, who would kill and die for him. And to secure his power he placed all of his grown orphans into every office and position of importance in his empire.

What a capital concept. Individualize children from their families, institutionalize them, raise them in a public/state/imperial education system until they grow old and put them to work. This way these orphaned people in their adult years have no ties to any family, clan, or tribe, and are loyal only to the state/sultan. With no family, clan, or tribe to depend on, you are dependent on the sultan/state. The best part about this is that such grown orphans breed and have children of their own. And when that happened what do you think happens? The orphaned adults raised their children in their orphan culture. This is your typical American. The amazing thing to consider is that in our public school system during our most impressionable years, we actually never learn anything about family or culture. That state draws you away from any family you might have with ideas of "Independence" and "Individualism" and "Personal Liberty." We learn about the state and things that will make us a productive citizen of a state later in life. And as orphaned, segregated, individualized citizens with no family to trust or rely on, no fellow citizens we trust, we end up living our entire lives serving the interests of the state and its corporations. Then you die, and your children you gave to the state takes your place. But you are never ever aware of the families and people that grow wealthy and powerful because of your orphaned state of existence. As long as you have your independence and individualism. God forbid you live together with family and friends to simply help each other prosper and live better.

The Future

Something new and strange is in the air for my cousins and I. Something strange happened after that 100th day ceremony. We had seen plenty before. But this time it was different because we experienced it as young adults, with the mind and understanding of such. My older cousins and I left that ceremony that day changed inside. I have a lot of cousins, 30 of us all together if you count just us who came out of the 9 children grandma had. She had 10, but 1 died as a boy. He was the twin of my favourite uncle. Since my mom had me when she was very young, I am up at the top with the older cousins. What changed us inside was that we that day fully realized that all our parents were getting old, and that our grandparents were all dying out.

We were hanging out as a family early this month at grandma's how with the aunts and uncles and cousins barbequing. My oldest cousin is 30 years old, and our ages tapers down from there. And so one of the older aunts looked at us all and shook her head and said out loud to us: "Look at you guys. You're all old as us now and you still need us to cook for you!" Everybody laughed since many of us cousins were old [over 18]. Jokingly I said back to get back at them: "You aunts and uncles take a good look at this house, because it's going to be your nursing home."

There was loud laughter that came from that statement. But it was a different kind of laughter, one with a solemn knowing inside all of us that it was true. My Grandma and her peers nod their heads laughing, and one of our aunts in her mid 50's says for everybody: "She's right, we're all going to die together in this house." My other favorite uncle I wrote about who knows the martial arts and kicked peoples asses said jokingly at me, as us cousins were laughing: "Ok, laugh your fill now. We'll see who has the last laugh. Since you cursed us to die in this house Diapers [my family nickname], when I get old and wear my first old people diaper, I'll make sure I take a big shit it in for you!" Everybody calls me Diapers because when I was a baby I cried so much I pissed and poed through many diapers a day.

That joke that day was what triggered "The Talk," among us older cousins. It was our first real adult talk together of any kind. The oldest one who is 30 whom we all call Big Brother started the talk when we were eating out. It was all the 10 of us who are over 21. He is an original "charter member" of our WSA and is actually "Myattian" because of me and my writings. He initiated the talk saying to us: "So, what are we going to do with them? Our parents are getting old?" In our culture the oldest in age by birth right has the most authority, then it works on down so the next oldest has the next level of authority. I'm nowhere really near the top, but everyone at the top are WSA and Myattian and turn to me for advice. The oldest of us girl cousins who is 26 named Christine answered our oldest cousin and said: "We have to try hard to keep them together so they can be happy, it's all on us." Our 28 year old cousin nods his head and puts his foot down telling us: "It's all down hill for everyone from here. Grandparents will go first, then our parents. This is it for us. We've fucked around enough. Just the parents together is 18 people. That's gunna take a lot of time and money. We either work together form now on and start saving up or they'll die apart in nursing homes." We all nodded in a solemn agreement together, knowing inside that someday in our lifetime, we will see them all die.

And from this first talk, our talks grew during the month. We ended up having a long talk about our future family. All of us older cousins were now at that age where we were either thinking about having our own children or where we have come into awareness that we will have children soon. I asked our oldest cousin what kind of wife he wanted to test him. Our oldest cousin is perhaps the most Americanized of all of us. When he was 18 he moved out on his own, got a job, had normal friends, and he didn't like Asian culture or Asian girls. He always dated either Black girls, White girls, or Mexican girls. It was only recently that he got his first Asian girl who was Korean. My oldest cousin surprisingly said to us something like: "You know, I've thought about it. I've been out there in their [American] culture. I've come to realize that they have no culture or purpose in life. They live for nothing. Over the years I felt drawn back to our culture. And thinking about it I've come to realize that I don't want my children living like them. With no soul or roots. I have to marry a girl with a culture and roots of some type, someone traditional with family bonds like us, for my own kid's sake you know."

Our main concern was money. Because as the cousins generation we have our 18 parents and the several grandparents PLUS our own future children to think about. So the idea is not a simple American concern of feeding two little mouths and keeping a roof over two little heads. The only way for us to pull this off is to all stay together as a collective to not work jobs but do business with each other. All 30 cousins will in time have to tribalize into a single organized whole to make our money to take care of both our elders and our own future children. There is no other way around it. The act of us wanting our personal freedom and independence will cause a causal chain reaction where the end result is the elders get separated and put into nursing homes and we each struggle just to feed our own kids.

The older cousins during our first adult talks said that the situation in America here is not going to get any better. It will either stay this way or more than likely get worse as time passes. This means that as time passes living conditions will get worse, money will buy less, housing and utilities will be more costly. My oldest cousins said that there is no way for us each to divide up into nuclear families like the typical American and expect to be able to provide the same kind of life that we each had when we were children growing up. If we go our separate ways to be little nuclear families, most of our kids will be raised in apartments in not so great neighborhoods and environments. My oldest girl cousin agreed and added that she would be more than willing without a second thought to give up being an independent person like an American and live with her siblings and cousins just so her children can have a nice big house in a nice environment to be raised in for their own sake and well being. We all nodded and agreed that the best option for our future children was for us cousins to follow the example of our aunts and uncles and live together in groups to share the load.

I had brought up during another adult talk we had with my set of older cousins the concept of gradual degradation of culture. We have the generation of grandparents who have inherited a lot of their ancestral cultural practices. Then we have the aunts and uncles generation who only know a few of those traditional rites and practices. And with our cousins generation we have 1% and really know nothing. This would mean that our children will have nothing, no real culture. And the problem arises that no matter what we do to give them a big house and nice environment to live in, because they have no real cultural praxis that vacuum will be filled in with that American secular stuff. And so their children ahead of them will be lost to this nothingness of an American "culture." In that condition they will just be prey to these religions as they look for cheap substitute cultures.

The oldest girl cousins in our group nodded in agreement and she added that she wants to re-introduce Chinese customs into her future children and so she was starting to learn as much as she can from our Chinese elders and from her Chinese friends. We all agreed that re-introduction was a great idea. Our 28 year old cousins said that he has his heart now set on marrying a Thai girl from Thailand in a few years when the time is right, so he'll have access to a living Thai set of traditions and cultural praxis which he can help re-introduce into our future children, which we all agreed was a great idea.

My other concern was transgenerational traditions, meaning a set of some sort of traditional observances or experiences where each emerging generation experienced such things. Our ancestors had the fortune of being settled in one place for hundreds of years to stare at the same forest and temples generation after generation. And living in America with the way of life here will not ever guarantee that our children and their children, and their descendents will stay in one place to be exposed to the same surroundings and the same traditions. My oldest cousins being Myattian and influenced by me knew exactly what I was trying to get at and he brought up the tradition the Muslims have of making a pilgrimage to Mecca which they have observed for over 1000 years, and this helps maintain the coherency of their culture and tradition over the passing of generation. So we all agreed that to help keep our clan blood and culture together over the passing of generations that we needed to designate a place where all of us makes a pilgrimage to once in a while. This way we can take our future children these places, they they pass that tradition down to their children. In ONA we call this the or a Black Pilgrimage.

My oldest cousin, me, and our 28 year old cousin all actually own tracks of land in Cambodia. Every time one of our family members goes to visit the old country, we'd send some money with them so they can buy more land to add onto our property. Personally I have about $5000 worth of land. Depending on the area, they sell what they call around 6000-7000 square Hecters for your $1000 or something like that. Unfortunately I don't know what a Hecter is or what a thousand squares of it feels like, and my older cousins don't really know either. It's just what my grandmother and those aunts call it, but they say it as in a Hecta. Our oldest cousin says that the property is just big because granny says she can't even walk to the other side of the property. So our first plan is to build villas on each of our properties, that way our children can share it and have a place to actually trek to. We designated the obvious Angkor Wat as our Mecca, and then the city of Chiang Mai in Thailand is our Medina. The rule we agreed on is that from now on every 5 years we all together have a family trek to our Mecca and Medina and this tradition will be observed by our children and theirs on down. We picked Chiang Mai because our grandmother traces her lineage back the a kingdom named Lanna whose ancient capital was Chiang Mai. In the late 1700's the Thais sacked Lanna and took Chiang Mai, then the traditional history our grandma tells us is that the family that ruled Lanna were forced to give up the throne and their hold on power, Thai kings were put in place and the Lanna family just married into a line of the Thai family. We have a younger girl cousin named Lan-Na, we call her Lan, which in Khmer means a "car" unfortunately.

My other concern was what we were actually going to be breeding with and if the other parent of our children has a culture or not and what culture our children will actually be raised in if they are mixed. We all agreed that whatever they were mixed with, it's our culture and way of life that they will be raised inside of. But my main concern was with us girl cousins, since it's easy for us to get involved with White guys/people. My issue is that those American guys just do not have a culture, and that if we breed with them, their cultureless way of existence will ruin our children. Our oldest girl cousin Christine understood what I was trying to say, since she is also Myattian, and she put her foot down with the younger girl cousins in our group and said that if we girls cousins are going to mix with a White person, that the White person cannot have a say into how the child will be raised, or we will call our boy cousins to use force to discipline the White guy. That White husband has to agree to raise the child in our culture. Because these White people have no sense of family bond and don't take care of their elders.

One of the older cousins among us is half White. She's 25 years old named Sopheary which means "Beautiful or Pretty," but she goes by Sophie; sometimes she calls herself "Sopretty," and we'll call her "Soapy." Her father is White whom we call Uncle Steve. But our grandma will pinch our thigh if we call him that, she wants us to call him Lok Boo Steve, which is more better. Boo means Uncle, and Lok is a respectful title meaning something like "Sir, Lord, Master, or Mistress, Lady, Ma'am." My grandma reveres Uncle Steve.

Back in the 80's before I was born when my grandma and her children first came here a young White Jehovah's Witness guy with blonde hair saw my grandma one day and clasps his hands together and had a Khmer friend of his tell my grandma that he would like to help my grandma's family get use to America. He introduced himself as Steve.

It was actually Uncle Steve who for some strange reason just devoted a lot of his time on our family teaching us how to buy [and drive] cars, get bank loans, find work, and start up businesses. And he also took my grandma and the aunts and uncles around to sight see different places around California. He never stopped devoting himself to our family. My grandma really liked him because she noticed that this young man had respect for his own parents, lived with them, and had the ability to respect his elders. He just spent so much time with our family he went “native” and married into it. Or actually my grandma “gave” him one of her daughters as a gift and asked him to marry her. So he did. Over the years Uncle Steve not only learned to speak fluent Khmer to talk with the aunts and uncles and his new wife, but he also learned to speak fluent Thai to speak with my grandma and her peers. He has never during his 30 of being around our family ever tried to convert us or ask us to go to his Kingdom Hall with him. My grandma sometimes asks him about his beliefs or she would ask him which religion he thinks is better Christianity or Buddhism. Uncle Steve always first clasps his hands and says that he really knows nothing of the matter, besides that there is only one God and as long as our own faith in this God makes us each good people, it should be all that matters between friends and family. Which is what my grandma believes also.

Uncle Steve raised his mixed children all in our culture, meaning 100% in his wife’s [our aunt] culture. And like how we do things, his elderly parents actually live in his house for free with his wife and children. Our mixed cousins he fathered are Buddhists just like us, are animists just like us, burn incense and pray to the Buddha and dead ancestors just like us. Uncle Steve is a big influence in my life, because of the aunt and uncle generation he is really the only one that knows about my culture, but also has the same command of the English language as I do, so he can articulate things about our culture in a sophisticated way when it’s just me and him talking. Sometimes for a fish born and raised in water, it’s hard to be consciously aware of this water. But when a frog above from a lily pad hops into the same water, this frog knows the water from a different perspective and can share what he understands of it to the fish. That’s kinda like Uncle Steve. There was a time in his past when after he had children that his Kingdom Hall rebuked him for not raising his children Jehovah’s Witnesses and never bringing them to the Kingdom Hall. They called him a hypocrite for believing in Jesus but allowing his children to be raised pagan. Uncle Steve quit going to his Kingdom Hall after that.

One time when after I had read the Satanic Bible, identified myself as a Satanist, and was in high school, I asked Uncle Steve why he didn’t raise his kids in his religion. He said that the average American – which included him – does not have an actual living culture. They gave that up during the American revolution when they severed ties with Mother England. So without a real culture they have a vacuum inside their soul and they look for things to fill this vacuum. They look for substitute cultures. Which is why religion and sects are a big business in America. Religion is a substitute culture, and now so is Consumerism. But he realized early on that the actual practice of religion, which is to sit in a church or building once a week to listen to a person talk for an hour is actually a very, very poor substitute for a culture. And so he didn’t want his own children to have that void which he had. So he wished for a wife with a living culture and promised himself that when he had children he would give them the gift of culture and cause them to understand that belief is no substitute or culture and tradition. In our culture, the praxis of Buddhism is an interwoven part of our culture and ancestral weltanschauung. You can’t separate the culture from the Buddhism, from the weltanschauung. Uncle Steve said that he would raise them immersed in a living culture, and give them the freedom to pick their own religions if they would like one, just to test out his theory that religion is a substitute culture. He hypothesized that his children will grow up having no interest in such substitutions. He was right.

Uncle Steve was still soul searching in his older years. He questions his beliefs and says that he whittles it down to the bare essentials. Jehovah's Witnesses don't believe that we have souls or spirits, and in our culture we do believe that we have something like a soul or a spirit. This one day when I was over at Uncle Steve's hanging out with my cousin, we had one of our philosophical talks. He's likes to see himself as an amateur anthropologist since he really is fascinated with other people and their cultures. So many times Uncle Steve asks questions just to gain a better understanding of a person and their understanding of things, but sometimes he asks questions because he is actually searching for an answer for himself. So as he was making us chicken wings while I was sitting at the counter doing my homework, he asks me something like: "I've read in some English translations of the Tripitaka that the Buddha seems to suggest that people don't have a soul or an atma. But in your culture you believe that the ancestors are still alive and that when we die we reincarnate? I was wondering what your thoughts were on that, just out of curiosity, if you have any? Do you believe a soul exists?" Now he was asking a high school student, so I didn't know much at the time.

I first told Uncle Steve that I didn't even know the Buddha taught that people had no souls and that now I was confused. I thought about for a while, and I had a clever answer that made things make sense to me. I told Uncle Steve that maybe stuff like souls and God is like the Sun? It doesn't matter if I believe in the sun or not believe in it because it is still going to be there. If I don't believe the sky is real, the sky will still be there. And if I believe really hard that the sky is really real, it's not going to get any bluer than it is. If I stop believing that my heart exists, it's not like it's going to stop beating and I die. So if spirits exist and are real, believing in it or not believing in it really changes nothing. So my answer is that I chose not to even bother to be concerned either way. Because you have the Yin of belief and the Yang of disbelief, and before yin and yang is neither one or the other but stillness. Then Uncle Steve nods his head in contemplation and says to me: "You know that answer deserved an extra pile of chicken wings!"

At our cousin meeting about the culture of our potentially mixed children I remembered my talks with Uncle Steve, so I suggested that we raise our future kids in our culture, but allow them to chose their own religion when they feel the need to search for one. And we all agreed to the idea. And most of us knew the out come. Because all of us older cousins during our teens and high school years and college years did actually go find other religions to be inside of for a while. Besides me, no less than at least 4 of my own cousins got into Satanism, but when we grew up and past our 21st year our insides turned around and we gradually dropped our religions to go looking for our roots. In such a way that now, all of us are actually devout Buddhists.

I think it's a beautiful thing that use older aged cousins are now growing into that age when we are thinking about having our own children and that we are now having meetings to talk out our plans. And those plans are boil down to sticking together for the sake of the next generation, because things in America aren't going to get any better. We made a contest to see which one of us will make the prettiest children. Our oldest cousin said he'll win because he's decided that he's going to either marry an Arabian wife or a Hindi one since he really likes both of those cultures. All the girls but me in our group cheered for him to marry a Hindi one. I objected to both of his choices because Arab and Hindi girls are hairy and his kids will come out hairy too.

This thing in the ONA we call Magian Ethos is like the ocean: it is everywhere around us in the West. I was watching a documentary on the navy once. The documentary was just about the US Navy and what life was like in it. It showed you what life was like in submarines, on ships, and on those air craft carriers, and what duties and chores the navy people had to do on a day to day basis. At one point the documentary showed these Navy guys run around putting tarp over the air crafts, painting other air crafts and their ships. I was wondering why they were doing that because the crafts look fine and did not seem to need a new paint job? But the documentary explained that sea water is corrosive to metal and over time will eat right through it. So those guys had to take care to keep a layer of paint on all their airplanes and ships to keep the salt water from eating away at them.

The unconscious mechanical State system born from the psychosis of millions of people in America long ago was built to manufacture individualized citizens to insure its own sustenance. It's nobody's fault and it's not a conspiracy. It's just that orphaned adults who don't have culture and don't know better simply perpetuate that state of existence down into their next generation over and over because they are lost in that samsara. As someone awake, who know what's going on, I cannot consciously allow myself to have children of my own and condemn them to become an individualized zombie. We can't escape the system, but inside we can do what we can to make life in it better. I'm done with teaching outsiders to see things my way. I don't care about you and your children, what religion you keep and what culture you are rooted into. I'm now concerned with my own family and my future children. I'll share my ideas with the ether and if you have come to understand and see things as I have, then what I share may help you along your way to survive in this system. All I can say is that you aren't going to go far alone, and that because things will get worse gradually in time here, your children will definitely not make it far alone. There will come a time when you will need to seriously inspect your belief of "individualism," to see if the causal fruits of such beliefs is worth the effort of being a loner in a system designed to prey on the individualized.

My only concern as a Buddhist and a Myattian person is to help reduce the potential condition of my future children's suffering and to give them peace in life. I was talking to one of the old guards once about DM. I can't remember if it was DarkLogos or Dark Lianna. But This was a time when DM was still into Islam. I had said to the old guard something like: "Maybe DM is trying Islam out because he is restless inside. I hope he finds peace someday." And the old guard said back: "What is peace." I thought it was supposed to be a humorous statement, so I never answered the question. Peace in English is meaningless, or it would mean the absence of war and conflict. Then we can parse the concept of "conflict" to mean any number of things, conflict between two people, conflict between two emotions, between ideas, conflict between duty and personal liberty, conflict between one's Mind and one's emotions; have you heard the statement that goes: My Mind's telling me no, but my body is saying yes? That's conflict and no peace. In my Asian weltaschauung the concept translated into the word "Peace" is different.

Generally Peace in Khmer is Souksabbai, which is pronounced Sookh and Sabbai which should rhyme with the English pronunciation of the word "Rabbi." It's used as a casual way of greeting people. We clasp our hands and ask "Souksabbai te?" Which literally means "Peace No?" Then as a return you say "Souksabbai." It's the same word in Thai and Lao with the same meaning. In the very same way a Muslim will greet another with a casual: "Salaam," and the other returns with the same. Salaam means Peace. But revealingly when you morph it by adding an I to the word you get "Islam" which has the meaning of: Surrender, Submit, Give Up, Let Go; which to me makes sense because it's the same essential imagery as our word for Peace and you'll see why as we go further.

Souksabbai is actually made up of two words. The word Sabbai is Khmer, but is used in Thai and Lao also with the same meaning. It means to be "Happy" or "Content." When you are drunk you say that you are Sabbai or Sabbai Jed in Khmer which means Happy Chitta [heart/emotions]. In Thai it's Sabbai Jai. Souk is the word that actually means "Peace," and it is almost impossible to translate into English using a single word. The word "Peace" unfortunately is the closest word English has.

Souk is the vernacular for the Buddhist-Pali word and concept: Sukkha or Sukkham meaning something like The Sukkha. But the final -A is soft so it is not pronounced in the vernacular. It is related to the Sanskrit word Sukra which is the name of the planet Venus. Thus there is a connection between the word Sukkha and the metaphorical shades of meaning of Venus. She is soft, pleasant, pleasing, subtle, gentle, etc. In fact in the vernacular the word Sukkha, and the name Sukra which also lends it's name to our word for Friday are pronounced the same: Souk. Before you can grasp what Sukkha means you have to know its opposite: Dukkha or Dukkham.

Dukkha is pronounced almost like the English word "Took," as in I Took something. But the "T" is soft like a French or Spanish T. It usually accompanied by the word "Ter" read like a Brit would like Tuh. Ter means to Do or Make, like "faire" in French. Ter Douk means to "Make/Cause Trouble." So when I say my Kabal [head] Ter Douk, I mean that I have a headache of some sort. When something is Ter Douk Jed me, it means something is bothering or troubling my heart. When I say my Gapih [stomach] Ter Douk, it means I have a stomach ache.

If say a thousand children in Ethiopia have died of a famine, then Douk is not the right word to use. In this case it would be ludicrous to describe the tragedy that happened to those starved children as "Douk." You use Douk like when a fly is bugging you and you say: "Shit, this fucking fly won't leave me alone, it's Ter Douk-ing me!" For the famine and the mass death you have to use a word that is heavier in tragical meaning. You can use the word Vetania, pronounced Wait-Tan-ee-ah, which means something like Misery or Hardship. If it's winter time in Denmark in the old days and your family is struggling to survive because you lack enough food and fire wood, you say your experience is Vetania. There is even more tragical "Apop" which is hugely worse than Vetania. Apop means Suffering but the kind of suffering that describes 2 million people dying of starvation, war, and genocide.

Which should tell you something. The Buddha in Pali said in Life Dukkha arises and that his Way is the way to alleviate Dukkham. He never said life is Apop. Unfortunately when Buddhism is translated into English, the well hearted English speaking Buddhists will interpret Dukkha to mean that maybe the Buddha said pessimistically that life is full of the kind of ungodly suffering born from a big meteorite falling on New York city and killing millions of people, tsunamis and earthquakes slaughtering whole cities so why bother living? Give up and die. When all the Buddha really said if we translated it into modern English was: "Dude life sucks man." And his 5 monks would say: "Dude for sure man." And Buddha says to that: "I think I got a fucking way to unsuck life dudes and make our lives Hakuna Matata!" What's Hakuna Matata mean? It's Swahili for No Worries, and is the exact meaning or essence as the word Sukkham. The opposite of Dukkham [worry/trouble] is Sukkham [no worries, laid back, chill dude]. Remember, bhikkhu means homeless beggar. The original monks back then were hippies and slackers that dropped out of society to chill out in forests to live a Free [liberated] life with no king, boss, or Brahmin priests. Why did they shave their hair? Because it was troublesome [dukkha] to keep hair in the forest because it got tangled and you got lice. Sukkha literally means the same thing as the word Chill in contemporary English slang. Pali back then is like what Ebonics is to English today.

Souk is when a creek flows softly as it naturally would where you see a leaf nice float by. It's chill, it's cool, don't touch it, leave it alone. Douk is when a rock in that river, The rock obstruct the river's Natural flow and Disturbs it. So we can then say that the disturbed state of the river is not as it Naturally should be. Let's remove the rock so the river can be chill again. When we take the rock out we say that the river "Na'oo Souk," meaning, it's "Kick Back, Laid Back." Na'oo means to Dwell At or Live At, or Be In a Place. When a baby is sitting by itself minding its own business chewing on things we say the baby Na'oo Souk. It's just minding it's own business and chilling. When you Disturb that baby and take its toy away and make it cry you caused Douk for the baby. So we can ask: "Is the baby's state of crying and unpleasantness [douk/dukkha] its natural state? No it isn't. Something is disturbing it. If we stop that cause of Douk, we then return the baby to its natural state/stasis of Souk.

Souk is Tao. Tao just flow naturally. Yin is being excited or over-joyed. Yang is Douk which is worry or anguish. Yang is climbing up hill which is the struggle of war or state of douk. Yin is the excitement of going downhill or the rapture and fanaticism of the belief in God or Peace. Tao is standing still at the foothill: neither going up or down, just Chillin like villain. Before the Upness and the downness is Tao. To find Tao, to be in Harmony to that Tao, to its Natural flow, you simply must Let Go of the yin and the yang. Stop holding on to the yin and the yang: surrender your grip. Submit, Islam. When you submit to the flatness of the foothill you are still and not in a state of trying to go up hill or falling down hill. If you are in a river, submitting to the Tao is when you are neither holding on to something to stay in one place, struggling up stream, or swimming down stream. You just surrender and float like a leaf undisturbed and flowing naturally. That is Peace: Souk.

And so in our life here in America there are many things that can cause us to worry, stress out, trouble us. The praxis of Buddhism as per the 4 Noble Truths is to learn to recognize what troubles us and let go, or to help others in our life let go of their worries or cause of their worries so they can Chill Out again, their natural state of being, when they are just still and content: souksabbai. Some times the word Sahnok is used instead of Sukkha or Souksabbai. Sahnok means “Easy,” or “Facile,” as in “Piece of Cake.” You hear your elder men say that they used to like short skirts on their girls when they were young because it’s Sahnok to get access to something. These words have no spiritual or religious meanings or value. It’s the religiously inclined people with their religious attitude that corrupt it in their ignorance, assumptions, and misunderstandings. Original Buddhism used to be a kick back [sukkha] way of life [sasana]. But as time past when less people understood the Pali, that Buddhism morphed into all these super spiritual religious things or some sort of super spiritual philosophy.

The Buddha once said that you are not in the sasana of his Way if you do not take Refuge in all Three Jewels. Sangham saranam gechami: The Sangha is the Help/Protection I go to. Refuge is an inaccurate translation for Sarana [Pali]. Sharana in the Sanskrit simply means Help or Protection. Sharanarti or Sharanasthana is Refuge or Asylum. So you cannot be a “Buddhist” unless you have a sangha to go to for help and protection. Sangha includes the bhikkhusangha which is the order of monks and the ariyasangha which is the order of nobles [what all Buddhists are collectively called]. The monks are just an order of people who have dedicated their life to keeping the dhamma to memory. This way their order can re-introduce the dhamma to every new generation that emerges. The ariyasangha is needed to apply or pout into practice the dhamma. You cannot practice Buddhism by yourself. It is a communitarian sasana. Meditation is not how you “practice” Buddhism. It is simply a tool to quiet the Mind so you can analyze what is causing dukkha in your family and friends, so you can discover a means to relieve them of their distress or worry. You can’t practice Buddhism alone because who do you practice metta with if it’s just you? Sasana doesn’t mean a Belief, it means Instructions to be Executed. When you buy a cabinet from WalMart and you begin to put it together, the sheet of paper with your Instructions on it is a sasana. You don’t believe in your Instructions, you either follow them thru to manifest the intended end objective, or not. Believing or disbelieving, agreeing or disagreeing does nothing practical.

When your elders are worried about their elderly years because they are unsure if they will be taken care of, this is Dukkham. As a member of their association/sangha or family, it is your duty to be your elder’s Help and Protection to get rid of that Dukkham and ease their worries by taking care of them. This is Buddhist praxis and the Gift of Peace [Sukkham]. If how you live your life makes your mother worry, perhaps because you drink too much or whatever, it is your duty since you took an oath to follow the Three Jewels, to relieve your Mother’s worry by changing the way you live your life. That is Buddhist practice and the Gift of Peace. If your child is hungry and crying you feed it and console it. That is relief of Dukkham and generating Peace. If you Understand – Buddhi – that the world in 20 years will be much harder to live than it is today, and you are going to have children, then it becomes your duty to do everything in your power to see to it that your future children has as few causes of worry as possible and will be as Souk and Sahnok as possible, that’s giving them peace. That’s Theravada Buddhist praxis. It’s nothing mystical. It’s boring. It’s a life long commitment. And it’s hard.

This country is not going to get any better. It will either plateau or decline further. Judging by our unpayable debt which becomes a heavy burden to each emerging generation ahead of us, I’ll bet that conditions in this country will decline. Having children in such an environment involves thinking and planning ahead. Because if we allow them to be individualized like the average American, then they will eat shit and struggle just to get by. This causes stress or Dukkha in their life. Our only way to help protect them from this Dukkha is to keep them in our culture so that they understand that our collective way of life allows them to enjoy life better than others. The gap between the rich and the poor as time passes will get wider, just like it is in India. The rich will be very rich, and the poor will be very, very poor. Staying in the middle class even today is a struggle and fight which many nuclear families loose. And this is today. My cousins and I talked all this through and we agreed that we cannot be so foolish as to give birth to kids, let them free and hope for the best. If they are to have money and enjoy life in their time and era, they need the proper life skills our family has used that has proven to work and generate positive results. The most important aspect of these life skill is collective living, sharing, and cooperative effort, for mutual benefit. That skill must begin to be taught as a culture at birth, and the concept of "independence" and "individualism" is a threat to that corporatist or tribal way of life.

This would be a good place to stop and bring up the Anariya. That word in Buddhism is used to mean people who are basal or worldly. Whose awareness is fixed low to the ground, pedestrian, barbaric, or an ignorant person. The Sanskrit Arya and the Pali Ariya means: Wise, Honourable, Noble, Polite, Respectable, Civilized, Cultured, Mannered. In the very ancient times in India when cities were still a novel concept not everybody lived in one. The city folk were described as "Arya" meaning that they were civilized, cultures, and orderly. Living in a city back then required the ability to get along with other citizens, work together, share resources; get involved in cooperative effort such as irrigate rivers to farm, till large tracks of land to farm, work together to build the actual structures of a city. So that word "civilized" has more the meaning of a person who is not only Wise enough to engineer such a city, but to work together in a honorable way with other to make that way of life work. Outside these first cities were the wild people or Barbarians. Barbarians are uncivilized, meaning that since they lived in the forest or mountains they had no reason to cooperate, they had no use for Honour, they had no wisdom to engineer anything, or sophisticated intelligence to be a part of a collective something the size of a city. So that's what the word Ariya and Anariya meant.

You can't enlighten the Anariya [mundane] because they don't have the Noble [ariya] Mind to Understand [Buddhi] sophisticated thought. Sophisticated thought meaning the ability to grasp the complexity of causal mechanics and the interconnection things. For example lets say there was an Anariya who is hungry and he asks you as you walk by for a Fish so he can eat. You say to him: "I'll tell you what my friend, I'll give you this fishing pole and teach you how to use it!" And the Anariya will say: "Why? I can't eat the pole? Just give me a fish." You test this out and you can always call out the anariya [Mundane]. It's a simple idea that you must work harder to survive if you are individualized. So you go up to any average Mundane American and tell him: "I'll teach you how to live in clans and work and live in a big communitarian group!" And chances are the Anariya will say to you something like: "That's conformity! I value my individuality and independence!" And even if that Mundane ends up struggling and actually being poor and homeless and suffering, he will hold on to his anariya beliefs with a death grip and not let go. This is a dhamma. It is Testable. Go out and prove to yourself that there are in fact two types of people out there: Noble and Mundane. You cannot enlighten the Ignoble because they lack Understanding [Buddhi/Gnosis] and will resist you like a stubborn mule.

Concepts that are simple for the Ariya to work out in their head, are impossible for the Mundane to reason. For example it is easy for some of us to understand that the Tanha [enthraling attachment] to gambling can manifest debt and loss of your savings. And we can also understand that a Tanha for alcohol where we abusively drink can cause us and other problems. So we may be able to become Aware of such Tanha and work to fix them. Whereas an Anariya will never become Aware of that Tanha to fix it. They are spellbound by its illusion. The gambling addict is in a state of delusion where he Believes that the next play will be the one that wins, and that he'll make all his money back and more to make his family happy. He sincerely Believes in that belief and is lost in it. An alcoholic who loses his wife, children, friends, job, and home to his drinking problem cannot see that he has a problem, because he sincerely believes that it is the other people that are against him, that hate him, that want to hurt him. You try to tell him he has a drinking problem and he will react violently with you and deny it. You can't Awake [Buddha] these anariya from their enthrallment and loss of self in their Beliefs. In Buddhism, it is metaphorically said that such anariya, because of their kamma [works], must sink to Hell and burn before they Awaken and work themselves back up to the human world. That Hell is rock bottom. So far down the bottom that your nose bleeds hitting it. That's when the gambler or alcoholic wakes up from his idiocy and Realizes his problem. Only then will he allow others to help him.

Tanha is just the Pali word for Thirst. But 2500 years ago in India, Thirst meant something very different. Thirst meant you go find a well or source of water. If you were wandering around the jungle and you were Thirsty back then you have 3 days to find water or die. The closer you get to that third day, the more Desperate you grow for water. It becomes All Consuming. Drinking water is the only thing on your mind. You don't give a fuck about the rest of the world, it's faded away. A better modern example of the essence of this word is when you are on a long road trip somewhere and you have to go pee. The longer you wait, the more Desperate you need to pee. You start to pray for the rest area to hurry and come. You get to the point where your parents talking gets you angry because you just want them to shut up and find a restroom for you. You can't think of anything but peeing. Then when you pee finally that bizarre spell which captivated your mind is gone, and you're happy and not a demon bitch anymore. It's wrongly translated as Desire. Tanha has nothing to do with desiring something. There is a difference between desiring to eat and enjoy a chocolate fudge cake, and a difference when you desperately eat chocolate fudge cake to comfort your misery because food is your friend and you get 500 pounds. Have you ever watched those talk shows where those fat ladies cry on TV and says to Oprah: "I can't stop eating. Please help me. I'm ugly." Those fat ladies don't have a simple desire to enjoy a cake sensibly. They have a serious problem. There was no word to describe this problem 2500 years ago in India so the word Thirst was used because of its metaphorical value. What's it mean when we say to "Thirst for knowledge?" It's not a simple desire to just know stuff. At times it's an all consuming drive.

The Magian West

The West has fallen under the control of two beasts who use very similar methodologies. It seems as if these two beasts were able to take root in the West because of the state of Mind of the Western mundane people. They are in their own way a great people with ingenuity. Our modern world and its sophisticated science, medicine, and technology was born from these minds. But still, it seems as if a majority of their fellows are gullible and not very bright.

The first beast was the Vatican and their invisible "Church." This Church set up shop in Europe and started to sell an invisible commodity called "Salvation." In exchange for the people's Dependence on the Church. Because if you wanted to be saved, only the Church can give it to you. Then this beast crept into other arenas of life like marriage. Now if you wanted love, sex, and children you Depended on the Church to give it to you in the form of a lawfully wedded spouse. Then they had all these laws and policies they past which were religious edicts that further Monopolized your Dependence on the Church. You had to follow these laws of you weren't a member of the Church, which meant no salvation or anything the Church offered you. Those people were enslaved by a power structure back then and the strangest part is that at no time did those Church members ever ask themselves: What exactly are we being saved from? It's revealing that the usual answer is: Sin. What is sin? It's a theological ideation that is nothing real.

Then the second beast is something called Democracy with its "State." You can't see the "State" they assure you its there, after all you're living in it aren't you? Then this State sets up shop and starts to sell you an invisible commodity called "Freedom." Then the State passes laws which you are to follow since you're a citizen of the State. It's your duty, or you go to jail. These laws further dis-empowers the citizen and further helps the State Monopolize your Dependence on the State. For example try printing and using your own money and tell you nice State that you won't be needing their printed money anymore and see what happens. Raise you kids at home and teach them things the school system does not teach and see what happens. People end up being enslaved by a power structure and at no time ever did any of the Mundane citizens of the State ever ask themselves: What are we being free from?

I can understand if the year was 1776 and I asked the American rebels what were were fighting to be free from. They'll say something like: "Freedom from the King of England and Freedom of Self Governance!" That I can understand. But today? In the year 2011? What are we being freed from? Freedom from what? The king of England? The freedom to govern ourselves? Whose governing who here now? Maybe it's the freedom to walk around and do whatever we want? But penguins do that to in Antarctica and they don't have a government. Or maybe the State exists to protect our freedom! From who or what? As a species we've been around for at least 200,000 years. People before the invention of the State were free and they didn't need a State to protect their freedom? They protected it by themselves? The Native Americans didn't need a State to protect their freedom or guarantee their freedom?

Revolting and tearing down the system doesn't work. Because we've seen it demonstrated in the Middle East and North Africa since at least the Cold War that when one regime falls from revolution, a new regime just takes its place and the State still exists and the citizens are still enslaved and abused. Russia and China are great example. It didn't matter what regime, revolt, or system of government was implemented, because the same group of people who were abused continued to be used and abused. And in other cases of revolution it only took one generation after the revolution, to have the same bloodlines back creeping into the governing apparatus and power structure.

Hypothetically we can as ONA say that even if we can't get rid of the State, as long as our regime is in power, it's all good. But this would only be a temporary victory because no power structure lasts forever. Will our power structure last long enough for us to evolve into a stellar civilization before the citizenship revolts and another regime fights for power? And if we do lose our grip on power, then it's all back to square one for our future progeny because now they'll be enslaved in a system again.

I see our unfortunate relationship with the System/State in two different views. My first view is that I see the State thing as a useful tool that we need. In the same sense electricity is a useful tool we need as a source of energy. Our dependence on this electricity is born into being because perhaps we just don't know of an alternative energy source. If we did know of an alternative energy source, it may be that gradually and collectively we would grow out of our electricity dependence phase. And we are actually now in the beginning moments of that stage so we'll see. A couple of years ago I read an article in a science journal about how we have reached the limit of the size our microchips can shrink to. The electrons are just too big for our chips to get any smaller, plus they give off too much heat, so anything smaller would burn up. Then the article introduced an new something that might forever change our paradigm and kill our dependence for electricity. The new something was something called a "Photon Crystal." The crystal was a primitive prototype. But the concept behind it is that the crystal traps and absorbs photons in its crystalline structure, and with nano sized "wires" these photons can be sent out in single file to produce binary code and also ENERGY. The article says that this prototype photon crystal has opened a door for something revolutionary with no name but they have coined it "Photronics," which is like electronic technology, except the devices neither use electrons or run on electrical energy.

When I use the term "paradigm shift" that is what I mean. Not a mere change of opinion. For the past hundred and some years since Edison, collectively we have existed "inside" a paradigm in which we see the whole world and our future tainted with the assumption/belief of electronic energy and electronic technology. Electricity is etched into our worldviews and we cannot or could not perceive of a modern world without it, or a future without it. Electricity is an indivisible part of the fabric of what we perceive to be our world and future. But now with the prototype photon crystals and the Photronic technology and Photonic energy it implies, if we fully grasp those implications it causes in us a genuine paradigm shift where we can understand that in the near future, electricity and our reliance on electrons would be a relic of a primitive human race using primitive aggressively harmful technologies to generate a wasteful form of energy. Wasteful meaning that a huge amount of energy of electricity is wasted as heat radiation. That's why you have fans in your computers. The knowing inside – heartfelt realization – that there is a usable other form of energy freely available from the sun; which is not electricity; that allows us collectively let go of our proverbial grip on our dependence of electricity. But before the "new age" of photronics can come into being, we all – all of us involved in a civilization – must together experience that critical paradigm shift.

This tool we call "democracy" in Europe and North America would not have been possible if the people of the West had not had a paradigm shift when they all genuinely realized that a world without the Church and a king was possible. That there was an alternative to kingdoms and Christendom. But those kingdoms and that Christendom had to be experienced by the old world Europeans for each of them to eventually have that inner Gnosis or genuine paradigm shift. In this context I don't believe that the religious and political institutions in old world Europe was a "bad" thing. No more than the opulent royal palace the Buddha was born and raised in was "bad." Because without that past direct experience in that palace, the Buddha would have never had his realization later. Without the experience of kingdoms and Christendom, the people of old world Europe would have never had the realization that an alternative was indeed possible or desirable. When I study the Middle East civilization and people, I see them in the state old world Europe was in, when they were inside Christendom. Where they cannot sincerely perceive or understand a world without Islam or Islamic law.

Barbarity in our species' ancient past brought us pretty far. But there is a point where it can't take us any further. Then empires and kingdoms like Sumer and Ancient Egypt appeared. That system of government was an epic Vehicle which brought our species up to the door step of the verge of the modern age. But even the memetics of empires and kingdoms fails as a vehicle to take us further into the future. So the West had a paradigm shift and democratic States was our new vehicle which brought us into the modern age all the way up to the doorstep of a stellar civilization and this is where our current Vehicle breaks down like an old car.

In this regard. I don't see the West as being wrong, or barbaric, or lost, or primitive. I still see the West and its mixture of peoples to still be the Earth's Supreme Causal Form of our species. And I still believe that it is this same West that can and will someday take us to the stars. But this vehicle we call the West has taken us as far as it can go and it is now broken down. But it is a good thing that it is broke. Because it helps us understand what this Form of civilization can do, and how far it can move forward, and what it can accomplish. And so because of this I believe the West is still the Supreme Causal Form because I can look at other civilizations such as the East dominated by China and know that although they may be a growing "superpower" and becoming a "huge" economy. Their copy-cat State won't go far. The best part is our Western vehicle broke down first. That means we are ahead of the game and have time to build something new that will take us further! Remember, we already rode on the wagon of Capitalism as far as we can go, those Chinese are just starting! But for there to be any further movement for the West, there needs to be an alternative way to cause or initiate a collective paradigm shift in the zietgeist of the West. Otherwise, we'll be stuck with our broken wagon for a while, and the Chinese will catch up.

Which brings me to my other way I see the State. I see the Western State as not going anywhere and that there is no logical sense in exerting force to even try to destroy it simply because the mundane anariya of the West are still enthralled in the delusional samsara of this Western State thing. As I mentioned up there, when an anariya is sincerely lost in their delusional beliefs the only way to wake them up is to wait till they hit rock bottom to go to Hell as Buddha's mythos puts it. I fear that there won't be a paradigm shift until the current Vehicle of the West falls where everything literally goes to Hell. Just like the chaos that came into being during that fall of the Roman Empire. The unfortunate thing is that these delusional mundanes must be allowed to have their experience from beginning to final end if they are to have a realization or paradigm shift born from their pathei-mathos. In this context I see revolution and deliberate use of force to tear down this system as being counter productive. This is not to say that subtle force shouldn't be used to hasten a fall such as messing with the economic system. But like some classical ONA texts puts it, I think the old must be destroyed – by its own dysfunction – for a new something to be realized. Vindex just might have a guest appearance after all when the right moment comes.

Thus, we are stuck here in this system for a while, either to ride it out until the end and/or to subtly work to hasten its fall. Until the fall, what we need to do is engineer Seed Cultures with which to seed the new aeon. And so it all comes back to each of us, how we live, and to our children and how we raise them. We have two important things to consider as Time moves on: 1) Magian Ethos is what is killing the current West, in time this will be clear when its dogma of independence and individualism is understood to make each citizen a prey; 2) it's going to be a long ride before the fall, and so we need to each plan ahead and prepare our next generation to function optimally, better than the mundanes and their children.

It is a good thing that these mundanes will never give up their individualized state of existence. This makes it so that they are easy prey to our own next generation. If our next generation is a coherent and organized group, then they will have the means to hire, use, and abuse, the mundanes as work force to make each other rich and generate some leisure in their future lives. In a jungle the most collective dominate and thrive, not the biggest or strongest. A legion of army ants in a jungle trumps the biggest panther, and the little individualized bugs are no competition. The ONA's next generation just needs to learn to understand the value of all this Myattian talk of clans and tribes. Sooner or later it will be apparent to those with the capacity to think and understand. I'm personally done trying to convince the deaf, dumb, and blind.

In the years to come within this sick West, I really do believe that Myattian things like Folk Culture, Reichsfolk National-Socialism, The Numinous Way, and the ONA offer the Westerner working templates to recreate for themselves their own clans, tribes, and communitarian societies. They are each not "perfect" but nothing is and each Drecc and Niner must use their own brains to work the bugs out by old fashion trial and error. One of the benefits these Myattian things has is that they teach members of a clan, family to be proud of their culture and family. This breeds group solidarity and helps forge a group awareness or collective identity. Which is vital if a clan is to exist at all.

Honour – as silly as the word may sound to some in the West – as a praxis is the vital glue that makes a clan function. It is like the grease that makes gears turn smoothly. Acausal-Empathy is like the wordless knowing of when to push and when to pull, when to lead, and when to let go that makes dancing with a partner possible. Empathy will also be needed if a clan is to function productively. Duty is vital if a clan and family is to also function and bare fruit for mutual benefit. These three might seem simple and overlookable, but they are to a clan or any group structure, and as genuine daily praxis are hard to execute.

The Mythos and Methodology of the ONA gives the Drecc or Niner the practical means to apply the ideas and theories from the other Myattian things. It also provides a template for the manufacturing of new cultures, new traditions, and new rites of passage vital to any group of humans. Ideas are useless unless applied. Applying the ideas to get results is the hard part. Talking about future children and clans is easy, doing the work to make it all become a reality will take decades of dedication and effort. I predict that after another 40 years there will be two types of Nexions, the old kind made up of friends and associates, and the new kind made up of blood kin and real clan members.

Like Anton Long says somewhere, the most important work for the ONA to work on during this Phase Three of Feyen is Our Family. This is because the family – as in big groups of people bound by loyalty, honour, and duty, as well as blood and intimate association – is the enemy of any regime and system. The Magian system has been assaulting and eroding the natural human Family since Christendom. This should be very easy to see. You can either have people share and borrow cars from their siblings or divide them so they have no choice but to buy your cars you made. You can either live with your family or divide them so they can buy your houses and rent your apartments. You can either borrow money from your family, or divide that family up so those people have no choice but to borrow money from your bank. With no family to be Loyal to, you become a Patriot and support your Nation even with your life. But you can barely shed a tear when your own mother or brother goes hungry. With no family to owe Duty to, you become Employee of the Month. You'd rather devote your energy and time to make another person wealthy. But you turn a blind face and pretend that your grandparents in those homes don't even exist anymore, because you have no duty to them. They don't give you a weekly pay check. They use all your hard earned money don't they. With no family to honour, you honour your ideologies and become fanatics of your religions and parties. Rather than honour living bodies that can return the honour and care for you, you would rather honour dead letters and empty ideations. You don't even have nuclear families any more. They are just single parent house holds. That's the cool things these days for mundanes to be bred in.

Without a culture and tradition of some sort to ground yourself in, you seek religion, and the secular -isms like individualism and consumerism as your substitute "culture." Your modern approved Western "families" today has the family tradition of all waking up at 8AM in the morning to go to school and work your whole life. You now have the family tradition and culture of driving through the Drive Thru for a traditional family meal. You now have the culture of going into credit card debt. It's a rite of passage actually. You're not a real Western Magian man unless you are at least $5000 in debt when you are 21. You have the cultural rite of passage for girls becoming real women too. You're not a real grown woman unless you had sex when you were 15. Oh, let's not forget the new cultural crazy: facebook. And we can't forget the Father and Mother of modern Magian culture: Apple Inc & the Internet! Oh yes, the traditional cuisine of the Magian Western Culture: Coca Cola, Pizzahut, McDonald's, Big Size fries, and beer. And we can't forget the Fine Arts of the Magian West: The Kardashians, Jersey Shore, Oprah, and the local news.

But I'm not trying to save the world or anything. You mundanes can keep that Magian culture. As a Buddhist and ONA I know it is pointless to try and enlighten and educate you anariya mundanes. Nothing I have ever written and no ideas I have ever shared was ever written for any of you anariya mundanes to read. I consider all of you mundanes to be illiterate, meaning even if you can read the letters, you are incapable of Understanding the essence. The last thing I want is for you mundanes to wake up. For the sake of my future children, nieces, and nephews. Who will more than likely own your children's asses. Your children will feed mine, work for mine, and make mine rich. Keep in mind that as time passes, the chasm between my rich descendents and your poor children will be huge. And don't tell me I don't know what I'm talking about, because the several family businesses my family today owns has some of your Magian Americans Mundane kinfolk working for us. In context to just the mundanes that work for my family, my family owns the apartments they live in, the houses they lease, and the cars they lease, because they get the money to pay for such things from my family. Your Magian "Culture" literally breeds you to be an employee and to seek employment when you need money. You have immigrants in the millions coming into this country with their own cultures and clan-families who all teach their young generations to start up and own businesses, and work and live together. That alone should tell you something about what you have to expect in your future. I promise you mundanes one thing: you will starve, die, and rot alone in your individualism.

I have no care or concern for the anariya mundanes. I do care for those in the West with the spirit and sinister quality who know something is wrong with the West and who understand that what is wrong begins at the very societal and familial foundation of the fabric of Western civilization. You have been individualized for a reason. I sound like a broken record now. If you know that much then you know the only means to fight Magian Ethos is to live the opposite way those Mundanes live. However they live, live the opposite. Whatever they Believe, believe the opposite. The only practical way to fracture the Monopoly the State is by re-establishing over time the more human way of families based on clan and tribes. This not only gives you a group of bodies to depend on for mutual aid and mutual prosperity, but gradually it also redirects people focus away from a far off government they believe they depend on back to the numinous level of your immediate sphere of life. The Monopoly of Power the State has is based on the Dependency of its populous on "services" the government or regime offers. Such as "protection" for tax money, its money they print, its jobs they make, etc. The more you are Dependent on that State, the more powerless you are and the more powerful the State becomes. The less powerful you are, and the more powerful the State is, the easier it is for the regime to implement its policies and further own your life. It's simple "causal mathematics."

There is no difference literally between a street gang and a political regime. If you look at a street gang that owns territory in the form of a neighborhood, you first ask, how did they get that territory? By war, meaning killing rivals or competition. Then they set up shop and start to prey on their "citizens," in the form of dealing drugs to the neighborhood dwellers. If you study these gangs real close in different areas, you will see with your own eyes that the more Dependent those neighborhood residents are on the "services" their controlling gangs offer [drugs and protection], the more powerless – due to a real lack of desire even – to over throw the gang and liberate themselves. In the neighborhoods where the people don't buy the drugs and resist the gangs "services" such as protection, its easier for them to chase the gangs out in time. All you have to do is take that street gang scenario and expand it to the size of a continent or large landmass and you have what is called a State and its regime. It doesn't matter of the gang/regime elect themselves into power or if you elect them into power, they are simply a gang/regime who controls territory to exploit you as their vanquished "citizens." When did the American Indians lose their sovereignty and become matriculated into America as a subordinate group of people to the federal government? When they were vanquished.

Ending Remarks

I have a certain way of writing where I naturally mix my important ideas I want to actually talk about inside a picture painting made of word which tells stories about my life and which all is explained in different ways to the reader. There are several reasons why I do this. First is that I write how I think and formulate my own thoughts. This is just how or what my own thought process in my own head looks like as they form ideas. It all comes out mixed with memories of past experiences and I brake my own thoughts down into easier to understand things. Second reason is I simply write how I talk. Third reason is I think and talk and explain things the way my elders talk and explain things to me. This is how I get most of my knowledge and wisdom from my elders. All wrapped in stories of their past experiences and broken down into picturesque explanations. And so it is very easy for me to Understand what they are trying to share with me, and if I wanted to used those ideas they shared or incorporate them into my own mental system, it forces me to be able to truly grasp what they are saying so that I can extract or distill or refine out the essence of their talks.

My Bhikkhu grandpa once said us in a room: "I'd be a useless teacher if my students didn't understand a word I was teaching wouldn't I?" I have always found it hard to digest some things my peers in the West – those of my age and stuff –write because they lack this organic way of being taught things by elders through stories and picturesque explanations. Many of my peers have only an academic college or books they have read to follow the example of. So when they do write, it's often dry and clinical to me. As if they were writing an informational essay for college. They tend to cloud their essays with big words, the more the better they seem to believe. Sometimes their essays in word are verbose but in essence are barren. And when I as a reader or "student" may complain that I have a hard time understanding the writing, I am accused of being stupid and informed that perhaps I need an education to learn the big words they know.

In Theravada we call what my elders and I do "Upaya" which is a method of teaching or tricking people minds to understand an idea or tricking them to act or behave in some way. You need rapport and empathy to use do upaya. Meaning that as a teacher you need to know your target audience. Upaya is then the ability to take the essence of an idea and convey it into the Minds of a 5 year old and a 50 year old and have them both understand your idea in their own individual way according to their nature. There is just no point in teaching an idea or sharing a thought if the people you are speaking to do not understand you. The other productive benefit to upaya is that an idea which is able to travel into other Minds easy thus travels around easier. And therefore such thoughts are better able to inspire and influence more people.

I start off with a seed idea in my mind and then I pick out a handful of imaginary people or people I may know as my direct audience. Then slowly Unfold that seed thought using lexical words and pictures ideas my chosen audience may use. I use the personal stories to generate relation, meaning that perhaps when you read those stories you end up saying to yourself: "Ah, I had similar experiences, I can relate with that." Then I take the same essence of the story and rewrite it out through different picturesque explanations so that the reader hopefully understand as close as possible what exactly I am trying to convey. If I was successful, then the essence of the essay should have added a new insight to your perception and understanding of things. With the end hope the you will in your own way add on to those ideas and even do something.

The essence of this essay is simple. Getting rid of a State with force does not work because the a new regime will form or relatives of the old regime will find their way back to running your lives. The West – or at least America – won't get any better. It may even get worse. And so as future parents or one generation who will give birth to the next generation we each have a responsibility to give each generation we give birth to the tools, knowledge, and wisdom they will need to make the best of life in their era and time. Because things won't get any better, the next generation will need more refined tools to survive. The tools the Magian Ethos offers will strangle them and cause them to be exploited. Lack of real culture is something vital that is missing in America. No the whole West is cultureless. Most of Europe still have their ancestral root at least. It may not sound super sinister but the most empowering work the ONA can do for the next generation is to put into practice the simple concepts of honour and clan life the ONA and other Myattian things teach. This way the next generation will at least have some kind of infant culture that can grow. It only took on person – my late great grandpa – just one life time to presence into the world a real living group of people who practiced his new culture of Christianity.

Our Unborn are our most important work. Because those of us alive today will all die and our Unborn will inherit this world. If we really intuitively understand this death of one generation and emergence of another, and we truly understand what it is we mean by the word “world” than it should in time be able to understand that in its the culture and mindset with give to the Unborn that unfolds as their world. The ONA gives us a clew to how to aeonically influence the future when DM defines a Nexion as also being a person. It is through each person that the essence of something is expressed into Form via action and behaviour. Yes I know I misspelled clew. Spelled that way it means a Ball of String you throw into a maze to help lead people out. Can't find your way through a Labyrinth if you without clews. It is through the Unborn as nexions that our aeonic seeds unfolds in a future time frame. But for those seeds to unfold and even pass to and through their children, our Unborn nexions must be given every thing they need to function properly. Our Unborn should be as healthy as we can make them, as smart as we can teach them to be, and as cooperative with their own. They will need some kind of culture and tradition.

One of the positive aspects of traditional religions is that they offer a means of transmitting rites, traditions, and customs to a people across time and the succession of generations. Islam and Catholicism are two fine examples, which I actually admire. Although religion should be no substitute for natural human culture. They work better as something to supplement that natural human culture. But things like this with structure end up becoming something opportunistic people fight each other over for power and influence and wealth. Something like the ONA should be more like language. Where each user/speak actually has their own unique version of the ONA, and where each nexion and clan also has their own vernacular or dialect of the ONA. This way, like language, no one can ever claim to own the ONA and get very far beyond the simple claim. You can claim to be the leader of English all you want, but it's not going to get any further than the claim. But if you pay attention to a living culture, they are also like that. No one can realistically claim to own or be leader of a culture. A culture does not actually exist as a concrete thing. It is a mosaic made up of all the individual doings, observances, and practices of each person in that "culture."

I think that the ONA itself, as an Order – which is what the word sangha means – is a useful tool in the very same way the sangha of Buddhism was useful for 2500 years. As an Order it is made up of different people with related ideas and thoughts housed in our writings just like dhamma was housed in the Tipitaka. The sangha's monks just simply introduce their ideas out to each new generation so that those new generations have the sasana/practice. The ONA may one day through one or some of us evolve into such an Order, which introduces the "Nine Angles Tradition" to each new generation of the future. The Seven Fold Way already can serve the function of a sort of "monastic" priesthood. Actually "priest/priestess" is a title you assume in one of the Grades of the Seven Fold Way. The Dreccs and Niners are like the ariyasangha which is the other half of the Order. It's actually not accurate to refer to members of the Ariyasangha as "laity" because a "bhikkhu" is actually a beggar who specializes in memorizing dhamma and not a really a monk." If you call a member of the Bhikkhusangha a bhikkhu then you call a member of the ariyasangha an Ariya or Noble. Technically there are classes of Nobles, the "lowest" being the Upasika which means Assistant or Apprentice. Each class is only based on how many vows you hold. The ONA has its novices who are beginners. They start off by studying and reading. Then you have the next class who are the Dreccs and Niners that take the vows of The Sinister-Numen to live by that code of honour. Then you have a different class who practices the traditional things outlined in Codex Saerus and Naos. And so on.

As long as each of us in our own ways puts into practice the ONA in our lives, and as long as we stay somewhat organized, we can slowly work to seed the future aeonically through people we meet and progeny we make. I'd rather learn from the example of these ancient memplexes like Buddhism, Islam, and Catholicism which have proven to live a very long time, then from the example of new age books and the occult. One thing those three memplexes share in common is that they are full of ceremonies and rites that become traditions observed by their people. They also supplement a people's organic human culture instead of totally trying to replace it like Protestant sects operate. A Mexican in Mexico and an Italian in Italy can have different cultures, but the same Catholicism. A Bedouin from the Sahara and a Bangladeshi can have very different cultures, but share the same Islam and Islamic traditions. A person from Sri Lanka and somebody from Japan can have very different cultures, but share Buddhism. But the English language works like this too. This is one flaw I see in modern satanism. It inherited its parent's [Protestantism] attitude of watered down substitute culture based on nothing but pure ideation, ideology, and thinking with a different set of beliefs. You are left divested of culture, tradition, or any kind of practice in life. It's literally just an idea and label you carry in your head.

The problem I see with the design in the State/System of America is that it was made to maintain equilibrium and status quo and not progress collectively as a civilization. Most scientific and technological progress we have seen comes from the private sector or from the corporate sector. Any American history buff like me who is actually into every little detail of America's history and development cannot avoid something called Freemasonry. At least as far as independent study of history goes. If you dig deep enough and look in all your corners, you'll come across that organization several times and out of curiosity to fit the pieces of history together, you'll have to research Freemasonry also.

If you take a look at how the structure of Freemasonry is put together you'll see a republican system of government called a Grand Lodge. The officers are democratically elected. But the actual function of the Grand Lodge is to maintain regularity of the rites and the status quo of its organization. So you'll see that the Grand Master and most of the other officers have only a one year term. Before you can make up your mind to make any real progressive change, you're time in office expires. And setting change in motion while in office is still hard. Because during your one year term you can try to draft a new rule, but this has to be voted on the following year after your term is actually up. Then if your drafted legislation does not collect the required votes, they use a method of stalemating that legislation sometimes called a "carry over" when it is saved for the next year to be voted on again. There is only so many times that draft bill can do that carry over before it is killed.

After the revolution, the Founding Fathers had no other republican system of government to model their system after besides the Freemasonry that many of them belonged to. So you end you end up with a the US Constitution, which was inspired by British Freemasonry's "Anderson Constitution" which is perhaps the oldest functioning constitution of any republican styled system. The Grand Lodge system of Freemasonry which is all three branches in one was separated into three independent branches and this became our American Governmental system. The office of Grand Master of Freemasonry is renamed the "President," in the same line of thought where the Master of the Lodge is the actual "Presiding" head of his Lodge. The one year term of the Grand Master is extended to 4 years. Most important correlation to look at is that in a Jurisdiction of a Grand Lodge, it's common members of the Subordinate Lodges are subject to the rule of their Grand Lodge and they have no choice but to follow the laws past by the Grand Lodge they elected. They also actually have close to zero power and say in their jurisdiction other than the power to vote once or twice on things during voting season which is also in November for them. So you look at the Citizenship of America and you see the same conditions. The Citizen is subject to the rule of the government they elected, they have no freedom but to follow federal laws, and the only real "power" of self governance they exercise is the ability to vote a few times once a year. The entire governing system of America is designed only to maintain stasis and status quo and is not mechanized to be an actual dynamic and progressive civilization.

Another major problem in the American System is the actual "Policy Maker." In a kingdom you have the king who is the actual policy maker. He creates the policy and asserts it onto his populous. When the Founding Father's won their independence they took the concept of a king and turned it into what we today call a "Political Party." The policy maker is no longer a person, but a set of principles, beliefs, and ideological theories, which has a base of people who support those theories and seek to assert those policies onto the populous. Whereas in a kingdom a king only lives for a good 90 years and if you don't like how he governs the land you can kill him, with a Political Party, the Party lives longer than one life time, and you can assassinate a political party if you did not like how it is running the place. The problem arises when not only do you have a separate President who only serves for for 4 years, but now you have many Political Parties, each with their own policies and agendas. You end up with a system designed from the beginning to only maintain its generic equilibrium and which system ends up going in circles because of the back and forth transition of Political Parties. The only thing that really manifests out of such a system is debt and control of the populous for the sake of control. At least with an empire of kingdom, you did have national debt, but you also had national fruit to show for that debt, such as expansion of territory, etc.

Where is the collective energy of America being focused? With collective entities such as an army or kingdom you actually had something dynamic where the collective force of the army or kingdom was focused on various "projects" and interests such as expanding territory or even exploration of new lands. So you can see that as an entity something like an empire funnels it's people's collective for on productive endeavours, so there was appropriate reasons for national debt at times to fund such projects. But what exact is the collective creative force of the 300 million Americans focused on to actualize? Corporate Labour is the answer, and the by products of such corporate labour, such as opening new markets. What do I mean by "opening new markets?" I mean what happened in the 1800's when Japan was a closed society and nation that would not allow America to trade and access it's market? America used force to open up Japan. Then back at home because of the new market, some new jobs were created to put citizens to work. Or the other byproduct of corporate labour, which the acquisition of needed resources to maintain a corporation and manufacture goods. If a energy requires oil to make and your companies need energy to make products, then oil is a resource that is very important to keep your corporate system functioning and to keep you citizens busy. And so it's no surprise that the West sticks its nose into the business of countries with oil. And our West goes so far as to make Capitalism and Consumerism as the Culture of the West. So in the end we end up with a civilization based on a really useless concept: the concept of making some people very rich. You're left asking: and than what? After you have made your billions, then what?

As diseased and dysfunctional [or pointless] as the West is right now, I still am conservative about the status quo of the world order. Meaning that I do not believe in the equality of civilizations and that it should remain as it is now. I would rather have a sick West which at least values freedom and creativity to lead the world and thus humanity, than to have the Islamic civilization be top dog in the world order to lead the world into shariah law. I reject the concept of ecumenism and egalitarianism on a global level, a ideological level, and a people level. Not every ideological doohicky is equally good and productive. Not every person or culture is productive or constructive or intelligent, with equal amounts of reason and understanding. Not every nation should influence the rest of humanity. Those people or nations or ideologies that have actually proven their worth via fruit and end results are what should lead the order of things. In this regard, I still believe in the Supremacy of the West and that the West still has a Destiny to manifest. Even if it is sick at the moment. Capitalism and our current system of government has just taken us as far as it can go and broke down or is breaking down like an old car. We just need to collectively [the zeitgeist] wake up with a paradigm shift and fix it.

Destiny is just a goofy word I use to mean Vipaka, or the aeonic End Fruit of a causal input. For example if I have the resolve to hike up a hill and I actually put my body in motion to climb that hill, then we can say that being at the top of the hill is my Destiny, or that I am Destined to be at the top. It's from the Latin word Destinare, which means to Establish or Make Firm, as in to be Determined to materialize an Intent or Purpose, which is what the old French "Destinee" meant. If I have the intent or purpose of visiting Tokyo and I actually bought a plane ticket and drove myself to the airport, then because of the causal input I have set in motion, it becomes my Destiny that I Will be in Tokyo the next day. But just because it is Destined to be, does not always mean that it is guaranteed. Because my plane can crash into the ocean before I get there. Then that is called Fate.

Fate is when you experience the end fruit of someone or something's causal chain reaction. When another person's Destiny crosses your path. An airplane is over flown and a crack develops in the wing. The people that should have inspected the wings for defects felt lazy that day so they didn't. I got on the plane to fly to Tokyo. It is fated that I die in the plane crash, because of the causal events set into motion by different wyrdful streams of causal input. And then Wyrd would be the messy spiderweb network of lines aeonic lines of fate and destiny crisscrossing which we are all inside. 300 million people lost in the samsara of the "State" of America is a collective wyrd, or we can say that the System is the Wyrdful result of the collective causal input of 300 million people.

If you pay attention to the murmuring of the zeitgeist of the West and Japan, you'll see that from our collective psyche there still bubbles to the surface visions and desires and dreams to colonize space and to exist in some sort of future environment that is different than the world we live in today. Usually these murmurings bubbles up in the form of science fiction movies and books, but sometimes it inspires scientists and inventors to try and make new things. If you were to just compare our collective hopes and murmurings of our Western Zeigeist with the collective mind of other civilization you'll see the big difference. The only real murmuring you feel come out of the Islamosphere is the destruction of Israel and global shariah, which is actually petty on the scale of humanity and human potential. I don't even know what the collective mind of Africa is murmuring for, maybe for food and clean water and money. China is collectively done murmuring for wealth and superpowerdom, they are now inputting their causal inputs to actualize their murmurings. So we can say that it is their destiny as a people to one day because of their new found capitalism be a rich and respected country. But keep in mind that the West has been there and done that. We're already rich and respectable, and capitalism can't take us any further. The West is broken right now, but the spirit of the West still murmurs and still yearns to reach high for the stars and for greater potential. We just need that paradigm shift to awaken everybody up to the reality and possibility a new aeonic vehicle that will manifest our Western Destiny.

Until that day comes when the West does experience that shift, the mundanes in the West will be enthralled or attached to their broken system until all Hell breaks loose. They are a breed of people who are very short sighted and weak minded. The anariya cannot be awaken unless they hit rock bottom first. Otherwise they will reject any help. Which means that between now and a future collapse of the System, those of us Aware in the West need to wise up and act accordingly and plan ahead. We are each thus responsible for our next generation's well being. Those of us in the ONA who are influenced by Myattian thought must try hard to keep Magian Ethos in all its Forms from infecting our Unborn. The next generation needs to learn how to live in a more collective or communitarian way. Even if we don't raise our future children up as criminals and Jihadists, there are still many aspects of the ONA and the other Myattian things that serve as templates to forge a culture and clan out of. Whatever we do, our next generation, being a product of our causal work here on this earth, are each living testimonies of our own worth. For, the results of our actions speak louder than our ideological beliefs. The Fate of our Unborn, literally, rests in each of our hands.

THE POWER OF MYTHOS

The Power Of Mythos

That's like a word play of Joseph Campbell's book called "The Power Of Myth." Which was a great book by the way. I think during my college years I read and watched every book and PBS thing Mr. Campbell ever did. I love authors and book like that. Unfortunately over the many years since I began reading on my own I've trained my Mind to be very selective with information. It's just that I am a voracious reader in real life. I'll read the back of shampoo bottles in the shower even. And so I just have no room in my brain to remember the titles over every thing I read. I just unconsciously retain only exactly what I need. Which all sinks into my unconscious part of my Mind as just potentials. Then I'll use mental devices to draw up those ideas when I need them.

I've also read every book and saw most documentaries by Graham Hancock and his pseudo-archeological speculations. I love how he goes around to all these ancient places and temples like Indiana Jones and from just a pile of stone he can fabricate all these fantastical stories of a lost civilization of Atlantis buried beneath the ice of Antarctica. Then he changed his mind and thought Greenland was Atlantis. But then he changed his mind again and said it may have just sunk into the ocean after all.

I have all these people that have either inspired me or been an influence on me and how I think and see things besides DM/AL. Like the other great British guy, Alan Watts. I first found Alan Watts when I was in junior high. When I was a baby I used to cry nonstop and the only way I went to sleep was if my parents played the radio or TV on a boring station. So I've had this weird thing ever since then where I always have my radio playing softly by bed set to a very boring station where people just talk so I can fall asleep tranquilly. So in junior high I found KPFK [90.7] and used it as my background station to fall asleep to since it was had a lot of talking.

Every Friday nights at 12AM KPFK has this all nighter yap fest from Midnight to 6 in the morning of the world's most boringest shit ever. Which was perfect because I fell asleep real peacefully. So every now and then on Fridays the station would play talks by Alan Watts, to which I fell asleep to. But gradually I ended up staying half awake to listen to things this guy had to say because I had suddenly grew interested in him and what he knew about Buddhist, Zen, and Taoism. So instead of helping me stay awake, I found myself staying up all nights every Fridays in bed.

That station also had these cool talk shows Friday nights where people with boring voices would read science fiction novels. They'd read a few chapters on Friday. Then a few more the next Friday. There were some really great stories that you can daydream to. But the irritating thing was you had to wait a whole week to get the other parts of the stories. And then they played this great kind of Techno-Ambient music in between their talk shows which I really liked. There was this one artist I really loved to listen to who had his own weird style of music. The music was a techno-Ambient beat but the guy instead of singing or rapping he just talked like he was telling stories about crazy things he did and how he felt doing them.

There was this one song I still remember where the music would play for 2 minutes, then he'd come in and whisper how he was walking one night past a old building, and he spent time describing in detail what the building looked like. Then the music would play for another 2 minutes. He comes back and whispers about him going into the building and how he was frightened of the dark, how his heart was beating, how it smelled of mildew inside. Then the music would play for 2 minutes. He comes back and explains in detail how he uncapped his gasoline cans and began to pour gas around the building, and how his heart was throbbing out of fear from being caught. Then the music would go for 2 minutes. He comes back and describes how he left the building and struck a match and ran to hide in a bush to watch. The music goes for 2 minutes. He comes back and the music in the back ground begins to pick up and he's now talking in a louder tone about how the building was consumed by a bright flame and the smell filled the night air, and how he was masturbating to his work of art he made which made him orgasm from the glory of the flames that lit the night. Then the music falls and comes to a stop. I remember laying there on my bed, visualizing his narrative as if I were in the scene and at the end I said to myself: "Wow, that was intense! I can't believe they play this stuff on the radio. I wanna be an arson too!"

I have a lot of other influences besides elders in my family. Minister Louis Farrakhan is a huge influence on me. When he was younger though. Today with all of his talk about Mother Ships and all, he just went somewhere I can't go [off the deep end]. I love watching him preach. His style of preaching actually is the influence or inspiration, not what he talks about. Then there are normal living people I encounter somehow that either is a source of inspiration, influenced my Mind somehow or contributes Knowledge to my personal bank vault of Knowledge. Like Beesty Boy and his contributions to the ONA as well as his Ex-Ordo works. I've always secretly found his Caelethi, Sinister Tarot, The Tree of Wyrld, and SIR to be a source of esoteric insight. Magister Hagur whom is a personal hero of mine. He's 70 years old and he's still mad repping ONA in his own way. Hagur is a very intelligent man. I love his books "Becoming Another God," "Dark Forces Words," & "The Dark Gods In The Spheres," which can all be found at his site HERE.

Then there are those people I follow whom I find online that have contributed their ideas/memes and Knowledge base and have influenced my thoughts and/or thought process. And these few may not even know me. People like MindFux from L316 wherever he is found in those networks. Dan Dread wherever he is found as well. I read Satanic Forums on a regular basis, so I end up picking out a few people I follow who have ideas and insights. Then there is Jason King. I've watched many of his videos and read his Postmodern Satanism book several times with a dictionary.

So I have a diverse resource of people and minds I draw from for raw material knowledge with which I end up building my own thoughts with. Why is the Tipitaka called the 3 Baskets? Because in ancient times workers used baskets to convey Raw Material to build things with. What do you do with Raw Material? You build with it. The stuff in the Tipitaka and the Knowledge we accumulate are only Raw Material. Knowledge is not the end of the Process. Only the beginning.

So those are just some people I find in some way, form, or other to be inspiring or influential; besides my two obvious influential giants Buddha & "You Know Who." I just didn't want people thinking I was some closed system where I'm just putting out "original" ideas left and right and that I'm so special I don't need outside inspiration and influenced. Quite the opposite actually. I just restate things others have already said and thought, sometimes for over a thousand or 2 thousand years. It's just that I simply take that Raw Material and build my own things with it for my own end purposes: ONA.

As far as Thought-Patterns goes, I personally classify Thought-Patterns – or "memes" – into 3 major species: 1) Speculative Knowledge, 2) Practical Wisdom, & 3) Mythos. Each are very different from the other and each function differently. Each are needed to engineer a fully functional Culture/Memplex.

Knowledge

What do I mean by "knowledge?" I mean Raw Data or Raw Information which you and I can collect and accumulate from whatever sources or resources. Knowledge is not Gnosis. Just because you have a data bank stuffed with Knowledge does not mean you have Awakened to Realize anything [gnosis]. Otherwise our computers would be enlightened beings. Knowledge is just random idea and data. The sun is an orange class star, that's a bit of knowledge. People are biological organisms, that's a bit of knowledge. Time flows "forward," that's knowledge. The more knowledge you have, the more Raw Material you have to build with.

I break the word Knowledge into two separate words and further break them down: Know and Ledge. Meaning to Know your Ledge. A Ledge in Old English is a Legge; from the verb Leggen. Back in those times a Ledge was a Cross Bar or Barrier. Like a cross bar on a door to lock it, or a Bar of a gate. Have you ever been to a paid parking lot where at the paying booth there was a Bar, that's a Legge. Have you ever heard the expression: "Pass the Bar?" That phrase comes from olden times when to take your exam to be a lawyer you had to cross the Legge of a gate of a Knights Templar compound in England to get to your exam place.

Back in those Medieval ages your village had a Legge. To cross it you needed an official paperwork giving you permission to leave your village. Like a hall pass at school. It was a crime punishable by death to wander outside the Legge of your village in those dark ages. You did not have any rights or business walking around beyond the Limits set and established for you. Where does the word "Villain" come from? A common villager. As a "citizen" you have Limits your authorities have set for you. You stay in those Limits if you are to be a "good" citizen. Leave those Limits and you are a heretic, villain, and a criminal: a threat to an established system meant to keep you in your place.

Do you Know your Ledge? When you have discovered a Ledge in Life or mentally, religiously, socially, physically, sexually, or politically, do you Cross that Ledge to expand your World, or do you choose to stay inside your diminutive Limits set for you by others? You know you have met up with a Ledge in Life when you say to yourself: "Nah, I ain't fucking with that shit. Satanism, nah, I heard from random people that shit is crazy." You know you have met up with a Ledge when you defend with conviction and passion your democracy, your capitalism, or your religion not knowing actually of an alternative and not allowing yourself to go beyond that Limit. The Limit of simply being born and raised and conditioned inside a democracy, capitalism, and your religion, your whole life. How do you Know of better alternatives, if you have never ventured outside of your Ledge? The more Ledges a person has the more diminutive and retarded their minds are. "Sheltered" is the word. Sheltered in the comfort of Bars.

Wisdom

You will never Know anything unless you cross your limits. Jumping that Ledge is the first step to Gnosis or Buddhi. KnowLedge is the first step. So the question can be asked of us: Once we Know something what do we do with that Knowledge? Which takes us to Wisdom.

I break Wisdom down into two "words," Wis and Dom. Wis etymologically comes from the really Old English word Weid meaning to "See," and is related to the Sanskrit word Veda, meaning Knowledge. To See meaning you can't See shit unless you are directly standing in front of it. Which in Theravada is called Pacchakka, meaning to See shit directly with your own eye balls. Later Pacchakka was renamed Vipassana. Dom as in a kingDOM. From the Old English word Cyningdom. Which back then was also rendered as Kingrick. A Rick/Reich and a Dom/Domr meant the same thing: a domain or place in the Realm of Nature. Realm of Nature would be the Causal realm in ONA speak.

So Wisdom is taking what you See and have come to Know from seeing, and applying it in Life, or the Realm of Nature for results. Google Wisdom and you'll get a page of the same definition. Wisdom is the application of knowledge.

The word Way/Ways and the word Wise are the same words. Way as in a Manner or Method or methodology of Doing something. As in the word Otherwise, meaning and suggesting that there is an Other Way of doing something. Or the word Likewise, meaning a Like Way. As in the words Anyway/Anywise. To be Wise means to Know the Way of Doing something.

So in practical terms to Know is to have read you car's owner's manual from front to back. The data you have collected is what is called Knowledge. You take auto shop in school to See with your own eyes what Knowledge you have collected. In auto shop you physically take cars apart and put them back together to gain the Knowledge of the Way and Manner a car is put together and how the parts work together. Once you have gone thru the Experience of applying your Knowledge, you have the Wisdom of how cars work. You are Wise with cars.

Understanding

Something happens to you inside gradually as you are directly exposed to the experience of putting together cars. It's a Realization or an Emotional/Intuitive Apprehension, when you say to yourself: "Oh, I See, this part and that part does such and such, that's why a car works." That's called Understanding, Gnosis, Buddhi, Revelation, Realization. It's when the Essence/Potential of that Knowledge has Unfolded like a flower and you finally smell it's fragrance. Like the smell of coffee waking you up – Awakened/Buddha – in the morning. Knowledge is like looking at a picture of a flower. Wisdom is the act of planting the flower plant. And Understanding is smelling the flower.

I break Understanding down to two words: Under & Stand. Under coming from the Sanskrit "Antar" meaning Among, Between; the Latin "Inter" meaning Among and Between as in International; and from the Greek "Entera" meaning your Guts and Insides. Together it means to Stand Among, Stand in Between, Stand Inside and in the presence of something. To fully Understand a culture or Kung Fu, you have to actually Immerse yourself inside that culture and be among kung fu artists and teachers Directly face to face, body to body. You go thru the Experience of taking apart and putting cars back together, and you develop an Understanding of how the car functions.

It's like relationships. You'll never genuinely Know how and what boys or girls are unless you have put yourself inside a relationship with one or several and directly experience them. You'll never Understand a marriage and what its all about unless you Stand Under/Inside/Among/Between a marriage and directly Experience it. That concept of standing directly before and among something for Gnosis in Theravada is called Vibhajjavada, the doctrine [Vada] of Direct Exposure [Vibhajja]. In ONA and the Nunimous Way we have a similar – yet not the same – concept in Pathei-Mathos.

So we can ask ourselves: Who teaches us or gives us our Understandings of things? Who can give us our Gnosis, our Buddhi, our intuitive apprehensions, our Acausal Knowings? The answer is no one can. Understanding is a personal realization of something which can only happen Inside your own self.

And so in Brahmanism we have the concept of Sambodhi which means Self-Realization. And in Theravada we have the concept of Sambuddhi which means Self-Enlightenment. They are the same words in different times and dialects. The Buddha is called the Sambuddhassa, the One Who Understood things by Himself. Because you can only Understand or Realize things by yourself and on your own terms.

The story of the Buddha goes that after he ditched his kingdom he had been confronted by the 4 Adversaries of Life: Old Age, Sickness, Death, and a Shramana. Seeing that Life was not as pretty as he was raised to believe it was he became a begging Shramana: one who lives Among/Between the Shram [struggle/adversity] of Life. Beggar in Pali is Bhikkhu which is mistranslated into English as “Monk.” They are not monks, they are people who have ditched the system and become self induced beggars. Or at least they used to be.

As a Shramana the young Siddhartha wandered around India and joined every sect and Brahmanist cult he could find to try to figure out why life was so adverse, why it was such a struggle, why people suffered, etc. he bounced around from guru to guru and was never satisfied with any answers these religions and sects were giving him. He ended up accusing them of replacing his ignorance with just more ignorance. So he retreats into the forest to immerse himself in Life: the Forest, to see how exactly life works. So the time he spent with sects and gurus is him collecting his Knowledge, Raw Data. Putting himself directly in front of Life to see the Wise it works is the process of gaining Wisdom.

Under the Bo Tree one day while meditating he recalls a moment when he was a child. His father had taken him outside his palace and the boy Siddhartha spied in the distance a farmer plowing his field. He noticed that the plow had unearthed an earthworm which was wiggling on a clump of dirt. He saw a bird fly by, took the worm, and fed it to her babies in her nest. And Siddhartha at that moment Understood the fundamental process of Life: Causal Mechanics. He suddenly Realized – Buddhied – that people suffer from a complex association of causal inputs. The first major input is the ignorant actions of the person themselves: stupid people reap stupid results. The second source of input is the actions set in motion by others around them: steal someone’s pigs and they suffer. The third source of input to suffering was set into causal motion by nature itself: monsoons might water plants but they can drown people. The fourth source was set into motion by the peoples religions: if you believe in a caste system, you will be put into a caste. And the fifth was set into motion by the internal function of the kingdom the people lived in: military actions, economic action, laws and punishment. So he became known as the Buddha: the Awakened Guy. And the Samma Sambuddhassa: the Guy who by Himself Understood [sambuddhassa] the Whole Thing [samma].

Speculative & Operative

I’m putting speculative knowledge and practical wisdom into the same topic header because I really don’t want people thinking one is “better” than the other. They are just two different species of Thought-Patterning. In western philosophy they are referred to as Practical Reason, and Speculative Reason. There are hence, not one but two types of Reason.

Both types can be found in science. Speculative Knowledge are theories, hypotheses, conclusions, and beliefs. Practical Wisdom/Reason in context to science would be the 4 steps of the scientific method. You believe in one, and you follow/apply the other. But if you pay close attention, you’ll notice that at least with science your speculative knowledge is supported by your practical wisdom: the Way, Method, or Methodology of the Practical steps of the scientific method. One is born from thinking/speculating whereas the other is born from Doing/Experience.

Each can give rise to the other. For example if one day you saw a fish eat a worm, and you speculate: “Hmm, if fish eat worms, and I put a worm on a hook???” And you apply that speculative reasoning and actually fished for fish, then your act of fishing and generating results supports your speculations, which was born from your speculations. Then when you tell people: "Put worms on hooks to catch fish" it is called practical wisdom. Because you experienced it, gained your wisdom from the act, and if other followed it they get the same results. You debate and argue speculative knowledge, but you can't debate or argue Practical Wisdom. No more than you would win a debate after being told: "Don't drink and drive." Because even if you did win such a debate, when you drive your ass home drunk, you'll either kill people or yourself. Which was the end result the practical wisdom was trying to prevent in the first place. Practical Wisdom in this case because others have driven drunk and have killed people or were killed.

Practical Wisdom is more important to tribes and living cultures. Usually in context to living culture practical wisdom is referred to as things like Customs, Traditions, Our Way of Doing, Our Way of Life. The practical wisdom of a tribe develops over time. I'll give a great example that happened last year.

My aunt-mother went to the hospital after she fainted. We all freaked out but the doctors said that she'd be fine and my aunt-mother went back home. In a matter of months she lost a ridiculous amount of weight and was always tired. Then she started to develop these weird sores and bubbles around her abdomen which were filled with green liquid. Her husband took her to the doctors again over this. The doctors checked her and said there was nothing wrong with her but they removed the green bubbles and sent her home.

Later the green bubbles came back and she fainted again. We took her to the doctors again freaked out. This time the doctors said there was something seriously wrong with her [duh]. They checked her with an ex-ray they found a lump the size of a grapefruit in her abdomen. They rushed her to surgery to remove it. It was a big ball of green fluid. They couldn't figure out where it was coming from. The doctors said she'd have to have a tube connected to this thing to drain it because they didn't know how to stop it.

They let her come home with a tube in her side. And every day a little pint of green fluid was drained. But she got worse. She couldn't eat any more. She had lost her appetite, when she ate things it was like the food didn't do anything for her. She couldn't walk anymore because she was literally took weak. Her husband took her to the hospital again. This time after the doctors told us that they will have to cut her open and look around and remove a few things if her condition or she will die.

Meanwhile my grandmother and the elders and my aunt-mother's oldest sister and brother had seen the green bubbles on my aunt-mother. The elders recognized what was going on with her and they recalled as part of their ancestral tradition passed down to them by their elders before that a tea made from a certain plant we call Marris Prow would fix her. Marris Prow is an herb and extremely aromatic in soup. The strength of its aroma is like oregano. It has heart shaped leaves and the leaves are ridged. My aunt-mother's oldest sister said that she had a huge bush of Marris Prow in her back yard she cooks with every other day. So the elders planned on take that Marris Prow and buy as much as they can elsewhere and give it to my aunt-mother.

Except there were problems. First her husband was so freaked out he didn't trust old traditional remedies. He said that he can't risk her life for herbal tea. It's irrational. The doctors know what to do. So everybody got into an argument and fight with him. My oldest aunt ended up saying that it's her sister, and that they were sisters before he married her. That her blood and sister's life is in her hands not his. He's just a husband she found. The other elders got into the fight and said, my uncle-dad is young and ignorant of the old tradition, and thus has no understanding of what is happening to her and how to fix her. After the fight my uncle-dad just let things be and said to do whatever then. The other problem was the doctors. There was this big fight with our family and the doctors at the hospital. The doctors said that they wanted to cut her open and see what is wrong with her or she'd die. My grandmother said to hell with that, her daughter is not a farm pig they can just cut open on a whim. Especially since none of them really knows what is wrong with her. The doctors threatened our family and said that if my aunt-mother dies, we'd all go to jail for murder. My oldest aunt said: "Fine. I'm willing to go to prison for life for my sister. I'm not like you and your dishonorable people. That's my sister, my blood, not yours."

They wheel chaired my aunt-mother to my grandmother's house, and we brewed that Marris Prow for her to drink 5-6 times a day. She'd drink liters of it every day. In only one month she was walking again and the green fluid had stopped coming out. Three months later she had gained nearly all her weight back because she was eating so much. She took herself to the doctors to have that tube from her side removed. The doctors checked her and said that she was perfectly fine.

So Practical Wisdom here means that its a species of knowledge which was not born from randomly speculating about things. Such Wisdom was born over long period of real living pathai-mathos of seeing people die and some people survive something like the weird condition my aunt-mother went through. The Practical Wisdom of using that herb Marris Prow to cure that condition was not speculative knowledge, not something which is a belief, or a theory. It was applied by many generations and people over time and to such people proven to work. You can't argue or debate a people or culture's body of practical wisdom they have accumulated, because such people have tried and seen the results.

The thing to keep in mind though is that to those people who have gone thru that pathai-mathos and experience and saw the proof, it is practical wisdom. But to "outsiders" unaware of such things, it can be speculative in nature. Such people with such practical wisdom have an Understanding of their practical wisdom born from direct experience and application. Outsiders who have not gone through that experience do not have that Understanding. So what is the bridge between Knowledge and Understanding? Wisdom. The wisdom born from personal and direct experience is the Bridge between what we have come to Know and what we will come to Understand. Wisdom is the nexion in other words between what what we Know in our Mind, and what we Realize in our Heart. So the steps to Understanding are: Mind, Body, Heart/Chitta. Mind as in Knowledge. Body as in Physical Action or the physical application of knowledge in the world to generate Wisdom, Heart as in the Inner apprehension of the Essence.

The three steps are the same stages expressed in the idea of the triple Goddess: maiden, mother, and crone. And also in the concept of Youth, Manhood, and Dotage. In our Youth as Maidens of boys we collect our Knowledge in Life, from our clans and people, from school. In our Middle age as mother or Man, we apply what Knowledge we have learned from our people to gain Wisdom. As in a Warrior ends up over time with the wisdom of war. As a mother who has experienced motherhood has the wisdom of mothering children to teach inexperienced ones. In our Elderly years as crone or old man, we gain a deep Understanding of Life from what deeds and actions we applied and committed in our past. And with that Understanding as Elders of a people we pass such Understandings down to the next generation and onward as gifts which were the fruit of a Life we lived in fullness.

This is one thing that turns me off about Western religions and culture. It's that many Occidental religions is unbalanced and mostly speculative. To clarify the difference speculative is what you can juggle in your head. Practical is like boot camp. There is nothing to believe in boot camp. Boot camp is not a philosophy, or spiritually, or paradigm, or worldview. It's just a Way of doing something others have done before. And after doing it you gain a corpus of Wisdom born from the experience which you simply cannot obtain from books.

I love how in Buddhism the Buddha gives you a list of the requisites that defines Dhamma as a dhamma. One of those requisites is that a dhamma must be testable in application and the conclusion the same for anyone who tests and applies it. In other words what the Buddha was saying is that when he says Cause and Effect is a dhamma or phenomenon that you yourself should and must test that out and see for yourself if an effect comes into being from a cause. So if someone came to you and said that a dhamma is that a blue skinned god named shiva is "real" and you and others can't test that dhamma to see a blue skinned god yourself, then it is not a dhamma or phenomenon of Nature, no matter how they bend, twist, and parse their beliefs. Belief in something is very different from Doing something and gaining a personal Understanding of it.

And so a teacher is limited in what they can do for you. A teacher can only give you raw data, and he may also only be able to Guide you into the Experience of something. The Wisdom and Understanding must be up to you to manifest and come into. There is no such thing in this regard as a "teacher" who can teach you to be Wise and Understand things, because Wisdom is born from personal and practical application/deed, and Understanding is born inside each of us. No more than your mother or father can manifest inside of you the Wisdom and Understanding of what it is like to be a mother or father. You have to; by the very Nature of Mind, Experience and Realization; come to those things on and by your own time, terms, and means. Their guidance can only come to you in the form of Practical Wisdom based on what they themselves may have learned. Anybody who comes to you and says that they can teach you to be wise and understanding of things, themselves have no real practical grasp of how the Mind works, and what wisdom and understanding are.

When mundane Satanist say: "Satanism is a philosophy" are they saying that it is speculative or practical? Speculative. What's a very familiar reaction we hear after someone has read the Satanic Bible? We hear them say: "Wow, it was like I were reading my own thoughts!" Is that speculative ideology or practical wisdom? If it were practical wisdom we'd hear people say: "Dude, I was experimenting with that shit just last week and the Satanic Bible somehow precisely expressed my very conclusions! It's like me and LaVey went through the same shit!" You know what I'm talking about, when we go crying to our best friend about something our boyfriend did, and our best friend goes: "Mmm hmm, I feel you girl, he sounds just like my ex." She said that because she has been through an actual Experience similar to what we were going through. And what advise she may give based on her experience is practical wisdom.

And this is my biggest turn off about Occidental memplexes. It's almost all speculative and zero practical wisdom. It's all a nice a pretty mix of spirituality, philosophy, ideology, theory, belief, and a lot of fantastical stories. And some of them [Jehovah's Witnesses, Satanists, etc] even go so far as to tell me their speculative religions are a "way of life." Like I'm stupid like them. Like I can't tell the difference between a fucking thought juggling in my head and doing shit in life. How is it a "way of life?" Did it make you gay? It gave you weird medical conditions? Are you Amish now? You're praying 5 times a day and planning a hajj now? Are you robbing people now whereas before you were law abiding? Did it give you an alternative to working a job? Did it give you a tribe to live with? Are you living in caves instead of houses like everybody else now? Can you seriously look at others around you not of your religion and say that you seriously live different from them? No you can't.

If I wanted to believe in something, I'd speculate the stuff up on my own. It's sad that it seems like the only place to find genuine practical wisdom in the West these days is in cook books and family recipes. Otherwise people today seem to treat ancestral wisdom like it were a disease to be avoided. You can love your grandpa, but whatever you do just don't do what he says! He's senile and he's from the 1930's. People today in the West got that Liberal Fever. They're fevering to be liberated and free from some old timer era. There's no place from practical ancestral wisdom. We have better things today like speculative mathematics and mainstream material science. The English word Elder is archaic now. People look at me like I'm an illegal alien when I use the word Elder. It's like they say: "Damn, that bitch just cross the boarder from Canada or something! She be talking that crazy immigrant talk, Elder and shit! She's got old people in her family, hang her!"

It's one thing I really like about the ONA. It's actually genuinely different, if you learn to actually see it with my eyes. There is a side to it that is practical. It has its practical wisdom. People like AL and the OG's back in the days – and still today – really did walk the walk and do the dirty work. When people like AL talk about subversion and sinister deeds, they mean it. It's documented. AL went to prison a couple times for putting in the dirty work and was under investigation by several law agencies and countries for his alleged-supposed-unproven-speculative-rumored connexion to some bomber in London who was associated with a group that was trying to ignite a race war. Now I'm not saying there is any connexion between any parties I named here. It's just worth noting that the ONA seeks to disrupt society and in the old days race war was the strategy and coincidentally there was some alleged group AL was supposedly said to have been associated with which just so happened have the same racial objectives. But the point is ONA Elders like AL back in the day walked the walk and put in the dirty work. So when they share their insights with us its Practical Wisdom based on things they have put into application. It's not speculative theories. And just like dhamma or a set of Dark Scientific experiments, if you and I would just put in the time to apply these methods, we'd get the same sinister results.

Mythos

Before the groups, tribes, clans, nations, culture, religion, practical wisdom, and speculative reasoning, there was and must first be Mythos. Mythos is what brings Like together with Alike. Mythos is the sound of the bell which causes the resonance. Mythos is when you place a thousand crystal goblets on a table and hit your tuning fork to Draw Out those that resonant with that vibe. Like attracts Like, but you have to find your Alikes somehow if you desire to form a group, family, clan, etc.

An example of the use of an easy mythos to engineer a coherent group was when I was at my second high school and my friends and I started talking the Asian Only rhetoric around campus to create a crew of Asians Only. The rhetorical mythos was just a device to collect people together and race was the easiest thing to use.

Another example is the Mythos of how the Khmer people came into existence. You have a Naga Princess named Mera bathing along the sea side and a Brahmanist Prince named Kambu who saw her and fell in love with her. They fell in love and mated and had what were called the Kamera, which is the ancient and current poetic form of Khmer. There is a part of the indigenous Mythos placed before this time of Kambu and Mera about how the people came to be living in Southeast Asia. The Mythos goes that the ancestors had come from Northern India and were back then known as the Kambuja. The Kambuja were a Kshatriya Tribe known for being very good with horses in battle. So when the epic war in the Mahabarata broke out the Brahmin Elder named Drona had come to ask the whole Kambuja Tribe to fight the war on his people's side. The tribal elders of the Kambuja knelt before the Holy Drona and offered them their lives and service in the great war for Krishna.

The war was won eventually. In return for their timely service the great Brahmin Drona called the elders of the Kambuja tribe and said to them: "Because your people gave your service in battle in my name and honour, in return I will give your people your own land and empire. I will throw my staff into the air and wherever it lands shall your land." And Drona threw his magickal staff across the air and it landed in the Southeast Asian peninsula.

As a Mythos, it is irrelevant whether this narrative is true or false, historical or fabricated. The intent of a Mythos has nothing to do with factual or fabricated presentation of information. The intent of a Mythos is to manufacture a culture and praxis. For there to be a culture, you need at least a group of people sharing a common identity, common views, and common way of doing things. And this is what a Mythos does.

The fact is the indigenous population of Southeast Asia since ancient times were a people called the Mon. These are the same people by the same demonym in Burma. They used to be everywhere in the peninsula. The Mon and the Khmer are the same people. They even speak the same language of the same language family: Mon-Khmer. My late great grandpa who just past, when he was working politics once worked a charity for the Mon people in Burma. During that time he lived and spoke to the Mon people. He said he was shocked to find out that he was able to understand without much difficulty the Mon language. The word Mon in Khmer means First, as in the First people to be there. Strangely Mon and Moun means resembles the Greek word Mono. The old people say that before the Khmer called themselves Khmer they went by the name Mon.

What basically happened was that after traders from India had settled the area and Indian culture had spread and inspired the native population, groups of feral Mons tribes invented Mythos based on stories they heard the foreign Indian traders tell. Those mythos eventually induced a new group identity which brought the tribes together. Then these groups eventually diverged into their own people with their own distinct cultures and traditions. So the majority of the common Thai, Lao, Burmese, Vietnamese, and Cham, are all actually of the same Mon stock. It's just that the indigenous Mon just either had their own mythos based cultural identities or matriculated into war lord kingdoms of the Thai, Nam Chinese [Viet], and Cham, etc.

So that's the other aspect of Mythos which is less considered. Mythos sociologically also is a word that deals with a people's set of customs, ways of doing things, and so on. Mythos sociologically does not mean a "myth" or fairy tale. It is a more robust word with more meaning. It means a cultural narrative, a set of distinct traditions, customs, beliefs, ways, and observances.

A great example of an actual live Mythos and what a Mythos was intended to do is found in the social ecosystem of Freemasonry. Back in the very early days of Freemasonry in England there was a guy by the name of Cavalier Ramsey. He was a tutor to one of the English kings at the time. He was a Freemason. His noble friends from English and French Masonry started to believe that it was unbecoming for nobles to be associated with an organization of common laborers. So the Cavalier gave a famous oration one day which is the beginning of the Templar Mythos. The oration basically stated that Freemasonry did not come from stone Masons, but was the direct descendant of an order of noble knights who fought during the crusades. The Cavalier never named this group of knights.

Later after this Cavalier dies a German mason by the name of Von Hunt took that Templar Mythos and beefed it up. Von Hunt actually named the group of knights the Cavalier mentioned to be the famous Knights Templar. He also beefed up his Templar Mythos by producing an entire set of knightly degrees of chivalry for Freemasons called the Strict Observance. The Strict Observance had this officer who was the secret Grand Master called the Knight of the Red Feather, or something like that, which was like the Ishmaelite idea of the Hidden Imam. Von Hunt's Templar Mythos and degrees sold like hot cakes and captured the imagination of continental Freemasonry sparking the creation of a thousand degrees in France alone. Von Hunt's Strict Observance is the Grand Mother of all Templar institution on earth from the 32 degree Knights Kodosh of the Scottish Rite, to the Templar Degree of the York Rite, to the Templar degrees of the Primitive Rite of Memphis and Mitzraim, to the OTO, and even a the non Masonic organization called the Sovereign Military Order of the Temple of Jerusalem [The SMOTJ].

The intent of Mythos is to inspire and breed group identity, attract Alikes, induce common culture and praxis. And in the Masonic example, you can clearly see how this Mythos first developed as a vague lecture which grew to even currently inspire Hollywood movies like National Treasure and the like. The Mythos of the Templar is so powerful that it still captures the wild imaginations of today's generation and causes them to speculate and theorize all adding to the life and force of the Mythos. This Mythos has produced tons of books, thousands of degrees, countless movies, public awareness and chatter, and for the Freemasons an actual culture and tradition that is at least now over 200 years old.

And if you doubt the power of Mythos, then all you really have to do is study any nations Military or better yet go join one. Or join a street gang or Nazi skinhead gang. Mythos not only engineers culture and tradition, it makes coherent military bodies that destroys and creates entire empires, that drives gangbangers to kill and go to prison, and racial hate and racial genocide. Tally the lives that died for and because of the Mythos propagated by Communism world wide since 1917. And think about it.

Mythos is what inspires, not text books and ideology. Most of us in the ONA knows that the common German people didn't know shit about the actual ideology and principles of the NS party. They just heard the Mythos orated by the Mythos Maker: Hitler. They just heard what they wanted to believe at the right time: severe economic conditions and a dead collective morale. The rest of Europe despised the Germans. And with that Mythos, Hitler nearly took over the world. It took the entire earth's Magian forces to stop Germany. You study closely the guys on the other side of the Mythos: the Party Liners, and you'll begin to notice that those men although they were inspired by the Mythos, they used their NS as a causal form to get a job done. Those were the last 12 great years of the human race.

I personally believe that Hitler was the last of the great humans to ever walk the earth that had the power to collect and amass by enchanting them spellbound with mere words and Mythos. To inspire millions and millions to fight for a dream or vision. Like Alexander the Great, Genghis Khan, Washington, Bolivar, even Lenin and Mao. After Hitler political leaders became officefags who just did their job for 4 years with a smile. This declining Aeon of Democracy is neck deep in mediocrity. We're not inspired to do shit anymore. We have no more inspiration these days. I don't even think we know what an inspiration is. One that stirs us with passion for something. But things are safer that way don't you think?

As a Magian state, the last thing you want is for your populous to be emotionally excited with passion. Ideologies are safe. The most harm an ideology these days will manifest is arguments and asshurtiness in forums. Citizens can't take ideological difference too far these days, because we are led to believe that all people have the right to their beliefs aren't we. It's not right to step on other people's religions and beliefs. How dare us. Philosophy is really safe. You can even philosophize quietly in a coffee shop and still be friends after wards. Spiritually is save and happy. Hippies and new agers do it. That's fun for everyone. You just camp in the Sedona Vortex and beat n drums. Religion is safe too. As long as you keep your shit in your respective places of worship and follow IRS guidelines. Hell, the system even created rebellion oriented philosophies for rebels to rebel within the system. Just don't break a law and stay inside.

But when you start to mix Mythos with Practical deeds you become a red flag to the system and their mundane goons. Think about it. It acceptable for citizens to be Nazis and skinheads, but why did the British authorities and intelligence community disrupt C18? It's acceptable for you to be Christian, and a crazy one too. But why did the people at Wacko Texas get burned alive? There are a lot of organization you don't hear about on the News which the federal government took out by force. Why? When does a belief like National Socialism become a threat to the establishment that the feds will use force to take you out and why? It's a simple answer: Organization and Action. You can't have either without Mythos and Practical Wisdom. But the system these days has a powerful tool to demoralize and soften Mythos. It's called Scientism. The mundane fanatic belief that theories are truths and anything not truth is ignorance and primitive. You share any kind of Mythos with a mundane and they have been trained in school to use their Scientism to attack, demoralize, and desensitize your Mythos. Because theories are safe.

End Remarks

Myth and Mythos are two different things. Mythos does not always take the form of a story; and sociologically it rarely does. Everything that we would hear Hitler present through his speeches is Mythos, the massive even pageantry and parades is Mythos. Mythos inspires in us passion for something, it inspires in us a new identity, it inspires a new culture. A culture is a Cultivation of Ethos. Mythos inspires a new way or mode of doing things, and new way of life.

The ONA has several Mythos. We have the Mythos of the Dark Gods, and the other one called the Vindex Mythos, which I personally think is the more potent of the two. Potent as in with the potential to inspire passion. This Vindex Mythos is already associated with the Vindex Ethos, or the Warrior Ethos. I'm already seeing nexions and Niners build their own Mythos based on strong feeling of dislike for The System which is actually inspiring. Eventually all of this needs to be mended together to the Vindex Mythos to make things more coherent. The objective is to engineer a current Mythos that not only inspires us but also others. Inspire as in to inspire in us and other not only a strong passion, and identification of groups, but also to inspire us to act, do, and more importantly to give birth to new cultures and new Traditions or to give life to old Traditions some of our people may have lost to Magian Ethos. In this way the Mythos we today spin, will be a source of inspiration to the Minds, Bodies, and Hearts of the future.

But Mythos without Practical Wisdom is pointless. It's like exciting and working up a radical Muslim to the point where he wants to kill a Westerner, and not giving him the tools and practical method of actually doing it. Or it's as stupid as going to a stripe club. It excites you then what? Why bother because it's just going to frustrate you. Frustration is the sign we pay attention to to learn to understand that our Mythos and Practical side of the ONA is imbalanced. What happens when someone sykes you out or works you up about something and never give you a means to release that excitement, if they do it too often? You leave disappointed. It's the same way with these things called memplexes. If they excite us, yet provide no means to venting our emotions or stops short of meeting our needs, we get frustrated, sick of it, and leave. You can only be tricked and teased so much, and then you leave. Having your institution imbalanced with way too much speculative ideology and none of the rest is a potential tease, out of which we will get nothing.

I suppose I'm writing this because I wish for the ONA to not degenerate. There are a lot of new Dreccs and Niners, and Balobians. We each do our own thing and what we do adds to the Kollektive we call the ONA. If we don't understand simple things like what the difference between Knowledge, Wisdom, and Understanding are. What the difference between speculative ideology and practical knowledge are; And what a Mythos is even good for, what we build together will come out lop sided. But if we each learned to understand what each of those things are, together with our respective Raw Material, we could Build ourselves an Empire. That is Aeonically.

THE PRADA OF SATANISM [V3.4]

[The Prada of Satanism \[v.3.4\]](#)

The silly name of this manuscript itself reveals the most important fundamental essence of what “Satanism” is. As Prada is a high quality ACCESSORY which accentuates your natural body and beauty which expresses the type and quality of person you are to other people; so too is Satanism an accessory; and not your Essence.

Satanism is only a memetic accessory which serves only to enhance or accentuate your natural Being and Essence as a human being in-tune with his/her humanness, Nature, and the Cosmos. It expresses the type and quality of person you are to others. This is to essentially say that YOU as a living human being, endowed by Nature with the instinct and quality of Primal Nature, are NOT what you believe. That you are NOT your ideological opinions. That you are NOT your spiritual or religions or philosophical assertions and concepts. These named things are merely invented tools with which the human animal may use to apprehend the essence of his own Being, Nature, and the Cosmos.

Thus such things as Beliefs are only tools used by the mind for acquiring an understanding of itself and its reality. Your beliefs should not be your Identity, but accessories to your natural Identity. It would be reasonable to understand that how we perceive the world, Nature, the universe, and ourselves, depends on the quality of such Beliefs. Such that how we see things depends on the tool. In the same way that if an astronomer’s telescope had a defected lens, what he sees with that telescope – and the reality he believes to exist on the other side of that telescope – will also be defected.

Belief is greatly important as explained in our manuscripts regarding Wyrd. To briefly recapitulate – what we believe, or how we see the world with our minds, gives birth to our emotions. These emotions in turn inspires, gives rise to, and governs our actions in life. Such actions will manifest causal results. Such that if a person were to believe his race to be superior in some way to others, such beliefs will give rise to strong emotions concerning his own race and other races. These feelings in turn governs this persons actions in life, which yields causal results.

The Magian Weltanschauung

By Magian we mean the beliefs, ontology, cosmology, theology, worldview, and ethos of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam; and their derivatives. The common characteristics of the Magian Weltanschauung is that reality is "dualized" into two competing and warring factions – Good versus Evil. There is a Good God responsible for all that is good, and an Evil God which is responsible for all the evils that plague humanity. Humanity is divided into two distinct groups – the "Chosen" and the "Rejected." To be "Chosen" the Rejected must think, live, and believe as the Chosen does. A high priest and or priesthood usually is the intermediary between the Chosen Good God and the Chosen People.

Such a stupid interpretation of reality is absolutely irresponsible. Rather than understanding that we each are responsible for the results and consequences in our own lives via our actions, and that such actions affects the lives of others. Such that ignorant and stupid actions manifests as hardship and suffering ["evil"], an imaginary god of evil is used as a scapegoat to blame the world's evils on.

With 7 billion people, each doing something stupid, and with hundreds of States run by stupid people each doing stupid things, it's not hard for anybody intelligent to understand that it is WE and not some god of evil that is destroying our ecosystem, that creates war, that creates mass poverty. It is the laws we pass that creates crime and criminals not an evil god. As long as we continue to ignorantly blame something imaginary for the evils that exists in the world, and not ourselves: we will continue to destroy ourselves as a species. What is worse is that the Magian belief of a Judgment Day, a heaven, a paradise, or whatever does not help with the destruction of the earth, because why go thru the trouble of fixings something like a dying earth when heaven or 72 virgins is right around the corner?

No amount of prayer to some good god in the sky, or superficial upholding of codes of morality is going to stop this self destruction. Enlightenment will. By Enlightenment, we mean that each individual person must come to the understanding that his and her actions in life not only affects their own lives, but the lives of others.

We aren't going to go into detail about how destructive Magian ethos is, because we should all be smart enough to open a fucking history book and read about Magian actions and the results of such Magian actions over the course of some 2000 years, and its over all retardation affect it has had collectively on the human species.

So this is the first Duty of a Satanist – To know and understand your enemy. As Satanists we believe that the Magians are the enemies of human kind because of the negative fruits of their collective actions on our species. The second Duty of a Satanist is then – To work to destroy the enemy in all their forms. Not by dressing up like Goths and emos. Not by using some dumb chaos magic to magickally fight the Magian. By practical and pragmatic means. By killing them or using Sinister Cloaking to get others to kill them. By destroying their States and undermining their politics and policies covertly with subversive groups and subversive actions.

Dressing up in the latest Prada and not using it in some way like getting a hot date, is useless. So is being a Satanist, of all you will be doing is wearing a label and carrying around beliefs and opinions. It's practically useless and pointless. It is what you do with your Satanism, that makes Satanism useful and valuable. In the same way that it is the glamour Prada gives you and what that glamour can do for you that makes Prada worth more than a WalMart outfit.

The Meaning of Satan

"Satan" is a mere meme in a memplex. By "meme" we mean to sociologically denote anything – such as an idea, a concept, a gesture, or aspect of a culture or tradition – which can be transmitted from one person to another. A handshake is a meme. A wave of the hand that says "hello" is a meme. "LOL" as it is typed which expresses a laugh is a meme. War paint Native Americans use to wear during battle is a meme.

A memeplex is a cluster of memes amalgamated together. In this context a meme is a “gene” of the genetic coding of a “memeplex” which, like viruses can and do infect people, replicate, and spread. Christmas is a memeplex with the songs, the gifts, the décor, the x-mas tree, and so on. Tail gating and football events is a memeplex. If a single gesture is a meme, than sign language is a memeplex. Gang culture is a memeplex. So are Buddhism and Catholicism. A religion, a culture, a tradition, a way of life, are all fundamentally the same thing: a memeplex. Thus we will approach this topic from this clearer perspective, rather than from an uneducated pre-college perspective of “religions,” “sects,” and “cults” which essentially has no meaning on an anthropological and sociological level.

The meme of a “satan” originated with the monotheistic Israelites. Originally the word “satan” did not denote a specific creature or being. It simply meant an “Enemy,” or something that opposes. The word “satan” was often interchangeable with the word “Tsar” which had the same essential meaning. Your enemy in battle was a satan/tsar. Vices are satan/tsar. Disobedience to God was satan/tsar. Thus, in the ONA, when many of us use the term “Satanist” we mean “One That Is An Enemy Of God’s People [Jews/Magian].” In this sense of the word; Satanism in the ONA is the System or Principles of Philosophy of being a Satan [Enemy/Opposition] to the Jews and their Magian Weltanschauung.

Satan is also a word used to denote The Sinister, which is the antagonistic, or force of opposition that exists in Nature and Life which is adversarial in Essence. The Sinister is like a fast flowing river pushing against us in which we must struggle or be swept away. Much like the adversarial quality of Boot Camp, or a University. There is a struggle to go thru Boot Camp. There is a struggle to finish school to get your degree. If you fail to fight the opposing flow, you are swept out of Boot Camp and the University never achieving your potential. In Nature what organisms do not struggle and fight against this Flow to Earn their potential and worth goes extinct. This Natural Oppositional Flow in Life and Nature is Mother Nature’s way of testing all of her species for the best quality life forms. It is Her way of gradually weeding out the weak. Thus Satan, or The Sinister, is the very cause of evolution of Life toward higher potential.

Satan in the ONA also is an exoteric or outer name given to an Living Acausal Archetype in our Psyche which has the ability to precence itself in the causal. This Acausal Energy/Archetype/Being in the ONA is associated with the Dark Sphere of Mercury in the Tree of Wyrd. This Archetypal Entity is The Sinister manifested in and through the Psyche.

If you were to ask me if I personally believe in a “satan” I would answer – Yes and No. No because I do not believe that before the beginning of time, when Satan was born, his mom gave him the Anglicized Hebraic name “Satan.” If you’re gunna believe that shit, you might as well also believe that God actually did give Moses the King James Version Bible in Shakespearian English. I pity you and your “intelligence” if you believe this. I really do.

Yes because I know/feel that there is more to Life than flesh and stone. That this Life Force or Cosmic Essence is feral, beyond human valuations of “good” and “evil,” is constructive sometimes – when it gives life: when trees and flowers grow; is destructive at times – when, thru Nature, a hurricane or monsoon or typhoon kills hundreds of thousands of lives: when fungus, bacteria, and maggots consumes what was once living. I understand that I consciously ascribe the word “satan” to this “Thing” that Life is, and I understand that I ascribe certain values and concepts to this word “satan” which reflects my own feeble apprehension of this “Thing” which is an aspect of the Living Cosmos. This is all I know.

One can reasonably point out that there is only ONE Life, ONE Cosmos, ONE Nature, and that perhaps what I call “satan” is the same thing a Hindu might understand as “Brahma,” or what a Christian calls “God.” This is entirely true. So, with this point in mind, it is easier to understand that we each have our own grasp of “That Which Is Beyond Us.” We each ascribe an idea/meme which we associate with certain values and concepts to this same Thing.

So that, like the clothes we wear, what and how we see/interpret this same “Thing,” reflect what type of person we are and our level of mental evolution and capacity to think and understand. Such that if we were to compare a Christian’s anthropomorphic, bearded, God who sits on a throne with a golden crown, to the orderly universe governed by natural universal laws of a scientist, we can clearly distinguish the idiot from the intelligent one; and we can discern the quality and capacity of each mind – one being clinically retarded, while the other is a highly educated analytical individual.

We use the word “satan” as “Satanists” because as the type of liberated and emancipated people that we are, we understand that Magian ethos is destructive to the human species. We utilize the word because we oppose their idiotic memplex with a passion, and that “satan” is a symbol of that passionate hatred of all things Magian. If – hypothetically – there were a billion devil worshipers in the world and they were doing the same stupid things to themselves, to everyone else, and to this earth, we would still hate them, and thus utilize “Jesus” instead. The Word is meaningless – The Wyrd is meaningful.

I am not one to believe that ancient humans were primitive lunatics. Just staring at a Mayan or Egyptian pyramid, the mathematics of an ancient Greek, or reading the ancient philosophies of ancient China, tells me that ancient humans were just as mentally – intellectually – capable; if not more; than we are today.

Thus I refuse to believe that ancient humans were also primitive lunatics in regards to what we today call “religion.” The fact that Lao Tzu, Kong Fu Tzu, and the amazing memplex of Buddhism came out of the minds of people living around and before 500B.C. tells me that ancient humans of such quality were not stupid pagans and wiccans worshiping anthropomorphic gods who danced naked around bon fires like some imbecilic people today. Thus, I do not believe idiots created Judaism and other Magian memplexes.

Originally “satan” in the mythos of the Jewish Tanakh was not a being or entity per se. A “satan” was anything which distracted you from your faith in God, or something which tested your faith. This can clearly be seen when you actually do read the Old Testament sans the babbling of a psychotic preacher. In the case of the ancient Israelites, a “satan” was anything which caused the Israelites to break his covenant with YHVH – i.e.: breaking the 10 commandments, or worshiping other gods.

There was a practical political reason for the many Laws in the Torah and Tanakh. This was the politics back then, and such sacerdotal laws actually governed a people. As the sacred Laws of Hammurabi and the sacred Laws of Manu governed their respective people. There is also a more human or “spiritual” reason for such laws – in such times when the bulk of humanity were wild and uncultured, such laws defined or created what a Civilized person was, and defines how a Civilized people treats and behaves with one another. In fact the idiomatic meaning of the word “Aryan” in India still means “Civilized” today.

This word “Aryan” now ties these civil code of behavior and conduct with the “Aryan Laws/Path/Way” of the Buddha. If you have never heard the teachings of the Buddha referred to as “Aryan” it’s because you’re ignorant and perhaps assume that the Buddha spoke English. The word “Noble” in “the Four NOBLE Truths,” or the “Eight NOBLE Paths” of Buddhism, in its original language is ARIYA which is the Pali vernacular of the Sanskrit ARYA, from which the English word “Aryan” comes. It’s easier to deal with Buddhism to gain an understanding of what “satan” was, before the Church patriarchs corrupted it because it’s well known that Buddhism does not preoccupy itself with gods, which is to say that Buddhism does not symbolically represent their esoteric wisdom in anthropomorphic symbolism for the common idiots to such an extent as other memplexes.

The basic reasoning behind the Aryan Way of the Buddha is that your common person is an unthinking imbecile creature – “Anariya” – that must be Liberated from gods and religion thus becoming Enlightened enough so that they themselves understand that via their own BELIEFS, emotions, and actions that they themselves produce their own human suffering and that by changing ones mind – ones beliefs – you change your own life, reduce your own suffering, an ultimately change the world. But this is to much for the idiot anariya to comprehend. Hence the deep shit our species is globally in today.

Thus the Aryan Way of the Buddha gives these common imbeciles a Way to Ennoble themselves – the Four Noble Truths, and the Eight Noble Paths. Which essentially concerns itself with the origins of human suffering and the cessation of that suffering by FOLLOWING the Eightfold Path. The Eightfold Path in turn concerns itself entirely with Right or Correct action and behavior – Right Thinking, Right Intent, and so on.

Meditation, which is a refined form of mental focus and concentration on a concept which helps one on the Eightfold Path is also used. The loyal following of these codes of conduct and meditation of ones actions and their results, annihilates human suffering.

So now we come to a mythos concerning the Buddha. As he was in the forest one day when he was just setting out to become self enlightened the Buddha sat under a tree and began to deeply meditate. Fearing that the Buddha would achieve Sambuddhi [Self-Enlightenment] Mara [the “devil” of Buddhism] came to the Buddha and TEMPTED the Buddha with illusions of power, beautiful maidens and such.

There is no evidence beyond conjecture that the Buddha was ever a real person, and there is no demon named Mara lurking in some astral world. These are metaphors/mythos. The Buddha is simply the individual arhant who “walks” or strives to live that Noble Eightfold Path. “Mara” is simply anything which Distracts or Misdirects the arhant’s mind from that path – the Mundane stuff of life you see?

So we come to the misinterpreted religion of Zoroastrianism. These Christians misinterprets this religion to be some cosmic struggle of a good god named Ahura Mazda against his archenemy Angra Mainyu [Ahriman] – the bad god of evil things. Why is it then that “angra mainyu” means “Incorrect Mind/Thought?” If we remember that Buddhism developed in India by a people who spoke Indo-Aryan Pali, and that Zoroastrianism developed in what is today Iran [Persia] by a people who spoke Irano-Aryan Avestan. We will not only see that these two cultures are neighbors, but that their languages are related also. So it is not hard to understand that Buddhism influenced and inspired Zoroastrianism.

So in Zoroastrianism we have the Ariya [Avestan for Aryan/Civilized] who follow the sacred laws of Ahura Mazda as revealed to the Prophet, which laws civilized and ennoble a people. And we have Incorrect Mind, or wrong ways of thinking which tests the faith of the Ariya from his noble path. In the same sense that Incorrect Perception is the opposite of Right Perception, which leads to human suffering. Angra Mainyu is a metaphor/mythos for that which distracts one’s mind from one’s Noble Path to self betterment.

We know that Zoroastrianism influenced Judaism. By the time of the Israelites, Buddhism had actually already colonized the city of Alexandria in Egypt. I refuse to believe that these ancient Jews were idiot lunatics because I personally disagree with “Zionism.” You underestimate these people – and the human mind and reveal your own primitive level of mind – when you simply believe that their religion was nothing more than burning goats to some bearded Jew in the sky. The human spirit and will to learn and become more than what was, is beyond this stupidity.

Like Buddhism and Zoroastrianism, you have a set of sacred civilizing laws of behavior and conduct in Judaism. And in the Torah and Tanakh, “satan” only appears in stories when someone is being tested of their faith or tempted to break such sacerdotal laws. There is no anthropomorphic creature named Satan. A “satan” originally was anything of the mundane which distracted or tempted the “covenanted people” – those who had made a vow to follow such civilizing laws. In fact, “satan” isn’t even a single being in the Holy Quran. It is in the plural: Shaitans. A shaitan is anything which distracts your mind away from Allah and what mundane – white devilish – things tempts you causing a Muslim to not submit to the Holy Shariah as God gave the Prophet Muhammad. It was only after the literalists of Christianity that "Satan" became the devil we know of today – which has influenced Islam's current exoteric interpretation of "the Shaitan."

What Satanism Is In Essence

Satanism as we of the ONA understands our Satanism to be is a Causal Form of an Essence. Satanism is an amalgamation of human thoughts, human words, human concepts which attempts to capture or convey an Essence in and of Nature that has existed before humankind walked the earth. In the same sense that we can say that the spoken and written doctrine of the Buddha is an outer expression of Dhamma [Phenomena]. In Buddhism, the body of outer doctrine is referred to as a Yana meaning a Vehicle. A Vehicle is only a means to convey something. And so although we have different vehicles such as Hinayana, Mahayana, and Vajrayana which are very different on the outside level; they each convey the same wordless Dhamma. The difference arises from the fact that such Dhamma must be packages in words and ideas specific to each people and culture. So in the ONA, our Satanism is only a vehicle which conveys the Sinister Essence. Satanism is a means to and end, and not and end in itself. As a vehicle it should lead one to the source and essence. Genuine Satanism as Form/Vehicle must lead the Initiate to the Essence so that the Initiate can Experience and Prehend the Essence Directly. The Essence of the Form is beyond and beneath and before thought, ideation, word, conceptualization, intellectualization, and philosophication. As It is stated Thesis part of the "Seven ONA Fundamentals":

[Begin Quote]

Q: What is the ONA?

A: Anton Long once called it an "Intimation." I call it an approximation.

Q: An Intimation or Approximation of what?

A: Of something wordless. A kind of phenomena or aspect of the Cosmic Body of Phenomena [dharmakaya]. When we speak of the actual "is-ness" of Natural occurring phenomena, or phenomena of Nature, we are dealing with something that has been around long before we humans ever evolved. That's what I mean when I say "wordless," having existed before our species put things into words and writing. We often forget that the world and Cosmos was here before us. Most oft we almost unconsciously assume or assume-project our human words and thoughts out into the world and believe that such phenomenal world is made of the fabric of our own words, urban apprehension, and weltanschauung. When we experience or observe such ancient and primeval phenomena, we apprehend such phenomena first in our human thought which is flawed or weak [being the product of a three pound brain], then we degenerate such thought further into words of our various human languages. Hence the descriptors "Intimation," or "approximation." For our words and thought are only in reality feeble intimations, feeble human verbal approximation of that which is ancient, pre-human, and primal. The words and the thoughts or ideation such words carry are not the primal essence. Thus, when I say that the ONA is an "intimation" or "approximation" of a "Primal Essence," or a "Sinister Essence," those wording and the thoughts they evoke are only feeble apprehensions of a "Something" that has Been, that has Pulsated, that has Undulated in and of the Cosmic Body of Phenomena long before our species set foot on this earth, and this "Something" will continue to Be, Crawl, Haunt, long after we are gone.

Q: What do you mean by "Primal Essence" or "Sinister Essence?"

A: I mean the Crawling Darkness, the hair that stands on the back of your neck, the leaping of hearts, the flush of adrenaline, the beating of tribal drums, the frenzy dance of feral humans around a fire, the spear piercing a chest, the war cry, the scream of terror, the eating of human flesh, head hunters beheading foes, the smell of fear in the darkness of jungles. I mean that Unknown Dark we fear and despise, which we make our religions and gods to give us a sense of safety and protection from. Like children clutching onto a teddy bear to the feel of crawling nothingness in the dark. I mean that Unknown Dark that haunts the depths of our collective psyche, that haunts even our unconscious dreams.

I mean that Dark Something that overtakes a mass of warriors screaming for blood, lost, enraptured in Primeval Darkness. Oblivious to life and loved ones, running to slaughter and to be slaughter. How does one put that Essence, that Phenomenon, that Primal Nature into words? That Primal Nature has been here before us. It has possessed our species since the dawn of our race. Its signature is clawed into the whole history of our species. Our Human history is a literal succession of blood, war, sacrifice, slaughter, murder, plunder, rape, exploitation, domination. We all Flow with the Primal Force of Darkness; or we all “know” – intuit – that this Dark Essence is “there.” We feel it. We fear it. It is nameless, wordless. It is experienced. As all phenomena of the greater Body of Phenomena is experienced, intuited, empathetically felt. Whatever words or forms we try to express this crawling dark in is merely an intimation, an imitation, a rough sketch drawn by the hands of one person. Expressed through the mind of one person.

Q: In what other way is this Sinister Essence intimated in the ONA?

A: At times the ONA refers to this Dark as “The Sinister.” It is the “Dark” which we try to Presence. At times we refer to the various “currents” and archetypes that composes The Sinister via our Mythos as “The Dark Ones,” or “The Dark Gods.” We feebly try to explain the act of our expressing The Sinister, manifesting The Sinister, Precensing The Dark, living in tune to that Dark Essence, allowing that crawling Dark to possess us, as “The Dark Tradition,” or as “The Sinister Tradition.” And sometimes we feebly – exoterically – intimate this, approximate this Essence, as “Satanism.”

Q: What is Satanism in the ONA?

A: Satanism in the ONA is a manufactured outer shell, a construction of wordful attempts at humanizing what is not human. An intellectualization of what is not of human intelligence. Satanism as the ONA understands it is a Causal Form of that wordless Dark Phenomena, or that aspect of the greater Body of Phenomena. It is an amalgamation of human words and thoughts born from feeling, intuiting, and knowing The Sinister via our Dark-Empathy and Acausal Knowing. For those of the ONA, Satanism in and of itself, is not the Essence, not the true actuality, not the phenomenal reality itself. It is a means, a vehicle, a Way of expressing, conveying, the Essence. It doesn't matter what it is exoterically called if we understand and intuit The Sinister. And so how we of the ONA understand Satanism becomes a test and marker to differentiate between those who can see and understand the Essence beneath the Form. As Anton Long puts it simply:

“The second test concerns the nature of what is termed “Satanism” and what we, of the ONA, call “the sinister”. If they accept or understand “Satanism” as something which can be divided up into categories, such as “theistic” or “atheistic” – and especially if they accept that someone called LaVey “founded modern Satanism” – then they have failed. Furthermore, if they do not understand or do not accept or do not feel that being “sinister” means being sinister on a practical, amoral, level – in the real world by deeds done – then they have also failed our test. [1]”

Q: What is Sinister Nature?

A: When “The Sinister” lives or flows in a person, such that this person exists in a state of Harmony with The Dark Primal Essence, this person can be said to possess a “Sinister Nature.” This Sinister Nature presences or expresses itself through such person's Being in thought, emotion, word, action, and Ethos. Sinister Nature is thus something that you have. It is a quality or “type” of person that you are. You cannot teach a person how to have Sinister Nature. In the same sense that you cannot teach or give a Warrior ethos to a random person and make him a soldier. In the same sense that you cannot teach somebody how to be suave and romantic. All you can do is give a person the intimation, the imitation, the worded approximation of the Formless so that the person gains a feel for the Essence. All one can do is Guide and show such person a Way or Methodology for such person to directly experience The Sinister himself/herself. For all phenomena in Nature must be apprehended by direct association, direct experience, direct and personal observation. And so the ONA's Satanism is the Way and Methodology by which the Initiate of the Sinister Tradition is guided slowly into the Dark, to experience the Sinister Essence directly and personally.

Q: The manner in which you explained guiding an Initiate into the Dark side of Life, does this have parallels outside of the West?

A: Most of the time in the East it is called things like Vama Marga, Vamachara, or, Kulachara; or in other words, what I tried to explain above is the very essence of the ancient and traditional Left Hand Path of the Orient. Vama means "Left," but in some dialects of Sanskrit it also means "Female." This alluded to Uma Shakti in ancient times who was the Female Left-Side half of Ardhanari. Shiva being the male right side. It was believed originally by the Mon-Khmer Shaktas in ancient times that Primal Nature was symbolically gynandromorphic; having both "male" and "female" aspects in one single body. This was so because it symbolized that Primal Nature – being both genders – is thus Self-Creating and Self-Perpetuating. That Primal Nature literally copulates itself to regenerate itself continuously. Thus sex was seen as the living aperture or vortex through which Primal Nature renews itself.

In ancient times it was believed that the Right "male" half Shiva – known in those times by the Dravidians and Mon-Khmer as "An" and "Kumara" – was the Unmanifested Life Force. The Left female half Shakti – known as Uma and Kumari – was the condensation of this Life Force manifested as the world of phenomena. From this two school of living Life emerged. The Right Handed Path school believed that the world of phenomena was intrinsically evil and an illusory prison of the spirit. The methodology of the Right Handed Path was to reject mortal existence, and strive to transcend the world so that the spirit can merge with the Unmanifested.

The Left Handed Path school of thought believed that it is natural that spirit or Life Force condensates as matter and flesh, thus there was nothing wrong with mortal existence. Mortal existence was believed to be a theater of learning where the newly individualized spirit becomes flesh to learn what Life is. Just because you are alive, does not mean you know what Life is or where it came from or why it is here. Except as a finite causal being, Life and Nature and Natural Phenomena was like a vast primeval ocean. The only way to know Life is to directly submerge into this primeval ocean and struggle to experience every aspect, state, condition, and phenomena of Life. To ride every wave and current in other words.

Thus instead of rejecting Life, the Initiate of the ancient Left Path lived a Life in which the Initiate went on a Quest to "shock" his consciousness awake from the moment and illusion of the Now by struggling to personally experience both the enjoyable Light side of Life, as well as the dangerous and fearful dark side of life. By "shock" I mean that the Initiate will force itself to physically experience and break all taboos and social norms to "shock" or shake itself free from its illusion of the mundane limits consciousness and thus gain Illumination from directly experiencing such phenomena and acts. And so we have many sects and methodologies of the Left Path such as the Kapalas and the Aghoris who may be the two most familiar in the West. For example the Aghori Initiate lives a long life on a Quest to experience every phenomena of the Dark side of Life. He will live in cemeteries, eat dead human flesh, perform human sacrifice, etc. These acts of shocking oneself free from the grip of the illusions of consciousness is not a permanent way of life. These acts are just a means to an end. The End being that at the End of the Initiate's Left Path Quest, his unconscious true self is shocked and shaken free from the illusion of consciousness and thus come to Realize inside the Nature and Essence of Reality beyond the veils of consciousness. For the conscious mind is the very veil and factor of illusion that restricts the power of the unconscious self from knowing the totality of what is the Greater Reality. For this world we exist in is only a small part and aspect of a Reality or Body of Phenomena which is much larger. By "larger" I mean a Reality beyond the limitations of causal space and causal time, of which this “reality” we are consciously aware of is only a minor phenomenon of. Reality – or rather the Cosmic Body of Phenomena – is not an illusion; consciousness – the conscious mind/self/ego – is the factor of illusion.

So now, if you understand the essence of the Left Path Quest, that it is a means of a human being to shake itself free of the grip of consciousness to Realize the greater reality beyond, we will thus come to understand the basic reasoning or logic behind Right Path methodology. The methodology of the Right Path – because it reject Life – seeks to constrict or restrict consciousness within a fixed “Nowness” or in other words, it seeks to fixate consciousness on “things” in the same way that a dog is tied to a tree so that it cannot wonder to experience the rest of the forest. This act of fixation of consciousness which is the methodology of all Right Paths can be seen in such things as idol worship for example where the conscious mind is fixated on a finite statue. This Right Path methodology can be seen expressed in its methods of adoration of written books, of constructed temples, of veneration of gurus, in the glorification and deification of myths over natural phenomena, of conscious fixation to strict rules of living, of the fixation of the conscious mind on external mythic gods and deities. For all these things perpetuates consciousness and fixates consciousness to things in front of it which it can lose itself in. Consciousness is the veil which separates us from what is Reality.

In the same sense that the amniotic sack a fetus comes into mortal existence inside of is a literal Veil that covers the fetus and separates it from what is beyond this veil. We thus see that when this fetus is “born” into the world outside its womb it breaks free from this Veil which once covered it for nine month. And so, in mystic circles the world over, Divine Illumination is sometimes expressed as a “Second Birth.” This second birth is the breaking of the Veil of mortal and mundane consciousness out of which the unconscious self – the psyche, the citta – enters the greater world Beyond. It may be hard for a Westerner to grasp the idea that consciousness is a veil or what causes the illusion of mortal unknowingness. To illustrate we can imagine that you were born with a magnifying glass glued to your eyes, such that you spend your whole life viewing and apprehending life as images seen through this magnifying glass. Being conditioned to apprehend life and existence via that magnifying glass you Believe that the image you see with it is reality, unconscious of the blurry stuff around you. And so you may even believe that consciousness and reality are the same phenomena, or two sides of the same things. It is not until you shake yourself free from this magnifying glass, that you slowly realize that the world is much bigger then the images seen on the lens of the magnifying glass. That magnifying glass is consciousness, as it is the function of consciousness to focus and fixate. Consciousness or mundane awareness with abstractions are the fetters one must shake oneself free of. This consciousness is like the outer shell of an egg or seed. We come into this causal existence with this shell. As the rootling or chick must struggle to break free from its shell, the individuated entity – a distinct manifestation of the Living Cosmos which we are – must grow out of its conscious shell by shaking free from its confines.

[End Quote]

The Satanist of the ONA must learn to balance their causal knowing and causal thinking of causal abstractions with Dark-Empathy and Acausal-Knowing which transcends causal abstractions, words, and ideation. Pathei-Mathos for the Satanist of the Order of Nine Angles is our Way and Method of Enlightening ourselves via Direct Experience and Learning From Adversity. Knowledge is born from books, words, and text. Wisdom and Understanding is cultivated from Dark-Empathy, Acausal-Knowing, and Pathei-Mathos. We refer to that state of wisdom and understanding as “enlightenment.” Sinister Enlightenment is born from connexion with, contemplation on the Carnal/Causal so that the Initiate organically prehends a deeper Understanding of what the causal is and how it works, and their place in it.

Enlightenment is a process of becoming, a progression or gradual transformation brought about by the cultivation and experience of direct experience of life without moral or religious restraint. The mind must be allowed to be free like a growing child to make and learn from its owns mistakes. It is only from direct experience and the freedom to make and learn from mistakes that one becomes wise. Wisdom is in essence the fruits of direct experience, whereas knowledge is an acquired idea or thought. The difference between someone who “knows” something and one who is “wise” in that something may be illustrated with two people and a single map. One person can read this map and be an expert with it to the minutest detail of every street name and landmark on that map; but the person who takes that maps as a guide and actually experiences the area directly experiences something completely different and from his experience he becomes wise.

“Satan” is only an approximation which represents Nature in all its manifestations: Cosmic nature, earthly nature, human nature, and the natural laws which universally governs nature itself. The mythos of Satan is picked to correspond to nature, because nature itself and all that it is, stands in direct Opposition to religion and religious laws; as well as the laws of morals, and the laws of civilized social-orders such as cities and states. How so? When religion teaches that Man is made in the image of some god, Nature says that Man is a monkey or just an animal. When religious morals states that killing is bad, killing in Nature is what produces life (food and defense). When state law says that you can only marry one mate, Nature states the whole opposite and says marriage and monogamy doesn't even exist.

The more value we add to the word “satan,” the more it is worth, and the better we can use it as a tool to express who we are as Satanists, and what Life is as we Satanists see it. The basic meaning of “satan” in it's original Hebrew is “to reject what has been established.” In our case as Satanists, it means that we reject Magian Ethos, their established ways, their established laws, and their established States.

There are two words in Sanskrit related to the phonetic value of the word “satan” – the first is “Satan[a]” which basically means to destroy or cause to fall. Which aptly describes the work and labour of a Satanist who genuinely understands Satanism, and who genuinely understands the meaning of emancipation and liberation from Magian State tyranny. As a side note: there are only three letters in the word “satana:” STN, with little marks at the top to denote vowel values. In the same way that there are only three letters to “satan” in Hebrew: STN.

There is another word related to the letters STN in Sanskrit: Sadhan[a]. The letter “DHA” in Sanskrit and many of its vernaculars and bastard children [such as Khmer] is actually pronounced with a breath as the letter “T” is said in English and not as a “D.” “Sadhana” has many meanings: Realization, Leading To A Goal, To Bring About or Cause To Happen, Effective, Perfection, To Produce, and An Accomplishment. This literally explains the End Goal of a Satanist: Self Realization, Self Betterment, Evolution Toward Perfection.

So, as Satanism is here presented, there is described the essence of a self imposed striving or struggle on the part of the Satanist to surmount himself via Pathei-Mathos, or to progress or evolve himself or herself against The Flow of Nature. It has nothing to do with the worship of a devil. But, such a focused endeavour, as that of self enlightenment and self willed evolution implies a focus of Will and Mind, as well as a practical Way of Life. Such that if something of the mundane world distracts a Satanist from this Sinister Way of life, such distractions becomes a stumbling block to the Satanist's progression toward her or his end goal doesn't it? Thus, we have come full circle to the understanding of the esoteric value of what “satan” meant to ancient Judaism. What Ahriman meant to ancient Zoroastrianism. And what Mara esoterically symbolizes in Buddhism.

All we have literally done was rearrange a few literal words around. It is still the same Life. Still the same Cosmos. Still the same Humanity. Still the same quest for Self Realization, Liberation, and Self Enlightenment. Still the same striving to be Honourable – civilized people with our own kindred, Still the same quest to become better than the Mundanes. If you are ONA and you don't understand what I mean by “Honourable” or think ethics and moral codes of behaviour have no place in Satanism, then go back and read “The Law of the New Aeon,” and “The Law of the Sinister-Numen.”

It is still the same Aryan versus Anariya: as it has always esoterically been throughout time – a struggle between the few Noble and the Common Ignoble Herd. And we still have the same source of distractions, misdirections: the way of the mundanes. It's just that instead of calling such distractions “satans” we call it “Magian” or “Mundane,” and we have adopted the word “satan” for its many values which aptly describes who we are as Satanists, what kind of person we are, what we do, and who our enemies are in this current age and era. In time, these labels will be dropped for better ones, as even the outer name "Order of Nine Angles" will someday lose its meaning and be dropped for something better.

THE SCIENCE OF PRESENCING

The Science of Presencing

There are to me three styles or methods of Presencing/manifesting. The first would be Internal Presencing which deals with the inner field within oneself. The second is External Presencing which deals with manifesting Results in the real world outside of oneself. The third style is Subversive Presencing which deals with social change by the implantation of memes inside other people within one's field of influence.

Internal Presencing is like getting an education or learning a skill, such as business. External Presencing is using what skills you have learned or have manifested within to produce measurable results and benefits in the real world. Then as you get better at business you will eventually come to understand that no matter what you do, as a single person, you are limited by the very limits of your own energy, resource, time, and money. Thus, if you want to take the business up a few levels, you must Duplicate your Efforts via other people, other people's energy, other people's resources, other people's time, and other people's money: OPP [Other People's Property].

One of our family friends is a self made man who is like a mentor to me in many ways. He once told me that no intelligent business person uses their own money to invest in a business they are starting. You borrow that money or you raise it by going to other people. This way if the business fails your personal assets are kept in tact. The second thing he told me that stuck in my mind was that "an employee works, a businessman makes others do the work." Third things he told me is "time is money: other people's time makes you money so you have time to play golf."

Internal Presencing

There was a time when I asked our self made family friend how he became successful in life and he simply said: "Burn baby!" He talks like a character from a mob movie and talks like one too. I asked him what he meant by that. He said that to me that "we are successful with things we passionately burn for."

Since I was still not very smart back then with very little life experience he used something I – and we all – should understand. It's like falling in love with somebody. This person captures our minds and hearts so that we can't think about anything but the person. The more we think about the person, the more everything around us fades into insignificance. Then, when a passion builds up and we begin to burn with a determination to be with that person, our burning determination possesses us with an obsessive drive. That burning drive causes us to do anything imaginable to get that person. If you are a guy you will work out and body build to look more attractive. If you are a girl you will spend money to get a makeover and work out to look nice. In the end – for those of us who have genuinely burned deeply for someone – we always get what/whom we want.

Unfortunately for most people the burning determination stops here or doesn't ever leave the arena of love and romance. After explaining this to me my "mentor" pointed at me and said something I still remember: "BUT: I can never give you that burn or teach you. No school or book or person can teach you how to burn for something. You must to find it on your own."

I have had the wonderful experience of deeply burning for someone. That burning determination once possessed me and I can say that after relentless determination and a lot of effort I did end up with my "dream person." But such romantic achievements may be petty to many materialists who desire superficial things in life they believe will bring them happiness. I'm not a materialist myself, but I have wondered for the longest time how one passionately burns with determination for other things besides love? If you desired success in life, how would you start the spark that will grow into a burning determination?

Last month was Chinese New Year's. My family celebrates three different new year days. One in January for being American. One in February for the Chinese in us. And one in April which is the Thai/Khmer New Year's which also doubles as Theravada's Birthday of Buddha. In January we have a family gathering. For the other two we usually go to the temple; a Chinese temple for the Chinese day and a Thai wat in April.

So last month a group of our friends wanted to meet up at the Chinese Buddhist temple by one of our houses. We all met up at Hsi Lai Temple which is up the hill. Hsi Lai is a huge Chinese Buddhist temple in Hacienda Heights. I think it's the biggest in America. It's very beautiful, but the Chinese Buddhists do things very different from us Thai Theravada Buddhists, so I only go to the Chinese temple to look around and burn a stick of incense.

After walking around the temple complex and eating lunch at the vegetarian eatery they have on the complex, we all looked at each other and wondered what to do next, as we had the rest of the day. One of our friends randomly suggested we go to the beach. Which was a good idea. I said: I dare us to walk there! [~20 miles away]. I was thinking of using the opportunity to train for one of the things you have to do in the Seven Fold Way [second degree]. So, after looking at each other and shrugging to ourselves we went and parked our cars in the street below the temple and started to walk to the beach thinking it wouldn't take long since it only takes 30 minutes to drive there.

Getting to the beach from the temple is easy in theory or as it looks on a map or from inside the car. You walk out the temple complex and go left on Hacienda which winds and twists through this beautiful wooded area. Then when you get to Whittier you go right to the first stop light which is Beach, and you go down Beach until the street ends at Huntington Beach. I really thought the Second Degree ordeal was going to be a piece of cake.

I thought I was doing good on Hacienda, but when we got to Beach my ass had to stop and rest after every other bus stop. Luckily one of our friends was out of shape too so he sat with me at every bus stop. I thought I was going to faint before we even passed the I-5 freeway bridge. I was sweating like a water buffalo. Me and our chubby friend were about to call it quits and take the bus back, but the others kept on pushing us. They said I couldn't bail out because it was my idea. The others had to entice me and our chubby friend with lunch, which we'd get when we reach Knot's Berry Farm, which was our "half mark."

I get really quite when I am ass tired, so as we walked I didn't say much, since I was trying to breathe. Every time one of us felt like quitting or resting too long, the others would go into this group pep talk mode by clapping and cheering us on by saying "C'mon, you can do it! Don't be a bitch, bitches!" And talking shit about how we were out of shape. But the pep talks and pushing worked gradually to instill in me – us – motivation and determination to get to the beach. And I could feel the Spark of Determination begin to burn inside to finish this goal whereas before during the first half of the trip I didn't have that feeling. But in my mind I was thinking to myself how utterly pointless this all was.

Not just the crazy impulsive walk to the beach being completely pointless, but the ordeals of the Sinister Way; and the whole of life too. Everything seemed totally pointless? Why try? Why strive and put in so much effort into life when you're just going to die anyways? It's like when my mother gets lazy to go out too dinner she yelp a complaint saying: "Oh god, why bother eating when it's all going to come out the other end anyways!?" Then my stepdad will say to that jokingly: "I know, why bother breathing in when you're going to breathe out? Buddha was right, life has no meaning, let's die."

The other half of our trek to the beach was like boot camp, or so I imagined [I've never been to a boot camp]. The walk was just pointless. But the motivational pep talks were there and so was the determination. Or at least I was determined not to appear as out of shape as our chubby friend. That's just unbecoming. I'm nowhere near fat or chubby.

Beach ends right on the beach. Well, it ends with a small parking lot on the other side of the perpendicular street, and the beach is on the other side of the lot. This feeling of triumph was beginning to run up my spine as we walked past the estuary. Then I set foot on the sand and smelled the beach as the sun was going down. It took us 6 hours but we did it! I felt like Rocky!

That one old movie where Rambo is a boxer and he's training and running triumphantly up a flight of stairs.

We had fun during our brief stay but for me the moment was a philosophical realization of something. Everything all fell into place. I had at that moment intimately understood – via experience – what my mentor meant when he said that neither he nor any book or person can ever give me that burn or teach me how to be determined for something in life. I also learned that day that even though the walk itself may have been pointless, the fruit that it bore wasn't pointless. The fruit was the intimate understanding that with determination, anything can be accomplished in life. I have heard that said to me in so many different ways before, and I have read it written hundreds of times. But to put yourself into direct experience to come to intimately realize this is something very different which can never be conveyed in words. You cannot say or write into the heart and mind of another person or pupil the Feel of burning determination and the realization that with that determination anything can be accomplished in life. It must be experienced.

We could only stay for an hour because we had to walk all the way back. The way back was a different experience. It was like we were soldiers returning home after a triumphant war campaign. Comrades with hands around each other's shoulders shooting the shit and laughing all the way back in the dark. It was in the late evening and the sun had long set. We have to pass Little Saigon where we stopped to grab dinner. At the dinner table I listened to everybody else take their simple experience that day of determination and philosophically and intellectually apply it into other venues in life as they understood life. We were all basically "on the same page" because we all seemed to have obtained the same insights from our simple experience that day. Walking through Hacienda Heights at night is dangerous. It's a very safe area. It's just that the area we were walking through is wooded and has no street lights. There is a cliff to the side of the winding road and it's so dark you can't see a foot in front of you. We had to stay on the yellow line on the road and not walk on the dirt or we'd risk slipping off the cliff. But we made it back safe.

The experience that day helped me understand intimately a few other things. On the way back during the night I recalled a Zen story frequently told. The story goes that one day a Buddhist monk was bathing in a stream and a young man walks by. The young man seeing the monk and ran into the stream and bowed saying to the monk: "I want to be enlightened. Please teach me."

The monk says in return to the young man: "Go away, you're bugging me." Thinking this was a test, the young man comes closer to the monk and kneels and says: "No, I'll stay right here. I want you to teach me." The monk gets annoyed and not saying anything grabs the young man's head and submerges it. He sits on the man's head so the man can't breathe. The young man struggles to not drown and fights for his life. When the man emerges from the stream he says in anger: "Crazy old man! I asked to be enlightened and you try to kill me!" The monk ends the conversation saying: "Unless you desire enlightenment as much as you wanted air down there, you will never get it. You are thus wasting my time. Go away."

This notion is shared by Theravadins too, as my own Bhikkhu grandpa once called me out on this. I was still in high school and during that time I believed myself to be a smartass know-it-all. So I asked my grandpa one time when we went to visit him to teach me what he knows and understands about Buddhism. Being my grandfather he didn't hesitate or question my intentions. So he immediately began to give me a simple lecture. He was briefly saying to me that there isn't much to Buddhism but knowing that suffering is a part of life and karma is something one must learn to understand.

When he had finished saying that I said back: "But I don't believe in karma. How do you know it exists?" My grandpa said back irritated: "You come to me with a full plate and ask me to fill it up, how can I do this? You give me no room. Do you want to know how I understand things, or do you want to show off what you think you know and what you already believe? There is a difference between learning and arguing. One takes us here to there. The other only pushes us back and forth. Come back when you have grown older and are empty."

It took me a long time to figure out that my "ego" was getting in the way. I didn't want to actually learn anything. I just wanted to challenge him. It wasn't until later when I realized that all I knew or thought I knew and believed were superficial trinkets of ideas and opinions blanketed over a reality I had no understanding of. I then realized that I didn't "know" anything. Empty, I went back to my grandpa. Who would briefly give me a simple lecture, ask me a bunch of question, and told me to go away and find the answer to them. Or he would ask me about my experiences in life, and then use what I gave him as analogies to explain certain ideas.

There was then – in emptiness and with experience – no need to argue or debate. When my grandpa explained to me the simple causal mechanics of "karma" I didn't have to question him or debate him for validation. Because in my own life, I had the experiences needed to understand the nature of unfoldment of the causal fruits of my own thoughts and actions in my own life which effects the lives of others around me. Whereas before, I secretly desired to challenge his belief in karma and all I had to work with were two dimensional opinions born from agreeing with what I may have heard others say or from what I may have read.

So this is my own first lesson in "Inner Presencing." That one never really learns anything without a genuine desire and determination to learn. And that before one can "learn," one must be empty, devoid of the intention of arguing and debating. This is pretty self evident in your average college student. They go into college stupid, and they come out stupider, in more debt, and pregnant.

It can be asked: "Well, what's wrong with arguing and debating?" It's like you were to go up to a black belt martial artists or a soldier who is a veteran and asked him to teach you his skills. So when he teaches you certain moves which he himself has learned from experience; you say to him: "Well, I have too disagree here, that block you're teaching me seems kind of ineffective in a confrontation because I saw in an episode of COPS, such and such." And then you believe that such argument adds to your stock of knowledge? The very fact that the teaching stops and some back and forth debate between opinion and experience-born wisdom ensues should show that the flow of information from on mind to another has stopped.

And that is the very basic idea of learning: Flow. Recognizing that there are things out there you do not know. Or people out there with more experience. Or other with a different perspective and angle of understanding than you. Then opening yourself to the Flow of data WITHOUT impeding that Flow. Then you test that data. Not with opinions you have collected. But test it with experience in the arena of life. If you have a hard time agreeing that karma is real, go out and randomly punch somebody, preferably somebody twice your size. And observe carefully if your actions manifests causal Fruit. Then, after you have tested the data – when you are lying semiconscious on the sidewalk – can you analyze your results to validate such data. That's the Three Legged Stool of Science: 1) Hypothesize; 2) Test/Experiment, 3) Analyze. You don't challenge a hypothesis [Opinion/Guess] with another hypothesis. You cancel the hypothesis with a test that shows and proves Otherwise.

If you are burning with a determination to learn or be “enlightened,” in such conditions, you will naturally set debates and arguments aside so as to not impede the potential flow of information between your mind, and the object you assess as a source of what information you desire. The Honourable thing to do is to absorb what they teach or give As-Is. In the Understanding that no two people are identical in body, mind, perception, thought, and experience. You must learn to tailor in your own mind what information you receive according to your own experiences and tests of validation. The ego doesn't need to learn. It knows everything already. When ego desires to learn, its desire is not born from determination for self growth. It is born from hubris and arrogance, a superficial belief that it knows better: that it is better than others. A dialectical argument or debate between two honourable equals does manifest/presence new insights. A debate or argument between two egos is a dick fight, its an assertion. It is the ego saying: “My opinions are better than yours because I am better than you.” Like two male monkeys fighting during mating season: minus the actual female; the “winner” really doesn't win anything.

The other thing I learned that night walking back from the beach is the usefulness of something like the Seven Fold Way, and Life in general. I thought that life was pointless. But it really isn't. Because what we learn today in life from our trials and errors, we can put to use in future to get better results out of life. The experiences and struggles in life themselves teaches us our lessons which can never been truly written or expressed in words. How do you teach someone what it is like to cry and hurt over the loss of a loved one? How do you write in words or speak to someone what it feels like to quietly watch a sun rise at the beach in the morning, wrapped in a blanket with someone you love so that the other person can feel what was felt? You can write and speak, and the other person can superficially know. But they will never “know” until they have themselves experienced it.

And we all learn this the hard way. My birth mother grew up hating her culture and mother. She rebelled during her teenage years and gave my grandmother a lot of trouble and heartache. But life has a funny way of teaching us. She became a mother herself. And when she did, she experienced everything that comes with the territory of being a mother. Which was when she empathetically understood her own mother. It would be so simple to write on a piece of paper: “Mother is always right” and give it to my mom back then. She would read it, and know the meaning of the words; but the essence of the words would be completely meaningless to her. We each unravel like flowers in time and experience, and come to our own understanding of things in their proper season.

The Seven Fold Way has often been questioned. I have questioned its usefulness. Before I saw the Seven Fold Way as being a sort of boot camp and set of tribal rites of passage. But now I see more to it. It teaches you, or imbues in you something – or somethings – that can never be taught via spoken or written words.

Such as determination. What the burn of determination feels like. What that burn can accomplish. If you knew what that burn felt like, and had the masterful skill to command that burn into existence inside you at will, such that you were able to passionately burn for your life's dreams and goals; you'd be successful in eventually presencing them. Most often we have dreams and desires but hardly a single one ever materializes. We all want to be multimillionaires, look the prettiest, have the most perfect pecs and abs, own our dream car and dream home, and so on. But is there a blinding burn of determination behind those fleeting dreams? No. 70% of Americans don't even burn with a determination to burn off their obesity. Yet ironically I hear quite a few fatasses talk about surmounting themselves into some "Ubermensch," or being their own gods.

What is the most basic meaning or understanding of a "god?" The bible opens up with the very essential meaning: "In the beginning God CREATED the heaven and the earth..." He SAID "Let there be light, and there WAS light." A God in most of the world's major religions is a creator. Usually such gods just speaks and things manifest. Vishnu Commanded the world into existence. What kind of a god are you – or believe yourself to be – when you can't manifest shit in life? Most of these self deluded mundane Satanists can't even manifest their own thoughts, ideas, opinions, paradigms, and worldviews. If it weren't for LaVey writing the Satanic Bible, those "gods" that populate the subculture of Satanism wouldn't have a pot to piss in. They don't create. They can barely debate themselves out of a paper bag let alone speak things into being. How are you a god when all you have done is be a consumer to somebody else's pre-fabricated Box Reality? One that comes completely with a worldview and set of beliefs and opinions to agree to? They just agree. What god agrees? Allah doesn't agree with shit. He speaks, and you either do the agreeing or you're an infidel.

Sometimes the greatest lessons one can learn are those which are not taught. And that's exactly what the Seven Fold Way of the ONA is like. That may be hard to understand unless you're a Buddhist or Taoist. It's like you were 15 and you came to me and said: "Chloe, you've been in several relationships, can you teach me about them?" Then I said: "Sure, but you have to follow my instructions exactly as I give it to you: 1) Smile at guys; 2) Say hi to all the ones that smile back; 3) Sleep with the one that tells you they love you."

You see the lessons taught are not in the steps themselves. The steps only help to create the proper Condition for the lessons to be learned. Because if you are naïve enough to follow my three steps and you sleep with the first boy that tells you he "loves" you, you will be in for a very hurtful experience. Then you'll come back to me and tell me how fucked up I was. All I did was help you to intimately understand from your own direct experience that love hurts and will hurt and that you cannot trust any man to make you happy. Happiness and self worth comes from within. Men are not vending machines where you can just put in a few kisses and hugs and get back the love, affection, attention, and happiness which you need. But I can't tell you these things. They're meaningless to you in word. You must experience them on your own term, and grow to realize their meaning on your own time. All I can do is help set you up for those experiences by giving you a list of arbitrary steps to follow.

The wisdom of science is not contained inside the four steps of the Scientific Method. You can't teach wisdom and enlighten people via instructions and lectures. It must come from experience and an intimate observation. The four steps of the Scientific Method only help to set up the proper Condition for insights and discoveries to arise, everything else is up to you. But we can also say that we can never be truly sure what each person will discover and learn from applying the scientific method. The mind that may have put together the Method in England long ago could not have ever dreamed that his steps would one day "teach" people about the wild nature of quantum phenomena.

So from these two illustrations of love and science and the steps that set up proper Conditions for direct and intimate discovery and genuine learning, we see that first the steps don't actually teach anything. Meaning they don't force/assert/impose a prefabricated opinion, idea, concept, belief, dogma, view on you. The second thing we should notice is that although the steps or set of instructions [sasana] were put together at a certain frame of time in some past, the unwritten lessons and potential for the unfoldment of wisdom and insight transcends Time. Simply because the lessons learned arises from within each person who each exist in their own reference of Time.

The key point is that the steps or instructions only sets up a Condition or environment conducive to Self-Born insight, wisdom, and discovery. Self-Born meaning arising from within oneself [Sambuddhi]. This concept is the opposite of religious indoctrination where a set of beliefs, doctrines, opinions, paradigm, worldview, is offered which supplants or covers an individual's self-born insights, self understanding, self apprehension of life, self sovereignty and self growth. Mundanes are a breed who are bred to learn only from indoctrination. You must give them their ideas, beliefs, worldviews and opinions. If science had not shown them pictures of a round earth, most of those mundanes would still believe the world to be flat and they'd debate it too. The fact that marketing and advertizing is a trillion dollar industry proves/exposes such mental condition of mundanes. The product itself can be shit. As long as the ads are good and the marketing tactics is good, the crap will sell. And mundanes will spend their time debating on crap shoot brands they use. Never realizing that the both of them bought shitty crap and did not produce anything themselves. They are Consumers manipulated by "brand propagandists" to simply buy. And they do the same thing with their ideas, beliefs, and religions. It's called debate, and religious wars.

And so you ask me: "So what is the Seven Fold Way?" It's a method or set of steps. What do they teach? Nothing in and of themselves. They are just instructions. It's like looking for a wealth of esoteric meaning in the instructions for putting a computer desk together. You just follow the god damn instructions because they were put together to manifest a certain Condition. I can't – nor can any person – give you or teach you the experience and feel ["qualia"] of putting a computer desk together. But you can cultivate the right Conditions when you follow the instructions. And it is what you actually learn and gain from the actual experiences that are the heart of the matter or the Essence.

I can only speak for myself and about the beginning degrees of the Seven Fold Way. When you put yourself inside the proper condition and environment which the Seven Fold Way produces several things are learned gradually. First is that every task and objective in each degree of the Sinister Way is a Process which has a beginning point and an end goal which is actualized via practical deed and action. Second is that the tasks and objectives of each degree is grounding. By that I mean they are based on activities based on the real world which refocuses your mind away from the clouds and back onto the real world. Third it requires determination to execute each task and ordeal. The task and objective themselves may feel pointless. As pointless as waking up at 3AM in the morning at boot camp to jog up and down a hill. But it is the unwritten experience and what is not being pointed at which is where the real value is to be found.

It breeds a culture and state of mind where you are goal oriented and where you come to understand that it is with the fire of determination that such goals – all goals in life – are actualized. Things like determination, will power, and morale are not separate things, but things which are linked and influence each other. Nowhere other than the battle field of war is this more apparent. When an army's morale is low, their passion/determination is weak. When their passion is weak, their will power is weak. Without the force of Will, the army cannot exert its influence onto the real world and they will all die. It is via force of Will that the nebulous idea and objectives of an army changes and alters the real world. Even the Buddha says that the secret to Power depends on Chitta Samadhi: the coherent focus of Heart. Passion can make or break an army. On the battlefield – soldier or gangbanger – passion determines whether you live or die. And when your nation depends on military force, passion makes or breaks your nation.

But in the everyday urban condition, the average person rarely has passion for anything. Can you even say that you are master of your own Heart? In such a way that you have full command of your emotions? To make yourself burn for something at will? The more crazy you are about something, the more likely you will have it. Enlightenment, inner growth, and self surmounting doesn't come easy. You don't read a book and become changed inside. You only add ideas. It's like adding a hundred dollars a week to your bank account and believing that such increase in funds somehow changes and evolve your actual bank account into something different. Enlightenment isn't a thing to obtain from reading or being taught. It is a nature you develop into gradually. It makes more sense in the original Pali: You use Buddhi to Become Buddha. Buddha is a state of being [bhava] not a resultant condition of reading and debating. In the same sense that the elevated state of mind of Homo Sapiens is not something that came from reading or learning. It develops gradually as a Nature of Being. That inner nature comes only from long spans of struggle. The Ariya is a breed apart from the Anariya. That inner development is a long struggle and process that works with the same elements as war: morale, passion, will power.

The Seven Fold Way simply gives you the Condition in which those elements can be cultivated. It produces over time in you a "culture" of knowing how to call into being the right state of heart and mind to manifest real inner change as well as real outer change. But the end goal of inner/self change and development begins with morale. In common lingo we call morale "being psyched out." It's like sex, if you're not in the Mood, you're not gunna do it. Action follows passion. If you're not psyched out about getting buff, you're not going to lift a pound. If you're not psyched out about looking hot, you're not gonna spend $10,000 on cosmetic surgery. If you're not psyched out about enlightenment, you're just dabbling, collecting, reading, and memorizing.

I used to know this friend during college named Richard. He was the assistant manager of an apartment complex across the street from campus. My friends and I used to hang out at the lounge of this complex because it had 3 pool tables and the manager and her husband were really cool people. So over the years as we played pool in that lounge Richard got to know us all and he became a friend. I often would sit in the office with him and listen to him talk about his only interest: Christianity. He was a chubby soft spoken guy who was very religious and he loved to share his Christian ideas with people. He gave me a tour of his apartment once because he likes to show off his bible collection. He had this wall packed with book shelves and every book was a different kind of bible. He says he loves to drive to Christian bookstores and buy bibles. But after years past I got to know the real Richard as I slowly questioned and attacked his weak spots in his character.

The real Richard was a pervert. He was a frustrated man because he was lonely and wanted female companionship. But he believed premarital sex was sinful. I got him to shamefully admit that he masturbated to pornography. He said he wasn't proud of it. He cried once in front of me when he shamefully admitted that he occasionally buys prostitutes. But I also noticed there was a part of him that got off from shamefully revealing these things to a girl who reflected his religiosity yet mirrored his secret desires; or so it seemed. Here was this guy who could quote bible verses off the top of his head, had hundreds of bibles, he was an expert on different publications of bibles, he went to church; but nothing about his inner nature has changed or is different from any normal secular guy. He was just dabbling and collecting ideas and bibles. He somehow believes that collecting all those bibles and superficially presenting a façade of Christian knowledge makes him a Christian. Like how those occultniks out there think that collecting as many grimoires as they can changes them into a different kind of person from the average guy off the street.

Richard's roommate was more fascinating to me though. His roommate had these thick glasses, and fluffy pepper hair, like a 40 year old nerdy Jew scientist. This guy was the first real live schizophrenic I ever met. Richard had told me his roommate is crazy and hears voices and was laughing. So I asked Richard to introduce me to his roommate named George. George was intelligent. He told me that he was fine when he took his medication but that he still heard the "voices." But on medication the voices were just background noise. Off medication the voices takes over and he starts blurting out obscenities and perversion. He also said that off medication all the cars on the street vanish to him. George tunes pianos for a living. I asked him if he ever had a girlfriend once. He said no, but he gave many girls piggy-back rides. I was like "What? Piggy back rides?" He said that the only way he can get sexually excited was to give girls piggy back rides. George's medication doesn't change his inner nature: a nutcase; his medication only covered up his inner nature. In the same way that Richards bible collection and Christian façade covers up his inner nature and does not change it. It takes more than dabbling and collecting to bring about genuine inner change.

External Presencing

There was a time in our human past when our own grandparents and tribe mates past on the wisdom and culture of the tribe to you so that you had the culture and knowledge to not only survive but to succeed in life. But this way of passing wisdom and accumulated practical skills has been lost. Today we depend on schools to teach us. And usually what we learn in school has very little to do with life and living life successfully. It has more to do with gradually training you to be a good employee.

If not school, we go to religion and political parties to fill us up with “wisdom” and knowledge; all of which has absolutely nothing to do with the real human side of living life and getting the most out of life. Religion may offer myth and doctrines that are mentally stimulating to some. And politics may offer gradual political change. But school, religion, and politics neglects the most basic aspects of human existence: life, relationships, fulfillment, and getting the best out of our life and relationships. The average person today barely has the practical knowledge and skills to keep himself out of financial debt, to have a meaningful and healthy relationship with family and spouse. And the average person has close to zero skills in manifesting positive end results in their lives. As in getting the things you want out of life, as opposed to manifesting a dysfunctional debt ridden life.

It is within a religion’s best interest to have you mentally dysfunctional so they can offer you their life changing services. It is serves the interest of the State to have you dysfunctional so they can offer you their service of governance. Why do judges exist? Because people can’t be adults and come to agreements on their own. Why are there law makers? Because people can’t be adult enough to simply govern themselves and treat others fairly and justly. Social service workers are the stupidest service. It’s like as a Western society we are so socially dysfunctional that we need a government mediator to just socialize and get along. It serves the corporate sector’s interests to have you financially dysfunctional, this way they can offer you their jobs. When there is a service offered, it means there is a lack of know-how or dysfunction somewhere. When you cannot function [live your life] on your own and need others, you compromise your own sovereignty and self autonomy. All that dysfunction in life is the result of a lack of will power. A lack of the power to exert real influence and change on life according to your will. That power of will arises from determination, which comes from a strong sense and feeling of morale. It all comes back to Heart and Passion.

There are two ways to making things happen [manifesting/presencing] in the real world: 1) The easy way & 2) The hard way. The difference between the two lies in the understanding of how the natural causal mechanics of the phenomenal world of experience works, and where in that causal chain reaction you start.

We can say that manifestation is like a train. A train has a definite departure point, a middle point which is the length of the track, and a definite end point. If the train begins where it is suppose to begin this train will almost effortlessly move to its end point without much force. But, if this train were parked in the middle of the track and you wanted to move it, you would need to exert a large amount of force to move it. It’s like a Hindu in India trying to push a cow out of the road. It’s not going to move if you are ignorant of how a cow works. You can push all you want. But if you know how a cow works, you just entice it with food or salt in your hand and manipulate it off the road without much effort. You learn to understand the Nature of things, and you learn to use its own inherent Nature to your own advantage. It's like learning to understand the Nature of air, wind, and aerodynamics, and using what you have learned to make very heavy metal crafts fly in the air almost effortlessly.

So the process of action-manifestation also has a departure point, a middle point, and an end point. The departure point or train station is the Heart and Mind. The length of train track is the real world and our actions. The end point is the materialization of thought. The closer you start at the beginning of the chain reaction, the less force and more momentum the thought-form/desire has to actualize. The further down the chain reaction you begin, the more force you must exert and the less momentum it has to manifest coherently.

Starting in the "middle point" is like you desired to start up your own business. So you go out and borrow 20,000 dollars and rent a spot. You may be able to produce a shop with items to sell; but the whole process will take a lot of effort to keep it going. You will eventually tire and then quit with negative losses. There is an easier way: start before the action.

All things with us starts of inside in the Heart/Citta/Psyche, where thought and desire arises from into conscious awareness and recognition. That feeling of desire when it burns and ignites properly with a passion influences Mind, in such a way that its thinking and function becomes fixated and focused. Meaning that instead of the Mind's thoughts and awareness going about in different directions, with burning passion the Mind is obsessed over one single objective. If you have ever been in love or infatuated with somebody, you'll know what I mean. Or if you are nerdy then there may have been a time when you were wholemindedly passionately obsessed with a math equation, Star Trek convention, or computer program, I don't know what nerdy types get all worked up for. It's like Christmas when we were kids. You stay up late at night and can't stop thinking about Christmas day.

That obsessive state of Mind influences and fuels everything else, especially the way you behave, carry yourself, act, perform, function, do, and interact with others. If you are racist or know a racist then you will eventually know how your obsessive thoughts influence your body and its physical expression and action. You hate the other race, you obsessively think about the other race, and so when you encounter this other race, you act and behave under the influence of those strong emotions and thoughts. And from there your actions and behaviour produces consequences and causal reactions which you will experience.

That Obsessive State of Mind is where I initially got my idea of "Resonance" from. There is a word for it in Buddhism and it's an entire method of meditation. The word the Buddha used was "Sati." Sati is the Pali version of the Sanskrit word Samriti [smrti] which means "Remembrance," "Mindfulness," as well as "Tradition." The original idea of "Mindfulness" has devolved in the West to mean something like carrying a thought in your brain around everywhere, when it had a different meaning long ago before New Agers.

Resonance Factor is when you take a big bell and strike it once to cause it to ring. Then you allow that ring to draw out unimpeded. That drawing out aspect of a bell's ring is its resonance factor. So we take that idea of resonance and use it with a tuning fork. You strike a tuning fork over a table of crystal goblets. When the fork resonates it will crack those goblets with the same frequency as the resonance. The question is then: Where in that process does the Potency or Power to shatter crystal lie? In the striking and exertion of force onto the tuning fork or in the effortless flow of the tuning fork's resonance factor? It is in the resonance and quality of resonance. Not in the striking or applied force. That resonance factor of the tuning fork is Sati. Sati is a word which feebly tries to capture a "remembrance" or "lingering" affect/sound of the first strike. Don't hold onto the strike, hold onto the resonance. Don't think of the thought, hold onto the resonance of the thought. The potency does not lie in the thinking or visualizing. It lies in the quality of Mindfulness/Resonance. What do I mean by that?

Before I was "corrupted" by bad friends I used to be geeky. During junior high I was a member of this one thing our school called a "Pentathalon." The Pentathalon is when different schools in a school district collect all of their geeky kids and compete them in these nerdy competitions involving math, spelling, vocabulary, etc. Those were my shameful years. I think I was the only member of our school's pentathalon team that didn't wear glasses, didn't drool, didn't have buck teeth, and looked pretty. My whole fobby family was terribly proud of me back then. I only joined it to escape P.E. [physical education] because I hate sports. Orchestra and Choir were all full, so I had no other alternative. The real members of the pentathalon team were boys that actually wanted to be members of it.

The cool part of being on the pentathalon team was that you get pulled out of class to "train" and to compete. Training is when your pentathalon "coach" teaches you a mess of math and grammar that will be used in the next competition. Then we'd take a bus to the other school and along the way our coach would get really into it and tell us to close our eyes and visualize being the best we can be in winning the competition and to just dwell on the great feeling of winning. I was bad at spelling, but good with grammar and punctuation. My strong point was remembering the meaning of words or figuring out the meaning of big words. Math amazingly was also one of my strong points. I wasn't into it at first, until we went to this one school which has three pretty [non-geek] girls on the team. All that time I thought I was the only cool non-geek girl on the pentathalon. When those other girls looked at me funny, that just changed everything from then on. Because you can look pretty, but you can't be both pretty and smart at the same time like me, I'm Asian. That's how we roll.

So anyways I did end up using my brains for the first time that day to help my team win thus humiliating those other girls. I got this sadistic satisfaction deep inside from outsmarting and outthinking other people and making them look stupid ever since then. Which was when I started to do what our coach was telling us to do: Visualize winning and being the best I can be and dwelling on that feeling of satisfaction. And the longer I dwelled on that feeling, the more I could feel an itch or burn inside to get all into it. In other words, I discovered that you can psyche yourself out just by thinking of the feeling of winning. Once you're psyches out, it's like your high and you have all this energy and anxious feel to compete and kick. You fidget and become restless, like you'll explode if they don't hand you your pile of fraction division.

I have several cousins who practice martial arts and they compete in sparring competitions with other teams. They also do the same thing before their competition. They will close their eyes and first visualize the competition and winning that competition. Which is the striking of the bell that causes to arise a feeling and state of mind or altered state of conscious awareness where they are psyche out and fixated on that one thing. Then they stop visualizing and “ride out” that crucial and stimulating feel for as long as they can to maintain that altered state of awareness. This is the resonance factor of the thought/visualization. It is there that the potency lies. Not in the thinking or visualizing itself.

You have to think about it. When we are excited, stoked out, or psyched out about something, that state of mind and elevated emotional condition is not a thinking or intellectual process. It is pure feeling and awareness sans word and thought and intellectualization. Animals don't “think” in word and thought like us. They are aware and they feel. And they can manipulate, refine or fine tune their state of awareness and feelings to heightened states. You can see it in the eyes of a cheetah completely fixated on a target it has picked out to kill. There is no think involved. It's pure concentration of a feeling/emotion/burn and an elevated/refined state of awareness. Then it rushes full speed for the kill, without thought, yet with intelligence and precision. That wordless awareness, elevated state of Mind, and heightened state of pure emotion/feel is what you are trying to Sati: be Mindful of, dwell on, hold onto, draw out. The longer you can get the tuning fork to resonate at its optimal condition, the more crystal it can crack.

Whereas in the occultnik subculture they work their “magick” ass backwards. Instead of their being a focusing of their Heart/Mind/Body into a coherent “beam” they scatter everything. Their mouth is busy rambling incantations and nursery rhymes. Their body is busy doing something else waving swords around. Their mind is busy visualizing and thinking, and worrying if they chanted the Enochain words right, etc. And they strenuously put in effort to visualize and say their magickal words with contorted force like they're constipated and trying to relieve themselves. That's like taking a tuning fork and repeatedly banging on thing, thinking the more thinking and visualizing you do – the more striking and banging – the more powerful you will or magic will be. And then they wonder why their magick sucks and why it never works.

Sati is when you learn to become first aware of something – anything – then you learn to hold onto its resonance factor in your mind. The easiest way to explain this is to vividly recall a wonderful nostalgic memory from your past. This is becoming Aware. Then, when you have called into being that same elevated state of Mind, wonderful feeling, you stop the visualization, and hold onto that state of mind and feeling for as long as you can. That is the actual Mindfulness part of Sati. To prevent the conscious mind from bugging that resonance you may chant or vibrate something, as you often see Vajrayana monks do. This keeps that money busy. Then you can learn to do something called a walking meditation, which is when you practice walking around the block while holding on to the resonance or Mindful State. Because that state of Ataraxia is where the magic of causal manifestation incubates and bursts out. Any thought held in that state of resonance will either burst out as the end results of your actions, or as insights and as what people in the past in the West refer to as “revelation.” Before heaven and earth there was Wu Wei, the potent state of pure effortlessness. Before heaven and earth was created God/Brahma or Whatever existed in a state of pure awareness burning and bursting with the restless and creative impulse to manifest itself.

With that impulse to manifest and that elevated state of Heart and Mind, failure has no meaning. It is failure itself that causes us to fail. Or rather when awareness had come down from that elevated state and acknowledges failure and defeat – allows failure to supplant its Will – it quits. And in quitting it has succumbed to failure, thus failing and not achieving. Every person that I have ever met in life so far who is in some way successful in some aspect of their human existence have all told me the very same thing: “Do not let failure stop you.” If you have ever burned deeply to be with someone, you will know there is no such thing as failure. Rejection is meaningless. Fail does not compute with sheer determination. You will get what you want, or die trying. Failure may only be a sign post to help you better yourself and refine your effort and will.

I know an acquaintance in real life named Thomas [Tom]. I met Tom a while back in church. I actually have friends that go to church who invite me, and so I'll go and hang out. Tom is the pastor of a local church. His church is not big, but he has a good sized congregation that is active and always full on Sundays. Most of the people that go to his church are under 30. He always dresses in very nice business suits and is always perfectly groomed. Perfect hair and perfect cuticles. We pay detailed attention to odd things on guys. When I first met Tom at the church, he smiled and professionally introduced himself with a firm handshake and a strong eye contact lock. He asked for my name, and after I gave it he said my name and gave me a warm welcome. As I watched him mingle with his congregation before the service, I noticed he knows every person's name, never fails to smile and establish a strong eye link, and was very respected by his people.

For the first times I hung out at this church, I assumed that maybe Tom was a 40 year old businessman who didn't quite make it in business so he became a preacher to make a living. Which I see no wrong in. He is always friendly and respectful in his mannerism and speech. After hanging out with friends at his church one day he came by our little group to causally talk with us and he noticed the ivory Buddha I wear around my neck. So he politely waited when no one was talking to me and pointed at the pendant saying: “Buddhist?” I said yes. And he then started giving me some positive feedback about the nice qualities of Buddhism which he liked. I felt bad and didn't want to offend him in any way and said something like: “I really like this church and the atmosphere here. There are a lot of good things about Christianity which I like. Buddhism is just a part of our culture.” He seemed to get what I was trying to say and he said back: “Hey, I must be doing something right Chloe, you're a regular here. That means something!”

So later on after hanging out with my friends at this church I get around to asking Tom about his background and previous profession because judging by his dress, mannerism, and body language, I assume he was a businessman by profession. So I told him I wondered how a businessman ended up becoming a preacher and mentor to young people. Tom said he never did business and never finished high school. In fact during his early 20's he was so addicted to speed that he ended up being homeless. But he said that for as long as he can remember he always wanted to teach people and mentor people. He watched a popular preacher once and knew from then that he wanted to do the same. It's just that home life for him was harsh and one thing led to another and he ended up homeless and on drugs.

But he said his dream of teaching people never left him. He eventually found enough faith to clean himself up and got himself a normal job and place to stay. He made friends and started to try and preach to them. But none of his friends liked it. Instead of taking such rejection as a failure, he used it as constructive criticism to better himself. He took classes at the local community college on anything that could teach him people skills, and he read whatever he could on things like body language etc. He tried many times to start up churches, but he was never quite successful and at times the people were very mean to him. But he never accepted failure and never quit. He just used what looked like failure as a means to understand what he may lack that people need. Then after so many errors and fail attempts, he got his church, and was “blessed” with a beautiful wife and children. One thing he taught in church once which stuck in my Mind was: “Anybody can quit. Anybody can not bother to try. It takes a person with the resolve of Job to stand up to the adversities of life to make things happen. Don’t let failure defeat you.”

When you learn to hold onto the resonance factor of a thought or desire, and to ride it out as long as you can, life starts to unfold and unravel gradually in your favour. And this is one of those things which can’t be given or validated in word and speech. You must apply it and test it yourself. The Buddha once said that dhamma is only dhamma if and when such dhamma can be tested and replicated. It’s one of the 6 conditions or qualities of dhamma. Dhamma meaning “phenomenon.” If a phenomenon is real, it must be testable and reproducible. Meaning that if Sir Isaac Newton noticed that apples fall, then if that falling nature is a real phenomenon, other must be able to drop apples and watch it fall too. Then you know it is a real phenomenon of nature. If on the other hand somebody experiences Brahma talking to him, and that phenomenon of a talking Brahma cannot be tested and replicated, then something is not right.

So if life unfolds and unravels like a blossoming flower when nurtured by Mindfulness is a real phenomenon, then it is testable and replicable. Thus, as a student of Life, it is up to each of us to test natural phenomenon. If certain people can become successful in life, and if they all follow the same basic blueprint of manifestation, then whatever blueprint they are using should be replicable if applied. Unfortunately like science, phenomenon in nature cannot not be tested by simply throwing around opinions and debates. Phenomena are things that are experienced, and thus to test a phenomenon of nature, one must experience such phenomenon on one’s own terms.

So the basic blueprint of presencing something in the causal is Heart→ Mind→ Causal Momentum→ Result. That resonance factor is what is needed to build up step three: causal momentum. Causal Momentum is like swinging on a swing set on a playground. We all use to do it. You start off slow and move forward. Then intentionally pull yourself backwards, and thrust forward again. You do that often enough and you will generate a gradual increase in causal momentum. But that momentum or swing has two parts or aspects: a moving forward, and a moving backward. Both the movements are part of the swing. Just like going up slowly and moving down fast are both part of a rollercoaster. But in life we often mistake the slow going up or backward motion as “defeat” and “failure.” And so, interpreting them as such, every time we are confronted by what looks like failure, we quit and stop trying. You need one to give rise to the other. Failure and error is a sign that you are getting closer. That sounds counter-intuitive. I'll explain.

A while ago my family and their friends started a business of making faux wood out of polyurethane. To get the idea going a Russian scientist which I renamed Dr. Scratchhandsniff because he looked like that bald scientist on the Animaniacs. The Doc presented his "expertise" on chemistry. So the makeshift "board of executives" made him a partner and gave him big shares of the future company. All he had to do was make the idea real. To keep me out of trouble they made me be the receptionist after school and double as The Doc's assistant which meant that I just run around and fetch him things he needs.

The idea was simple. We take fiber glass, foam, and fly ash and mix it up into a clay like substance, then push the pliable substance through a long 60 foot pressing belt and Voila! Fake wood comes out the other end. And surely, with a chemical scientist from Russia, the minor details would be a piece of cake to figure out. Well, that's not how it looked like on our end. Or at least to me the Doc seemed to not know what he was doing for the first 3 years. The first year I stood there and watched him talk to himself as he mixed a bunch of chemicals. Some didn't do anything and others made a lot of smoke and caught on fire. There were times when he had to look at me as he was running to the door saying: "Okay, let's go outside, remind me to not use that specific formula again!"

One problem was that the Doc didn't have any money of his own. So his "tests" and "experiments" costs a lot of money, which nobody had. They had to use credit and borrowed money to supply the Doc with his chemicals. The other problem which looked like failure was the fire department kept coming by and telling us to get rid of the Doc's chemicals because they were a safety hazard. The second year the Doc ended up making something that looked like clay, but the quality was pure crap because the stuff just foamed and didn't harden into a wood like texture. The year the Doc finally perfected his formula. He made these little one foot long samples in the hundreds and I had to test all of them for its breaking point with this pump thing. Once we had the actual formula, it was time for the others to borrow more money to actually build the belt machine and extruder and stuff. That was when more failures came.

First nobody knew how or where to make belts as big as were needed. Each belt had to be 60 feet long. But the belts were round like massive rubber bands so that the belt machine can turn the things around. That meant the belts had to be 120 feet long and one piece because the pressing part of the belt had to have a continuous wood grain design. So one of my uncles who knew something about latex came on board and spent the whole year experimenting with the belt concept. This was a long process of trial and error and a ton of failure; each failure costing money nobody had. Next came the actual engineering team, nobody knew what the machine that mixed the stuff together must look like that could work with the chemicals and stuff the Doc's formula specified. They found an old one that handled the mixture which cost a huge arm and leg which was also borrowed.

Then the Doc and machine team came on board to learn to work the big blender. The blender/extruder was the size of one of those fans on the wing of a commercial airplane and it takes all these bunches of chemicals, ash, and chopped up fiberglass and mixed it all together in its mixing bowl inside of it. The chemicals react to make heat which melts everything together and the blender squeezes all of this out of a hole smaller than my fist. Which meant to me – being as smart and analytical as I am – that it's not a good idea to stand in front of the small hole, because if something happens and all the pressure and heat inside of it is clogged, something is going to blow up and fly out of the hole fast. Which happened and was the other set of huge failures. The blender machine on the first day of mixing got clogged because the Doc did not know exactly how long to keep the mixture inside before it hardened. Well it hardened inside the machine and the blender smoked up in a puff of clouds. I was the first to run out of the building, than like a cannon it shot out hot steaming rocks and clouds of toxic smoke. They had to take the whole machine apart piece by pieces to chip away the hardened stuff. This went on half the time.

The fourth year they were in terrible debt and the debt collectors were calling my phone at the desk asking for money and all these companies kept threatening me to sue me. I had had to tell every caller daily: "Hey, this is just an after school job, I have nothing to do with anything!" But the manufacturing plant was making boards! Piles of boards which were totally useless. The quality was crap, you step on it and they break. Each pile of boards cost about 5,000 dollars worth of chemicals and material which nobody had, and the whole yard was packed many feet high of worthless boards.

Finally, after all those years of failure, the plant made nice boards. So that's when the marketing team came in. Which was when I got assigned to work with the fat cigar smoking guy who was a partner and marketing guy. We made samples and drove around to these horse ranches to try and sell the stuff as fencing wood. We eventually started getting customers! Which was when the "executive board" said that everything looks "good" enough to sell the company to get out of debt. They had no other option. If they all didn't sell, everyone would be homeless. This was when the other set of failures came. Every group of investors and potential buyers that came to the plant rejected the whole thing as total waste of money [which it was]. Finally they found a farming family with a lot of money and not much brains. They came over to the plant and everybody was showering the farmers with visions of spectacular gross profit from making and selling fake wood! They bought the whole company, and everybody involved broke even with barely a significant profit. But that small profit everybody got plus getting out of debt was the success.

If it weren't for all the failures, trial, and error, there would have never been a profit of any size. The more causal momentum the business idea picked up, the more failures there seemed to be, and with each overcoming of those failures and from the learning of error, there was a progress. If you think about it, the people who have not met up with failure in life, have not actually tried to do anything in life. They all stay within the average limits of mundane existence: get a job, borrow money, lease a house, pay off debt, make a nuclear family. There are no risks or failure involved with mediocrity, it's safe.

Causal Momentum in real life out side of manufacturing plants takes on a different aspect, which is really cool to watch unfold, if you ever put yourself in the proper conditions. The state of Mind of resonance is the fuel which drives the momentum. By that I mean the thought/emotion you Mindfully resonate during your waking hours or are single mindedly focused on seeps into your sphere or field of influence and draws in people who themselves resonates with something you are “broadcasting” out. It usually happens in the form of coincidences and happenstance. Except when you manifest often, all the coincidences adds up to the point where you become consciously aware that they simply cannot be dismissed as coincidences.

I was told once by a mentor that success in life is easy, you just do what you love to do and the rest will fall into place. You eventually meet the “right” people at the “right” place and time. But it all requires a burn and putting yourself out there and meeting people. One causal thing happens which causes to arise another, and gradually a momentum builds up, until the end goal is actualized. It’s like the Star Game. There will be many moves, many errors, many failures, but every move takes you closer to the top board and put you closer to the winning pattern. The further along the Game, the more momentum build up. All you have to do is hold on, ride the unraveling of causal momentum, and keep things moving. The entire system itself is designed to take care of the How and details. You just move and set things initially into motion.

I’ll tell you a real story about manifesting, determination, and causal momentum. I have a close friend named “V.” I’ve known her for 7 years at least. She’s a few years older than me. When V was 9 years old her uncle brought home his best friend named “M.” We call her “Big M.” Big M is 11 years older than V. V said that when she first saw Big M, she fell in love and knew that Big M was the person she wanted to spend the rest of her life with.

At the time V was too young to know or make any sense of what she was as far as sexual orientation or identity goes. She just had a deep feeling for Big M. As V grew up Big M went through her many relationships with guys, which we all go through. The fact that Big M was never in a relationship with a girl never deterred V or stopped her from going to bed at night dreaming about being with Big M and waking up in the morning with the same thought resonating in her Heart and Mind.

Twelve years later V is all grown up. She has figured her self out and has been with a few girls. She still wanted to be with Big M, and the feelings never went away. They only grew stronger. So one day she had to tell her uncle, to get things off her chest. Back then she and her uncle were like best friends. He was a gay boy 11 years older than her. V told her uncle that she was in love with Big M for over 10 years and wanted to be with her. They got into this big fight as he went into a big sissy fit, and her uncle ended up telling his whole family that V was gay [lesbian]. At the time she was living with her grandparents who were religious Catholics. They kicked V out. She didn’t have a place to go so she went to live with her cousin. But she and her cousin got into a big fight as well, and so she left. For a while V was homeless. She drifted between our house and other friends houses. But she was working and still in love with Big M.

Enter me. I knew V’s family problems at the time, but she never mentioned anything about her 11 year in loveness with Big M who was already 30 something at the time. Which was way older than us. Plus I had never seen Big M with a girl before, but I don’t hang out with Big M much anyways. So one day Big M calls me up to hang out. It was a day before V’s birthday and Big M wanted to buy something for V, but she didn’t know what V liked. While we were shopping Big M kept on asking me about random private information about V, such as what kind of girls she dated etc. So after coercing it out of her, I learn that Big M has this crush on V ever since she first saw V when she was 9. Except she never told anybody about it because Big M was always afraid that people might think of her as a “child molester.” I also learned that Big M has some encounters with other girls, and had finally come to realize that she is happier with girls because men are pigs. And Big M for the longest time wanted to be with V more than anything, except she was scared how this all would effect V’s relationship with her uncle [M’s best friend].

I thought it was odd when she mentioned V’s relationship with her uncle, because they didn’t have one. Big M didn’t know, because the fag never told her. I had to tell her that V’s uncle went on a sissy fit rampage and got V kicked out a year before and she was living from house to house, but I didn’t know what the cause of the big fight was. I suggested unknowingly that Big M perhaps give V a call and find out, and tell V that I had told her about the fight if V asks. Well as soon as I could I ran over to our friends apartment where V was living at to tell her the load of gossip I uncovered. I was thinking, “V will never believe me when I tell her Big M was in love with her when she was 9 years old!” It turned out that the bizarre feeling were mutual. A month later after 13 years, they started dating. Today, after constant mindfulness, the burn of passion, and causal momentum, they are living happily together in a house they rent. They have been together for about 5 years now.

When we hang out together and quietly talk, it always amazes us how throughout all the challenges, difficulties, and adversity, V never lost sight of the only thing in her life that gave her life meaning and something to wake up to, to strive for. For even when she was rejected by her entire family and homeless, she held on to that determination and never waived. Even if it never happened, it is the hope itself that kept her striving and kept her from doing anything tragic with herself like suicide. Most girls who are kicked out and severed from their families within V’s “subcultural demographics” don’t have happy lives, and don’t really make it in life as anything successful. When V was kicked out, she worked her ass off at her job. Today she is the assistant manager of a large grocery store. V is a personal “hero” of mine, one of many Real everyday people I look up to and admire. Not for what philosophical or religious BS they know, but for what they have accomplished and manifested against all odds and adversity.

Morale, Determination, and Will Power sets the pendulum of causal manifestation in motion. I find it unfortunate that mundane Satanism has rejected the fundamental aspects of human motivating morale such as hope and faith. They have traded the very basic flint of manifestation that makes the sparks which sets aflame the burn of passion and determination for dead lifeless intellectualism and opinions. And when these mundane occultniks have some sort of desire to have something, rather than understand that it is from the burn of determination and single minded action that results in life are born, they turn to dead grimoire of medieval magic. Think that pointing swords at a pentagram and speaking Enochian will do anything. You take a close look at many of these mundane Satanists and occultniks in cyberspace and you’ll notice that most don’t even have the will power to lose weight. With such people something Jesus and something Forrest Gump once said comes to mind: “By their fruits, ye shall know them;” and “Stupid is as stupid does.”

Where do you go to learn about determination and will power? Can you read a self help book and be magically endowed with god like passion and will power? No. They are phenomena in nature. Inner nature and outer nature. You must put yourself in the right conditions to experience such phenomena. No body can teach you or me how to passionately burn for something, some goal, or someone. But steps which helps put together the right condition can be given to you. And if you would just apply the steps and put yourself into the Flow of Life, you will eventually gain the experiences and learn by trial and error how to use those experiences to makes real things happen in life.

The 7 degrees of the Sinister Way are the steps, the tasks, the trials, and the ordeals that bring about the right conditions in life for one to experience sheer determination. Sure, the individual end goals seem pointless. But that is not the point. The point is what is not pointed at or written. What can never be written. Only intimated feebly from on Mind to another. It's like a constructed wind tunnel in a way. There is wind everywhere in the world, Why bother constructing a stupid wind tunnel? To test and experience things first in a controlled environment, before you take flight in the much bigger environment. So we can ask: "Why bother experiencing unnecessary adversity and ordeals set up in some Seven Fold Way, when life itself is already difficult and challenging to live?"

It's a simple answer really: to gain practical skills in a controlled environment. Failing tasks in the Seven Fold Way doesn't generate long term consequential results in your life. Failing to hike 50 miles up a hill doesn't kill you or make you homeless. If you fail, pick yourself off and try again. It's an outrageously arbitrary end goal, but just do it anyways. In the process you will feel something stir and burn inside. And when you reach the end goal you will gain an intimate realization that can never be given to you in spoken or written word. The realization that with determination and will power anything is possible in Life and beyond.

It is the only thing that strikes fear in God. Throughout the whole mythos of the Bible, there is only one real instance when God expresses fear. It was when humanity was One and they had collected themselves into a coherent union with a single minded revolve to build the Tower of Babel to pierce the heavens. In fear, God said to himself: "If as one people speaking the same language they have begun to do this, then nothing they plan to do will be impossible for them..." [Gen 11:6] Then he divided everybody up, fracturing their coherency; and making them – Humanity – impotent, dysfunctional, and dependent on him.

Besides the ability to show you intimately what determination is and how force of will is born from that burn of passion; the 7 degrees of the Sinister Way of the ONA orients your Mind to see, understand, and to work for goals, aims, objectives, and directives. It trains you to live your life within context to goal orientated action. Don't just live aimlessly. Live for something and work to Presence it. Don't just waste your time working for anything. Work to manifest something beyond you, for those who will come after you: your progeny. Like bees who labour their whole existence for unborn grubs. Step by step, the Sinister Way gives you a goal and task to accomplish. It gives you the basic methodology. The rest is up to you/us. If we are the right type and kind of people, we will know and figure out the How and the details.

If it's one thing I hate, it's babysitting grown people. There was this time when me and my cousins had this idea of building a gazebo in our grandma's back yard for her, next to a fish pond there. We went around and collected money from everybody who thought it would be a good idea. So me and my cousin Tiff had the chore of finding the guy who would build it. We call up this one guy we found in the internet after a day of searching. This fatass comes over to grandma's house and we talk business. We tell him we want a six sided gazebo "right here." This fatass then proceeded to act like a smart ass saying things like: "You guys don't have blueprints? What kind of sticks and lumber should I use? Should I use cement or brick to lay the foundation?" His badgering and whining got me and Tiff upset so we went off on him. Can't you just build the god damn gazebo right here without people feeding you the little detail and baby sitting you?

So we fired him and drove around Home Depot looking to hire a Mexican labourer. After stopping by a few Home Depots cruising for the right looking guy who has the look and feel of someone who takes charge, we found one and Tiff yells out: "Hey anybody know how to build a gazebo?!" My pick stepped up and said he had experience building patios and that he can make a gazebo. So we hired him. We took him to grandma's and said to him: "Aqui [here]." He says: "Okay, tomorrow I come back and show you pictures." He came back the next day on a bike with a magazine of gazebos. We pointed to one we liked, and that was it. All we had to do was drive him around back and fourth to home depot to go crazy on picking whatever he needed to build the thing. We didn't know. Our gazebo guy even provided us with his own cheap labourers without us bothering to look. And the gazebo got built. That's more like it. You are given an end goal or objective. Nobody babysits you. Stupid people need not apply. You/we should be smart enough to figure out on our own how to get from point A to point B. Point A is now, point B is Galactic Imperium. Point A is the current condition, point B is system breakdown.

Subversive Presencing

I just made up that term. It basically means to presence or manifest in people ideas in a subversive manner. Why bother doing that anyways? Because with something like Inner Presencing, we can change and alter our own inner condition, which is great. And with Outer Presencing we can learn to change and alter the immediate environment in our own lives. But those methods don't bring about social change because "society" means a group of other people. When we are dealing with the building block that is the human being, there is no difference between a "civilization," a "city," and "nation," and "corporation," a "school campus," a "tribe," a religion, a "gang," a military, or the gay pride parade. It's all the same thing: People! They are social orderings of humans who associate with each other for some purpose.

So when we have demystified all of that, we can clearly see that if we desire to change "civilization" or society that we are not talking about rebuilding structures and buildings and infrastructure things like highways and sewage pipe lines. We really mean the people, the social glue that binds them together, and the causal future fruit of their combined wyrd and actions. So it's basic causal mathematics from here: Coherency + Modality = Future Result.

By Coherency here we mean the social ordering or social organization of a given group of humans. By Modality here we mean the pattern of behaviour, way of life, culture, mode of expression, of the given group of people. By Future Result we mean the condition of life, of the world, of the environment, the collective causal output of a given group of people will manifest in the framework of Time. Each vector is the sum of several variables or factors. Coherency is the sum of the factors of People plus a shared common resonance. Like attracts like. We are drawn to people who have something in common with us somehow. It comforts us by appeasing our ancestral tribal instinct wired in us. We feel safer around our kith and kinfolk who share things in common with us. Such as tradition, beliefs, culture, rituals, etc. Modality is the sum of the factors of Heart [citta/psyche], Mind, and Action.

So once we have the simple equation, we can say that if we do not like the potential Future Result of a given group, or if we desire to graft our own Future Result into the equation, that we must deal with the vectors of Coherency and Modality. Change any one of those two initial vectors, and we in time influence the Future Result of the equation. How do we change those two first vectors? Implantation of emotive memes in Heart, implantation of memes in mind influences behaviour and activity. Maneuvering and manipulating People requires an intimate understanding of how humans function and understanding of Resonance Factors, what they are, and why they bring people together. Affect any of those two secondary variables, and you influence the coherency of the given social order, in Time. When we are working in real life with the factor of Time always in the background, we are not working in a static environment. It is again very much like the Star Game. Each move changes everything and takes you – in Time – closer to the “end.” Not only do you have to be considerate of each move and the potential causal resultant sequences of each move, but also how each piece will affect other pieces and how it all must work to make an end pattern in context to the matrix of Time.

I learned how to change others gradually over time by paying close attention to my own life, my actions, and how those actions affected and influenced others around me. Then what I would do is make a hypothesis, experiment around with people and situations, and then analyze my results. All this takes time and a progressive examination of your past actions and resulting reactions. It also has a lot to do with speculation, trial, error, mistakes, and the learning from mistakes. But it wasn't like learning to manipulate people subtly was my life's objective. It was just a random thing that popped into my mind when I was bored and thinking.

My first visual perspective of manipulating people comes from the examination of my own junior high years and being honest with myself. During that time I knew there was a social pecking order on campus. There were the popular people at the top and I was somewhere at the bottom. I hated the popular kids, but only because I may have envied something they had. I secretly wanted to be them. When I left campus, I vanish from the minds of my peers, if they were ever aware of me at all. When school was over, the popular kids were still on our minds and we bottom rung students still talked about them. We hated them, but we wanted to be like them. Which is why we dressed like them, did our hair like them, talked like them, thought like them, liked the same celebrities like them, etc.

We all do it whether we like to admit it or not. We desire to associate or be close to things we find pleasing. They don't even need to be people. When you walk into a pet store and you see a cute puppy you want to take it home with you. When you walk into an antique store and you see a beautiful curvy French armoire you want to take it home with you to have; to keep in close proximity with you. When you meet someone and you like them you want to have them close to you somehow. We want to be close to things we like. If we can't be close to things we like directly we associate with those things indirectly by proxy. We can't associate and be close to Hitler, so we either carry a picture of him, have a swastika, or associate with whatever party he affiliated with. We can't all marry Justine Timberlake or Brad Pit or Angelina Jolie, so we do the same with them by proxy. We listen to their music, watch their movies, talk about them, and wear what they wear. We can't all be best homies with Dr. Dre and Obama, so we listen to Dre's music he produces, associate by proxy with his label, and join the democratic party and support liberal agenda like stooges.

Top down influence is easy. Those people at the top don't have to try. We naturally associate. Bottom up influence is pathetic and not even worth trying. If you were a bottom rung student and you tried to start a fad or set a fashion trend, nobody would notice you or give a shit. So from that experience in being at the bottom rung of our school's social order, I gained two valuable hypothetical insights which I would test later: 1) If you want to influence people, get to the top of the social organization; 2) If you can't get to the top, and you want to influence people, you just influence the people at the top.

The Higgs Particle comes to mind here. It's a speculative elementary particle that "gives" mass to bigger particles. I was watching something on youtube which explained the Nature of the Higgs Particle really nicely. You have a campus of students at break just hanging out and talking. Then a Popular professor walks across the quad and all the students start to crowd around this Popular professor. The Popular professor represents the Higgs Particle and the crowding effect represents "mass." On the other hand, when a normal professor without the popularity walks across campus he doesn't even draw people's attention to him. So in any social ordering of people you often have two kinds of people you want to look for. The first is the "Leader Particle" who is somehow either an authority figure or given that role. The second type of person to look for is the "Higgs Particle" people, or the Popular one.

As a Subverter you first want to find the Higgs Particle type and focus your work on them and not the Leader Particle. Why? Because just because you are a leader of a group does not mean people like you. The Popular ones in the group attract the attention, have already established strong rapport with their peers, and everybody likes them. Your memes will travel further and wider through that type. Ignore the leader and the satellite membership. The leader types are only secondary options in the case that a group has no popular types, which is a rarity. Some social orders don't have leaders. How do you brand market "Nike" to an entire leaderless subculture of basketball players? You put Nike shoes on the most Popular type in that subculture. Human Nature and the natural pecking order of the subculture will do the rest of the work.

So in practice, let's say that you have a tagger crew on campus you wanted to influence. Do you waste your time and energy convincing the many individual members to agree with you and see things your way, or do you work on the leader and popular icons in the crew? The second option is the more constructive option. First in a friendly subversive manner, and if that doesn't work, you use force. As long as the leader, perceived leader, and iconic figures in that crew are influenced, the rest of the crew will naturally follow.

I first became aware of "Satanism" in junior high, when one of my friends talked about it. Him and his few friends were Modern Satanists. They had this group thing they called AMS which stood for "American Modern Satanist." The group leader was this emo fag named "Shadow," or at least that's what he called himself. He wore black lipstick, eyeliner, and black nail polish and said making out with other boys is cool. But they were the only friends I had at the time beside the drooling geeks on the pentathalon team. At the time I only knew about three religions: Buddhism which I didn't think anything of because you drown in it at home; Christianity which I thought were obnoxious crazy people; and Hinduism which I thought were irritating crazy people with stupid English accents. So I naturally thought Satanism must be crazy too. Who worships Satan?

My friend Shadow gave me a Satanic Bible one day after I asked for one. This was when he had spent time talking about the greatness of Satanism during every lunch break in the library. And I liked the ideas. But as I read the Satanic Bible I had all these questions. I tried asking my friends in AMS but none of their answers really satisfied me because they were idiots.

But I had this one grandfather who was a Buddhist monk! So I figured that, of all people who knew anything about life and human nature, it must be a monk. I thought about asking him my question whenever I had time. Except I had a few problems, first I didn't want anybody in my family to know I was a crazy Satanist. I wouldn't know how to explain it. Second, that grandpa speaks gibberish which I don't understand hardly. He uses these really big Pali and Khmer word. Second I was only had the command of the English language. My Khmer is primitive. I understand it spoken; by my personal lexicon in my head consists of mostly domestic words. Domestic meaning the further from the house environment one goes, the less words I knew to describe things. So I would need a translator, which was my aunt-mom. But she was a problem as well. She understood the grandfather and she is fluent in English, except my aunt-mom's English is on a different level than mine. I'm not going to say I am smarter than her. It's just that I have a different class and set of words I use which differs from the everyday domestic class of words and thought she uses. So this is how I learned the other method of influencing people.

The idea was for me to trick my aunt-mom into thinking I am asking a question about Buddhism when I am actually asking a question about Satanism. This way the grandpa will be tricked into giving me the answers I am looking for. But the trick happens the other way around as well which I would later find out. It's called Upaya, which is a method of tricking people to be Buddhist by using words and thought-ideations your audience uses already. The whole system of Mahayana is an Upaya to trick the native Taoist Chinese people to be Buddhist for example. Vajrayana is another example of an Upaya, where the monks reformat Buddhism into the native Bon-Po thought-ideation, weltanschauung, and cultural peculiarities of the indigenous Tibetans. And this is not unbuddhist because the Buddha himself used Upaya to trick everybody around him to understand Dhamma.

There is no way to translate "Satan" into Thai, or Khmer, or Pali, or Sanskrit in such a way that it retains its native quality without completely changing the outer word. You can just use the name and it would be completely meaningless to your Bhikkhu grandfather who is totally ignorant of what a Satan is. So from my exchanges back and forth with my grandpa through my aunt-mom, I learned to clearly see that there is a distinct difference between a string of words and the thought-ideation that such spoken words conveys or tries to convey. For example I can say in English: "My Dog Has Black Eyes," and in simple Khmer "Pnaek [eye] Jakai [dog] Pon [belong] Chloé Khmau [black]," and although the words and ordering of words are completely different, both sentences relay the same exact ideation.

And I learned further that the sequencing of thought-ideations themselves only tries to approximate an essential concept further beneath the ideas. For instance In English we can say: "God Exists." This makes sense in English and the ideation of it also makes sense in English, yet it cannot be literally translated into Khmer or most other languages. Then also the ideas native to each word themselves cannot be "translated." There is no real word in Khmer for "God," and there is no real word in Khmer for "to exist," or "to be." You cannot state that English ideation intelligently in Khmer in any real way. Thus there is a problem because the superficial thought-ideation simply does not exist as a viable construct in Khmer weltanschauung. Neither the word or ideation exists. How do I go about this huge problem if I wanted to get my grandpa to tell me if a god is real?

If I wanted to say "Trees Exist," in Khmer I would have to say "Dam-cher [Tree] Roos [Grow/born] Bee [From/of/with] Dey [Ground]." But here I would be stating a complete obvious. Of course trees grow from the ground. But the point is you cannot take the "tree" outside of its condition and matrix. The condition of growing, and the matrix of ground. The condition and locality or matrix gives the phenomenon of a tree its given reality/actuality. You see it, it grows, it's obviously exists. Or I can say: Mian [Have] Dam-cher [Tree] Khnong [Inside] Pandey [The Earth]. But again, the "tree" is accompanied by a condition [Have] and a matrix of existence [The Earth] as in the earth has trees. But you can't say Vishnu grows from something, because what is Vishnu growing out of? People? The sky?

People like me can Roos [grow] Bee [From] Madai [Mother]; and thus the phenomenon of my existence is fixed to conditions and people and places: real things. You can't say that the earth has shiva, because where is it? But I can say "Preah [sacred/honorable/used to also mean god] Nau [dwells] Khnong [inside] Chet [Heart/Citta] Manus [People/Human]," or God dwells in the human heart, which is the closest I can get to "God Exists." If God exists, he only exists as a "quale" – an inner experience – of Heart and Mind, and thus has no reality in the real world of phenomena, in the same sense that the emotion of love exists only as an inner experience and does not – cannot – exist in and of itself in the real world independent of condition and context. It's the same thing with the spirit of ancestors. You can't say that "spirits exist," or spirits are real. Your ancestors and forefathers are dead. They no longer "exist" in the real world. But their spirits can be with us in our heart [citta/psyche]. To be fair one can actually say "God Exists" in "Khmer" by heavily borrowing words and ideas from Sanskrit and Pali. But when 100% of the words/ideas are Sanskrit is it really Khmer anymore?

From many years of struggling to state my questions about Satanism, life, and human nature in general to my aunt-mom to ask my grandpa, and from he in return giving answers, I gradually figured out that the only major difference between at least Satanism and Buddhism was the verbal décor; otherwise I noticed that both religions were feeling the same arena of human experience and nature. Like we were to take grade schoolers from the 1st grade to the 6th grade out into a natural setting and have them paint the same scenery of snow capped mountains, lake, and pine forest. Not everyone will draw the same picture with the same detail. Some pictures will come out very crude and almost unintelligible. Other may come out perfectly drawn. Yet they are all the human attempt of capturing what has existed before human Mind existed to capture.

So I switched high schools and became popular at my new school due to relations with people who had gone to the school before and because at that new school, taggers, gangbangers, and ravers were the cool crowd. I had gotten into tagging at my first high school, which was not an activity the popular crowd there were into. All my friends were just that type there. Things were different at the new school. I ended up making many friends in the top rung, as well as in the subgroups on campus. And so at that new school, with my new found social status I brought my confused belief system with me. Which was when I learned another useful factor in subversive presencing.

At that school I was the only "Satanist" on campus, but I didn't tell anyone, since I was confused myself. By the time I was a senior, every person inside my field of influence, which included many of my cousins at home became Satanists. There was literally only 3 or 4 people I knew at school whom I associated with that was not a Satanist, or who did not get into Buddhism. Basically what happened was that I would often share my own ideas and insights during general conversations but I never put a tag or label to those insight. As time past my friends would come up to me and ask me what my religion was, or where I was getting my ideas and thoughts from. Depending on the person, I either just said from the Satanic Bible or from Buddhism.

So when a person is first exposed to a set of ideas that they resonate with, and they later find out that those ideas are "Satanic," they cannot fall back on their own preconceived assumptions and biased opinions about Satanism, because they first resonated with the ideas and associated with them. If we like something, we want to associate with them, and this goes with ideas and thoughts also. It is our own preconceptions, assumptions, misunderstandings of a religion, a belief, a culture, a race, etc, that prevents us from associating or being open to such. You want to completely go around and bypass their ego, prejudice, and assumptions, by presenting your memes with words and ideas "native" to the person's paradigm first. Then if you want, you later give them a label for those ideas. Otherwise, it serves no real purpose to put labels on memes when subverting.

When I left high school and went to colleges, things changes. I no longer had the back up of a social pecking order, because there really isn't a coherent single one on a college campus. And the people that go to college are more intelligent. It became hard to tell people my ideas and get people to just accept them like I had become used to. This is when I learned another factor in subversive presencing.

From hereon I learned that the verbal décor and outer ideation are only tools used to convey a deeper essence to specific groupings of people. You can complete change the verbal décor and outer ideation around and retain the essence. So now it was possible to convey that essence to a target person by manufacturing the ideation and verbal décor this target person was receptive to and embed that essence in him. Religion had then lost its meaning to me. It now had become a tool of manipulation. Because I can take the essence of "Satanism" and morph that essence to be acceptable to a Mormon. And I could take Mormon ideas and by switching verbal décor and ideation around, I can make it acceptable to a Satanist. Or I could take dhamma and morph it to sound like Mormon ideology to a Mormon and Satanic philosophy to a Satanist.

The idea of subverting the internal thought process, paradigm, belief system, or worldview of others is to Implant your own memes somehow into their Minds, so that the target grafts those memes into their system. When you meet with resistance, you must understand that the subject's psychological "immune system" has red flagged your memes and has put up a defense mechanism. The very minute your memes is challenged by a debate or argument, that memetic coding is trash and useless. Because instead of those memes embedding in a Mind, it now just circulates in a circle of debate and validation. Debating ideas defeats the very objective of subversion. You don't want your subjects debating, arguing, and validating, your ideas. You want them to think them and use them. You don't want the street gang down the street to debate on the economic validity of teaming up with your gang and monopolizing the drug trade in the whole area. It's pointless and gets you nowhere. You want them to go with it without resistance.

The minute one of my ideas meets up with a debate or sign or resistance in the other person, I know that my idea/meme did not pass their customs agents. When you are trying to smuggle drugs and contraband across the boarder into a different country, the last thing you want is the boarder patrol checking through your vehicle and cargo. A debate is not conducive to subversion. It is a resistance to what has been outted as a foreign idea that challenges the other persons set of opinions, lexicon, belief, and worldviews.

I say lexicon, because most of the time, what triggers a debate or argument is not the idea itself, but the actual words you used to convey those ideas. For example when you are taking to a group of Mormons and you want them to think thoughts congruous to Satanic weltanschauung, you don't give them the meme: "Human sacrifice and culling is cool!" It's not the idea of killing people they reject, because Mormons join the army and kill, they do become police officers and must use force at times, the bible and book of Mormon includes acts of war, and in their history they did have what was called the "Mormon Illuminati" who were fanatics that murdered any Mormon who betrayed their secret priesthood oaths. They reject the memetic coding because their system is programmed to just reject such words. When you use different words which they use and you mirror their Mormom thought-process or way of thinking [paradigm], they will agree or not debate it.

It's like a problem I recently encountered. I got a cool program with some weird extension [.asc] which worked fine on the internet, but when I downloaded it my computer said it couldn't open an ASC file. I have never come across an ASC file before. So I just deleted the software after trying to open it with everything I had in my computer. I figured ASC must be some computer programming language from the stone age of computers or something. It was a stupid program anyways. I don't know why I downloaded it. It was an artificial intelligence program. There was a box with a head in it and you type things to the head, and it talks back to you. Except its conversation skill was pitiful.

Anyways, in college I dropt Satanism; or at least the outer décor of Satanism since it's hard to subversively implant memes using outer satanic ideas in people. But by then I had learned the fine art of upaya from my grandpa. Upaya is like shapeshifting but for your ideas/memes. You have the essence you want to convey. You calibrate your target, acquire their lexicon and paradigm schematics from associating with them, then dress up the essence of your meme in ideas and words that resonates with the target's mental programming language and paradigm.

Rapport is also a crucial initial factor of subversion and subtle influence. I only learned this after asking myself why was it that every friend I had thought like me in some way; why most of my friends I had in high school turned into Satanists like me. Why when I dropt Satanism and reverted back to Buddhism that those friends who associate with me turned Buddhist. To "Turn" people: what's the root meaning of the word "Subvert?" Sub+Vertere/Versus. It shares the same root as the word Universe. A Uni-Verse is something that is a Whole System and when it Turns everything in it Turns together as One Whole Thing. Uni meaning "One" and "Verse" from Vertere/Versus meaning "Turn [Around]." Reverse meaning to "Turn Back." Convert meaning to "Turn Together," or "Turn With." Divert meaning to "Turn From." Subvert essentially means to Turn people around Beneath [sub] their conscious awareness in a subtle manner. Or it can be parsed to mean to Turn people's Subjective orientation around.
