

NAG HAMMADI &
MANICHAEAN STUDIES

Demonstrative Proof in Defence of God

*A Study of Titus of Bostra's
Contra Manichaeos
The Work's Sources, Aims and Relation to its Contemporary Theology*

NILS ARNE PEDERSEN

brill

Demonstrative Proof in Defence of God

Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies

Editors

Stephen Emmel & Johannes van Oort

Editorial Board

H.W. Attridge, R. Cameron, W.-P. Funk,
I. Gardner, C.W. Hedrick, H. Jackson,
S.N.C. Lieu, P. Nagel, D.M. Parrott,
B.A. Pearson, S. Richter, J.M. Robinson,
K. Rudolph, W. Sundermann, G. Wurst

VOLUME LVI

Demonstrative Proof in Defence of God

A Study of Titus of Bostra's Contra Manichaeos—The Work's Sources, Aims and Relation to its Contemporary Theology

by

Nils Arne Pedersen

BRILL
LEIDEN • BOSTON
2004

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Pedersen, Nils Arne, 1959-

Demonstrative proof in defence of God: a study of Titus of Bostra's Contra Manichaeos: the work's sources, aims, and relation to its contemporary theology/by Nils Arne Pedersen.

p. cm.—(nag Hammadi and Manichaean studies, ISSN 0929-2470; 56)

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 90-04-13883-8 (alk. paper)

1. Titus, of Bostra, Bishop of Bostra, fl. ca. 362-378. Against the Manichees. 2. Manichaeism—Controversial literature—History and criticism. I. Title II. Series.

BR65.T853A347 2004

229'.1—dc22

2004045862

ISSN 0929-2470

ISBN 90 04 13883 8

© Copyright 2004 by Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, The Netherlands

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by Brill provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910, Danvers, MA 01923, USA.

Fees are subject to change.

PRINTED IN THE NETHERLANDS

CONTENTS

Preface	ix
Abbreviations	xii
I. Introduction	1
1. The main interpretation	1
Excursion: Manichaeism as Christian Gnosis	6
2. Overview of the study's structure	13
II. Summary of Contents	17
1. Summary of Book I	17
2. Summary of Book II	23
3. Summary of Book III	34
4. Summary of Book IV	50
III. Receptions, editions and scholarship history of Contra Manichaeos	66
1. Knowledge of Titus in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages	66
2. Reception of and scholarship on Contra Manichaeos from the end of the 16th century to De Lagarde's editions of the text in 1859	69
3. Contra Manichaeos as a source of knowledge on Manichaeism	78
4. Titus as a theological and philosophical writer	89
5. Text transmission and history of editions	109
IV. The historical and literary context for Titus of Bostra's Contra Manichaeos	120
1. Introductory remarks	120
2. The province of Arabia, conflicts between pagans and Catholics and the dating of Contra Manichaeos	120
Excursion: Other works by Titus	128
3. Heresiology and anti-Manichaeism	129
Excursion: Possible use of various patristic sources in Titus	146

V.	The audience for Contra Manichaeos and the portrayal of Manichaeism that Titus wished to present to them	158
	1. The two audiences	158
	2. Titus's portrayal of Manichaeism as barbarism, irrationalism and as a philosophy	166
	3. Titus's portrayal of Manichaeism as determinism and immorality	171
VI.	The Manichaean texts used by Titus of Bostra	177
	1 The relevance of the problem for this study	177
	2. Heraclianus's information and Adda's works	178
	3. The Manichaean source in Contra Manichaeos I + III.4–5	186
	4. Other Manichaean sources in Contra Manichaeos Books III–IV	199
	5. The Manichaean criticism of the Creator God in Contra Manichaeos III.7	206
	a. Introduction	206
	b. Discussion of the non-Catholic polemical interpretations of the OT	209
	c. The philosophical and Marcionite background for the idea of the Creator's ignorance	216
	d. The philosophical and Gnostic background for the idea of the Creator's φθόνος	225
	e. The positive evaluation of man's acquisition of knowledge in Gnostic texts	234
	f. Comparison with the original Manichaean literature	237
	g. Comparison with Augustine's portrayal of Manichaeism	243
	h. Comparison with Emperor Julian's treatise: Contra Galilaeos	249
	i. Problems and different solutions	251
VII.	Titus of Bostra's philosophical position	255
	1. Titus's knowledge of philosophers and philosophical texts	255
	2. Titus's concept of God and his basic philosophical position	259

3. The “common concepts”	280
4. Titus’s philosophical psychology	297
VIII. Titus of Bostra’s interpretation of the Paradise narrative	320
1. Introductory remark	320
2. The image of God in man	321
3. God’s foreknowledge and man’s disobedience	326
4. Comparison with earlier writers	331
5. Death as a benefit	343
a. Titus’s view of death in Book II and Book IV	343
b. Death did not harm man	349
c. The background to these ideas in the earlier tradition	353
6. Summarising remarks	363
IX. Comparison between the exegesis of Genesis in Titus of Bostra and in a number of writers in “the Antiochene School”	366
1. Plan for the following comparison	366
2. Outline of the interpretation of the Paradise narrative in Eusebius of Caesarea	369
3. Comparison with Eusebius of Emesa’s interpretation of the Paradise narrative	371
4. Comparison with Diodore of Tarsus’s interpretation of the Paradise narrative	379
5. Problems concerning Coisliniana, fragment no. 115	382
6. Comparison with Theodore of Mopsuestia’s interpretation of the Paradise narrative in his commentary on Genesis, illustrated by other Theodore fragments	392
7. Comparison with Theodore of Mopsuestia’s work: Against those who say that men sin by nature and not by intention	407
8. Comparison with the Constitutiones Apostolorum	414
9. Hypotheses to explain similarities between interpretations of the Paradise narrative	415

X. Summary of the study's most important conclusions	420
XI. Critical examinations of the text	424
Bibliography	475
Indices
1. General Index	517
2. Index of Sources	528
3. Index of Persons	565
a. Index of Ancient Persons	565
b. Index of Modern Persons (after 1500)	569

PREFACE

Few scholars have been willing to take up the challenge of Titus of Bostra's lengthy refutation of Manichaeism. On being informed that I was working on Titus of Bostra a colleague declared, "He doesn't exist. He's just someone you made up!"—But Titus was actually the author of important works that require repeated engagement from scholars, as I hope to prove within these covers.

The book contextualises Titus and simultaneously includes many modern studies on his context, though it should be noted that for practical reasons I have been unable to include any contributions published after 2001.¹

The study would not have come into being without major inspiration and support from many sides. I wish to thank all those persons, institutions and foundations who have helped and supported me in various ways:

Peter Nagel, then in Halle, now in Bonn, suggested during his stay in Copenhagen in 1992 that I should work on the Church fathers' criticism of Manichaeism. His view was that by and large scholars of Manichaeism knew relatively little about patristics, and scholars of patristics knew relatively little about Manichaeism. The idea of providing new knowledge and perspectives by linking areas of scholarship usually examined in isolation has been a guiding principle in the composition of this book.

Paul-Hubert Poirier (Université Laval) granted me access to his and Catherine Sensal's (unpublished) French translation of the first two books of the Syriac version of Contra Manichaeos, as well as to the 100-year-old German translation (also unpublished) of parts of ¹ A practical note is necessary for readers. I refer throughout to the Greek text of Titus and to the Syriac translation through the abbreviations Gr. and Sy; afterwards I give the number of the pages and lines in Paul A. de Lagarde's editions of these texts from 1859. The form of the Greek and Syriac texts is also the one found in De Lagarde except where I have revised this text on the basis of my examinations in Ch. XI. Thus although I refer to pages and lines in De Lagarde, my text may here and there be different; in which case an explanation is given in Ch. XI.

Book III and the whole of Book IV, done by Ludwig Nix. These translations have been at the very least an introductory aid to reading Titus, who is among the more difficult writers to understand.

The Danish Research Council for the Humanities awarded me a 3-year grant for a project titled, "An examination of early Church theology as marked by the clash with dualistic 'heresies'." The project concentrated on Titus of Bostra, and together with a number of articles the present book is the project's result. Since 1994 I have also been attached to the Department of Church History and Practical Theology in the Faculty of Theology at the University of Aarhus. In recent years the faculty has also established a research seminar under the title, Antiquity and Christianity, to which I am also affiliated. Within this framework I have received inspiration from conversations with colleagues, and support from the Faculty of Theology for financing copies of manuscripts and rare books as well as from the librarians at the State and University Library in Aarhus who have laboured to locate books for me through interlibrary loans.

Of great importance for the Titus project were my studies in Oxford in 1996–1997, generously supported by Julie von Müllens Fond, Arthur Christensen og hustrus legat for orientalist and Frimodt-Heineke Fonden.

Sebastian P. Brock at the Faculty of Oriental Studies in Oxford read large sections of the Syriac version of Titus and placed his expert knowledge at my disposal. In Oxford I also had the opportunity to discuss specific problems with Kallistos Ware and Richard Sorabji.

The Greek parts of Ch. XI as well as certain individual passages have been discussed in detail with George Hinge of the Danish National Research Foundation Centre for Black Sea Studies, University of Aarhus.

Institut de Recherche et d'Histoire des Textes, section grecque (C.N.R.S.), allowed me to purchase copies of the Titus text in the manuscripts "Congregazione della Missione urbana di S. Carlo, Genoa, cod. 27" and "Athos Vatopaedi No. 236". Through kind assistance of V. Heidi Hass (Pierpont Morgan Library), Susan Halpert (Houghton Library, Harvard), and James Hodgson (Widener Library) I also obtained a copy of an additional folio in the Athos manuscript which was missing among the photographs in the French institute. From the British Library I purchased copies of the Syriac manuscript "British Museum add. 12,150"; from Niedersächsische Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek, Göttingen, copies of Paul A. de Lagarde's notes on Titus of Bostra; and from the Faculty of Oriental Studies Library, University of Cambridge, photocopies of C.R.C. Allberry's notes on Titus of Bostra.

Bas ter Haar Romeny (Leiden) provided copies of parts of a preliminary translation into French of the Armenian version of Eusebius of Emesa's Genesis commentary, made by L. van Rompay and J. Weitenberg. Romeny is reworking this translation for publication.

At various points I have received practical support or inspiration through discussions from a number of other persons: Anna Marie Aagaard (Aarhus), A.M. Allchin (Bangor), Byard J. Bennett (Toronto), Per Bilde (Aarhus), Søren Giversen (formerly Aarhus), Johannes Glenthøj (Nordby), Ittai Gradel and Hanne Lavér Hansen (Copenhagen), Finn Ove Hvidberg-Hansen (Aarhus), Anders-Christian Lund Jacobsen (Aarhus), Henning Lehmann (Aarhus), Samuel N.C. Lieu (Macquarie University), Peter Paludan (Aarhus), my brother Kim Arne Pedersen (Aarhus), Gert Skov (Lystrup), Holger Villadsen (Kappel).

I am deeply indebted to all the above for their generous support. I also owe a great debt of thanks to the foundations who have financed the English translation: Lillian og Dan Finks Fond, G.E.C. Gads Fond, Landsdommer V. Gieses Legat, Carlsen-Langes Legatstiftelse, The Aarhus University Research Foundation, Frimodt-Heineke Fonden, Lademanns Fond; and to the foundation, Statsaut. el-installatør Svend Viggo Berendt og hustru Aase Berendt, født Christoffersens Mindelegat for help in purchasing an IBook.

Edward Broadbridge (Randers) has demonstrated great enterprise in translating the book into fluent and precise English. He has also translated my own Danish translations from Greek, Syriac and Latin, after which I have revised them with the original text.

Finally, I wish to thank Johannes van Oort (Utrecht) for recommending this book to be published in the NHMS-Series.

A special vote of thanks goes to my wife, Kirsten, to whom I dedicate this book. They have been difficult years with changing and uncertain tenures, but she has supported me throughout and been a source of my courage. Thanks also to our children, Jonatan and Jakob, who perhaps one day will think that it was a good book their father spent all that time on.

Nils Arne Pedersen
Aarhus Universitet, August 2003

ABBREVIATIONS

- Acta Arch.*
Ad Autol.
Ad Hyp. IV
Adv. haer.
Adv. Hermog.
Adv. Manich.
Adv. Manich. hom.
Adv. Marc.
Adv. Math.
Adv. omn. haer.
Adv. Prax.
Adv. Sab.
Anaceph.
Anal. post.
Anal. pr.
Apoc. Mosi
Apocr. Joh.
Apol.
Bibl.
Capita
Carm. adv. Marc.
Cat.
Catal.
Catech.
Catena in Gen.
Catena in Luc.
Chron.
Chron. Seert.
I Clem.
CMC
Cod. Theod.
Coll. Pal.
Coll. par
Concil. Univ. Const.
- Conf.*
Constitutum de tribus capitulis, epistula
Contra Adim.
Contra adv. leg. et proph.
Contra Ar.
Contra Cels.
Contra Chald.
Contra ep. fund.
Contra Faust.
Contra Fel.
- Acta Archelai*
Ad Autolyicum
Ad Hypatium tractatus quartus
Adversus haereses
Adversus Hermogenem
Adversus Manichaeos
Adversus Manichaeos homiliae
Adversus Marcionem
Adversus Mathematicos
Adversus omnes haereses
Adversus Praxean
Adversus Sabellium
Anacephalaiosis
Analytica posteriora
Analytica priora
Apocalyptis Mosi
Apocryphon Iohannis
Apologia
Bibliotheca
Capita VII contra Manichaeos
Carmen adversus Marcionitas
Categoriae
Catalogus librorum omnium ecclesiasticorum
Catecheses
Catena in Genesis
Catena in Lucam
Chronicon
Chronicon Seertensis
First Letter of Clement to the Corinthians Codex Manichaicus Coloniensis
Codex Theodosianum
Collectio Palatina
Collectio paroemiarum
Concilium Universale
Constantinopolitanum sub Iustiniano habitum Confessiones
Constitutum, ep.
Contra Adimantum Manichaei discipulum
Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum
Contra Arianos
Contra Celsum
Contra Chaldaeos
Contra epistolam fundamenti
Contra Faustum
Contra Felicem Manichaeum

Contra Gal.
Contra gent.
Contra Jul.
Contra Manich.
Contra Manich. opin. disp.
Contra Marc.
Csl.
Cyropaed.
De Abr.
De an.
De apost. et fide
De arb. fici
De arbitr.
De autex.
De cal.
De carne Chr.
De civ. Dei
De comm. math.
De cons. phil.
De decr.
De duab. anim.
De Fil.
De Gen. contra Manich.
De gen. et corr.
De haer.
De hom. assumpt. II
De ieiun.
De inc.
De incorp.
De incorp. et invisib. Deo
De int.
De lib. arb.
Dem.
De Manich. rec. rep.
De mart.
Dem. ev.
De mor. eccl.
De nat. boni
De nat. deor.
De nat. hom.
De op. mund.
De orat.
De or. mund.
De paradiso
De plant.
De praescr. haer.
De princ.
De quinque pan.
De res.
De spec. leg.
De syn.
De vir. inlustr.
De virt. mor.
Dial.

Contra Galilaeos
Contra gentes
Contra Julianum
Contra Manichaeos
Contra Manichaei opiniones disputatio
Contra Marcionem
Collectio Coisliniana
Cyropaedia
De Abrahamo
De anima
De apostolis et fide liber secundus
De arbore fici
De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione
De autexusio
De calice
De carne Christi
De civitate Dei
De communi mathematica scientia
De consolatione philosophiae
De decretis
De duabus animabus contra Manichaeos
De Filio
De Genesi contra Manichaeos
De generatione et corruptione
De haeresibus
De hominis assumptione II
De ieiunio
De incarnatione
De incorporali
De incorporali et invisibili Deo
De interpretatione
De libero arbitrio
Demonstratio apostolicae praedicationis
Narratio de Manichaeis recens repullulantibus
De martyribus
Demonstratio evangelica
De moribus ecclesiae
De natura boni
De natura deorum
De natura hominis
De officio mundi
De oratione
De origine mundi
De parad.
De plantatione
De praescriptione haereticorum
De principiis
De quinque panibus
De resurrectione
De specialibus legibus
De synodis
De viris inlustribus
De virtute morali
Dialogus cum Tryphone

- Dial. Adamant.*
Dial. contra Pelag.
Dial. contra Manich.
Dial. cum Heracl.
Did.
Diogn.
Disp.
Doctrina Silv.
Eclog.
Enn.
Ep.
Ep. ad Aeg. et Lib.
Ep. ad Afr.
Ep. ad Const.
Ep. fund.
Eth. Nic.
Ev. ver.
Exp. Ev. conc.
Fihrist
Gorg.
Gr.
- Haer.*
Haeret. fabul. comp.
Hist. eccl.
Hom.
Hom. cat.
Hom. cath.
Hom. in Gen.
Hom. in Jer.
Hom. in Luc.
Hom. in Num.
Hymni contra haer.
Hymni de parad.
Hyp.
Hyp. Arch.
In Cant. cant.
In Cat.
In Cent. et contra Manich. et Apoll.
- In Cor. I*
In De an.
In De caelo
In Es.
In Gal.
In Gen.
In Hi.
In Hiezech.
In Isaiam Sket.
In Jo.
In Luc.
In Matth.
- Adamantius, Dialogus de recta in Deum fide* Dialogus contra Pelagianos
Dialogus contra Manichaeos
Dialogus cum Heraclide
Didascalicus
Epistula ad Diognetum
Disputatio cum Manichaeo
Doctrina Silvani
Eclogae
Enneades
Epistula
Epistula ad episcopos Aegypti et Libyae
Epistula ad Afros episcopos
Epistula ad Constantium
Epistula fundamenti
Ethica Nicomachea
Evangelium veritatis
Expositio Evangelii concordantis
Fihrist al-'ulüm
Gorgias
Greek text of Titus of Bostra, Contra Manichaeos, as found in Lagarde 1859 and Ch. XI of the present book
Panarion/Adversus haereses
Haereticarum fabularum compendium
Historia ecclesiastica
Homiliae
Homiliae catecheticae
Homiliae cathedrales
Homilia/Homiliae in Genesim
Homilia in Jeremiam
Homilia/Homiliae in Lucam
Homilia in Numeri
Hymni contra haereses
Hymni de paradiso
Pyrrhoniae hypotyposes
Hypostasis Archonton
Commentarius in Canticum canticorum
Commentarius in Categorias
In Centurionem et contra Manichaeos et Apollinaristas
Commentarius in Epistulam ad Corinthios I Commentarius in De anima
Commentarii in De caelo
Commentarii in Esaiam
Commentarius in Epistulam ad Galatas
Commentarius/Commentarii in Genesim
Commentarius in Hiobem
Commentarii in Hiezechielem
Commentarius in Isaiam Sketensem
Commentarius in Iohannem
Commentarii in Lucam
Commentarius in Matthaëum

In Matth. Hom.	Commentarius in Matthaëum. Homilia
In Oct.	Commentarius in Octateuchum
In Rom.	Commentarius in Epistulam ad Romanos
In Rom. Hom.	Commentarius in Epistulam ad Romanos. Homilia
In Tim. I	Commentarius in Epistulam ad Timotheum I
Isag.	Isagoge
Leg.	De legibus
Leg. all.	Legum allegoriae
Liber schol.	Liber scholiorum
Man. Hom.	Manichæan Homilies
Met.	Metaphysica
Od. Sal.	Odae Salomonis
Oratio in ram. palm.	Oratio in ramos palmarum
Paed.	Paedagogus
Par.	Paroemiae
Phaed.	Phaedo
Phaedr.	Phaedrus
Philoc.	Philocalia
Plac.	Placita philosophorum
Praep. ev.	Praeparatio evangelica
Prot.	Protagoras
Protr.	Protrepticus
PsB	Manichæan Psalm Book
Quaest. in Gen.	Quaestiones in Genesim
Quaest. in Oct.	Quaestiones in Octateuchum
Rec.	Recognitiones
Ref.	Refutatio omnium haeresium
Rep.	De republica
Retract.	Retractationes
Rhod.	Rhodia
Sacr. Par.	Sacra Parallela
schol.	scholium
Sermo contra omnes haer.	Sermo contra omnes haereses
Strom.	Stromata
Sy	Syriac text of Titus of Bostra, Contra Manichaeos (British Museum add. 12,150)
Symp.	Symposium
Test. ver.	Testimonium veritatis
Theat.	Theatetus
Theoph.	Theophania
Tim.	Timaeus
Top.	Topica
Tract. Magni Seth II	Tractatus secundus Magni Seth
Tract. trip.	Tractatus tripartitus
Vita Ad. et Ev.	Vita Adae et Evae
Vita Porph.	Vita Porphyrii

This page intentionally left blank

CHAPTER ONE

INTRODUCTION

1. The main interpretation

The subject of this study is the Catholic Bishop Titus of Bostra's work, Κατὰ Μανιχαίων (Contra Manichaeos or Against the Manichaeans), which consists of four λόγοι ("treatises") or books written between the years 363 and 377 C.E.¹ Contra Manichaeos represents perhaps the most comprehensive attempt in the first four centuries of the Church to formulate a theodicy—or in Titus's own terminology, "demonstrative proof in defence of God" (τὴν ἀπόδειξιν τὴν ὑπὲρ θεοῦ → Ch. XI.2). And yet,—it has been widely overlooked in modern scholarship. I hope to change this state of affairs by showing its importance for the history both of the Church and of theology. As an introductory guide I shall first present the complex problem facing the scholar and the theories that underpin the book.

The present study of Contra Manichaeos is historical, meaning that it seeks to understand a past discussion within the context of its own time and on its own historical terms. I do not claim that I myself or anyone else could arrive at such a final understanding, for the interpretation of texts is always partly determined by the interpreters' own assumptions; I am merely pointing out what the attempt sets out to achieve and what is its interest. A historical study of this nature can be a foundation on which others may build, and as such these enquiries find their justification in reflections and questions that transcend their own context. I can claim an interest in Contra Manichaeos that goes beyond the boundaries of the historical questions,² but to my mind nothing is gained by confusing the two questions.

¹ Contra Manich. was written in Greek, but the original is only partially preserved. The Greek text editions exist in, among others, Migne PG 18, 1069–1258; De Lagarde 1859 and Nagel 1973. In its entirety Contra Manich. is only preserved in a Syriac translation which is edited in De Lagarde 1859a. See further below pp. 109–19.

² My theological interest has in particular been concerned with the price that Titus of Bostra paid for propounding his theodicy. In my view, Titus had to blur the seriousness and power of evil, thereby undermining the soteriology.

My approach to Contra Manichaeos is more specifically concerned with the history of the Church and the history of theology. I understand the latter to be “the history of Christian ideas”, that is, the study in the time-perspective of the Christian patterns of thought as they are found in texts from among Christian elites. Their theology does not necessarily correspond to what broader Christian communities understood by their Christianity. The field covers both Catholic writers who have received particular attention in patristics, as well as those writers regarded by Catholics as heretical, such as the Manichaeans, and it cannot be adequately covered without paying particularly close attention to the relation of the theology to the cultural history of the time and in particular the history of philosophy in Late Antiquity. Furthermore when I classify my approach as being to “the history of the Church”, it is due to a wish to grasp these ideas in their institutional context. Contra Manichaeos cannot of course be explained solely on the background of its historical institutional context, that is, on the basis of the concrete conflicts between various religious communities, but the guiding principle is nevertheless to search for as much of that context as possible.

That context can seem hard to find. Contra Manichaeos is both a theological-philosophical theodicy and an exposition of the correct non-Manichaean interpretation of the Bible, and it keeps very close to its subject: God, the Creation, the Bible. It thus provides no information about its author and hardly any about the relationship between the Catholic and the Manichaean Church in the province of Arabia. Titus is barely concerned with historical data and names, and the modern reader looking for the concrete and the historical will doubtless soon abandon the search.

Nevertheless, Titus did live in a particular time and place; and we know that he represented a particular institution that was in opposition to other, specified, groups. If we read Contra Manichaeos closely, we notice that Titus has scattered information throughout the books regarding its purpose, and that in this context he also hints at a concrete situation that gave rise to his authorship of the work. Contra Manichaeos is constructed in such a way that in the first two books Titus seeks to refute Manichaeism without using the Bible, basing his argument solely on the universal, innate concepts that are contained in the common reason of all mankind; whereas in the last two books he is concerned with the Manichaeans’ interpretation of the Bible. At the start of Books I and III he explains the purpose of this structure more closely. In the first two books of Contra Manichaeos Titus wishes to strengthen the pagans' mind against Manichaeism, and he therefore employs only universal rational arguments. The last two books, however, are ostensibly aimed solely at those Catholic circles that have assumed an open attitude towards the Manichaeans. The background for the work is thus a two-pronged, aggressive Manichaean mission which presents Manichaeism to pagans and Catholics alike as the very essence of their own tradition.

Despite the subject and target-group being different in the last two books of Contra Manichaeos the presentation is nonetheless governed by the same theological-philosophical views as in the first two books. The narrower theological-historical studies thus show that, primarily on the basis of the first two books but also with the inclusion of the last two, Titus's idea of God, his idea of universal natural concepts and his understanding of the soul were deeply informed by philosophy. However, this powerful influence of Greek philosophy is not peculiar to Titus in comparison with older patristics. More particular to Titus is his interpretation of the Paradise narrative in Book III of Contra Manichaeos, which within the Catholic tradition is noteworthy in being—precisely on the basis of its philosophically influenced concept of God—a denial of the traditional teaching on Adam's original immortality and the catastrophic "Fall of Man". In my opinion it is not only the constructional division of Contra Manichaeos into a "rational" and a "biblical" part that can be explained by the nature of the Manichaean mission, but also the theology itself, with its strong philosophical leaning in both halves of the work.

In the first instance, however, the question must be why Titus is so intent on repelling the Manichaean mission to the pagans that he is willing to suspend the Bible for the entire argumentation of the first two books. My theory here is that this ideological strategy is to be understood on the background of the complicated relations existing between the pagans, the Catholics and the Manichaeans. This complexity cannot be uncovered simply through an analysis of Contra Manichaeos itself but requires the inclusion of external material. For instance, from the letters of the famous rhetorician Libanius we know that under Emperor Constantius II (337–361) and Julian the Apostate (361–363) Bostra had been the scene of bitter conflict between Catholics and pagans. In Emperor Julian's 52nd Letter, addressed to the citizens of Bostra and issued in Antioch on 1st August 362, the citizens are urged to drive Bishop Titus out of the city. Relations between the Catholics and pagans of Bostra thus seem to be extremely poisonous, with Titus being drawn into the very centre of the confrontation. After the Emperor's death Titus also found occasion to attack him in Contra Manichaeos II.28.

These contexts may perhaps be linked to a significant feature of the work, namely that in the first two books of Contra Manichaeos Titus wishes to immunise the pagans against Manichaeism by using only rational arguments. He seeks to show that Manichaeism is irrational, insane and barbaric. In this connection I set out to prove that some of the Manichaean texts that Titus uses in his work, known through his quotations and references, must have been especially intended for the mission to educated pagans and Catholics, since these texts invoke philosophically-slanted, cultural values that were shared by practically all educated citizens in the Roman Empire. One of them superficially attempted to obscure the mythological stamp of Manichaeism. Another attacked the Catholics' God as he appears in the Paradise narrative for lacking foreknowledge and for begrudging Adam and Eve the knowledge of good and evil—the text thereby reflecting the general philosophical stamp of the contemporary image of God. This philosophical slant is also rendered probable not only through a comparison of the fragments of Emperor Julian's anti-Catholic treatise, where the attack on the God of the Paradise narrative contains the same points, but in general through an examination of the roots of these motifs in the history of ideas.

I conjecture that the Manichaean mission threatened to create an alliance between Manichaeism and paganism, turned against Catholicism. Titus wished instead to persuade the educated pagans that the Manichaeans were enemies of their own and also of the Catholics' common cultural values of rationality and morality, and thus he could also hope that the antagonism between pagans and Catholics would slip into the background as being less relevant.

If it is indeed the case that the Manichaean mission has regarded educated pagans and Catholics in particular as its target-group, then this observation helps to explain why the same theological-philosophical views also play so important a role in the last two books that even the traditional interpretation of man's primal history must be rewritten. The Manichaean mission strategy in relation to the Catholics was not only concerned to demonstrate the Christian character of Manichaeism, but also to show that Manichaeism was rational Christianity. When Titus regarded it as necessary to revise the common interpretation of the Paradise narrative, it was because he accepted that this interpretation was particularly vulnerable to the Manichaeans' arguments. As regards the Paradise narrative Titus's attack is therefore directed not only against the Manichaeans, but against all those who believe that Adam was originally immortal and that the Fall had catastrophic consequences. Their teaching on original immortality and the disastrous Fall confirms for Titus the Manichaeans' polemical picture of an ignorant and malignant Creator God and this teaching should therefore be abandoned.

Thus a central feature of the rational Christianity which Titus instead represents is the rejection of any idea that either allows evil and sin to be a principle and a substance, or allows them to be linked to a catastrophic transformation. Sin is not a power but man's passing misuse of his reason.³ Titus is even ready to regard a slight initial sin such as Adam and Eve's violation of God's prohibition as a necessary and useful step in man's ethical development. Although Titus nowhere claims a relation between the Manichaean teaching of an evil primal principle and the traditional Catholic teaching of a catastrophic Fall—only that the irrational character of the latter exposes it to Manichaean attack—it is thus clear that both doctrines are in opposition to his more optimistic portrayal of the nature of evil and of man's possibilities.

In my view Titus's theology has been developed precisely in his meeting with this aggressive Manichaean mission, and it is furthermore my opinion that here we have an interesting example of the more general fact that the philosophical forming of the Catholic theology of Antiquity very often took place in the confrontation with the so-called heresies.

One could also imagine, however, that it was not the meeting with the Manichaeans that gave rise to Titus's interpretation of the Paradise narrative, but that on the contrary it had come into being on other grounds and had only secondarily been employed in this anti-Manichaean context. For even though the interpretation in question is new in relation to the older patristic texts, it anticipates corresponding interpretations of the Paradise narrative by the important

³ However, alongside and in partial conflict with this view Titus also believes that individual sinful actions can come to form a pattern that has such power over people that they cannot free themselves from it, though Titus does not attribute such habits to the Fall.

Antiochene theologian, Theodore of Mopsuestia. I suggest, however, that the similarity with Theodore's interpretation could be due to both Titus and Theodore building on one of the lost anti-Manichaean works from the Syrian region—which would imply that anti-Manichaean problems and strategies of the same kind that we find in Titus may have been more widespread and thus determinative for aspects of theological development in the 4th century.

This then is a summary of the main interpretation of the present study. Before I move on to the actual development and documentation of the thesis, I shall give a brief account of some of the resolutions and demarcations of the study as regards content and terminology.

The subject of the present study, ancient Christianity, involves both Catholic Christianity and the so-called "heresies" (in casu Manichaeism). I do not therefore regard it appropriate to describe the relationship between them in terms of "Christianity" meeting "a foreign religion". Manichaeism was not—as has been claimed, for example, by G. Widengren in continuation of the History of Religions School—an Iranian religion which in the Mediterranean area pretended to be Christianity for tactical reasons.⁴ In the present study therefore the terms Christianity/Christian/Christians etc. are used broadly, and include Manichaeism, whereas I use the terms Catholic/Catholics etc. about Titus of Bostra's affiliation. Since with regard to Manichaeism I go beyond the terminology of most presentations on this point, I must briefly explain what I mean and do not mean by including Manichaeism under Christianity.

Excursion: Manichaeism as Christian Gnosis

The perception of Manichaeism as being in origin essentially a non-Christian movement which only superficially posed as Christianity, as exemplified above by Widengren, can already be traced in embryo in the work of J.L. von Mosheim, but it received its best-known expression within the History of Religions School, particularly in R. Reitzenstein, where Manichaeism is regarded as an Iranian religion.⁵ This theory was always disputed and has received little credit in the last few decades, when scholarship has to a greater degree emphasised Manichaeism's Christian background, in particular as a result of the publication of the Graeco-Manichaean text On the Origin of His Body in the Cologne Mani Codex (CMC). The text portrays Mani as growing up in a baptising sect that invoked Jesus, but then tells how Mani's break with the sect was over the question of the right interpretation of Jesus' words and commandments.⁶ It must be emphasised that even though on this basis alone Manichaeism can no longer be considered an "Iranian religion", it is still possible that significant Manichaean theologoumena, in particular "radical dualism", are of Iranian origin.⁷

⁴ Widengren 1961, 123.

⁵ See below pp. 74, 81. In a larger perspective this theory is of course only a partial aspect of the broader theories regarding the non-Christian origin of "Gnosis" in Antiquity.

By way of contrast, another theory that still has considerable support acknowledges that to a very great extent Manichaeism had "Christian roots", but must nevertheless be understood as a new non-Christian religion. This theory received classic expression in a contribution by A. Böhlig, originally dating from 1957.⁸ By "Christian roots" Böhlig was thinking of the Bardesanites and Marcionites, whom he assumed to have strongly influenced the Manichaeans. In this connection and with reference to W. Bauer's seminal work, Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum from 1934, Böhlig stressed the necessity of operating with a broader concept of Christianity that not only embraced "die Großkirche", but, for example, also Marcion and Bardesanes, both of whom considered themselves to be Christians. In Böhlig's view Bauer was right to claim that in many areas of the Roman Empire "Gnosis" constituted the most original type of Christianity. On the other hand, in contrast to the Marcionites and Bardesanites the Manichaeans cannot be regarded as a Christian group, since they consciously understood themselves as a new, non-Christian religion, named after its founder, Mani. Böhlig sought to prove that this was the case on the basis of a Coptic-Manichaean text, Kephalaia Ch. 105.⁹ Today Böhlig's position is held by many scholars, such as C. Marksches, who in a stimulating contribution

⁶ Cf. the first editors of CMC, Henrichs and Koenen (1970, 40): "Man wird folglich die christlichen Elemente im Manichäismus nicht mehr als sekundäre Zutat des westlichen Manichäismus abtun dürfen; sie standen an der Wiege der manichäischen Kirche, wenn auch bei ihrer Ausbreitung im Einflussgebiet des Christentums die christlichen Einflüsse weiter verstärkt worden sind. Die Kirchenväter hatten von ihrem Standpunkt aus völlig recht, wenn sie den Manichäismus als eine christliche Häresie behandelten."

⁷ The theory that Mani's dualism was of Iranian origin (already anticipated by Titus of Bostra in Contra Manich. IV.19 → Ch. XI.46) finds favour in Sundermann 1997a, who claims, however, that the purpose of adopting this dualism was really in order to explain a problem in the Christian religion, i.e. how it was possible for Jesus to have been killed by God's human enemies at the instigation of "the prince of this world" (Jn. 14.30). An attempt instead to explain Mani's dualism as being fully and completely of Christian origin—as inspired by Bardesanes and Marcion—is to be found, for example, in De Blois 2000.

⁸ The lecture from 1957 was first printed in 1960 and then reprinted in Böhlig 1968. Nor of course was this conceptualisation accepted by Widengren (1978, 300): "... christliche Wurzeln gibt es im Manichäismus nicht. Die christlichen Elemente sind eben nur 'Stilelemente'..."

⁹ Böhlig 1968; cf. also Böhlig 1968b, 262–65.

seeks to understand the ancient “Gnosis” as being at first mainly a movement within the Christian religion, but who also maintains that there is a widespread consensus that the ancient “Gnosis” ended in the foundation of an independent religion, namely Manichaeism.¹⁰

Treatment of these problems must also in my view be linked to the discussions elicited by Bauer’s book, the chief interest of which lies not in its concrete and partly doubtful historical theses, but rather in the view that the currents which were retrospectively regarded as “orthodoxy” and “heresy” had in fact a parallel genesis. If this is the case, it makes no sense to claim that “orthodoxy” was earlier and more original in relation to the “heresies”. This view must be taken on board if we are to avoid the historical account ending in mere reproduction of the classic concepts of Church and heresy, where the one true Church is the continuous bearer of a historically unalterable truth, while the heresies, as bearers of false teaching, could not rightly be called Christian.¹¹ If we follow this line of Bauer’s, the problem with the old theory of “Gnosis” being a non-Christian religion that lived parasitically in the Christian body becomes clear. Even though the intention was a quite different one among scholars who maintained these theories, they are nonetheless de facto difficult to distinguish from the reproduction mentioned,¹² at least when they imply that all forms of “Gnosis” should be developed from a single, non-Christian model. This view obscures the wide range of potential options for the development of Christianity in the 1st century, while simultaneously the historical contingency in the development of both “orthodoxy” and “heresies” is blurred.

The question now is whether Manichaeism really—as Böhlig believed—falls outside the broader concept of Christianity? Would it not be more natural to regard Manichaeism as the last form of “Christian Gnosis”? This problem can be discussed from several different angles.

Firstly, it must be underlined that in a strict sense it is anachronistic to claim that the Manichaeans consciously understood themselves as constituting a new religion, for the good reason that the concept of religion is a modern one.¹³ But the significance of this observation must not be exaggerated.

¹⁰ Marksches 2001, 30–31, 101–7.

¹¹ I refer here to the second edition of Bauer’s book from 1964, which also includes an essay by G. Strecker on the reception of the first edition of Bauer’s book (Bauer 1964, 288–306). In the English translation (Bauer 1971, 286–316) this essay is revised and augmented by R.A. Kraft; his thought-provoking reflections at the end are worthy of note (Bauer 1971, 310–14). Harrington 1980 goes over the deliberations in the 1970s which the English translation of Bauer’s book gave rise to. The discussion is wide-ranging; among later significant contributions I have noted are Le Boulluec 1985, 1985a; Brox 1986; Williams 1989; Ritter 1993, 195–280.

¹² Cf. Marksches 1999, 54–55.

¹³ It is also misleading, for example, when H.J. Polotsky in his translations of Kēphalaia Ch. 154 (in Schmidt and Polotsky 1933, 41ff.) alternately translates ἐκκλησία with “Kirche” (Church) and “Religion”; only the first is correct, while the latter easily misleads the reader into believing that Mani already conceptually was a participant in our discussions.

gerated, for if the Manichaeans distanced themselves from the Christians in their awareness of being an independent group with a different identity, it is obvious in a modern context to interpret this self-understanding as constituting a new “religion”. However, Böhlig’s claim that this distance from Christianity actually existed is less secure; he himself mentions the testimonies that the Manichaeans described themselves as “Christians”, but regards them as an expression of a later, secondary development—in contrast to Kephalaia Ch. 105, which expresses the original Manichaeism.¹⁴ It must be admitted that Kephalaia Ch. 105 contains a testimony in which the Manichaeans understand themselves as being different from “Christians”, but that this should constitute evidence of an inherently different phenomenon from the one that Böhlig himself mentions—where, for example, the Marcionites in areas with other dominant churches described themselves as “Marcionites”¹⁵—remains unclear to me.¹⁶

Secondly the discussion must focus in particular on the ambiguous Manichaean Jesus-figure. If the Manichaean Jesus is used to justify the claim that Manichaeism is regarded as a Christian phenomenon, it will not be sufficient to refer to the proven misunderstanding that the Jesus-figure was seen as a secondary element in Manichaeism for tactical missionary purposes. The crucial point is not that Jesus was included from the start, but rather that Jesus was not merely one among many Manichaean saviours. Jesus was at the centre of Manichaeism, the saviour par excellence. This view, which in my opinion must already undermine the understanding of Manichaeism as a “new religion”, has in fact long been widespread and has also found expression among many important scholars of Manichaeism; these include J.P. Asmussen, who has inspired the present wording,¹⁷ and J. van Oort, who stresses “the special place of Jesus in Mani’s system” and “the essential ‘Christocentric’ character” of the Manichaean psalms.¹⁸ On this basis certain scholars including myself have been willing to regard Manichaeism as a part of ancient Christianity. This is the view of E. Rose, ¹⁴ Böhlig 1968, 204, 218.

¹⁵ Böhlig 1968, 203–4.

¹⁶ Under all circumstances it is problematic that Böhlig believes that Kephalaia Ch. 105 reflects the original Manichaean self-understanding. One of the translations from Mani’s own (as yet unpublished) Epistles in Gardner 2001, 100 could also undermine Böhlig’s theory inasmuch as the following quotation possibly means that Mani himself described his Church as “the Christians”: . . . “our good saviour, our god (?) Christ Jesus, by whose name I chose you (pl).”

¹⁷ E.g. Asmussen 1965, 208ff. (208: “Already to Mani himself . . . Jesus was a central figure of almost incalculable importance”), but particularly Asmussen 1975, 107: “But as Jesus the Splendor he is one of the most popular figures in Manichaean theology. He is the redeemer par excellence.”—Compare also Henrich’s and Koenen’s views quoted above p. 7, n. 6.

¹⁸ Van Oort 2001, 35. On the background of the Jesus-figure’s fundamental importance for the Manichaeans, Van Oort (2001, 39–53, esp. 44) further emphasises that in the Latin West the Manichaeans must be considered a Christian movement, a view which here I also extend to the movement as a whole.

for example, who in his Die manichäische Christologie finds Jesus' central position in Manichaeism confirmed by the practical and soteriological concern of Manichaeism; he concludes, "daß der Manichäismus zwar ein durch und durch häretisches Christentum ist, aber doch noch ein Christentum".¹⁹ The other contribution is in A. Khosroyev's Die Bibliothek von Nag Hammadi, where the author understands the "Christianity" of Antiquity as a designation for all the movements for which belief in Jesus Christ was fundamental and which confessed themselves to be Christians; he therefore regards "ecclesiastical Christianity", Gnosticism and Manichaeism as the three major currents.²⁰

In the third place and with reference to Bauer, if Manichaeism is to be regarded as a Christian movement, the discussion must be seen in the context of an understanding that the so-called "orthodoxy" or "Catholic Church" was a phenomenon that only gradually came into being. In my opinion it is clear that the largest group of "ante-Nicene" Christians had already achieved, institutionally and theologically, a certain degree of self-definition and self-demarcation which formed a point of departure for the later far more clearly defined and self-demarcated "post-Nicene" Church. But since in Antiquity this Church was never the only one in existence, the concept of Christianity cannot be restricted to this Church alone—as it indisputably can when it is a matter of its continuation into the early Middle Ages in Europe. However, because Manichaeism has its origin in the "ante-Nicene" period and moreover in a region (Mesopotamia) where it is possible that at the time (the beginning of the 3rd century) "Catholic Christianity" did not even exist, the oldest Manichaeism actually belongs to a place where Catholic self-definitions were perhaps not yet established. It will not be possible in a historical work to present the process in such a way that the formation of an orthodox or Catholic Christianity meant that Christianity as such became Catholic. This would imply, for example, the impossible line of thought that Manichaeism was Christian in origin, but that the growth of the Catholic Church in the ante-Nicene and particularly post-Nicene period turned Manichaeism into a non-Christian movement. Historically it is necessary to extend the broad understanding of Christianity to cover the entire period of Antiquity, however large the Catholic Church grew in the 4th-5th centuries and however small other Christian groups gradually became.

¹⁹ Rose 1979, passim, quote 182. Cf. also Rose 1979, 4: "Zwar ist es keine Frage, daß die Religion des Mani in die allgemeine Religionsgeschichte hineingehört . . . , aber darüber hinaus besitzt er doch seine feste Stellung in der christlichen Kirchengeschichte." When Rose took his methodological starting-point in Mani's personal, religious relation to Jesus and from that explained the role of the Jesus-figure in Manichaeism (e.g. Rose 1979, 29, 30ff., 54), the value of this starting-point seems to be confirmed in some degree when one compares it with Gardner's (2001, 100) observations on the basis of Mani's Epistles: "The emphasis upon the authority of Jesus is a striking feature throughout the Epistles. . . . I believe that Mani's own sense of the personal authority of Jesus still needs further emphasis and discussion."

²⁰ Khosroyev 1995, 143–57. Note especially the formulations: "Unter dem Sammelnamen Christentum verstehe ich die Gesamtheit verschiedener Strömungen, die sich ihrer Organisation, kultischen Praktiken, heiligen Schriften, Theologie und sogar Ethik nach bedeutend unterscheiden konnten, aber für die der Glauben an Jesus Christus als Mittler zwischen Gott und Menschen grundlegend wurde und die sich als Christen bekannten." (Khosroyev 1995, 144). "Manichäismus betrachte ich ebenfalls als eine gnostizistische Abzweigung des Christentums, wenn auch Mani selbst sein ursprüngliches durch das Prisma seiner gnostischen Religiosität verstandenes Christentum relativ schnell in eine selbständige Religion (mit allen Attributen einer neuen Offenbarungsreligion: Kirche, Hierarchie, Kultus, das heilige Schrifttum, Mission) umgesetzt haben konnte. Aber auch wenn unter dem Gesichtspunkt der Form der Manichäismus als eine echte Religion betrachtet werden kann, so kann er unter dem Gesichtspunkt des Inhaltes nur als das letzte große Erzeugnis des Gnostizismus . . . verstanden werden." (Khosroyev 1995, 133–56).

Fourthly and crucially, I must make it quite clear what I mean and do not mean by regarding Manichaeism as a form of Christianity. The paramount concern is to avoid a terminology that tears apart groups and ideas which in a historical perspective had not only a common source, but also a continuous, interconnected history in which they remained related: each defined itself in relation to the other and each professed to represent the true version of what its opponent also claimed to be. On this basis Titus's polemic could, for example, be understood in a credible historical perspective that makes it clear that the struggle between himself and the Manichaeans is concerned with the ownership rights to a common spiritual legacy.²¹ It is not my intention to discard theological benchmarks and norms for what is correct Christian theology but to make clear that theological valuation lies on a different level from the historical.²² Theological evaluation must involve a reflection on one's own historicity, that is, a dependence and commitment in relation to the Church that was determined by the biblical canon and regula fidei. The Manichaeans fall outside these limits, their history is another. I do not see why this position should ²¹ At this point it is also apposite to deal with two other views of Markschie's (2001) which are used to justify the perception of Manichaeism as a "new religion". Thus Markschie's (2001, 107) believes that Manichaeism was intended as a universal religion which integrated, superceded and replaced previous religions such as Zoroastrianism, Judaism and Christianity, but he overlooks the point that this "universal religion" was meant to be the final revelation of Jesus the Splendour. Similarly, Markschie's apparently sees Manichaeism as a return to true polytheism when he presumes (2001, 104) that the aeons surrounding the Father of Greatness (the fundamental divine hypostasis in Manichaeism) "im Unterschied zum System der 'Valentinianer' wohl nicht als Teilaspekte des einen Gottes, sondern als weitere Götter gedacht sind." This statement does not take into account the Manichaean theologians who emphasised that they only reckoned on one God, or that all aeons and 'gods' are one substance, see Contra Faust. XX.2; XXI.1; Contra Fel. I.XVIII.

²² Cf. Schindler 1985, 337: "Die eine, biblische, 'richtige Linie' des wahren Glaubens ist historisch als solche nicht beweisbar. Rein historisch stehen wir immer wieder vor dem Chaos der Häresien und Orthodoxien und der von ihnen allen erhobenen Behauptung der einen Wahrheit. Wie das Verhältnis der geglaubten Einheit zur historischen Pluralität zu bestimmen ist, muß innerhalb einer systematischen Reflexion entschieden werden."

exclude a recognition of the religious or intellectual greatness that may exist in the diverging histories, and preoccupation with them can continue to have theological relevance. Thus, for instance, the historical possibility that Manichaeism might among other things have been set in motion by dualistic tendencies in Paul and John raises the question of whether a theology like Titus of Bostra's, which will reject the understanding of evil as a real "power", can be a plausible interpretation of Christianity.

At this point I must also justify the use of the word "Catholic" regarding the main current of Christianity to which Titus of Bostra belonged. There are other terms that could be used such as "orthodoxy", "great Church" ("Großkirche"), "majority Church" ("Mehrheitskirche"; Marksches) or "ecclesiastical Christianity" (Khosroyev). There are a number of advantages, however, in using the term "Catholic". In the first place the term was used in Antiquity to indicate "orthodoxy" in contradistinction to "heresy", and it appears to be precisely in this sense that Titus uses it in Contra Manichaeos I.1 (Gr. 1.24), where he makes it clear that he is speaking on behalf of "the Catholic Church" (→ Ch. XI.1). Secondly, the Manichaeans do not appear in any way to have defined themselves as "Catholics"; indeed, material exists which suggests that they have accepted the term as the correct designation for their opponents (though now of course emptied of the meaning "of the true faith").²³ Moreover, the term is used in Antiquity about the Church's geographical universality,²⁴ and at the time with which we are concerned (4th century) it is practically meaningful to identify this ideal theological and religious self-understanding with a legal and geographical reality, since by then "the Catholic Church"—despite a continuing and considerable inner theological plurality—existed throughout the Roman Empire as a clearly defined collective institution recognised by the Empire. True there were "heretics" and "schismatics" around, who in contrast to the Manichaeans had been segregated from the broad "majority Church" which had developed gradually throughout the ²³ There is no instance of the Manichaeans calling their Church "Catholic", and documentary texts from Ismant el-Kharab can even be interpreted to mean that the Manichaeans in ancient Kellis referred to their own congregation as the "Holy Church" (ΤΕΚΚΛΗΣΙΑ ΕΤΟΥΔΑΒΕ) in contrast to the "Catholic Church" (καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία) (see Gardner, Alcock and Funk 1999, 72–74).

²⁴ See Schindler 1986–94 on the meanings of the term "Catholic" in the early Church and in Augustine (on orthodoxy and on universality etc.).

Roman Empire, and who therefore called themselves Catholics, such as the North African Donatists or the Arians and the Pelagians,²⁵ but in a historical work it makes little sense to use this term about them, for they could in no way match the legal and geographical range of the Church with which they were not in communion. The advantages listed above justify my use of the term “Catholic”, which does not therefore reflect a “decadence model” that interprets the early Church as a declining “Catholic” phenomenon in relation to the “pure” primitive Christianity, and is therefore not used to generate associations with e.g., the modern Roman Catholic Church.²⁶

In the present study the term “heresy” will also be employed as a designation for false teaching in reference to the Catholics’ views or as a looser conventional designation for non-Catholic Christianity seen from the Catholic Church’s point of view. Again there is no question of reproducing the classic concepts of Church and heresy.

2. Overview of the study’s structure

It remains for me to present an overview of the structure of this study that will serve to guide the reader through the extensive material.

Since Titus’s Contra Manichaeos does not exist in a modern translation, the best point of departure must be a relatively detailed overview of the content (Chapter II), which nonetheless can only present the reader with the main features of the work; it is not possible to reproduce all the nuances and details of the argumentation. The summary of contents at the beginning can give a general impression which the book cannot otherwise offer. Readers may of course also choose to skip this comprehensive summary, and should they later require an amplifying context the summary is easily available.

²⁵ Cf. Frend 1952, 20, 286, 318, 321 (on the Donatists); Schindler 1986–94, 818–19.

²⁶ Markschies (1998, 45–46) rejects the use of the term “Catholic” for the early Church, which has been standard practice in Church historiography since the 19th cent.: “Somit wird über diese Terminologie die ganze antike Christenheit in die konfessionelle Polemik der mitteleuropäischen Neuzeit hineingezogen”. Cf. Markschies 1995 on the problematic usage of “decadence-models” in Protestant historiography. I can quite understand Markschies here, but in my view the term can remain in use provided one is clearly aware of what one means and does not mean by it. Even Markschies is forced to use some term to characterise the institution that is here called Catholic, namely “Mehrheitskirche” (e.g. Markschies 1997, 46).

Chapter III deals with the history of the book's reception, editions and scholarship, without claiming total inclusiveness. An interpretation can never be detached from the previous history of reception and scholarship, and this study will not seek to conceal this fact but on the contrary bring it into the light. The interesting questions that will be raised concerning Contra Manichaeos have in a number of cases been treated before, but at the same time it is important not to be a prisoner of the problems of previous discussions; therefore it is useful here to be aware of the contemporary historical context that determined questions from earlier times. Moreover I have divided off the history of the editions of Contra Manichaeos as a specific aspect of scholarship history and treated it at the end of the chapter in the context of an account of the text transmission; in this connection I explain my own procedure in relation to the difficulties of textual criticism when working with Contra Manichaeos.

Chapter IV collects various material that illuminates Titus's historical context as well as the theological and literary context of his work. The first section deals mainly with the contemporary conflicts in the province of Arabia between Catholics and pagans, along with the dating of Contra Manichaeos. A brief Excursion is added on other works by Titus of Bostra. The second section comprises in particular an overview of the most important anti-Manichaean texts of the 3rd and 4th centuries from the eastern part of the Empire, which conclude in an attempt to place Titus in a group of early "Antiochene writers" who were particularly interested in anti-Manichaeism. In order to define Titus's theological context I also include the question of his position in the "Trinitarian controversies". A further Excursion examines three passages and a few other places in Contra Manichaeos that point to various patristic sources on which Titus may have drawn.

Chapter V initially analyses those passages in Contra Manichaeos that suggest most clearly to whom the text was addressed. The background to Contra Manichaeos was the Manichaean mission among pagans and Catholics respectively, and Titus wished to protect both groups against this mission. That is why the first part of the work (Books I–II) is addressed not only to the Catholics but also to the pagans. And even though Titus states that the second part (Books III–IV) is only aimed at Catholics, I will attempt to demonstrate that his likely purpose in reality was that pagan readers should "read on" in Books III–IV, in other words the second part was intended for Catholics and pagans. I propose that Titus's particular interest in the pagans is linked to the serious conflicts in the province of Arabia at the time, while simultaneously calling attention to the probable similarity between the pagans and Catholics whom Titus is trying to protect from Manichaeism. Titus seeks to depict Manichaeism as irrational barbarism, but he also acknowledges that Manichaean theology has raised significant problems relating to theodicy. In addition he draws a picture of Manichaeism as deterministic and immoral. It is reasonable to assume that Titus is here appealing to attitudes already present among his readers, who indeed have been troubled by theodicean questions, but regard themselves as operating in a cultural context characterised by "rationality", lack of barbarism, and morality.

Chapter VI shows that Titus takes up a position on Manichaean texts that were intended for use in the Manichaean mission, which partly explains his strategy of refutation. The texts sought to present Manichaeism as rational, philosophical and especially moral. One text, for example, simplified the Manichaean mythological system and omitted mention of the names of the mythological gods, while another text criticised the OT, especially the Paradise narrative, by borrowing arguments from older Marcionite and Gnostic literature which in fact were ultimately of philosophical origin.

Titus's refutation strategy therefore consists of demonstrating that it is Catholicism that is the rational Christianity, whereas Manichaeism is philosophically untenable. Because of this strategy, Titus's own philosophical position becomes the subject of Chapter VII, which examines Titus's concept of God, his idea of common, universal human concepts, and his psychology in the context of the philosophical background for all these ideas. Chapter VIII shows how this philosophical position and complex of problems from the equally philosophically-influenced Manichaean criticism of the Paradise narrative determines Titus's own interpretation of that narrative, in which he breaks with previous tradition. Instead of understanding Adam and Eve's disobedience as a fall into mortality and sin, he interprets it as a useful experience for man's moral progress. Chapter IX, however, raises the question of whether this particular understanding of the Paradise narrative should truly be regarded as a reaction to Manichaean criticism, since a similar reading is to be found in Theodore of Mopsuestia. A comprehensive comparison of Titus's interpretation of the Paradise narrative with that of various writers within the Antiochene School, and with Theodore in particular, leads on to a suggestion that both Titus and Theodore's interpretations must be understood as being dependent on an older Antiochene, anti-Manichaean tradition.

Chapter X comprises a brief summary of the most important results of the study, while Chapter XI contains additional, text-critical studies of the passages in Contra Manichaeos that are of special significance for my argument. Translations of these passages are also included. Parts of these translations also appear at various points in this study, always with reference to the examination of the original text in Chapter XI. However, a few passages that do not contain text-critical problems are not included in Chapter XI, and in these cases both the original text and the translation are cited in the earlier chapters of the book.

CHAPTER TWO

SUMMARY OF CONTENTS

As already stated, Contra Manichaeos is not an easily accessible text. The following summary of contents may therefore to some degree help readers over this difficulty by giving an impression of the whole work chapter by chapter.

In the Syriac edition of Titus a division into chapters is sustained through all four books, an order that De Lagarde and later Nagel also transferred to the Greek text and which I employ in the present study; this chapter division must not be confused with that of Migne, PG 18.

a. Summary of Book I

The first four chapters lay out the fundamental purpose and content of the entire work—a defence of God and His Creation and a demonstration that evil is an ethical category, not a natural one. Titus begins his work by mentioning certain persons (undoubtedly heretics) who out of a genuine desire to acquit God of the responsibility for human sin have ended up denying that Divine Providence reveals itself in everything; the worst of these is Mani, who placed evil on an almost equal footing with God. Mani claimed that evil was also eternal and uncreated, and although he did not deny God’s care for the world, he did reject His omnipotence.

The Catholic Church similarly confesses that God is innocent of human sin, and Titus therefore also presents a “demonstrative proof in defence of God” (τὴν ἀπόδειξιν τὴν ὑπὲρ θεοῦ, Gr. 1.30) on the basis of the Bible and the “common concepts” (τῶν κοινῶν ἐννοιῶν, Gr. 1.28). The proof is to the effect that man is himself responsible for sin. This solution implies not only that evil is not an independent principle—so there is no eternal being that opposes God—but that man can be improved ethically (I.1). In contrast, the Manichaean teaching on eternal evil is that evil (matter) is a necessity of nature in that sins are due to a preponderance of evil in a given person, and correspondingly that good is a necessity of nature among those who act for the good. Thus the Manichaeans are undermining the possibility of any ethical appeal (I.2).

A further problem is that since the Manichaeans did not understand the rationality of God's Creation either, they assumed that it was a mixture of complete opposites, and on this basis they blamed most of Creation for being evil. In reality, however, it is only human sin that is evil (I.3). The Manichaeans thus divided all created things on these two principles, linking sin to created things and censuring the whole of Providence; and to put it bluntly they have ended up in total ignorance (I.4).

On the basis of this presentation Titus then outlines in Ch. I.5 what he sets out to prove in the first two books.¹ Firstly, he wishes to deal "with the two opposing principles which they take as their basis" (περὶ τῶν δύο ἐναντίων ἀρχῶν ἃς ὑποτίθενται, Gr. 3.38–39), i.e. the contents of Book I, after which he endeavours to show that all that exists is good and necessary, and that man's sin does not contradict the principle that God is good, which is the content of Book II. Titus then declares that he will begin by demonstrating that both a doctrine of two principles in general and a doctrine of two principles in conflict is unacceptable for "the natural concepts" (αἱ κατὰ φύσιν ἔννοιαι, Gr. 4.12–13) (I.5).

Titus deals first with Mani's doctrine that there were originally two opposite, uncreated, living principles (I.6), a claim which he proceeds to refute in Ch. I.7–16.² Whereas the two principles limit each other, Titus seeks to show that God is uncircumscribed and is everywhere (I.7). According to the Manichaeans, the two principles occupy each their own ground; the problem is whether they are greater and older than the ground or the reverse is true. Perhaps it is their ground that is uncreated and not the principles, or perhaps there are four uncreated principles (I.8)? The Manichaeans also claim that there was a boundary, e.g. an adamantine wall, which delimited the two from each other, a position which in I.9 and I.10 Titus demonstrates is untenable.

¹ Cf. Poirier and Sensal 1990, 16 n. 129: "Il faudrait voir dans quelle mesure ce chapitre n'annonce pas le plan de tout l'ouvrage." I believe, however, that it is a question of the plan for Books I–II (which perhaps is Poirier and Sensal's intention?). Cf. also Frankenberg 1938, 28.

² After the introduction (I.1–5) Book I appears to be structured in such a way that Titus presents more or less continuous excerpts from, or summaries of, a Manichaean book (I.6; I.17; I.38; I.40; I.42) with long refutations interrupting these. In passing he also includes brief quotations and summaries from the book in question which occasionally contain information that goes beyond what has already been set out in the fuller excerpts and summaries. The passage in I.38 is not so essential for the subsequent rebuttal in I.39–40, for so many of the details refuted there come from the reproduction of the myth in I.17.

Nor does the Manichaean attempt to situate the principle of evil in the south fare any better; thereafter Titus moves on to the fundamental point that it makes no sense whatsoever to speak of two principles, since a 'principle' means what is older than, and what controls, all else. This criticism is expounded through several arguments in I.11–13, leading on to a proof that there cannot be two eternally opposite principles, but only one. Titus further attempts to prove that in their usage of two principles the Manichaeans are employing concepts in a meaningless way (I.14–15). Confronted with such objections the Manichaeans always resort to asking from where then do evils and disorder in concrete realities originate? Titus states, however, that he will later show that nothing that is evil in substance exists, and that the so-called disorder is in reality order (I.16).

Titus then deals with the next step in the Manichaean myth: through its unordered growth, matter was led to seeing the earth and the light of goodness and then wishing to attack it; in return goodness sent out a special power, which matter then devoured not knowing that the power was a kind of bait that constrained it like an animal. Power and matter were hereby mixed and goodness and evil in the world stem from this mixture of opposites; the soul is good, but the body and the flesh belong to matter. Matter holds the soul fast in a prison, but matter is also itself imprisoned, and it was the good one who created the universe out of the mixture, even though He did not really intend its existence. The purpose of the good one, however, was to free the soul and to scoop it out of matter; this happens through the aid of the moon, which is like a pail, as is clear from its waxing and waning. Titus adds that there is much more nonsense in Mani's writings, which incidentally are composed in Syriac (for example, that the earth is borne by Atlas or that showers are the beads of perspiration from the archons of matter), which it is superfluous to treat, the whole idea being laughable if it were not for the fact that the main argument, to defend Providence, continued to be worth pursuing (I.17). The Manichaean material that has been presented is then refuted by Titus in Ch. I.18–37.

Titus's refutation initially builds on the distinction between necessity of nature and free, rational action. He is mostly concerned with the following question: if the growth of matter happened as a necessity of nature, it must have taken place for all eternity and not just before the attack on the Kingdom of Light. If on the other hand the growth of matter is due to a rational decision, it comes into conflict with the Manichaean claim (according to Titus) that matter was without reason (I.18). When the Manichaeans say that the emanations of matter were in disorder and devoured each other until they saw the light, Titus objects that it was not disorder but good order, because as a result evil destroyed itself (I.19). The Manichaeans believe that this disorder ceased when matter saw goodness, but it must surely on the contrary be called disorder that evil's self-destruction ceased (I.20). When the Manichaean book maintains that the emanations of matter desired the beauty of light, one can only protest that it is good to desire what is good (I.21). Titus is also able to find a number of details in the Manichaean myth that do not accord with the belief that matter is without reason, and he further maintains that there is a contradiction between matter both fighting and desiring goodness simultaneously. Talk of the earth of goodness is meaningless, for it is all ostensibly supposed to have happened before the earth was created; yet if this earth has not come into being, it is an eternal principle beside God (I.22).

A corresponding question arises as to which light it was that the demons of matter saw; can it really have been a sensible light, when the creation had not yet taken place? Titus assumes further that cognition presupposes equivalence between the knower and the object of knowledge, which in turn means that if the darkness saw a sensible light, then the darkness was not dark, and if the light was intelligible, then darkness cannot be its opposite. Darkness must be of the same nature as light. Moreover, it is unclear to Titus why matter would rise up to the light; did it wish, for example, to change its nature and itself become light? Whatever the case, the desire of matter reveals here that it was not without reason, nor was it the opposite of light (I.23). These arguments can be equally applied to matter, which desired and devoured the power from God. For instance, it is absurd that matter should be without reason and yet see and desire intelligible power, especially when one takes into account that both we and the angels know that goodness or God exists and yet no one is capable of seeing Him in substance. Furthermore it is clear that when Mani asserts that matter desired goodness, he has in reality, yet without knowing it, testified that its substance was good (I.24).

If matter truly devoured the power, they must have been associated natures (I.25). Mani's teaching can also be attacked from another angle. If in reality the power emitted was incorporeal, it would not have been possible for it to be divided among many or to be devoured, whereas if it was corporeal, it would have been annihilated through division (I.26).

Even worse, however, is the point that in order to save His earth God surrendered to matter the power that is of His own substance, so that this power is united with matter and therefore sins together with it; this implies that God's substance can actually sin (I.27). Mani is thus railing against God by attributing weakness and suffering to Him (I.28).

Titus then attacks Mani's teaching that the body is from evil and that the soul is from good (in passing Titus mentions the possibility here that the Manichaeans consider the soul to be either homogeneous or compounded of opposites). When a body has no soul within it, it does not commit sin. The cause of sin must therefore be sought in the mixture of the evil body with the good soul, but in that case the power from God ought not to have mingled itself with evil. Sin can altogether only be committed with reason, and if matter was without reason before it was mingled with the good power, it was incapable of committing any evil (I.29). Matter was thus not bound by the mixture with goodness, but on the contrary brought to life by it (I.30). When Mani goes on to claim that God did not want the world to come into existence yet nevertheless created it, this can only mean that God must have been forced to do so. In the final count, and contrary to Mani's purpose, God is therefore the cause of human sin (I.31). Titus then returns to the possibility that he briefly mentioned in I.29, namely that the soul is made up of a good and a bad part. Sin must nevertheless originate from the good part, for that is the rational part and sin requires precisely deliberation. Titus himself, however, rejects outright the argument that the soul consists of various parts. The soul is a unity, and good and evil are differing qualities that it can take on by choice of reason (I.32). If evil were not a possibility for those who are training themselves in virtue, we would not be able to reproach the dissolute for any sin. It is altogether reason alone that is responsible for virtue and vice (I.33). Various examples can demonstrate that it is the underlying intention of an action that decides whether it is just or wicked, which again demonstrates that reason alone is responsible (I.34). The most governing element, which is to be found in reason, is thus responsible for sins, but if Mani operates with a good and bad part of the soul, the most governing element must belong to the good part. Mani ought therefore to think that the good part is responsible for sin, while the material part, which Mani condemns quite unreasonably, is innocent (I.35).

Titus next turns his attention to Mani's teaching that God wished to release the devoured power, the soul of the universe, from matter and that the soul suffers within matter. According to Titus there would be some point in this teaching if the power in question had been of another substance than God, but that is precisely not so, and there is thus a case for blasphemy here (I.36). Titus regards the Manichaean idea that until the end of time God is endeavouring to ensure that His own power is returned as meaning that He sits idle merely feeding on hope (I.37).

A further stage of Mani's myth is the flesh object of Titus's criticism. When those who originate in matter felt that they would perish through the light slowly being taken away from them, they took counter-steps by constructing flesh as a chain for the souls (I.38). Titus believes, however, that Mani contradicts himself by claiming both that it is God who has created the world, that it is those who originate from matter who have produced flesh, and he also finds other contradictions in Mani's teaching, including some in connection with Manichaean eschatology (I.39).

Titus now concentrates on eschatology. If, as the Manichaeans maintain, the goal is that the light is brought back to God, it is hard to see why it should be tormented for so long beforehand. But if the soul binds matter, one should think that matter would return to its natural disorder, once the power from God was gradually taken back. Yet Mani denies this, claiming that God will form matter as a self-devouring 'globe' (βῶλος). But why has God not done this a long time ago? Either He would not, or He could not. If He would not, why will He then do so later—has He had second thoughts? If He could not, then He is powerless—and how could He then do so later? If He later becomes capable of doing so through receiving a new power, it must be pointed out that nothing can be added or subtracted from an uncreated substance. Titus then returns to the teaching that the light that is bound is slowly being released via the moon. This must presumably imply that there are now fewer people and animals and that the world order has been changed—but none of this has actually happened (I.40). And what about those souls that sinned through their long connection with evil, are they also punished? Mani believes so, saying that they are attached to the 'globe' together with wickedness, with the result that God is punishing His own nature. Nothing could be more absurd. Yet if Mani would prefer instead to claim that sin went unpunished, then sin would seem to have the advantage of justice, since the sinners would then enjoy life both in this world and in the world to come (I.41). Titus then takes the opportunity to reject yet another point in Mani's book. While here on earth matter is occupied with the captive light, God is sitting filling up the abyss from which it emanates with earth. Was this earth from the earth of goodness or the earth of evil, Titus asks, since he believes that both are impossible, after which he concludes the book by exclaiming that it would be ridiculous to answer this unreasonable madness any further (I.42).³

b. Summary of Book II

At the start of Book II Titus picks up the thread from I.42: although the Manichaean fables are no longer worthy of refutation, it is still incumbent upon him to show that evil does not exist in substance and that there is no principle of matter without beginning that is opposed to God; there is only one single principle, namely the one God who has created all things good. The Manichaeans' objection is always the same: where then do evils originate? (II.1). Against this Titus claims that God is one, and that He has created all things good. Absolutely nothing in Creation is evil in relation to its substance; everything has its rational purpose and is joined together by God's wisdom like limbs on a perfect body. Only human sins are evil, but they do not stem from an evil principle without beginning; that simply does not exist (II.2).

This paves the way for the Titus's real theme: mankind, which is his subject throughout II.3–14. The world is created by God; even the Manichaeans accept this, though they believe that it is in disorder.

³ In De Lagarde 1859, I.42 is part of I.41, but Sy separates the two chapters at the point which corresponds to Gr. 25.24. Here De Lagarde has apparently forgotten to transfer the division of chapters from the Syriac to the Greek text. The rest of PG 18, I.LXXXI together with I.LXXXII–LXXXVI actually belongs to Serapion of Thmuis's anti-Manichaean book (see below pp. 110–11).

However, God has set mankind over this world as a rational citizen. God has kept under His own control everything except virtue and vice, which He has handed over to us. Mankind's reason is responsible for both of these; sin is the unwise use of the natural world, while virtue builds on the hard training of reason (II.3). God has enabled us to choose vice because virtue consists precisely in refraining from desires. So the virtues could not exist unless their opposites did so too. If we nevertheless demand that man should not be able to experience the opposite of virtue, we are actually demanding that man should not be man (II.4). The virtues cannot exist unless they can be compared with their opposites, so if God had not created man with access to vice, we would have been able to reproach Him for not giving us the opportunity to be virtuous (II.5). If we demand that man should be chaste by nature and not by labour, we have failed to understand that there can be no question of chastity if it is enforced by nature (II.6). As we can see with small children, man is by nature neither good nor bad, but beautiful, like gold and precious stones. However, God has created man so that he is able to become good, i.e. to acquire virtue himself (II.7). In other words, good and bad are qualities that come into being through upbringing and by choice. Evil therefore does not exist until it is committed. If God had not given man the power to do evil and therefore also to do good, we would be able to accuse Him of begrudging us good repute and freedom. God is good alone through being a benefactor, whereas man's goodness depends on the negative virtue of refraining from vice. Man can be a benefactor insofar as he has the power to sin because he can only win good repute by self-restraint (II.8).

Titus expands on this idea in a brief excursion on the difference between God's and man's goodness. It is good to say that God is incapable of committing injustice, but the fact that He is unable to do so is due neither to ignorance nor weakness. God is good through a power that is perfect in not willing evil (II.9). Of course God could do so, but because His nature is immutable, His unwillingness to do evil is also of an immutable nature. With man, on the other hand, resistance to evil is not constant (II.10). Being created in the image of God means that with the freedom of his will man must emulate God's goodness, which is free by nature.

Man's vice and virtue rest on his intention, which can be altered; the two qualities mentioned are thus of the will (II.11). Titus refutes the possible objection against his argument that there are indeed people who wish to refrain from wicked deeds but are nonetheless unable to do so; such people may admittedly find it difficult to remove the vice that has become a habit, but this is precisely a question of a condition for which they themselves are responsible. The very fact that we punish offenders also shows that there is a consensus that these have not been forced into the offence by their natures (II.12). Nor are the Manichaeans right in claiming that the fact that we involuntarily think of both good and evil together means that two opposite natures dwell within us. It is due to our knowing both by nature, and the fact that our thoughts therefore move in both directions merely allows us the basis on which to choose and act (II.13).

Finally, Titus summarises the results of his study. Because God is good and incapable of jealousy, He has given man the possibility of sinning so that he can acquire virtue. No matter without beginning exists, and evil does not exist in substance, but has its existence in action (II.14).

In II.15 Titus makes it clear that he is introducing a new section that will deal with God's all-wise governance and with created objects which Mani assigns to evil; this section concludes the book. According to Mani, disorder is due to the principle of evil, and by disorder he means social and health inequalities, the fact that the innocent are punished instead of the guilty, and that the wicked rule the rest. Titus treats these accusations against the Creation in Ch. II.15–21, first by replying that God has created man exclusively in order that he can fight for virtue; He supplies man with food and clothing, air to breathe, water and so on, so that he can live to toil or fight for virtue, and both rich and poor have need of these essentials. Gold, silver and precious stones are also from God, but they contribute little to the toil in question; both rich and poor have the possibility of living a virtuous life, and for either state both wealth and poverty can become the hindrance to virtue that is necessary for there to be a struggle (II.15). The wealth of the rich can train the poor in endurance, and poverty puts the rich to the test of how to use that wealth to do good. Not every rich man is happy, and not every poor man unhappy, for only that soul is happy who possesses the virtuous solid kindness. Man receives existence from God, but from himself he gets goodness added with God's assistance. In truth the poor man has more than the rich; for the rich man who acts evilly is not happy but is consumed by anxieties for the future and grows ill with the life of luxury, while the poor man's way of life gives him a healthier body. For the rich man the good things become trivial, while the poor man can enjoy them as new and strange (II.16). Sickness and health are necessary: for example, good health can render possible a good deed, and sickness frustrate a sin. Drawing on several other examples Titus demonstrates how the purpose of Providence is found everywhere in allowing some to be healthy and others sick. The only pernicious sickness is that which inflicts the soul with an evil disposition to remove itself from virtue. It is also an expression of God's wisdom when offenders are not struck down by illness or the law's punishment: if punishment was always certain, then everyone would keep the law insincerely for fear of that punishment; but because it is not certain that we will be punished, we can keep the law because we hate evil deeds (II.17). Of course one could object that, on the contrary, it is an incentive to evil deeds if no one is ever punished. Titus acknowledges the objection: it is both necessary that some are punished as an example to others, and that others escape punishment, so that man's reason is tested as to whether it nevertheless will keep the law. In both ways reason is aided from without by sickness, poverty, wealth etc. (II.18). The innocent man who is punished is not damaged if he is an admirable person, even if he is punished to the point of death. With a view to his later death he has already taken care of his worldly affairs, and he is indifferent to the vicissitudes of fortune that are generally estimated as beneficial or detrimental; he even receives his enemies' injuries positively, since his hope is concerned with a reward after death (II.19). It is God's dispensation that permits evil people to rule in the world. With their injustice they punish precisely those who commit evil deeds (II.20). Mani speaks ill in order to maintain both his dogma that wickedness is without beginning and his blasphemy, but Titus emphasises that if all that is required to be happy is virtue, then nothing in God's dispensation can be suspected of inequality or disorder. Happiness (virtue) is equally accessible to all, and the basic human conditions such as birth, food and death are also universal; whatever else exists is a beneficial multiplicity and not inequality, despite the Manichaean claim, on the same basis, for fate, the meaningless inequality (II.21).

Titus then concerns himself with the fact that the Manichaeans believe that wars are derived from the principle of evil (this was not mentioned directly among Mani's accusations in II.15). Titus's most important answer is that wars do not derive from God but from man's evil avarice, which however is realised in war, because God permits it. However, not even death is evil, nor should it be understood as a punishment, but as ordained by God to create room for new people. The dead are not annihilated but receive their punishment or reward after death. Although death is not evil, it is still associated with fear, which is really only aimed at frightening the wicked; the wise know that death is not evil. Those who wage war are themselves guilty if they die. Death is moreover a benefit both to sinners in that it puts an end to their sin, and to survivors by being an example of something to fear; for righteous people death means that finally they are rewarded for their arduous struggle for virtue (II.22). In regarding death as the release of the soul from matter, the Manichaeans are contradicting themselves, since they also say that death in war is wicked. Death is not good because it frees the soul from matter, says Titus, but because it is a reward for the virtuous and a conclusion to their sin for the wicked. Wars on the other hand are evil—but they are man's responsibility (II.23).

A further accusation has to do with earthquakes, plagues, famine, grasshoppers, etc., which supposedly have their origin in the principle of evil. Titus on the other hand believes that all these calamities help to shake us out of a soft self-indulgence that can lead us away from the struggle for virtue. When God chastises us by these means, He is not seized by some form of passion of anger, but has the conversion of the wicked in view. It would not be an expression of love for man if God merely allowed human passions to grow; and here Titus compares God with the father who chastises and the surgeon who cuts out and cauterizes. The sin that God chastises, however, is one that man is responsible for; fortunately, partly God is long-suffering, so He does not deprive man of his freedom to sin, and partly He is not soft when chastisement is required (II.24). Earthquakes and the like arouse awe; they are unpleasant for the senses but good for the soul (II.25). Mani moreover contradicts himself, for if the growth of matter is harmful, it is hindered precisely by the disasters mentioned; the truth, however, is that both abundance and misfortune are benefits from God (II.26). What is more, it is only if man loses these benefits from time to time that he acknowledges that they are a grace from God; and God wishes this to be recognised, so that man can become more worthy to receive the things that issue from Him (II.27). One example is the recent earthquake under the ungodly Emperor. Natural death and divine austerity may be compared to good medicine. When Mani says that the procreation of children is an instance of the growth of matter, yet that mass death is evil, he is again contradicting himself. Summarising his views from II.22 Titus asserts that on the contrary procreation renews the race and death is not an evil (II.28). The conceivable objection that misfortunes have no effect on people is rejected by Titus; it arises from the habit of noting only the sinners and not all those who have been helped to piety and virtue. The rapid coming and going of misfortunes does not happen in order to enforce a conversion but only to persuade; and to test those already converted. Even if misfortunes were to have no effect, it is better that they come than that we should accuse God of being negligent. But basically Titus nevertheless maintains that misfortunes really do have a powerful effect in the direction of conversion (II.29).

Titus now comes to a new series of charges against created things, beginning with Mani's accusation against darkness and night (II.30). According to Titus, the darkness of night is without existence in substance; it is accidental and merely the shadow of the physical world that comes when the sun sets. Titus states that shadow is merely the absence of light; light has substance, but not darkness (II.31). The reason that God has ordered it thus is to create rest for man, and to offer equal access to it (II.32). Moreover, the calculation of time would be impossible without night's interruption of day, and we would be unable to sense and enjoy the light, if we could not compare it to darkness (II.33). In a final summary Titus says that night is accidental but useful and an expression of God's wisdom (II.34). The Manichaeans say that the thief steals in the night; but this can also happen by day, says Titus. In both cases it is the thief's responsibility and not the fault of the night, for the purpose of night was for the thief to sleep (II.35). What darkness and light are to the body, lies and truth are to the soul; darkness and lies have no existence in substance, but they are essential for cognition of the light and the choice of the truth (II.36). It can never be proved that lies and darkness have substance; but truth and light clearly do. Titus then turns aside to a brief excursion on God, who in Himself is truth (ἀντοαλήθεια) and intelligible light. The reason that He does not lie is not that He is powerless but because He never wishes to lie; it is in this sense that God cannot lie. For it is absurd to imagine that the Creator should be subject to the constraint of His nature or to necessity; He who has made the natures is beyond nature and free of the necessity of nature. He is in truth good and without lies. Titus then returns to his main subject: the lie is without substance like the night, but we should shun the lie, for it is thought up by ourselves, whereas the physical darkness is set by God (II.37).

Titus's next subject is Mani's mockery of wild animals. His antipathy to these creatures, who are God's own means of chastisement, shows that he himself is in need of them. God, however, always employs two means by which to educate man: the enjoyment of His benefits makes him appreciate God's grace, while frightening occurrences make him turn to God (II.38). Wild animals are a frightening means of education, but they are not evil, for they are without reason, and wickedness is reason's passion. When Mani claims that the principle of evil is without reason, then this too is a contradiction; there can only ever be a question of evil on the premise that the opposites "good and evil" are known. Consequently the principle of evil does not exist and cannot be accused of anything (II.39). Only a creature of reason like man can therefore be evil; on the other hand animals (and also infant children) are without reason and cannot be reproached (II.40). Furthermore, how can poisonous animals originate from the principle of evil when snake venom and meat from snakes and reptiles can be used in curative medicine? In this respect poisonous animals are useful, as they are again when they function as a frightening means of education (II.41).

This point leads Titus on to a series of considerations on God's admirable means of education, which with many examples he proves are adapted to the various people and situations (II.42). He continues the series by marvelling at how different causes have the same effects, but he points out at the same time that God only reveals to us the purpose of a few of His actions; these must serve as examples to show us that everything is governed by Providence; those who are upright in their intention will always remember these examples, whereas those who have weighed down reason with the habits of sin—or like Mani believes in beings that are hostile to God—are very far from acknowledging and benefiting from these examples (II.43).

Titus now returns to the question of wild animals; he summarises some of his views and adds that in addition to the animals' usefulness for man, they represent the diversity of the world, which is a well-ordered beauty. God has generously granted them much, such as fur and hides against the cold and heat, the ability for large or small propagation, and so on. God's wisdom reveals itself in the capacity of the same plant to nourishing one species yet poison another; the fact that the animals can distinguish between the plants that are respectively edible or poisonous for their own species even shows that God has nevertheless given creatures without reason a trace of it (II.44). On this basis Titus remarks that Mani's charge against poisonous plants is rejected. But Mani also accuses iron and fire of annihilating bodies, even though this annihilation ought really in his view to constitute a useful destruction of matter. Fire and iron, however, are created by God, and with God's authority discovered by man's reason; fire and iron are of great benefit. It is clear that man's reason is not a gift from evil matter but from the good one. Yet it is equally clear that it is the same reason that is responsible for the misdeeds that iron and the other instruments are used for. According to Titus, man has acquired access to these instruments in order that he may be tested and free to choose them in the service of virtue. Nor, he adds, is it an argument against the instruments that death can occur through them, for death is not wicked but natural (II.45).

There follows a summary in which Titus adds that nothing in Creation is evil; only sin, for which man's reason is responsible, is evil. The law or nature of created things cannot be altered, but reason can use them unreasonably (II.46). Since death is not evil but killing is, one might still ask why Providence has allowed man to kill. According to Titus, there are many reasons why God allows this, such as chastisement of severe vices. Death, as it reveals itself in the many ways of dying, is on the other hand natural and determined by the Creator in a beautiful and appropriate way for the whole race (II.47). Thus all that is created is good, and created by God's wisdom and governed by God's Providence. It is not surprising, however, that God's reason and the signs of His wisdom are not accessible to everyone; the thoughts of kings are also hidden. We must trust in the wisdom of Providence, just as we must have faith in the experience of a craftsman. The proper thing for us is to be awestruck and to honour God's wisdom which is beyond all reason, both when we understand it and when we do not (II.48). Unless we understand the reason behind most of the things that come from God and instead use our own reason's blindness as a guide, we will end up like Mani, who in his fantasy has formed evil as a second principle without beginning, who mocks God by dividing Creation and attributing it to those two principles, and who refers God's good works to consist in reality partly of something that is evil (II.49).

On this basis Titus then looks at the principles of the corporeal substances, which he explains as being four elements, the dry, the wet, the hot and the cold; the merging of these contrasting elements produces the body. Is Mani really referring some of these elements to good and bad respectively, either two to each or three to the first and one to the second? Each element, however, is in itself able to do damage. When Mani then goes on to imagine that the elements are themselves mixed, Titus protests: each element is homogeneous and indivisible (II.50). Mani says, for example, that some of fire comes from the good, and some of it from evil, but then he even has to separate the qualities in the elements, which on the contrary are simple and homogeneous (II.51). Mani's reasoning is that fire is both curative and consuming, but he overlooks the fact that this separation touches only on the use of fire, not on its nature. For the nature of fire is precisely to consume; it is dangerous to get too close to it, and not dangerous to be further away from it, and it is as a consumer that it can be useful (II.52). Titus further points out the contradictory and impossible consequences of referring the merger of the elements to the principle of evil (II.53).

The sun constitutes a subject all of its own. Mani praises the sun for not being mixed with evil, and Titus accepts that the sun originates from only one of the four elements, the substance of heat; it also shares the nature of fire in both warming when it is at a distance and burning when it is too close. The nature of fire is more glorious than the other elements' nature, for whereas their natural direction is downwards, the nature of fire is upwards; through its fineness it is lighter than air, which it overpowers by climbing above it, since it is finer in its affinity with the sun. When Mani deifies the sun by saying that it is from the nature of good, this would in effect mean that he reckons fire to belong to goodness, for the sun differs from fire only in its position, but otherwise performs the same task by its activity; only because God has set the sun so far away for our benefit, are we prevented from being consumed by it. Allotting the sun to the element of heat also refutes those who regard it as a fifth element. Mani's deification of the sun is a mockery of God; visible bodies are by nature contrasted with invisible and incorporeal (II.54).

Mani refers the fruits of the earth to matter, but in so doing he contradicts himself, for they would not be able to grow without the sun's help in concert with rain and wind (II.55). On the one hand Mani believes that rain-showers are a superfluous extravagance, for instance when it rains in the desert, on uncultivated soil or in the sea, yet on the other hand he maintains that they are the perspiration from the archons of matter who are enflamed with love for the forces of goodness.⁴ Titus's response is that God generously allows the rain to fall everywhere, but that rain is also useful; rain over the sea becomes clouds, and rain in the desert and on uncultivated soil forms springs which, like rivers elsewhere, nourish the earth. Whether it rains or not, the Manichaeans accuse God, even though they themselves sow the earth and eat bread. The Manichaeans ridicule sexual intercourse and procreation, i.e. the continued existence of the human race; the force of the sexual instinct, however, is an expression of God's wise means of sustaining the human race and, what is more, it enables women to suffer the labour pains of childbirth, and for both sexes to take the trouble to raise children; these are beneficial trials. The sexual drive is free from accusation if one follows reason and the Creator's law. The Manichaeans encourage women to dispose of their foetuses, and they are enemies of nature and the Creator (II.56). The Manichaeans also ask why desire for sexual intercourse exists in bodies, why some people could not be chaste without being excited by nature. Titus's answer is naturally that chastity consists precisely of a triumph over desire (II.57). And just as with sexuality, so the moderate enjoyment of food and drink is natural and good (while training through fasting is not against, but over, nature). It is not the use of the natural that provokes sin but the immoderate use (II.58). Desire is not evil, but actually makes virtue possible through abstinence from desire (II.59).

Mani dishonours goodness and virtue, and vilifies man's power and freedom, nor has he been ashamed to say that stones and everything else are animated, because the nature of goodness was bound in them when evil defeated its opponent. A sign that there is a soul in trees and stones is the sound in the air that branches and stones evoke. According to Titus, however, these sounds are signs of corporeal objects and not of animation (II.60).

⁴ Previously treated by Titus in I.17.

Mani lays a charge against those who kill animals for nourishment, since the animals are animated with souls; the power of goodness is confined within them. Titus then asks who it was that from the beginning allowed the animals to be handed over to man as food. It cannot be the work of the evil one in order to deride the good one, for in that case the evil one would be gifted with reason (which the Manichaeans deny, according to Titus), and furthermore the Manichaeans admit that God is the Creator. Some animals are obviously created to be food for man, as can be seen by the way they propagate so rapidly, or the animals are otherwise created to be beasts of burden or to provide clothes etc. Man has not tamed the animals against God's will but in accordance with the order of Creation (II.61). Mani on the other hand claims that it is unjust for oxen to be subjected to the labourer in order to till the soil; this too is an example of the slavery of the good soul in the world. To this Titus asks how should we till the soil if we did not use oxen, and how should the race of man survive without food? It is plainly natural for domestic animals to slave for man. As for wild animals, there are, as he has mentioned, a number of reasons why God has permitted some of them to be able to kill man, among others as a trial (II.62).

Any further polemic is now superfluous, since it is clear that everything has been ordered by the one and single reason of the Creator and that there is no conflict, sign of war or disharmony among His created things, but that they all exist in mutual peace. Titus depicts in wonder the harmonic, regular order of the whole universe (II.63–64), and in connection with the four elements he emphasises that it is precisely the contrast between them that is the cause of their harmony and a testimony to their Creator (II.65). May we not be astonished at the power of the Creator and the harmony of the Creation, which is only broken by man's injustice? Considering this, what man in his right mind would be able to invent another principle that was contrary to God? The Creation is manifold and contains both the mild and the strict, and man needs both God's mildness and His strictness in his education, for unqualified mildness is harmful, while seriousness and strictness without mildness become coarseness and misanthropy (II.66). At this point Titus concludes Book II.

c. Summary of Book III

The first three chapters of Book III⁵ constitute a kind of introduction that establishes the aim of both Book III and Book IV. Titus begins by stating that the previous refutations in Books I–II have not been based on the Bible, because they were also intended to strengthen the pagans' mind against Manichaeism. Now, however, his refutations will be on a Scriptural basis in order to fortify the believers who are being misled by the Manichaeans' distortions of the words of the Bible and their misuse of the name of Christ. Mani is proselytising among both pagans and Christians, and he is leading imprudent Christians astray both by calling himself the intercessor (παράκλητος, Paraclete), and also in his epistles, just as Paul does, the apostle of Jesus Christ (III.1). Mani attributes the Law and the prophets to the principle of evil, whereas the gospels and the other parts of the NT are given by the principle of goodness, even though they are defiled by matter. As the intercessor Mani is now removing those parts of the NT that supposedly stem from matter, thereby leaving behind incoherent fragments. Yet even these fragments will be sufficient to disprove Mani (III.2). First, however, Titus will demonstrate that Mani's mockery of the OT is not according to reason. Mani is in agreement with the older heretics, and indeed he is even more ungodly than them. Titus would not be attacking Mani, if, like the pagans, he had just settled for not believing in the stories of the Bible; it is precisely because he believes that they have taken place—and because he attributes them to the principle of evil—that these miracles must be proved to be expressions of God's wonderful dispensations (III.3).

Titus then turns to a rebuttal of the Manichaeans' attack on Gen. and Ex. (III.4–47) in the form of three sequences: III.4–9, III.10–29 and III.30–47. In the first Titus quotes and refers to one or more Manichaean texts that have construed and criticised Gen. and Ex., and in this context he employs various polemical strictures against the Manichaeans. In III.10–29 Titus defends Gen. 1–3 against the Manichaean criticism or profanity. In the third sequence, III.30–47, he rejects the other profanities against Gen. and Ex. that were mentioned in III.7 (this refutation is furthermore continued in III.62–65).

⁵ III.1-beginning of 7 = PG 18, "praefatio in librum tertium". III.7-beginning of 30 is edited in Nagel 1967; 1973. The remainder of Book III and all of Book IV, apart from a few fragments, are only preserved in S_y.

In III.4 Titus explains that he will now deal with the chapter to which either Mani himself or one of Mani's disciples has given the title "On the first human moulding" (περὶ τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης πρωτοπλαστίας, Gr. 68.12). Following on in III.5 are long quotations from the chapter, which claim that when the archons discovered that they were being deprived of the light, they created Adam in order to keep the soul in its prison. This is therefore the same step in the Manichaean myth that Titus was concerned with in I.38. III.6 revolves around the built-in contradictions and the ludicrousness of this story, and around the fact that it turns man, the peak of Creation, into a creature of matter. Titus begins III.7 with a summary that partly Mani is in doubt as to why the world came into being, and partly he wishes to show that man is not God's creature. Titus then repeats and quotes Mani's criticism of the Paradise narrative, beginning with the question of whether God knew beforehand that Adam would disobey His commandment. Mani does not believe that God knew this beforehand, and therefore this God he considers to be the evil one. The serpent was the angel of goodness who persuaded Adam to break the command so that he received his eyesight, acquired clothing and knew good and evil. God banished Adam from the Tree of Life and immortality, because he begrudged him immortality. Mani ridicules the murder of Abel and thinks that the Flood and the destruction of Sodom can only stem from the principle of evil. Mani also censures the polygamy of the patriarchs and claims that with the ten plagues of Egypt God showed much hostility and anger against the Egyptians and unfair bias towards the Hebrews. Nor can it have been the good one that commanded the Hebrews to steal the Egyptians' jewels. Mani vilifies both the fire on the mountain and Moses, who said that God is a consuming fire (cf. Deut. 4.24). In III.8 Titus also states that these blasphemies are aimed at documenting the differences between the OT and the NT, and in III.9 he writes that the Manichaeans hide their books, because untruth loves to hide itself. He himself, however, will refute major and minor lies in the Manichaean texts.

In III.10 Titus sets out on the refutation itself, returning first to Mani's doubts about why the world was made (cf. beginning of III.7). Titus maintains that the reason for the creation of the world is God's creative goodness; God did not need the Creation, but as a boon.

He nevertheless gave non-existent things a share both in being and in being good (III.10). God then brought order to what He had created. However, the only usefulness of created things, including the heavenly bodies, lies in their existing for man's sake; man is thus the principal part of the world. It therefore makes no sense when the Manichaeans refer the heavenly bodies to the good Creator, while man, for whom they are made, is referred to the archons (III.11–12).

By now Titus has already moved on to the question of the creation of man. He sets out to explain what it means that man is created in God's εἰκών and according to his ὁμοίωσις and he is to rule over the animals (Gen. 1.26). The difference between man and the animals is contained in their various natures; animals are without reason, bound by the necessity of nature, whereas man's nature is to be reasonable, and reason is natural freedom: reason can pass its own judgements, which ensures that man is in the world like the free citizen in the city. It is in man's power whether to employ his natural capacities or not, as one can see, for example, with regard to procreation and also with nourishment and sleep, which, however, man can only abstain from within the limits of the exercise of perseverance and the power of reason. When man utilises nature, he does not do so like the animals out of necessity but with premeditation, and in consequence man is lord of both the animals and himself. Man's createdness κατ' εἰκόνα is thus concerned with his lordship over nature, his reason and his freedom (III.13).

With this in mind Titus explains the command not to eat of the Tree of Knowledge. The animals were not given a commandment, because they were not worthy of it and being without reason they would not have understood it, but man is honoured by the commandment because he thereby comes to participate in his Creator's reason. When he receives the order, he apprehends as far as possible the commanding God, and correspondingly, in commanding man God wishes to reveal knowledge of Himself to the degree that is possible for human nature. In this context Titus also adds an interpretation of Gen. 2.7 (III.14). He explains further that already through man's knowledge (contained in his createdness κατ' εἰκόνα) he anticipated the command that he should obey the Creator. However, the command was an exercise of his nature and freedom, for just like a man who already has the rules in his soul for some art or other, such as the art of medicine or carpentry, and is driven to practise them so that they do not remain in the soul unused, so was man-driven through the commandment to apply his natural knowledge. Freedom would be ineffectual without the command that God therefore gave, even though He knew beforehand that Adam would disobey it. On this background one could accuse God of having harmed man by punishing him for a disobedience that he knew of beforehand; but Titus will deal with this problem later (i.e. from III.17–18); for the present he expounds in greater depth on how obedience or virtue are only possible together with the freedom to disobey, and how the initial disobedience later came to benefit virtue, in that man became careful out of regard for later virtue, since he had been disobedient and experienced harm. For obedience always requires man's genuine experience, whether he has to learn it for himself or he settles for using the example of others (III.15).

Titus maintains that God's purpose was not defeated by man's disobedience, but satisfied; this can already be seen by God giving man a commandment he could disobey rather than forcing him (III.16). Out of consideration for later obedience God wanted man to have the power to be disobedient, and although He humbled man after his disobedience, He allowed him to preserve the possibility of leading a virtuous life and encouraged him to do so. As man's first experience disobedience was necessary, for it showed him the freedom and the power to choose that lay in man's nature, which was a precondition for later obedience. Nor did disobedience mean that man perished or made himself incurable, but only that he became conscious of his own power. The reason that God did not give him new laws and commands immediately after his disobedience was because man already in his nature had knowledge of what he should or should not do. When God censured him, he did not counsel him to do penance; for man did not need healing for what he had done, since he did not remain in a state of disobedience but could assume his true life-form (III.17).

Titus next returns to the question of whether mortality and expulsion from Paradise damaged man (cf. III.15). Presumably it is Titus's idea to counter this question by referring to what is God's fundamental purpose with man, and he therefore again points out that man has been given his existence through the benefaction of the good God (cf. III.10). God not only gave man freedom of choice but also a body and thus mortality because He had foreknowledge of man's disobedience. It is impossible for a free agent such as man always to be without sin; nor does God therefore demand it. However, it is for this reason that death is necessary, though also terrifying. Even though there is a fear of punishment linked to death, it is nonetheless of benefit for both sinful and virtuous alike; it puts an end to whoever deliberately wishes to be evil, and gives rest to whoever has made his endeavours for virtue (III.18). It is with God's permission that man freely takes the cause of death from himself. Yet man's disobedience does not please God, and therefore he seals it with death. If, however, one could imagine that everyone made such an effort that they lived without sin, death would still be necessary as rest (III.19).

Titus can also support these interpretations with precise references to Scripture. Already before man was disobedient, God had appointed him to rule over the animals (Gen. 1.26.28), but in Paradise he had no need of them; in other words the intention was not that he should he remain there; furthermore Paradise was a place of particularly spiritual value which was not in the long run destined for the irrational animals; this point also demonstrated the provisional nature of the primeval state. Further evidence is found when God says in Gen. 1.26, "let them have dominion" (καὶ ἀρχέτωσαν, ed.N 324.14–15), even though there was only one man. The plural form must refer to "the sum total of mankind" (τὸ πλήρωμα τῆς ἀνθρωπότητος, ed.N 324.15), but the reason that Adam did not "know" Eve (Gen. 4.1) until after the banishment from Paradise was because there was no purpose for them to concern themselves with procreation in Paradise: only for the man who must die does procreation become necessary for the continuation of the race. It is thus quite clear that God had beforehand made all things ready and controlled them as it suited Him, so that mankind could fill the earth, and that the purpose of the first man and his descendants was not just to inhabit Paradise (III.20). When God says that mankind shall be multiple, fill the earth and have dominion over the animals (Gen. 1.28), He is making a promise that would not be required if they were to inhabit Paradise incessantly. When God gives man corn and fruit for food (Gen. 1.29), it is clear that from the beginning man was formed to the condition in which he now finds himself (Titus believes that 'seed corn' alludes to agriculture). God's foreknowledge and dispensation were of course connected, in that He had prepared the things that would be appropriate to man after the disobedience. Through its consequences it led to man's beneficial endeavour to virtue as well as his industrious labour with the arts and crafts, both being tasks that can hinder him from getting involved in incurable wickedness, which nevertheless happens now and again (III.21).

Man's disobedience did not force God to invest him with death and expel him from Paradise; the point of origin in His action was God Himself. Death and banishment should not harm man; for the experience of a lost, better life animates man to moral efforts to return. It is enough that only Adam had this experience, for we, his descendants, can settle for knowing something that another has experienced (III.22).

Since God in this way was in control of all things and man was not harmed, the prohibition against eating from the Tree of Knowledge must be interpreted in this light. Man should not be prevented from eating something bad, for there was nothing harmful in Paradise, and consequently the purpose of the prohibition was that it should be an ethical exercise in abstinence. The fact that the tree was called "the Tree for knowing good and bad" referred neither to the tree knowing good and evil nor to man acquiring this knowledge by eating of it. The tree is so called because man knew good and bad by not approaching it. It is true that man had this knowledge beforehand, but it was not tested in practice until the commandment was to be kept. Thus the prohibition was an exercise in obedience and contained no danger of sinning: in Paradise Adam had no possibility of sinning, i.e. stealing, committing adultery, killing, bearing false witness and being envious, and therefore God did not forbid him any of these things. Such a prohibition would not have been necessary either, since Adam's nature already contained the knowledge that these things are wrong; the name of the tree is in itself a testimony that man possessed this knowledge (III.23). So Adam had no opportunity to sin, but since his need in Paradise was for food, it was of course on food that he was tested. Titus again underlines that the tree and its fruit were not harmful, indeed, Gen. 3.6 even shows that the tree was good to eat from (and the same passage shows that the Manichaeans are not right in claiming that Adam and Eve were physically blind before they received their sight again in Gen. 3.7). Titus now explains the character of the eating prohibition as an ascetic exercise in greater depth: one does not evaluate the actions themselves that an abstaining person has promised not to perform, but rather the intentions of the person in question, since the actions gain another quality through the particular aim of the person's vow; correspondingly there was nothing wrong in the action of eating of the tree, but God's prohibition gave the action a different quality, so that it all turned into a contest.

Titus then concentrates on interpreting Gen. 3.7: when Adam and Eve saw that they were naked and were ashamed of themselves, it was because that he who is unfamiliar with wickedness exposes himself, but experience of disobedience drives out innocence and introduces shame. The two people thus lost their ignorance of wickedness (III.24). When their eyes were opened and they knew that they were naked, the reference is to reasoning; it is reasoning that leads the eye to see a particular object; not until one knows what one is seeing does one see it (III.25).

In this context Titus deals with an interpretation that assumes that Adam and Eve still had no flesh in Paradise, since the time for procreation had not yet arrived, and that God had therefore not yet given them the concern about nakedness. According to this reading, their disobedience gave rise to mortality, and in consequence of this came procreation, and therefore God gave them modesty towards one another, so that they knew their different forms, which God had foreseen as being necessary for the continuation of the race (III.26). Titus rejects this interpretation. That man and woman could see in Paradise is clear enough—the central evidence is Gen. 2.23—, they just did not know shame. But from the moment they had eaten, they regarded one another in a more bodily form and were transferred to the earth, from which they had been created in the beginning. But it was not because God was jealous that he cut man off from access to the Tree of Life, but because it would be harmful if he who has great boldness to sin, lives forever (III.27).

When God says that Adam has become “like one of us” in his knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 3.22), He is referring to Adam's original nature; the meaning is not that Adam only acquired this knowledge through disobedience. It is clear that this is how it is, since Adam had already been created in God's image, which must mean that knowledge of good and evil was put into his nature. The command that God gave man for exercise was given to a cognitive being, as can be seen from Eve's knowledge of God's commandment in her answer to the serpent (Gen. 3.2–3). The reason that Eve could be led astray by the serpent is because she was deceived by a deceptive reason, and Titus now takes the opportunity to reject Mani's interpretation of the serpent as the messenger of goodness

(cf. III.7): when the serpent says that man will not die (Gen. 3.4), it is clearly a fraud; the serpent was a liar like Mani himself (III.28).

Titus is nonetheless willing to acknowledge that whoever claims that the tree was really created in order that it effected a knowledge of good and evil in those who ate of it is not necessarily saying something absurd, provided he agrees that man was from the first free, had reason and knew the power of the Creator's commandment, but he just does not think that man from the first had acquired full knowledge of virtue and vice. From this less than perfect life man was led to the full and complete knowledge when he ate of the tree. In all circumstances Titus concurs that disobedience increased man's knowledge; God allowed the disobedience, which by virtue of His foreknowledge he knew would be committed, because despite the pain of its acquisition man's accrument of knowledge would improve his capacity for choosing goodness.

Even though to all intents and purposes Titus thus grants the Manichaeans that Adam and Eve's disobedience was a benefit in that it involved a useful growth of knowledge, this does not mean that he accepts that the serpent was the messenger of goodness: the serpent was evil, not just because it lied, but in particular because it believed that by advising Eve it would do harm; they were ignorant of God's dispensation. This finds its correspondence later on in God's greatest dispensation, the crucifixion, where Paul testifies in 1 Cor. 2.8 that the rulers of this world would not have crucified Jesus if they had known God's secret wisdom. For God often uses the attacks of the evil one to carry out His will (here Titus refers to his later exposition of the Devil [cf. IV.57]). Because the intent of the serpent was to deceive, it has also deserved God's curse (Gen. 3.14–15); on the other hand the reason that God was angry when he turned to Adam and Eve was to emphasise his stern character.

Titus ends his study of Gen. 1–3 by explaining that this is how the interpretation must be for one who loves God (φιλόθεος); Mani's reading stems from a φιλαίτιος, i.e. from one who loves to bring accusations (III.29). However, Mani and his supporters have clad themselves in the darkness of aberration, and even extended it by sticking to the difficult passages in Scripture.⁶ That is why they also read the Scripture in such a way as to blame God for the murder of Abel (cf. III.7). It was, however, Cain who was responsible for murdering his brother out of envy, whereas God punished Cain for his wicked deed (III.30). Of course God could have prevented Cain from murdering; the reason He allowed the killing was to institute the rule that as a trial the righteous should humbly endure even to death the scorn of the unrighteous. Abel suffered no harm, since he returned to the Paradise that his father had left, and furthermore it is reasonable that a righteous man was the first to share in the great benefaction that death is. For Adam too Abel's death was an example in favour of conversion; precisely by being an example such a death is even preferable from the viewpoint of the righteous (III.31).

⁶ The Greek text transmission ends here (i.e. manuscript V: see below); what follows, aprt from small sections in Sacr. Parallel. (see below) builds entirely on Sy.

In censuring the Flood as cruel (cf. III.7) the Manichaeans are contradicting themselves, for they overlook the fact that it was aimed at evil people; on the contrary, they could have reproached God if He had merely let things carry on as they were. God was a wise judge who before He let the waters rise even set a limit of a hundred twenty years for conversion, while the ark was being built. God also reveals Himself as an example of both the just and the good judge by actually saving one pious man and his sons (III.32). One would think that the Manichaeans could turn it to their account as an accusation against the flesh when God says that His spirit shall not remain in these people who are flesh (Gen. 6.3), but that is not the case because they will not regard this God as good. It is not the intention of the text to accuse the flesh, however, but rather to accuse the reason of those who satisfied the flesh through pleasures. Even today the Flood is a useful and essential example for man (III.33). The same considerations are also true of the Sodomites (cf. III.7). Wherever human reason deliberately moves from natural thoughts to the passions Providence in its goodness prepares a swift ending to their wicked life, and by this example simultaneously educates the few who are willing to repent, while the rest are left without an excuse if they continue their actions (III.34). In contrast the reason that God did not annihilate those responsible for the Tower of Babel was because they had not corrupted their nature through the passions of desire, even though their audacity was without reason. The division of languages was also of advantage to them, for they became the fathers of all the peoples of the earth, differing from each other through their various languages which were all given by God (III.35). So when Mani refers this wonderful, wise governance to his own self-concocted principle of evil, it is clear that he in no way scorns the principle; this ought to be clearly stated (III.36).

In connection with Moses' and Pharaoh's wonders in Egypt (cf. III.7) Titus asks Mani to which of the two principles he would refer the two persons in question. Moses was clearly superior to Pharaoh! Mani, who like Pharaoh does not know God (cf. Ex. 5.2), must either refer Pharaoh, who was openly unjust, to the principle of goodness, since he refers the OT to the archons of matter, or he must acknowledge that Moses was God's servant, in which case the plagues on the Egyptians must have been from this God, who did not act in unseemly anger but wished to bring up a race of free men, whom the Egyptians were oppressing, in the fear of God (III.37). Perhaps Mani would refer both the Egyptians and the Hebrews to matter, so that in some way or another goodness abandoned matter to its own self-destruction through the two peoples fighting each other; but it is hard to believe that the archons, who originally formed the body as a strategem against goodness (cf. III.4-5), should again allow themselves to be cheated by goodness. As it happened, the Hebrews were unharmed, and if it was the archons of evil who were protecting them, then the Manichaeans must at least admit that evil also both sustains and destroys. But if the principle of evil was sparing the Hebrews, then it has also possessed compassion; this, according, to Titus, presupposes knowledge of goodness, which in turn would come into conflict with the Manichaeans' teaching that matter was without reason (III.38). Moreover, if matter was indeed without order and reason, then the archons have not deliberately committed any evil against man either (III.39). But above and beyond all this it could not possibly have been a disordered being but rather a wise one who took pains to protect the Hebrews against the great plagues that struck the Egyptians among whom they were living (III.40). Nor can the confusion and disordered fortuitousness of matter be the cause since Moses with his prayer was able to call up and then to stop the plagues not just once but all of ten times (III.41). But to whom did Moses pray? The sorcerers who served the evil spirits were only able to imitate Moses' first four miracles; after that they had to admit that his actions could not be compared with their own, and that the finger of God was with Moses (cf. Ex. 8.19). Thus Mani, who continues to accuse God, is worse than the sorcerers. (III.42). If the Manichaeans say that the evil spirits which were obeying the sorcerers correspond to their evil matter, they must recognise that Moses was God's prophet. Titus adds that he will return to the question of evil spirits in his section on Satan (cf. IV.57–85) (III.43). And to which of the two principles would Mani refer Moses and the sorcerers respectively? How would he deal with the sorcerers accepting that the finger of God was with Moses if he, Mani, numbers them with the principle of goodness? (III.44). Finally, Titus again explains how it is impossible to refer all these events, which at every step express the will of Providence, to the area of matter which the Manichaeans believe in; he concludes that further argument on this point is therefore superfluous (III.45).

As for the charges of theft of Egyptian jewellery (cf. III.7), the jewels were no more than a reasonable payment for the Hebrews' toil, and whoever was representing devotion to God by drowning the Egyptians, who worshipped animals, cannot possibly have been matter. Is it credible that Moses, his company and his sister should really sing the praises of matter as though it were God? cf. Ex. 15 (III.46). And surely the miraculous solicitude for the Hebrews during their desert wanderings cannot be attributed to evil matter, especially since the manna came from above, where Mani says that everything is pure? And can one believe that the principle of evil would teach the Hebrews justice in the course of these forty years? Since we can see that the Ten Commandments are just and good, they can only originate from the good one, and not from the evil one, as Mani otherwise claims (III.47).

Titus now moves on to a completely new subject, namely, the question of sacrifice, which the Manichaeans regard as evil. Sacrifices do not satisfy a need of God, he says, but of those who sacrifice; and God also received only their pious intention, and not their sacrifice; for instance, God rejected the intention behind Cain's sacrifice. Nor did He command the first righteous people to sacrifice; that was their own idea, which He accepted. His purpose in giving Moses laws regarding sacrifice was His way of adapting and condescending to the Hebrews' level, which required that worship of God be linked to the corporeal (III.48). It was necessary to educate the Hebrews slowly to perfection by beginning on a small scale (III.49). Titus therefore wishes to go over what God through the prophets said to the Jews regarding sacrifice (III.50). He cites a number of their statements that criticise sacrifice, such as Isa. 1.11–13 (III.51), Isa. 66.3 (III.52), Isa. 43.22–24 (III.53), Hos. 6.5–6 (III.54), Am. 5.22 and 5.25 (III.55), Mic. 6.6–8 (III.56), Jer. 7.21–23 (III.57), and notes that one can find more of the same kind in Jeremiah (III.58). Similar things have also been said in the Psalms of David, such as Ps. 40.7 (LXX 39.7), Ps. 50.7–14 (LXX 49.7–14) and Ps. 51.18–19 (LXX 50.18–19) (III.59). Consequently God scorns sacrifices, but nevertheless uses them to educate man to rise from the corporeal and into the incorporeal. The Manichaeans should admit that also these critical prophetic voices belong in the OT, which they otherwise attack (III.60).

Just as with sacrifice the whole of the OT should be understood as types and images which are intended as milk for babes and sucklings who must be weaned onto solid food (cf. 1 Cor. 3.1–3). Those who on the way realised the inadequacy of the Law did not reject it but supplemented it through their faith, because only the Lawgiver Himself could replace it with anything else, when the time was right. Such people thus demonstrated that through love for the Lawgiver they had already raised themselves above the others; this is true of both the prophets mentioned and further back even of Moses, who himself had no need of the Law; and the same is true of Elijah, who also sacrificed (1 Kings 18.20–40 [=LXX 3 Kings]) (III.61). Titus then returns to some of Mani's points of criticism from III.7; he states that the purpose of the fire on the mountain in the desert was to imbue the Hebrews with devoutness, and that Moses' words about God being like a consuming fire (cf. Deut. 4.24) do not mean that God was that fire; the formulation was adapted to the sensuous preconceptions of the audience (III.62). Titus again asserts that much of the OT is types and images with a deeper meaning, but also that other things which are now forbidden were allowed as a result of special circumstances. This is true of polygamy, for example, which was permitted because the earth required a surplus of children so as to be filled with people, and it was appropriate that the devout patriarchs became forefathers of many peoples (though Titus even finds a purpose in sinful people also participating in polygamy). Once the earth was populated, however, polygamy could be abolished (III.63). If one wonders that anything can be forbidden which was once permitted, one can compare with Titus's own times, in which marriage is not a sin for anyone except for the demented Manichaeans, though it may nevertheless be a sin for those holy men who have taken a particular vow of abstinence. Correspondingly, marriage between siblings, which one must assume was practised by the first generations after Adam, was once both permitted and essential, yet was later forbidden (III.64). The first people on earth were virtuous, but they had many children because children were needed; since then chastity has been introduced for the pious (III.65).

Mani is a barbarian who believes that virtue and vice come from the body and not from the disposition of the one who acts; nor does he grasp that people require spiritual food in relation to the level which they are at (III.66), which is true, for example, of the Jews who were born and bred in Egypt (III.67).

When Mani contrasts the OT and NT and claims that the two testaments cannot stem from the one and the same, he joins the company of previous heretics such as Marcion, who may not have believed that the OT was a product from evil but of a righteous one who was different from the good one, thereby showing that he was still in awe of the strength of the righteousness that the OT commandments contain. Basilides, however, dared to aver that the OT is a product from evil, and Valentinus also agreed with these persons on several points; they slandered the OT in particular, calling it bad and presenting certain passages in the OT as being both internally contradictory and in conflict with the NT (III.68).

However, before Titus deals with the passages in Scripture where the heretics allege there is a discrepancy between the OT and the NT, he wishes to attack the pagan philosophy which is without validity, since it is split into heresies. He takes up the subject because the pagans defend themselves by referring to the Christians as also being split into the heresies in question. This argument is untenable, he says, for the pagans acknowledge all their disagreeing philosophers as still being philosophers, thereby undermining any credibility for themselves (III.69), whereas heretics are immediately banished from the Catholic Church if they fail to acknowledge Scripture and to relinquish their teaching but instead actually reject part of Scripture. The Catholic Church has never called itself by the name of an individual person, apart from God's Christ, who speaks in both the OT and the NT and who is God Himself, as can be seen from His speaking to ordinary shepherds and fishermen who with their lack of education must have been genuine and cannot have lied about Him (III.70). Heretics on the other hand are called by the name of their heresiarchs. Just like the pagan Greeks they introduce new and godless doctrines out of their own intellects and their own thought, and that is why the Manichaeans are called after Mani, the Marcionites after Marcion and the Valentinians after Valentinus. The truth is present in the collected Scriptures, which are without internal contradiction, and the Catholic Church had always refused to call heretics Christians; for they are more alien to the Catholic Church than pagans (III.71). Those who are expelled have no share in the name of Christian, since it is not against a person that they have initiated their new doctrines but against Christ Himself (III.72).

If, however, one wishes to refer to the current debate, which has already been going for a long time, and the division that exists in the Catholic Church (clearly referring to the “Arian controversies”), Titus retorts that in the first place none of the Catholics dare to remove anything from the Holy Scriptures, and secondly, the division is not about the existence of the hypostases or their properties as such, but only about in what manner these properties exist. The conflict is due to overweening pride, and Titus wishes in all humility to refrain from such an inquiry. For all are agreed in their belief in the one principle that has no beginning, and the important thing is that all honour the Son, just as they honour the Father (cf. Jn. 5.23); as the Father’s honour is incomprehensible for every human being, so is the Son’s honour also incomprehensible (III.73). Against this, the heretics who are completely outside the Church, including the Manichaeans, have introduced non-existing principles and new properties; they are not Christians at all and therefore their existence does not render the Catholic truth dubious either. Christianity is solicitude for and protection of the holy books right down to the tittle of a single letter, and the heretics are thus expelling themselves from Christianity. While the pagan philosophers only do battle with people, the heretics do battle with God, who speaks from both the OT and the NT alike. Titus ends by explaining that he has found it necessary to diverge from the theme of his inquiry and attack the pagans because they have dared to employ the existence of heretics in an argument against the Catholic Church (III.74).

Simultaneously Titus has also moved away from the theme of his inquiry, because it is correct to argue in the same way against all the heretics who will not attribute the lawgiving in the OT to God. Against them Titus will prove that it is the same God who stands behind the OT and the NT. The heretics may be in dispute with each other, but they still agree on quoting passages such as Mt. 5.27–28.33–37 as proof of the conflict and contradiction between the two testaments. Titus, however, will only speak of difference and change, not about conflict and contradiction. In the NT there is a growth and intensification of what has gone before, not its abolition. The OT was only insufficient out of concern for the weakness of its audience, and Christ came to perfect it (cf. Mt. 5.17) (III.75). The heretics on the other hand also wish to refer to Mt. 5.38–39 (to turn the other cheek, in contrast to lex talionis), which in their opinion demonstrates a distinction between humility and madness, but Titus explains that both the words of the OT, which are quoted, and Jesus' words are spoken by the same God, but to different people in different epochs, as was appropriate for them (III.76). Those to whom God gave the Law were hard of heart, but lex talionis at least prevented the minor offences from being avenged by death, so instead they could be avenged in proportion to the offence itself; at the same time the threat of punishment implied in lex talionis had a preventive effect on the men of violence. God proved Himself good and merciful by paying regard to the weakness and violence of the times. If He had demanded at that time that they turn the other cheek, they would have thought that violent deeds were permitted because there was no punishment for them (III.77). Those who were taught in the NT, however, excelled in virtue to such a degree that they were able to receive the perfected precepts to show strength through endurance. But both the old and the new rules were given by the one and the same, and do not contradict one another, they are merely addressed to different people (III.78). The precepts would only contradict one another if the one group of rules inflicted nothing but damage, while the other was only of benefit. However, the precepts bring various advantages to those who receive them. The laws of the Jews were to take care of worldly matters, while the Christians' laws were to train them in virtue with a view to what lay beyond. That is why the Jews were threatened with visible punishments of this world, whereas the Christians were threatened with something in the future in order that they should not be prevented from sin because of something visible. Permission for divorce furthermore was only given in the Law of Moses to prevent a worse evil, namely that anger in the family led to killing, but permission could be retracted in relation to Christians, whose customs were more elevate. So the Law of Moses already improved the customs with regard to the introduction of the new precepts. In the Law, the mystery of service was shown in types, but now it is overtly demonstrated with the help of truth itself; so the blood of salvation was in both places, for there is no salvation without redemption through blood (cf. Heb. 9.22). Titus also adds the typologies from Rom. 2.29 and Gal. 4.25–26 (III.79).

The Manichaeans also put forward other passages from the OT and NT which they claim to conflict with one another. Titus settles for giving one example to refute their madness, also because the Manichaeans hide their books so as to prevent them being proved wrong. The Manichaeans exploit the OT portrayal of the sins of the righteous, even though they ought rather to wonder that the Scriptures also criticize them. But God benefits man both by depicting the righteous as good examples and by censuring their sin. Both when the Scriptures show that God was long-suffering towards these sinners, and that He punished the sinners, the Manichaeans attack Him. God's forbearance even reveals itself in His indulgence with these attacks from the Manichaeans (III.80). Titus then seeks to demonstrate God's divine dispensation in relation to the sins of one of the righteous, namely David's sin in connection with Uriah and Bathsheba (2 Sam. 11–12); this is an example that every man can transfer to the others. Yet the Manichaeans ignore all David's pious deeds and concern themselves only with his sin. However, when God weighed up David's good deeds against his bad deeds, it was the former that tipped the scales, and yet God did not fail to heal the wicked deeds, for He had them censured through a prophet, then He revealed the hidden sin, and finally punished David despite his deep repentance; the Manichaeans ought to be ashamed of themselves. God gives everyone the opportunity for repentance, and only those whom He knows beforehand will not repent does He allow to harden themselves (III.81). Like a healthy body David's devoutness had only one sore; so God did not destroy the entire body but healed the sore instead (III.82), and if there was more time, there would be much more to say about this matter (III.83). Titus urges his readers to admire David's repentance when he was rebuked by Nathan; also in this way did David become an example for coming generations, just as in his psalms he continually confessed his sin with tears, so that one cannot read them without weeping (III.84). The Manichaeans ought not to call David a whoremonger, for one does not call a man an archer just because he fires a single lucky shot. One should similarly rather admire David for recovering so swiftly than for his degradation (III.85). In the same way the Manichaeans criticise other righteous men from the OT, because they do not understand what they are reading, but Titus will not tire his readers with further refutation (III.86).

When the Manichaeans censure Moses' words concerning the sins of the fathers that are punished to the third and fourth generations (Ex. 20.5; 34.7; Num. 14.18; Deut. 5.9), it is because they do not understand that the meaning only is that punishment is inflicted if the descendants also imitate the sins of their fathers; in other words the descendants are only punished for their own sins, but the threat in the formulation has a useful preventive effect. Titus summarises by saying that the Law and the Lawgiver are good, because they progressively raise mankind to a greater perfection, where the Law becomes superfluous (III.87).

Titus ends by stating that all the heretics' scorn for the OT is foolish, for without the OT's narratives and prophecies of Messiah the NT has no context; and also in relation to the NT Titus will refute the Manichaeans (III.88).

d. Summary of Book IV

Titus begins Book IV by referring to his refutation in Book III of Mani's scorn for the OT, adding that he will now undertake a similar refutation with regard to the NT. Whereas Mani let the entire OT text stand unaltered and merely referred it to the archons of matter, he made cuts in the NT and discarded most of it in favour of only a few passages. Yet even on the basis of these fragments it is still possible to demonstrate Mani's effrontery, quite apart from the fact that the fragments themselves point back to the context from which Mani excised them (IV.1). Mani did not really have any need for the NT, for a liar has no need of true words; his sole purpose in using NT passages was to lure the sheep from the church, and that is why in his writings he called himself Christ's apostle and the Paraclete. However, towards the pagan Greeks he abandons the Christian material and instead sets out to prove that his message accords with their traditions (IV.2). When Mani calls himself Jesus Christ's apostle, it must be pointed out firstly that the very name "Christ" comes from the OT (IV.3). Thus, one must either discard one's confidence in Mani, or he himself must acknowledge the OT and its God. If Mani dared to say that the archon of matter prophesied the coming of Christ, he would undermine his own position, for it would mean that the archon was in possession of divine foreknowledge (IV.4). And if Mani says that the OT too has something of the good in it, he cannot then continue to reject the entire text. If one accepts the OT prophecy of Christ, however, one must also accept the rest that belongs with it, including the OT's offices of king and high priest, both of which involved anointing and were united in Christ (IV.5). The term 'Jews' in the OT was not a shameful one, but contained a provisionally typological meaning that pointed forward to the new designation 'Christians', which was to replace it (IV.6). The Christians' only disagreement with the Jews was indeed concerned with Christ, whom they believe has not yet come; on the basis of their own Scriptures they must themselves be refuted (IV.7). And when Mani calls himself Jesus Christ's apostle, he is refuted by both the OT's prophecies of Christ and the fact that the very name 'Jesus' is Hebraic (IV.8). At this point Titus takes the opportunity to explain in further detail the reason for the name 'Christ', partly through the oil of the priesthood, which typologically pointed towards the anointing by the Holy Spirit, and partly through the fact that those who are to fight are to be anointed with oil; the Christians are thus people who fight, in their case on the side of virtue, for which they are persecuted (IV.9). But the Manichaeans require no anointing for battles, since they regard virtue and vice as necessities of nature (IV.10). Nor does Mani wish to see his followers persecuted to death, but believes on the basis of 1 Cor. 9.19.22 that it is permissible to make sacrifices. So the Manichaeans are not anointed for battle and therefore do not have the right to the name of Christ. But Christ's incarnation took place among the Jews because they had the prophecies about Him (IV.11).

Like his heretical predecessors Mani removed all the passages in the NT that referred to the God of the OT, but he also claimed to have been sent out by Christ as apostle and Paraclete with the purpose of removing the passages mentioned in the NT. However, Christ was born under Augustus, and suffered and ascended into heaven under Tiberius, after which 213 years passed before Decius. Under him lived Origen, who has named all the heretics, though not Mani, who consequently must have lived later than him. Why did it take such a long time before anyone was sent out who could cleanse Christ's words from the intermingling of evil, and how was such intermingling at all possible? (IV.12). On the other hand, when Mani claims that the words of Christ have been polluted with wicked additions, one must ask why Christ waited so long to intervene, right up until Mani arrived, and why he chose his disciples in vain and why he promised them the Holy Spirit after his ascension in vain. If Mani really was the Paraclete, Christ must also have been lying when he said that it was the Holy Spirit who would be the Paraclete (cf. Jn. 14.26; 15.26; 16.7). But how, without the Holy Spirit, have Christ's disciples been able to convert so large a part of the world, which was otherwise in thrall to idolatry and immorality? It is clear, however, that it must have been none other than the Holy Spirit which enabled such simple people to perform miracles, to do battle with evil spirits and to step forward and speak out with boldness to hostile assemblies (IV.13). Furthermore, in contrast to Christ the Holy Spirit did not come in either bodily or visible form (IV.14). But how should a corporeal man like Mani be this Holy Spirit? The idea that Christ had a body was infamous, say the Manichaeans; yet on the other hand they believe that the Paraclete was a man, as though salvation by Christ was not enough (IV.15). And again, if they regard Mani as an ordinary man who has been instructed through his receptivity to the true Paraclete, then Mani cannot himself be the Paraclete, and we must also ask what was it for a spirit that Mani actually received? Why does Mani's teaching differ on nearly every point from what Jesus' apostles taught, if they received the same Holy Spirit? Mani has obviously received an unclean spirit, as can clearly be seen from his teaching about the principle of evil, blasphemies against the Creation and Providence and his denial of Christ's corporeality. Mani, however, pretends to be sent out by the Christ who performed miracles and founded churches (IV.16).

Mani thus has his teaching from Satan and the evil spirits, but God allows his activity in order to test the believers in accordance with passages like Mt. 13.25.30; 1 Cor. 11.19; Tit. 3.10–11. Mani is a liar who has collected together all kinds of bad teaching from others (IV.17), but who himself claims that as the Paraclete he brings a revelation that is not from human beings, and that he is the coming completeness that is spoken of in 1 Cor. 13.9. However, none of Mani's fables originates with himself; he merely gathered the evil things that were scattered among others (IV.18). The teaching of the two opposite principles, for instance, comes from the Persians, and the concept of 'matter' is from Aristotle, where, though, it means something quite different. Mani is thus both a thief and a forger. The doctrine of the transmigration of souls is from Plato, and it is common for both barbarians and pagan Greeks to call the sun 'God' and to believe in fate and horoscopes (IV.19). Mani ought to admit his thefts, but he is just an ungrateful disciple of the Greeks and barbarians and full of lies (IV.20). Titus does not exclude the possibility that errant teaching can contain certain elements of truth without however being a help to piety, but Mani's teaching contains only lies. Mani has gathered up the lies of others, but also seems to have invented new things. Like the pagans Mani worships many gods, the only difference being that he gives them barbarian names (IV.21).

Titus goes on to state that Mani rejected the gospel's references to Christ's physical birth (a problem dealt with in IV.22–39). This accords with the fact that Mani did not regard the body as God's work, a subject that Titus has already treated and to which he will return (cf. IV.27ff.). In addition Mani asked the question, how could it be a true prophecy that Christ would be of David's seed? For Joseph was not Jesus's father, since Mary was a virgin. It was Joseph nevertheless who was descended from David, not Mary. This was a question also raised by the Jews (IV.22). Titus's provisional answer makes a point among others of showing that it is the same prophet who has predicted the virgin birth (Isa. 7.14) and Christ's descent from David (Isa. 11.1), and he also discusses Mary's ancestry (IV.23). Titus then emphasises that the bodily descent from David took place symbolically through Joseph's engagement to Mary, which confirmed the truth of the prophecy, while the conception in truth and in reality was through the Holy Spirit. Moreover it was not for the sake of noble blood that the symbolic descent from David was important, but in order to express the fact that just as the family line came to an end, so did the corporeal kingdom (IV.24). The purpose of Joseph being of the tribe of Judah and Mary of the tribe of Levi was also to demonstrate that kingship and priesthood were united as spiritualised in Christ. This too was the prophesy of David, who furthermore spoke of Christ's incorporeal generation from the Father, as well as his suffering, resurrection and coming again as judge (IV.25). Titus states that his presentation is somewhat broad, and he names Jews, Manichaeans and heretics among his opponents (IV.26).

The Manichaeans put the blame for sin on the body, even though it is only an instrument for the responsible part, namely the soul. However, as an instrument the body also participates in the virtuous deeds of the soul (IV.27). Because the Manichaeans find fault with the body and say that Christ did not assume a body, Titus wishes to devote some attention to the subject. Through the incarnation Christ has assumed His own Creation. The body is not evil, but can be the soul's assistant in virtuous action (IV.28). If Mani's principle of evil had existed, it would not have been able to create an instrument like the body, since according to Mani this evil principle is without reason (IV.29).

Christ assumed a body, because salvation required that he resembled us, while the virgin birth was to show that it was God who became man (IV.30). Thus, the Creator did not come to something unclean, and Mary was particularly suitable for Him since she was sanctified to a special degree (IV.31). The virgin birth was supernatural, but nothing is impossible for the Creator (IV.32).

According to Titus, Mani claimed like previous heretics that the Saviour's revelation was merely illusionary and apparent, and that is why he removed all the references to Jesus's true body in the gospels. In consequence the Scriptures contained large lacunae and gaps between the individual passages, but Mani then connected these passages to each other, even though they were far apart. Titus adduces that Jesus really was circumcised on the eighth day (apparently this story was struck out by Mani), in order that the shepherd himself could belong with the sheep and fulfil the prophecy (IV.33). The reality of the incarnation is testified to in both Jn. 1.14 and at other points in the same gospel, in particular at the wedding in Cana (IV.34). But if a Manichaean were to say that the evangelist has written Jn. 1.14 and similar passages excised by Mani while he participated in matter, or were to claim that the fact that Jesus was seen by and associated with people perhaps does not mean that the body was real—like the angels who dined with Abraham (cf. Gen. 18)—Titus would answer that if that were the case, then Jesus was an impostor, but that at least the turning of water into wine must have been a reality, and that must then be true of the other things (IV.35). If on the other hand the Manichaean was to say that in these passages John has lied on purpose, one would be unable to give credence to anything else that he wrote; another possibility, however, is that they attribute the evangelist's lie to the influence of matter, thereby acquitting the evangelist himself. Titus now cites passages from Jn. that assume Jesus's real body, also after the resurrection, and he considers it totally improbable that the evangelist's statement on the crucifixion should be illusory or mendacious (IV.36).

Also Lk. 24.37–39 testifies to the reality of Jesus's body; Titus again refutes the possibility of a lie or of the influence of matter (IV.37). Since the influence of matter can be excluded, there are only two options left: the evangelists are either lying or telling the truth that Jesus did indeed have a body (IV.38).

The Saviour not only instructed souls but also healed bodies, which he would not have done if they originated from the evil one. In other words, the bodies were Christ's creatures; he even gave the body back to Lazarus. It would not have been a special miracle if Christ had only promised life to those souls that are immortal by nature and not to the mortal bodies, and the body, which like the soul has also toiled for virtue, deserves just such a reward (IV.39).

In repeating many of the themes from Books I and II in a series of chapters (IV.40–43) Titus asks how Jesus's promise of peace (Jn. 14.27) can be consistent with Mani's fable of God, who can never find any peace from being attacked by matter (IV.40). In addition to adopting the pagans' worship of evil spirits as gods, Mani goes much further than them by asserting his principle of eternal evil which even forced God to create a world for which there is no need; Mani's God is weak. The body is not even created by God, but by the archons of matter (IV.41). Mani mocks the entire Creation and considers man's fear of God's rule futile (IV.42). Titus is astonished at the madness and blasphemy of Mani, who vilifies the Creation while enjoying its benefits. Mani does not acknowledge the difference between things and an ethical being like man; he introduces coercion and banishes the hope of conversion, and that is why he becomes the friend of young people who want permission to sin. In appearance the Manichaeans resemble ascetics or philosophers, but that is simply hypocrisy, a cover for magic and secret felonies (IV.43).

Indeed one ought to hate Mani even more than has been so far intimated for his destruction of the gospel. Mani rejects the reality of Christ's body, and denies that the Word can influence matter. He restricts the Saviour's words to just a few, but spins on endlessly with his own chatter in long hymns and epistles; there is no reason to say any more about his empty words and seductive arts (IV.44). However, Titus wishes to give a few examples of how Mani misuses different passages in the NT (the first examples he presents are concerned with dualism [IV.45–49]). Thus, Mani quoted the opening of Mt. 6.24 ("No man can serve two masters") and interpreted this to mean the two principles, but he kept quiet about the sequel, "You cannot serve both God and mammon". If the opening words really do refer to two principles, it would not be true, for then one would have to serve them of necessity. The meaning, however, is precisely that it is possible to rid oneself of avarice, which is a passion of the mind. Titus cites other examples of how one can figuratively phrase it so that it is the passions that govern (IV.45). Mani struck out verses such as Jn. 1.3 and 1 Cor. 8.6, which show that there is only one principle, whereas he used a verse such as Mt. 6.24 in complete contravention of its meaning, which has to do with ethics, not God (IV.46). Mani similarly quoted Lk. 6.43–45 on the two trees and interpreted the verses as references to the two principles. However, the sequel (Lk. 6.45) shows that Jesus was not speaking of the two principles but about ethics (IV.47). For instructive purposes Jesus used unfree things from nature such as the two trees in order to speak about the freedom of the will (IV.48). The difference between necessity of nature and freedom is expressed by Jesus saying on the one hand good trees cannot bring forth bad fruit, nor bad trees good fruit, but on the other hand, despite His assertion that the evil person produces evil deeds, He does not say that such a person cannot also do good. Conversion is possible, as the Baptist's words also demonstrate (cf. Mt. 3.10; Lk. 3.9); the Baptist's threat of punishment contains an appeal and assumes that man sins freely and not out of the necessity of nature (IV.49).

Mani vilified the Creation and called it evil, invoking the passages on hatred of the world in Jn. 15.18–19; 17.14 (IV.50). But Christ does not call created things "the world". Created things did not hate Christ; in the gospels they actually serve and obey him. "The world" that hated Christ means rather its inhabitants, mankind (IV.51). This is also clear from Jn. 15.20 (IV.52), as well as from Jn. 7.7, where Jesus does not say that the world is evil but only that its deeds are evil, which is because conversion is possible. It is also clear that Christ loved those who hated Him, and that He came to save and convert them. The correctness of Titus's interpretation is to be seen from the way Jn. 17.14 is followed by 17.15 (IV.53). Christ wanted His disciples to remain in the world in order to convert their persecutors. The persecutors were to be changed voluntarily, but their nature was not to change, since it was not evil (IV.54). Not only in the gospel but already from the first Christ spoke in this way about humanity (Gen. 6.3.5) (IV.55). Titus has previously explained that man is of necessity created with the possibility for sinning, and that the choice of sin is easy, whereas the virtuous deed is difficult (cf. III.10–29), but Titus now wishes to add that mankind is not worthy of the benefits that he hopes and expects. There is nevertheless a reason as to who receives them, in that God gives much for a small effort in order that man does not censure God for giving without distinction; moreover God's gifts would not be of value to man if they were received by accident, without reason. It is not our own but God's merit that we who did not exist came into being, but since we do exist, it is up to us to acquire virtue through reason. Man could not have been created differently (IV.56).

The Manichaeans, however, demand from the Catholics an explanation of Satan, which Titus is therefore also willing to provide (IV.57–85). The Manichaeans claim Jn. 12.31, among others, as proof that the prince of this world is another than God; Titus will now present the true understanding of this verse (IV.57). The reference to the prince of this world may either be to a prince of the other created things or to one who is only a prince of humanity. But since all created things have their immutable position within God's order and can only move by virtue of the Creator's decree (IV.58), the reference can only be to a prince of mankind, and Titus has already in fact explained the meaning of the term "the world" (cf. IV.51–55). On the other hand, certain passages such as Jn. 17.15 and 12.31 state that "the prince of this world" has no power from the necessity of nature; he is indeed to be "cast out", and this is to happen through the sin of the world being taken away (cf. Jn. 1.29). Evil, then, is sin, not nature, and the prince will be cast out by the cessation of his power when the idolatry of evil spirits is destroyed and judgement is held over sin (IV.59). The conversion of all Romans and barbarians demonstrates that the Devil has lost his power. The fact that this conversion had its origin among a few uneducated fishermen proves that the power of the Devil cannot be a necessity of nature; otherwise he would not be driven out by such a little force.

Evil is the sickness of reason and not of nature, and the Devil also therefore uses precisely reason when he dupes man into sinning. It is thus clear that the Devil acts out of knowledge of both good and evil and appears to be motivated by envy (IV.60). That is, the Devil seduced man because he envied him his ability to be virtuous, since he knew that virtue is better than vice. In consequence, the Devil was evil by virtue of his intention, not because of his nature (IV.61). The Devil, who is thus evil on purpose, can only lure man into sin, he cannot force him, for God has not allowed him to (IV.62). The Devil's nature is thus good, and he is a created being, as can be seen from Jesus's comparison of him with a flash of lightning (cf. Lk. 10.18), or—even more clearly—from the entire portrayal in Job 1 (IV.63). The demons' words to Jesus (cf. Mt. 8.29; Mk. 1.24; Lk. 4.34) also prove that they were gifted with reason and knew the good one; moreover, the fact that it was possible to drive them away shows that they were subject to the dominion of God and not to an independent principle (IV.64). As for Satan himself, the temptation narrative (Mt. 4.1–11) proves the same thing (IV.65). Satan's name, δίαβολος, does not refer to his nature but to his deed, namely that he dares to slander man before God.

The Devil's purpose is evil, but he can do nothing without the permission of God, who without the Devil's will allows him to serve His will by testing rational man. For man has need of an opponent for there to be a battle and a victory for virtue (IV.66). Thus, it was inappropriate for God Himself to make tyrants persecute Christians, but God allows the Devil of his own free will to incite them to persecution, so that the believers can be crowned as confessors and martyrs. How could the whole world have gained salvation if the Devil had not aroused the envy of the Jews against our Lord, who gave Himself up to them? The Devil deserves no credit for his deeds, however, since his purpose is evil, and yet in a wonderful way God uses it in the service of great matters (IV.67). From the very first God could have stopped the Devil, but He leaves him alone and he comes to serve God's plans (IV.68). If one is to object that on the contrary the Devil is victorious over a large number of people, Titus will answer that sin is man's own responsibility, as can also be seen from the many inexperienced souls choosing evil without the Devil's assistance (IV.69). The reason why God also allows the pious either to be tempted by the Devil or by their own nature is because with His foreknowledge He knows that they will win the struggle admirably, but as for the large number who fall, we must entrust the matter to God and His judgement (IV.70). The righteous, however, must have the opportunity to demonstrate their righteousness in practice and to exercise themselves (IV.71).

While the righteous are winning renown through their victory over the Devil, he on the other hand is already being punished through this disgrace (IV.72). The Devil is mocked by God's forbearance, which does not remove him from the scene but allows him to be where he is, so that he can constantly suffer defeat until the final judgement (IV.73).

The Devil's rebellion and fall was not due to corporeal desire, since he is incorporeal, but rather to pride. This pride continues to reveal itself in the Devil's endeavour to be worshipped as God, for instance before the Saviour's face (Mt. 4.9) or before confessors and martyrs, and Mani shows himself as the Devil's disciple by being seized with a similar pride against Christ to that which seized the Devil against God (IV.74). So the Devil fell, and was deprived of the intelligible nourishment which otherwise falls to the share of all spiritual beings, and that is why he envies man his goodness and cognition of God and tries to cause him to fall—voluntarily and through his bodily passions. The expression "prince of this world" is used because it makes sense from the viewpoint of the fallen beings, but in reality the Devil has no other power than that which God permits. In order to test the pious, God allows the Devil to attempt to be equal to Him, for example through Mani and the other heretics who abuse the name of Christ (IV.75).

Since the Devil has seen how Christ has defeated him by His coming in the flesh, he will also, as the Bible predicts, in the final count attempt to achieve a similar worship from man; this attempt will fail, and then Christ will come and punish him. For the present, however the Devil is seducing whoever he can in order to become their accuser later (IV.76). However, God does not allow him to force or test those who are truly weak either too hard or too soon. So those who fall do not do so because they were tempted beyond their powers, and those who prevail should not boast, for God determined the magnitude of the temptation (IV.77). Christ Himself provided the pattern for how to resist the Devil's temptation, and when He finally commanded him to depart (cf. Mt. 4.10), He demonstrated who held sway, and that the Devil is not an independent principle (IV.78).

In their uncertainty, however, the Manichaeans ask who can have placed evil in the mind of Satan (IV.79). Titus answers by pointing out that all rational beings in their nature have a love of honour, the purpose of which is to drive them to toil for virtue, even though in their inexperience some rush headlong towards honour, losing their humility and becoming wicked in the process (IV.80), so that instead of honour they achieve the opposite in accordance with Jesus's words in Mt. 23.12 (IV.81). In similar fashion the Devil abused his natural self-esteem and exalted himself, and that is something he did not learn from others (IV.82). By nature all rational beings know virtue and vice, and indeed all ethical opposites, and they are in addition gifted with free choice, for only in that way is virtue a victory (IV.83). So the Devil fell through his own pride, but his nature was not changed. For his nature is beautiful, yet neither good nor bad, and this is true in general of the whole substance of Creation. Goodness comes subsequently through the choice of reason. Only God is substantially and immutably good, as the Saviour also testifies to (cf. Mt. 19.17 parr.), but the Saviour, who is from the Father, is also good, as well as the Holy Spirit. All others, however, are good by virtue of their rational will and not by nature (IV.84).

In conclusion Titus states that he has now as requested sought to give an account of the Devil and to show that he is not evil by nature or an eternal principle and to explain why God is leaving him alone until the last times. The account may also be of benefit to Catholics who are unsure on this point (IV.85).

Titus now wishes to mention all the quotations from Paul that Mani invoked and to refute his interpretation of them, which he does in IV.86–109. He therefore quotes Mani's claim to be "the perfection", in 1 Cor. 13.9–10, so that "the partial" can at last be repaired and cleansed, but Titus rejects this interpretation: complete knowledge is an eschatological gift that is not available in this life (IV.86). Claiming 1 Cor. 9.22 as a justification for the right to sacrifice during persecution contravenes the entire concern of Christ (IV.87). What Paul is referring to in 1 Cor. 9.22 was rather the fact that he was seeking to convince the Jews with the help of proof from the Law, but to convince the pagans with the aid of quotations from pagan poets (cf. Acts 17.28; Tit. 1.12). But if Paul had sacrificed while he was being persecuted, all sides would have lost confidence in him, and he would never have been beheaded by Nero or become the jewel and seal of the city of Rome (IV.88). The Manichaeans also invoke Mt. 20.16 and claim to be "the chosen" (the Elect), but already before the election in truth at Christ's second coming the Manichaeans are outside the faith (IV.89).

Titus goes on to interpret some central passages in Rom. (IV.90–95). The Manichaeans cite Rom. 7.23—the law of the bodily members and of sin contra the law of the mind—as evidence that there is a conflict and opposition in man that stems from the "mixture" of good and evil. In his refutation Titus takes as his starting-point the fact that just prior to the passage (Rom. 7.22)—and in conflict with the Manichaean view—Paul has acknowledged the law as being God's. But if the laws of God and of matter are placed on an equal footing, then the good one ought not to have begun a battle against the evil one, since that battle could never be ended. If matter, as the Manichaeans claim, is without reason, then it could not have laid down a law either. The insane Manichaeans will never manage to understand the Scriptures (IV.90). Paul, however, was writing to the Jews who were contending for the Law in order to nullify the faith, and his purpose was to shame them and raise them up to the faith, which is better than the Law. The Law was given to the Jews, because they had no faith; of its own accord faith manages that which pleases God, and it has not learned this from outside. Faith in God is the knowledge that is acquired through the visible Creation and the natural concepts, and which is linked to affection and love of God (IV.91). But the Jews had no room for the inner faith, because they were buried in voluntary sin and therefore had to learn those things from the outside which the believers know from, and within, themselves. Since the commandments on cognition of God and virtue did not mediate love of God, they became idle and the Jews again became sinners (IV.92).

If one asks how the Law is of profit when it does not convert a man from evil, Titus answers that the Law has a preparatory value in revealing hidden sins; only when sins are acknowledged as sins, can steps be taken against them. Sinful habits had hidden knowledge and mind from view completely, but these were awakened by the Law, so that now we can distinguish between virtue and vice. That is why Paul says that the Law came in order to increase sin (cf. Rom. 5.20), which must be understood to mean that hidden sin was revealed. God's grace, however, abounded all the more (cf. Rom. 5.20), but if the Law had not come first, grace would not have made sense, and herein lies the advantage of the Law.

So when Paul speaks to the Jews in Rom. 7, he is playing the role of a man who knows right from wrong through the external law, but who is imprisoned in sinful habits, and he speaks in the first person, but not of himself. Titus now lays out an interpretation of Rom. 7.14–17, in which he emphasises that “the sin that dwells within me” (cf. Rom. 7.17) refers to the sinful habit that is fixed in the person and which cannot be defeated by external commandments of the law but only from within through a good passion that will increase by faith and banish the sinful habit from its habitation (IV.93). The “inner man” who delights in God’s Law (cf. Rom. 7.22) refers to mind, which accepts what the Law has taught it concerning virtue and vice, but which continues to be in thrall to the habit of sin because it is without faith, as Paul phrases it by speaking of another law in the bodily members which is at war with the law of the mind (cf. Rom. 7.23). The sinful action takes place through the limbs, and although it does not act by necessity, it is, like a long-standing habit, not different from necessity. The apostle wishes to shame the Jews, however, so that they can move forward to the faith of the gospel, but he asks who will set man free from “the body of death” (cf. Rom. 7.24), which refers to death of condemnation, not ordinary death. Nor is it a question of the apostle being against the natural, created body and wishing to live on this earth without a body, which is impossible, but he wishes to be released from the sinful habit which takes hold through the aid of the body. Release is possible, because the sinful habit is not natural but finds its power through the evil choice, and release takes place through God’s grace removing the evil and allowing man to become his own lawgiver. There is no longer a need to hear the external law (IV.94). This law of the spirit of life that has released man from the law of sin and death (cf. Rom. 8.2) does not refer to the law that was sent inside man by being heard, but to a law that with the aid of faith has taken up residence in the heart, as was also predicted in Jer. 31.33. However, the “law of sin and death” (cf. Rom. 8.2) is different from the Law of God (cf. Rom. 7.22), but the same as the law of sin in the members (cf. Rom. 7.23), namely, the sinful habit that resembles a law. On the other hand, the verse on the impotency of the Law (cf. Rom. 8.3) refers to the whole passage and deals with the fact that the Law could not change the incitements of the body or add anything extra to man. When the apostle says that God sent His Son “in the likeness of sinful flesh”, it is in order to specify that this flesh is without sin. Through his association with us, however, Christ killed our bodily passions by means of faith. We are gradually to move away from the Law and towards faith, for when we love God, we have no need of laws (IV.95).

Mani’s allegorical interpretations produce patent aberrations, and if Titus were to expound on all the passages that the Manichaeans adduce as evidence for their doctrines, yet another book would be required. Instead he will settle for refuting a couple of examples (IV.96). For instance, the Manichaeans use 1 Cor. 15.50 to deny the resurrection of the dead and on this basis reject the entire context in which the apostle presents this doctrine (IV.97). To underline what was the apostle's concern, Titus now emphasises various passages from 1 Cor. 15 (IV.98). The meaning of 1 Cor. 15.50, however, is that the resurrected body will no longer contain bodily passions and diseases, nor will it require bodily nourishment, but will harmonise completely with the soul in the worship of God. We know, for example, from the heavenly bodies that bodies do not have to be made of flesh, and the fact that a change takes place we learn from 1 Cor. 15.51 (IV.99). The soul receives back its instrument (i.e. the body), which laboured with it but which is now in its altered state, no longer earthlike and full of fleshly desires which were originally required to render the battle for virtue possible (IV.100). The Manichaeans deny the resurrection with the help of words that are to do with the resurrection. By denying the resurrection of the body the Manichaeans either attribute weakness to God, which fits in completely with their fable that everywhere makes evil greater than God, or to injustice, because the body that took part in the struggle for virtue will not be rewarded for its victory (IV.101).

Paul cannot be credited with a doctrine concerning an eternal, hostile principle that acts with necessity; otherwise he would not, as in Eph. 2.1–2, censure his readers by speaking of them as previously being dead through trespasses and sins. In this passage Paul again assumes that they have converted voluntarily. But if this is to be believed, then Paul's teaching must already have been perfect, even though he wrote long before even the birth of Mani's grandparents (cf. IV.86). "The ruler of the power of the air" (cf. Eph. 2.2) refers to the Devil and seeks to express that he has mastery neither above nor below. The Devil sins of his own free will, and he is only our master if we ourselves allow him to be so (IV.102). If instead Paul had meant that the Devil was the ruler of all worlds, he would have said so; however, he makes it crystal clear that the Devil was evil of his own free will (IV.103). Titus demonstrates that Eph. 2.2–3 must refer to voluntary sins and does not contain an accusation against the body or against an eternal matter, as may also be seen from the expression "children of wrath", which can also be illustrated by Eph. 5.6–8. If evil here should be 'darkness' (Eph. 5.8), how can it also be 'air' (Eph. 2.2)? But with such expressions the Scriptures describe only the rational beings' qualities (IV.104). When Paul says that they were previously darkness (cf. Eph. 5.8), he is not referring to their substantial nature but to something linked to their free will (IV.105). The Manichaeans also invoke Eph. 6.12; here, though, it is clear that the Devil does not work with flesh and blood, but with cunning. The Devil seeks to outwit us because he is envious of us, which cannot, however, be reconciled with the Manichaean doctrine of the evil one who is outside reason (IV.106). In Eph. 6.11 Paul makes it clear that the Devil's wiles can only be defeated with the aid of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which are faith and devoutness, and he then lists who the Christians are to fight against (Eph. 6.12) (IV.107). Titus elaborates on the details of Eph. 6.12; thus "this darkness" refers to ignorance about God—for their doctrine of an eternal principle the Manichaeans cannot, according to Titus, invoke the designation "the god of this world" (2 Cor. 4.4) or such-like expressions; they are to be understood just as figuratively as when Paul says "the belly is their God" (Phil. 3.19) (IV.108).

Titus concludes by saying that just as he has now construed certain passages of the apostle in accordance with his intention, so can others do the same with the rest (IV.109). In the gospels and the epistles of the apostles one cannot actually find anything that is in concordance with Manichaean teaching, but only clear statements about the one and single God, the righteous and good dispensation and the judgement. The expressions "matter" or "the evil, opposite principle" do not even appear (IV.110).

The Manichaeans cannot cite Gen. 1.2 as proof that the earth is without beginning for immediately before, the Scripture states that God had created the earth. Mani avoids the entire OT because there we clearly find the doctrine of God's monarchy and only a little about the Devil's opposition, and from the NT he can only retain a modicum in support of his teaching. But with foreknowledge the Scripture has already warned against Mani (Titus refers to Mt. 13.25; Tit. 3.10–11) (IV.111). Titus has no hope of being able to convert those who are completely captured by Manichaeism, but he does hope to be able to immunise those who are stronger and more vigilant against it. Above all one should avoid those who worship idols, as Paul has already cautioned in 1 Tim. 4.1–5 (IV.112). Titus underlines how exactly this passage by Paul fits the Manichaeans (IV.113).

Christ, who has promised that the Church will be spread throughout the world, gave the promise that the gates of Hades should not prevail against it (cf. Mt. 16.18); this expression refers to all the means whereby the Christians are to enter the gates to martyrdom, such as by the sword, fire, water etc. Where the gates to martyrdom and confession are, there the Church of Christ is also manifest, but those who believe that martyrdom is superfluous are foreign to Christ and His Church (IV.114). A further characteristic of the true Church's position is that it is the Son of Man to whom one confesses as Christ, which implies the incarnation; Mani on the other hand teaches that Christ is the fifth element, and that from time to time the good one has constantly sent out others than Christ (IV.115). So the Church of Christ is not with those who do not confess that the only Christ is He whom the OT predicted would come in the flesh (IV.116).

CHAPTER THREE

RECEPTIONS, EDITIONS AND SCHOLARSHIP HISTORY OF CONTRA MANICHAEOS

1. Knowledge of Titus in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages

There is a considerable difference between on the one hand identifying one's own position and those of the past when using Contra Manichaeos to attack "the Manichaeans" and on the other hand making the work an object for analysis and interpretation. Since the Catholic and Orthodox Churches continued to be confronted with what they regarded as "Manichaeism", Contra Manichaeos was used for the first purpose far into early modern times. In the Roman Catholic world, however, there was no access to Contra Manichaeos in the Middle Ages; its author was only known through Jerome's mention of him, whereas the work was in use in both the Greek Orthodox and the Syrian Churches.

It is still not possible at present to draw a clear picture of Titus's importance for posterity.¹ The fact that he was not completely unknown is apparent from the material that follows in this chapter. Several writers from his immediate posterity name Titus; Jerome mentions him twice very commendably,² and Sozomen, Historia ecclesiastica III.14,42 (written between 439 and 450) ranks him alongside Eusebius of Emesa, Serapion of Thmuis and a number of others as the most outstanding writer of the 4th century.³ We must assume, however, that Titus's particular significance was for the later anti-Manichaeism.

¹ A separate case which will not be dealt with here is the further importance that Titus's other authorship has had (see below pp. 128–29 on this): see Sickenberger 1901, 118–30 on the use of Titus's Hom. in Luc. in later gospel commentaries. Syriac excerpts from Titus's Hom. in Luc. (cf. British Museum, Add. 17,191, Wright 1871, 1010b, No. 23 [Wright 1871, 1008b–1015b (DCCCLXIV)]) suggest that this work too was translated into Syriac (Baumstark 1922, 60).

² See below p. 126 and p. 256.

³ Bidez 1960a, 125; cf. Sickenberger 1901, 5–6. See also below p. 123 with regard to Sozomen's mention of the Julian-episode.

G.G. Stroumsa and S. Stroumsa regard Titus's Contra Manichaeos as by far the most important Christian anti-Manichaean work in Greek, and they assert—without direct documentation, though it is a priori probable—that its arguments were taken up time and again by later Christian heresiographers, a claim supported by other writers.⁴ A closer examination of whether this assertion has anything of substance in it would be of interest; so far there have been only a few studies and in this context I can furthermore point to the possibility of other influences from Titus on later writers which could be examined. It has been proved, for instance, that Epiphanius, who wrote shortly after Titus, already uses him as a source in his refutation of Manichaeism.⁵ Theodoret of Cyrus mentions Titus explicitly several times in his Haereticarum fabularum compendium,⁶ and it is therefore possible that he has drawn on him in his presentation of Manichaeism. Around 500 Bishop Heraclianus of Chalcedon mentions him in his own, lost work against Manichaeism, as can be seen from Photius's Bibliotheca, cod. 85; the same work by Photius also testifies, in cod. 232, that Stephanus Gobarus (after 560) quoted Titus and also claimed that Titus was positive towards Origen.⁷ Later John of Damascus (c. 750 or 780) employs Titus quotations in his Sacra Parallela; since John was also acquainted with Titus, it would conceivably be a fruitful project to search for the influence of Titus on the great theologian.⁸

I. Hadot demonstrated several similarities between the anti-Manichaean polemic in Titus and the Neo-Platonic philosopher Sim-

⁴ Stroumsa and Stroumsa 1988, 43; Casey 1937, 1589; Klein 1991, 42.

⁵ Epiphanius himself states in Haer. 66.21,3 that great men have already rebuffed Manichaeism with admirable counter-attacks, after which he mentions a number of writers, the last being Titus (Holl 1933, 49.3). Cumont has proved that in his chapter on the Manichaeans Epiphanius actually used Titus as a source (Cumont and Kugener 1912, 157–59; cf. Alfarić 1919, 17, 25. Cf. also the notes in Holl 1933, 13–132 and Williams 1994, 219–308).

⁶ See also below pp. 137–38.

⁷ See below pp. 114–15 and pp. 138–40 and pp. 178–79.

⁸ Here it would be natural to examine primarily John of Damascus's Dial. contra Manich. from the first half of the 8th century (ed.: Kotter 1981, 333–98; cf. Klein 1991, 24–26). Hildebrand Beck (1937, 183 n. 8) states that John of Damascus's anti-Manichaean arguments "lassen sich wohl kaum in aller Form bei einem der älteren Kirchenväter nachweisen. Am meisten Ähnlichkeit haben sie noch mit den Gedankengängen des Titos von Bostra" (referring to Titus's Contra Manich. I.6ff.; I.13).—Kotter 1981, 344 names only Titus among a whole series of other anti-Manichaean texts as a source for John of Damascus. Klein 1991, 26 states that all previous anti-Manichaean texts must be regarded as possible sources for John's Dial. Contra Manich. See below pp. 115–16 on Sacr. Par. quotations.

plicius (c. 530), respectively, but would nevertheless not assume that Simplicius was dependent on Titus.⁹ On the basis of Hadot's work, however, S.N.C. Lieu appears to believe that this was the case,¹⁰ which, if it is so, is of great interest for the history of ideas to show that it was not only Christian writers of Late Antiquity who were influenced by the Platonists, but that the opposite was also now and again the case.

Photius himself also mentions Titus together with Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, Serapion, Alexander of Lycopolis and Heraclianus in his anti-Manichaean work (871–72), which was directed at the Paulicians (Narratio de Manichaeis recens repullulantibus).¹¹ We have thus reached the point that the reason why so many anti-Manichaean works, including Titus's Contra Manichaeos, are preserved is presumably to be found in the fact that for later churchmen they served as an arsenal of arguments against heresies such as the Paulicians and the Bogomils.¹² In this context it must be noted that the two Greek Titus codices from the Middle Ages contain other anti-Manichaean works besides that by Titus.¹³

Posterity thus regarded Titus as an orthodox authority; indeed, Sickenberger actually states that the manuscript titles and the lemmata in the catenae often describe him as holy, but that other traces of a Titus of Bostra cult are lacking.¹⁴

Outside the Greek-language Church Titus's Contra Manichaeos has been of importance to the Syrian Churches. Contra Manichaeos was translated into Syriac almost in Titus's own lifetime and there are also a number of Titus quotations in Syriac manuscripts.¹⁵ Finally, Contra Manichaeos is mentioned in the Syriac writer Abdišo's Catalogus librorum omnium ecclesiasticorum.¹⁶

⁹ Hadot 1969, 35, 41–46, 55–56. Cf. more distantly Hadot 1972.

¹⁰ Lieu 1994, 159, 192.

¹¹ Photius, De Manich. rec. rep. 37 (Astruc, Conus-Wolska, Gouillard, Lemerle, Papachryssanthou, and Paramelle 1970, 131.19–29); cf. Sickenberger 1901, 9.—For the dating of Photius's De Manich. rec. rep. see Lemerle 1973, 39–40.

¹² Cf. Lieu 1994, 159.

¹³ I.e. the codexes G and V; see below pp. 109–12. Among G's 14 texts are 3 anti-Manichaean (Ehrhard 1893, 205;—Ehrhard 1893, 204 also writes of G: “Die Quaternionen sind eigenthümlicherweise armenisch numerirt. Die orientalische Heimath des Codex, die sich auch im übrigen erkennen lässt, wird dadurch bestätigt”, cf. Brinkmann 1894, 490–91). V contains among its many texts no fewer than 8 that are anti-Manichaean (Eustratiades and Arcadios 1924, 52–53).

¹⁴ Sickenberger 1901, 9.

¹⁵ Cf. below pp. 112–13, 116.

¹⁶ Abdišo's Catal. XXIX (Assemani 1725, 41.2; translated by Badger 1852, 366).

2. Reception of and scholarship on Contra Manichaeos from the end of the 16th century to De Lagarde's editions of the text in 1859

In the turmoil of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation it was almost inevitable that the Catholic tradition for branding heresies as “Manichaean” would be revived. Now it was Luther and Calvin who were Manichaeans, and the ancient heresiology was dug out to prove the claim, while the Protestants defended themselves by among other things attacking the Manichaeism of the past through historical studies.¹⁷ It was precisely in the context of this Counter-Reformation strategy that Contra Manichaeos became available to Western European scholars. The Spanish Jesuit Francisco Torres (Latinised “Franciscus Turrianus”, c. 1504–84) produced translations of Greek heresiology in Latin, among them those parts of Titus of Bostra’s Contra Manichaeos that were available to him (i.e. Book I–II, as well as the beginning of Book III). After his death they were published in Ingolstadt, also with a Counter-Reformation purpose, as was the case too with the Contra Manichaeos translation first printed in 1604 by Heinrich Canisius and reprinted many times since.¹⁸

However, it turned out that it was unsure whether Greek heresiology always contained a confirmation of Roman Catholic dogmatics. Barely 100 years after the first two books of Contra Manichaeos had become generally available through Torres’s translation, the question was raised by Louis Ellies du Pin in the second volume of his major work, Nouvelle bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques, as to whether Titus had been an adherent to the doctrine of original sin. Du Pin possessed a genuinely historical understanding that the Church writers were to be seen in the context of their time, and he realised that Church dogmas could be unknown to the older Church writers, because they had not been taught until a later epoch. Regarding Titus of Bostra’s Contra Manichaeos he noted:

¹⁷ See further in Ries 1988, 17ff.

¹⁸ See Petitmengin 1988, 128–36 on Torres’s person and work with further references to the Titus translation; and Petitmengin 1988, 135, 153, on the Titus translation; and Petitmengin 1988, 130, 133 on the context with Counter-Reformation interests. Editio princeps Canisius 1604, 31–142. Reprinted 1610 (Petitmengin 1988, 153; Petitdidier [1692, in his unpaginated “Table des éditions”, which follows the “Preface” and “Table des chapitres”] also speaks of an edition “dans la Bibliothèque des Peres, édition de Cologne de 1618”). See further below p. 110 on Torres’s translation, which also included a long interpolation that has later been proven not to be part of Titus’s work.

Il y a dans ces Livres beaucoup de Metaphysique & de Dialectique. Les raisonnemens en sont solides & subtiles. Le stile est assez net & assez pur pour un ouvrage de cette nature. Il est surprenant qu'il n'ait point eu recours au peché originel, pour expliquer toutes les difficultez des Manichéens. Il lui eût servi de solution generale à presque toutes leurs objections. Car on n'a plus de peine à comprendre, pourquoi l'homme est porté au mal, pourquoi il souffre, pourquoi il est sujet à la faim, à la douleur, aux maladies, aux miseres, à la mort, quand on a une fois admis le peché originel. Il ne s'en est toutefois point servi pour expliquer ces questions, il les a examinées en Philosophe. Il n'a point parlé de la grace de Jesus-Christ, & il semble avoir supposé que l'homme peut de lui-même faire le bien comme le mal.¹⁹

It was Du Pin's historical understanding, including in particular his observations on the weak position of the doctrine of original sin among many of the early Church fathers, which especially aroused the ire of the orthodox Benedictine, Mathieu Petitdidier, and forced him to go on the attack in Remarques sur la bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques de M. Du Pin. Here Petitdidier also dealt with Titus of Bostra,²⁰ maintaining that Du Pin in Contra Manichaeos ought to have been able to read why Titus did not avail himself of the mystery of original sin in his refutations. Petitdidier pointed out that Titus's remarks in Contra Manichaeos III.1 on the aim of the whole must mean that des quatre Livres de Tite de Bostre les deux premiers étoient destinez pour détourner les Payens des rêveries de Manichée, & les deux derniers pour en détourner les Chrétiens: Que dans les deux premiers n'ayant en vûë que des gens qui n'étoient pas instruits de nos Mysteres, & qui ne reconnoissoient pas l'autorité de l'Écriture, il avoit crû devoir se renfermer dans les bornes de la raison, sans rien emprunter de ce que la foy & l'Écriture nous enseignent: & que dans les deux derniers il s'en étoit tenu uniquement à l'autorité des Ecritures.²¹

When measured by how much of Contra Manichaeos was available at the time, Petitdidier's interpretation was doubtless just as feasible as Du Pin's. But also in relation to Du Pin's claim about the lack of teaching on grace in Contra Manichaeos Petitdidier expressed his disagreement: Titus himself pointed out in Contra Manichaeos (II.16) that man achieved virtue “with God’s assistance” (→ Ch. XI.20), and he speaks of God’s correction and education of man. Petitdidier commented:

¹⁹ Du Pin 1687, 380–81 (on Titus in general Du Pin 1687, 378–82, 967, 996).

²⁰ Petitdidier 1692, 362–77. See further in Carreyre 1935 on Du Pin and Petitdidier's controversy; their disagreement on Titus is also referred to in Sickenberger 1901, 14 n. 3 (–15); cf. also Haase 1959, 381–82. Cf. also Basnage 1725, 57 on the question of a doctrine of original sin in Titus.

²¹ Petitdidier 1692, 362–64 (quotation: 363–64).

Il est clair . . . que Tite de Bostre parle de la grace, & que quoiqu’il donne beaucoup à la liberté de l’homme, il ne laisse pas de reconnoître que pour faire le bien il a besoin du secours de Dieu. . . . Il est vrai qu’il semble . . . que cet Auteur ne mette la grace que dans ces choses purement exterieures. Mais outre que je ne prétens pas justifier sa doctrine sur la grace, & qu’il ne suffit d’avoir montré que M. du Pin s’est trompé lorsqu’il a dit, qu’il n’a point parlé de la grace: On peut répondre qu’il a crû que ces advertissemens & ces châtimens exterieurs étoient accompagnez d’un mouvement intérieur. . . .²²

Du Pin’s Jansenism presumably excludes the possibility that he had any hidden theological or ideological agenda, when he maintained that many early Church fathers only had imprecise or no ideas at all of original sin, but Petitdidier was undoubtedly right to fear that Du Pin’s observations could be used by others.²³ In the following century the rejection of the doctrine of original sin was to become a basic element in many forms of Enlightenment ideology.

At the same time tendencies towards the concept of heresy being undermined appeared in the Protestant world. Best-known is Gottfried Arnold’s Unpartheyische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie vom Anfang des Neuen Testaments biss auf das Jahr Christi 1688, which was first published in 1699–1700. A radical pietist Arnold condemned the persecutions in the confessional conflicts, denunciations and the use of ancient heretical designations by himself taking the side of mystics and enthusiasts—the inner man’s true piety that was played off against institutions, dogma and the heresy-makers. Heretics were nearly always defended—and indeed Arnold also rehabilitated the Manichaeans—at the same time as he noted with disgust how among others the Lutherans had been accused of being Manichaeans, while themselves bringing charges of Manichaeism against one another in their internal disputes. Arnold’s treatment of Manichaeism was rather summary, however, and Titus of Bostra was not mentioned.²⁴

²² Petitdidier 1692, 365–66.—In the third edition (Du Pin 1701, 499 [the second edition has not been available to me]) Du Pin seems to make an admission to Petitdidier, though not a real one, in that the last sentence in the above quotation now reads: “& il semble avoir supposé que l’homme peut de lui-même faire le bien comme le mal avec les secours exterieurs de Dieu.”

²³ In his “Preface” Petitdidier (1692, LXXXI) argues that Du Pin commits a very great injustice against the Church and he believes that Du Pin has partly given the Calvinists the opportunity to despise the Church fathers, and partly allowed the Socinians to exploit Du Pin’s admission to maintain their claim that the doctrine of original sin did not exist at all in the oldest times.

Arnold's demand for a truth-seeking "impartial" re-evaluation of the heresies and his sympathy for the Manichaeans is found again in the Reformed theologian Isaac de Beausobre's Histoire critique de Manichée et du Manichéisme from 1734–39, which with reservations is regarded as the first work of modern scholarship on Manichaeism.²⁵ As a result of the Huguenot persecutions De Beausobre had fled from France via Holland to Berlin, and his motives for writing the book were undoubtedly linked to the application of Manichaeism as a cliché in the confessional conflicts of previous centuries. He himself asserts that when he set out to examine the origins of the Reformation, he found an attempt at reformation already among the Waldenses and the Albigenses. The charges against the latter of being Manichaeans now led De Beausobre to investigate the ancient Manichaeans.²⁶ He endeavoured to acquit the Manichaeans of false accusations and considered that, whatever their errors, they had been driven by honourable motives, and therefore it was the Church fathers who were to be criticised.

De Beausobre's book represented scholarly progress, particularly through his collection and evaluation of source material which among other things shook the historicity of the information about Mani in an important anti-Manichaean text, Acta Archelai. In contrast to this text and in particular to the heresiologist Epiphanius's work, De Beausobre considered with some justification that Titus's refutation of Manichaeism bore the mark of fairness. De Beausobre stated that Titus never accused the Manichaeans of employing magic, of calling up demons or of performing disgusting ceremonies, but although this is admittedly true, he ought really to have mentioned that on other points Titus was willing to impugn the Manichaeans morally. Nevertheless De Beausobre also hit the mark when he wrote that Titus presented his opponent "comme un Philosophe, qui, persuadé que le Monde ne répond pas à l'idée, que nous avons des Perfections

²⁴ Only the edition of Arnold 1729; 1729a has been available to me. The section on the ancient Manichaeans is in Arnold 1729, 129–35 including (130) his remarks on the later use of charges of being Manichaeans.

²⁵ Cf. also De Beausobre's (1734, 239–40) remarks on Arnold; cf. Ries 1988, 36, 56 n. 88. Cf. Haase 1959, 390; Van Oort 2000a; Stroumsa 2000 on De Beausobre.

²⁶ De Beausobre 1734, III–V.

Divines, s'est mis dans l'esprit, qu'il y a un autre Principe que Dieu."²⁷ This is true even if the formulation may well be influenced by the contemporary discussion of theodicy in Bayle and Leibniz.

Finally, it must be noted that De Beausobre led subsequent scholarship astray by claiming definitively that Titus used as a source one of Mani's own works, The Book of Mysteries; this mistake was retained by many later scholars until it was corrected in 1912 by F. Cumont.²⁸

De Beausobre used only Torres's translation of Contra Manichaeos, even though the Greek original of the same parts of the work had been edited a few years previously in 1725 by another Huguenot, Jacques Basnage, who had gone into exile in the Netherlands and had also incidentally been a close friend of Pierre Bayle. Basnage's project was to present a revised edition of Canisius's work, supplementing the Latin translations with the Greek originals also in the case of Titus.²⁹ By virtue of his experience as a persecuted Protestant Basnage, like De Beausobre, was eager to clear persecuted religious communities of false allegations, and he was also in dispute with Roman Catholic theologians interested in establishing a continuity between the Reformation and the mediaeval heretics, which raised the problem of the Albigenses' "Manichaeism".³⁰

De Beausobre and Basnage remained orthodox Calvinists, but went a long way down the road in support of religious freedom, and their desire for truth in their historiography paved the way for some of the most sympathetic aspects of the Age of Enlightenment that followed. One of the greatest Church historians of that era, Johann ²⁷ De Beausobre 1734, 222–23 on Titus (quotation: 222).

²⁸ De Beausobre (1734, 221–23, 427–28) misunderstood Epiphanius, Haer. 66.13–14, who having first mentioned The Book of Mysteries and then a number of other titles of Mani's works carried a Mani-quotation (Ἦν θεός καὶ ὕλη, etc., Haer. 66.14, 1, Holl 1933, 36.3ff.) that De Beausobre referred without grounds to The Book of Mysteries. Since this same quotation is found in Titus, Contra Manich. I.6, Gr. 4.16ff., De Beausobre concluded that Titus throughout refuted The Book of Mysteries. The error is found again in Walch 1762, 720, 752; Baur 1831, 10, 461 n. 35; Flügel 1862, 355; Kessler 1889, 197–98.—Cumont (Cumont and Kugener 1912, 157ff.) pointed out firstly that Epiphanius did not refer the quotation to The Book of Mysteries, and proved secondly that Epiphanius was merely quoting Titus. Cf. also Holl 1933, 36 in the note.

²⁹ Basnage 1725, 56–162. This edition, which also contains only Contra Manich., I–II and the beginning of Book III (plus the interpolation [see below pp. 109–11], which does not come from Titus), includes Torres's translation.—See Haase 1959; Cerny 1987 on Basnage; Haase (1959, 390) and Cerny (1987, 169–72) on his edition of the Church fathers; cf. Petitmengin 1988, 134.

³⁰ See further in Cerny 1987, 206–31.

Lorenz von Mosheim (1694–1755), also devoted much attention to the heretics, but by now the question of who had constituted the “true Church” was outmoded. Heretics were not to be condemned, though they were not to be regarded as witnesses to the truth either.

It therefore comes as no surprise that Von Mosheim’s comprehensive investigation of Manichaeism³¹ was finally able to detach this area of scholarship from the clashes between Catholics and Protestants. Instead he changed the direction of the debate by deriving Manichaeism to a large extent from non-Christian oriental philosophy. Von Mosheim also emphasised Titus of Bostra’s importance as a source, and he included a good deal of Titus’s information in his own interpretation.³² Another major Church historian of the Enlightenment, Christian Wilhelm Franz Walch (1726–84), also treated Manichaeism, mentioning Titus and drawing on his work.³³

The tendency towards accentuating the non-Christian elements in Manichaeism that Von Mosheim in particular initiated grows even stronger with the key work, Das Manichäische Religionssystem nach den Quellen neu untersucht und entwickelt, by the Tübingen theologian, Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792–1860), published in 1831 and generally regarded as the second and real basis of modern scholarship on Manichaeism. Baur proposed that Buddhism and Iranian religion had been the two main sources of Mani’s inspiration.

Baur also made wide use of Titus in his presentation. With his background in German idealism Baur was better placed than later scholars to appreciate Titus and Augustine’s philosophical arguments against dualism.³⁴ Baur thus accepted that Manichaean dualism was philosophically untenable,³⁵ but he therefore had to ask how Mani could possibly have constructed such a system. Baur then drew on the distinction in German idealism between “image” and “concept”,³⁶ and his answer was broadly that although Mani’s “matter” could in ³¹ Von Mosheim 1753, 728–903. See also Baur (1831, 2–3; 1852, 118–32) on Von Mosheim and his studies of Manichaeism.

³² Von Mosheim 1753, 730–31 on Titus; scattered references in Von Mosheim 1753, 728–903.

³³ Walch 1762, 812 on Titus; scattered references in Walch 1762, 685–814. See also Baur (1831, 3; 1852, 145–151) on Walch’s work.

³⁴ A brief summary of Titus’s argument in Contra Manich. I.5–13 is found in Baur 1831, 29–33; Baur 1831, 29 (cf. 340) describes Titus and Augustine’s arguments as “scharfsinnige Einwendungen”.

³⁵ Baur 1831, 37.

³⁶ See e.g. Baur 1831, 9.

fact only have an apparent reality, Mani was indulging a propensity for “mythisch-bildlichen Versinnlichung”.³⁷ It is therefore necessary, says Baur, that one not only judges Mani’s system “als ein philosophisches System nach der logischen Strenge des Begriffs”, but that one also regards it “als ein mythisches Poem”.³⁸

Baur is possibly right in claiming that the philosophical criticism of Manichaeism by the Church fathers is not without interest in the field of philosophy. He is at any rate clearly right in stating that the Church fathers asked philosophical questions of the Manichaeans that to some extent lay outside their horizon. Whatever the case, there can be no doubt that it was Baur’s ability to think in “image” and “concept” that enabled him to draw such a significant distinction within the anti-Manichaean texts that were his sources. According to Baur these texts can be divided into two classes:

Die Schriftsteller der einen Classe geben uns das Manichäische System in einer mehr concreten Form, in einer lebendigen und reichern mythischen Gestaltung und Ausführung, während die der andern die mythische Hülle und Form mehr abstreifen, und mehr den abstracten Begriff, die logische Seite des Systems herauskehren. Mehrere Mittelglieder, die bei jenen ihre eigene Stelle im System einnehmen, fehlen bei diesen ganz, oder sie sind, beinahe kaum mehr erkennbar, in den Hintergrund zurückgetreten. Am meisten divergiren in dieser Beziehung der Verfasser der Acten und Alexander von Lycopolis, jener durch die mehr concrete, dieser durch die mehr abstracte Darstellung des Systems. In die Mitte zwischen beide fallen Augustin und Titus von Bostra, und zwar so, daß jener ebenso nahe an die Acten, als dieser an Alexander sich anschließt.³⁹

Baur’s distinction can serve as an example that speculative models may also help towards a better understanding of historical material. Widengren’s judgement is that here Baur has “eine evident richtige Scheidung der Quellen unternommen”.⁴⁰

³⁷ Baur 1831, 37–40, quotation: 39.

³⁸ Baur 1831, 39–40. Baur also believed, however, that the mythical was a poetical clothing of philosophical and religious ideas that could not be separated from the mythical (see e.g. Baur 1831, 81, 149), though this circumstance was not always clear to Mani and therefore could not really be pursued in Baur’s interpretation (see e.g. Baur 1831, 348–50, 489–90).

³⁹ Baur 1831, 8–9. Baur (1831, 9–10) thought that both ways of presentation belonged to the original Manichaean system, and also explained the difference between them based on the views of the authors in question and not on the character of their sources.

⁴⁰ Widengren 1978, 279.

Baur's view of the passage on the Paradise narrative in Contra Manichaeos III.7 (→ Ch. XI.34) is also of interest. He believed that the allegorical reading found in Acta Archelai XI.1, represents the Manichaeans' original understanding of the narrative; "Die Erklärungen der Manichäer über die Mosaische Geschichte des Falls machen es . . . sehr wahrscheinlich, daß sie ihr keine historische Wahrheit zuschrieben."⁴¹ On this basis Baur suggested that Contra Manichaeos III.7 could hypothetically either assume "die factische Realität der Mosaischen Erzählung", or the text could express a later polemical development within Manichaeism.⁴²

In the period up to and including Baur, scholarship on Manichaeism was primarily the domain of Church historians, but after him it also passes into the hands of orientalist and historians of religions, though without the theologians ever quite relinquishing it. This change is due in some degree to the tendencies in Baur's book, but also to the arrival of new sources that provided a clearer awareness that Manichaeism contained many ideas of non-Christian origin. Like Baur, therefore, the conclusion was that Manichaeism had essentially been a non-Christian movement. To some extent, however, the trend in scholarship was also linked to the intellectual and political changes of the 19th century which were to initiate university studies in the new fields of History of Religions and Comparative Religions.

One scholar who to some extent may be considered as being in the field of tension between theology and the trend towards Comparative Religions is the remarkable German orientalist Paul Anton de Lagarde (1827–91), who in 1859 provided in all essentials the textual basis on which scholarship on Contra Manichaeos has rested ever since. Although to the best of my knowledge De Lagarde expressed no particularly deep interest in Manichaeism, it is worth stating in the context that certain impulses from De Lagarde seem to have been instrumental in the development of the so-called "History of Religions School" in Göttingen in the 1890s which proved to be of such importance in the history of scholarship on Gnosticism and Manichaeism.⁴³

The reason that De Lagarde became the hitherto most important editor of Titus was to some extent a coincidence. He arrived in ⁴¹ Baur 1831, 157–62; quotation: 159.

⁴² Baur 1831, 160–62; quotation: 161.

⁴³ See the section on De Lagarde in Hjelde 1994, 87–125, and on De Lagarde's importance for the History of Religions School in Hjelde 1994, 89.

London in 1852, because in previous decades the British Museum had acquired a large treasure of ancient Syriac manuscripts, but his plan was to create a new edition of the NT based on the oriental versions. It was only when it turned out that the assistant keeper of manuscripts, W. Cureton, had reserved for himself the most important manuscripts that would have been relevant for the project in question that De Lagarde plunged into a transcription of other Syriac manuscripts, so that already by Oct.-Nov. 1852 he had transcribed the Syriac translation of Titus, which, in contrast to the material that had so far been available, comprised all four books. In 1859 De Lagarde then published his edition of this Syriac version, along with a new edition of the same parts of the Greek text that Basnage had published earlier.⁴⁴ In a number of respects the basis for Titus-studies was changed by De Lagarde's editions, as I shall hope to point out, but at this point it is reasonable to take stock of the character of the contributions to Titus scholarship that the previous c. 280 years had given rise to, and which first and foremost had reached a turning-point with Baur's book.

We can note the existence of two differing interests in relation to Titus's Contra Manichaeos. Whereas Du Pin and Petitdidier were concerned with Titus's own dogmatic position, De Beausobre, Von Mosheim and Baur, for example, were interested in Titus's information on the Manichaeans. These two possible approaches are also to be found after Baur, and since scholarship on Manichaeism now took place, often but not always, without contact to Church history, it is possible to present them separately, even though contributions were still being made that covered both lines. The interest in Titus as a source of knowledge of Manichaeism is clearly represented as the stronger of the two, and here Titus's own concern is really without importance, since the important thing is to find authentic information on Manichaeism that is hidden in his work. On the other hand, the interest in placing Titus's thought within the theological and philosophical currents of his time grants Titus's own concern a place of importance, while on the other hand largely ignoring the issue of Titus's work as a source of knowledge on Manichaeism.

⁴⁴ De Lagarde 1859 (the Greek text); De Lagarde 1859a (the Syriac text). See the forewords in both editions, as well as Rahlfs 1928, 15 n. 3, 42-48, 54 n. 1-2, 56-58, more distantly Schemann 1920, 125, 139, 319, on De Lagarde's editions of Titus.

As far as possible the following presentation will follow the division of Titus scholarship into these two lines.⁴⁵ In addition the presentation will continue to place the scholars in their historical context, to make their underlying interests explicit and, where it is deemed relevant, to include aspects from the wider field of scholarship in which their examination of Titus places itself.

3. Contra Manichaeos as a source of knowledge on Manichaeism

The second half of the 19th and the whole of the 20th century were marked by a tremendous expansion of the source basis for Manichaean studies, in the first place through the publication of Arabic accounts of Manichaeism, then later through the publication of hitherto unknown Syriac sources,⁴⁶ and finally and above all through the discoveries of original Manichaean texts. In consequence, the significance of the information that can be extracted from Titus's own work has become increasingly less, even if it has never quite been extinguished in that it remains a source of independent information. But perhaps relatively little work was done on the value of Titus as a source because the information did not have the same decisive importance as before.

However, a minor contribution was made on the subject of Titus's Manichaean sources in 1901 by a study orientated towards Church history, in which through a comparison with Contra Manichaeos J. Sickenberger examined the authenticity of, and edited alleged fragments of, Homiliae in Lucam, a work written by Titus. Around the ⁴⁵ With regard to Titus as a source of knowledge on Manichaeism I mention only writers who have either tried to establish which sources Titus might have used or who have made an extensive use of material from Titus. It is not possible to include the many who have merely borrowed some "information" on Manichaeism from Titus's work. In addition a few minor contributions may be mentioned: a paper from the 1930s on Titus's Contra Manich. (Frankenberg 1938) exists only as a summary. Observations regarding content and textual criticism on Titus, Contra Manich. II.56, Gr. 60.38–61.5, exist in a minor article by Allberry (1939, 130–31). Information on the Manichaeans' understanding of evil, derived from Titus, is included in Rottenwöhler's (1986, 115–45) survey of the origin and nature of evil according to heterodox teaching from Marcion to the Cathars. Incidentally, accounts of the history of scholarship on Manichaeism as such are to be found in Nyberg 1935; Widengren 1978; Ries 1988, and an almost complete bibliography up to and including 1996 in Mikkelsen 1997.

⁴⁶ Even among these "new" Syriac sources we can also include De Lagarde's edition of the Syriac version of Titus's Contra Manich. (De Lagarde 1859a).

year 500 the anti-Manichaean Bishop Heraclianus claimed that Titus had actually written his work against the writings of Adda, another Manichaean, and not against Mani himself.⁴⁷ Commenting on this claim Sickenberger remarked that Titus himself did not profess to be writing against Mani either, but he often speaks of Manichaeism in such a way that a plural such as οἱ Μανιχαῖοι must be imagined as the subject, and that he often expressly refers to such a subject, e.g. οἱ ἄπ' ἐκείνου I.3 (Gr. 2.39–3.1), οἱ ἔξ ἐκείνου II.1 (Gr. 26.5), II.59 (Gr. 62.14), οἱ ἐκ τοῦ μανέντος II.13 (Gr. 31.33), οἱ δὲ πρὸς ταῦτα διαμαχόμενοι II.23 (Gr. 40.5), φησὶ δὲ πρὸς λέξιν αὐτὴν ἐκεῖνος ἢ ἕτερός τις τῶν ἄπ' ἐκείνου III.4 (Gr. 68.10–11) etc.⁴⁸

The increase in oriental source material strengthened the religio-historical perspective of Manichaeism; this was already the case in Baur's book, but even more so in F. Cumont's studies in Manichaeism, which also incorporated Syriac sources that had so far not been examined, e.g. Theodore bar Kōnai's Liber Scholiorum and Severus of Antioch's 123rd Homily (in the Homiliae cathedrales, only preserved in a Syriac translation). Titus was included when Cumont, together with M.-A. Kugener (a few years after Sickenberger's book) proposed that Titus had used several Manichaean works; as one possibility Cumont and Kugener suggested that on the basis of passages such as I.6 (Gr. 4.15), I.21 (Gr. 12.22) and I.22 (Gr. 13.6) a written work by Mani himself was Titus's source for Book I, while in Book III Titus had used another work, since in III.4 (Gr. 68.10–11) he is in doubt as to who had written the work he was using.⁴⁹ Here Cumont and Kugener did not apparently consider the fact that also in Book I, as demonstrated by Sickenberger, Titus speaks in indefinite terms of "Manichaeans" as his source, although perhaps this fact nevertheless lay behind Cumont and Kugener's further suggestion that all Titus's Manichaean sources originated in an older anti-Manichaean work, possibly from the early years when Manichaeism spread into the Roman Empire and provoked the interest of philosophers and theologians; they attributed Titus's doubt in III.4 to his use of this work too.⁵⁰ Moreover, Cumont and Kugener believed that they could document Titus's source in Book I as the same source that Severus

⁴⁷ See below pp. 138–39.

⁴⁸ Sickenberger 1901, 7 n. 3 (–8).

⁴⁹ Cumont and Kugener 1912, 159.

⁵⁰ Cumont and Kugener 1912, 159.

of Antioch used in his 123rd Homily and Theodoret of Cyrus in Haereticarum fabularum compendium I.26 (PG 83, 378B). They also suggested (with great reservations) that this source had been Mani's work, The Book of Giants.⁵¹

Around this time the epoch-making discoveries were made in Central Asia of original Manichaean texts, which inspired the great Augustine scholar, P. Alfaric, to examine all the material on the Manichaeans' literature that was available at the time. Alfaric was also aware of how unsure Titus had been as to the author of his Manichaean sources.⁵² Since Heraclianus also mentions a writing by Adda with the title Μόδιος, which he maintains has been refuted by Diodore of Tarsus, who confused it with Mani's Living Gospel,⁵³ Alfaric made the assumption that Μόδιος and The Living Gospel had the same content, and he suggested that Book IV of Titus's Contra Manichaeos, which indeed concerns itself with the NT, was also directed against Μόδιος. At the same time, however, Alfaric knew that according to Heraclianus Titus used several works by Adda. Alfaric further proposed that Book I was aimed at Mani's Kephalaia (κεφάλαια), which is mentioned in the Acta Archelai.⁵⁴ Since Alfaric also accepted Cumont's hypothesis that Titus, Theodoret and Severus had used the same Manichaean source that he believed Alexander of Lycopolis had also used, this source must then have been Kephalaia. Alfaric went on to suggest that Kephalaia, which he translated as "Principes" ("fundamental doctrines"), had been identical with Mani's Book of Giants.⁵⁵ Alfaric explained Titus's uncertainty as to who had written his own sources by referring to the Chinese-Manichaean Traité in which Adda (Ato) puts a question to Mani, who then answers it in the rest of the work. "L'écrit s'offre sous une forme telle qu'on pourrait se demander, à l'exemple de Titus de Bostra, s'il est de Mani ou d'Ato", Alfaric commented.⁵⁶ Finally, Alfaric believed quite simply that Contra Manichaeos III.1–7 quoted a text by Adda, and that the content of III.7 corresponded to a writing on the flesh not being created by God that ⁵¹ Cumont and Kugener 1912, 154–57, 160–61.

⁵² Alfaric 1919, 98–99.

⁵³ See below pp. 138–39.

⁵⁴ Acta Arch. LXII.6 (LII) (Beeson 1906, 91.5); the Greek text in Epiphanius, Haer. 66.2,9; Holl 1933, 18.13.

⁵⁵ Alfaric 1918, 116–17; 1919, 21–31, 98.

⁵⁶ Alfaric 1919, 99.

Augustine mentions in Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum II.41, and which Alfarcic took to be a work by Adda-Adimantus.⁵⁷

As is well-known, theories of Iranian influences on Middle Eastern religions, such as Jewish eschatology, apocalyptic and Gnosticism, were prevalent in the contemporary “History of Religions School” in Germany, and here R. Reitzenstein’s studies of Manichaeism played an important role; it seemed that the new Manichaean Turfan texts could support new theories. However, in 1927 Reitzenstein’s presentation in which Manichaeism is based on oriental mythology was attacked by a former collaborator, H.H. Schaeder, whose objections rested on the same distinctions as the one made by Baur between mythological and conceptual presentations of Manichaeism. Schaeder argued that it was not the “myth” but the “conceptual apparatus” as found in the Platonic anti-Manichaean Alexander of Lycopolis that was Mani’s “original system”.⁵⁸ Titus played only a minor role in Schaeder’s argument, but the similarity between his and Alexander’s account of Manichaeism was underlined.⁵⁹

Reitzenstein’s response to Schaeder was the final study he prepared before his death in 1931,⁶⁰ which also contains a minor examination of Titus, since Reitzenstein believed that the Manichaean sources for both Titus and Alexander of Lycopolis belonged to the same transmission nucleus, but that Alexander’s source was an abbreviated and partially misleading summary by a “Neo-Platonic Manichaean”, whereas Titus contained the more original and complete tradition, which was more mythological.⁶¹ According to Reitzenstein, Titus had been in possession of a Syriac work by Mani or one of his personal disciples; he referred to the fact that in I.21 Titus speaks of ἡ παρ’ αὐτοῖς βίβλος (Gr. 12.22), and to the formulation ὁ τὰ τοῦ μανέντος συγγράφων φησὶν (Gr. 13.2), and pointed out that in III.4 (Gr. 68.10–12)

⁵⁷ Alfarcic 1919, 105–6, 143. Cf. below p. 181.

⁵⁸ According to Schaeder (1927) Manichaeism ought primarily to be interpreted in the light of the philosophical systems of Antiquity, though he also thought it wrong to separate ancient “philosophy” too far from “religion”. This thesis ran into criticism not only from Reitzenstein’s side, but also from e.g. Polotsky (1935, 246–47), Jonas (1934, 49–58); cf. also Widengren (1978).

⁵⁹ Schaeder 1927, 109; see also 131 n. 3.

⁶⁰ Reitzenstein 1931; cf. Reitzenstein 1931a (there is also [192–93] a summary of his view of Titus).—In his earlier work Reitzenstein had also made use of Titus as a source; see e.g. Reitzenstein 1917, 4 n. 2, 10 n. 1, 31 n. 8, 40.

⁶¹ Reitzenstein 1931, especially 46–58. Also Villey (1985, 130) thinks that Alexander and Titus used related texts.

Titus himself is unsure as to whether a section of the book was by Mani himself.⁶² Reitzenstein concluded that the work was in Syriac on the basis of I.17 (Gr. 10.13),⁶³ where Titus nevertheless strictly speaking only states that Mani wrote in that language, but not that his own version was a Syriac one.

With reference to Heraclianus Reitzenstein believed that Book IV of Titus's Contra Manichaeos was directed at Adda's work, Μόδιος, which had counted up all the places in the NT (more probably only in "the gospel" and "the apostle") which Mani, as God's final envoy, knew to be "material" elements that had intruded into the text. Adda's writing had presupposed that Mani himself had produced a text without these elements, but for practical, presumably including "political" reasons, Adda had allowed the Christians to retain their old "book" and had merely written a kind of "user's manual" as to what the correct text should be, aimed at the Christian who had converted to Manichaeism.⁶⁴ Furthermore, Book III of Contra Manichaeos built on a corresponding writing by Adda that was an attack on the OT and had supplemented Μόδιος.⁶⁵ It was therefore also possible that Adda was the source behind Titus's Book I and "ultimately" behind Alexander of Lycopolis's account of Manichaeism.⁶⁶

In the same year as Reitzenstein's paper was published (1931) there also appeared C. Schmidt and H.J. Polotsky's account of the discovery of the Coptic-Manichaean papyri from Medinet Madi in Egypt, amongst which was a work (or rather two works, perhaps a work in two volumes) with the title Kephalaia. With knowledge of this work Schmidt and Polotsky could definitively reject Alfarc's translation of κεφάλαια as "principles"; the title means "chapters", and the work has not been the same as Mani's Book of Giants. On the other hand they considered it likely that in Contra Manichaeos III.4–5 Titus quotes from Kephalaia, because in III.4, Gr. 68.10–12 Titus speaks of a κεφάλαιον, which seems to come from Mani or one of ⁶² Reitzenstein 1931, 47.

⁶³ Reitzenstein 1931, 48–49. Already Cumont (Cumont and Kugener 1912, 159) thought that "l'évêque de Bostra connaissait certainement cette langue [i.e. Syriac, NAP] comme le nabatéen".—This line of reasoning is rejected by Bennett (2001a, 72 n. 12), who states that in Titus's time Nabataean in Bostra had been completely supplanted by Arabic.

⁶⁴ Reitzenstein 1931, 56–57.

⁶⁵ Reitzenstein 1931, 57.

⁶⁶ Reitzenstein 1931, 57.

his disciples, and which bears the heading περὶ τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης πρωτοπλασσίας.⁶⁷ This theory was later followed up by A. Böhlig, who in the edition of Kephalaia (1st half) went so far as to suggest that Titus's chapter could be identical with Kephalaia Ch. 55.⁶⁸

Finally, it was also in 1931 that in continuation of Reitzenstein's paper A. Baumstark used philological means to underpin the theory that Titus had used a Syriac Manichaean work. Baumstark attempted to render it probable that the Syriac translator of Contra Manichaeos had been in possession of Titus's Syriac source. When Titus quoted this source, the translator had inserted the original text instead of retrotranslating Titus's Greek text. For according to Baumstark the Mani quotations in the Syriac Titus-translation diverge more from the Greek original than the translation otherwise does, just as certain terms are rendered otherwise in the quotations than in Titus's own text, and the Greek text appears at times to rest on a misunderstanding of the Syriac, etc.⁶⁹ Baumstark later supplemented this examination by showing that the Syriac translator had not translated Titus's biblical quotations from the Greek either, but instead, when dealing with OT quotations, had inserted the Pešitta-text and with NT quotations a Vetus Syra-text, which in Baumstark's opinion had been the Diatessaron.⁷⁰

In the post-war period the discussion on Titus's Manichaean sources was discontinued, and new contributions did not appear until P. Nagel followed up his edition of the Greek text of Contra Manichaeos

⁶⁷ Schmidt and Polotsky 1933, 19.

⁶⁸ Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 133.4–137.11 with the heading (133.5–6) ΕΤΒΕ ΤΩΜΠΛΑΔΟΕ ΠΑΛΛΗ, “Über die Bildung (-πλάσσειν) Adams.” Böhlig writes in his note on the translation of 133.5 (Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940): “Ist dieses Kapitel bei Titus von Bostra gemeint?”

⁶⁹ Baumstark 1931.—Baumstark's theories have recently been accepted by Clackson, Hunter, and Lieu 1998, viii–x, see in particular ix: “The coverage of the vocabulary of the Syriac version of Titus is limited only to sections which are mainly devoted to Manichaean cosmogony (esp. I,17 and I,21ff.) as these sections in their original Greek version were most likely to have been derived from genuine Manichaean writings which Titus claimed to have read in Syriac.” Also Cumont and Kugener's theory of the common source behind Severus, Titus and Theodoret's accounts is accepted in Clackson, Hunter, and Lieu 1998, viii and Lieu 2001, 141.

⁷⁰ Baumstark 1935. See Nagel (1967, 20–24) on both studies by Baumstark; Nagel (1973, 290, 293 n. 28) has also remarked of them that they demand a new study, but particularly the latter in the light of the Syriac Diatessaron, by which he presumably means Ephrem's Syriac commentary on the Diatessaron. Cf. also Nagel 1974, 303 n. 7, 308–9.

III.7–30.⁷¹ In his work from 1980 on the Gnostic interpretation of the Paradise narrative Nagel included the criticism of the Creator that is repeated in Contra Manichaeos III.7 (→ Ch. XI.34); Nagel reckoned the criticism with what he called the aggressive, polemical type of interpretation, which is also represented in a number of Nag Hammadi tractates. However, Nagel rejected the possibility that this criticism could originate in a Manichaean text: the reason is that in the first place the serpent in Contra Manichaeos III.7 is regarded as the angel of good and mediator of Gnosis, which incidentally also corresponds to Augustine’s presentation of Manichaeism, whereas the serpent in the original Manichaean sources belongs to the side of Darkness,⁷² and secondly that there is no testimony in the original Manichaean literature that the creator of man as in Contra Manichaeos III.7 and 27 should be ignorant or animated by φθόνος and βασκανία.⁷³ Instead Nagel proposed that Titus was in actual fact attacking Emperor Julian the Apostate’s polemical treatise Contra Galilaeos, which contains all these features.⁷⁴

A further contribution to the discussion of Titus’s Manichaean sources has come from a different angle in G. Sfameni Gasparro, who has again attempted to render probable Heraclianus’s remark that Titus was in reality writing against Adda. Sfameni Gasparro refers to Contra Manichaeos I.21 (Gr. 13.2) ὡς γε ὁ τὰ τοῦ μανέντος συγγράφων φησὶν, which she translates with “as he who wrote down Mani’s teaching asserts”, and comments as follows:

The polemist thus shows himself to be aware of a Manichaean author who is an intermediary between the Prophet’s dualistic doctrine and the written report that he knows and utilizes. This writer speaks in the name of his Master whose teaching he faithfully reports.⁷⁵

⁷¹ Nagel 1967; 1973. Cf. below pp. 112–13.

⁷² Nagel 1980, 55–57; cf. also earlier: Nagel 1973a, 163–65. Other scholars have also cast doubt on the idea that the Manichaeans regarded the serpent as a saviour: Cumont (1908, 49) observed that in the Manichaean excerpts in Theodore bar Kōnai it is Jesus and not the Tempter who makes man eat of the Tree of Knowledge; according to Cumont, this explained why the Christian polemicists could accuse the Manichaeans of identifying Jesus with the serpent. In furtherance of Cumont’s view Waldschmidt and Lentz 1926, 25 similarly regarded this charge as a misunderstanding.—Skjærvø 1995, 243 also thinks that it is a misunderstanding from Augustine’s side; his arguments are feasible but not binding.

⁷³ Nagel 1980, 55–57.

⁷⁴ Nagel 1980, 57.

⁷⁵ Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 551.

This Manichaean writer was Adda, a claim that can also be rendered likely in another way. In Sfameni Gasparro's view the text used in III.4–5 tells the myth of man's creation that at one critical point differs from Mani's Epistula fundamenti. In Mani's text man is created by the demon couple begetting humans, but in Titus's Manichaean text Adam is formed by the demons.⁷⁶ From this Sfameni Gasparro concludes that Titus's source was not composed by Mani, but more probably by Adda, who out of regard for the western mission removed what was for Christians the offensive thought that man had come into being through the demons' intercourse.⁷⁷ We know from Augustine that Adda was identical with the Adimantus against whom Augustine wrote a polemic in Contra Adimantum,⁷⁸ and Sfameni Gasparro now thinks that since we know from Contra Adimantum that Adimantus in particular concentrated on biblical exegesis and attacked the OT, it is probable that his authorship in general has been Titus's source. Sfameni Gasparro also points out that there are major similarities between the Manichaeism that Titus attacks in Contra Manichaeos III.7, and that which Augustine attacks in De Genesi contra Manichaeos, and this may be because both Church fathers used a text from Adda.⁷⁹

Sfameni Gasparro's article is without doubt an important contribution to the question of Titus of Bostra's Manichaean sources, and this is especially true of her emphasis that the similarities between Titus and Augustine's description of Manichaeism may be linked to a usage of Adda texts.

Other relevant contributions to the question of Titus's Manichaean sources have dealt with Cumont and Kugener's older theory that Titus, Severus of Antioch and Theodoret of Cyrus all drew on Mani's The Book of Giants. The main element in this theory, which turns on ⁷⁶ Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 552. Fragments of Mani's account in Ep. fund. on the origin of man are found in Augustine, Contra ep. fund. 12, Zycha 1891, 207.25–208.11 = Feldmann 1987, 10–12, fig. 4a and in Augustine, De nat. boni 46, Zycha 1892, 884.29–886.17 = Feldmann 1987, 16–20, fig. 9. In Feldmann 1987, 82–87 there is an overview of the other Manichaean source material on the creation of man. The difference between Ep. fund., in which man is begotten by the Prince of Darkness and his spouse, and a number of other accounts of the Manichaeans' teaching on the creation of man (Acta Arch.; Titus and Alexander of Lycopolis) was already noted in Baur 1831, 120, 131–32.

⁷⁷ Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 556.

⁷⁸ See also below p. 181.

⁷⁹ Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 554–56.

Severus of Antioch's 123rd Homily, was the object of discussion in J.C. Reeves's monograph on 'The Book of Giants traditions' in Manichaeism; Reeves did not deal with Titus of Bostra's inclusion in the theory, however. Reeves convincingly proves that we have no basis for claiming that Severus's Manichaean source has been The Book of Giants.⁸⁰

Finally, B. Bennett has examined one of the parallels between descriptions of Manichaeism in Titus, Severus and Theodoret, which formed the basis of Cumont and Kugener's theory, namely reports about the Manichaean division of primordial space into four quarters corresponding to the four cardinal directions. Bennett points out that this division is not only found in the three writers (in abbreviated form in Titus [Contra Manichaeos I.11]), but also in descriptions by many other writers. Bennett believes that since these reports . . . are consistent in content but do not display obvious literary dependence upon one another, it is reasonable to assume that they are all summaries of information found in some common source document. All of the early citations are found in Greek writers and there is no evidence that these writers were conversant with Syriac; it is therefore reasonable to assume that the source document was in Greek. Furthermore, this source document must have been produced before 348, the date of the earliest extant citation.⁸¹

Bennett now calls attention to the fact that like Titus the other writers also oscillate between referring to what the "author", "the Manichaeans" and "Mani" say, and this fact he explains by claiming that "the source document was a summary which contained some citations attributed to Mani, but was not itself identical with one of Mani's works."⁸² Titus's remark that Mani used Syriac is interpreted by Bennett to mean that "Titus of Bostra believed that the Greek source document's Mani quotations were derived from a Syriac-language work of Mani".⁸³ However, presumably Cumont and Kugener were right that "the source document was a Manichaean text rather than a hostile account by a Christian writer", partly because it does not seem to have contained any "obvious distortions or polemical

⁸⁰ Reeves 1992, 26–27, 46–47, 165–83.

⁸¹ Bennett 2001a, 71–72. Cf. above on Bennett's view on the question of whether Titus could read Syriac. Bennett does not include Baumstark's (1931) arguments in his study.

⁸² Bennett 2001a, 72–73 (quotation: 72).

⁸³ Bennett 2001a, 76.

elements”, partly because it corresponds with Augustine’s description of Manichaean cosmogony on the basis of quotations and references based on Mani’s Epistula fundamenti and certain other writings by Mani that were only available to a few people.⁸⁴ Since the Arab writer Šahrastānī in his Book of Religious and Philosophical Sects presents the same teaching and asserts that it was found in the first Chapter (ālaf, Ⲁ) of Mani’s Living Gospel and at the beginning of Mani’s Šābuhragān, Bennett concludes that the Mani quotations in the Greek-Manichaean source came from The Living Gospel, since Šābuhragān is known to have existed only in Middle Persian; moreover Bennett supports this argument with religio-historical references that make it probable that the teaching in question has belonged to the original Manichaeism.⁸⁵

As can be seen from the above exposition the question of Titus’s Manichaean sources contains many unsolved problems. In the long term an elaborate examination of all Titus’s specified references to, and quotations from, Manichaean texts is required, if more secure results are to be achieved. Without delivering such an examination I nevertheless hope in the present study to take scholarship in this area further. The reason why Titus’s Manichaean sources are at all of significance for my work is the supposition that Titus’s own refutation of Mani is fundamentally determined by the nature of the Manichaean sources that he employs. In this context we must be aware of how the question of the philosophical character of the Manichaeism that Titus is writing against was raised by scholarship already in the 18th century. De Beausobre held that Titus presented Mani as a philosopher who was shaken by the imperfection of the world, while Baur underlined how Titus gave almost the same picture of Manichaeism as an abstract thought-system of concepts as Alexander of Lycopolis. Reitzenstein’s reflections on the other hand moved in a different direction, for even though like Baur he stressed the similarities with Alexander, it was of equal importance for him to underline the stronger mythological character of Titus’s picture of Manichaeism.

⁸⁴ Bennett 2001a, 73–75 (quotation: 73).—Bennett makes much of a remark in Augustine’s Contra ep. fund. 25, Zycha 1891, 224.23–27, that the Mani writings are only in the hands of a few people.

⁸⁵ Bennett 2001a, 75–77.—Bennett refers to Šahrastānī, Book of religious and philosophical Sects II,I,II in Gimaret and Monnot 1986, 660 [*628].

The question of Titus's Manichaean sources hereby touches on the question of the relation between mythology and philosophy in Manichaeism, which as stated was raised by Schaeder, but which cannot be said to be finally clarified. In spite of the heavy criticism Schaeder received, for example at the hands of Reitzenstein, Polotsky, H. Jonas and Widengren, we must note that in a number of studies A. Böhlig, who was a pupil of Schaeder, defended elements of Schaeder's thesis. Böhlig sought to prove that significant elements of Manichaeism were completely or partially of philosophical origin.⁸⁶ A number of these results, for instance, have also found acceptance and have been further pursued by Sundermann.⁸⁷

Fundamentally, however, one can hardly maintain that Böhlig answered the question as to whether those elements in Manichaeism which according to him were philosophical in origin were also employed to the same purpose as in philosophy, or whether they were inserted into a new and quite different context that on crucial points changed their original sense. When some of Schaeder's critics, for instance, have agreed that also Mani himself used "concepts" such as ʿlḥ on the lines of mythical names such as "Prince of Darkness", but have simultaneously pointed out that precisely this equivalence between concepts and mythological ideas makes it doubtful that Mani's concept of ʿlḥ should be what Schaeder called a "logical concept",⁸⁸ there is at any rate no question of a criticism that Böhlig attempted to refute.

As far as I can see, therefore, it is still possible to interpret the presentation of Manichaeism that is summarised in Alexander of Lycopolis and perhaps also Titus as a further development in relation to the original Manichaeism, more closely defined as an attempt to make Manichaeism presentable among philosophically educated circles in the Roman Empire by superficially brushing off the mythical character.

⁸⁶ See e.g. Böhlig 1986.—A skilful criticism of Böhlig's position is to be found in Khosroyev 1995, 110–29.

⁸⁷ Sundermann 1997, 17–24.

⁸⁸ Cf. Widengren 1978. This was also noted by Titus, see pp. 170, 256–57.

4. Titus as a theological and philosophical writer

I turn now to the second line of Titus scholarship, that is, the occupation with Titus's own dogmatic position. In this field the contributions have been even more limited than for the subject of Titus as a source for knowledge of Manichaeism. What has been written is mostly concerned with three areas: firstly Titus's relation to the doctrine of original sin, secondly, which philosophies are included in his work, and thirdly Titus's place in anti-Manichaean literature as such. The third area contributes to an understanding of the anti-Manichaean literature as being borne by common theological concerns, although some studies may still be borne by a wish to draw on the literature as a source of knowledge about Manichaeism, or are written in the perspective of illuminating the reaction to Manichaeism as a contribution to its history. Nor in this context shall I in general include works that mention or treat Titus more or less en passant.⁸⁹

The most important of these discussions is without doubt the debate among scholars within the history of doctrines on the origin of the dogma of original sin. In brief this may be said to be concerned with the extent to which Augustine is solely and completely the father of this dogma within the Catholic tradition, or whether similar ideas were to be found in Greek patristics. It is in this context that Titus's position has also proved to be of interest: we are dealing here with a debate in which significant theological interests are invested, as it is intertwined with fundamental questions of how Christianity is to be interpreted.⁹⁰ In the background of this debate we sense a set of problems from Augustine's own time, in which his opponents, Pelagius and Julian of Eclanum, claimed that not only was there no tradition behind the doctrine of original sin in either the Eastern or the Western Church, but that it had in fact been invented by Augustine. Both of them believed it to be a legacy of Augustine's Manichaean past: original sin was an attempt to revive the Manichaean view of evil.⁹¹

⁸⁹ A few works may be mentioned, however: Titus's interpretation of the Cain and Abel story (Contra Manich. III.7 and 30–31) is included in e.g. Glenthoj 1997 (311, follow the index).—The valuable encyclopedia articles and sections in patrologies and literary histories etc. should also be emphasised (e.g. Bardenhewer 1912, 269–73; Puech 1930, 554–61; Casey 1937; Quasten 1963, 359–62).

⁹⁰ A brief survey of the history of scholarship is found in Hauke 1993, 30–45.

⁹¹ See further in Bruckner 1897, 35–39, 52, 57–59, 65–68, 82–83, 86; Clark

I have already mentioned how the subject of Titus and the doctrine of original sin was raised in the dispute between Du Pin and Petitdidier back in the 17th century, and how its rejection was later fundamental for theologians of the Enlightenment. Since the thinking of that period forms a significant background for the modern world, taking up a position on it is in many ways still relevant. The attraction yet the problem of postulating man's innate goodness and natural ethical freedom may doubtless explain why patristic scholars even in the 20th century have struggled to discover the origin of the doctrine of original sin.

In another way Sickenberger's aforementioned study and edition of Titus's Homiliae in Lucam from 1901 also marks an important milestone in Titus scholarship by including, together with a collation of the most accessible information on Titus (prosopographical etc.), a summary of the contents of the entire *Contra Manichaeos*⁹² and—with a view to a comparison with the catena fragments of Titus's Homiliae in Lucam—by being the first to seek to place Titus in relation to the philosophy, theology and exegesis of his time.⁹³ Sickenberger held that in relation to the contemporary Trinitarian controversies Titus represented a cautious, conservative but non-heretical position.⁹⁴ On the other hand Sickenberger claimed that Titus's anthropology and teaching on the primeval state brought him close to a later heresy. In referring to the controversy between Du Pin and Petitdidier, Sickenberger stated initially that [i]n den beiden ersten Logoi kommen meist nüchterne, dem allgemeinen menschlichen Bewusstsein entnommene Wahrheiten zur Behandlung. Der rein natürlichen Standpunkt bleibt im Vordergrunde.

These books were aimed at the pagans and Sickenberger thus thought that Petitdidier was probably right, but he also added:

1986, 291–349; Clark 1992, 214, 216–19, 237, 239, 242.—Anti-Manichaeism was in itself an important issue for Pelagius and Julian of Eclanum, see Clark 1992, 208–9; Lamberigts 2001, 114 with further references. A number of modern scholars have been partly willing to accept the Pelagians' claim; see e.g. Clark (1986, 291–349), who accepts that the “biological” theory of original sin in Augustine actually developed ideas from his Manichaean past; similarly Adam 1958; Gross 1960, 372; Van Oort 1987; 1989. See also Lamberigts 1990, 398–401; and especially the thorough examination in Lamberigts 2001, who reaches a nuanced position.

⁹² Sickenberger 1901, 1–16.

⁹³ Sickenberger 1901, 79–118.

⁹⁴ Sickenberger 1901, 98–103.

Indes hätte du Pin vielleicht seine Ansicht aufrecht erhalten, wenn er im 3. Buche des Titus Anschauungen über den Sündenfall der ersten Menschen gelesen hätte . . .

Sickenberger then adduced that in Contra Manichaeos III.7–29 Titus dismissed the claim that God urged the first people on earth to repent; that he maintained that from the beginning they were created to the present life-form; that they themselves through virtue were to gain the path back to Paradise; and that death is a benefit. Sickenberger continued:

Eine gewisse Verwandtschaft dieser Anschauungen mit den Sätzen, wie sie ein halbes Jahrhundert später der Pelagianismus vertrat, lässt sich nicht leugnen. Die Gegnerschaft gegen den Manichäismus, dem gegenüber auch nicht der Schein einer Korruption oder Depravation der menschlichen Natur zugestanden werden durfte, ohne sofort dessen Lehre vom bösen Prinzip zu fördern, mag Titus zu obigen extremen Sätzen veranlasst haben. Auch Pelagius und Julian sahen ja bekanntlich eine Vererbung der Sünde für einen manichäischen Irrtum an . . .⁹⁵

Sickenberger's view that these Pelagian-like sentences are provoked by anti-Manichaeism is of course obvious, but may also be inspired by the fact that prominent theologians of the 19th century had precisely explained the weak position of the doctrine of original sin in Greek theology with the anti-Manichaean bias.⁹⁶

When Sickenberger came to clarify what lay behind the “natural standpoint” that he found to be prominent in Books I–II, he claimed, ⁹⁵ Sickenberger 1901, 14–15 with n. 3.

⁹⁶ According to Hauke (1993, 33) J.H. Newman already in 1845 explained why original sin is rarely mentioned among Greek theologians with the argument that they were involved in a struggle with Gnostic-Manichaean fatalism; similarly the Lutheran G. Thomasius (Hauke 1993, 34). Later examples of this view that the powerful position of “the free will” in Greek theology of the 4th and 5th century is linked to the anti-Manichaean counter-position: Kelly (1977, 344) claimed that part of the explanation as to why the Greek Church fathers of the 4th and 5th century had a relatively optimistic view of man's condition after the Fall is that “the rival philosophy was Manichaeism, with its fatalism and its dogma that matter, including the body, was intrinsically evil.”—According to Slomkowski (1928, 110) Gregory of Nyssa insisted on the free will against the Manichaeans' determinism.—Stroumsa and Stroumsa 1988, 47–51, 56 assumed partly that the development of a theodicy in the context of the significance of autexousion in older patristics was very much due to the battle against the Valentinians and other Gnostics, and partly that the Manichaean challenge served to sharpen this view in the Byzantine Empire and develop the Christian teaching on evil. Cf. also Williams (1927, 274–76, 278, 302), who stressed the importance of Manichaeism for the development of theodicies in the Eastern and the Western Church.

though without any real argumentation, that Titus was re-examining Manichaeism's fantastically-furnished oriental system with the aid of concepts derived from Aristotelian logic, physics and psychology. Titus was an "Aristotelian", and for Sickenberger there was an incompatibility between this ostensible "Aristotelianism" and "Platonism".⁹⁷

This evaluation must presumably be seen in the light of Sickenberger's claim that he could demonstrate that Titus's exegesis was "Antiochene", i.e. more down-to-earth and simple than speculative and respecting the literal meaning of the text. According to Sickenberger, the reason that Titus nonetheless allegorises at intervals can be explained by the fact that he lived before the contrast between the Antiochene and Alexandrian schools was fully manifest.⁹⁸

The developed Antiochene theology to which Sickenberger refers is of course that which we find in Diodore of Tarsus, John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia. Although Sickenberger does not state it explicitly, it is likely that he has associated Titus's non-allegorical exegesis with other features that are normally linked to theologians in the Antiochene School. Thus, the question of a connection between Theodore of Mopsuestia and Pelagianism was a problem both in Late Antiquity and in 19th century research,⁹⁹ and furthermore A. von Harnack claimed, apparently as the first, that the differences between the Antiochene and Alexandrian School also had something to do with the possibility that philosophically the Antiochenes were Aristotelians, while the Alexandrians were Platonists.¹⁰⁰ The distinction that Sickenberger draws between Titus's "Aristotelianism" and "Platonism" is presumably to be understood on the basis of this model.

However, Von Harnack's theory on the Antiochenes' "Aristotelianism" was by and large rejected by later scholarship in the light of ⁹⁷ Sickenberger 1901, 14–15, 111. Sickenberger referred to the fact that in Contra Manich. IV.19 Titus speaks directly against the Platonic doctrine of the soul (→ Ch. XI.46). But as I demonstrate below (see p. 257), we are dealing here with a specific point in Plato which all the Church fathers criticised to a man, namely, the transmigration of souls. More comprehensive conclusions cannot be drawn from this on Titus's attitude to the Platonic tradition.

⁹⁸ Sickenberger 1901, 15–16, 111–114. Jülicher's (1902, 82) explanation was different: "Der Abstand von Origenes ist allerdings erheblich, aber Titus allegorisiert vor Allem deshalb so viel weniger als Origenes, weil er so viel weniger Phantasie und Gedanken besitzt."

⁹⁹ See further in Norris 1963, 239–52.

¹⁰⁰ According to Norris (1963, 249–50) it was Von Harnack who began to link Theodore's anthropology with Aristotelianism; cf. Von Harnack 1931, 52, 116–17, 124, 153, 156, 172, 189–90, 267, 332, 340, 504, 506–7.

R. Arnou and R.A. Norris's works, which have demonstrated that central philosophical problems did not find an Aristotelian solution in Theodore.¹⁰¹ Norris, for example, showed that Theodore did not have an Aristotelian understanding of the relation between "body" and "soul": if this was the case, then the soul should be seen as the body's form, and consequently the soul's independence and immortality must be denied, but—as with the contemporary Neo-Platonists—for Theodore the body and soul were clearly two distinct "things".¹⁰² When we also bear in mind that Stoicism and Aristotelianism had disappeared as philosophical schools by the 4th and 5th centuries—while elements of their teaching from the beginning of our era onwards had been absorbed first in Middle, then in Neo-Platonism—it would actually come as a surprise to find a true "Aristotelianism" among the Antiochene theologians.¹⁰³ The Aristotelian influence that in fact we find in Theodore cannot, as far as I can see, be interpreted to mean that Theodore based his theology on Aristotle,¹⁰⁴ and this ¹⁰¹ See Arnou 1936; Norris 1963.

¹⁰² Norris 1963, 22–23, 127–28, 149–59. Altogether Norris (1963, 125–59) demonstrated that Theodore's theology was not based on actual studies of philosophical anthropology; Theodore was primarily an exegete. He nevertheless accepted elements from contemporary philosophical anthropology, and the reason that he criticised such elements in some of his writings was because he believed them to be at odds with the teaching of Scripture.

¹⁰³ Cf. Norris 1963, 4–7. Cf. Gottschalk 1987 on the interest in Aristotle and the integration of Aristotelian terms and concepts into all the philosophical schools from the 1st century BCE onwards. However, Norris may not be right in thinking that the Peripatetic tradition had completely disappeared; Themistius, who belongs in the period after Porphyry, is probably to be understood as a non-Platonic commentator on Aristotle (see the discussion in Blumenthal 1996, 22–23, 37–38, 56, 144, 155, 172, 213 n. 47).

¹⁰⁴ Following Arnou, Wickert (1962, 157 n. 1, 189–90 n. 107a) also thought that there was a Platonic element in Theodore's theology. In connection with Wickert's (1962, 45–61) treatment of the "rational character" of Theodore's exegesis of Paul he noted (45–46) that Theodore did indeed turn against metaphysical speculation, but (47–52) he nevertheless found that Theodore was interested in definitions and a classification of species and genera, and (57, 85) that he established syllogisms. However, the question is whether this is not merely superficial knowledge of Aristotelian logic. Wickert (1962, 63ff., 92–95, 105) also thought that there are individual Aristotelian elements in Theodore's ethics. Finally, when Wickert (1962, 157–58) believes that Theodore's tenacious grip on the concrete was "Aristotelian" rather than "Platonic", we are dealing with a very loose definition. Many scholars, however, are willing to accept this loose Aristotelianism: Dewart (1971, 4–8) emphasised that Theodore had only a limited knowledge of philosophy from the schools of Libanius and Diodore, but she thought (9–11) that it nevertheless makes sense to say that the Antiochenes and Theodore were marked by a down-to-earth Aristotelian-Stoic method, though not an Aristotelian-Stoic doctrine. In relation to judgement can also be extended to his teacher Diodore and other great Antiochenes.¹⁰⁵ Bearing this in mind we must ask whether Sickenberger's understanding of Titus as an "Aristotelian" should not be revised. As I will show in the following, however, Sickenberger was right in thinking that Titus employs a considerable degree of Aristotelian logic, merely that his "Aristotelianism" must not be read as being in opposition to his "Platonism".

In the period after Sickenberger a number of individual articles and sections in larger studies were published that contributed to an understanding of Titus's philosophy and theology; some of these ignored Sickenberger's theory of Titus's "Aristotelianism", however, and not all of them even seemed to know of his work. Thus, several traced the origin of the various ideas in Titus's work to Stoicism and Platonism respectively, and Sickenberger himself was already also well aware that Titus drew on Stoic ideas.¹⁰⁶ For instance, Titus was included in K. Gronau's study from 1922 on the theodicy of the Early Church, a work which was especially borne by an interest in proving the question of doctrines she thought that the philosophical elements in Theodore's thought reflect the philosophical syncretism of the time. Schäublin (1974, 30–32) noted that the Antiochenes' "historical-grammatical" method was a "literary", not a philosophical, reading of the Bible, and that they were not directly influenced by Aristotelian thought, but he nonetheless thought that every philology ultimately builds on a philosophical foundation and that the Antiochenes' down-to-earth thinking can be seen as a continuation of Aristotle's.—Wallace-Hadrill 1982, 96 (cf. 102–3) thought that it is only admissible to call Antioch's Christian writers "Aristotelian" in the general sense that in their view of the world they set store by historical events and Christ's humanity, which forms an analogy with Aristotle's interest in empirical facts. The Antiochene theologians were more biblical and historical than philosophical, and moreover were not especially marked by Aristotle, but more by Platonism.

¹⁰⁵ Diodore may in fact have had a genuine knowledge of philosophy; the titles of some of his works could suggest so (the Suidas Lexicon Δ 1149, Διόδωρος, Adler 1967, 103.1–23; cf. Amand 1973, 467–69), and Diodore's work against Bardesanes and astrology were stamped with philosophy (see below p. 140). Dewart (1971, 7–8), however, claimed that in Diodore's asceterium the focus was on the study of Scripture and only to a very limited degree were the studies concerned with secular literature (she refers to Leconte 1957). Schweizer (1942, 64–65, 66–67) observed a Neo-Platonic-Aristotelian influence on Diodore, but cf. here Schäublin 1974, 31f. Cf. also Wallace-Hadrill 1982, 101–3: Theodoret of Cyrus's knowledge of Plato and Aristotle was second-hand and very limited; however, he stressed positively the Platonists to the disregard of the Peripatetics. On the Antiochenes and philosophy see also McLeod 1999, passim, but esp. 17, 87–115, 120–21.

¹⁰⁶ Sickenberger (1901, 97) mentions that in Contra Manich. II.4 (Gr. 28.4f.), II.8 (Gr. 30.6f.) and in a scholium to Lk. 18.20ff. Titus defines the nature of virtue negatively "ganz im Sinne der Stoiker".

the dependence of the Church fathers on Stoic theodicy. This was also true of Titus's theodicy, which originated, to be precise, from Posidonius of Apamea.¹⁰⁷ Moreover, in his work on the history of Greek Christian literature A. Puech also found Platonic elements in Titus,¹⁰⁸ but similarly noted that areas of Titus's work had a Stoic ring.¹⁰⁹

R.P. Casey's encyclopedia article on Titus hardly contained any new view, but nevertheless deserves mention for its clarity and completeness, thanks to the writer's intimate knowledge of Contra Manichaeos. Casey lauded Titus's high level of learning and eloquence, stating that Sein Stil beweist rhetorische Schulung und sein Denken tüchtige philosophische Bildung. Dies ist besonders bemerkbar in der Schrift Adv. Manichaeos I-II, wo im Buch I das dialektische Spiel außergewöhnlich geistreich und bunt ist, während Buch II die ausführlichste und gedankenreichste Behandlung des Problems der Theodicee in der frühen christlichen Literatur enthält.¹¹⁰

In addition, Casey often repeated Sickenberger's emphasis on the non-Augustinian character of Titus's anti-Manichaeism:

Im Grunde ist seine Ethik rationalistisch und griechisch und himmelweit von Augustin und der Theologie der Gnade entfernt, aber ihr moralischer Gehalt und ihre Lehre von Lohn und Strafe sind spezifisch christlich.¹¹¹

Casey clearly preferred Augustine, but when the same view was expressed in J. Gross's major work on history of the doctrine of original sin, the evaluation was different.¹¹² This work, based on source criticism and comprehensive studies, is still indispensable for anyone engaging with the history of the doctrine, though this does not change ¹⁰⁷ Gronau 1922, 17–18. Gronau did not document this dependence on Posidonius, and I have not attempted to prove his claim. A certain caution is also advisable here, since the reference to Posidonius should probably be seen as reflecting a period of scholarship rich in hypotheses now dismissed—and strongly criticised in Reinhardt 1921; 1926.

¹⁰⁸ Puech 1930, 559–60; cf. below pp. 258–59.

¹⁰⁹ Puech 1930, 560 n. 1 referred to Contra Manich. II.37 (PG 18) = Gr. II.63–65 (on the world order).

¹¹⁰ Casey 1937, 1587.

¹¹¹ Casey 1937, 1588.

¹¹² Gross 1960. Titus does not appear to be included in 20th century surveys previous to Gross of the history of the doctrine of original sin, e.g. not in Tennant 1968 (orig. 1903); Williams 1927.

the fact that the author's interpretations are problematic. Gross emphasised that his work was a historical one, free of ties to a particular confession; guided by reason it sought only the truth.¹¹³ Yet it is clear enough that the studies were in reality governed by a topical interest in disgracing the doctrine, so that man could optimistically devote himself to belief in progress. Gross also stated that he hoped to render mankind frei vom Alpdruck der Furcht vor dem willkürlich zürnenden und strafenden Erbsündengott; frei von der lähmenden Vorstellung, in fremde Schuld und Strafe verstrickt, einem allgemeinen und unaufhalt-samen sittlichen Niedergangs preisgegeben zu sein; frei für die ermutigende Erkenntnis, daß, im ganzen gesehen, der Weg der Menschheit kein Niedergang ist, sondern ein Aufstieg; ein Aufstieg freilich, der sich nicht geradlinig, sondern wellenlinig vollzieht.¹¹⁴

To this end he would prove that the doctrine of original sin was unknown in the Bible and the entire pre-Augustine theology. Pelagianism was thus largely a continuation of the older theology:

Steht doch die gesamte griechische Tradition auf dem Boden eines ausgesprochenen Schöpfungsoptimismus, der mit dem augustinischen Erbsündenpessimismus schlechterdings unvereinbar, ja die Hauptwurzel des Pelagianismus ist. Daher der unüberbrückbare Gegensatz zwischen Ost- und Westkirche hinsichtlich der Erbsünde . . .¹¹⁵

Gross now linked this fact with anti-Manichaeism; thus, he believed that until the beginning of the 5th century man's ethical freedom was the sole interest of oriental theologians because of the battle against Gnostic and Manichaean dualism and fatalism; the consequences of the primeval sin were of less interest.¹¹⁶ Most importantly, none of the pre-Augustinian theologians allowed for an inherited sinful guilt or a lack of original justice. Most of them agreed on an "Erbübellehre", which meant that death and the other physical evils were regarded as punishment in consequence of the primeval sin; however, this doctrine—particularly among the Alexandrians and the Cappadocians—became an "Erbverderbnislehre", according to which Adam and Eve's successors were tainted with concupiscentia as an ¹¹³ Gross 1960, 11.

¹¹⁴ Gross 1960, 13.

¹¹⁵ Gross 1960, 205.

¹¹⁶ Gross 1960, 214.

inherited ethical weakening, but not as a guilt. Gross divided the Antiochenes into two groups: Diodore and Chrysostom were closer to the Alexandrians and Cappadocians,¹¹⁷ while Theodore of Mopsuestia was further away from them through claiming in some of his writings that man was created as a mortal being from the beginning.¹¹⁸

It was in this context that Titus (together with Hegemonius's Acta Archelai) entered the picture as a kind of forerunner of Theodore. Gross followed Sickenberger in defining Titus as belonging to the Antiochene School ("der nach seiner ganzen geistigen Einstellung zu den Antiochenern gehört").¹¹⁹ He then presented a fine outline of Titus's teaching on man's ethical freedom;¹²⁰ for Gross, however, it was more a question of Stoicism than Aristotelianism in Titus:

Schon oft wurde hier auf die mehr oder weniger wichtige Rolle hingewiesen, die bei den Kirchenschriftstellern, zumal den griechischen, ein im Intellektualismus und in der Freiheitslehre der Popularphilosophie wurzelter Moralismus spielt. Dieser rationalistische Moralismus stoischer Inspiration, der bei den bisher besprochenen Antiochenern die Auffassung von Sünde und Erlösung beherrscht, findet sich bei Titus von Bostra sozusagen in Reinkultur. Mit der Vorstellung von einer Erbverderbnis oder gar Erbschuld ist er schlechterdings unvereinbar.¹²¹

Gross further emphasised that in Book III Titus expressly distances himself from the traditional "Erbübel- und Erbverderbnislehre" by claiming that the historical condition of mankind is as God would have it from the beginning, and we have thus lost nothing with Adam's disobedience; Gross's knowledge of these chapters built at this juncture on Sickenberger's summary.¹²² Finally Gross actually proposed that Theodore of Mopsuestia's renowned teaching on the two Ages ("states", κατάστασεις) owed its origin in fact to Titus:

Die Zwei-Katastasen-Theorie spielt in der Theologie des Bischofs von Mopsuestia eine ausschlaggebende Rolle; . . . Nebenbei bemerkt, der eigentliche Urheber dieser Theorie scheint nicht Theodor zu sein, sondern dessen älterer Landsmann Titus von Bostra († 378).¹²³

¹¹⁷ Gross 1960, 179–90.

¹¹⁸ Gross 1960, 190–205.

¹¹⁹ Gross 1960, 176.

¹²⁰ Gross 1960, 177–79.

¹²¹ Gross 1960, 179.

¹²² Gross 1960, 179.

¹²³ Gross 1960, 194.

Various surveys of the history of the doctrine of original sin published after Gross neglected to include Titus;¹²⁴ on the other hand Titus is mentioned en passant in P.F. Beatrice's work, which certainly was marked by the same negative evaluation of the doctrine of original sin as in Gross, but otherwise differed from him in finding the doctrine of original sin pre-Augustinian. Beatrice thought that Augustine's "original sin" was essentially the same as concupiscentia, and being bound to the semen it was transferred through sexual intercourse and thus in a real sense was physically inherited. The roots of this belief lay with Julius Cassianus and his heretical Encratites, whom Clement of Alexandria treats in Stromata III.13ff. (91ff.),¹²⁵ and it was further developed by the Messalians. There are traces of this doctrine among individual ecclesiastical writers, such as Origen and Didymus the Blind, but mainly it was opposed by the Greek Church fathers as being both heretical and an uneducated, stupid and vulgar popular belief. In deriving Augustine's doctrine from Manichaeism the Pelagians continued another aspect of the Eastern Church's polemic, namely the attempt to identify the doctrine of original sin with the Manichaeism doctrine of evil, but this identification was incorrect. The Manichaeans' cosmological dualism with its coeternal principles is quite different from the dualism of the Encratites and Messalians, who held that evil was the result of the Fall of Adam and would be brought to an end at the resurrection of the dead—and this was the case despite a number of similarities between the Manichaeans and the Encratites and the fact that the Manichaeans were influenced by the Encratite tradition.¹²⁶

Theodore of Mopsuestia's understanding of death as being natural was typical of Greek patristics and in line with most of Clement of Alexandria's statements. In this context Beatrice also included Titus, Contra Manichaeos III.21 (→ Ch. XI.41), which, like Gross, he knew from Sickenberger's summary and which, as he pointed out, lies closer to Theodore both geographically and chronologically than Clement. Finally he noted that "[d]ottrina analoga viene presentata anche in un altro documento siriano coevo, le Constitutiones Apostolorum".¹²⁷

¹²⁴ Thus Rondet 1967; Testa 1970. Both writers are far removed from Gross's evaluations.

¹²⁵ Stählin 1906, 238.9ff.

¹²⁶ Beatrice 1978, esp. 243–59.

¹²⁷ Beatrice 1978, 244 n. 4.—As early as 1904 Turmel compared Theodore's

Although Beatrice's studies are singularly interesting, it is not possible to delve further into them here; I will merely mention that his interpretation of Augustine's doctrine of original sin as sexual desire transferred via sexual intercourse is in my opinion a caricature, just as the genealogy of the doctrine from the Encratites and Messalians is hardly tenable either. The question is whether we should not—to a far greater degree than Beatrice will admit—search for the preliminary stages of Augustine's doctrine of original sin among the early orthodox Church fathers, and whether Beatrice does not distort the picture by portraying Theodore's (and Titus's) position as typical.¹²⁸ In particular Gross's presentation of the Greek Church fathers has recently come under fire from the Catholic theologians, L. Scheffczyk and M. Hauke,¹²⁹ and theirs is the more legitimate interpretation in my opinion, despite the fact that they are wide of the mark in imagining "orthodoxy" and "heresy" to be two separate worlds. Scheffczyk and Hauke demonstrate how the Greek history of doctrine contains forms of thought similar to Augustine's doctrine, and thus they claim that many of the Eastern Church fathers came close to Augustine's position through other conceptual systems. As Eastern preliminary stages of the later doctrine they also underline, for example, that the death which is a consequence of the primeval sin is not merely a physical death but also the spiritual death of the soul, or that Irenaeus and other Greek Church fathers imagined that mankind is "in Adam" and therefore participates in his sin and fall.¹³⁰ statement with the Constitutiones Apostolorum, as well as with Theophilus of Antioch and Paul of Samosata (Turmel's work has unfortunately remained unavailable to me, but cf. the later ed., Turmel 1931, 75–77). The similarity between Theodore and Theophilus's thought was by and large rejected—and rightly so, in my opinion—in Slomkowski (1928, 129–31), who also stressed that our knowledge of Paul of Samosata's anthropology was too limited for a firm position to be taken on it in this context. Conversely, Slomkowski admitted similarities between the Constitutiones Apostolorum V.VII and Theodore's position. Also Gross (1960, 179) compared Titus's position with the Constitutiones Apostolorum; see also further below pp. 414–15.

¹²⁸ Cf. also the criticism of Beatrice in Lorenz 1980; De Simone 1980; Bonner 1981; Den Boeft 1981.

¹²⁹ Scheffczyk 1982; Hauke 1993. Criticism of Gross: Scheffczyk 1982, 5, 8–10; Hauke 1993, 40–42.

¹³⁰ Scheffczyk 1982 and Hauke 1993, passim.—These motives and similar ones, however, are summarised by Hauke (1993, 709) into the concept of "Erbunheil": "Kraft der Ursünde befindet sich jeder Mensch in einem Zustand, in dem er des von Christus geschenkten Heiles bedarf." Hauke (1993, 709–14) further states that the more privative "Erbunheil" also approaches a concept of sin and in particular contexts it includes the idea of mankind's common sin in an unsystematised way.

Hauke excludes the Antiochenes and Titus from his study, but in return they are treated in Scheffczyk's book, which understands "the Antiochene School" broadly and includes, for example, Eusebius of Caesarea, Cyril of Jerusalem and Epiphanius.¹³¹

Scheffczyk does not believe Gross was right to claim that writers such as Hegemonius and Titus denied a general "Verfallenheit":

Diese Linie, welche auf eine Verfallenheit der Welt nach oder auch schon in Folge der Adamssünde ausgerichtet war, findet auch keinen Abbruch durch die Tatsache, daß bestimmte, nicht unbedeutende Theologen dieser Schulrichtung über den Problemkomplex der Adamssünde schweigen, selbst wo sie die Fragen der Hamartologie berühren. Dieses Schweigen muß nicht als ein der Menschheitssünde widerständiges und ablehnendes Verschweigen gedeutet werden.¹³²

As for Titus, Scheffczyk bases his case on the first two books, noting that Titus links his teaching on the image of God in man to free will, but like Petüdidier some 300 years earlier he also points out that in II.16 Titus states, "daß der Mensch das Gutwerden nur mit Gottes Beistand zu verwirklichen vermag" (→ Ch. XI.20), and with an implicit criticism of both Sickenberger and Gross he continues:

In diese mehr philosophisch gehaltene Apologetik paßt offenbar zwar die Auffassung von der Vernunftgemäßheit der Tugend und der Naturwidrigkeit der Sünde hinein, nicht aber die geheimnishafte Spannung zwischen Sünde und Gnade in einer übergreifenden Heils- und Unheilsgeschichte. Wo im Rahmen einer philosophischen Anthropologie und Freiheitslehre solche tiefer gelegenen theologischen Schichten nicht erreicht wurden, sollte man aber die betreffenden Autoren auch nicht zu förmlichen Gegnern einer Natursünde oder einer sich anbahnenden Erbsündenauffassung stempeln. So erscheint es auch nicht begründet, Titus von Bostra als direkten Gegner einer Erbübel- oder Erbverderbnislehre auszugeben, weil er nämlich im dritten Buch seiner Kontroverschrift davon spricht, daß "wir von Anfang an . . . für die Lebensart geschaffen wurden, nach der wir leben, und der Ungehorsam das Geschöpf nicht änderte" (III 21). In einer Abhandlung, die gegen den Manichäismus vor allem die Unversehrtheit des menschlichen Wesens oder der Natur unter dem Einfluß des Bösen betonen möchte, hat eine solche Aussage eine gewisse positive Beweiskraft für sich. Sie spricht auch nicht grundsätzlich gegen die gläubige Gnaden- und Sündenauffassung, die ja auch im Punkte der Erbsünde so geartet ist, daß sie keine innerliche und ¹³¹ Scheffczyk 1982, 152–74.

¹³² Scheffczyk 1982, 163.

wesenhafte Verderbnis der geschaffenen Natur meint (weshalb später Augustin nur ungern von einer “Natursünde” sprach).¹³³

Scheffczyk adds, however, that accounts like Titus’s are examples of “eine zu starke Fixierung auf eine gegnerische Position”.¹³⁴ With regard to Theodore of Mopsuestia on the other hand Scheffczyk accepts that here a genuine denial is to be seen of the doctrine of original sin; in this connection Gross’s suggestion that the doctrine of the two Ages could originate with Titus, is transposed into a fact.¹³⁵

It is regrettable that like Beatrice before him, Scheffczyk has been unaware that nine years previously Nagel had already published the Greek text of Contra Manichaeos III.7–29 (Nagel 1973), that is, the text on which both Sickenberger and Gross had in particular based their evaluation of Titus, and that already in 1966 Nagel had analysed in summary form the argumentation in this section of Titus’s work.¹³⁶ The text is exceedingly interesting and, as we shall see, serves to undermine the main idea in Scheffczyk’s interpretation of Titus.

Since Gross’s work, all the other contributions to an understanding of Titus as a theological and philosophical writer have in one way or another been determined by an interest in Titus through a comparison with other anti-Manichaean works.¹³⁷ This is the case already with the work mentioned above by I. Hadot, which in a comparison between Simplicius’s polemic against the Manichaeans and other anti-Manichaean works demonstrated how Titus and the Neo-Platonist Simplicius employed the same Aristotelian distinction in their attacks on Manichaeism.¹³⁸ In so doing she became the first to document Sickenberger’s claim for Titus’s use of Aristotelian logic—apparently without a knowledge of Sickenberger’s book.

Hadot’s work was largely concerned with Simplicius, but it may also be said to represent an example of an increasing interest in ¹³³ Scheffczyk 1982, 163–64; the quotation from Contra Manich. III is, as Scheffczyk himself states, borrowed from Sickenberger.

¹³⁴ Scheffczyk 1982, 164.

¹³⁵ Scheffczyk 1982, 172: “Obgleich in der Christologie nicht ohne Bedeutung und nicht unorthodox, verhindert seine eigenwillige Anthropologie und seine von Titus von Bostra übernommene Zwei-Zeitalter-Lehre (καταστάσεις αἰώνες) doch die Anerkennung einer Sünde, die mehr sein könnte als die willentliche Gesetzesübertretung.”

¹³⁶ Nagel 1966; 1967; 1973. Cf. above pp. 83–84.

¹³⁷ The importance of the Church fathers’ anti-Manichaean polemic was especially emphasised in Nagel 1977.

¹³⁸ Hadot 1969, 44 (the Aristotelian distinction between e.g. white as substance and accident); Hadot refers to Titus in PG 18, I.22, 1097C = Gr. I.25, 16.21–22.

comparative studies of anti-Manichaean literature. Yet scholarship on anti-Manichaean literature is still in its infancy, despite the long-standing and intensive research into the problem of “Augustine and Manichaeism”.¹³⁹ Greek and Syriac anti-Manichaean literature has not aroused much response, apart from the Manichaean scholars who acquired some information on Manichaeism from these sources while remaining unconcerned about the genre in its own right.

Although the ostensible purpose of E. Beck’s study of Ephrem the Syrian’s polemic against Manichaeism¹⁴⁰ was also concerned with information on Manichaeism, its strength actually lies elsewhere. Beck incorporated both Augustine and a large amount of comparative material in Greek, including Titus, to illuminate and supplement Ephrem’s texts. The aim of Beck’s book, however, was to present the entire material from Ephrem’s polemic, which would serve to present the Manichaean system as closely to Mani’s original version as possible. Beck therefore sought to distinguish between what was justifiable and unjustifiable in the Church fathers’ criticism of Manichaeism. Measured in relation to this aim Beck’s book is unfortunately a failure, for it barely includes any original Manichaean literature, which is absolutely essential for the purpose, but if we ignore its aim, then as a study of anti-Manichaeism as such it is a pioneering work; it contains, for example, in-depth analyses of passages in Titus of Bostra that scholarship has so far left unexplored, and in the present context Beck’s contribution to an understanding of Titus’s philosophical position must be underlined.

Beck’s basic view is that Titus was a philosophical eclectic;¹⁴¹ in his teaching on the four elements (Contra Manichaeos II.50–54) Titus rejected Aristotle’s theory of elements and instead followed Empedocles and the Stoics, though on one point he followed Empedocles against the Stoics.¹⁴² Stoic influence also revealed itself in Titus’s references to κοινὰ ἔννοιαι¹⁴³ and his cosmological usage of the term τόπος.¹⁴⁴

¹³⁹ The subject is of course not only Augustine’s anti-Manichaean writings; see the overview of the most important studies in Van Oort 1995, 289–90 n. 1, as well as the articles in Van Oort, Wermelinger and Wurst 2001.

¹⁴⁰ Beck 1978; on this subject see also Mansour 1984.—Beck has also published short studies of Ephrem’s polemic against the Bardesanites (Beck 1978a) and Marcionites (Beck 1978b).

¹⁴¹ Cf. Beck 1978, 85 n. 62.

¹⁴² Beck 1978, 116–19.

¹⁴³ Beck 1978, 85 with n. 62.

¹⁴⁴ Beck 1978, 70.

When Titus bases his criticism of the Manichaean myth on the essential kinship between the knower and the object of knowledge, Beck speaks of “[eine] Gebrauchsphilosophie stoischer Färbung”,¹⁴⁵ in addition, Titus’s understanding of ethical action, where the will is subject to reason, is “genuinely Greek” and with a Stoic cast.¹⁴⁶ On the other hand Beck described Titus’s doctrine of “the parts” of the soul as Platonic.¹⁴⁷ He also drew attention to Titus’s ability to use the term οὐσία with greater philosophical precision than other Christian polemicists against Manichaeism,¹⁴⁸ and to the fact that in Contra Manichaeos IV.19 Titus precisely points out that ὕλη is not alive nor has any movement of its own accord, according to Aristotle, as is the case with ὕλη according to Mani (→ Ch. XI.46).¹⁴⁹

Titus also received considerable attention in a valuable article by S.N.C. Lieu in 1986, “Some Themes in Later Roman Anti-Manichaean Polemics”,¹⁵⁰ which describes a number of themes in both Christian and Neo-Platonic anti-Manichaean literature. In this context Lieu also dealt with Titus’s theodicy in Book II.¹⁵¹ A similar article by S. and G.G. Stroumsa from 1988, which was concerned with Christian, Neo-Platonic, Zoroastrian and early Islamic anti-Manichaean polemic, also contains many references to Titus.

A further work by G.G. Stroumsa on Titus and Alexander of Lycopolis is apparently of an earlier date but was not published until 1992.¹⁵² According to Stroumsa, Titus understood Manichaeism in a philosophical context and as an attempt to solve the problem of evil; the Manichaeans were also able from early on to develop a highly sophisticated theoretical argumentation for their dualism.¹⁵³ Titus himself was not a philosopher, but according to Stroumsa he had been well trained in rhetoric and possessed a certain knowledge ¹⁴⁵ Beck 1978, 85.

¹⁴⁶ Beck 1978, 61, 150.

¹⁴⁷ Beck 1978, 122, 150–51.

¹⁴⁸ Beck 1978, 30–31.

¹⁴⁹ Beck 1978, 57–58.

¹⁵⁰ Originally published Lieu 1986; 1986a, but an updated version was reprinted in Lieu 1994, 156–202, to which I refer. Cf. also Lieu 1992, who gives ample treatment of anti-Manichaean polemic (on Titus 132–33).

¹⁵¹ Lieu 1994, 183–88.

¹⁵² Stroumsa 1992; a French version of both Stroumsa and Stroumsa 1988 and Stroumsa 1992 was also published in the same year (Stroumsa 1992a, 355–77 and 329–40 respectively).

¹⁵³ Stroumsa 1992, 339.

of general philosophical terminology and arguments, both Platonic and Stoic.¹⁵⁴ In Books I–II Titus employs a rational argumentation against dualism, claiming universal value since he is arguing only from κοινὰ ἔννοια; this term is admittedly Stoic in origin, but Titus uses it in a broad rather than a technical sense: κοινὰ ἔννοια means the rational grounds as to why dualism is unconvincing.¹⁵⁵ However, the chapters in Titus’s theodicy that argue for God’s Providence in the form of a cosmic harmony and are therefore concerned with such phenomena as earthquakes, disease or wild animals, have a Stoic stamp.¹⁵⁶ Yet it was Stroumsa’s view that “Titus’s major philosophical frame of reference remains Platonism”,¹⁵⁷ as is clear from Titus’s concept of God: according to Stroumsa, Titus partly attacked Manichaeism’s corporeal view of God, claiming instead that God was incorporeal of nature,¹⁵⁸ and partly claimed that the concept of ἀρχή of necessity implies “unicity”, so that dualism is logically impossible.¹⁵⁹

Through a comparison with Alexander of Lycopolis Stroumsa also sought to place Titus’s view of “matter” philosophically. He believed that Alexander’s somewhat un-Platonic view was that matter should be derived from the first principle and could not therefore be regarded as evil, though he failed to explain what the origin of evil was otherwise. Moreover it was Alexander’s otherwise sound Platonic view that matter has no real existence.¹⁶⁰ Nor did Titus think that matter is linked to evil; since the world is created by God, who by definition is good, no part of the world at all is evil. It is not matter but evil that has no objective existence. Evil is sin and comes from the weakness of the free will.¹⁶¹ Stroumsa added that from Basil the Great and Augustine onwards this negative concept of evil become the standard solution in Greek and Latin patristics and later in Neo-Platonism too; Christian theology thus appears to have been quicker to draw a conclusion that was only potentially contained in Neo-

¹⁵⁴ Stroumsa 1992, 338: “Titus, on his part, while no philosopher, is the bearer of a good rhetorical education, and shows a certain knowledge of koinē philosophical vocabulary and arguments—both Platonic and Stoic”.

¹⁵⁵ Stroumsa 1992, 339–40. Cf. Stroumsa and Stroumsa 1988, 41.

¹⁵⁶ Stroumsa 1992, 342–43.

¹⁵⁷ Stroumsa 1992, 343.

¹⁵⁸ Stroumsa 1992, 341, 342, 343.

¹⁵⁹ Stroumsa 1992, 342, 343.

¹⁶⁰ Stroumsa 1992, 340–41.

¹⁶¹ Stroumsa 1992, 341; cf. 348 n. 39.

Platonism's hierarchical thought.¹⁶² Summarising, Stroumsa maintained that Manichaeism was not a challenge to Alexander and Titus respectively on the same point: the issue concerning the status of matter (and "the nature of intermediary powers") was the challenge for Alexander, who represented "an emanationist ontology", whereas theodicy was the challenge for Titus, since the problem of evil demanded a justification of the Demiurge in "a creationist ontology".¹⁶³ The central similarity between the two writers was that both wanted to defend Providence.¹⁶⁴

K. Fitschen's study of Serapion's Adversus Manichaeos from 1992 also contains a valuable comparison between motifs in that book and those in other anti-Manichaean works, including Titus.¹⁶⁵ Fitschen's study was already available to W.W. Klein, who in 1991 published the first monograph on Greek anti-Manichaean literature, another book which deserves the epithet 'pioneering'. Klein also noted that work on the Christian anti-Manichaean literature had hardly begun; only a few critical editions and translations exist. The entire literature has been examined almost solely by Manichaean scholars seeking information on Manichaeism, in particular fragments of original Manichaean texts. Since this information is scanty and not particularly trustworthy, hätte es nahegelegen, die Antimanichaica als geistesgeschichtliche Quellen für die Fortsetzung des Kampfes gegen die Gnosis und für das sich konstituierende Christentum zu erforschen

but no scholar of the History of Religions, of Byzantine culture or patristics has noticed the significance of this literature.¹⁶⁶

Specifically, Klein studied only Greek Christian works whose explicit subject was the religion that Mani founded, including of course original Greek works that are now only preserved in translation (e.g. parts of Acta Archelai or Titus),¹⁶⁷ and he began with an overview of these works.¹⁶⁸ His main purpose, however, was to demonstrate their importance by gathering their arguments systematically according ¹⁶² Stroumsa 1992, 341–342.

¹⁶³ Stroumsa 1992, 343.

¹⁶⁴ Stroumsa 1992, 345.

¹⁶⁵ Fitschen 1992, 3–57.

¹⁶⁶ Klein 1991, 1–3.

¹⁶⁷ Klein 1991, 6–7, 11.

¹⁶⁸ Klein 1991, 15–50; 40–42 treats Titus of Bostra.

to the main themes of the polemic or the apologetics¹⁶⁹ in order finally to collate the results as regards the aims and methods of the polemic.¹⁷⁰

Klein himself mentioned a large number of areas that he was unable to cover in his study, such as the question of the inter-dependence of the anti-Manichaean texts, or the origin of the arguments in Christian polemic against the Jews, Gnostics and Marcionites and in Greek and Hellenistic philosophy, including Neo-Platonic anti-Manichaean texts. Furthermore Klein dealt neither with the issue of how the anti-Manichaean concern influenced the exegesis of many of the Church fathers, nor with the question of the polemic as a source of knowledge about Manichaeism.¹⁷¹

The present study sets out to make a contribution in some of these areas, including the issue of inter-dependence in anti-Manichaean texts. But I hope especially to answer the question of the origin of some of the philosophical arguments.¹⁷²

Here it should be noted that it is a common feature of the limited studies of Titus's philosophical background that have been published since Sickenberger's work appeared that they emphasise Titus's use of doctrines derived from several philosophical schools. When Beck chose the term "eclecticism" to describe Titus's standpoint, he possibly intended it merely as a description without any real evaluation. In the history of ancient philosophy the term was otherwise often used to indicate that philosophers in the period from c. 100 BCE to c. 200 CE arbitrarily took over various doctrines and juxtaposed them without regard to their philosophical coherence. Since this assessment has often rested on a superficial knowledge of the writers in question, it is now used less often.¹⁷³ Among the Church fathers the term is particularly applied to Clement of Alexandria, who in Stromata I.7 (37.6) describes his philosophy as a "selection" (ἐκλεκτικὸν) of the good thoughts to be found in the teachings of the various schools of philosophy.¹⁷⁴ However, Lilla has convinc-

¹⁶⁹ Klein 1991, 51–204.

¹⁷⁰ Klein 1991, 205–28.

¹⁷¹ Klein 1991, 3–5.

¹⁷² At this juncture, where I present an overview of Titus scholarship, I can also mention that I have produced a brief outline which can be seen as a preparatory study of the present monograph (Pedersen 1996a).

¹⁷³ See Donini 1988; Dillon and Long 1988, 1–6; Blumenthal 1996, 9.

¹⁷⁴ Stählin 1906, 25.2. See e.g. Donini 1988, 16, 17, 20, 31, 33.

ingly established that Clement was no greater an “eclectic” than his contemporary pagan Middle-Platonists.¹⁷⁵ What is important to note is that just because a philosophy contains elements of various origin, it does not mean that it is per se uncritical or inconsistent. Of course, the question of coherence in the philosophers’ thought cannot be immediately identified with the question of philosophical coherence in the Church fathers; in particular one must observe that many Church fathers had no intention of being philosophers. For example, even though Irenaeus’s concept of God is marked by popular philosophical ideas, and he sees no clash between revelation and reason, he clearly lacks a consciousness of philosophical problems.¹⁷⁶ On the other hand, one must realise partly that it was not philosophical problems that Irenaeus wished to solve, and partly that as one of the first writers to seek to show the unity of the two testaments, he possessed no fully-fledged concepts and solutions, but had to feel his way.¹⁷⁷ Other Church fathers, especially Origen, were better schooled philosophically, but otherwise it is often just a matter of isolated philosophical arguments being applied ad hoc. Thus the individual arguments of the Church fathers, insofar as they are “philosophical”, can naturally be evaluated as philosophy, and the result in the opinion of some critics leaves a lot to be desired; another side of the issue is to what extent did the Church fathers adopt philosophical doctrines that did not allow what may be regarded as the true intention of Christianity to flourish—instead of criticising them.¹⁷⁸

It is nevertheless not unreasonable to suggest that in his first two books Titus himself wishes to be a philosopher. True, he does not use the word as such, but his programme is concerned with pre-

¹⁷⁵ Lilla 1971, 2, 51–56.

¹⁷⁶ Irenaeus’s philosophical knowledge was strictly limited and rested largely on doxographical material; yet he nevertheless employed a range of rational arguments of philosophical origin whose content helped to determine his idea of God. On the other hand Irenaeus appears to have received a good rhetorical education (see further in Grant 1967, 158–69 [= 1949]; Schoedel 1959; Meijering 1975, 19–38; Vallée 1981, 12–16).

¹⁷⁷ Hugo Koch, who otherwise endeavoured to find as much consistency in Irenaeus’s ideas as possible, remarked (1925, 213): “In der Tat kann einen dieser doctor constructivus et confusus des Frühkatholizismus zur Verzweiflung bringen, wenn man klare und scharfe Begriffe bei ihm sucht.” Also D’Alès (1916, 185) thought that it was just as difficult to orient oneself in Irenaeus’s position as it was in a jungle.

¹⁷⁸ See e.g. Stead 1976a; 1982.

senting a universal rational argument without including the Bible. If therefore Titus has employed philosophical arguments inconsistently, in that he has selected them arbitrarily in order to attack Manichaeism, they rebound on himself, measured by his own yardstick. On the other hand, inasmuch as Titus does not draw up a philosophical system, it can never be fully determined whether or not he was merely an "eclectic". In what follows, however, I shall build on Stroumsa's view that "Platonism" was Titus's "major philosophical frame of reference". In relation to the whole of Titus's age it is by far the most likely assumption. Instead of regarding Titus as an "eclectic" the working hypothesis must be that the Stoic and Aristotelian elements in Titus appear because such elements were integrated into the Platonism of the day. On the other hand I shall not consider the degree of inconsistency in Titus's philosophy but merely suggest that such inconsistency as there is in Books I and II of Contra Manichaeos is due rather to ineptitude than to a consistent method.

As can be seen, the relevance of the question of Titus's philosophical position naturally follows on from the history of scholarship in the area, and it is of interest to note that just as some of the Manichaean-orientated Titus scholarship revolves around the relation of his sources to philosophy, so does the patristic Titus scholarship focus on Titus's own relation to philosophy. This similarity makes it probable that the two lines of Titus scholarship have more in common with one another than has otherwise been outlined within the scholarship traditions. The division into two types of question—what does Titus tell us about Manichaeism, and what did he himself believe?—is meaningful enough, but a rigid separation between them cannot be maintained; they are internally linked and all the time must be related to one another.

The question of Titus's relation to the doctrine of original sin is connected both to his anti-Manichaeism and to his philosophical orientation. If Titus really did reject a "doctrine of original sin", was it linked to his confrontation with Manichaeism, to philosophical influences or to both? These are the various strands that I shall attempt to bring together in my interpretation of Titus.

5. Text transmission and history of editions

Titus of Bostra wrote his work in Greek, but only a part of the Greek original is preserved.¹⁷⁹ One of the two important manuscripts is G = Congregazione della Missione urbana di S. Carlo, Genoa, cod. 27 (also 37), a parchment codex from the 11th century that has never been edited,¹⁸⁰ and which on f. 8–78 contains Τίτου ἐπισκόπου κατὰ Μανιχαίων, which is the same part of Titus that was published in De Lagarde 1859, 1.1–69.27 (I.1–III.7), although G f. 16r–37v contains a lengthy interpolation between αἰὼνας and ἡ ἀγένητος, Gr. 11.4 that has been transmitted in all manuscripts dependent on G.

The first of these is A (= Biblioteca angelica, cod. lat. 229) from the 17th century.¹⁸¹ The second is B (= cod. vat. gr. 1491 [olim 1522]), an unpublished paper manuscript from the 16th century, which according to Nagel contains the Titus text f. 13r–112r (and the interpolation 22v–55r).¹⁸² The third, which is indirectly dependent on G, is H (= Hamburg, Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek, cod. phil. 306 [olim Stadtbibliothek, Philosophi gr. in fol. XVI]); this too is a paper manuscript from the 17th century which formerly belonged to Lukas Holste, who either acquired it or copied it in the Vatican library. H is a copy of B and contains the Titus text on pp. 25–202 (and the interpolation on pp. 42–99).¹⁸³ The fourth and last is the Greek Titus text ff. 192–260r in the manuscript Vat. lat. 6221 from the beginning of the 17th century, which according to Poirier seems to go back to G via B.¹⁸⁴

¹⁷⁹ The following presentation is based on Brinkmann 1894; Sickenberger 1901, 8ff.; Casey 1928; Nagel 1967, 8–16; Nagel 1973, 285–93; Poirier 1989–1990; Poirier 1990–91; Poirier and Sensal 1990a.

¹⁸⁰ The manuscript was mentioned for the first time in Pitra 1888, 44–46; cf. 57–63, where on the basis of a collation of the text of G and Basnage's text in PG 18 Pitra carried a list of variants in G which, however, is incomplete (Pitra 1888, 59 n. 3). There is a description of G in Ehrhard 1893, 204–5, and in Palau 1996, 49–65.

¹⁸¹ Casey 1928, 102 n. 11; Nagel 1967, 9 n. 28; Poirier 1989–1990, 367.

¹⁸² According to Nagel 1967, 9; B is described in Giannelli 1950, 10–12 (1491).

¹⁸³ Described in Omont 1890, 361–62. See also the catalogue Philologica hamburgensia, 6 No. 15.

¹⁸⁴ See Sickenberger 1901, 11; but esp. Petitmengin 1988, 132 (who states that the Greek text is accompanied by a Latin translation by Jean Matthieu Caryophyllis); Poirier 1989–1990, 368; Poirier 1990–91, 325 (the copy of the Latin translation of Titus is not by Caryophyllis, but it is corrected by him; the Greek Titus-text is

As mentioned above, Torres' translation of Titus into Latin was published in 1604¹⁸⁵ and reprinted in 1610 and 1618; it is now easily available in Migne PG 18, 1069–1258. Torres drew on a Greek source, the text of which was identical with the text in G, according to Casey.¹⁸⁶ Torres' translation has no text-critical importance according to Nagel,¹⁸⁷ but in my opinion it can be used with caution as an aid to the interpretation of Titus. Moreover, Torres understood already back then that the interpolation created a break in the line of thought in the text and he therefore excised it, though he unfortunately came to omit a little piece of Titus's text (corresponding to Gr. 10.36 [from δοῦν]-11.4 [up to and including αἰῶνας; see PG 18, 1087B]); he placed the excised passage, which he continued to regard as a part of Titus's work, partly at the end of Book I (in PG 18, 1115A [from "Si vero vultis"] to 1132C) and partly as Titus's Book III, in that he considered III.1–7 to be no more than a "Praefatio in librum tertium".¹⁸⁸

Torres's solution to the problem of the interpolation was taken up in Basnage's editio princeps of the Greek text from 1725, which built on Johann Friederich Winckler's copy of H. Basnage also added Torres's translation, even though it was based on a different manuscript than H.¹⁸⁹ Together with Torres's translation Basnage's edition was reprinted by Andreas Gallandi in 1769¹⁹⁰ and (from Gallandi) in 1857 in Migne PG 18, 1069–1258 (and later reprints of Migne). Finally, Basnage's text was reprinted in Athens in 1959 (from Migne's printing).¹⁹¹

De Lagarde's observation that the interpolation was missing in the Syriac version of Titus meant that it could not belong to Titus's Contra Manichaeos, and he therefore removed it from the Titus text in his new edition of H from 1859, already mentioned several times copied by Jean de Sainte-Maur): since the manuscript only contains Titus until III.7, it is also dependent on G; probably via B.

¹⁸⁵ Canisius 1604, 31–142.

¹⁸⁶ Casey 1928, 98–100. Cf. Petitmengin 1988, 135.

¹⁸⁷ Nagel 1967, 13–14.

¹⁸⁸ In Nagel 1967, 14–15 there is a more detailed outline of how the individual parts of the interpolation are arranged in Torres. Cf. also Brinkmann 1894, 480–81.

¹⁸⁹ Basnage 1725, 56–162.

¹⁹⁰ Gallandi 1769, 269–350. In addition Oratio in ram. palm. (see below p. 129) was published in Gallandi 1769, 350–56.

¹⁹¹ Τίτος Βόστρων etc. in Βιβλιοθήκη Ἑλλήνων Πατέρων καὶ Ἐκκλησιαστικῶν Συγγραφέων; XIX. Contra Manich. is on pp. 12–108 and Oratio in ram. palm. (cf. below p. 129) on pp. 109–16.

above. De Lagarde consigned the interpolation to an appendix (De Lagarde 1859, 69.28–103.16). Nagel says of De Lagarde's new edition of H:

Die Edition LAGARDES ist trotz mancher Nachteile—subjektiv bedingt durch die übliche Manier seiner Textausgaben, objektiv durch den jungen Textzeugen—immer noch die einzig brauchbare Ausgabe.¹⁹²

The question now was from which text did the long interpolation actually stem.¹⁹³ The problem was solved in 1894 by August Brinkmann, who proved that the interpolation belonged to Serapion of Thmuis's Adversus Manichaeos, which through a mistaken exchange of quires and leaves in G had not only entered the Titus text but had done so in disorder.¹⁹⁴

The second of the two important Greek manuscripts is V = Athos Vatopaedi No. 236, an unpublished parchment codex from the 12th century,¹⁹⁵ in which f. 59v–95v contain Τίτου ἐπισκόπου κατὰ Μανιχαίων; in other words this includes, in addition to De Lagarde's edited text, the conclusion of III.7, III.8–29 and the beginning of III.30. In the catalogue of manuscripts at the Vatopedi Monastery from 1924 the title is incorrectly given as τοῦ αὐτοῦ κατὰ Μανιχαίων and is therefore assigned to Serapion's preceding Adversus Manichaeos (Σεραπίωνος ἐπισκόπου Θμουέως κατὰ Μανιχαίων).¹⁹⁶ However, Casey proved what the correct title was, and could thus verify both De Lagarde's and Brinkmann's results, for V does not contain the interpolation, but gives f. 64v the text αἰῶνας ἢ ἀγένητος without a break. Thus V is independent of G, B and H; but in Casey's opinion G and V are copies of a common, vanished manuscript. Finally Casey showed that the interpolation is found again in the order reconstructed by Brinkmann in the Serapion text of V.¹⁹⁷

On this basis Nagel noted that a critical edition of the Greek text cannot build on either B or H, but only on G and V. Where G and ¹⁹² Nagel 1967, 16. Casey 1928, 105: "Lagarde's text is at best an accurate copy of H, to which a few happy conjectures have been added."

¹⁹³ Dräseke (1887) was the first after De Lagarde to take a stance on the problem, but his solution that the interpolation contained George of Laodicea's lost anti-Manichaean writing was wrong; cf. Brinkmann 1894, 487 n. 1.

¹⁹⁴ Brinkmann 1894.

¹⁹⁵ Eustratiades and Arcadios 1924, 52 points to the 11th cent., but Casey 1931, 3; Nagel 1973, 292 n. 16; and Poirier 1989–1990, 367 date V to the 12th cent.

¹⁹⁶ Eustratiades and Arcadios 1924, 52.

¹⁹⁷ Casey 1928.

a new edition of Sy's version of III.7–29, as well as the beginning of III.30 (i.e. corresponding to the part of V that Nagel edited on the same occasion), together with a German translation.²⁰³

Despite the help afforded by De Lagarde's editions scholarship on Titus has remained slight, as can be seen from the historical summary presented here. This is presumably due to the inadequacy and unavailability of these editions, and De Lagarde himself was aware of the need to make the full text available; he therefore planned a translation into German, but unfortunately it never came to anything.²⁰⁴

At least five times in the course of the last hundred years plans have been drawn up for a critical edition of the entire Titus corpus, or at least of the Greek text, but each time these plans have stranded. The first time, around 1900, the intention was that Brinkmann and L. Nix should produce an edition; although the project fell through, Nix did manage an unpublished translation in German of the Syriac version of Titus.²⁰⁵ Casey also planned an edition,²⁰⁶ and in this case it also looks as if the project was actually nearing completion when the manuscript disappeared into the depths unaltered in Hannover in 1924, and De Lagarde 1859 and 1859a have been reprinted together as reproductio phototypica in Osnabrück 1967.

²⁰³ Nagel 1967, 26–80; however, only the German translation has been published in Nagel 1973. With regard to Nagel's Habilitationsschrift it must be emphasised that it also contains a very valuable introduction (Nagel 1967, 1–24) and indexes (Nagel 1967, 115–203).

²⁰⁴ See the foreword in De Lagarde 1859a; Rahlfs 1928, 57. According to Rahlfs (1928, 57 n. 3) a handwritten concordance is a preliminary work to this translation. The concordance is the most important testimony to De Lagarde's continued interest in Titus, and it is to be found in "Niedersächsische Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek, Göttingen". The concordance and two other relevant notes are also mentioned with the numbers Lagarde 53–55 in Die Handschriften in Göttingen, Universitätsbibliothek (Verzeichniss der Handschriften im preussischen Staate; I,3). Berlin 1894. These relate firstly to the concordance to De Lagarde 1859, alphabetically arranged according to Greek words, and with references to the Syriac (No. 55), secondly to De Lagarde's own copy of his edition of Sy (1859a) with a few additions (No. 53), and thirdly to his own copy of De Lagarde 1859, where on pp. 1–7 he has handwritten some very minor improvements of the text (No. 54). I have acquired copies of this material and also used it to some extent (as regards the concordance). My attention to the material was originally drawn by Byard Bennett.

²⁰⁵ Nagel 1967, 13 (it was available to Nagel in manuscript); Nagel 1973, 292 n. 21. Nix's translation of (most of) Contra Manich. III.30–IV in type was kindly made available to me in 1994 by Professor Paul-Hubert Poirier. Cf. also Sickenberger 1901, VI, 10 n. 7, 12.

²⁰⁶ Casey 1937, 1588. On the other hand Casey 1928, 109 n. 22 mentions plans for an edition by Casey and F.C. Burkitt.

of the sea on a ship that was torpedoed in the Second World War.²⁰⁷ An edition was also planned by H. Lietzmann and A. Baumstark and again by C.R.C. Allberry and H.H. Schaefer.²⁰⁸ After Allberry's death, the task of continuing Allberry's edition was taken up by A. Böhlig.²⁰⁹ Until recently P.-H. Poirier and C. Sensal were also preparing a French translation of Sy, but oral reports have informed me that this project has also been abandoned. Some articles were published in connection with this project, however.²¹⁰ Meanwhile, a new edition from E. Hunter of the Syriac text of Titus in the series Syriaca of Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum has recently been promised.²¹¹

In short, no collected translation of Titus into a modern language has ever seen the light of day, even though short passages have been translated in many of the studies to which the present book refers.²¹²

This account of the Titus tradition is not quite complete. In addition to the manuscripts G, V and Sy, a number of fragments of Contra Manichaeos exist, preserved in other works, as follows.

Firstly, in his Bibliotheca Photius excerpts a writing by the tritheist Stephanus Gobarus (after 560), who quotes Titus I.15 (Gr. 8.31–35 → Ch. XI.6).²¹³ Interestingly, a comparison of G, V and Sy shows

²⁰⁷ In an e-mail (24th Oct. 2001) S.N.C. Lieu has referred me to the brief biography of Casey in Birdsall and Thomson 1963, 9, which says: "Returning to the U.S.A. in 1940 he was torpedoed in the Athenia and lost the notes of his previous fifteen years work." Lieu himself adds: "It does not say specifically that he had finished his GCS edition but from his other writings and comments I have picked up from an earlier generation of scholars (most of whom are no longer alive), I learned that he was busily editing the final version of the Athos text of Titus for GCS when he left for the US."

²⁰⁸ Reitzenstein 1931, 47; Nagel 1973, 292 n. 21. See also Lewis 1984, 11, 60–61 n. 1, 80. Some of Allberry's drafts from the Schaefer-Allberry-project are preserved, incl. an incomplete Syriac-Greek index found among his papers in the Faculty of Oriental Studies Library, Cambridge which I have occasionally used in the studies behind the present book. I owe this information originally to S. Giversen.

²⁰⁹ According to a letter from Böhlig of 26th August 1953 to Allberry's widow, quoted in Lewis 1984, 11.

²¹⁰ Thus a study of the way Sy translates from Greek: Poirier and Sensal 1990a (cf. here already Gressmann 1903, 45 n. 2); as well as Poirier 1989–90 and 1990–91. Poirier also generously gave me access in 1994 to the provisional translation of Books I–II (Poirier and Sensal 1990; a translation of the Syriac version to French with a critical apparatus).

²¹¹ Clackson, Hunter and Lieu 1998, ix.

²¹² It would take up too much space to note all these pieces, but see also the English translations of Titus II.7, PG 18, 1145A–C (= Gr. II.15, 32.30–33.12); II.14, PG 18, 1160C–1161C (= Gr. II.24, 41.4–42.14); and II.22, PG 18, 1177B–1180A (= Gr. II.41–42, 50.22–51.16) in Walsh and Walsh 1985, 53–57.

²¹³ Photius, Bibl., cod. 232 (288b24–30) (Henry 1967, 70–71). Stephanus Gobarus's that on certain points this fragment and Sy differ in the same way from G and V,—the fragment thus appears to contain earlier readings than G and V.

Secondly, John of Damascus carries a number of quotes from Titus of Bostra in his Sacra Parallela. Migne, PG 18, 1257D–1264A publishes 5 fragments (from Codex Rupefucaldinus),²¹⁴ and in Pitra there are 6 fragments from Codex Coislinianus 276, which represent the original form of the first book of the Sacra Parallela. Pitra also published his collation of Codex Rupefucaldinus with Codex Coislinianus 276 in connection with two further fragments contained in both these manuscripts. In passing it should be noted that Pitra's edition contains many errors, which, however, were later corrected by Casey.²¹⁵

The Sacra Parallela fragments are as follows: Fr. I, PG 18, 1257 D–1260C is identical with Fr. III, Pitra 1888, 52–54 and is found again in IV.99–101, Sy (part of the fragment → Ch. XI.50–51).²¹⁶ Secondly, Fr. II, PG 18, 1260D–1261A comes from II.15, Gr. 32.37–33.2.²¹⁷ Thirdly, Fr. III, PG 18, 1261AB is from II.27, Gr. 43.18–32, and is also found in Codex Coislinianus 276, the variants of which were edited in Pitra 1888, 63 and Casey 1928, 109. Fourthly, Fr. IV, PG 18, 1261C–1264A comes from II.48–49, Gr. 56.23–57.2, and is also found in Codex Coislinianus 276, the variants of which florilegium collected conflicting patristic statements (see Bardy 1947 on this florilegium, Bardy 1947, 7–8, 13–14, 27 on the Titus quotation). In what follows, Photius notes that Stephanus Gobarus also quoted Titus for the view that at his second coming Christ will be without flesh and only with divinity (Photius, Bibl., cod. 232 [289a17–18] [Henry 1967, 71–72]). Bardy 1947, 8 n. 4 (cf. 14) suggested that this passage perhaps came from Contra Manich. IV, which Henry 1967, 72 n. 1 doubted. However, neither of them consulted Sy. No passage exists that really corresponds to what Stephanus Gobarus meant; it might possibly, however, be a bizarre reading of Contra Manich. IV.76, Sy 165.20ff., where at his coming Christ will cast the Devil and his supporters into the place of punishment—“only through the revelation of his divinity” (ܡܫܗܘܡܠܟܐ ܕܠܝܠܐ ܕܡܘܨܐ ܡܥ, Sy 165.22).

²¹⁴ Reprinted from Gallandi 1769, 351–56, who in turn had them from Lequien 1712, 747, 763–64, 783, 785, 788–89; they can also be found in Migne PG 96, 467–68, 485–88, 529–30, 533–34, 539–40. See further in Sickenberger 1901, 8–9.

²¹⁵ See Holl 1896 on Sac. Par. and Holl 1896, 183 on the 7 fragments in Codex Coislinianus 276. The 6 fragments exist in Pitra 1888, 51–57 and the collation in Pitra 1888, 63; cf. on these fragments the corrections in Casey 1928, 106–9.

²¹⁶ Cf. Sickenberger 1901, 13 n. 1.

²¹⁷ Although it is not mentioned in Migne, PG 18, this fragment exists twice in somewhat different form in Lequien 1712, 747 (= Migne, PG 96, 467–68) and 785 (= Migne, PG 96, 533–34).

were edited in Pitra 1888, 63 and Casey 1928, 108–9 (part of the fragment → Ch. XI.30–31). Fifthly, Fr. V, PG 18, 1264A comes from IV.91, Sy (→ Ch. XI.48).²¹⁸ All these fragments are already identified in PG, with the natural exception of the two from Book IV.

With regard to Pitra's fragments Fr. I, Pitra 1888, 51 comes from I.18, Gr. 10.35–11.4; Fr. II, Pitra 1888, 51–52 does not belong at all to Titus's work but is a fragment from Serapion of Thmuis's Adversus Manichaeos.²¹⁹ Fr. III, Pitra 1888, 52–54 (with corrections in Casey 1928, 107) is also found as mentioned as Fr. I, PG 18, 1257D-1260C and again in IV.99–101, Sy (part of the fragment → Ch. XI.50–51). Fr. IV, Pitra 1888, 54–56 (with corrections in Casey 1928, 107–8) is from II.21, Gr. 37.15–38.26. Fr. V, Pitra 1888, 56 (with corrections in Casey 1928, 108) comes from II.43, Gr. 52.7–23. And finally, Fr. VI, Pitra 1888, 57 (cf. Casey 1928, 108) is from II.16, Gr. 34.10–14 (part of the fragment → Ch. XI.20). Pitra also identified Fr. I, IV and V, and also Fr. III with Fr. I in PG.

Thirdly, various unpublished quotations from Titus's Contra Manichaeos also exist in Syriac manuscripts,²²⁰ which I have not consulted, however.

As can be seen, the conditions for the provision of a new critical edition have long been present. The confusing interpolation in G is no longer a problem. A, B, H and Vat. lat. 6221 are based solely ²¹⁸ Cf. Sickenberger 1901, 13 n. 1.

²¹⁹ See Sickenberger 1901, 8 with n. 7.

²²⁰ i. A fragment of what corresponds to IV.39, Sy 148.4–9, but in another translation, exists in a Syriac florilegium which is preserved in two manuscripts (British Museum Add. 14,532 from the 8th cent., Wright 1871, 955b–967a [DCCCLVIII] and British Museum Add. 14,538 from c. 10th cent., Wright 1871, 1003b–1008b [DCCCLXIII], esp. 1007b): see Van Roey 1984, 131 (cf. Poirier and Sensal 1990a, 310 n. 19).

ii. A quotation in a manuscript from the 11th cent., British Museum Add. 14,731 (described in Wright 1871, 852a–855b [DCCCXXVII]) from “Titus of Bostra: ܡܪܘܨ ܕܠܝܘܩܢܝܘܨ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ, fol. 73 a” is mentioned in Wright 1871, 855a; it is included as a quotation in “[a] treatise of Moses bar Kīphā bishop of Moṣul and Nineveh, on freewill and predestination, divided into four discourses.” (Wright 1871, 853ab).

iii. A quotation in a manuscript from the 8th or 9th cent., British Museum Add. 14,533 (described in Wright 1871, 967a–976a [DCCCLIX]) from “Titus of Bostra, ܡܪܘܨ ܕܠܝܘܩܢܝܘܨ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ” is included in Text “51. Of the reason and the soul, ܡܘܨܘܠ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ ܕܡܘܨܘܠ, Fol. 179 a” after “[e]xtracts from Didymus of Alexandria,” . . . “Epiphanius, the Ancoratus” and “Severus, hom. epithron. xxi.” (Wright 1871, 975a).

on G, so that the only Greek text transmission of significance lies in G and V (ignoring a few fragments). A critical edition can therefore be based on G, V and Sy—but unfortunately it still does not exist. It might therefore seem hazardous to publish a study of the theology and sources of Titus of Bostra, when the critical edition of his work is still outstanding. Conversely, however, it might be argued that one of the reasons why no critical edition has ever reached publication is that Contra Manichaeos has not been regarded of particular significance. If this is true, it is to be hoped that studies such as the present one will invest the work of a new edition with sufficient prestige that it will one day be completed.

It would be irresponsible of me if my studies were undertaken without regard to the fact that the best edition of the Greek text (De Lagarde 1859) is only an edition of the late manuscript H. I have thus attempted to secure my results through limited, text-critical work that concerns itself solely with those passages that have been translated or quoted directly in the present study or are otherwise central to my argument. Where there are deviations from De Lagarde's text, I have included the passages in question in Ch. XI together with a critical apparatus and a translation, and I have also attempted to give these passages a little more extensive context so as to afford the reader independent access to central ways of thinking in Titus. Where there is no deviation from De Lagarde's text, the original text and translation are not included in Ch. XI.

By 'deviations' from De Lagarde's text I mean firstly, those places where there is a different text in G and/or V (since I have acquired copies of these manuscripts)²²¹ from De Lagarde 1859. Where G and V differ, I have also consulted Sy. I have used De Lagarde's edition (De Lagarde 1859a), but also collated it with a copy of the original manuscript; in so doing, I have discovered other errors, which are also dealt with in Ch. XI. Taking into consideration the fact that G and V are medieval manuscripts and closely related to each other, whereas Sy was written shortly after Titus's Greek text was written down, I have deemed it necessary to pay regard to those places where Sy appears to build on a different text form than that on which G and V otherwise agree. Here, however, it is often difficult to decide whether apparent differences between Sy and the Greek text transmission are due to the style of the translation, the translator's inadequacy or a genuinely different text. A thorough examination of the translation style was thus required before Sy could be included in depth, and my inclusion of this version, though it may prove of some help, does not empty it of further possibilities.²²²

²²¹ When Casey (1931, 4) writes that "G has suffered badly from damp and is in parts entirely illegible", it agrees with my copies, even though it affects only brief passages. In the worst cases I have only been able to check the De Lagarde text from V.—Otherwise I only know H from De Lagarde's edition (1859—and from Basnage's); and I have not consulted the manuscripts A, B and Vat. lat. 6221.

It should also be mentioned that in some cases the text of H may seem better than G and V, which must be due to the transcriber's own improvements, and if these improvements are plausible,²²³ and especially if they are supported by Sy,²²⁴ I have retained them in the text. The same goes for the few cases where H supports V against G.²²⁵

I must also underline that the passages in Ch. XI where I have attempted to improve De Lagarde's text do not meet the requirements of a new edition, but they nonetheless give a better foundation for further work with the text.

In addition to G, V and Sy other passages have been of importance for this study, namely those contained in the fragments in Photius, Biblioteca and in Sacra Parallela. In the latter case there are also some fragments from Books III–IV that have had particular relevance for my studies and are the only ones representing the Greek text.

With regard to the part of V found in Nagel's editions (1967, 1973) a modern, critical edition of Titus already exists, based on V+Sy. I have therefore limited myself to including some passages where I have been able to correct a few minor errors in Nagel, but I have also mentioned some of Nagel's remarks about divergences in relation to Sy, especially when it was a question of variants dependent on dogmatics that were of particular interest for my study.

²²² Poirier and Sensal 1990 has been a valuable introduction to this inclusion of Sy.

²²³ E.g. Ch. XI.8 n. 1, n. 3; XI.11 n. 3, n. 7; XI.14 n. 4+n.a); XI.20 n. 2; XI.23 n. 2, n. 9; XI.27 n. 1; XI.32 n. 7, n. 12, n. 14.

²²⁴ E.g. Ch. XI.2 n. 1, n.3; XI.12 n. 2; XI.14 n. 6; XI.15 n. 1; XI.18 n. 2; XI.19 n. 5; XI.20 n. 1; XI.23 n. 11.

²²⁵ E.g. Ch. XI.1 n. 2; XI.2 n. 2, n. 4; XI.3 n. 2; XI.12 n. 3; XI.34 n. 5.—The fact that H contains sound improvements of the text is also mentioned in a single case by Allberry (1939, 130–31 n. 2), who notes that the emendation (in relation to G) appears for the first time as a marginal gloss in B, from where it has been transferred to H. It is thus conceivable that the good emendations in H actually originate in B.

A separate case is Book III.7, Gr. 69.5–25, which was re-edited in ed.N 296.1–298.6 (V+H+S), but where the text also exists in G, which Nagel has not included. In this case I have therefore decided that the entire passage should be thoroughly collated (→ Ch. XI.34).

CHAPTER FOUR

THE HISTORICAL AND LITERARY CONTEXT FOR TITUS OF BOSTRA'S CONTRA MANICHAEOS

1. Introductory remarks

As already stated, it is a guiding principle of this study to search for the links between the ideas in Contra Manichaeos and the context of Titus of Bostra. Admittedly we are not particularly well-informed about this context, but a certain amount of material does exist which can be brought together and made relevant for my interpretation.

Starting with a few remarks on Bostra and the province of Arabia I shall first attempt to gather certain relevant information on the position of Christianity and the Catholic Church in Bostra. This material will form the background for an exposition of the scattered information that we possess on the violent conflicts in Titus's time between Catholics and pagans. This information can be illuminated by a remark in Contra Manichaeos which together with information from Jerome and Epiphanius contributes to a closer dating of the work. Finally, Jerome's information that Titus also wrote other works than Contra Manichaeos will be the occasion for a brief Excursion to look into which other texts have been attributed to Titus.

Secondly, I am concerned with the fact that Titus's work belongs within the genre of ancient Catholic heresiology that had formed a particular branch in the form of anti-Manichaean literature. My focus is especially on a minor group among the anti-Manichaean writers who by and large correspond to what has been described "the Antiochene School", because there is a variety of material that indicates that Titus of Bostra may have had a special association with them. A further Excursion contains various theories on patristic sources that Titus of Bostra may have used.

2. The province of Arabia, conflicts between pagans and Catholics and the dating of Contra Manichaeos

Bostra is the Graeco-Latin form of the name of the city of Buṣrā, which lay in the Nabataean Ḥawrān, and which is also mentioned as Βοστροπὰ in 1 Macc. 5.26.28, because it was destroyed by Judas Maccabaeus in 163 BCE. In 106 CE Emperor Trajan changed the Nabataean Kingdom that he had conquered into the province of Arabia (Arabia provincia), and Bostra became its capital, with the provincial governor's residence and the headquarters of the Third Legion of Cyrenaica (legio tertia Cyrenaica), also known as the Bostra legion. Bostra became a polis, and soon after a colonia, and finally a metropolis under Emperor Philip the Arabian.¹

Bostra was thus a Roman city-state, which by virtue of its origins nevertheless contained a number of different ethnic groups. The names of its citizens in the city's inscriptions testify to several Semitic groups, in particular of course Nabataeans, but there were also Safaites as well as other groups. In addition, there is a large amount of material comprising Greek and Latin names, bearing witness to the hellenisation and romanisation of the city.² According to 1 Macc. 5.45, Judas Maccabaeus led all the Jews of Gilead into Judea, but later (documented from the 3rd cent. CE) Bostra contained a substantial Jewish population.³

Together with this Jewish element Bostra's proximity to Palestine makes it probable that Christianity reached the city relatively early, although no contemporary witness testifies to this—only late legends.⁴ Nevertheless, Christianity must have gained a considerable footing by the first half of the 3rd century, since Origen travelled to Bostra in 214–15 at the request of the city's Roman governor (Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica VI.19,15–16), and shortly afterwards we know the name of the city's Bishop, Beryllus, who corresponded with the Bishop of Jerusalem (Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica VI.20,2) and was influenced by Monarchianism. However, at a synod in Bostra that took place under Emperor Gordian III (238–44) Origen managed to guide Beryllus back to orthodoxy (Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica

¹ On Bostra see Sickenberger 1901, 1; Aigrain 1924, 1161ff.; Kindler 1983; Bowersock 1983; Sartre 1985. Our knowledge of Hawrān has been greatly increased in the last 30 years thanks to extensive archaeological activity; cf. Kindler 1983; Bowersock 1983; Sartre 1985; Graf 1997—all with further references.

² Sartre 1985, 141–52.

³ Cf. Kindler 1983, 2–3, 9; Sartre 1985, 45–48, 151, 158–59. The inscriptions do not reveal anything about the Jews of Bostra, but they are known from the Talmud.

⁴ See Aigrain 1924, 1159–61; Devresse 1945, 211; Sartre 1985, 99 with further references.

VI.33,1–4).⁵ From this time there is also further documentation of so-called heresies in the province of Arabia,⁶ but in addition to Beryllus we have also other evidence of ante-Nicene Catholic bishops and of theological activity in Bostra.⁷ Later we know that the Bishop of Bostra, Nicomachus, took part in the first ecumenical synod in Nicaea in 325 and that Bishop Antonius of Bostra was present at the synod in Serdica in 343.⁸

In its 6th canon the synod of Nicaea recognised the ancient rights of Antioch (which in later terminology points forward to its role as a “patriarchate”) without going into further detail about them; from a later time we know that these rights included Arabia, since Bostra occupied the sixth place among the great metropolises of Antioch, and this may already have been the case in Titus’s time.⁹

Whether or not Bostra had a clear position in Titus’s time in relation to the church at Antioch, there is not a shadow of doubt that Titus was the central Catholic figure in the province of Arabia, for the 4th and 5th canons of the synod of Nicaea already assume the existence of ecclesiastical provinces with metropolitans. The two canons thus prove that the Church was already taking over the provinces and provincial boundaries of the state.¹⁰

Even though paganism had strong and old roots in Bostra, Catholic Christianity at the time of Titus seems to have matched its power

⁵ Bardy 1955, 117–120, 135–36. Cf. Aigrain 1924, 1164–69; Devreesse 1945, 211; Bowersock 1983, 125–27; Sartre 1985, 99–101 on early Christianity in the province of Arabia.

⁶ Such as the Arabian heresy that Origen refuted at a synod between 244 and 248 (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. VI.37; Bardy 1955, 139), and which Dial. cum Heracl. (Scherer 1960) is perhaps connected to. Sartre 1985, 101 is also right that it is likely that there were Jewish-Christian heresies like Ebionites and Elchasaites in Bostra, even though this is not documented (cf. Aigrain 1924, 1174); Mani came from a Mesopotamian branch of the Elchasaites.

⁷ See Sartre 1985, 101–2; Froidevaux 1962; Renoux 1979 on the problem concerning the Hippolytus who may have been Bishop of Bostra in c. 260.—Bishop Maximus of Bostra was one of Paul of Samosata’s judges at the synods in Antioch in 264 and 268 (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. VII.28,1 and VII.30,2 [Bardy 1955, 212, 214]).

⁸ Aigrain 1924, 1172; Devreesse 1945, 211–12, 227; Sartre 1985, 104. See Sartre 1982a, 360–62 (no. 9439); Sartre 1985, 104 on whether the ἱερεύς John who is mentioned in an inscription from Bostra that contains a dating corresponding to 352–53 CE was the city’s Bishop.

⁹ The synod of Nicaea’s 6th canon: See Joannou 1962, 28–29. Cf. Vailhé 1898–99; Aigrain 1924, 1172; Alt 1937; Beck 1959, 191–93. Early on Jerusalem laid claim to Bostra, but without success (Beck 1959, 154, 191–93).

¹⁰ The synod of Nicaea’s 4th and 5th canon: see Joannou 1962, 26–27.

in the city, provoking serious tensions in which Titus, as the city's Bishop, must have been directly involved. In addition to the long-standing existence of a church with a bishop, Catholic power in the city must be attributed to a presumed massive increase in Christian numbers after Constantine the Great began to favour the Catholic Church.¹¹

In 356 Emperor Constantius II had prohibited some of the manifestations of the pagan cult,¹² and it seems as though subsequently the pagans in Bostra were forced to undergo certain violent penalties such as destruction of their temples; that at any rate is what they later claimed under Emperor Julian the Apostate, since some of them accused Orio, one of the city's Christians, of being responsible. The same Orio had been Constantius's governor in Arabia (Praeses Arabiae) and was an old friend of Libanius, who protested Orio's innocence; some of the pagans probably held Orio responsible for the enactment of such strict laws as those which Constantius's governor was bound by, while others believed that Orio had demonstrated moderation in his implementation of these measures. For those who held Orio responsible, the hour of revenge came under Emperor Julian, who appointed as provincial governor (Praeses Arabiae) Belaeus, a rhetorician. Libanius tells of these events in letters to Belaeus from 362–363: Orio's brother had been exiled, his family scattered and his house plundered, while his fields lay fallow.¹³ Belaeus's clear anti-Catholic rule also meant, as epigraphical material shows, that sanctuaries in Ḥawrān were reopened or newly established.¹⁴

A letter from Emperor Julian, addressed to the citizens of Bostra and issued in Antioch on 1st August 362,¹⁵ makes it probable that

¹¹ The inscription material from Bostra testifies to the city's pagan cults; see Sartre 1985, 154–58; Bowersock 1986; Bowersock 1990, 9–10, 18; on Ḥawrān's cults see Sourdel 1952. In the country paganism survived for a long time, in some places until the end of the 6th cent.; see Trombley 1993, 34, 37–39, 315; 1994, 117, 316–79, 384 on the long process of Christianisation. See Emperor Julian's Titus-quotations below p. 124 on the Christians' power.

¹² Cod. Theod. XVI,10,4–6, Mommsen 1905, 898; transl. by Pharr 1952, 472–73; cf. Sartre 1985, 105.

¹³ Libanius, Ep. 763, Foerster 1921, 688–89; Ep. 819, Foerster 1921, 739–41; cf. Seeck 1906, 97, 394, 397; Puech 1930, 555; Sartre 1982, 104; Sartre 1985, 105.

¹⁴ Balty 1974, 272–75, 294–99; Sartre 1985, 106; Trombley 1994, 332–334.

¹⁵ Julian, Ep. 52, published as no. 114 in Bidez 1960, 193–95. Cf. Sozomen, Hist. eccl., V.15,11–12, Bidez 1960a, 215. The letter and the confrontation between what happened to Orio had a broader effect. In the first half of the letter the Emperor does not make concrete mention of Bostra; he begins the letter with the hope that the Galileans' leaders would be more grateful to him than to his predecessor (i.e. Constantius II), for while he had been a persecutor (i.e. of the Nicenes), the exiles were now coming home under Julian, and confiscated wealth could be regained. The Emperor emphasises that no one must be forced to participate in worship of the gods. Nonetheless, he writes, the clerics, who cannot bear the loss of their tyranny, are exciting the masses against worshippers of the gods. He is therefore issuing an edict to all the people that they must not create trouble on the provocation of the clerics, nor must they throw stones or disobey the authorities; at the same time he stresses that they may continue to hold services and prayers.

In the second half of the letter Julian states that he is at pains to point this out to the citizens of Bostra in particular, because in their letter to him Bishop Titus and the clerics have blamed the masses for the trouble, whereas they themselves have called for calm. The Emperor then quotes Titus's letter directly:

Although the Christians are a match for the Hellenes in numbers, they are restrained by our admonition that no one disturb the peace in any place.¹⁶

On this basis the Emperor appeals to the citizens of Bostra to drive Titus out of the city, since he is insulting them by assuming to himself the honour for their self-discipline. The Emperor then closes the letter with the call for all sides to remain calm. Those who have strayed from the truth should respect the worshippers of the gods, but they for their part should not outrage and plunder the homes of those who have strayed—the treatment of Orio suggests itself here—but should show tolerance and pity them rather than hate them. Finally, in a remark on the worship of martyrs shortly before the end of the letter—which unfortunately has been only partially Julian and Titus is either mentioned or analysed in many accounts, e.g. Sickenberger 1901, 2–3; Allard 1903, 36–42; Aigrain 1924, 1173; Puech 1930, 555; Bidez 1930, 294–95; Casey 1937, 1586; Bidez 1960, 123–26; Weis 1973, 325–27; Browning 1975, 137; Bowersock 1978, 92–93; Trimmingham 1979, 81–82; Sartre 1985, 104–6.

¹⁶ καίτοι Χριστιανῶν ὄντων ἐφομίλλων τῷ πλήθει τῶν Ἑλλήνων, κατεχομένων δὲ τῆ ἡμετέρα παραίνεσει μηδένα μηδαμοῦ ἀτακτεῖν (Bidez 1960, 195.1–3). English transl. Wright 1923, 133.

preserved by the Christian copiers—the Emperor appears again to sharpen his tone against the Christians.

This letter ought to create difficulties for scholars who, like many writers since the Enlightenment, imagine that Emperor Julian was in principle a supporter of religious freedom in the modern style. For the Emperor's many assurances of tolerance are revealed as hypocrisy with the distortion of an isolated quotation from Titus's letter.¹⁷ What is of interest in the present context, however, is not so much the moral evaluation of the famous Emperor as the fact that in line with his policy in general, he again attempts to create an internal split in the Catholics' ranks, this time between the clergy and the people. Of equal interest too is the information on Titus and the Catholic Christians' position in Bostra that can be deduced from the letter. Firstly, in terms of numbers the Christians can be equated with the pagans,¹⁸ and secondly, relations between the two groups have been thoroughly poisoned, with Titus drawn into the forefront of the confrontation.

We do not know whether the Emperor's demand for Titus's expulsion was acted on, but if that was indeed the case, the Bishop must have returned swiftly, since barely a year later the Emperor was killed (26th July 363) in the middle of the war against the Persian arch-enemy and was succeeded by Emperor Jovian, a Christian. What we do know for sure is that as Bishop of Bostra Titus was present at a synod in Antioch at the end of 363 which in a letter to Emperor Jovian recognised the Creed of Nicaea.¹⁹

¹⁷ Bidez (1960, 126) emphasises quite rightly that Voltaire selected a poor example when in his attempt to rehabilitate the Emperor he referred precisely to this letter.—What in reality lay behind Julian's violent reaction to Titus's letter is hard to say; the letter is not preserved, but perhaps Titus was trying to have Belaeus removed. However, it may also have been a more consistent move in the Emperor's policy, if he really did attempt to have other bishops expelled (cf. Sartre 1985, 105).

¹⁸ This is how Von Harnack (1924a, 702 n. 2: "eine wichtige statistische Notiz") understood the passage; similarly Trombley 1993, 110, 228; 1994, 317, 349 (Trombley 1993, 228 correctly states this is a quotation from Titus's letter that is preserved in the Emperor's letter, whereas Trombley 1994, 317 incorrectly refers the estimate of the number of Christians and Hellenes to the Emperor himself). But if "the Hellenes" means only the educated pagan population of Bostra, this is not a statement that says anything about the total numerical strengths between the two population groups in Bostra. The statement can still confirm that Christianity was just as strong as paganism among the people of influence.

¹⁹ See further below pp. 142–43.

Titus did not write his major work Contra Manichaeos until after Emperor Julian's death. This can be concluded from a passage in the work which mentions the Emperor in the past tense in connection with an interpretation of natural disasters as an example of God's training in piety:

But even if the cities collapse, because ungodliness is growing—as also actually lately (happened) in the time of that very ungodly (man), who also called to mind the error of the idols—sin is being destroyed and the error that went against God is being diminished (II.28, Gr. 43. 34–37).²⁰

Titus is referring here to the earthquake in 362 which struck Nicomedia and Nicaea.²¹ In addition to the light thrown on the question as to when Titus concluded the writing of Contra Manichaeos the passage is of particular interest in view of our knowledge of Titus's role during the Emperor's pro-pagan policy in the province of Arabia. Since we know that Book II of Contra Manichaeos is also aimed at the pagans, Titus must presumably be reckoning that since Emperor Julian's defeat and death he can persuade pagan groups to accept that the earthquake was a judgement on the Emperor and his politics.

In addition to the remark in Contra Manichaeos II.28 Jerome's mention of Titus in De viris illustribus CII is of importance for the dating of Contra Manichaeos:

Under the princes Julian and Jovian, Titus, Bishop of Bostra, wrote powerful books Against the Manichaeans and (also) some other books. He died under (Emperor) Valens.²²

Since Valens died in 378, Titus himself must have died at the latest in that year, from which we also know the name of his successor, Badagius (who as early as 381 was replaced by his rival, Agapius).²³ Contra Manichaeos was therefore written between 363 and 378. Since

²⁰ κἄν πόλεις δὲ καταπίπτωσιν, ἐπιφουομένης ἀσεβείας (οἷα δὴ καὶ πρόην ἐπὶ τοῦ λίαν ἀσεβήσαντος καὶ τῶν εἰδῶλων τὴν πλάνην ἀναμνήσαντος), φθείρεται ἡ ἀμαρτία καὶ μειοῦται ἡ κατὰ θεοῦ πλάνη·

²¹ See Ammianus Marcellinus, Res gestae XXII.13,5: “et quartum . . . Decembres uergente in uesperam die reliqua Nicomedia collapsa est terraemotu iudemque Nicaeae portio non mediocris.” (Seyfarth 1978, 280; cf. Brinkmann 1894, 479 n. 2; Sickenberger 1901, 12). Already in the margin of Contra Manich. II.28 in Canisius 1604, 92 it is noted: “Iulianum Apostatam dicit.”

²² “Titus, Bostrenus episcopus, sub Iuliano et Ioviano principibus fortes Adversum Manichaeos scripsit libros et nonnulla alia. Moritur sub Valente.” (Richardson 1896, 48).

²³ Cf. Sickenberger 1901, 4–5; Sartre 1985, 107.

Epiphanius's Panarion, written between 374 and 377, also mentions and makes use of Titus,²⁴ Contra Manichaeos, however, must have already been finished and published before 377, probably indeed a number of years before. Jerome, however, says that Contra Manichaeos was written under Julian and Jovian, and taking this literally means that the lengthy work came into being in the period 361–64 and was concluded under Jovian around 363–64. Titus's statement in Contra Manichaeos II.28 that the earthquake and Emperor Julian's restitution of paganism had taken place "lately" can mean many things; but it probably refers to events no more than a year old. It is possible, though, that Jerome was being imprecise and that Contra Manichaeos was not finally concluded and published until a few years after Emperor Jovian's death.

Whatever the case, it is clear that the work was finished a few years after Titus had been involved in violent conflicts with the pagans of Bostra, and it is therefore in a way surprising that it was not against them but against the Manichaeans that Titus took up his pen. To my knowledge Titus's authorship is the only proof of the existence of Manichaeism in Bostra, even though we have a number of testimonies to other so-called heresies in Bostra and the province of Arabia.²⁵ As we shall see, however, the pagans are never far away in Contra Manichaeos, and below we shall consider whether it was not Titus's strategy in relation to pagans and Catholics that led him to turn against the Manichaeans.

However, such a view accounts only partially for Titus's attack. From another angle Contra Manichaeos may be seen in the context of the other heresiological and especially anti-Manichaean literature of the Early Catholic Church. This finds expression not only in the province of Arabia, but throughout the Syrian-Palestinian region, where Catholic writers were carrying on a controversy against Manichaeism. Through this and other circumstances Titus might well be numbered with a group of other contemporary writers.

²⁴ See above p. 67.

²⁵ From the 4th cent., Titus's time, Epiphanius mentions in Haer. 58 (Holl 1922, 358–63), 70 (Holl 1933, 232–49), 78 (Holl 1933, 452–75) and 79 (Holl 1933, 475–84) heresies in Arabia that he calls Valesians, Audians, Antidicomarians and Collyridians (cf. Aigrain 1924, 1173–74; Sartre 1985, 101). Ebionites, Elkesaites (i.e. Elchasaites), Ossaeans and Sampsaeans in Arabia: Haer. 19.1,2, Holl 1915, 217.21–22; 19.2,10, Holl 1915, 219.6–7; 30.2,9, Holl 1915, 335.19–20; 30.18,1, Holl 1915, 357.14–15; Anaceph. T.3, 53, Holl 1922, 212.13–14; Haer. 52.1,1, Holl 1922, 315.1–3.

Excursion: Other works by Titus

From the above quotation of Jerome in De viris illustribus, it appears that Titus must also have written other works than Contra Manichaeos. However, the fact that Jerome mentions the title of Contra Manichaeos shows that Titus's contemporaries also regarded it as his most important work. In the following I will deal briefly with the discussion of these other works.

The Greek original of a Commentariū in Lucam, the title of which states that it was written by Titus of Bostra and other fathers, was first published in 1624.²⁶ The title does not claim that it is a text by Titus, nor is this the case. But it does include, as Sickenberger has proved, genuine fragments of Homiliae in Lucam written by Titus; these are found again in catenae on Luke. Through his examination of the catenae on Luke, Sickenberger was able to separate off the fragments attributed to Titus, and then in a comparison with Contra Manichaeos he could determine that the majority of them were genuine.²⁷ In addition to this there are nine fragments in a Catena in Daniele which are also attributed to Titus, and which in Sickenberger's opinion are genuine and may well come from Homiliae in Lucam.²⁸ In this connection it should be added that Sickenberger was able to demonstrate that in Homiliae in Lucam too Titus's position is anti-Manichaean.²⁹ Finally, Sickenberger included a version of those Lk. and Dan. scholia which were by Titus.³⁰ Later scholars have added further fragments and comments to this edition.³¹

A Palm Sunday sermon Oratio in ramos palmarum, which is also ascribed to Titus of Bostra, is in all probability not genuine,³² and the same can be

²⁶ See Sickenberger 1901, 16–41 on the history of editions, transmission of manuscripts and origin. This In Luc. was to have been reprinted in 1866 in Migne, PG 162, but the volume went up in flames before publication: see Cavallera 1912, 10, 110; Bardenhewer 1913, 52–54; Hopfner 1936, 847b.

²⁷ Sickenberger 1901, 41–118; cf. Sickenberger 1898. Cf. also Von Soden's (1911, 579ff.) criticism of Sickenberger and Sickenberger's response (1903).

²⁸ Sickenberger 1901, 130–34.

²⁹ Sickenberger 1901, 81ff.

³⁰ Sickenberger 1901, 140–249 with an "Anhang" on "Ein Palimpsest von Lukashomilien, wahrscheinlich des Titus." (Sickenberger 1901, 250–59).

³¹ Thus Reuss 1976 was able to add six fragments from a Catena in Luc. to which Sickenberger had no access. A Coptic Catena in Luc. also contains fragments that are ascribed to Titus (ed. De Lagarde 1886); Sickenberger 1901, 139 was inclined to think them spurious, but Bellet 1957 claimed that these fragments come from an authentic source, even though they are translated very loosely. On Arabic Titus fragments commenting on Mt. see Iturbe 1969–70 (Iturbe 1970, XXV, 300).

³² The text is printed in Migne, PG 18, 1263–78 (from Gallandi 1769, 351–56); a single manuscript attributes it to Hesychius of Jerusalem, and it is re-edited in Aubineau 1980, 715–77. There are also Georgian (Van Esbroeck 1975, 78–79) and Church-Slavonic translations (Hannick 1981, 268). The text is clearly not written by Titus: see Sickenberger 1901, 134–36; Casey 1937, 1591. Van Esbroeck 1975, said for certain of an interpretation of the parables of the Unjust Judge and the Pharisee and the Tax Collector.³³ However, Sickenberger kept an open mind on whether some Syriac fragments of a Sermo in epiphaniam attributed to Titus are genuine.³⁴

3. Heresiology and anti-Manichaeism

Perhaps it was not until the Manichaeans came into contact with the Roman Empire around the middle of the 3rd century—while Mani was still alive—that they met the Early Catholic Church in earnest.³⁵ Even though we do not find the first sign of a literary Catholic reaction until half a century later, it is nevertheless correct to say that the Church was by now armed and ready to confront its opponents, who, like the Manichaeans, claimed to represent true Christianity and to have solved the problem of evil. Already a hundred years earlier, and without realising it, Justin Martyr with his Syntagma against all heresies had established a new Christian, literary genre,³⁶ which later through Irenaeus, Tertullian and Hippolytus among others had come into full bloom and helped to a great extent to form the Catholic theological profile and mentality.

78–79, 249 defended its authenticity, but was refuted by Aubineau 1980, 724–32. According to Aubineau it cannot be by Hesychius of Jerusalem either.

³³ Sickenberger 1901, 137.

³⁴ Ed. in De Lagarde 1863, 94–95 and (with Greek retrotranslation) Rucker 1933, 82–87. Cf. Wright 1871, 646b (British Museum Add. 12,156); Sickenberger 1901, 138–39.

³⁵ The Manichaeans' own traditions of their early days do not apparently mention relations with the Early Catholic Church, but instead depict Mani's background in, and clash with, a non-Catholic Christian group of Baptists who claimed Elchasai as their founder. The Manichaeans must surely have met Catholics, but we cannot be sure of when they came to realise that they constituted a formidable opponent.

³⁶ Justin himself mentions his (now vanished) Syntagma in Apol. I.26,8 (Krüger 1915, 22.1: σύνταγμα κατὰ πασῶν τῶν γεγενημένων αἰρέσεων). On this work see Le Boulluc 1985, 35–91. Heresiology clearly forms a special genre with fixed themes and common rules; cf. e.g. Le Boulluc 1985, 15–16; cf. more distant Brox 1986, 283–87. On heresiology see e.g. Koschorke 1975; Aland 1978; Vallée 1981; Le Boulluc 1985; 1985a.—It must be emphasised that of course there are two types of heresiology: works against “all heretics”, e.g. Justin, and works against individual heresies, e.g. Tertullian's Adv. Marc. Most anti-Manichaean heresiology belongs to the latter type.

On the clash with Manichaeism W.W. Klein rightly remarks that “[d]er Schwerpunkt des Kampfes fällt ins 4. Jahrhundert, wo die Basis für die Diskussionsinhalte gelegt wird.”³⁷ By this time, however, the Catholic theologians had already staked out their basic territory in relation to syncretistic, dualistic versions of Christianity that could also be employed against the Manichaeans, despite the fact that on many crucial points their mythological system differed from the older opponents of the Catholic Church—for instance, in its “radical dualism”. Orthodoxy now had to define itself in relation to new heresies such as Arianism. Even so, we must not underestimate the significance of anti-Manichaean writers in this period, for although its two major theological doctrines—monotheism and man’s ethical freedom—had long been established by earlier heresiologists as the corner-stones of a theodicy, these doctrines could not only be elaborated and refined, but would undoubtedly have lost their power if they had not continually been reformulated. The reason for the need of this continuous reformulation was that Manichaeism was a real danger, as is clear from the large number of anti-Manichaean texts that were produced.

This can be demonstrated by means of an overview of the most important anti-Manichaean texts from the eastern part of the Empire in the 3rd and 4th centuries, and including a few 5th century writers of interest. This overview may also help to narrow the focus on to which particular anti-Manichaean writers Titus may have been especially linked.

A papyrus contains what is thought to be the oldest anti-Manichaean writing in existence; it is in the form of a pastoral letter from the last decade of the 3rd century, originating perhaps from the chancery of Theonas, Bishop of Alexandria at the time (282–300). Here we also find for the first time the wordplay on Mani’s name and μανία that Titus would later use again and again.³⁸

Two anti-Manichaean texts from the beginning of the 4th century are not Catholic, however, but pagan. With regard to genre, Emperor Diocletian’s edict against the Manichaeans, which probably dates from 302, belongs outside the literature that we are dealing with, but it nevertheless deserves to be mentioned in this context, because already here we meet the idea that Manichaeism is suspect, because it comes from Persia, the arch-enemy of the Empire.³⁹ Probably from the same time we know of a Platonic polemic against Manichaeism which is particularly related to the more educated Christian polemic as we later meet it, for example, in Titus, namely Alexander of Lycopolis' Contra Manichaei opinioniones disputatio.⁴⁰ From a much later date we also have a testimony to a Platonic attack on Manichaeism, and it is not impossible that sharing this common enemy has had a mediating effect on the rapprochement between Neo-Platonists and Catholics in Late Antiquity.⁴¹

³⁷ Klein 1991, 49.

³⁸ Ed. Roberts 1938; the wordplay on μανία line 26–30, Roberts 1938, 42, 45; cf. Klein 1991, 39–40.

Perhaps in the decade after 303 Eusebius of Caesarea in Palestine found the occasion to treat Manichaeism in Historia ecclesiastica VII.31,1–2. Eusebius also used the wordplay on μανία but in a more advanced way, playing on the similarity between the Greek form of the name Mani, Μάνης and μανείς, 2nd aorist participle of μάνομαι, “be mad” (because of the iotacisms they are pronounced identically, apart from the stressed accents); moreover he emphasised that Mani was a barbarian and from Persia.⁴² Also these ideas are to be found in Titus.

The oldest comprehensive anti-Manichaean writing by a Catholic hand comes from Athanasius's friend, Serapion, who wrote Adversus ³⁹ The edict is printed in Adam 1969, 82–84. See also Chadwick 1979; Lieu 1992, 121–25; cf. also Klein 1991, 137–39.

⁴⁰ Ed. Brinkmann 1895. Modern translations: James B.H. Hawkins in Roberts and Donaldson 1993b (English); Mansfeld and Van der Horst 1974 (English); Villey 1985 (French).

⁴¹ See Hadot 1969 on Simplicius's polemic against the Manichaeans, which is compared with the Catholic polemic. Cf. Andresen 1978, 69–73 (“gemeinsame Abwehrfront von Christen und Neuplatonikern gegen den Manichäismus”); Andresen 1984, 408–10 and Stroumsa 1992 on the Platonist and Catholic rapprochement against a common opponent.

⁴² Ed. Bardy 1955, 220–21. It should be mentioned that it is a point of contention as to when Eusebius first published his Hist. eccl., which at that point already comprised at least the first 7 books; see Schwartz 1909, XLVII–LXI; Grant 1980, 10–21; Barnes 1980; Bardy's account of the discussion in Bardy and Périchon 1987, 121ff. with further references. The last redaction of the work was undertaken after 326. Nor is it certain that the 7th book originally contained the chapter on the Manichaeans, though this does appear likely since it “seems to contain echoes of phrases used by Diocletian” in the anti-Manichaean edict mentioned above (thus Grant 1980, 14, 20, 94–95).

Manichaeos some time after 326; Serapion was Bishop of Thmuis in Lower Egypt.⁴³ The date is relatively late, but the work is swiftly followed by other texts. I have been unable to prove that Titus may have used Serapion.

From the same time comes Hegemonius' Acta Archelai, which was written in Greek but now only exists in its entirety in a translation

Prior to the attack on Manichaeism in Hist. eccl. Eusebius had already made a brief assault in his Chron., and there had similarly applied the $\mu\alpha\nu\acute{\iota}\alpha$ wordplay (Helm 1956, 223.25–26 ^[l]: “Insana Manichaeorum haeresis in commune humani generis exorta”; Karst 1911, 227: “Der rasenden Manichäer allvernichtende Verderbnis schlich sich in die Sitten der Menschheit ein.”). But we must add that according to Helm's (1923, 42–43) theory, as developed by Barnes (1980, 192–93; 1981, 111 with 339–40, n. 44–49), the final remarks in the first edition of the Chron. have to do partly with Bishop Anatolius of Laodicea (Helm 1956, 223.21–22 ^[l]) and partly with a number of synchronisms between different chronologies covering the 2nd year of Emperor Probus's reign = 276/7 CE (Helm 1956, 223.23–24 ^[k]), which was the same year in which Anatolius's Easter cycle began. Eusebius is thought to have concluded the Chron. in that year “to make an implicit compliment to the scholarship of Anatolius” (Barnes 1981, 111). This theory is supported by the fact that Anatolius is also discussed at the conclusion of Book 7 of Hist. eccl. (VII.32,6ff.) (Barnes 1981, 111); this should be understood to mean that the first edition of Hist. eccl. also ended here (Barnes 1981, 146). According to Barnes this means that the subsequent mention of Manichaeism during the 3rd year of Emperor Probus's reign could not have been included in the first edition of the Chron. (which Barnes [1981, 111] would date as early as before the end of the 3rd cent.), but must have belonged to the second edition, which ended with Constantine the Great's vicennalia in 325/6, when it was presumably written (Barnes 1981, 113, 369 n. 14). On this basis Barnes also believes that the chapter on Manichaeism in Hist. eccl. VII.31,1–2 was not originally part of the first edition of Hist. eccl. (which Barnes [1981, 346 n. 10] reckons was already finished c. 295), but a later addition (Barnes 1981, 192, 368 n. 8, 369 n. 14–15). The Helm-Barnes theory on the conclusion of the Chron. is rejected in Grant 1980, 7–9, 14.

See Puech 1930, 559 n. 2; Klein 1991, 143–44 on the wordplay $\text{Μάνης}—\mu\alpha\nu\acute{\epsilon}\iota\varsigma$. Eusebius also mentions Manichaeism elsewhere; firstly in Theoph. IV.30 (Lee 1842, [164.12–13]; Gressmann 1904, 209*) and IV.34 (Lee 1842, [170.1]; Gressmann 1904, 215*); cf. Grant 1980, 95, and secondly in his Ep. ad Const. which could date from before 324, but possibly also later; this also uses the $\mu\alpha\nu\acute{\iota}\alpha$ -wordplay and shows that Eusebius himself had met some Manichaeans carrying a picture of Mani (see Pitra 1852, 386.25–27; quoted also in Adam 1969, 106; cf. Grant 1972, 433; Gero 1981, 461, 465–66, 469). The authenticity of the letter is admittedly doubted in Murray 1977, 326–36, while Schäferdiek (1980) attempts to refer it to Eusebius of Nicomedia. However, the authorship of Eusebius of Caesarea is convincingly maintained, as far as I can judge, in Gero 1981, cf. also Thümmel 1984. When Epiphanius Haer. 66.21,3 (Holl 1933, 49,1) mentions Eusebius of Caesarea as one of those who had previously written against Manichaeism, the reference is probably, as proposed by Grant (1972, 434), to Hist. eccl. VII.31,1–2 and not, as Moreau (1966, 1976) suggested, to a part of a vanished work of some kind.

⁴³ Ed. Casey 1931; modern German transl.: Fitschen 1992, 164–204. See further in Fitschen 1992, 3–57; cf. Klein 1991, 35–36.

into Latin.⁴⁴ The work must have been written before Cyril of Jerusalem used it in his Catechesis VI from c. 348–50. Lieu and other scholars also refer to the possibility that the use of the term ὁμοούσιος in Acta Archelai may mean that it was written after the synod of Nicaea in 325, and Lieu adds that perhaps it was written after 330, since Eusebius of Caesarea did not draw on it in his section on Manichaeism in Historia ecclesiastica VII. But the arguments are not persuasive. As regards localisation, however, Lieu is convincing when he shows that Acta Archelai reveals a correct knowledge of the Syrian-Mesopotamian region that perhaps tells us where the writer came from.⁴⁵ As I shall demonstrate in the following, I believe it is probable that Titus knew of Acta Archelai and to a limited degree drew on it.

Cyril of Jerusalem's above-mentioned attack on the Manichaeans in Catechesis VI, Ch. 20–36 from around 348–50 is based on both Acta Archelai and on individual personal experiences.⁴⁶

The question of the sources and dating of another Contra Manichaeos, by Didymus the Blind (c. 313–98), are unclear, according to Klein; he mentions that parallels to other Didymus-texts and patristic literature, including Titus, could form the basis of a solution. Didymus's writing is without doubt directed against the Manichaeans, even though they are only mentioned explicitly in the title. His knowledge of Manichaeism has recently been the object of a thorough examination by Byard Bennett.⁴⁷

⁴⁴ Ed. Beeson 1906. Eng. transl.: S.D.F. Salmond in Roberts and Donaldson 1993a; Vermes 2001.

⁴⁵ Lieu 1988, 73; Lieu in Vermes 2001, 6–7, 16–23. Apart from Cyril of Jerusalem as a terminus ad quem the arguments for a closer dating are weak. The reference to Eusebius is valid only as an argumentum e silentio (cf. Lim 1995, 76 n. 25) and furthermore ignores the possibility that the chapter on the Manichaeans in the 7th book of Hist. eccl. may have already formed part of the first edition, and the ὁμοούσιος-argument seems less secure, since the term is not used of the Trinity, but to characterise the Manichaeans' views.—Lieu (1988, 74–76; in Vermes 2001, 13–16) argues persuasively against there being a Syriac version behind the Greek Acta Arch.—Cf. also Scopello 2000 on Acta Arch.

⁴⁶ Cf. Klein 1991, 29. Ed. Reischl 1848, 182–207. Modern German transl.: Häuser 1922, 94–119.

⁴⁷ Klein 1991, 18; Bennett 2001. Bennett also refers to the similarities between Didymus's anti-Manichaeism and passages in Titus; cf. Bennett 2001, 43, 46 n. 32, 50 n. 45. I have similarly noted some parallels between Didymus and Titus (see below pp. 241, 279–80, 292). Ed. PG 39, 1085–1109; a new unpublished ed. by Bennett is mentioned in Bennett 2001, 38 n. 1.

Klein has noted that the 7th section of Pseudo-Athanasius's Sermo contra omnes haereses is also concerned with the Manichaeans.⁴⁸ According to Klein, the text clearly originates from Alexandria too, since it both demonstrates similarities with the genuine Athanasius-writings and with Didymus; Klein indicates a dating around 360.⁴⁹

Already Augustine believed that Basil the Great of Caesarea was among those attacking the Manichaeans, and that is probably also the case with Basil's homily Quod Deus non est auctor malorum, which Klein wishes to date to around 370, even though the Manichaeans are not explicitly named.⁵⁰

The lack of direct mention of the Manichaeans in the writings of Didymus and Basil supports É.M. Buytaert's view that Eusebius of Emesa's discourse, De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione, is aimed at the Manichaeans. This discourse is preserved in a translation into Latin as the first text in ms. T. 523, and two fragments in Greek are also preserved in Theodoret of Cyrus's Eranistes, which states that they derive from a λόγος by Eusebius of Emesa.⁵¹ The subject of De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione seems to be the existence of free will, and here Paul's conversion is the most important example;⁵² on the way, however, Eusebius takes the opportunity to speak of Christ's impassibility (also in Theodoret's two fragments). In this context Eusebius also has Christ condemn certain christological heresies, starting with Paul of Samosata (mentioned by name) and the Arians,⁵³ and followed by two more heresies, the one claiming that Christ did not assume a body,⁵⁴ and the other that Christ was not born of a virgin in order to save the body of the virgin.⁵⁵ The two

⁴⁸ PG 28, 513–16.

⁴⁹ Klein 1991, 33–34.

⁵⁰ Ed. PG 31, 329–53. Modern German transl.: Stegmann 1925, 371–89. Cf. Decret 1982; Klein 1991, 47–48.

⁵¹ De arbitr. was edited in Buytaert 1953, 13–43; and Theodoret's two fragments in Buytaert 1949, 9*–15*. Buytaert 1948, 25–89; 1953, XXXVIIIff. has argued that the texts in T. 523 are actually translations of writings by Eusebius of Emesa (the argument for the authenticity of De arbitr. and Theodoret's two fragments is to be found in Buytaert 1948, 29–40). In the following I will give a more extensive account of Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore of Tarsus; this is due to a particular interest in the question of the links between these writers and Titus.

⁵² Cf. Buytaert 1948, 14–15.

⁵³ Theodoret: see Buytaert 1949, 15* ([II 4]); De arbitr. [38]: Buytaert 1953, 40–41.

⁵⁴ Buytaert 1949, 15* ([II 4]): εἶπερ ὅτι οὐκ ἀνέλαβον σῶμα, De arbitr. [38], Buytaert 1953, 41.4–5: “Dixisti quia non assumpsisti corpus”.

⁵⁵ Buytaert 1949, 15* ([II 4]): εἶπερ ὅτι οὐκ ἐγεννήθη ἐκ παρθένου, ἵνα σώσω τὸ last heresies were regarded by Buytaert as being Marcionite and “Gnostic” respectively,⁵⁶ but it was also his view that the heretics who are attacked in the main section of De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione,⁵⁷ are the Manichaeans. For the text attacks precisely the heretics who deny free will,⁵⁸ and maintain that God should have created our nature better, that nature is evil.⁵⁹

Buytaert regarded as significant the mention of Eusebius of Emesa’s polemic against heretics, which is named by Epiphanius and Theodoret of Cyrus. According to Theodoret, Eusebius wrote against the Marcionites,⁶⁰ and in the introduction to Haereticarum fabularum compendium (PG 83, 340A) and in I.26 (PG 83, 381B) Theodoret states that Eusebius wrote against Manichaeism,⁶¹ a claim that is also mentioned by Epiphanius, Panarion 66.21,3 (Holl 1933, 49,1–3). This anti-Manichaean writing was in Buytaert’s opinion identical with De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione, and he drew attention to the fact that neither Theodoret nor Epiphanius states that the titles of Eusebius’s heresiological works were Adversus Manichaeos and Adversus Marcionem respectively.⁶² Buytaert assumed that from the content of De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione Theodoret and Epiphanius concluded that the work was anti-Manichaean.⁶³

This argument is persuasive but not conclusive: Eusebius’s attack on heretics who deny man’s free will fits the Manichaeans particularly well, because this view was always ascribed to them by the Church fathers,⁶⁴ but the same could be said of the Valentinians too. On the other hand the doctrine that Creation is evil could equally σῶμα τῆς παρθένου, De arbitr. [38], Buytaert 1953, 41.6–7: “Dixisti quia non sum natus ex virgine, ut salvarem corpus virginis”.

⁵⁶ Buytaert 1948, 32, 35, 39.

⁵⁷ De arbitr. [13], Buytaert 1953, 21.25.

⁵⁸ De arbitr. [13], Buytaert 1953, 21.23–22.17.

⁵⁹ De arbitr. [14–17], Buytaert 1953, 22.18–25.8. Buytaert 1948, 35–36, cf. 70 claims that these views must be Manichaean.

⁶⁰ Theodoret, Haeret. fabul. comp. I.25, PG 83, 377A mentions Eusebius of Emesa as one of those who wrote against the Marcionites (even though Haeret. fabul. comp. I.25 is specifically concerned with Apelles, Poitius, Prepon and others, it is clear enough that the remarks beginning in 376C, which are introduced with the words Πλείστοι μέντοι κατὰ τῆσδε τῆς ἀσεβείας συνέγραψαν, are about the Marcionites as such, who are treated in I.24–25, PG 83, 372D–377A; cf. Buytaert 1949, 21).

⁶¹ Cf. below p. 138 on Theodoret’s mention of Eusebius of Emesa’s anti-Manichaeism.

⁶² Buytaert 1948, 36.

⁶³ Buytaert 1948, 37–39.

⁶⁴ See p. 173.

be a Marcionite view. Nor is the possibility that Buytaert is right diminished by his inadequate knowledge of Manichaean Christology.⁶⁵ If De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione really is the anti-Manichaean text, we must simultaneously note that like other Church fathers Eusebius has not used original Manichaean texts in his refutation; all the charges that are made against the heretics are standard fare, without the particularity that is linked to a heresiology that is related to sources.⁶⁶ A glance at some of Eusebius of Emesa's other anti-heretical remarks shows that in the other discourses, preserved in Latin, they offer the same impression.⁶⁷ Nor do the scattered remarks

⁶⁵ Thus Buytaert is wrong to state (Buytaert 1948, 36–37) “Même l'excursus sur l'impassibilité du Christ est peut-être, dans l'intention de l'auteur, une apologie contre le manichéisme. En effet, pour Mani et ses adeptes, le Christ n'est qu'un prophète. Pour Eusèbe, le Christ est impassible parce qu'il est Dieu.” On the contrary, the Manichaeans' theology was “docetic”. But also in another way Buytaert has proved how the excursion can be understood in the context of De arbitr. (see 1948, 34). Buytaert's closing remarks on the two “docetic” heresies are also superficial: any of them could just as well be “Marcionite” or “Manichaean”, and it is impossible to decide which misunderstanding has made Eusebius separate them.

⁶⁶ If Buytaert 1949, 19–23 is right that Theodoret's remarks in Haeret. fabul. comp. are to be understood to mean that he has had direct access to Eusebius of Emesa's writings against the Marcionites and the Manichaeans, just as Theodoret directly uses the anti-Manichaean writing in Eranistes, then Eusebius's anti-Manichaean writing cannot have been Theodoret's source for the detailed knowledge of Manichaeism in Haeret. fabul. comp.

⁶⁷ De Fil. [I 3], Buytaert 1953, 45.22–46.17 distances itself from the heretics' chasteness, fasting and virginity and from their attack on the Creation; this could refer to both Manichaeans and Marcionites; cf. further remarks in the same text mentioned in Buytaert 1948, 40–41; Hanson 1988, 389; correspondingly in De mart. [9] and [20], Buytaert 1953, 156–57, 164; cf. Buytaert 1948, 70. The remark in De apost. et fide [19], Buytaert 1953, 337.7 on the heretics who split off the NT from the OT could just as well be directed against the Manichaeans as against the Marcionites, who are mentioned in Buytaert 1948, 47, 48 with further references. Also in De incorp. [5], Buytaert 1957, 161.12–15 the heretics could be both Manichaeans and Marcionites. The same is true of the heretical attack on the OT mentioned in De hom. assumpt. II [4–6], Buytaert 1953, 373.5–374.15, which Buytaert 1948, 57–58 believes refers to the Marcionites; here we find again the problem concerning God's question to Adam in Gen. 3.9 (cf. below pp. 223–24). The heretics in Adv. Sab. [7], Buytaert 1953, 109.19ff. are in Buytaert's (1948, 85) opinion Marcionites, but could also be Manichaeans. Also in De cal. Buytaert (1948, 64) finds anti-Marcionite polemic. In De quinque pan. [9], Buytaert 1953, 202–3 Eusebius attacks heretics who hate the Creation and maintain that the Son is the Son of another God; Buytaert (1948, 71) refers to this as “La doctrine manichéenne et marcionite”; here perhaps Marcionism is the most probable heresy, but one can also with Hanson (1988, 389 n. 3) assume that “it is likely that Eusebius, like many of his contemporaries, could not or would not distinguish between Manichaeans and Marcionites.” Cf. also the remarks in Buytaert 1948, 73 on De arb. fici [10–15], Buytaert 1953, 262–66. Polemic against those who think that God is corporeal (De incorp. et invisib.

about heretics in Eusebius's Commentarius in Octateuchum appear to give the impression of a better knowledge of them.⁶⁸

De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione must have been written before 359, the date of Eusebius of Emesa's death. He was a pupil of Eusebius of Caesarea, who, as we have seen, already took part in the polemic against the Manichaeans. We are even given the feeling of a circle that regarded the fight against Manichaeism as a major task when we consider other works of a similar character by both Eusebius of Emesa's friend, "the Arian" George of Laodicea,⁶⁹ dated before his death in 360,⁷⁰ and by Diodore of Tarsus (died before 394), who was a kind of pupil of Eusebius of Emesa.⁷¹

Among later writers who mention both George and Diodore's lost anti-Manichaean texts, as well as that by Titus of Bostra, two passages are of particular importance and deserve to be quoted here, since I shall often return to them in what follows. The first is by Theodoret of Cyrus, who in his attack on Manichaeism in Haereticarum fabularum compendium I.26 refers to other literature on the subject, and here it is striking how he couples Titus with Diodore, and George with Eusebius of Emesa:

The best advocates of piety, Titus and Diodore, wrote against the madman's impiety, Titus as shepherd for the church of the citizen of Deo, passim, e.g. [32], Buytaert 1957, 98), can also, as Hanson (1988, 389) thinks, be directed against the Manichaeans. In De fide [5], Buytaert 1953, 82 we also find an anti-Gnostic polemic that could be directed against the Manichaeans (cf. Buytaert 1948, 79).—Incidentally, cf. also the anti-heretical polemic in Eusebius of Emesa, which is referred to in Lehmann 1975, 187, 269.

⁶⁸ See below pp. 369, 371–79.

⁶⁹ George's writing against the Manichaeans is mentioned in the introduction to Theodoret, Haeret. fabul. comp. PG 83, 340A and in I.26, PG 83, 381 (quoted in the following); in Epiphanius, Haer. 66.21,3, Holl 1933, 49,1–3; and in Heraclianus in Photius, Bibl., cod. 85 (65a36–65b38) (Henry 1960, 9–10), which is also quoted in the following. See Bardenhewer 1912, 263–64; Hanson 1988, 388 on George's friendship with Eusebius of Emesa.

⁷⁰ This is presumably the case, even though Hanson (1988, 350) points out that we cannot be sure that all the information on an Arian Bishop, George of Laodicea, refers to the same person. George was a very common name, and there were several towns named Laodicea. Besides see also Hanson 1988, 382, 388; Wiles 1989, 277 on Eusebius of Emesa and George of Laodicea's year of death.

⁷¹ Jerome, De vir. illustr. CXIX, Richardson 1896, 52: "Diodorus, Tarsensis episcopus, dum Antiochiae esset presbyter magis claruit. Extant eius In Apostolum commentarii et multa alia ad Eusebii magis Emiseni characterem pertinentia, cuius cum sensum secutus sit, eloquentiam imitari non potuit propter ignorantiam saecularium litterarum." It has also been proved that Diodore used texts written by Eusebius (see Petit 1979, 284; Romeny 1997 with further references).

Bostra, Diodore as ruler of the Cilicians' metropolis. But the Laodicean George also wrote against this impiety, a man who admittedly was leader of Arius's heresy, but who was (also) trained in philosophical knowledge. As too was the Phoenician Eusebius, mentioned above.⁷²

Is Theodoret hinting that Titus, Diodore, George and Eusebius of Emesa belonged to a common circle? We might also ask whether he is suggesting that in particular George and Eusebius's anti-Manichaean texts were of a philosophical character?

The second passage is from Photius, who in his Bibliotheca mentions a Bishop Heraclianus of Chalcedon (c. 500),⁷³ the author of 20 books against the Manichaeans refuting the writings that they called The Gospel, The Book of Giants and the Treasuries. Heraclianus listed his predecessors in the battle against the Manichaeans, namely Hegemonius, Titus of Bostra, George of Laodicea, Serapion of Thmuis and Diodore of Tarsus. Below is the central passage in Photius' summary:

But he refutes the book that among the Manichaeans is called The Gospel, and The Book of Giants and the Treasuries. He also lists the many who wrote before himself against Manichaeus's impiety: Hegemonius, who wrote out Archelaus's controversies with him, and Titus, who indeed believed that he wrote against the Manichaeans, but who rather wrote against Adda's writings, but moreover also the Laodicean George, who has used almost the same dialectical arguments against impiety as Titus used, wrote against impiety, as did Serapion, Bishop of Thmuis, and Diodore, who has battled against the Manichaeans in 25 books, and who in his first seven books believes that he is refuting Manichaeus's Living Gospel, but does not succeed; instead he refutes the book written by Adda which is called The Bushel. In the remaining books he clarifies and elucidates the (correct) use of the scriptural passages which the Manichaeans appropriated for their own purpose. And that (is how it was with) Diodore. But after he has mentioned these “fathers”—as the most devout Heraclianus calls them—he has admittedly noted in passing those things that are feebly said by them, but what (is said) that is inadequate he conscientiously completes, and the things (that are said) adequately he praises, impartially accepting them and also compiling things from them which have been thought through by himself.⁷⁴

⁷² Κατὰ δὲ τοῦ Μάνεντος δυσσεβείας συνέγραψαν οἱ ἄριστοι τῆς εὐσεβείας συνήγοροι, ἴτιος καὶ Διόδωρος, ὁ μὲν τὴν Βοστρηνῶν Ἐκκλησίαν ποιμάνας, ὁ δὲ τὴν Κιλικίων ἰθύνas μητρόπολιν. Συνέγραψε δὲ καὶ ὁ Λαοδικεὺς Γεώργιος, ἀνὴρ τῆς μὲν Ἀρείου προστατεύον αἰρέσεως, τοῖς δὲ φιλοσόφοις ἐντεθραμμένος μαθήμασι. Πρὸς δὲ τούτοις καὶ ὁ Φοῖνιξ Εὐσέβιος, οὗ καὶ πρόσθεν ἐμνήσθημεν. (Haeret. fabul. comp. I.26, PG 83, 381B). Cf. Klein 1991, 46. Theodoret also mentioned Eusebius of Emesa, Titus, Diodore and George among his sources in the introduction to Haeret. fabul. comp., PG 83, 340A.

⁷³ Photius, Bibl., cod. 85 (65a36–65b38) (Henry 1960, 9–10). The 7th century is terminus ante quem for Heraclianus, since Sophronius of Jerusalem mentions him in a fragment that is preserved in Photius, Bibl., cod. 231 (287a25–27) (Henry 1967, 66). Cf. Sickenberger 1901, 7; Alfarcic 1918, 66, 100; Henry 1960, 9 n. 1; Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 549 (5th–6th cent.) on the dating of Heraclianus.

Even though Heraclianus may have wished to prove himself a more learned heresiologist than his predecessors, his information is so accurate that it is unlikely that it was pulled out of thin air. It therefore requires further comment, part of which will appear below. Although both George and Diodore’s anti-Manichaean works are mentioned in other sources,⁷⁵ Heraclianus is the only one who provides concrete information on the content of the two works. What he writes about the relation between Titus and George’s works, could mean that the one was dependent on the other, and in that case it must be Titus who drew on George, since the latter died in 360, whereas ⁷⁴ Ἀνατρέπει δὲ τὸ παρὰ τοῖς Μανιχαίοις καλούμενον εὐαγγέλιον καὶ τὴν Γιγάντειον βίβλον καὶ τοὺς Θησαυρούς. Καταλέγει καὶ ὅσοι πρὸ αὐτοῦ κατὰ τῆς τοῦ Μανιχαίου συνέγραψαν ἀθεότητος, Ἡγεμόνιον τε τὸν τὰς Ἀρχελαίου πρὸς αὐτὸν ἀντιλογίας ἀναγράψαντα, καὶ Τίτον ὃς ἔδοξε μὲν κατὰ Μανιχαίων γράμματα, ἔγραψε δὲ μᾶλλον κατὰ τῶν Ἀδδου συγγραμμάτων, ἔτι δὲ καὶ τὸν Λαοδικεῖα Γεώργιον, τοῖς αὐτοῖς σχεδὸν οἷς ὁ Τίτος κατὰ τῆς ἀσεβείας κεχηρῆμένον ἐπιχειρήμασι, καὶ Σερapiάνα τὸν τῆς Θμουέως ἐπίσκοπον, καὶ τὸν Διόδωρον, ἐν κ’ καὶ ε’ βιβλίοις τὸν κατὰ Μανιχαίων ἀγῶνα ἀγωνισάμενον, ὃς διὰ μὲν τῶν πρώτων βιβλίων ἐπτὰ οἰεῖται μὲν τὸ τοῦ Μανιχαίου ζῶν εὐαγγέλιον ἀνατρέπειν, οὐ τυγχάνει δὲ ἐκείνου, ἀλλὰ ἀνατρέπει τὸ ὑπὸ Ἀδδα γεγραμμένον, ὃ καλεῖται Μόδιον· διὰ δὲ τῶν ἐφεξῆς τὴν τῶν γραφικῶν ῥητῶν, ἃ οἱ Μανιχαῖοι ἐξοικειοῦνται πρὸς τὸ σφίσι βεβουλημένον, ἀνακαθαίρει χρῆσιν καὶ διασαφεῖ. Καὶ ὁ μὲν Διόδωρος οὕτω. Τούτων δὲ τῶν (ὡς αὐτὸς φησιν ὁ θεοσεβέστατος Ἡρακλειανός) πατέρων μνήμην πεποιηκώς, ὅσα μὲν ἀσθενῶς αὐτοῖς εἴρηται, ἐπισημαινόμενος παρατρέχει, ὅσα δὲ ἔλλιπώς, εὐλαβῶς ἀναπληροῖ, καὶ ὅσα ἀρκούντως, ἀδεκάστως ἀποδεχόμενος δι’ εὐφημίας ποιεῖται, συντάττων αὐτοῖς καὶ ἄπερ αὐτῷ διανοήθη. Henry 1960, 9–10 (65b1–25).

⁷⁵ In the Syriac tradition only three books are named by Diodore against the Manichaeans, thus in Barhadbešabba, Hist. eccl. XVII.3 [139], Nau 1932, 315.7–8 and Chron. Seert. XLIX [164], Scher 1910, 276. Diodore’s writing against Mani is also mentioned again in Barhadbešabba, Hist. eccl. XVII.3 [140], Nau 1932, 316.1, without the number of books being mentioned, nor does Abdišo’s (died 1318) Catal. XVIII mention other than the title (Assemani 1725, 29.6 [transl. Badger 1852, 365]). The difference between Photius and the Syriac tradition is noted both by Abramowski 1931, 245–46 and Baumstark 1922, 106; this can best be explained by only the first three books of Diodore’s comprehensive refutation being translated into Syriac.—The anti-Manichaean work is incidentally missing in the Diodore-catalogue in the Suidas Lexicon Δ 1149, Διόδωρος, Adler 1967, 103.1–23.

Titus's work was not completed until after 363. Perhaps the reason why Heraclianus mentions Titus before George was that he did not wish to emphasise that Titus was dependent on an Arian author.⁷⁶

In Photius's summary, however, no direct link is established between Titus and Diodore's anti-Manichaean works, though the fact that according to Heraclianus both carried on a controversy against Adda suggests a parallel situation in relation to Manichaeism. We have already noted that Titus shared his interest in anti-Manichaeism and ethical freedom of choice with Eusebius of Emesa, and we can presume that this defence of man's ethical freedom was also central to Diodore's anti-Manichaean work, just as in Eusebius's De arbitrio, voluntate Pauli et Domini passione; that at any rate is the case in another heresiological work by Diodore about which we are better informed, namely his attack on astronomers, astrologers and fate, which was directed against the Bardesanites among others.⁷⁷

Apart from Pseudo-Athanasius, Epiphanius of Salamis is the first to include a section on the Manichaeans in a work "against all heretics", namely his monumental Panarion, written in the years 374–77, mainly in Judea, in which the lengthy Ch. 66 is concerned with the Manichaeans.⁷⁸ Here Epiphanius made extensive use of large areas of the preceding literature, above all Hegemonius, but also, as we have already noted, of Titus of Bostra.

⁷⁶ It is true that Photius's summary gives the impression that Heraclianus refers to all his predecessors, including George, as "fathers" (and thus authorities), but the summary may well be simplifying here; in other words Heraclianus could have known of George's heresy and has therefore only been referring to the four others as "fathers".

⁷⁷ This work is mentioned in the Suidas Lexicon Δ 1149, Διόδωρος, Adler 1967, 103.13: Κατὰ ἀστρονόμων καὶ ἀστρολόγων καὶ εἰμαρμένης, and is extensively paraphrased in Photius, Bibl., cod. 223 (208b–222a) (Henry 1965, 8–48). A quotation from the work also exists in Immanuel aš-Šahhar's Hexaëmeron (quoted in Abramowski 1949, 69). Barhadbešabba, Hist. eccl. XVII.3 [139], Nau 1932, 315.13 also mentions Diodore's work Contra Chald., and similarly Abdišo's Catal. XVIII (Assemani 1725, 29.3; transl. Badger 1852, 365).—When Diodore asks in this work what sort of γένεσις it is that creates a Manichaean or the Valentinians (Photius, Bibl., cod. 223 [218b] [Henry 1965, 37]), the question also contains an irony, since the Manichaeans and Valentinians were regarded precisely as determinists.—See also regarding Diodore's work Ermoni 1901, 433–36; Amand 1973, 59, 61, 461–79; Drijvers 1966, esp. 70–71, 176; Schäublin 1974, 43–44.—Also the understanding of Bardesanes as an enemy Diodore may well have "inherited" from his teacher: for Eusebius of Emesa attacked Bardesanes by name already in his In Oct. (see Fr. XXII, Romeny 1997a, 265–71, cf. Romeny 1997a, 12, 15 [also in Petit 1993, 113–14, no. 682]), but possibly on a false premise; see the discussion in Petit 1993, 114 n. (i); Romeny 1997a, 269–70.

⁷⁸ Ed. Holl 1915; 1922; 1933; Ch. 66 in Holl 1933. Modern English transl.: Williams 1987; 1994.

Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore of Tarsus show that anti-Manichaean polemic was common among those writers who are generally counted under the Antiochene “School”. Often included with them is Severian of Gabala, who in c. 400 wrote a work against the Manichaeans.⁷⁹ It is also interesting to note that anti-Manichaeism was not entirely foreign to Diodore’s own pupils, John Chrysostom (344/54–407) and Theodore of Mopsuestia (died 428).⁸⁰ In John Chrysostom’s exegetical sermons the battle against the Manichaeans is of great importance.⁸¹ Occasionally Theodore of Mopsuestia also mentions the Manichaeans, but not very often;⁸² it is feasible, however, that an anti-dualistic work such as Theodore’s against Zoroastrianism must have been, renewed many of the Antiochenes’ anti-Manichaean themes.⁸³ Finally, it should be mentioned that the battle against Manichaeism played a major role in the authorship of Theodoret of Cyrus (c. 393–c. 466) and not only in his heresiology Haereticarum fabularum compendium; thus Viciano has examined how Theodoret’s ⁷⁹ In Cent. et contra Manich. et Apoll.: ed. in Aubineau 1983. See also Klein 1991, 36–37 with further literature references.

⁸⁰ Theodore and Chrysostom were received into Diodore’s School, the so-called “asceterium” (Socrates, Hist. eccl. VI.3,1–7, Hansen 1995, 313–14; Sozomen, Hist. eccl. VIII.2,6–8, Bidez 1960a, 350–51; see further on this “asceterium” in Leconte 1957).

⁸¹ See also Alfarcic 1918, 58; Klein 1991, 5, 44 n. 130 with further references. Cf. also Amand 1973, 502–3; Gross 1960, 186.

⁸² See e.g. Hom. cat. V.8 (Tonneau 1949, 111); XIII.8 (Tonneau 1949, 381); In Tim. I, 4.1–3 (Swete 1882, 139); cf. In Gal. 1.4–5 (Swete 1880, 5 with note); 5.13 (Swete 1880, 94 with n.); 5.19–21 (Swete 1880, 99 with n.). Cf. Wickert 1962, 50, 172–73, more distant 165 with n. 45; Norris 1963, 202; cf. Bultmann 1984, 124. It is also of interest to note how Theodore attacks unnamed determinists in In Rom. 9.9–13 (Staab 1933, 143.18–144.8); cf. Wickert 1962, 83f.

⁸³ Cf. Dorner 1853, 34 n. 10.—The work is mentioned with the title περὶ τῆς ἐν Περσίδι μαγκυκῆς, καὶ τῆς ἠ τῆς εὐσεβείας διαφορᾶ in Photius, Bibl., cod. 81 (63b32–64a9) (Henry 1959, 187), who claims that it consisted of three books. From Photius’s overview it is clear that the writing attacked the “Zurvanist” version of Zoroastrianism, which also differed from Manichaeism’s radical dualism, and that the writing presented the correct Christian cosmology. However, the work may have given Theodore the opportunity to argue for the non-substantial character of evil. The only fragment of the work that is preserved in Dadišo Qatraya’s In Isaiam Sket. XV,16–18 (Draguet 1972, 270–77; transl. Draguet 1972a, 208–14; cf. Scheinhardt 1968, 188ff., esp. 192–96), deals however with the soul’s fate after death. Theodore’s work against the Magians is also mentioned in Abdišo’s Catal. XIX (Assemani 1725, 34.2; transl. Badger 1852, 365) and in Chron. Seert. LIII [178], Scher 1910, 290.

clash with Manichaeism influenced his Pauline exegesis.⁸⁴ It is tempting to imagine that the battlefield against Manichaeism in these writers was not only provoked by the real Manichaean threat, but that it was also a tradition that was passed down from teacher to pupil, and that this was because Manichaeism had gained a special position within theological thought, i.e. the role of representing determinism and an (impossible) solution to the question of theodicy.

Finally, within the Roman Empire but not employing the Greek language we find Ephrem the Syrian (c. 306–73), the author of prose refutations of, and hymns against, the Manichaeans, the Marcionites and the Bardesanites.⁸⁵

Here it must be emphasised how many of the 4th century Christian anti-Manichaeans lived in the broad Palestinian-Syrian region, including Eusebius of Caesarea, Hegemonius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Eusebius of Emesa, George, Diodore, Titus, Epiphanius and Ephrem; on the verge of the 5th century we also find Severian. Only Theonas, Serapion, Didymus and Pseudo-Athanasius wrote in Alexandria and Egypt, and Basil in Asia Minor. This geographical distribution may mean that Manichaeism was stronger in the Syrian-Palestinian region than in Egypt (it is only the climate that explains why we have found so many Manichaean texts only in Egypt), but it also raises the question of whether it is likely that there was a widespread exchange of texts and viewpoints between the Syrian-Palestinian writers.

Of particular interest here is the fact that a small group among the Syrian-Palestinian anti-Manichaeans were personally linked through friendships or teacher-pupil relationships; this includes Eusebius of Caesarea, Eusebius of Emesa, George of Laodicea and Diodore of Tarsus. It is possible that there is a connection between Titus and this group, and in this context it is also worth considering Titus's part in the "Arian controversies", since both the contemporary bishops, George and Eusebius of Emesa, like Eusebius of Caesarea formerly, played a role in these controversies.

Here, however, the only tangible fact is Titus's presence in 363 at the synod in Antioch, which in a letter to Emperor Jovian acknowledged ⁸⁴ Viciano 1992. The anti-Manichaean concern, according to Viciano 1992, 206ff. is the reason why Theodoret rejected the doctrine of original sin. Cf. also Klein 1991, 45–46.

⁸⁵ Prose refutations ed. with English transl. Mitchell 1912; 1921. The hymns ed. Beck 1957 with German transl. 1957a.

the Creed of Nicaea and the ὁμοούσιος formula together with the interpretation ὅμοιος κατ' οὐσίαν τῷ πατρὶ. Together with among others Acacius of Caesarea (also a pupil of Eusebius of Caesarea) and Meletius of Antioch Titus of Bostra co-signed the documents.⁸⁶ In my view, this conditional recognition of the Creed of Nicaea sits well with the picture of Titus as a conservative theologian that Sickenberger painted on the basis of passages in Contra Manichaeos and Homiliae in Lucam: Titus clearly distances himself from actual Arianism, but demonstrates an anxious caution and dissociation from bold inquiry, just as he prefers to speak of the likeness of the Father and the Son and never uses ὁμοούσιος.⁸⁷ This conservative position is in reality not so far from Eusebius of Emesa's, despite Eusebius being more reflective than Titus on the point.⁸⁸

As mentioned, Sickenberger defined Titus's exegesis as "Antiochene",⁸⁹ and it is also my view that the anti-Manichaean circle of which I believe we can glimpse the contours has quite simply been the same as that which is conventionally called "the Antiochene School". "The Antiochene School" was an intellectual current that ⁸⁶ Socrates, Hist. eccl. III.25, Hansen 1995, 225–27 (cf. Sozomen, Hist. eccl. VI.4, Bidez 1960a, 240–42). See Hanson 1988, 581–83, 651–52, 796 n. 24 on the synod, and Sickenberger 1901, 3–4 on Titus's participation.

⁸⁷ Sickenberger 1901, 98–103. Cf. Casey 1937, 1588: "Es ist wahrscheinlich, daß seine Haltung eher konservativ als haeretisch war" etc.—It should be mentioned that Jülicher 1902, 81–82 thought that Sickenberger made Titus's standpoint in the Trinitarian controversy approach too closely that of orthodoxy: Titus's standpoint was roughly the same as Eusebius of Caesarea's.

⁸⁸ See Grillmeier 1979, 453–57; Hanson 1988, 387–98; Wiles 1989. However, Titus appears to distance himself further from Arianism than Eusebius of Emesa; e.g. on the question of the divinity of the Spirit, see Hanson 1988, 395f. on Eusebius and cf. the material on the Holy Spirit collocated by Sickenberger 1901, 103–6; to this can be added Contra Manich. IV.84, §y 169.12–17:

וְכֵן כִּי יִשְׁמַע אֱלֹהִים אֶת הַקּוֹל וְיִשְׁמַע אֶת הַקּוֹל
 אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ
 אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ
 אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ
 אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ אֱלֹהִים אֵלֶּיךָ

("For so too our Saviour speaks: 'There is no good but the one God alone'. This is a case where His goodness undergoes no change at all. But that one [i.e. our Saviour] is also good like Him, that one who says this about his Father, since he is from Him. But also the prophet says of the Holy Spirit: 'Your good Spirit will lead me on the smooth earth'." According to Baumstark [1935, 278, 293] the first quotation [Mt. 19.17/Mk. 10.18/Lk. 18.19] is from Diatessaron, the second from Ps. 143.10 [= 142.10LXX]).

⁸⁹ Sickenberger 1901, 15–16, 111–114.

was particularly held together by common exegetical principles, and which can at least be traced back to Eusebius of Emesa, but may also be older.⁹⁰ My interest tends more towards a group united by a common theological interest in defending man's ethical freedom than a group united on the same exegetical principle; to some extent, though, we are speaking of two descriptions of the same group. However, this vague theological agreement on the defence of ethical freedom does not correspond to what is known as Antiochene theology, i.e. the particular Christology that receives its clear distinguishing mark with Theodore of Mopsuestia. It is highly doubtful whether such a Christology exists at this point, and it is certainly not in Titus. "[T]he definition of the Antiochene School as a Richtung alleviates the necessity of dogmatic unity", Romeny claims;⁹¹ the absence of an "Antiochene Christology" cannot therefore be used to justify Titus's omission from the Antiochenes. If it is nevertheless correct that alongside the common exegetical principles we can say that it was common to the Antiochene theologians to lay great stress on man's freedom of choice and to reject every idea of determinism or fatalism, it may then very well be that this was the common feature that was later instrumental in creating Antiochene Christology.

The defence of ethical freedom, however, was a concern that on the one hand the Antiochenes shared with the entire Early Church and on the other actually united them with Origen; moreover, insofar as the Antiochenes' concerns are seen to be determined by their common front against allegedly determinist heresies such as the Bardesanites and Manichaeans, they are following a similar line to ⁹⁰ There is agreement that the designation "the Antiochene School" does not cover a particular institution but rather a "school of thought". Some scholars, e.g. Drewery (1978, 104–9), distinguish between an older and a younger Antiochene School, where the older School includes Theophilus of Antioch, Paul of Samosata and the presbyter Lucian, and the younger School Eustathius of Antioch, Marcellus of Ancyra, Diodore of Tarsus, Flavian of Antioch, John Chrysostom, Nemesius of Emesa, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Nestorius, John of Antioch and Theodoret of Cyrus. Cf. Romeny 1997, 127f.; 1997a, 89ff.; Viciano 1996, 370–71, who gives an account of other similar distinctions. An actual teacher-pupil tradition can only be documented beginning with Eusebius of Emesa, and it is therefore doubtful whether it makes sense to speak of an "Antiochene School" before Eusebius of Emesa; Romeny (1997, 127–28; 1997a, 89–90) observes that the above-mentioned "Antiochene" writers before Eusebius are precisely those about whom we know least, but he nonetheless holds that there are "few grounds for drawing the line before Eusebius." (Romeny 1997, 128; 1997a, 90).

⁹¹ Romeny 1997a, 10.

the attacks on the alleged determinism of Valentinianism by Justin, Irenaeus, Clement and Origen, among others. On this point the Antiochenes may well have been influenced from several directions, but in particular Eusebius of Emesa was a direct link with the tradition from the Alexandrians through his pupil relationship to Eusebius of Caesarea. Despite this community of ideas with the other Church fathers and especially the Alexandrians, we nevertheless sense that the Antiochenes' emphasis on man's ethical freedom is, if possible, even stronger than that of the other Church fathers, because they lack an accompanying interest in man's reason as contemplative and "related to God".⁹² A partial explanation of this fact could be that the battle against allegedly determinist heresies grew to be so widespread among the Antiochenes that ethical freedom became the only concern that was of interest.

Titus's relationship to the group in question could have been a purely literary dependence without further personal contact, i.e. conditioned by his use of George of Laodicea's work against the Manichaeans. But the possibility of closer personal contacts should also be considered, e.g. that Titus received his education from Eusebius in Caesarea. Geographically and chronologically this is perfectly possible, and even though it could never be proved, it would most assuredly explain a string of similarities that have been, or will be, mentioned in this study: similarities in the portrait of Mani, in the sympathy with Origen, in the possibly broad knowledge of pagan literature, the similarity with the quaestiones-genre, the historically orientated exegesis, the political theology in Homiliae in Lucam, and similarities in the interpretation of the Paradise narrative.⁹³ To this may be added further material that perhaps suggests that Titus had access to Eusebius of Caesarea's Chronicon and Historia ecclesiastica (see the following Excursion).

The theories laid out here on Titus's relationship to a group of early "Antiochene" writers will prove to be of relevance to this study, particularly in the examination of the following questions. Did any of the writers in this group more or less share the marked philosophically-orientated theology that Titus of Bostra introduced in Contra ⁹² This special point in connection with Theodore is very clearly presented in Norris 1963, 129–46, 157–59, 169–72, 191, but I believe that to a wide degree it also covers writers such as Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore of Tarsus.

⁹³ See below pp. 153, 156, 166–68, 172, 253–54, 255ff., 369–71 on all these points.

Manichaeos, and if so, does this demonstrate that the anti-Manichaean problems and strategies that were determinant for Titus also helped to steer the theological development in a wider geographical and cultural context?

Excursion: Possible use of various patristic sources in Titus

With the single exception of Origen, Titus never mentions earlier Catholic writers. In so doing he has made it truly difficult to establish anything about his sources. Yet his knowledge of other works on heresy is clear from the number of standard arguments that resurface in Contra Manichaeos. Thus Titus's charge in III.69–72 (§§ 116.31–119.5) that pagan philosophy is without validity because it is divided into heresies is traditional polemic: for it was common in the literature of Late Antiquity to attack pagan philosophy precisely because it was divided into heresies.⁹⁴ The theological purpose in withdrawing the epithet of 'Christian' from the heresies by designating them according to their heresiarch (III.71–72) was also common.⁹⁵ When Titus claims in Contra Manichaeos IV.17–21 that Mani has stolen his teaching from others, it is no more than a heresiological topos,⁹⁶ just as the feature that Mani uses Aristotle wrongly (Contra Manichaeos IV.19) is a heresiological topos.⁹⁷ But these traits do not allow us a closer definition of Titus's sources. However, in three passages from the part of Contra Manichaeos which is only preserved in a Syriac translation there is information that perhaps can help us to identify certain patristic sources.

In several places Titus includes Mani alongside earlier heretics; in III.68.71 we are given the names Marcion, Basilides and Valentinus. Already this fact shows that, as we might expect, Titus was informed about previous heresiology; thus in III.68 Titus appears to present a doxographical "catalogue of heretics" common to patristic literature, though it is only by implication that Titus uses the idea here of a heretical succession or διαδοχή;

⁹⁴ A line of argument on the basis of the philosophers' διαφωνία has roots in philosophy itself and appears e.g. in Philo and many of the Church fathers (see Grant 1967, 159 [= 1949, 41–42]; Tardieu 1984, 351; Le Boulluec 1985, 52–58; Brox 1986, 257; Mansfeld 1988, 89–102 [esp. references 92 n. 41]).

⁹⁵ Cf. Le Boulluec 1985, 52–64, 158–67; Dörrie 1976, 510. The two motives are already linked together in Justin, see Dial. XXXV,6 with reference to Dial. II,1 and Apol. I.4,8; I.7,3; I.26,6 (on this see also Van Winden 1971, 42–45). Cf. e.g. Athanasius, Contra Ar. I,2–3 (PG 26, 16A–17A).

⁹⁶ This occurs among others in Irenaeus (e.g. Adv. haer. I.27,4; II.14); see Brox 1967a, 267–71 ("Bestreitung der Originalität"); Le Boulluec 1985, 123–24. At the same time Titus also turns it into a charge against Mani that he is the inventor of "new" teachings! (Contra Manich. IV.21) (cf. Klein 1991, 142, 164).

⁹⁷ See Brox 1967a, 271–73 ("Mißverständnis und Mißbrauch der Quellen").

of, it is nevertheless possible in my opinion that it existed in the Greek original of Eusebius's Chronicon.¹⁰⁴ If so, we can say that Titus has had access to the Chronicon, but this is a poor result, for there is not much else in the Chronicon that could be used in Contra Manichaeos, which is barely concerned with history and chronology. Moreover, the other remarks in Contra Manichaeos III.68 on Marcion, Basilides and Valentinus cannot come from Eusebius's Chronicon,¹⁰⁵ nor from Eusebius's renowned Historia ecclesiastica.¹⁰⁶

Yet Titus's remark that Basilides and Mani spoke in agreement with each other about the principles (ܠܘܚܘܬܝܢ) could perhaps be seen as a clue to another, far more important, source. As I have already implied in my previous paraphrase, on this point we must be aware that the Syriac term ܠܘܚܘܬܝܢ translates the Greek ἀρχαί, i.e. "principles", which in Titus's context must mean the first, fundamental principles behind the entire universe. This in turn means that Titus believes that, like Mani, Basilides was an adherent of a radical dualism, a doctrine that both good and evil were eternal principles.

Apart from this passage in Titus I am aware of only one other text which claims that Basilides shared with Mani a doctrine of good and evil as eternal principles. This is the Acta Archelai LXVII.4– LXVIII.4

Simon Magus anhebende irenäische Schema der Ketzersukzession . . . verlassen". The ancient term γνῳστικὸς did not carry the modern technical meaning of "Gnostic" (cf. e.g. Khosroyev 1995, 145 n. 414; Williams 1996, 31–43). The information in the Chron. comes rather from a superficial reading of precisely Irenaeus; e.g. in Adv. haer. I.28,2 Irenaeus speaks of heresies with a lawless practice that come from Basilides and Carpocrates, and then in I.29,1 of a large number of Gnostics; in II.13,8 Irenaeus mentions first Basilides's School and then "the rest of the Gnostics"; cf. also the remarks on the Gnostics and Basilides in II.31,1; finally Irenaeus speaks in IV.6,4 of Marcion, Valentinus, Basilides, Carpocrates, Simon and the rest of those who are unjustly called Gnostics. My theory that on this point the Chron. builds on an erroneous reading of Irenaeus cannot, however, be reconciled with the opinion of Grant (1980, 9, 40, 84), who believes that Eusebius had not yet studied Justin and Irenaeus when he wrote the Chron., because in it he does not mention any heretics before Basilides.

¹⁰⁴ This is apparently also the view of Helm (1956) since he does not add an asterisk.

¹⁰⁵ Titus cannot have found anything in the information on Marcion and Valentinus in Eusebius's Chron. (see Helm 1956, 202.8–9.20–21 and Karst 1911, 221).

¹⁰⁶ Neither the information on Marcion and Valentinus in Hist. ecl. IV,11; IV.18 nor on Basilides in IV.7 would be sufficient.

(LV),¹⁰⁷ which claims that Basilides was one of Mani's predecessors, and, in roughly the same formulation that Titus employs, that Basilides lived before Mani.¹⁰⁸ With the aid of two quotations from Basilides, one of which contains a long so-called "barbarian myth" that has certain similarities with the Manichaean myth, Acta Archelai seeks to prove that, like Mani, Basilides had taught a radical dualism.

In my opinion Löhr has convincingly shown that Basilides does not reveal himself as a dualist in the above quotations, and that dualism in the barbarian myth, which Basilides includes only as a subject worthy of discussion, had already been subjected to a philosophical interpretation that had toned down its dualism.¹⁰⁹ In other words Hegemonius has misunderstood his quotations, and it is purely as a result of this misunderstanding that Basilides can appear to maintain a dualism of the same type as Mani's. If Löhr is right, it is most likely that Acta Archelai was one of the texts that Titus used when he wrote his Contra Manichaeos. It is improbable that both Hegemonius and Titus misunderstood in the same way and by chance the comparability between Basilides' and Mani's fundamental doctrines.

Not everything that Titus wrote about Basilides—or Marcion and Valentinus—can be found in Acta Archelai,¹¹⁰ and it might be objected that the feature which I have just introduced is insufficient documentation for ¹⁰⁷ Beeson 1906, 96.10–98.11; cf. Hilgenfeld 1966, 207–10.

¹⁰⁸ Cf. Acta Arch. LXVII.4 (LV) (Beeson 1906, 96.10–12): "Fuit praedicator apud Persas etiam Basilides quidam antiquior" (Beeson 1906, 96.10–11) and Sy 116.23:

אל סח ר.ר.ר.ר.

¹⁰⁹ See Löhr 1996, 219–49.—Von Zittwitz's (1873, 471–72) view that the passage on Basilides should not originally have belonged to Acta Arch., is not convincing; nor was the end of the passage accessible in his time (cf. Traube 1903).

¹¹⁰ Titus's information on Mani and Basilides's disagreement on "the form of the creation" is not to be found in Acta Arch., but Titus himself may have accepted it on the basis of Acta Arch. by being more sharp-sighted than Hegemonius in observing the difference between the Manichaean and the barbarian myth in question. The myth ends with the words "Et haec est ista, quam cernimus, creatura." (Acta Arch. LXVII.11 [LV], Beeson 1906, 97.21), and Archelaus concludes shortly after: "In his enim de mundi conditione conscripsit secundum quod Scythianus senserat." (Acta Arch. LXVII.12 [LV], Beeson 1906, 97.23–24).—Scythianus was according to Acta Arch. Mani's precursor.

On the other hand neither the information that according to Basilides the OT is evil in origin, nor the information on Marcion and Valentinus comes from Acta Arch., not even indirectly. When Archelaus among earlier heretics in Acta Arch. XLI.8 (XXXVII) (Beeson 1906, 61.5) names "Valentiniani aut Marcionis aut Tatiani aut source dependency. I will therefore turn to another passage from Contra Manichaeos which also makes it likely that Titus depended on Acta Archelai. The passage in question is to be found in Contra Manichaeos IV.86, where Titus apparently presents a Mani-chaeic interpretation of 1 Cor. 13.9–10, in that he writes:

Paul said that he (only) knows a little out of much, and he (only) prophesies a little out of much, but when perfection comes, (then) that which was a little comes to an end. Now because he speaks through me, perfection has been introduced precisely through me, and also that that which was a little is being repaired and cleansed (Sy 169.34–170.3 → Ch. XI.47).

This quotation is especially interesting because it is in the 1st person singular and clearly must have been intended as spoken by Mani. At first glance one might imagine that it came from one of Mani's own works or from the Kephalaia-literature. Both in Augustine (Contra Faustum XV.6; XXXII.17) and in the Manichaean Felix (Contra Felicem I.IX) we can also read that Mani invoked 1 Cor. 13.9–10.

We also find the same information in Acta Archelai XV, and XLI. Ch. XV is particularly interesting: Mani has finally arrived in the city of Carchar in Mesopotamia, and the rich Marcellus has arranged a public disputation in which Mani is first allowed to present himself and his message. Here we can read the following in Vermes' translation:

and, as Paul who was sent before me said, he “knew in part and professed in part”, thus reserving for me that which is complete, so that I might destroy that which is in part.¹¹¹

Yet another quotation in the 1st person singular! Is Titus in fact quoting from Acta Archelai? One must observe here that although the two quotations are very close to one another, there are nonetheless certain differences. Thus at the end of the Acta Archelai quotation we are told that Mani “might destroy that which is in part”, “hoc quod ex parte est destruam”, which follows the text of the Greek Bible (καταργηθήσεται) (13,10), whereas in Sabellii ceterorumque qui propriam sibimet ipsis scientiam conposuerunt” and in Acta Arch. XLII.1 (XXXVIII) (Beeson 1906, 61.32–33) “Marcionem et Valentinianum ac Basilidem aliosque hereticos” (cf. Klein 1991, 140), such brief remarks cannot of course be Titus's source.

¹¹¹ Vermes 2001, 59–60. Acta Arch. XV.3 (XIII) (Beeson 1906, 24.4–7): “sicut et qui ante me missus est Paulus ex parte scire et ex parte prophetare se dixit, mihi reservans quod perfectum est, ut hoc quod ex parte est destruam.”

Titus we read that “that which was a little is being repaired and cleansed”. The use of two verbs in Contra Manichaeos, i.e. ܩܕܝܢܐ and ܩܕܫܐ, is presumably a so-called hendiadys translation, which is often found in the Syriac translation of Titus, i.e. out of regard for semantic precision the Syriac translator renders a single Greek concept with two Syriac words. I am unaware, however, of which Greek concept is being referred to, though it cannot have been καταργηθήσεται. The reason why the Titus text does not have a word that corresponds to καταργηθήσεται at this point is because, in contrast to Acta Archelai Titus has quoted the whole of 1 Cor. 13.9–10 in the previous sentences, while at this juncture Acta Archelai shortens the quotation from Paul.

This is admittedly a minor variant, but it seems a more important difference that the quotation in Titus states that Paul “speaks through me”, and that “perfection has been introduced precisely through me”; these formulations are not found in this form at this point in Hegemonius. However, much further on in the disputation (Acta Archelai XLI), in distancing themselves from the heresiarch, the men who have been appointed judges between Mani and the Catholic Bishop Archelaus, return to the question of 1 Cor. 13.9–10. Here we find the remarks:

Therefore when you said that the Paraclete was present in Paul and that the Paraclete attested everything, why did Paul say: “We know in part and we prophesy in part; but when what is perfect comes, what is in part shall be abolished.”?¹¹²

Here we at least find the point that the Paraclete spoke through Paul, and since Mani claimed to be the Paraclete, Titus may have improved the quotation from Acta Archelai XV with this detail. The improvement may be due to Titus finding that the line between the quotation from Paul and Mani’s interpretation was not marked clearly enough in the formulation from Acta Archelai XV.¹¹³ Another possibility is that the Latin translator of Acta Archelai

¹¹² Vermes 2001, 106. Acta Arch. XLI.2 (XXXVI) (Beeson 1906, 60.9–12): “Unde cum dixeris in Paulo fuisse paracletum et ipsum omnia consignasse, quare dixit: Ex parte scimus et ex parte prophetamus; cum autem venerit quod perfectum est, id quod ex parte est destruetur?” See in general Acta Arch. XLI.2f. (XXXVI f.) (Beeson 1906, 60.9ff.).

¹¹³ Cf. Vermes’s note on the translation of ‘reservans’ in Acta Arch. XV (2001, 60 n. 84): “Our translation attempts to keep an ambiguity as to whether ‘I’ or Paul is the subject of this verb.”

XV shortened the Greek original, the more complete text of which is preserved in the Syriac translation of Titus.

If it is true that Titus had access to Acta Archelai, it means that with all the information on Manichaeism that is common to Hegemonius and Titus, we must reckon that Titus can simply have borrowed it from the former. This rule is true, for instance, of Contra Manichaeos IV.47, where Titus states that the Manichaeans used Jesus's words about the two trees, for the information is also found in Acta Archelai V.¹¹⁴ Or when Titus speaks in I.9 of the adamantine wall (τὸ ἀδαμάντινον τεῖχος, Gr. 5.9) that will close off the Kingdoms of Light and Darkness from each other, he may have read already in Acta Archelai XXVI (XXIII).¹¹⁵ In both cases we are dealing with genuine Manichaean material, but this does not necessarily mean that Titus himself found it in the Manichaean texts which he undoubtedly had access to. He may also have used Acta Archelai on other points.¹¹⁶

Whatever the case, Titus has made use of Hegemonius's work to only a limited extent. However, his procedure in Contra Manichaeos IV.86 means that we must reckon with the possibility that in similar fashion he may have plundered other anti-Manichaean works long vanished, for information on Manichaeism.

The third and last passage from Contra Manichaeos that I wish to bring into the discussion is to be found in Contra Manichaeos IV.12 (Sy 134.22–135.17), where Titus seeks to prove that Mani lived long after Christ. He is interested in documenting this fact because Mani claimed to have been sent by Christ as an apostle and Paraclete with the aim of removing all the passages in the NT that relate or refer to the God of the OT (→ Ch. XI.45). According to Titus, however, it is unlikely that God would have allowed such a length of time to pass since Christ before He sent out one who could cleanse Christ's words of interpolations.

¹¹⁴ Beeson 1906, 7. As is well known, the Manichaeans actually used this parable.

¹¹⁵ Beeson 1906, 38.11–39.10.—The adamantine wall is also known from Serapion of Thmuis and in fact comes from Manichaean mythology (see references in Klein 1991, 63 and Gardner and Worp 1997, 149).

¹¹⁶ Cf. also Baur 1831, 31.—The Manichaean attack on Deut. 4.24, which Titus mentions in Contra Manich. III.7.62, does not appear in Acta Arch., but does so in Cyril's Catech. VI.27 (Reischl 1848, 190–93), where there is the debate between Mani and Archelaus (cf. Von Zittwitz 1873, 471). Cf. on this point the possibility mentioned by Lieu (in Vermes 2001, 8), “that Cyril was using a divergent or more extensive version than the one reproduced by the Latin Acta.”

Titus states that Christ's bodily birth happened at the time when Augustus was Emperor (Sy 134.34–35), and that his passion and ascension took place in Tiberius's 18th year (Sy 134.35–135.1). From Tiberius to Decius, who persecuted the Church violently, there are 213 years (𐌲𐌹𐌶𐌰 𐌹𐌲𐌰𐌳𐌹𐌳𐌰 𐌲𐌰𐌳𐌰𐌹𐌳, Sy 135.2) (Sy 135.1–2). Until then Mani was unknown, as Titus can prove (Sy 135.3–4), because Origen, the Church's teacher and presbyter, who lived until Decius, does not mention Mani, even though he does not omit a single one of the heretics who fought against the Catholic Church; so, Mani lived after Origen (135.4–8).

This passage is singular in that Titus mentions a previous Catholic theologian by name, and it is worth noting that Origen is described positively throughout as a man of the Church. Unfortunately the passage hardly tells us anything about how many of Origen's writings Titus had actually read,¹¹⁷ for what can Titus mean by saying that Origen has mentioned every one of the heretics that fought against the Catholic Church? Unlike Irenaeus and Hippolytus Origen never wrote a single polemic "against all heretics".¹¹⁸ Of course Titus may be referring to the running polemic against heretics that is found in most of Origen's works, but this polemic has hardly the systematic and complete character that could form the basis for Titus's deduction. The evidence speaks in favour of Titus referring to a work that contemporary theology wrongly attributed to Origen. There are two works ¹¹⁷ Material outside Contra Manich. favours the argument that Titus had read the great Alexandrian theologian. Titus's knowledge and appreciation of Origen is confirmed by Photius, Bibl., cod. 232 (291b18–21) (Henry 1967, 79), who relates Stephanus Gobarus's florilegium (cf. Bardy 1947, 22), but Stephanus could of course be referring precisely to Contra Manich. IV.12. Cf. more distantly Sickenberger 1901, 39, 114 on Origen-Titus. In Hom. in Luc. Titus borrows historical, geographical and other entries from Origen, but otherwise, because of his non-allegorical hermeneutics Titus does not draw on Origen to any great degree.—Although Sickenberger is right in saying that Titus does not allegorise much, this does not preclude his appreciation of Origen; cf. the Origen admirer, Eusebius of Caesarea, whose exegesis was also historicising (see Wallace-Hadrill 1982, 38–39). It is also of interest to note in this context that by the beginning of the 4th cent. the Antiochenes knew and were influenced by Origen; Eustathius of Antioch refuted him, and Acacius and Eusebius of Emesa were pupils of Eusebius of Caesarea, who as mentioned admired Origen and had access to his library (see Romeny 1997a, 92–93).

¹¹⁸ Remarks in Epiphanius, Theodoret and Pamphilus could admittedly suggest that Origen wrote a work of heresiology (see Bardenhewer 1914, 166–67), but Bardenhewer's conclusion (167) can hardly be disputed: "Aber wenn nicht samt und sonders, so sind doch jedenfalls die meisten dieser Angaben auf jene beiläufige Polemik gegen Häretiker zu beziehen, wie sie fast allen Schriften des Origenes eigen ist."

that in this context are possible candidates. The first is Adamantius's dialogue De recta in Deum fide, which already in the 4th century had been attributed to Origen.¹¹⁹ Yet nor does this text appear to have the character that could justify Titus's deduction.¹²⁰ The second is Hippolytus's Refutatio omnium haeresium, which from an early date was circulating under Origen's name. Precisely this text is of a character that could justify Titus's deduction, and already in 1863 De Lagarde suggested that this was the work to which Titus was referring. This is the most likely solution, but I should mention that I have been unable to find other places in Contra Manichaeos where it might seem that Titus has used Refutatio. Even though Books 2–3 of Refutatio are missing, eight other books are preserved that ought to have left their mark. Did Titus only consult the work just the once, and solely to check on whether it included Mani?¹²¹

If Titus really did know Acta Archelai, he must have chosen to ignore it, since on the basis of Refutatio he deduced that Mani lived after Origen. If he had trusted Acta Archelai, he could have settled for referring to the work's dating of Mani under the Roman Emperor Probus, who reigned from 276 to 282,¹²² a dating that is not entirely misplaced if it is true that Mani died in 276 and not 274. Despite Titus ignoring the dating in Acta Archelai, it is nevertheless possible that he borrowed the general argument from this text! For in Acta Archelai XXXI.6–8 (XXVII) Bishop Archelaus attacks Mani in the following way: Mani . . .

says that he is the Paraclete who was predicted by Jesus would be sent, and by so saying perhaps in ignorance he will allege that Jesus is a liar. For Jesus who had said that soon afterwards he would send the Paraclete, is found after three hundred years and more to have sent this man, according to the testimony that he himself provides. What will those people say to Jesus on the day of judgement that have departed this life in between that time and the present? Surely they ¹¹⁹ Bakhuyzen 1901, XIII–XV; Bardenhewer 1914, 292–99; Clark 1992, 168–71 with further references (cf. perhaps also Epiphanius, Haer. 66.21,3, Holl 1933, 49.1 with Holl's note and Lieu 1994, 202).

¹²⁰ Nor here could Titus have found the information on Marcion, Basilides and Valentinus for Contra Manich. III.68.

¹²¹ It is perhaps because Ref. circulated very early under Origen's name that Epiphanius did not draw on the writing (see Bardenhewer 1914, 563–64; Vallée 1981, 41, 63).—De Lagarde 1863, 94 n. 1 suggested that Titus was referring to Ref.—The information that Titus brings in III.68 on Marcion, Basilides and Valentinus is also different from the account in Ref. and therefore unlikely to come from that source.

¹²² Acta Arch. XXXI.8 (XXVII) (Beeson 1906, 44.22–24) and XXXII.1 (XXVIII) (Beeson 1906, 45.4).

will present these statements to him: "Do not torture us if we have not fulfilled your works. For why, when you promised under Tiberius Caesar that you would send the Paraclete, to 'convict us of sin and of judgement and justice' did you only send him under the Roman emperor Probus? Why did you leave us as orphans, when you yourself said: 'I shall not leave you as orphans', when you yourself said that you, soon to depart, would send the Paraclete?"¹²³

This is an argument very similar to Titus's own, but at the same time this passage can perhaps explain why Titus ignored its dating: he may have found it problematic because of Hegemonius's transparent nonsense. From the ascension of Christ to the time of Probus was not "three hundred years and more"; the statement refers rather to the real point in time that Hegemonius wrote Acta Archelai.

Titus must also have ignored Eusebius's Chronicon, where the beginning of Manichaeism is similarly dated to the time of Probus.¹²⁴ Titus also follows a different dating from Eusebius when he writes that 213 years passed from the passion and ascension of Christ in Tiberius's 18th year to the time of Decius who persecuted the Catholic Church. It is true that Jerome's translation of Eusebius's Chronicon also places the crucifixion in Tiberius's 18th year, and the Armenian translation dates it to the 19th year (cf. Lk.

¹²³ Vermes 2001, 85–86.—Beeson 1906, 44.15–24: "dicens se esse paracletum qui ab Iesu praesignatus est mitti, in quo mendacem ignorans fortasse adseret Iesum; qui enim dixerat se non multo post missurum esse paracletum invenitur post trecentos et eo amplius annos misisse hunc, sicut ipse sibi testimonium perhibet. Quid dicent Iesu in die iudicii illi qui iam vita excesserunt ex illo tempore usque nunc? Nonne haec apud eum allegabunt: Noli nos cruciari si opera tua non fecimus? Cur enim, cum promiseris sub Tiberio Caesare missurum te esse paracletum, qui argueret nos de peccato et de iudicio et de iustitia, sub Probo demum Romano imperatore misisti? <Cur> orphanos dereliquisti, cum ipse dixeris, non derelinquam vos orphanos, cum ipse dixeris te, mox ires, missurum esse paracletum?"

¹²⁴ Helm 1956, 223.25–26; Karst 1911, 227. Presumably on this point it is Eusebius's Chron. which is Hegemonius's source; cf. Holl 1933, 14, note.—It is unconvincing when Grant (1972, 433; 1980, 84–85, 94; cf. Barnes 1981, 192, 369 n. 14–15) suggests that Eusebius's dating alluded to the arrival of the Manichaean mission to Eleutheropolis in Palestine which is mentioned in Epiphanius, Haer. 66.1.1 (Holl 1933, 13.21–14.4), for Epiphanius dates this mission to the time around the 4th year of Emperor Aurelian's reign. When Epiphanius also mentions Emperor Probus (Haer. 66.19.9, Holl 1933, 44.16; 66.20.3, Holl 1933, 47.11; 66.78.1, Holl 1933, 119.7), he is drawing on Eusebius's Chron. (Holl 1933, 14, note), as Grant (1972, 432 n. 6) himself also mentions.

3.1–2.23; Jn. 2.13, 6.4, 11.55), but none of them contain Titus's information that 213 years passed from the crucifixion to Decius. Both versions state that there were 220 years from the crucifixion to Decius.¹²⁵

There are other remarks by Titus in Contra Manichaeos IV.12 that one could imagine were taken from Eusebius's Historia ecclesiastica. Also in his work Eusebius wrote that the crucifixion took place in Tiberius's 18th year (I.10); Origen is mentioned as a presbyter (VI.8 and 23); naturally Decius's persecution is treated, and in this context Origen's suffering and death are mentioned (VI.39); this rhymes less well with Titus, however, when we read later that Origen died at the time when Gallus succeeded Decius (VII.1). Titus's understanding of Origen as a man of the Church could well have its source in the apology for Origen in Historia ecclesiastica. But another possible source could be the Apologia pro Origene in six books, jointly written by Eusebius and Pamphilus and only partially preserved.¹²⁶

We have now come to the end of the three passages from Contra Manichaeos that I wished to discuss, and they have also resulted in theories on at least four early patristic works which Titus may have used. The most probable theory is that Titus drew on Acta Archelai,—and it is also the most interesting, because it shows how Titus's portrayal of Manichaeism not only has its source in his meeting with original Manichaean texts, but is already formed by earlier anti-Manichaean heresiology. With regard to the other theories it is very reasonable to assume that in Contra Manichaeos IV.12 Titus ¹²⁵ Helm 1956, 174.14ff.; Karst 1911, 213 (the crucifixion). See also Helm 1956, 174–218; Karst 1911, 213–26.

¹²⁶ Titus's information that Origen lived until Decius must mean on a strict interpretation that Origen died under that Emperor. In that case the information agrees with Photius's summary of Pamphilus and Eusebius's work in Bibl., cod. 118 (92b14–19): Φασὶ δὲ αὐτὸν ὃ τε Πάμφιλος μάρτυς καὶ ἕτεροι πλείστοι, οἵτινες ἀπ' αὐτῶν τῶν ἑωρακότων Ὠριγένην τὰ περὶ τοῦ ἀνδρὸς ἠκριβώσαντο, διαβοήτῳ μαρτυρίῳ τοῦ βίου ἐξεληλυθῆναι ἐπ' αὐτῆς τῆς Καισαρείας Δεκίου τὴν κατὰ τῶν Χριστιανῶν ὁμότητα πνέοντος. (Henry 1960, 90–91) (the alternative idea that Origen survived Decius's persecution, as Photius states in what follows [92b19–24; Henry 1960, 91], comes according to Nautin 1977, 101–2 from the Greek version of Jerome's De vir. illustr.). However, Grant (1980, 16, 20, 77–79) argues that the account in Hist. eccl. VI.39 still contains traces that show that like Pamphilus and Eusebius's Apologia, it originally had Origen dying during Decius's reign. If Grant is right, then this could also be the older version of Hist. eccl. that was Titus's source. Eusebius's Chron. also refers to Decius's persecution and Origen's occupation as teacher, but this text mentions neither his position as priest, nor his fight against heretics, nor his death (cf. Grant 1980, 16), and cannot therefore be Titus's source on this point.—Also relevant to the question of whether Titus knew Eusebius's Hist. eccl., are the similarities in the understanding of Mani that I noted above (p. 131).—Incidentally, as it now stands, the reference to Mani's appearance in Hist. eccl. VII.31 could almost give the impression that it took place under Emperor Diocletian!

is referring to Hippolytus's Refutatio; this is of less importance, however, because Titus does not otherwise seem to be influenced by that text. Finally, it is a possibility, but no more than that, that Titus used Eusebius of Caesarea's Chronicon and Historia ecclesiastica. This possibility may yet tell us something about Titus's position in the history of Early Catholic theology.

CHAPTER FIVE

THE AUDIENCE FOR CONTRA MANICHAEOS AND THE PORTRAYAL OF MANICHAISM THAT TITUS WISHED TO PRESENT TO THEM

1. The two audiences

The previous chapter was mainly concerned with material outside Contra Manichaeos that could serve the interpretation of the work; thus it was suggested that the information on Titus's role in the contemporary local conflicts between Catholics and pagans in the province of Arabia could explain his intentions to attack the Manichaeans while addressing the pagans. The point was also made, though, that as a literary heresiological work Contra Manichaeos belongs in a broader Catholic context, and that it seems particularly suited to being grouped with various "Antiochene" anti-Manichaean texts.

The possible link between Contra Manichaeos and relations to both pagans and to a widespread type of Catholic literature reminds us of its basic division into on the one hand Books I–II—where the Bible is hardly ever quoted¹—and on the other hand Books III–IV, which are dedicated to the interpretation of the Bible. It is clear that the most fundamental interpretation of Contra Manichaeos must take up a position on this structure.

In two passages, however, Titus actually explains this structure; the first is in the opening chapter of Book I, where he writes (I.1, Gr. 1.22–30):

¹ I have found only the following direct, but general, references to the Holy or Divine Scriptures: Contra Manich. I.1 (Gr. 1.27–28); II.20 (Gr. 37.4); II.42 (Gr. 51.4–5). But in addition to these there are a number of covert allusions to the Bible: see Gen. 1.26–27 and Contra Manich. II.11 (Gr. 31.3–4); Gen. 1.31 and Contra Manich. II.1 (Gr. 26.4), II.2 (Gr. 26.10–11), II.7 (Gr. 29.14.18–19); perhaps Mt. 13.1–9.18–23/Mk. 4.1–9.13–20/Lk. 8.4–8.11–15 and Contra Manich. II.43 (Gr. 52.25–26); Jn. 1.5 and Contra Manich. II.36 (Gr. 47.26–27; cf. De Lagarde 1859, 126); perhaps Jn. 14.6 and Contra Manich. II.37 (Gr. 48.4); 1 Cor. 9.25–26/Phil. 3.14/1 Tim. 6.12/2 Tim. 2.5, 4.7/Heb. 12.1/Jas. 1.12/1 (1 Pet. 5.4 and Contra Manich. II.22 (Gr. 39.7–10.34–35); perhaps Phil. 4.7 and Contra Manich. II.48 (Gr. 56.36); perhaps 1 Tim. 4.7 and Contra Manich. I.17 (Gr. 10.12); 1 Tim. 6.10 and Contra Manich. I.29 (Gr. 18.34–35) (cf. Poirier and Sensal 1990, 51 n. 311); perhaps 1 Tim. 6.16/1 Jn. 1.5 and Contra Manich. I.23 (Gr. 14.5–6), II.37 (Gr. 48.5–7).

For the teaching of the Catholic Church endeavours to give priority to (the point) that it is pious to confess with full vigour that God is innocent of the injustices that exist among men. When we examine in what way we sin, since God does not wish us to do so, we do not accuse God of great things, since like him [i.e. Mani] we wish to defend Him with regard to minor things. On the contrary: since we possess the very way of truth both from the Holy Scriptures and from the common concepts, we are walking assuredly towards the examination that is thus constituted, and by sincerely directing the charges against ourselves, we make the demonstrative proof in defence of God a pious one. (→ Ch. XI.2)

As can be seen Titus derives “the way of truth” from two parallel and equally important sources: “the Holy Scriptures” and “the common concepts”. The fact that Titus believes the truth to have two sources explains the peculiar structure of his work, as he himself presents it in the second passage at the beginning of Book III (III.1, Gr. 66.28–37):

What has now been said above—both from their actions and from the common concepts—may perhaps strengthen the mind, also in all those outside the Church, so that it in no way sanctions the madman’s blasphemy against the Creator of all things; but because he has set an other trap for those who are from the Church, both fearful and dangerous, by violating certain words from the Holy Scriptures for his own false narrative, the time is now also ripe to set in motion refutations from the Divine Scriptures against him to strengthen those who believe (and) in defence of those who are occasionally led astray by him through outlandish and highly improbable interpretations. (→ Ch. XI.32)

Already here we see that Titus is not writing to the Manichaeans as such, but to groups that need to be protected from them. Moreover, it is clear that the first source of truth, “the common concepts”, κοινὰ ἔννοιαι, is only used in Books I–II, while the other source, the Bible, is brought into play in Books III–IV. Titus believed that he could construct a line of argument without a specifically Christian foundation that would unite both Catholic Christians and non-Christians and protect the common rationality in both parts. In other words the argument in the first two books lays claim to universal validity, which is why it is not Bible-based, for it is to be read also by non-Christians.² Since Titus regards his argument in the first two books as decisive within its area, his approach cannot be explained through the rhetorical technique of placing the weaker arguments before the stronger.

² Stroumsa (1992, 339–40) also emphasises that Books I–II are a rational refu-

The question therefore remains as to why it was important for Titus to warn pagans against Manichaeism. Sickenberger's suggestion that Titus wished to convert them to Christianity is untenable;³ firstly it is not what Titus says in III.1, and secondly a line of argument which is not specifically Christian would not have served this purpose. At the most it might have made his readers sympathetic towards its author and possibly therefore amenable to later Catholic mission—and to the arguments in Books III–IV.

Part of the explanation for Titus's use of a universal rather than a specifically Christian line of argument might very well be found in Book III.1, where he claims that the Manichaeans are endeavouring to proselytise among pagans. He speaks of Mani, but he means Mani's disciples (Gr. 66.39–67.4):

Among the Greeks he does not overthrow their teachings, but he raises the lesser evils to the greater standing of impiety and (thus) he instructs a worse kind of Greekness; in them [referring either to 'the lesser evils' or to 'teachings'] he has inserted an addition of his own inventions, in that he carries his claim round to nearly everyone with a similar tenet on evil and unreliable doctrines . . . (→ Ch. XI.32)

Ἕλλησι and ἑλληνισμὸν mean here “pagans with Greek culture” and “Greek paganism” and perhaps refer to all the pagans in Bostra, whether or not they were of Semitic origin.⁴ Titus is thus addressing tation of dualism, in which Titus seeks to give his argument universal value by arguing solely from κοινὰ ἔννοιαι.

It is of course probable that in Books I–II his argument will occasionally retail views that are specifically Christian, or that he at least chooses precisely the philosophical doctrines that could be combined with the Catholic confession. The crucial point, however, is that Titus does not justify these views by referring to the Bible or to Church tradition. When he speaks in II.11 of man being created by God κατ' εἰκόνα ἑαυτοῦ, it must mean that he believed this view to be shared both by Catholic Christians and Greek philosophy. Titus does not use the Bible as basis when he argues for views that in one way or another are taken from that book.

³ Sickenberger 1901, 13. Jülicher 1902, 82 objected that Titus's aim was only to strengthen the pagans in their rejection of Manichaean dualism.

⁴ This may be the case in the letter to the Emperor, where Titus similarly distinguishes between pagans and Christians (see above p. 124). Since in Contra Manich. Titus also distinguishes between barbarians and Hellenes, the latter term has nevertheless not yet changed its meaning to designate pagans as such. Cf. also the treatment of the meaning of “Hellenes” and “Hellenism” of the time in Bowersock 1990, 9ff.

addressed the pagans, or at least how they contained something that especially appealed to them? And is it possible to discover in Titus's work a counter-strategy that aimed partly at creating a distance between the Manichaeans and pagans and partly a rapprochement between the latter and the Catholics? Before we turn to answering these questions, however, we must look a little more closely at the audience for Books III–IV.

One of Titus's audiences for Books I–II is educated pagans with an interest in both Catholicism and Manichaeism, but a Catholic audience is also clear from the fact that Titus did not write two works (one for pagans, one for Christians). III.1 links the first two books to the last two and states directly that the former were also aimed at Christians—and in Books III and IV he refers to his presentation in the first two books (in III.18 he refers to his previous explanation as to why death is a benefit).

But could not Books III–IV also be addressed to pagans, even though Titus explicitly claims something else?⁸ Here we must remember that in Books I–II Titus in no way seeks to hide his Christianity or to butter up the pagans. From the start, I.1 makes it clear that it is a representative of the Catholic Church who is speaking, and in II.28 Titus suddenly directs an attack at Emperor Julian and his restitution of “the error of the idols”, which in Arabia under Belaeus had found particular expression.⁹ The attacks on the pagan Greeks in III.69–74 and IV.18–21 could well be addressed therefore to the pagans themselves, a reasonable assumption since the chapters answer pagan questions to the Christians among other things. In that case we must imagine Titus hoping that Books I–II were sufficiently attractive to his pagan readers for them to wish to read on in Books III–IV, and it is indeed quite possible that they did so, if it is true that the same pagan readers were open-minded towards both Manichaeism and Catholicism.

However, it is clear from Books III–IV that Titus was writing primarily to protect those who believed in the Scriptures but had been led astray by Mani's distorted and improbable interpretations, as Titus also states in III.1. It seems then, that Titus's other audience

⁸ Titus states explicitly in Contra Manich. III.1, Gr. 66.31–37 that the last two books are written for the sake of believers (→ Ch. XI.32), and this is also implied in III.3, Gr. 67.35–68.10, as well as in IV.32, Sy 144.35–145.2.

⁹ See above p. 123.

was Catholic Christians under the influence of Manichaeism, or whom Titus at least believed to be affected by Manichaeism. In other passages he also states explicitly that his work is not addressed to the Manichaeans, for example in IV.112:

I have, however, not even given myself up to the labour of this book in the hope that I will be able to convert those who are severely enchanted and whose mind has withered and become idle (as a result) of them [i.e. the Manichaeans; lit. '(resulting) from them'], but so that I may warn those who are stable and watchful away from the corruption and harm of these people; and especially, that they escape from those who worship idols, concerning whom the Apostle Paul openly prophesied in another passage: . . . (Sy 184.33–185.3)¹⁰ (1 Tim. 4.1–5 is then quoted)

Titus is seeking to warn in advance those who are stable and watchful to beware of Manichaeism; they are to avoid the Manichaeans, who in truth are idolaters. The groups that Titus is advising here could well have been confronted with Manichaean teaching, even though for tactical reasons Titus claims to be warning them in advance and also praising them with terms such as “stable and watchful”.¹¹

Corresponding distinctions are to be found in other places too, such as in IV.23, where in connection with the question of Christ’s descent Titus comments that he is not speaking “to those who are caught in an incurable disease, but to those who are like us” (Sy 139.34–35).¹² We find a similar distinction in IV.79; here the problem is Satan, whom Titus believes is a created being, a fallen angel, and he adds:

But those adherents of that mad Mani say in their uncertainty: “Who was the teacher of this rebellion, or who let all this evil come and put it into his mind?”¹³ But this uncertainty is honest among those who

¹⁰ ܩܘܠܗ ܕܐܘܪܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ
ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ
ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ
ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ
ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ
ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ
ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ
ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ

¹¹ When Titus claims on the contrary in Contra Manich. III.1 that it is “the less intelligent” (Gr. 67.8 [→ Ch. XI.32]) who allow themselves to be deceived by Mani, it is a further example of a rhetorical tactic in a different context.

¹² ܩܘܠܗ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ

¹³ The meaning of these Manichaean questions is that if the Devil was originally

In addition to influencing pagans, the major aim of the work is to protect the Catholics' own flock, and in so doing it does not differ from many other heresiological works of the Early Church: already in the Preface to Book I of Adversus haereses Irenaeus makes it clear that his purpose is to protect the more simple believers against Valentinians and other heretics. Epiphanius's audience was hardly the heretics themselves, since his aim was clearly to frighten his readers away from any kind of contact with them whatsoever.¹⁶ In Contra Faustum I.1 Augustine explains that he is writing his work because a copy of Faustus's anti-Catholic writing had been read by the brethren, "who called for an answer from me, as part of the service of love which I owe to them."¹⁷

Thus it is clear that Contra Manichaeos was not written to the real Manichaeans, but to two ambivalent groups, namely, pagans with an open attitude to both Manichaeism and Catholicism, and Catholics with an open attitude to Manichaeism. Ostensibly both parts of the work are addressed to Catholics, and only the first part to pagans; in reality, however, Titus's hope and aim was that the pagan audience would concern themselves with the second half of his work too.

If the assumption is right that Titus had in reality imagined that his two audiences should read the whole of Contra Manichaeos, then the two parts of the work fit together well. The Summary of Contents of the four books of Contra Manichaeos also shows that the same arguments and forms of thought appear throughout the work. Even though the emphasis may be shifted in the process, and even though much is unclear, it is hardly likely that Titus's theology in its entirety can be regarded as inconsistent, or that the work is just a collection of ad hoc arguments. But if Contra Manichaeos—despite its division into a general and a biblical part—is a coherent work to be read by both audiences, the question is whether there was something else that united these groups apart from their vulnerability to Manichaeism. Perhaps this question can best be answered if we examine the portrait of Manichaeism that Titus wished to draw for his readers. What was he trying to warn them against, and what did he believe he could persuade them to shun? When this has become clear, we can perhaps begin to gain an idea of where Titus expected to gain support among both groups, as well as why both were attracted to Manichaeism.

¹⁶ Cf. Vallée 1981, 72–73. It looks on the contrary as though the heretics are also one of Hippolytus's audiences in Ref. (cf. Vallée 1981, 52).

¹⁷ Transl. by Richard Stohert in Schaff 1887, 155.—"desiderauerunt et iure caritatis, per quam eis seruimus, flagitauerunt, ut ei responderemus." (Zycha 1891, 251.10–12).—Cf. finally also Ephrem the Syrian's heresiological motives in composing hymns against and prose refutations of Mani, Marcion and Bardesanes, according to Drijvers (1966, 128–29): "The point is that the Hymns were destined for the ordinary 'congregation', who with these Hymns were to attack the Bardesanites with their own weapons, . . . [t]he Prose Refutations, on the other hand, were meant for an intellectual elite".

2. Titus's portrayal of Manichaeism as barbarism, irrationalism and as a philosophy

The question now is whether certain elements in Titus's portrayal of Manichaeism can reveal what were the generally accepted cultural values among his intended pagan and Catholic readers, and furthermore, whether it is true that he set out to create a cultural distance between the Manichaeans and the pagans and thus a rapprochement between the latter and the Catholics.

Several different features in Contra Manichaeos can be seen as the means to an alliance between pagans and Catholics, such as the argumentation with the aid of the pagans' own philosophy, one which Titus also shares to a considerable extent, and perhaps also the style, which according to an expert, however, hardly won plaudits from the educated.¹⁸ Here, though, the essential point is Titus's attempt to create this alliance by establishing a joint antagonism towards the Manichaeans. Various topoi in Titus's work can thus be understood as attempts to create a cultural distance between the Manichaeans on the one hand and the Catholics and educated pagans on the other. Firstly, Titus makes a point of presenting Mani as a "barbarian" and "barbaric" (e.g. I.1 [Gr. 1.8], I.2 [Gr. 2.15], I.11 [Gr.

¹⁸ Aimé Puech (1930, 559–60; quote 560) praised the intellectual content of Titus's work, but did not assess his stylistic abilities very highly: "La valeur littéraire du traité est par contre assez médiocre. Titus compose et écrit avec clarté; mais il est monotone, et ne cherche guère à parer son style. Il use cependant parfois assez bien de l'ironie, par exemple quand il persifle le Dieu de Manès à la fin du premier livre. L'expression, sans aucune recherche de purisme, n'est pas non plus d'un vulgairisme choquant. Les tours qui, dans le syntaxe, sont incorrect par comparaison avec l'usage classique, sont assez nombreux, mais sont aussi de ceux qui ne sauraient beaucoup surprendre en ce temps."

6.8], I.12 [Gr. 6.27], I.23 [Gr. 14.24–25], I.26 [Gr. 16.23], I.40 [Gr. 25.1], II.52 [Gr. 58.22], III.1 [Gr. 67.16–17], III.66.68, IV.19.20.21.43); here Puech has pointed out significantly that in Titus's eyes Mani is not only a heretic but also a barbarian; Mani's teaching destroys the Platonist and (Catholic) Christians' teaching that God is good.¹⁹ As mentioned previously, the description of Mani as a "barbarian" is precisely the same as the one that is found in Eusebius of Caesarea's Historia ecclesiastica VII.31,1–2 and aims above and beyond the specifically Catholic polemic against the "heretics".²⁰

But it is only a particular pagan evaluation of the "barbarian" that Titus chooses. Of course a negative assessment of "barbarian" was a possibility in Graeco-Roman culture, but so was a positive evaluation. It did not therefore follow that the origin of Manichaeism in the Kingdom of Persia was necessarily to its detriment. Already in ancient Hellas the Greek philosophers had regarded eastern religious cosmologies and ethical doctrines, including those of the Persians, as a residue of man's original knowledge of the universe, and one could therefore use the barbarians' venerable philosophy, φιλοσοφία βάρβαρος, to prove the truth of one's own philosophy. In a number of cases the early Christian writers were therefore also interested in reckoning their own wisdom among the "barbarian".²¹ Instead Titus uses Manichaeism's barbarian origin to explain its irrational nature; in I.12 he speaks of the discrepancy between Mani's barbarian error and the "common concepts" (κοινὰ ἔννοιαι) (Gr. 6.25–29) (→ Ch. XI.4), that is, man's universal knowledge. Mani has "invented" (ἐπινοέω) his barbarian impiety (I.2, Gr. 2.16), he "fabulates" (μυθολογέω, I.2, Gr. 2.25–26), his stories are a "fabulation" (μυθολογία, I.9, Gr. 5.8; μῦθος, I.26, Gr. 16.32.35), the Manichaeans "fantasise to no purpose" (I.15, Gr. 8.31 [→ Ch. XI.6]). In I.17 Titus declares that Mani does not escape from “the poetic myth” (τὸν ποιητικὸν . . . μῦθον, Gr. 10.14), and that he “fabulates” (μυθολογέω, Gr. 10.13) like an old crone (γραῦς)²² about how the earth is borne by Atlas, and how the rain showers result from the pearls of sweat on the archons of matter. It is superfluous to refute this kind of thing. Here Titus also mentions that Mani’s language is Syriac (Gr. 10.12–17).²³

¹⁹ Puech 1930, 559.

²⁰ To brand heresiarchs merely because of their barbarian origins is, according to Opelt and Speyer (1967, 282) a patristic topos, but the only example before Eusebius's treatment of Mani is Tertullian's mention of Marcion in Adv. Marc. I.1,4, and as far as I know, it is indeed rare in older times. After Eusebius the idea of branding Mani as a "barbarian", as Klein 1991, 142 draws attention to, also occurs several times in Acta Arch., e.g. "barbare" in Acta Arch. XL.5 and 7 (XXXVI) (Beeson 1906, 59.19 and 27) or the whole description of Mani in Acta Arch. XIV.3 (XII) (Beeson 1906, 22.24–23.1).

²¹ See Waszink 1963; Opelt and Speyer 1967, 258–59, 269–71; Dihle 1982, 5, 7, 165 n. 19, 168–69 n. 30; Wyrwa 1983, 87–101, 139–40.

It is therefore not surprising that when he reaches a certain point in Mani’s myths Titus several times allows a remark to fall that this is ridiculous (e.g. I.10 [Gr. 5.37]). In II.1 he declares that he would be a laughing-stock among all the sages if he should attempt to verify the fictions in Mani’s teaching (Gr. 25.36–26.1).

Mani’s teaching is “mad”, and Titus uses the above-mentioned wordplay Μάνης—μανείς to emphasise it (passim).²⁴ For a writer such as Titus, who “thinks Greek”, Mani’s “madness” presumably also implied a lack of moral reason, which is the basis of the good action.

The entire portrayal shows that Titus wishes to employ the distinction in philosophy between rational knowledge and “myths” to polemicise against the Manichaeans; indeed the very oldest criticism of popular religion and mythological cosmogony in Greek philosophy was based on this contrast.²⁵ Titus was probably aiming to set up a cultural difference between on the one hand people of culture, being the Catholics, and pagans with their stamp of Greekness, and the Manichaeans on the other. Titus associates universal validity with Catholic Christianity and both of these entities with Graeco-Roman culture and in this way he places the Manichaeans outside the context as barbarians, together with the Romans' enemies, the Persians. A comparison with other contemporary sources reveals that because of the Romans' wars with the Sassanid empire Manichaeism came under suspicion, since it was of Persian origin.²⁶

²² The expression is proverbial in ancient literature, and Titus may have it both from 1 Tim. 4.7 (τοὺς δὲ βεβήλους καὶ γραῶδεις μύθους παραίτου), to which Irenaeus alludes in Adv. haer. I.16,3 (τοῖς γραῶδεσι μύθοις, “his anilibus fabulis” [Rousseau and Doutreleau 1979, 262; the Greek text preserved in Epiphanius, Haer. 34.13,1 (Holl 1922, 26.12)]), where it refers to the Valentinians’ teaching, and from pagan literature; e.g. Plato, Theaet. 176b; Gorg. 527a; Celsus says that Gen. 2–3 is μῦθόν τινα ὡς γραῦσι διηγούμενοι (Contra Cels. IV.36 [Borret 1968, 274]); in Contra Cels. V.20 Origen claims that it is the philosophers rather than the Christians who believe in γραῶδεις λόγους (Borret 1969, 62). According to Acta Arch. LXIV.5 (LIII) (Beeson 1906, 93.10) Mani’s teaching is like “anilibus fabulis”, and in Contra Faust. XIII.6 Augustine says of Manichaean teaching: “fabula illa est longa et uana, puerile ludibrium et muliebri auocamentum et aniculare deliramentum continens” (Zycha 1891, 383.25–384.1). Further references to pagan and Christian writers can be found in Pease 1968, 341. The occurrence of the expression among heresiologists is also noted in Scopello 2001, 213, who, however, has overlooked its classical roots.

²³ Perhaps this is also meant as an example of Mani’s barbarism? Hegemonius, Acta Arch. XL.5–6 (XXXVI) (Beeson 1906, 59.19–27) writes that as a Persian barbarian Mani only mastered the Chaldean language, whereas at the miracle of Pentecost the apostles spoke every language; so Mani lacked the Holy Spirit (cf. Klein 1991, 148). But we cannot be sure that Titus’s view is the same, for in Contra Manich. III.35 he appreciates the separation of languages at the Tower of Babel as positive.

²⁴ Cf. Puech 1930, 559 n. 2; Klein 1991, 143–44: the wordplay is quite common in nearly all Christian anti-Manichaeans, cf. above pp. 130–31 (but it does not appear in Acta Arch.).—In addition, most of these motifs are common to heresiologists; they were later to be used as never before by Epiphanius of Salamis, see Vallée 1981, 73, 83, 89, 91.

But Titus does not settle for writing off Manichaeism as barbarism and irrationality. Simultaneously in I.1 he can also acknowledge a legitimate apologetic motive in Mani, namely the wish to release God from the responsibility for sin. It is worth noticing that after writing off the "fables" in I.17 as ridiculous, he declares that the question of Providence is still a serious problem. We find exactly the same approach in I.42–II.1. Without the distinction between fables and serious philosophical and theological problems in Manichaeism Titus's work would hardly needed to have been so long, but it would clearly also have lost its significance. Titus's arguments for there being only a single principle, his theodicy and defence of man's ethical freedom would be superfluous. But nor would Contra Manichaeos have made an impression on the readers who were open to Manichaeism. However, the acknowledgement that serious philosophical and theological questions can be raised in connection with Manichaeism does not mean that true answers are also to be found in this area; indeed Titus does not seem to acknowledge the existence even of partially true answers.

²⁵ See Jaeger 1960, 10, 12, 19, 42, 69.—Since Titus argues without Scripture in his first two books, μυθολογεῖν does not have the same meaning as in Athanasius, De inc. 3: "Μυθολογεῖν" ist bei Athanasius das menschlich willkürliche Reden über Gott, das im Gegensatz zum göttlich inspirierten Reden steht" (Meijering 1989, 48 with further references).

²⁶ Cf. above on Diocletian's edict (. . .); see also Lieu 1992, 121–50; Klein 1991, 137–39. Shortly before Titus wrote his work, Emperor Julian had gone to war against the Persians. But it must be added that even though Titus repeatedly calls Mani a barbarian, it is only in IV.19 that he explicitly links him to the Persians. However, Mani's background in the Persian Kingdom may have been so well-known to his contemporaries that the association to the Persians followed quite naturally from calling Mani a barbarian. Reitzenstein (1931, 47) takes a different line: "statt ὁ Πέρσης sagt er nur ὁ βάρβαρος, das Wort, das auch den Ungebildeten oder Stumpfsinnigen bezeichnen kann."

Often Titus misunderstands the Manichaeans or imputes to them beliefs they have never held, but he is hardly acting in bad faith. He draws on original Manichaean writings and has undoubtedly only wished to create a controversy against what the Manichaeans really believed. But probably his sources could not tell him what he wished to know, and furthermore his entire polemical purpose and conviction that he had right on his side prevented him from quietly and impartially attempting to acquaint himself with the views of his opponent; such an approach would also be quite foreign to his or any mind in classical Antiquity. Titus's work is a polemical treatise and a refutation, not an open discussion. It is equally important, however, to note that when Titus employs philosophical arguments to refute the doctrines of Manichaeism, they are simultaneously subjected to an interpretation. His written Manichaean sources are used to answer questions that were probably beyond their authors' horizons.

It would nevertheless be wrong only to say that Titus forces foreign problems onto the Manichaeans; the fundamental question of evil was a problem common to the Manichaeans and the philosophical tradition, and from its earliest days Manichaeism contained important forms of thought that were of philosophical origin. The Manichaeism that Titus met also employed—with a missionary aim that I shall attempt to prove—even more ideas and values that were philosophical in origin. He knows also, however, that he is forcing the Manichaean myths into a foreign context; as we shall see, for instance, he is fully aware that the Manichaean concepts οὐσία and ὕλη do not mean the same as they do in the philosophical tradition. In fact, to a degree that is indeed what Titus seeks to demonstrate; this is what his criticism is aimed at. The philosophical concepts have universal validity, and the mythology of Manichaeism thereby loses any meaning. For Titus therefore it would have made no sense either if we imagined, anachronistically, someone asking him whether Manichaeism could be another “language game” or, like Baur, a mythical poem. For Titus the truth was one.

The portrayal of Manichaeism that Titus draws in the above summary may possibly also tell us something about his audiences. The intended pagan and Catholic readers perhaps agreed that they belonged in a rational Graeco-Roman cultural environment in sharp contrast to the barbarians' irrational world. At the same time they were troubled by the theological and philosophical questions that the Manichaeans raised—questions about evil and Providence, in short the question of theodicy. Of course Titus also seeks to influence his readers into distancing themselves from barbarian irrationality, but it is hardly credible that this influence should not at heart be seen as an appeal to attitudes already present.

3. Titus's portrayal of Manichaeism as determinism and immorality

This appeal to beliefs already held by pagans and Catholics also reveals itself in another aspect of Titus's polemic, namely the attempt to draw a portrait of Manichaeism as a deterministic system and an immoral practice. This aspect has already been richly documented in the above Summary of Contents of Contra Manichaeos: Titus interprets Manichaeism to mean that whoever commits evil deeds is determined by a preponderance of evil matter; it is noteworthy, however that in Contra Manichaeos there are precious few direct quotations from Manichaean sources to support this interpretation. It is important to realise, though, that Titus's interpretation means that Manichaeism is a direct danger to the morality of the entire society. If virtue and vice are a question of nature, all appeals to ethics are redundant. No honourable pagan can therefore reject Titus's polemic as extraneous or an internal Christian controversy.

In this indirect way Manichaeism is a danger to morality. In two places, however, Titus goes on to claim that it is also only in appearance that the Manichaeans themselves live a moral existence. In reality they are quite immoral (Contra Manichaeos II.56; IV.43). It must be said, though, that in comparison with much other Early Church heresiology this theme complex is very poorly represented in Titus's work.

In this context we must also consider whether Titus has wanted to imply that the Manichaeans constituted a socio-political threat. Stroumsa claims that the reason Alexander of Lycopolis and Titus wished to defend Providence, it was because dualism meant anarchy, and he assumes that this attitude also had political implications.²⁷ We must recall here that there is nothing to suggest that Titus himself sought a conflict with Emperor Julian; on the contrary, he even wrote to the Emperor that he was ensuring calm in Bostra. In Homiliae in Lucam Titus also gives expression several times to a pro-imperial “Byzantine” attitude.²⁸ It is difficult, however, to get beyond pure guesswork in connection with this theory. As mentioned, in Book II Titus refers alleged Manichaean accusations against the Creation, which among other things has to do with the injustice in the discrepancy between rich and poor, or that evil people rule others. One might think that these statements might also be political statements, but this is extremely unsure, for their function is precisely to be theoretical accusations against the Creator on a par with the charge that it also rains for no reason in the desert, on uncultivated soil or in the sea without there being talk of socio-political demands or the like.²⁹ Even though the Manichaeans have not fought for any alternative political or socio-economic system, it nonetheless makes sense to say the fact that in the eyes of the leading forces in society these accusations must have made Manichaeism unsuitable as ideological legitimation.

²⁷ Stroumsa 1992, 345, 349 n. 66. Cf. also Klein 1991, 226–27.

By virtue of Titus’s polemic in these areas falling so well into line with his interests, it must also be reasonable to ask the question whether the accusation of “determinism” is not merely pure imagination. It cannot of course come as a surprise to anyone that much of Titus’s attack does not hit home; the accusation of immorality is a clear case in point, but Titus touches only lightly on this accusation. The fact that many of the arguments to prove that Manichaeism is inconsistent have no substance—for instance, the charge that ὕλη, matter, is ἄλογος, i.e. without knowledge and reason³⁰—hardly shakes the basic opposition that Titus would maintain exists between himself and his opponents. More seriously on the other hand is the question of whether Manichaeism really was the deterministic system that Titus believed it to be.

²⁸ Thus too the so-called political theology/Augustus theology: Sickenberger 1901, 115–16 (cf. on this Jülicher 1902, 81); Peterson 1951, 138–39 n. 141; Ernst L. Fellechner in Schindler 1978, 52, 54.

²⁹ Of course one can compare the accusations against the social order of being unjust with the example of social frustration that I myself have found in a Manichaean text (see Pedersen 1996, 262) and assume that they are also founded on concrete problems; this is not necessary, however.

³⁰ Beck (1978, 56–57, 61, 64, 83–84) is right in stating that this claim does not agree with the Manichaean myth. Beck suggested that it is Titus’s own deduction on the basis of a Manichaean passage concerned with the lack of γνῶσις, i.e. the γνῶσις that those souls that are caught by ὕλη lose, and which the saving νοῦς, being Jesus, again grants them (Beck 1978, 57).

Suspicion is already aroused by the fact that what is a common point of attack for Christian anti-Manichaeans,³¹ clearly continues an older heresiological polemic, especially against the Valentinians, but also against other “Gnostics”. In this context much recent research doubts that the attack has any substance, even though we cannot speak of a consensus.³² Whatever the truth or untruth over the question of the doctrine of the Gnostics, it is at any rate clear that the Church fathers’ defence of free will against “determinists” are also a continuation of a philosophical polemic, for instance, of Carneades’ anti-fatalist and anti-Stoic argument³³ and perhaps also of polemic against Platonic doctrines on irrational parts of the soul.³⁴ It is tempting to conclude that the anti-Manichaean Church fathers are merely prolonging a heresiological cliché.

This conclusion would seem to be confirmed by the original literature of the Manichaeans, which often lays claim to man’s freedom and sense of responsibility; the importance in Manichaean texts of themes such as ethical commandments, penance and eternal perdition would seem to render it impossible for Manichaeism to have been a deterministic doctrine. In general scholars of Manichaeism have also rejected the Church fathers’ claim, or possibly modified it significantly.³⁵ It was definitely the Manichaeans’ view that human ³¹ See e.g. Klein 1991, 19, 35–36, 108–112, and esp. 113–25; Aland 1973, 435 (with reference to Titus). This is also true of Augustine, who for instance in Conf. claims that as a Manichaean auditor he believed that his soul was innocent and that it was another, foreign nature in him that sinned (Conf. V.X,18; Verheijen 1981, 67).

³² It is not necessary to summarise the whole discussion in the present context; a few references will suffice. An overview of the older literature is found in Koschorke 1978, 224–27. See also Dihle 1982, 150–57; Trumbower 1989; Trumbower 1992; Marksches 1992, 146–49; Strutwolf 1993, 104–54; Williams 1996, 189–212; Löhr 1992; Löhr 1996, esp. 186–90, but also 50–52, 57, 63, 81, 101–1, 106, 125, 148–49, 151, 157, 173–74, 177, 181, 316, 325.

³³ Cf. Amand 1973; Löhr 1996 (see references in previous note).

³⁴ Cf. below pp. 309–10.

³⁵ See Baur 1831, esp. 162–202, more distantly 156–57, 263–64, 268, 330–33, 445, 491–92; Asmussen 1965, 16–19; Puech 1977, 189ff., 198ff.; Pedersen 1996, 378–84; Magris 2001.—It is in itself clear that when, for example, Augustine accuses the Manichaeans of abolishing free choice, the form of the accusation is a polemical attack, not a description of Manichaean thought, but this does not exclude that as a description it is also correct. We must note, however, how Augustine can bring quotations from Mani, who claims free will, but only to conclude that Mani contradicts what is his real opinion (De nat. boni 42; quotes from Ep. fund.).—However, all aspects of the problem are far from having been examined in depth.—It should also be noted that in Contra Manich. IV.19 Titus links Manichaeism to astrological fatalism. If, however, Jones’ (1997, 197–98) interpretation of the ἐπιτροπος—which wickedness stems from demonic forces in the body which have captured the soul, and “dark” and “light” are clearly described in Manichaean texts as matter or quasi-material elements, but the Manichaeans also wished to lay claim to the individual, the existential and singular, irrespective of how great this interest was in a tense relationship to Manichaean ontology.³⁶

One could therefore assume that the charge of determinism was unsubstantiated, that in this case—and perhaps rightly so—a logical conclusion was drawn from the Manichaeans’ ontological premises that they themselves never drew. But it is not as simple as that. At any rate two Manichaean texts exist which claim that sinful souls are determined for perdition.³⁷ It follows from this that the Church fathers really were attentive to a tendency in the direction of “determinism” that could also influence the Manichaeans’ own speculations. However, the Church fathers, including Titus, never refer to the precise speculations that appear in the texts in question, and it is therefore most likely that they actually had not read Manichaean texts in support of determinism.

Since determinism is only rarely mentioned in Manichaean texts, which at the same time have unreflectively claimed man’s free will, and if indeed the Church fathers had no precise knowledge of Manichaean determinism, these factors must affect the relations that scholars have sought to establish between Manichaeism and patristics.

This is true in the first place of the above-mentioned theory that the Eastern Church fathers insisted so strongly on the free will because they were faced with a deterministic opponent.³⁸ Insofar as the Church fathers made these opponents out to be even more deterministic than they actually were—so that they become in a sense a kind of literary in Kephalaia Ch. 69 is placed above the zodiac—as a mythological figure which out of regard for salvation can suspend the influence of the stars is correct, then the question here is one of Manichaeism anti-fatalism.

³⁶ Manichaeism contains fundamentally a tension between “essence” and “existence”, as I sought to demonstrate in an earlier work (Pedersen 1990) which in the main I still stand by.

³⁷ M 2/II/ (Andreas and Henning 1934, 849–53) and Kephalaia Ch. 40 (Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 104.21–105.14); see further Pedersen 1996, 385–92.—Incidentally, Böhlig (1986, 27) presumes inter alia influence from Stoic determinism on Kephalaia Ch. 90 (Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 223.17–228.4).—The recently edited Ch. 138 of Kephalaia (Funk 1999, 340.20–341.24) is important for a reconsideration of all these problems.

³⁸ See above p. 91.

ideological construction—this particular explanation is partly weakened, even though the actual idea of the deterministic opponent naturally may have continued to steer the Church fathers to some extent. In addition to this we should note that the Manichaean texts only claim man's freedom as part of an ethical appeal but otherwise independent of this they ascribe evil to a primordial principle and locate it in matter and the body, whereas the doctrine of man's freedom in the Catholic writers has the central function of giving a different explanation of the origin of evil and of keeping the world and the body free of accusations of evil. As such the doctrine of free will is a genuine response to the Manichaeans, who maintained that if evil does not stem from another eternal principle, then it must stem from God Himself (e.g. in Kephalaia Ch. 120 [Böhlig 1966, 286.24–288.18]). For the Church fathers evil was fully and totally a product of man's free choice. In this way it is therefore still possible to claim that the importance of the doctrine of free will in Eastern theology is also linked to a genuine ideological challenge from the Manichaeans.

Secondly, the above-mentioned theories that the Pelagians were right in their assumption that there was a connection between the Manichaeans' and Augustine's concepts of *concupiscentia*³⁹ must be modified. One can still discuss Clark's view that there is a similarity between the biological and sexual aspects of the Manichaeans' concept of sin and that of Augustine,⁴⁰ but when in her later work she also appears to accept that there was such a thing as "Manichaean and astrological determinism",⁴¹ caution should be advised; on this point the Pelagians' accusations were strongly marked by clichés.

Summarising we can say that Titus's charge against the Manichaeans of being determinists and immoral is first and foremost an expression of his own interest in persuading certain pagan and Catholic groups to distance themselves from Manichaeism. The fact that Titus was able to reckon on such an effect must mean that none of these groups was interested in undermining the morality of society. It is furthermore conceivable that these groups were fascinated among other things by the strict morality of the Manichaeans, in particular by the ascetic life of "the Elect". For there is absolutely no evidence to suggest that Titus had any ground for his accusation of immorality among the Manichaeans. The case is slightly different with the charge of determinism. Titus had no precise knowledge, but he did glimpse—and not unrightly so—a deterministic tendency in the Manichaean system. From the impression we can gain today from the original literature of the Manichaeans, however, it would seem that the deterministic tendency clashed with other—and stronger—Manichaean interests, with the result that in this area Titus did not meet the unambiguous response that he expected.

³⁹ See above pp. 89–90.

⁴⁰ Clark 1986. Cf. also the conclusions in Lamberigts 2001, 134–36.

⁴¹ Clark 1992, 3, 5, 196–97.

CHAPTER SIX

THE MANICHAEAN TEXTS USED BY TITUS OF BOSTRA

1. The relevance of the problem for this study

As I have previously stated in this work, the question of which Manichaean texts Titus actually used¹ in Contra Manichaeos can probably not be separated completely from the purpose of his work. The very fact that the history of scholarship has revolved around a special relationship between philosophy of Late Antiquity and, respectively, Titus's source material and his refutation of its content rendered it probable that there was a link of particular significance. Does Titus's source material have a special stamp that can explain important elements in his refutation strategy?

Contra Manichaeos was written in order to immunise certain pagan and Catholic circles against a two-pronged Manichaean missionary effort aimed at each of these groups. On the assumption that the values which Titus found suitable to win over the intended pagan and Catholic readers to his side could also be used to give a preliminary description of these readers, I have suggested that they felt themselves linked to an ostensibly "rational" Graeco-Roman cultural context which contrasted with the barbarians' irrational world at the same time as they were troubled by the theodicy problems that were being introduced by the Manichaeans. Titus's readers also set store by morality and perhaps on this very point were impressed by Manichaeism. This description of the situation thus turns out to contain a set of problems which were also found in the treatment of the history of scholarship on the work, namely the importance of contemporary philosophy.

¹ That Titus really has used Manichaean texts is clear from both his remarks and the content of his information and ostensible quotations. Moreover in some cases in G and V a system of horizontal dashes or small signs is used in the margin for every line with presumed Mani-quotations, apparently something like παράγραφοι; thus the following are marked in G: Gr. 9.13–22, 68.12–27, 69.19–22 (in this latter case, though, the intention was probably to mark the Gen. quotation), and the following in V: Gr. 9.13–31, 26.8–9, 68.12–27. However, whether the system can be traced right back to Titus himself must remain very unsure.

These observations alone are sufficient to advance the hypothesis that the Manichaean texts which Titus referred to in his work played a particular role in the Manichaean mission to pagans and Catholics to which he was reacting. In itself the Summary of Contents of Contra Manichaeos (cf. Ch. II) shows that “theodicy problems” must have been prominent in the Manichaean texts that he drew on, but it would be especially worthwhile to see if we can achieve so clear a picture of these texts that we can say for sure whether they tried to present Manichaeism as “rational” and “philosophical”. We must also ask whether the texts in question presented Manichaeism as attractive because it laid particular emphasis on morality.

2. Heraclianus’s information and Adda’s works

The examination of Titus’s Manichaean sources must take as its starting-point Photius’s above-quoted mention of Heraclianus of Chalcedon’s refutation of the Manichaeans.² My commentary on this Photius-passage has so far concentrated on the information that it contained concerning anti-Manichaean heresiology; it also contains important information on Manichaean literature, however, and it is that which we shall now focus on.

Heraclianus himself claims to have opposed three or four Manichaean works (The Gospel, The Book of Giants and the Treasuries) that we know from other texts were written by Mani himself, though only fragments of them are preserved. The Gospel is without doubt the same as The Living Gospel; Heraclianus himself writes the full title a little further on, when he mentions Diodore. The Book of Giants is another of Mani’s writings, and the Treasuries (τοὺς Θησαυρούς) refers among other things to the title of Mani’s work, The Treasury/The Treasury of Life, but also shows that Heraclianus used the so-called Little Treasury.³

² Photius, Bibl., cod. 85 (65a36–65b38) (Henry 1960, 9–10), quoted above pp. 138–39.

³ In Haer. 66.13,6, Holl 1933, 35.9–10 Epiphanius speaks of both a Θησαυρός and a μικρὸς Θησαυρός, and also Cyril of Jerusalem and Nilus of Ancyra know of several Treasuries (see Alfarcic 1919, 48). Cumont suggested that The Little Treasury was a summary of The Treasury of Life (Cumont and Kugener 1912, 157), while Alfarcic (1919, 48) believed that we are dealing with a supplement.—Lieu (in Vermes 2001, 10), however, identifies Heraclianus’s Treasuries with “the Pragmataëia”; I have been unable to find a justification for this identification.

Of particular interest is Heraclianus's information on Titus and Diodore's use of Adda's works. On the strength of Heraclianus's apparently wide knowledge one would imagine that the content of his remark about Titus was that Titus incorrectly believed that he was writing against Mani himself, but instead we are presented with the almost meaningless remark that Titus was rather writing against Adda than against the Manichaeans—almost meaningless because Adda was himself a Manichaean.⁴ We should therefore consider whether Μανιχαίων in line 65b7 should not be corrected to Μανιχαίου, which would bring Heraclianus's criticism of Titus into line with his criticism of Diodore. The present Photius text must nevertheless probably be retained, for the very title of Titus's work (Against the Manichaeans, not Against Manichaeus) favours Μανιχαίων as the original text.⁵ Heraclianus's remark must therefore mean that although Titus believed that he was writing against many Manichaeans, in reality he was writing against only one.

Furthermore, we note that Heraclianus claimed that Titus attacked Adda's works in the plural, and not just a particular one. With regard to Diodore's vanished work on the other hand, Heraclianus claims that it was written to refute a single work of Adda's that had the title Μόδιος, The Bushel, but that Diodore believed himself to be writing against Mani's Living Gospel. If Heraclianus is right, it is possible that Diodore was in error, since among heresiologists Μόδιος had been circulating under the wrong title of The Living Gospel. A further possibility is that the mistake stemmed from the fact that Μόδιος had the same structure and content as The Living Gospel.⁶

⁴ Cf. Nagel 1967, 5 ("Pseudokritik").

⁵ Both G and V give the work the title Κατὰ Μανιχαίων, and this title must be original, since there is very early testimony to this effect; it corresponds to Sy's لامصلد خبيث and Jerome's Adversum Manichaeos in De vir. illustr. CII (cf. above p. 112 and p. 126).

⁶ Alfáric 1919, 98 writes as follows about Heraclianus's remark on Μόδιος: "D'après ses indications, cette œuvre avait le même objet que l'Évangile vivant de Mani. Elle étudiait donc la vie du Christ et son enseignement. Peut-être tirait-elle son titre du texte de Matthieu (V, 15)". Lieu 1992, 92 on the other hand has suggested a different explanation for the title Μόδιος. Reitzenstein (1931, 46) thought that Μόδιος had been a critical work concerned with single verses from the Living Gospel.—Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 549 accepts Alfáric's hypothesis and goes on to suggest that perhaps Μόδιος was intended to present the teaching of The Living Gospel.—Evidence that The Living Gospel dealt with Jesus's life and teaching, as Alfáric says, can be found in al-Bṛūnī's information on the contents in Chronology of Ancient Nations III (Sachau 1879, 27); VIII (Sachau 1879, 190–91) (other fragments of The Adda is not an unknown figure; from many both Manichaean and anti-Manichaean texts he is known as one of Mani's own disciples.⁷ In the present context, however, there is no need for a detailed prosopographical account of where Adda is mentioned or what we know about him; all that is important here are the sources which refer to Adda's authorship. These include firstly a number of Iranian Manichaean fragments, M 2 (R I, 1–33); M 216c+M 1750 R/9/–V//13; M 18220, which claim that Mani sent Adda as a missionary to the Roman Empire, where he wrote works attacking non-Manichaean religious communities; indeed he even got all the way to Alexandria.⁸ M 2, R I, 9–11 find Mani sending the Gospel (i.e. Mani's Living Gospel) “and two other writings” to Adda,⁹ information that we are of course tempted to apply to the theory of a link between Μόδιος and The Living Gospel, which would nevertheless be too bold, since Adda was also sent two other writings and in general as a leading Manichaean must have known the whole of Mani's authorship.

Secondly, there is a work by Adda which is mentioned in certain abjuration formulae for use by Manichaeans who wished to convert Living Gospel: See for example Adam 1969, 1–2; CMC 65.23–70.10 [Koenen and Römer 1988, 44–49].—When Heraclianus states that Diodore did not refute the Manichaean interpretation of the Bible until the last 18 books, we see a possible similarity to the structure of Titus's Contra Manich., which likewise does not move on to biblical interpretation until the last part, but it must be noted that if Alfarcic is right, then Diodore must also have concerned himself with biblical interpretation in the first seven books.—Perhaps a reevaluation of the problem surrounding The Living Gospel and Μόδιος will be possible when the Coptic-Manichaean Synaxeis-Codex is edited; see Böhlig 1968a; Mirecki 1988; 1994; King 1992.

⁷ See for example Alfarcic 1918, 55–56, 61, 68, 69; Alfarcic 1919, 6, 73–75, 79, 96–106, 143–44, 165; Lieu 1994, 263; Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 546–49.

⁸ M 2: Andreas and Henning 1933, 301–2; Sundermann 1981, 17–18; M 216c+M 1750: Sundermann 1981, 25–26 (here Sundermann restores the lacunae in his translation, so that the writings are by Adda [V/5/–/8/]); M 18220: Sundermann 1981, 36–41. 13941 + 14285, V/14/–/15/ (Sundermann 1981, 36) also mentions a letter from Adda to Mani.

⁹ Andreas and Henning 1933, 301–2; Sundermann 1981, 17–18; cf. Sundermann 1987, 70ff.—Khosroyev (1995, 132 n. 388) partly doubts the historicity of M 2, because the text does not give precise information of all the details, and a certain reservation is certainly in order here: “Unter Berücksichtigung, daß dieser Text an sich keineswegs als historisch zu betrachten ist (z.B. war es dem Autor des Textes unwichtig—oder er besaß keine Kenntnis mehr darüber—, welche Texte genau Mani dem Adda geschickt hat, als letzterer im Römerreich predigte—‘das Evangelium und zwei andere Schriften’: R I, 10—, oder in welchen Ländern genau Adda verweilte) . . .”

to the Catholic Church. Zacharias of Mitylene's Capita VII contra Manichaeos anathematizes "Addas and Adimantus" (Ἀδδᾶν καὶ Ἀδεΐμαντον) as the first among Mani's disciples (Capita 2,36) and it then anathematizes "the book which refutes the Law and the holy Moses and the other prophets composed by Addas and Adimantus" (τὴν κατὰ τοῦ νόμου καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου Μωϋσέως καὶ τῶν ἄλλων προφητῶν Ἀδδᾶ καὶ Ἀδεϊμάντου συγγραφήν, Capita 2,45–46),¹⁰ and this is continued in the Long Abjuration Formula that is dependent on the Capita (1468B, 1466D).¹¹ Capita appears to regard Addas and Adimantus as two different persons. Later it is added that Mani and his disciples, Addas and Adimantus, do not believe in the mystery of the divine incarnation (Capita 4,112–15).¹² The Short Greek Abjuration Formula, however, regards Addas and Adimantus as the same person and knows that he was sent out as a missionary.¹³

Thirdly, we know from Augustine of a work by Addas, or rather Adimantus, which he refutes in Contra Adimantum. In his Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum Augustine himself testifies that Adimantus was identical with Addas,¹⁴ and this information must be regarded as certain.¹⁵ In North African Manichaeism Adimantus seems to have occupied a special position after Mani himself as a theological teacher; that at least was the judgement of the Manichaean Bishop, Faustus

¹⁰ Lieu 1994, 236.

¹¹ Lieu 1994, 237, 239.

¹² Lieu 1994, 242. See also the comments in Lieu 1994, 263–64, 270.

¹³ See Vramming 1983, 15; Merkelbach 1984; 1985; Tubach 1995, 170. See also Vramming 1983; Tubach 1995, 170–71; Bennett 2001, 47 concerning Adda in the abjuration formulae.

¹⁴ Augustine, Contra adv. leg. et proph. II.12,42 (1321–22): "Adimanti opus est, illius discipuli Manichaei, qui proprio nomine Addas dictus est" (Daur 1985, 131). Cf. Alfarcic 1919, 105; Chatillon 1954; Decret 1986–94; 1986–94a; Tubach 1995.—This is the same work that is refuted in Contra Adim.; it is referred to in Contra adv. leg. et proph., thus in II.12,41 (1294–98; Daur 1985, 130) and as mentioned in II.12,42 (1320–32; Daur 1985, 131). The reason that Adimantus's work is referred to in Contra adv. leg. et proph. II.12,42 is that the codex that contained "the opponent of the Law and the prophets" whom Augustine refuted also contained two other texts: firstly a writing that claimed God had not created the flesh; only the beginning of this text appeared in the codex, and Augustine clearly did not know the writer (Contra adv. leg. et proph. II.12,42 [1306–20]; Daur 1985, 131), and secondly Adimantus's writing (cf. Raveaux 1987, 133–34). Alfarcic's assumption that the first writing was also by Adimantus (Alfarcic 1919, 105–6, 143) is thus unjustified. Alfarcic (1919, 105–6) also suggested that this first writing was identical with the Chinese-Manichaean Traité, which can hardly be the case, however (see Sundermann 1992, 13).

¹⁵ Alfarcic 1919, 104–5; Merkelbach 1984; 1985; Tubach 1995.

of Milevis, in one of the excerpts from Faustus's anti-Catholic work which is preserved in Augustine's Contra Faustum:

As the learned Adimantus, the only teacher since the sainted Manichaeus deserving of our attention, has plentifully exposed and thoroughly refuted the errors of Judaism and of semi-Christianity . . .¹⁶

Faustus could be referring to a number of texts by Adimantus, but the one that is mentioned in Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum and refuted in Contra Adimantum has without doubt been one of them.¹⁷ In Retractationes I,XXII (XXI),¹ Augustine also refers to this text as follows:

At the same time certain dissertations came into my hands that were written by Adimantus, who had been Manichaeus's disciple; he had composed the dissertations against the Law and the prophets, endeavouring to show that the Evangelical and Apostolic Scriptures ran counter to them.¹⁸

Of course Contra Adimantum offers a closer impression of Adimantus's work. It appears to have been in the form of "antitheses", using selected biblical texts to demonstrate the radical opposition between the OT and the NT. It seems therefore as though there were distinct similarities between Marcion's Antitheses and the text by Adimantus which Augustine refuted in Contra Adimantum.¹⁹ Yet perhaps Adimantus's arguments against the OT were not always gathered in a single volume, as was the case with the book that Augustine drew on in Contra Adimantum; they may have circulated among the Manichaeans as sin-

¹⁶ Contra Faust. I.2; Zycha 1891, 251.22–252.3: "Satis superque in lucem iam tractuctis erroribus ac Iudaicae superstitionis simul et semichristianorum abunde detecta fallacia a doctissimo scilicet et solo nobis post beatum patrem nostrum Manichaeum studendo Adimanto non ab re uisum est . . ." Transl.: Richard Stothert in Schaff 1887, 156.

¹⁷ Cf. Contra Faust. VI.6; XVI.30–31 (cf. Contra Adim. XV,1); cf. Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 548–49.

¹⁸ "Eodem tempore uenerunt in manus meas quaedam disputationes Adimanti, qui fuerat discipulus Manichaei, quas conscripsit aduersus legem et prophetas, uelut contraria eis euangelica et apostolica scripta demonstrare conatus." Mutzenbecher 1984, 63–64 (1–5).

¹⁹ Frensd 1953, 20–21 (the argument also rests on a comparison with passages in Contra Faust. and Acta Arch.); Decret 1978, 98, 176; Rottenwöhler 1986, 129–30, 143–44; Lieu 1992, 53, 92, 155; Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 549 n. 18. Cf. Pedersen 1993, 168. Cf. also Fitschen 1992, 54–55, who emphasises the Marcionite ideas among the Manichaeans and points out that Serapion of Thmuis was also aware of such a context.

gle sheets.²⁰ Incidentally, until Ch. XII in Contra Adimantum Augustine speaks of “the Manichaeans”—and only from then on of Adimantus, but it seems certain enough (cf. the title of the work and Retractationes) that he was polemicising specifically against Adimantus’s book.²¹

Some scholars seek to identify Μόδιος with the work by Adimantus that Augustine refuted,²² but if Μόδιος was a text that was linked to The Living Gospel, this is improbable, since Contra Adimantum does not suggest that Adimantus’s work was connected with The Living Gospel.²³ On the other hand, by virtue of its content Adimantus’s work could very reasonably be identified with the book mentioned in the abjuration formulae that attacked the Law and the prophets.²⁴ Since this work attacked Judaism and Catholicism, its content corresponds well with the mission situation that the Iranian sources depict: Adda was writing works that attacked the non-Manichaean religions. These sources, however, speak without specification of several works composed by Adda, just as Heraclianus claims that Titus wrote against a number of Adda’s works.

Nagel has asserted that Heraclianus’s claim that Titus used Adda cannot be tested, since not one line by Adda is preserved,²⁵ and this is true in a way. Nevertheless there is the possibility of comparing Augustine’s Contra Adimantum with Titus’s Contra Manichaeos. Does this make it probable that the bishops of Bostra and Hippo Regius—at least in part—refuted the very same work of Adda?

Contra Adimantum is constructed in such a way that Augustine presents the “antitheses” one at a time and then refutes them. If we compare this approach with his summary of the content of Adimantus’s writing in Retractationes I,XXII (XXI), it seems likely, as mentioned, that like Marcion’s famous work the writing consisted of texts partly from the OT and partly from the gospels and Paul which were placed counter to one another. The structure of Augustine’s work is such that a comparison must rest on the quotations from the Bible. Are there in Titus’s long work certain places stating that the

²⁰ Thus Decret 1986–94, 91–92; cf. Decret 1978a, 74 (n. 20).—Cf. also Decret 1978, 93–105, 121–23, 173–77; 1978a, 69–78, 85–88, 121–24 (notes) concerning Adimantus and Contra Adim.

²¹ Cf. Decret 1986–94, 92.

²² Lim 1992, 237–39; Lim 1995, 74–75; Tubach 1995, 171 (with caution).

²³ Thus Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 549 n. 21.

²⁴ Thus also Tubach 1995, 171.

²⁵ Nagel 1967, 5.

Manichaeans used passages from the Bible in the same way as Augustine claimed that Adimantus did? Such a comparison has produced the result that in only two cases is there such a similarity:

1) In Contra Adimantum VIII Augustine asserts that the Manichaeans found an antithesis between Ex. 21.24 (“eye for eye, tooth for tooth”) and Mt. 5.38–40 (“You have heard that it is said, ‘eye for eye and tooth for tooth.’ But I tell you etc.”). Contra Manichaeos III.76.77.87 is concerned with a corresponding Manichaean use of these texts. But precisely because Jesus himself in the gospel emphasises the difference between his commandment and the passage in the Law, the passage was a titbit (“gefundenes Fressen”) for Manichaeans; to set up a radical opposition was obvious, and this means that the passage cannot prove that the two heresiologists drew on the same source.²⁶

2) In Contra Adimantum XII,4–5 Augustine observes that the Manichaeans used 1 Cor. 15.50 (“flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God”), but otherwise omitted to quote 15.39–50, and, if I understand Augustine rightly, launched a further attack on 1 Cor. 15.51–53. Titus says in Contra Manichaeos IV.97 that the Manichaeans used 1 Cor. 15.50 to deny the resurrection of the dead, and that on this basis they rejected the previous verses, nor did they turn to the following ones. Although there is a real similarity here between Titus’s source and Adimantus, it is in itself not sufficient for the claim that Titus’s source is Adimantus. The Manichaeans naturally used the same biblical verses to substantiate their teaching, and therefore a whole raft of similarities is required before a literary dependence is rendered likely.²⁷

In addition, two other parallels may be mentioned that illuminate the problem:

3) In Contra Adimantum X Augustine states that the Manichaeans found a contradiction between Ex. 25.2–8, where God will dwell in an earthly sanctuary to which the Israelites will bring offerings, and Mt. 5.34–35, where heaven is God’s throne and the earth His foot-stool. Can the God whom Jesus speaks of live in such a sanctuary? Augustine adds that the Manichaeans also referred to 1 Tim. 6.16, where Paul says that God lives in unapproachable light. Contra Manichaeos III.75 now shows that also Titus's source used Mt. 5.33–37, but in a quite different sense. In Titus's source, building on Jesus's words, the subject was a prohibition against oaths, which was in contradiction of Lev. 19.12. Thus nothing speaks in favour of the same source being used.

²⁶ Also Acta Arch. XLIV.9 (XL) (Beeson 1906, 65.19–21); XLVII.1 (XLII) (Beeson 1906, 69.12–14) presents Mani as claiming the contradiction between Ex. 21.24 and Mt. 5.38–40.

²⁷ Cf. P&B II, Allberry 1938, 121.9; also Acta Arch. XLV.4 (XL) (Beeson 1906, 66.9–12) presents Mani as using 1 Cor. 15.50. Here the Manichaeans were part of an old tradition: according to Irenaeus, Adv. haer. V.9,1 all heretics used 1 Cor. 15.50 to attack the doctrine of the resurrection of the flesh.

4) There are certain similarities between Augustine and Titus's argument: for instance, both bishops apply 1 Cor. 15.51 against the Manichaeans' interpretation of the previous verse (Contra Manichaeos IV.99 and Contra Adimantum XII,5), and one can also compare their use of Rom. 8.3 in Contra Manichaeos IV.95 and Contra Adimantum XXI respectively. These passages, however, indicate a similarity between the two bishops' interpretation that has nothing to do with their sources; it is of course because they were both Catholics.

There are therefore only two real similarities between Adimantus and Titus's source. In both places we are dealing with interpretations that by virtue of the conceptual world of Manichaeism were quite natural for Manichaeans; the two similarities may therefore be coincidental. At the very least they cannot hold up a theory that Augustine and Titus used the same source. It must also be noted that both Augustine and Titus concern themselves with a long series of other passages in the Bible that have been used by their sources. If the source was the same, one might expect more similarities than the few that there are. And this is also true, even though Augustine testifies that he did not refute all of Adimantus's work in Contra Adimantum.²⁸ The application of passages from the Bible in both Contra Adimantum and Contra Manichaeos is so extensive that it is unlikely that they did not make greater use of the same passages if both works were attacking the same source.

Since Adda was probably the author of a number of writings, it is nevertheless still a possibility that Titus was dependent on one or more of these, just not on the work that Augustine refuted. Unfortunately we have no possibility of checking this, though there remains a not completely arbitrary method with which to separate the Adda sources in Titus's Contra Manichaeos. For—with every reservation as regards the historicity of all our sources—we do possess some of Adda's theological contours, and we can ask whether these contours fit the Manichaeism that Titus is attacking: 1) Adda's authorship came about in a missionary situation and was therefore markedly polemical against other religious traditions. 2) Contra Adimantum seems to show that Adda re-used the Marcionite idea to posit antitheses between the OT and the NT. Adda can therefore also have advanced other antitheses in his writings. 3) Adimantus is treated by Faustus as a crucial theological authority; it is therefore natural that many ideas in North African Manichaeism in fact originated with him, and this could mean to a particular degree the Marcionite ideas, such as a radical criticism of the OT's image of God or theories about interpolations in the NT. 4) According to the Capita VII Contra Manichaeos Adda and Adimantus, like Mani, did not believe in the incarnation. Adda may therefore have criticised this dogma in particular. 5) Perhaps Adda wrote his Μόδιος as a kind of commentary on Mani's Living Gospel.

²⁸ Retract. I,XXII (XXI),1, Mutzenbecher 1984, 64 (9–13); cf. Decret 1978, 95; 1978a, 73 (n. 14); 1986–94, 92. Cf. Contra adv. leg. et proph. II.12,42 (1328–29; Daur 1985, 131); Raveaux 1987, 215 n. 1496.

The problem with these five points is that both Mani himself and other Manichaeans may have shared them. For instance, we know that Mani himself was concerned with the Marcionites in The Treasury of Life and he may therefore also be thought to have used Marcionite ideas in his authorship.²⁹ Despite this reservation the five points could still function in an examination of Contra Manichaeos on the assumption that some of them can be combined with an attempt to render probable that Titus's source was not texts by Mani himself: for in that case, on the strength of Heraclianus's information, Adda must be singled out as the most likely source.

3. The Manichaean source in Contra Manichaeos I + III.4–5

However, the problem is not just whether the five points that characterised the Manichaean Adda can fit some of the Manichaean texts which Titus appears to have used. The main interest now centres on the more important questions of how far it is possible to gain an impression of the nature of these texts, and whether we can distinguish at all between them. A really systematic examination of these questions has not been undertaken so far, even though there are rudiments in some authors, especially Reitzenstein, and I am aware that the present contribution can be no more than an initiator of further discussion.

²⁹ See Pedersen 1993, 168. In this context I take the opportunity to state that I now doubt the correctness of the interpretations of M 28 I Riü, 33–37 (Hymn 2, strophe m; see the new edition in Skjærvø 1995, 246) that I adduced in Pedersen 1993, 167 n. 7; an alternative interpretation of the very obscure strophe is also to be found in Skjærvø 1995, 244.

My starting-point is Baur's observation on the character of Titus's presentation of the Manichaean myth. Of course it is very much mythological and concrete, for instance when Titus can state in I.42 that God fills up the abyss from which matter comes with earth, but Baur was right in the sense that Titus's presentation brushes off the mythological names and, by simplifying, blurs the distinctions between the individual divine hypostases, as can be seen from the following brief overview: thus in I.6 the two principles are described as θεός καὶ ὕλη, φῶς καὶ σκότος, ἀγαθὸν καὶ κακόν (Gr. 4.16), while the designations "Father of Greatness" and "Prince of Darkness" never appear in Titus.—The Primal Man ("First Man") is described simply as a certain δύναμις (I.17, Gr. 9.18), but at the same time it is mentioned that this power was given a name (Gr. 9.18), apparently a covert reference to the name "Primal Man".³⁰—The soul (ψυχή), which is to be regarded as Primal Man's five sons or "armour", is not distinguishable from Primal Man himself (I.17 [Gr. 9.31ff. → Ch. XI.8] and I.36 [Gr. 23.8–9]).³¹—It is not mentioned that the Creator God, "the Living Spirit" is an independent hypostasis; we are only told that ὁ ἀγαθός is δημιουργός (I.17; Gr. 9.35–36 → Ch. XI.8).—"The Third Messenger" is referred to most cryptically in Titus's excerpt in III.5 as the one "who had firstly revealed himself for the redemption of the soul, once the door had been opened" (Gr. 68.20–21 → Ch. XI.33).

This complete blurring of mythological names cannot be regarded as Titus's own work, since, as demonstrated above, he is extremely that he himself targets: Christians and pagans with a taste for philosophy. Contra Manichaeos IV.21, however, reminds us that there were also other pagan circles for whom the mythological element in Manichaeism was particularly attractive.

³⁰ Cf. Baur 1831, 56.—Reitzenstein (1931, 55–56) supposed here, "daß Titus in seiner Vorlage hier einen Namen bzw. eine Wesensbezeichnung fand, wie etwa Ἄνθρωπος, Adam oder Ormuzd". It would go completely against Titus's intention, however, if he himself had omitted the name!

³¹ On this point Titus's presentation very much resembles that of Alexander of Lycopolis (cf. Baur 1831, 51–52).

Holding firm to Baur's observation makes it possible to find some characteristic features that are common to the Manichaean material that is used in Book I and in III.5. Moreover we can note that by and large Titus presents the Manichaean myth in the right narrative order in Book I; together with the common characteristics just mentioned this fact suggests that Titus has chosen more or less continuously to take excerpts from the same source. In Book II on the other hand there is no continuous mythological account, and it must therefore remain unclear whether Titus used the same Manichaean source for Book II as for Book I.

In Contra Manichaeos III.4, however, we note that Titus was in possession of a text where a chapter had the heading, περὶ τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης πρωτοπλαστικής; Titus was in doubt as to whether this text was written by Mani or one of his disciples (in III.38 Titus again refers to this text and reiterates his doubt as to who the writer was [Sy 103.13–15]). The text dealt with the creation of Adam, and Titus brings two quotations from it in III.5. It is likely that the same text has also been used in Book I, because the presentation fits so perfectly together with the alleged Mani-quotation in I.38, where a plurality, apparently the archons, have planned to create the body in order to bind the soul, since they have realised that they themselves will perish when the light is gradually removed from them.³³ In the Manichaean excerpts in Book I, however, we find no allusions to the Bible, whereas III.4–5 is obviously somehow related to Gen. 1–2. Similarly, the Bible is the subject in the Manichaean excerpts in the rest of Book III and in Book IV. The question now is whether Titus used the same Manichaean source in Book I + III.4–5 as in the rest of Book III + Book IV. This question is admittedly somewhat crudely formulated, but can serve as a presentation of the problem for the time being.

Some factors favour the theory that it is at least partly the same source that is being used in Books I, III and IV. In Book I Titus may have excerpted his source himself so that allusions to the Bible were omitted because they would have been ill-suited to his programme that the first half of the work should only argue on the basis of the “common concepts”. When in IV.40–43 he suddenly returns to several of his themes from Books I and II, this might very well be explained by this argument. But other factors point in a different direction and in my opinion must weigh more heavily; primarily it is a question of certain differences between the texts that Titus summarises or quotes in III.4–5 and III.7 respectively (→ Ch. XI.34):

³³ The similarity between I.38 and III.5 was already noted in Baur 1831, 134–35.

1) The quotations in I.38 and III.5 do not relate directly to Gen. 2; in the very same style as the preserved original Manichaean texts that recount the creation of Adam, they tell a “new” creation myth that can stand on its own, without regard to the fact that in its historical origin it was based on Gen. 2.³⁴ On the other hand the text that Titus summarises in III.7 deals directly, though critically, with Gen. and Ex. 2) I.38 + III.5 narrate a myth authoritatively, while III.7 asks critical questions and employs logical arguments. 3) In I.38 + III.5 Adam is formed by a group of archons, but in III.7 man is created by one figure, the God of the OT, who belongs to evil. This difference is not decisive, for a comparison with original Gnostic and Manichaean sources would make it likely that the God of the OT was regarded as the leading archon in a group of archons, and yet III.7 makes no mention of any other archons.

These differences do not prove that I.38, III.4–5 and III.7 cannot possibly originate from the same written source. We might imagine a source that alternates between its own myths and a criticism of Gen., but this is less likely in my opinion. Consequently we can now distinguish between two different Manichaean sources: in Book I + III.4–5 Titus used a Manichaean source that reproduced the Manichaean myth, but in a superficial way presented it as more philosophical than mythological. In III.7 on the other hand Titus employed another Manichaean³⁵ source that asked critical questions of Gen. and Ex.

The source that Titus used in Book I + III.4–5, for example, he calls a βίβλος (I.21; Gr. 12.22) and τὸ γράμμα (I.22; Gr. 13.6–7), ³⁴ See however the remarks in Feldmann 1987, 35–36, 84.

³⁵ It is true that Nagel (1980, 57) doubts the Manichaean character of this source; this problem will be dealt with below pp. 250–51.

and sometimes he says that it was written by Mani (for example I.6; Gr. 4.15), while at other times, as Sickenberger first pointed out, he merely refers to “the Manichaeans”. Sfameni Gasparro is right in stating that with the expression ὁ τὰ τοῦ μανέντος συγγράφων φησὶν in I.21 (Gr. 13.2 → Ch. XI.10) Titus decides that the work was not written directly by Mani himself, but Titus does not implement this solution, as is particularly clear when he is in doubt in III.4 (Gr. 68.10–11) and III.38 (Sy 103.13–15) who is the writer of the chapter on the creation of man. These remarks also show that Titus was interested in reproducing his sources honestly.

Titus’s irresolution must be because the information in his sources confused him. It is now clear that such a work as Kephalaia would be able to explain this doubt. Here the speeches are put into the mouth of Mani himself, who speaks in the first person, but the framework around the chapters and the introduction to the work make it clear that Kephalaia only pretends to convey Mani’s oral teachings. Schmidt and Polotsky’s theory that Contra Manichaeos III.4–5 contains a fragment of Kephalaia, has therefore a touch of probability about it: for Titus states precisely that he is now dealing with a κεφάλαιον, and the heading περὶ τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης πρωτοπλαστίας has the same form as the headings in Kephalaia. The theory could now be further combined with Tardieu’s theory that Kephalaia in one sense or another stems from Adda; the theory has recently received Funk’s cautious support.³⁶ But apart from the fact that the chapter from which Titus quotes is not among the chapters from Kephalaia that have so far been published,³⁷ Kephalaia does not have to be the only Manichaean work that was divided into chapters with headings that announce the contents.³⁸ If Contra Manichaeos III.4–5 comes from the same work

³⁶ Tardieu 1987, 134 with n. 73; Funk 1997, 152–55.—Alfaric’s comparison with the Chinese-Manichaean Traité in which Adda (Ato) asks questions of Mani (see above p. 80), could here acquire renewed relevance, precisely because the Chinese-Manichaean literature (including the Traité) constitutes a close parallel, both in form and content, to the Coptic-Manichaean Kephalaia (cf. Funk 1997, 151–52). Cf. also Sundermann 1992, 13–22.

³⁷ Böhlig’s identification with Kephalaia Ch. 55 is untenable; the chapter’s form may be related to Contra Manich. I.38 and III.5, but it is not two different translations of the same text. This is also true of the following two related chapters in Kephalaia (Ch. 56, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 137.12–144.12; Ch. 57, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 144.13–147.20).

³⁸ In this context it is of interest to refer to Wurst (2001, 307–13), who in the first place points out that when Faustus of Milevis’s work, which Augustine refutes as the Manichaean quotations in Book I, as I believe, there is moreover no question of quotations from Kephalaia, which definitely does not blur the mythological names.

My theory that Titus uses the same source in Book I as in III.4–5 means that this source was not written by Mani himself, which in turn is supported by Sfameni Gasparro's suggestion that when the source in III.4–5 does not mention that man came into being through the demons' intercourse, but on the contrary claims that man was "formed", it was because the offensive myth should be concealed.³⁹ Moreover, for the most part the theory is in line with Bennett's arguments for the existence of a Greek-Manichaean written source containing quotations from Mani's Living Gospel, which was also used by other non-Manichaean writers. At the same time, however, it must be underlined that Bennett's study is so far less than complete: it ought to contain more parallels between non-Manichaean writers in Contra Faust, probably bore the title Capitula, it must be a translation of the Greek concept κεφάλαια, and secondly that both these Capitula and the Coptic Kephalaia belong to the same literary genus, namely the quaestiones genre (see more on this below pp. 253–54). However, it is hardly possible to decide whether the source that Titus used in Book I + III.4–5, really was built up in 'question' and 'answer' form.

³⁹ Admittedly we must note that in Ep. fund. Mani introduces the description of the creation of man by making the Prince of Darkness say to the other demons that he will form an image ("imagine[m] fingam", Zycha 1892, 885.6–7), but that in what follows he makes man be created through cannibalism and sexual intercourse (Augustine, De nat. boni 46, Zycha 1892, 884.29–886.17 = Feldmann 1987, 16–20, fig. 9). We find the same ambiguity in, for example, the Middle Persian Manichaean text M 7980–M 7984 (= T III 260), which is probably a part of Mani's Šābuhragān (thus Boyce 1960, 132–33; Sundermann 1979, 97 n. 10), where Āz says that she will "form" (dys'n) man (e V I 9; Andreas and Henning 1932, 193, new ed. in Hutter 1992, 81); in what follows we then find the well-known account. When Contra Manich. I.38 and III.5 has the demons forming man, it could therefore merely be because Titus was quoting a small part of a longer myth from his original sources. But this approach would conflict with Titus's interest, which is to stress that Manichaeism consists of grotesque fables.—In Kephalaia Ch. 55 (Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 133.4–137.11) and Ch. 56 (Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 137.12–144.12) it is also merely a question of Adam and Eve being "formed" (πλάσσειν) (for example, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 133.19, 137.16–17, 138.11.17), and of being "the formed" (πλάσμα) (for example, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 134.10, 137.18.22, 138.21); here neither cannibalism nor sexual intercourse are mentioned. In Kephalaia Ch. 57 (Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 144.13–20) Adam is both "formed" (πλάσσειν) (for example, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 144.18) and "begotten" (ἄπιΟ) (for example, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 144.19), but the latter in reality is not explained. Nor are cannibalism or intercourse mentioned in Kephalaia Ch. 64 (Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 157.1–158.23).

than just their common teaching on the division of primordial space into four parts corresponding to north, east, west, and south.⁴⁰

The theory that this source might derive from Adda is attractive but also difficult to lend any more weight to. The source's blurring of mythological names for tactical reasons could fit Adda's task as a missionary, but one could also claim that such a blurring demands so powerful an acquaintance with Hellenistic Mediterranean culture that it is unlikely in so early a missionary from the Aramaic-speaking community in Mesopotamia. This observation is in turn uncertain, because we do not know anything about Adda's background or his qualifications.⁴¹

In this context it is natural to take up a position on Baumstark's theory that Titus of Bostra's Manichaean source was originally written in Aramaic and is partially preserved in Sy.⁴² Admittedly it is not decisive for the validity of my proposal so far whether his theory is right or not, for one can also imagine an Aramaic-Manichaean text blurring the mythological names out of regard for an educated audience. However, it is not so easy to imagine as an original Greek-Manichaean text, and that is why Baumstark's theory is not irrelevant. A position on Baumstark is also natural in continuation of Bennett's arguments that Titus (and other writers) only used a Greek-Manichaean written source.

A final position and possibly a definitive rejection of the theory would require that every single one of Baumstark's examples be ⁴⁰ Perhaps the divergences between the versions in the non-Manichaean writers mean not only that they are internally independent of one another but also that they did not (in every case) use the same written source. It is striking, for example, that there is no trace in Titus of the marked feature from Severus's version that the Kingdoms of Light and Darkness are designated as the Tree of Life and Death respectively. The theory that Theodoret and Titus used the same written source is encumbered with the difficulty that Theodoret himself states that Titus is one of his sources (see above pp. 137–38).—The subject of Theodoret's sources in the section in question also deserves a new examination; Acta Arch. is evidently among them (Lieu 1988, 73; cf. Viciano 1992, 198 n. 2); it seems as though the arguments contained in Von Zittwitz's (1873, 494–503, 521–26) theory that Acta Arch. (mainly the Turbo-account in Acta Arch. VII–XI, Beeson 1906, 9–19), Theodoret and John of Damascus (Dial. contra Manich.) used the same Manichaean source may be much better employed to show that Theodoret and John both used Acta Arch. and John also used Theodoret.

⁴¹ Bennett's theory that Titus used a Greek-Manichaean written source with quotations from The Living Gospel could of course be developed into a theory that this written source was identical with Μόδιος, but caution is advised.

⁴² Baumstark 1931; see above p. 83.

tested. I have not done this, but I have examined a number of them and found that they are unconvincing; other observations and considerations point in the same direction. I am therefore very sceptical about the validity of Baumstark's result.

Thus, we must note that when the translation of Contra Manichaeos I.12, Sy 9.6 employs a ⲙⲗ , which indicates a quotation, at the beginning of one of Titus's own arguments, it means that Sy has misunderstood the text and believed it to be a Manichaean quotation; such a misunderstanding is difficult to square with the theory that Sy had access to Titus's allegedly Aramaic source!

One of the central passages in Baumstark's argument is to be found in III.5 (Gr. 68.18–24; Sy 83.35–84.7 → Ch. XI.33). According to Baumstark the Greek text contains a number of contradictions that do not appear in Sy.⁴³ Thus according to Baumstark the Greek text has the archons sending down a power involuntarily and turning themselves into a formation that can outfox the souls. Baumstark was wrong, however, for the Greek text contains hardly a self-contradiction and makes good sense in relation to the generally known Manichaean myth.⁴⁴ The construction καταπέμψας . . . ἐμόρφωσεν normally implies that καταπέμψας comes before ἐμόρφωσεν. We are thus dealing with two different events, and therefore there is no difficulty in the 'sending down' being 'in consternation' and 'involuntarily', whereas the 'formation' is an expression for a cunning intention.

The first event is described with the words τῆς γενομένης κινήσεως ἕνεκεν καὶ τοῦ φανέντος πρῶτον ἐπὶ τὴν λύτρωσιν τῆς ψυχῆς, τῆς θύρας πρῶτον ἀνοιγείσης ὑπ' ἐκπλήξεως ἄκων καταπέμψας τὴν ἐν αὐτῷ δύναμιν: here we learn that the Manichaean hypostasis or god who normally bears the name "the Third Messenger" reveals his figure, which the text apparently describes as though the door had been opened (presumably to the Kingdom of Light). This revelation is to be regarded as a divine trick, because the Messenger's beauty arouses the sexual desire of the archons imprisoned on the firmament, so that they pollute and abort, and the semen and abortions contain part of the swallowed light (the soul), which is thereby released and falls down to the earth. It is clearly this that the text is referring to with its mention of the power which the archons in consternation involuntarily sent down (i.e. to earth). The “movement” that is previously mentioned probably refers to the Messenger then setting in motion the Column of Glory and “the ships”, i.e. the sun and moon, with a view to them purifying the light particles that had now fallen to earth and leading them back to the Kingdom of Light.

⁴³ Baumstark 1931, 36–39.

⁴⁴ See for example Polotsky 1935, 254–56 on these well-known myths about 'the seduction of the archons' and the creation of man.

The other parts of the text portray the second event: the Messenger’s success frightens the archons, who through the sexual act have come down to earth and as a counter-move form from their own, swallowed, demon children the human body, so that it resembles the figure of the Messenger. By resembling the Messenger the body “fits” the soul, so that it is deceived into remaining in the material world. Baumstark is of course right in noting the problem that the text does not distinguish between the archons who involuntarily sent power down to earth and their ‘descendants’, i.e. the archons who formed themselves and made a copy on earth; but this problem also exists elsewhere in reproductions of this myth.⁴⁵

In the Greek text’s depiction of the creation of man Baumstark found yet another internal contradiction:

Jeder soll sich selbst als Seelenkötter abgebildet haben, woraus sich ebenso viele Gebilde ergäben, als es eben Archonten der Hyle sind, und gleichwohl ist dann auf einmal von einem einzigen gemeinsamen Gebilde, Adam, die Rede. Wollte man hier ausgleichen, so müßten natürlich die Sonderabbilder der einzelnen Archonten das zeitlich Frühere sein und doch heißt, gerade Adam ausdrücklich ihr erstes Gebilde.⁴⁶

But this contradiction can nevertheless be resolved, for the myth does distinguish between the demon children and the first human couple.

The other half of Baumstark’s argument—that Šy should contain a different text without the contradictions in question—does not hold either, unfortunately. The first apparent contradiction between the involuntary ‘sending down’ and the conscious ‘formation’ may just as well be said to exist in Sy: the words ܕܘܡܘܚܘܬܗ ܕܗܘܘܢ ܕܥܡܐܘܨܝܗ, “by their consternation which was not by their will” also refer to the archons and—as in the Greek text—deal presumably with the emission of the immanent power. Baumstark’s translation blurs the fact that the other apparent contradiction (between the archons forming themselves into many beings and the formation of a single copy) may equally be claimed to exist in Sy. For Baumstark translates ܘܚܘܠܘܘܬܗ in Sy 84.5 as “seine Hypostase”, when it is much more likely that the word has a reflexive sense and merely translates the Greek ἐαυτὸν (Gr. 68.22).

⁴⁵ Cf. Polotsky’s (1935, 256) summary: the demon couple Ašaqlon and Nemrael “soll nach dem Ebenbilde des Dritten Gesandten, den die Dämonen (eigentlich vielmehr ihre am Himmel gefesselten ‘Eltern’: das wirkliche Subjekt ist aber die in den einen wie in den andern wirkende Hyle) im Lichtschiff gesehen hatten und der immer noch ihre Phantasie beschäftigt, den Menschen zeugen.”

⁴⁶ Baumstark 1931, 37.

The whole of Baumstark’s argument is thus unsound; he provides no convincing grounds for Sy not being at this point a translation from a Greek original, which of course does not exclude the possibility that at certain other points Sy may have preserved a more original form of the text.⁴⁷

There are also grounds for caution when Baumstark points out in some instances that the Syriac text is clearer than the Greek, for this could be caused by the Syriac translator attempting to clarify his original, or quite simply because the Greek textual tradition, which is much younger than Sy, has been corrupted.⁴⁸ In certain cases Baumstark has quite simply not understood the Manichaean meaning of the text, so that there is absolutely no question of the Greek text being unclear.⁴⁹ On some points Baumstark does not

⁴⁷ This is true for example of ܘܚܘܠܘܘܬܗ in Sy 84.5, which perhaps renders an original θήρην or ܘܚܘܠܘܘܬܗ ܕܘܡܘܚܘܬܗ ܕܗܘܘܢ ܕܥܡܐܘܨܝܗ in Sy 84.6–7.

⁴⁸ Both explanations are thus possible in relation to an example from Contra Manich. III.7 (i.e. a text which I refer to another of Titus’s sources than that used in Book I and in III.4–5), namely αἴτιος αὐτοῦ in Gr. 69.10, which is rendered more clearly in Sy 84.31 (→ Ch. XI.34). However, Baumstark (1931, 31) exaggerates somewhat when he writes: “Die abgerissene Kürze des Griechischen wird hier eigentlich erst auf Grund der volleren syrischen Fassung recht verständlich.”

⁴⁹ This is the case in another example from Contra Manich. III.7 where instead of the Greek text ἢ ἀγνοοῦντα λέγειν ἀνάγκη τὸν θεὸν ἀγνοῖα περιβεβλησθαι (Gr. 69.10–11), “or one must say that God was ignorant and endowed with ignorance”, in Sy 84.31–32 the text reads ܘܚܘܠܘܘܬܗ ܕܘܡܘܚܘܬܗ ܕܗܘܘܢ ܕܥܡܐܘܨܝܗ, “or he did not know, and it is not likely that God is thrown under ignorance” (→ Ch. XI.34). This was one of the instances where Baumstark (1931, 39–41) claimed, “daß die Form der griechischen Zitate des Titus mitunter auf Korruptelen der aramäischen Vorlage beruht, welche der in die syrische Übersetzung eingebettete Wortlaut nicht aufweist”, and more specifically he thought that an omission of the negation ܕܘܡܘܚܘܬܗ in Titus’s original would be sufficient to explain the Greek text. Baumstark was unaware therefore that the Greek text realise that the Greek and the Syriac text give to the same extent excellent (Manichaean) meaning, so that it is impossible to choose between them.⁵⁰

Baumstark's results are occasionally shaken by the fact that he only relies on De Lagarde's edition of the Greek text (1859), that is, the late manuscript H. When καὶ οὐποτε μὴ οὐχὶ πράγματα παρέχουσιν αὐτῷ (Gr. 1.13) is apparently translated by Sy as ܐܘܟܠܐ ܕܠܐ ܕܠܐܟܝܢܐ ܕܠܐ ܕܠܐܟܝܢܐ ܕܠܐ ܕܠܐܟܝܢܐ ("and which never even ceases from harming him.", Sy 2.12–13), this is seen by Baumstark as an example of the expression (οὐποτε) being weaker in the Greek text, but sharper in the Syriac.⁵¹ Here, however G+V read οὐπόποτε, which corresponds to Sy (→ Ch. XI.1).

Finally, it must be added that whereas in connection with biblical quotations it is likely enough and a well-known practice from other contexts to use the text from the familiar translation (as Baumstark believed Sy had done with the biblical quotations in Titus's texts), the same can hardly be claimed for the Manichaean quotations, which from the translator's point of view were derived from heretical books that he has not necessarily had access to and which have possibly not been so well-known among his readers that it was necessary to use the assumed original Aramaic version with which, according to Baumstark, they should already have been familiar.

from a Manichaean point of view must give the best sense: in the Manichaean myth Darkness lacks foreknowledge—in contrast to the highest Manichaean God, the Father of Greatness (see for example Titus, Contra Manich. I.22, Gr. 13.6–9). In the present context the intention is to prove that "God" in Gen. 2–3 is the Prince of Darkness, but because there is a polemical attack on the Gen. text, the designation "God" must be maintained for the time being (cf. also that on the basis of 2 Cor. 4.4 the Manichaeans could use the word "god" figuratively about the principle of evil: Titus, Contra Manich. IV.108, Sy 183.26–184.6 [cf. Beck 1978, 47]; Contra Faust. XXI.1, Zycha 1891, 569.11–18; P3B II, 56.31ff.; cf. Wurst 1995, 119 n. 3).—The text of Sy is thus not the original but a variant dependent on the Catholic point of view (cf. Nagel 1967, 18: "Dogmatisch bedingte Varianten").

⁵⁰ In Contra Manich. III.7 the Greek text (Gr. 69.14) claims that it was to man's advantage that he was obedient to the serpent's advice, whereas Sy 84.34–35 claims that it benefited man to disobey the Creator (→ Ch. XI.34). The texts say the same thing, but from different points of view. There is therefore no reason to agree with Baumstark (1931, 40) and assume that Titus's Greek text must be explained through the assumption that the negation ܐܘܟܠܐ was omitted in his hypothetical Aramaic manuscript, while the Syriac translator used a manuscript in which the negation was preserved.—It is of course still possible, indeed probable, that Nagel (1967, 82; 1973, 296) is right to assume that Sy reproduces a more original Greek text than G and V.

⁵¹ Baumstark 1931, 28.

In so saying, I do not wish to suggest that there are not also good arguments in Baumstark's article. Thus when he points out that Sy's rendering of the Greek θηρίον in Gr. 9.23.34; 17.38 (partly → Ch. XI.8.12) with ܠܘܬ, "reptile", in Sy 12.34; 13.11; 23.14 is "more original" (the Greek text refers to an "animal" that is held fast by an incantation),⁵² he is probably right. The wrong θηρίον must be because an Aramaic prototype has not been adequately understood, but Titus's source may nonetheless be a Greek-Manichaean original that employed metaphors and mythology from an older Aramaic-Manichaean prototype. However, Baumstark's further argument is untenable, when he claims that Titus's Manichaean quotations must stem from an Aramaic original on the grounds that the translation θηρίον is explicable, if the original built on a manuscript that contained a variant reading from the manuscript that Sy has used, i.e. the variant ܠܘܘ, "serpent", which in Titus's original had been corrupted into ܠܘܬ, "living". The argument is problematic, for (as Baumstark himself also hints) ܠܘܘ should probably rather be translated with ζῶον, "living being". The Syriac equivalent of ζῶον, however, is ܠܘܘ.⁵³

It is thus far from obvious that the Manichaean source that I believe can be distilled from behind Contra Manichaeos Book I + III.4–5 was originally composed in Aramaic. Since with its missionary goal the text sought in a superficial way to present Manichaeism as more philosophical than mythological by concealing the names of the individual divine hypostases and simplifying their number, it would suit a Greek-reading public best, even though this argument cannot be decisive. The missionary purpose of the Manichaean text is also clear, in that it apparently seeks to hide the offensive idea that man has been begotten by the demons. Despite the text's attempt to hide the mythological stamp, it contains in reality a presentation of the Manichaean myth, beginning with the two principles and ending with eschatology, and it probably does not directly refer anywhere to biblical texts.—By virtue of the text's link to the Manichaean mission, Adda would be a natural candidate for its authorship (cf.

⁵² Baumstark 1931, 30–31; Baumstark (1931, 41) convincingly refers to Ps. 58.5f. (LXX 57.5f.): θυμὸς αὐτοῖς κατὰ τὴν ὁμοίωσιν τοῦ ὄφεως, ὡσεὶ ἀσπίδος κωφῆς καὶ βουούσης τὰ ὦτα αὐτῆς, ἥτις οὐκ εἰσακούσεται φωνὴν ἐπαθόντων φαρμάκου τε φαρμακευομένου παρὰ σοφοῦ.

⁵³ Cf. Baumstark 1931, 41.

point 1 above), but this is far too insecure a basis on which to claim anything about the author of the text.

The Manichaean text that Titus used in Book I + III.4–5 attempted to present Manichaeism as being precisely “rational” and “philosophical”. The text’s real interest, however, was to present the narrative sequence of the Manichaean myth, so it does not appear to focus on ethical questions, even though this impression may only be due to the fact that Titus did not need such passages for his refutation. In any case we must be aware that despite a certain determinist tendency the purpose of the Manichaeans’ dualistic myth—notwithstanding Titus’s claim to the contrary—was to conclude with an ethical appeal.

4. Other Manichaean sources in Contra Manichaeos Book III–IV

The delimitation between a particular Manichaean text that Titus has used in I + III.4–5, and another text that has been used in III.7 raises the question of Titus’s Manichaean sources in the rest of Book III and in Book IV, i.e. all the material that ostensibly reproduces the Manichaeans’ view of the biblical writings. Laying III.7 to one side for the moment—which I shall return for separate treatment—I shall instead focus on the other material. In some cases my accounts of this material will be somewhat summary, since readers can make use of the more comprehensive account in Ch. II.

It is important here to note that the portrait which Titus paints of Mani’s criticism of the Bible has a striking similarity to Marcion’s biblical criticism, as it is presented in particular by Tertullian. Thus Titus maintains that Mani did not deny that the events which the OT speaks of actually took place (III.4), but that he assigned the OT to the principle of evil and the NT to the good; however, the NT had become mingled with matter, so Mani himself had purged the NT of these passages (III.2; III.8; IV.1.12–13.33.44).⁵⁴ In the NT Mani appears to have concerned himself only with the gospels and Paul’s epistles. Titus also states that Mani had predecessors, including Marcion (III.3; III.8; III.68; IV.12.33). All these views are indeed very close to what has been passed on about Marcion.⁵⁵ Titus, though, does not mention that according to Mani the Judaists stood behind the material interpolations, just as Marcion claimed; in general the presentation seems rather to suggest that against their will the gospel writers falsified the NT, because in certain places they were affected by their material nature.

⁵⁴ That Titus’s information here resembles Marcionism is also underlined by Fitschen (1992, 54 n. 146).

Titus's classification of Mani alongside previous heretics shows that he was aware of earlier heresiology, and it remains a possibility that his portrayal of Manichaeism is coloured by this knowledge. I have previously shown the likelihood that Titus knew Hippolytus's Refutatio and Hegemonius's Acta Archelai, but he seems hardly to have used the former, while Acta Archelai does not contain much material on earlier heresies. Titus may have known other heresiological works, including vanished literature, as I suggest is the case with George of Laodicea's anti-Manichaean work.⁵⁶

Not only must we consider whether Titus drew on earlier heresiology; occasionally it seems as though his information on the Manichaeans is no more than his own assumption. Indeed both possibilities seem sustainable in Contra Manichaeos IV.35–36, where readers are in doubt as to whether by virtue of their hypothetical form the objections of the Manichaeans have not simply been constructed by Titus himself. Moreover, the interesting reference to the angels' bodies in Gen. 18 as an analogy to Jesus's body may have been drawn from earlier heresiology; it is well-known from the Marcionites, though it may of course also be Manichaean.⁵⁷ These explanations ⁵⁵ Cf. Von Harnack 1924 with further references.

⁵⁶ Cf. below pp. 417–19.

⁵⁷ Tertullian, Adv. Marc. III.9 (Evans 1972, 194–99) and De carne Christi III.6–9 (Kroymann 1954, 876.35–878.3); Ephrem, Exp. Ev. conc. XXI.3 (Leloir 1953, 312 [Armenian text], 223 [transl.]; Leloir 1966, 375 [French transl.]; McCarthy 1993, 318 [Engl. transl.] [the chapter is missing in the manuscript with the Syriac original edited by Leloir 1963; 1990]) (cf. Von Harnack 1924, 286*). In Hom. cat. V.8 (Tonneau 1949, 111) Theodore of Mopsuestia attacks the Marcionites, the Manichaeans, the supporters of Valentinus and the rest of the heretics for their docetic Christology; he writes that they claim that what Jesus bore in the world corresponds to the prophets' vision or the form in which the three men appeared to Abraham.—But it is also possible that here Titus is actually drawing on genuine Manichaean sources; for in Contra Faust. XXIX.1 it is possible that Faustus is also referring to Gen. 18 when he says that Jesus could very well have appeared to, and spoken to, people without ever having been born, since Faustus's teachers have shown that angels have often appeared to and spoken to people. Is he thinking here of Adda/Adimantus?

do not cover all of Titus's material in the last two books, however, because the presentation is so full of quotations and summaries, and Titus appears to be interested in building honestly on his sources.

The claim that the NT had been interpolated is also found among the North African Manichaeans, such as Faustus (for example Contra Faustum XXXII.1–2 and 7; XXXIII.3), although unlike Marcion the North Africans did not possess a NT that was cleansed of the ostensible interpolations, see Confessiones V.XI,21:

They asserted that the Scriptures of the NT had been tampered with by persons unknown, who wanted to insert the Jews' law into the Christian faith. They were incapable of producing any uncorrupted copies.⁵⁸

At first glance Titus gives the impression that he has been in possession of such a NT copy, for example when he speaks in Contra Manichaeos IV.33 of large lacunae in the text; in these cases Mani connected the surviving passages. On closer inspection, however, it seems that Titus could not have had access to such a NT; indeed it is unlikely that such a 'purged' Manichaean text ever existed. When Titus writes that Mani himself claims to have deleted large parts of the NT (Contra Manichaeos III.8; ed.N 300.12–13 → Ch. XI.35), we cannot assume that Titus possessed such a copy of the NT in which these elements had been removed; more likely Reitzenstein was right that Titus possessed only a book in which Mani first claimed to have removed parts of the NT, then gave examples of which elements ought to be excised and which should be retained—with an interpretation added to the latter. For already in III.8 Titus states that Mani wanted to use those parts of the NT that he had allowed to remain, because he believed they testified to the same things that he himself had said (ed.N 300.10–12), which suggests that Titus's source was concerned with how the "remaining" passages in the NT should be interpreted. Titus's formulation in Contra Manichaeos IV.45 (Sy 151.8) hints perhaps that Mt. 6.45 together with a particular Manichaean interpretation introduced the source that he used, which hardly fits any specimen of the gospel genre. Among other examples we find according to Contra Manichaeos IV.22 that when Mani not only rejected the birth narratives of Jesus, but also raised questions concerning the contradiction between Jesus's Davidic descent from Joseph and his birth by a virgin, we are not dealing with a new gospel writing but with a text which argues. The same is doubtless true of the claim that the revelation of Christ was only an illusion, while the remark that Mani connected those passages that he allowed to remain may only mean that the text was arguing for a context between them (Contra Manichaeos IV.33). As we have seen, the quotation from Mt. 6.45 was linked to a dualistic interpretation (Contra Manichaeos IV.45) and the same was the case in connection with Lk. 6.43–45 (Contra Manichaeos IV.47). The quotations from Jn. 15.18–19 and 17.14 were used to legitimise accusations against the Creation (Contra Manichaeos IV.50).

⁵⁸ Transl. Chadwick 1991, 86.—“cum dicerent scripturas noui testamenti falsatas fuisse a nescio quibus, qui Iudaeorum legem inserere christianae fidei uoluerunt, atque ipsi in corrupta exemplaria nulla proferrent.” (Verheijen 1981, 69); similarly in De mor. eccl. XXIX (61).

In the Manichaean text which Titus used, Mani claimed to have removed the passages in the NT that referred to the God of the OT (Contra Manichaeos IV.12). He rejected the birth narratives (Contra Manichaeos IV.22) and also apparently the account of Jesus's circumcision (Contra Manichaeos IV.33), as well as Jn. 1.14a (Contra Manichaeos IV.35). Only the beginning of Mt. 6.24 (“No man can serve two masters”) was quoted, while the continuation “You cannot serve both God and mammon” was passed over (Sy 151.8–12). In Contra Manichaeos IV.46 Titus writes that Mani deleted (ܡܢ ܕܡܢܐ, Sy 152.4) verses such as Jn. 1.3 and 1 Cor. 8.6, which show that there is only one principle, whereas he used Mt. 6.45 to show that there are two, although the verse deals with something quite different. The question is whether this “annihilation” means anything more than that Titus's source omitted to mention Jn. 1.3 and 1 Cor. 8.6?

Was this work really from the pen of Mani himself? Here again we find the same lack of clarity as in the first two books: even though Titus often refers to “Mani”, he also talks about “the Manichaeans”. Now and again he speaks of questions that had been put to him, and here he might be referring to an oral source (for example Contra Manichaeos IV.57; IV.79; IV.85). In Contra Manichaeos IV.89 Titus claims that the Manichaeans invoke Mt. 20.16 and thus follow their master's madness; does this mean that Titus knew of the application of the verse from both oral and written sources? It is also confusing when Titus states in Contra Manichaeos IV.87 that the Manichaeans refer to 1 Cor. 9.22 as a reason for being allowed to sacrifice during persecutions, whereas earlier, in Contra Manichaeos IV.11, he attributes the same interpretation of 1 Cor. 9.22 (and 9.19) to Mani himself. The ambiguity is also revealed when Titus slips over from ‘Mani’ to ‘the Manichaeans’ in Contra Manichaeos IV.96, whereas in Contra Manichaeos IV.90; IV.97 and IV.106 he refers only to Manichaeans. In Contra Manichaeos IV.111 we hear that the Manichaeans invoke Gen. 1.2, as also other literature claims to be the case,⁵⁹ but perhaps Titus’s subsequent formulations here are aimed at the difference between the Manichaeans and Mani, in which case the latter did not himself use this passage in the OT.

However, there are also summaries and quotations in Titus that must be understood as Mani-quotations. This is true above all of the quotation in the 1st person singular in Contra Manichaeos IV.86, which I suggested above was taken from Acta Archelai.⁶⁰ But also the quotation in Contra Manichaeos IV.12 must be imagined as issuing from Mani:

“For I have come and been sent out to restore and <cleanse> the gospels because in them—even in those—is also (some) of the intermingling”, as he says, “of evil.” (Sy 134.28–29 → Ch. XI.45)

In Contra Manichaeos III.8 we gain the impression that Titus has been sitting with a self-aware prophet who has spoken in the 1st person singular:

But he says in his defence that he has not undertaken to excise most of the new covenant in vain. (ed.N 300.12–13 → Ch. XI.35).

Also the above-quoted passage from Contra Manichaeos IV.21 on the worship of several gods must be a Mani-quotations.

If we lay to one side the special question as to whether Titus did not just borrow the Mani-quotations in Contra Manichaeos IV.86 from Hegemonius, we can consider whether the other quotations were already quotations in Titus's source, if this was a text written by a Manichaean, for example Adda's Μόδιος, as Reitzenstein believed. In favour of this theory one could say that Titus's source was characterised by polemic against the Catholic canon and scriptural interpretation, and that it used the same ideas with roots in Marcionism that were widespread in North African Manichaeism, and moreover that it attacked in particular the doctrine of the incarnation. If Μόδιος was a kind of commentary on Mani's Living Gospel, it could explain the direct Mani-quotations and also fit in with some of our information on the content of The Living Gospel.⁶¹ Even so, on this point Reitzenstein's theory remains very insecure.

⁵⁹ Cf. Didymus the Blind’s In Gen. 3A (Petit 1991, 11 [Catena in Gen. 15]; Nautin 1976, 38–39) (cf. Procopius of Gaza, In Gen., PG 87,1, 41C3–4: ‘Ο δὲ θεομώχος Μάνης τὸ ἦν φησι δηλοῦν τὸ τῆς ὕλης ἀγέννητον; cf. May 1978, 144 n. 132). Presumably, in reality Didymus is here attributing to the Manichaeans the views of Hermogenes of Carthage (thus Bennett 2001, 52–54).—An ostensibly Manichaean interpretation of Gen. 1.2 is also to be found in John of Caesarea, Adv. Manich. hom. 1,9–12 (Richard 1977, 88–90 [132–207]), cf. Klein 1991, 72. Felix also interprets Gen. 1.1–2, but in a somewhat different way; see Contra Fel. I.XVII (cf. Decret 1970, 82–83, 126–28, 214–15); cf. De Gen. contra Manich. I.III,5.1–4 (Weber 1998, 71–72) and Weber 2001, 302–303.

⁶⁰ See above pp. 150–152.

Finally it must be stated that there are three places where Titus formulates himself in such a way that we might believe that he really did possess some of Mani's original works. The most important passage is in Contra Manichaeos III.9. At first Titus speaks more vaguely about the Manichaeans' books, claiming that they are hiding them because a lie loves to conceal itself (ed.N 300.15–302.3),⁶² but then he turns to Mani's Treasury ("his madness's so-called Treasury", τὸν λεγόμενον αὐτοῦ τῆς μανίας Θησαυρὸν, ed.N 302.4–5) in a way that perhaps means that he himself was in possession of the work (ed.N 302.4–9). This Treasury could, as Nagel presumes, be Mani's well-known Treasury of Life.⁶³ But as mentioned previously a Manichaean work also existed with the title the Little Treasury,⁶⁴ and we cannot exclude the possibility that Titus confused the two texts.

The two other passages are places where Titus speaks of Mani's epistles and psalms. But here it is not clear whether Titus himself had access to this literature.⁶⁵

⁶¹ According to al-Bīrūnī's Chronology of Ancient Nations VIII (Sachau 1879, 190), in The Living Gospel Mani claimed to be the Paraclete. However, Titus could also have found Mani's claim to be the Paraclete in Acta Arch.

⁶² Titus has already expressed the same idea in a passage in Contra Manich. I.17 that is missing in the Greek text (Gr. 10.17), but which is preserved in Sy (cf. also Poirier and Sensal 1990, 32 n. 209): "For he has concealed his books and has placed them in darkness because he feared the refutation which would be (made) against them on the basis of [lit. from] them." (Sy 13.32–34 → Ch. XI.9).—This might be a heresiological topos known from Hippolytus; cf. Vallée 1981, 53.

⁶³ Nagel 1973, 302 n.

⁶⁴ See above p. 178.

⁶⁵ Thus in Contra Manich. III.1: "Like an apostle of Jesus Christ among those who are barbarians by kin he who is a barbarian both by kin and intelligence now and then sends his impiety (Gr. 67.15–17: ἔστι δ' ὅτε καὶ ὡς ἀπόστολος Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ βαρβάρους τὸ γένος ὁ βάρβαρος καὶ γένος καὶ γνώμην τὴν ἀσέβειαν ἐπιστέλλει.); cf.

The conclusion must be that in the rest of Book III and all of Book IV Titus has used Manichaean sources that relate directly to the Bible, and it is my view that particularly in Book IV Titus uses a text that argued for the excision of certain passages in the gospels and Pauline epistles and the retention of others. His text contained interpretations of the retained passages in the Bible, polemic against the doctrine of the incarnation, and, if not written by Mani himself, at least quotations by him. Since the text was thus markedly polemical against Catholicism and used Marcionite ideas, it is this text above all among Titus's Manichaean sources that could have been written by Adda.

It is debatable whether this source too was especially aimed at presenting Manichaeism as "rational"; moreover it must have been particularly well-suited to the mission among Catholics, but less so among pagans, even if there had been an interest in Christian traditions in pagan circles. On the other hand we must suppose that the consistently dualistic interpretation of the words of Jesus and Paul in the Manichaean sources was to result in an ascetic "separation" from the material, corporeal world, in other words a complex of ethical themes that was the complete opposite of what Titus expresses.

So far I have laid aside the source that is used in Contra Manichaeos III.7, apart from distinguishing it from the source that is used in Contra Manichaeos III.4–5. However, Contra Manichaeos III.7 contains an example of anti-Catholic, Manichaean polemic that originates from a number of value judgements and ideas that were also shared by contemporary, educated pagans and Catholics. For this very reason the polemic was an exceptional challenge to Titus, who responds with a comprehensive refutation.

Lieu 1988, 86; 1992, 88. In Contra Manich. IV.44, Sy 150.33–35 Titus mentions both Mani's psalms and his epistles, which he claimed were long-winded. Titus may of course have found the introduction Μανιχαῖος ἀπόστολος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ to the epistles in Acta Arch. V.1 (VI) (Beeson 1906, 5.22.25), where, however, only one epistle is mentioned; besides it is a question of whether the introductions in Mani's epistles have not been so well known that Titus can have received information about them orally.

5. *The Manichaean criticism of the Creator God in Contra Manichaeos III.7*a. Introduction

I shall begin with a translation of the passage in Contra Manichaeos III.7 that deals with the Paradise narrative (Gr. 69.5–25/ed.N 296.1–298.6; in Nagel’s verse division III.7,1–9). It is important in the present work to gain a precise understanding of this text and its basis in the history of ideas in order to speak more principally about how the relation between certain “heretical” and “orthodox” interpretations of Gen. 2–3 should be regarded. On this background the aim is then to clarify what culturally-determined values and ideas Manichaeans and Catholics in this context felt themselves called to explain, as well as whether we can here uncover specific strategies in relation to the surrounding pagan society.

(1) He [i.e. Mani] thus also doubts why the whole world came into being, but as for man he strives to demonstrate that he is not God’s creature. (2) He [i.e. Mani] examines also other things foolishly: “In what way,” he says “has God given Adam a commandment?” (3) For one of two reasons: Either He knew that he would transgress, (and in that case) He not only gave the commandment in vain but was also responsible for it [i.e. the transgression], (4) or one must say that God was ignorant and was endowed with ignorance, so that the commandment was indeed given, but by (the principle of) evil as a plot against man, as he [i.e. Mani] believes, and by none other. (5) But it has been of the greatest benefit and has set man free when he followed the serpent’s advice, which he [i.e. Mani] claims was the angel of the good. (6) “For man was blind,” he says, “but when he had tasted the forbidden, he saw that he was naked, and he made use of the clothing that he found, and he learned to know good and evil.” (7) Thus he [i.e. man] has above all benefit from transgressing the order from the one who created him with guile. (8) “But how”, he says, “can it be fitting for God to say, ‘See, Adam has become like one of us, knowing good and evil, and now, lest he ever stretch out his hand to take from the Tree of Life and eat and live forever!’?” (9) “For,” he says, “if it is possible to take away immortality, then He is jealous (φθονερός) who expels the man from Paradise and excludes him from sharing the Tree of Life, from which the participant could forever possess immortality.” (→ Ch. XI.34)

In III.7,10–15 Titus enumerates other blasphemies against the OT in the Manichaean text (Cain and Abel, the Flood, Sodom, the patriarchs’ polygamy, the ten plagues of Egypt, the theft of the Egyptians’ jewels, the fire on the mountain and Moses).

In III.7,1 Titus claims that Mani doubts (Ἐπαπορῶν) why the world has come into being; ἐπαπορέω means “raise a new doubt or question”. It is this question which in III.10,1 Titus calls the first of the aporiae (πρώτη γὰρ τῶν ἐπαπορήσεων αὐτή, ed.N 302.11).⁶⁶ Titus thus presents Mani as one who doubts or questions. Such a “sceptical Mani” is not a common understanding of him, as we know from the fragments of Mani’s own writings or from the other Manichaean literature, in which Mani is rather the omniscient revealer.

Assuming that Titus’s source really has raised sceptical questions, however, we can imagine that their purpose was to undermine the world-picture of the orthodox and thus clear the way for another cosmology that was not to fall foul of sceptical questions itself. The relationship between criticism and revelation in Manichaeism may be understood in this way, and as we shall also see, there is a parallel with Augustine’s path into Manichaeism, as he himself depicts it in Confessiones III. Titus is also aware that the questions stem from a prejudice when in Contra Manichaeos III.29,13 he explains that Mani is a φιλαίτιος, one who loves to make accusations.

Titus formulates it in such a way that the question of why the world came into being occurs as a summary of the previous presentation in III.4–6; in these chapters, however, Titus has only been concerned with the Manichaean claim that man is not God’s creature. We must in reality therefore return to Books I–II to find a presentation of “the first aporia”. It is thus only the remark that Mani strives to show that man is not God’s creature that summarises III.4–6. The formulations also show that Titus knows all about the finer nuances in the Manichaean myth; while man is created by the archons of matter, the world is created by the good God as a necessary evil in that the already mingled mass of good light and evil matter had been organised so that the light could gradually be freed from the matter. The world is thus a rather ambiguous quantity, for although it is created or formed by God, it is not an expression of what He Himself could have wished.⁶⁷ From Titus’s view of the world and God the Manichaean standpoint is offensive.

⁶⁶ Liddell, Scott and Jones 1968, 610a.

⁶⁷ The ambiguity in the Manichaeans’ understanding of the created world is admirably illustrated in Titus’s summary in I.17: the universe is created from a mingling of the power from the good and from matter (Gr. 9.25–27), “manifestly by the good one, for the evil does not concern itself with the genesis of the world.”

Since III.7,1 is merely a summary of the content of Books I–II and Book III.4–6 respectively, it is not until the passage from III.7,2 that Titus brings what he himself states are direct quotations. Perhaps these quotations are in reality interwoven with his summary of the source, but it is also conceivable that the whole passage is a single direct quotation in which he only adds remarks such as φησίν, ὡς οἶεται, φησί.⁶⁸

In III.7,2 Titus begins by saying that Mani “examines” or “discusses” (κινεῖ) foolishly, and in this way Titus again depicts Mani as a curious philosopher. However, this picture has a factual justification, for as I will attempt to show, the question of whether God knows the future, and whether He contains φθόνος has philosophical roots. In III.7,2–9 it is claimed that (I) God was (a) ignorant, because He did not know beforehand that man would violate the prohibition, and (b) jealous, because He banished man from Paradise and the Tree of Life; it is further claimed that in this connection (II) the serpent was the angel of the good, and (III) that the violation was a liberation, because man (a) saw that he was naked, and (b) knew good and evil. On the basis of God’s ignorance the text moreover concludes that this God was evil, and that the prohibition was a plot against man.⁶⁹ Thus Titus’s source evaluates nearly all the figures

(Gr. 9.28–29 → Ch. XI.8). The creation of the world, however, is a necessary evil: “Then since the good one has fooled matter in this way, he is, he [i.e. Mani] says, the creator of the world; true he did not strive to create (the world), for he stands against it, but he did so because of the rebellion of evil, which he had in mind to quell.” (Gr. 9.34–38 → Ch. XI.8) (cf. I.31). In I.39 Titus is aware that the Manichaeans distinguish between the creator of the world and the creator of man (Gr. 24.9ff.). In II.3 he writes: “So God has made the world, and those against whom the treatise is directed are not raging about this point. For even if they manifestly change the world that is ordered into disorder, they agree on its character and the cause of its coming into being.” (Gr. 26.31–34 → Ch. XI.14).—The Manichaeans’ agreement with the Catholic Christians on the character of the world perhaps alludes to an agreement that the world is not eternal.

⁶⁸ In favour of the text being Titus’s summary rather than a direct quotation could be the stylistic feature that Titus appears to favour the phrase δουῖν γὰρ θάτερον (III.7,3; Gr. 69.8) = ܕܘܝܢ ܓܘܪ ܬܘܪܐ ܕܠܘܟܐ in Sy 84.29; thus it is repeated in I.18, Gr. 10.36; I.29, Gr. 18.22 and in IV.102, Sy 180.8.

(ܕܘܝܢ ܓܘܪ ܬܘܪܐ ܕܠܘܟܐ). However, this one single feature is insufficient to claim that Titus is summarising instead of quoting direct. For the expression is quite common; cf. for example δουῖν θάτερον in Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. VI.27, Reischl 1848, 192.

⁶⁹ I do not think it possible to understand both alternatives in the texts as merely hypothetical, as Baur proposed (see above p. 76); the text develops to such a breadth on the second alternative that it is clear that it decides in favour of it.

and events differently than is the case in the traditional, Catholic exposition of the Paradise narrative; only the text still appears to value the actual Garden of Eden with the Tree of Life positively.

b. Discussion of the non-Catholic polemical interpretations of the OT

Contra Manichaeos III.7,2–9 is closely related to a number of other “heretical” Gnostic texts which—in comparison with “orthodox” or Catholic Christian exegesis—also reevaluate a range of figures and events in the Paradise narrative. These texts exist partly in several Nag Hammadi tractates, partly in the heresiologists’ reproduction, and they also contain value reversals of other OT texts, partly corresponding to the content of Titus’s Contra Manichaeos III.7,10–15. Moreover, occasionally there are such value reversals of the Paradise narrative in the original Manichaean literature, though it must be emphasised that there are no such exact parallels to III.7,2–9 as are to be found in certain Nag Hammadi tractates.

It is thus natural to interpret Contra Manichaeos III.7,2–9 in the context of these related texts, and since they have been the subject of much discussion, it will be necessary by way of introduction to draw out some important positions from the history of scholarship beginning with Hans Jonas, who treated the Gnostic and Manichaean texts which reevaluate large parts of the Paradise narrative under the heading, “Gnostische Allegorie”. As his first point Jonas claimed that we are dealing with a particular type of interpretation, which he characterised as an aggressive-polemical “Umkehrung”. Jonas believed that the Gnostics used allegory as a conventional method, but that from the inside they destroyed the conservative purpose that had been its intention. For instance, the purpose of the Stoics’ allegorical interpretations had been that mythological content was blurred in favour of the philosophical ideas, but that the formal value-structure which the mythological figures occupied in relation to each other should simultaneously be maintained, and in this way they could continue to pretend to be in agreement with the original intention of the myth. In relation to a rational criticism of mythology they were thus pretending to “save” the myth, while at the same time sanctioning their own rational cognition by the “ancient” wisdom that they had themselves projected onto the myth. Although Jonas thus regarded allegory as a usurpation of myth, he nevertheless thought that on a more fundamental, ontological level the original myths and their allegorical interpretations in fact shared a common view of the world, by which he presumably was thinking of an “immanent”, affirmative attitude. The “Gnostic allegory” on the other hand sought to demonstrate an opposition to the tradition and to reevaluate the significance of the individual figures in the myths, and its real point and deeper principle was quite simply paradox, and in a way blasphemy. In reality it was no longer a question of an allegory, i.e. a distanced, literary treatment of the mythological original, but of a new mythological course in which the ruling cosmic gods were dethroned and new non-cosmic gods installed. Precisely because the Gnostic allegory in reality created new myths, it was furthermore possible for the original to be forgotten and thus for the reinterpretation to live on as an independent myth; in Jonas’s opinion this was the case with a Manichaean myth about Adam which is preserved in some of the excerpts in the Nestorian writer Theodore bar Kōnai’s Liber Scholiorum. In Theodore’s Manichaean excerpts, which are generally taken to be written by Mani himself, the serpent had, according to Jonas, been replaced by Jesus and there is no longer an allusion to any source in Gen. Here it has doubtless already been forgotten how this type of myth came into being.⁷⁰

It is also important to draw attention to an article by Nagel from 1980 which points out that the Gnostic texts also contain other interpretative methods and tendencies than the polemical in relation to the OT. The recurrent feature of Jonas’s aggressive-polemical type of interpretation is not a particular method of interpretation, according to Nagel, but a particular tendency, and in connection with the Paradise narrative this tendency is only in evidence in four Nag Hammadi tractates (Testimonium veritatis [NHC IX,3]; Hypostasis Archonton [NHC II,4]; De origine mundi [NHC II,5] and Apocryphon Johannis [this important text exists in two versions: the short version is in BG 8502,2 and NHC III,1, while the long version is in NHC II,1 and NHC IV,1]).⁷¹ The polemical type of interpretation can be further divided into three sub-groups: 1) The openly scornful rejection of figures and events in the OT (Testimonium veritatis). 2) Expositions which by making the figures and events change roles and functions contradict the meaning claimed by the texts themselves (Hypostasis Archonton; De origine mundi). 3) A corrective exegesis in close affiliation with 2), which, however, involves direct criticism of the words of Scripture (Apocryphon Johannis).⁷² According to Nagel, despite the differences among the aggressive-polemical interpretations there is a constant that unites them, namely the positive value reversal of the Tree of Knowledge: all the texts make it the decisive event in the history of salvation that man ate of this Tree. The evaluation of the serpent on the other hand is variable; although its role as the one who saves man by persuading him to eat of the Tree is necessary, the texts do not agree on the extent to which the one who had this role was the serpent. The value reversal of the Tree of Knowledge is similarly the distinctive mark that separates the aggressive-polemical type of interpretation from a different type found in other Gnostic texts, and which Nagel designates as the aetiological or typological interpretation of the OT. Within this latter type, which Nagel believes to be strongly Christian influenced, it was a disaster that man ate of the Tree of Knowledge, while the Tree of Life is evaluated positively.⁷³

⁷⁰ Jonas 1934, 216–23, who refers to Theodore bar Kōnai, Liber schol. 11, Scher 1912, 317.15–318.4. Fundamentally Jonas maintains the same views in his later presentation: Jonas 1963, 91–97.

⁷¹ Nagel’s analysis also includes other texts, heresiological and Manichaean, but for the sake of clarity I mention only the Nag Hammadi texts at this point.—I refer in the present work to the edition of Test. ver. in Pearson 1981 and to the

Finally I shall outline Michael Allen Williams' view of these allegedly "aggressive-polemical value reversals" or "protest exegeses"⁷⁴ that editions of Hyp. Arch. and De or. mund. in respectively Layton 1989 and 1989a. Apocr. Joh. in BG 8502,2 is edited in Till 1955. Apocr. Joh. in NHC II,1; III,1 and IV,1 is edited in Krause and Labib 1962, and Apocr. Joh. in NHC II,1 also in Giversen 1963. A synopsis of Apocr. Joh. in NHC II,1; III,1; IV,1 and BG 8502,2 now exists in Waldstein and Wisse 1995, which also includes new readings; in the following I also refer to the pagination of double pages and lines in this synopsis.—Test. ver. dates presumably from the period 180–312/13, most likely from the middle of the 3rd cent., and was originally in Greek (Koschorke 1978, 91 n. 1, 109; Koschorke 1978a, 96); it must also be mentioned that Pearson assumes that the relevant passage in the present context, Test. ver. 45.23–49.28, constitutes an older, perhaps pre-Christian, source, which together with Hyp. Arch. and De or. mund. should be derived from a common archetype (Pearson 1972, 469; 1981, 106, 158).—The dating of Apocr. Joh. is debatable; Waldstein and Wisse 1995, 1, 7–8 believe that the short version was written in Greek at the beginning of the 3rd cent., while the long version dates from a redaction later in the same century.

⁷² Nagel 1980, 50–57.

⁷³ Nagel 1980, 61–64.

⁷⁴ The designation "protest exegesis" was created by Kurt Rudolph (1967; 1980, 313–15) for the ostensibly polemical expositions which he sought with the aid of a Weberian theory to explain as a protest from the declassed, powerless scribal cir-

characterise interpretations of the Paradise narrative and other narratives in the OT as presented in his Rethinking "Gnosticism" from 1996. Williams notes that within the group of "Gnostic" texts that are claimed in particular to contain value reversals, no systematic reevaluation as such ever takes place, only totally selective adjustments, transpositions and reworkings of the original narrative. A number of subjects are not reevaluated at all. It follows that the point of these texts is not, as Jonas maintained according to Williams, to turn the meaning of the text upside down; we are not dealing with "reversal as the principle, reversal as protest, and so on", but rather with a selective reversal.⁷⁵ Moreover Williams claims that in those passages where the Gnostic texts "revaluate" in relation to the tradition, it is nearly always a question of passages in the OT that have already long ago in the Jewish tradition been regarded as "problems". These were passages which, probably as a result of influences from Hellenistic, philosophical ideas of divine transcendence, had come to be regarded as offensive or unworthy, for example the anthropomorphisms and anthropopathisms or the prohibition against acquiring knowledge of good and evil—for knowledge of the good was central to philosophy. There is sufficient testimony that these passages were also a problem for the Catholic Christian writers in the 2nd century. It is thus Williams' view that the "revaluations" in the Nag Hammadi tractates must only be understood as an attempt at a "hermeneutical problem-solving", a different attempt, for example, than Origen's allegorical interpretations.⁷⁶

Let me now quote a passage from the Nag Hammadi text called Testimonium veritatis 47.13–48.15) that has been seen as a typical example of "protest exegesis":

But what sort is this God? First [he] envied Adam that he should eat from the tree of knowledge. And secondly he said, 'Adam, where are you?' And God does not have foreknowledge, that is, since he did not know this from the beginning. [And] afterwards he said, 'Let us cast him [out] of this place, lest he eat of the Tree of Life and live for ever.' Surely he has shown himself to be a malicious envier. And what kind of a God is this? For great is the blindness of those who read, cles. Cf. also the scholarship overview in Williams 1996, 55–56, 77–78, 97–98, 225–29.

⁷⁵ Williams 1996, 60–63 (quotation 63).

⁷⁶ Williams 1996, 63–76.

tially the same presuppositions derived from the philosophically influenced idea of God and the problem of theodicy. The designation “hermeneutical problem-solving” is not wrong, yet it does not involve so very much, since the crucial point is that the problems could be solved in fundamentally different ways. Jonas is right to assert that there is a conservative interest to be traced in the traditional allegories of Antiquity, namely a wish to be able to pretend that they were reproducing the innate meaning of the myth. It was important that one could feel oneself to be in accordance with the tradition.⁷⁹ In the Gnostic texts that we are dealing with here, there is no pretence of actually being in accordance with the whole tradition; parts of the OT are “demiurgic”.⁸⁰ There really is aggression, polemic and protest, and protest not only against a different interpretation, but also against other interpreters, i.e. the Christians and possibly the Jewish groups that would not accept these Gnostic interpretations. This is explicit in Testimonium veritatis, where we read of “the blindness of those who read” (48.2–4) or “those who believe in him (i.e. the demiurge, NAP) [and] serve him” (48.13–15). This vehement aggression is also manifest in the “blasphemy litany” in Tractatus secundus Magni Seth (NHC VII,2) 62.27–65.2, where it becomes clear that in this polemical tradition there are tendencies that could lead not only to a partial, but also to a complete rejection of the OT as Holy Scripture.⁸¹ However, this difference between a traditional Catholic and a polemical heretic view of the OT seems to originate in a deeper, more fundamental difference: thus there is a correspondence between the Jews’ and the Catholic Christians’ conservative ⁷⁹ Williams presents a somewhat unfair summary of Jonas’s view of the traditional allegorizing: “Jonas insisted that in spite of the huge liberties for which most ancient allegorical interpreters of myth and Scripture are deservedly famous, in spite of their seemingly arbitrary manipulations of the tradition, nevertheless the aim was to rescue the central truths and values of the tradition of which the allegorist was still respectful” (Williams 1996, 54–55). The summary is of course not quite fair, for it was clearly Jonas’s opinion that the traditional allegorists only pretended to reproduce the myths’ own meaning; on the other hand it was on a different level that he also believed that myth and allegorist shared a world view.

⁸⁰ But it is clear that these groups feel themselves in agreement with another tradition which presumably also goes back to primeval times, namely the tradition of the highest God, for example Seth’s tradition.—Nagel 1980, 50 stresses that the Gnostics never claimed that events in Gen. 2–3 were humbug or “unhistorical”; their problem was how these events were to be interpreted.

⁸¹ Thus Bethge 1980, 104–6.—I refer here to the edition in Pearson 1996.

attitude to the tradition and their theodicies, their view of the Creator and the world, and a correspondence between the anti-cosmic Gnostics' rejection of part of the tradition and their rejection of the Creator.

As mentioned Nagel has shown that the four Nag Hammadi tracts, Testimonium veritatis, Hypostasis Archonton, De origine mundi and Apocryphon Johannis together with different heresiological accounts share the fundamental common feature that they reevaluate the eating of the Tree of Knowledge positively, so that this becomes the fundamental event in the history of salvation. Williams derives this positive evaluation from the philosophy's appreciation of knowledge. However, if particular philosophical presuppositions are an adequate explanation of Gnostic value reversals, it becomes impossible to understand why Catholic writers who clearly shared the same assumptions nevertheless failed to reach the same value reversals in their interpretations as the Gnostic writers. For example it is clear enough that a group of Catholic writers agreed that "knowledge of good and evil" is valuable and good, yet they did not interpret Adam and Eve's disobedience as a deliverance; their "solution" was that eating from the Tree was prohibited because Adam and Eve were not yet ready to receive the valuable Knowledge. In this way they maintain that the disobedience was a fall.⁸²

It thus seems as though behind the different interpretations there lies a deeper, more fundamental presupposition than merely a positive philosophical appreciation of the knowledge of good and evil. The solution to the problem is determined by deep-lying, different convictions, which in a sense could be called different "confessions". The vastly dissimilar doctrines on God in relation to the world are hardly derived from the interpretation of these texts, but are rather the principle that conditions this interpretation.

The following examination will also involve the view that the polemical interpretations of the Paradise narrative have as their context value judgements of philosophical origin in Graeco-Roman culture; I would nonetheless question whether these value judgements are sufficient explanation for the character of the interpretations. The context of these value judgements can provide a partial explanation, however, and here it is particularly interesting that this context, in connection with the polemical character of these texts, suggests that they derive from groups who sought to distance themselves from traditionalist Christianity and possibly Judaism while at the same time wishing to show their concord with educated culture.

⁸² E.g. Theophilus claims in Ad Autol. II.25 that the Tree of Knowledge and its fruit were good, but that man ate of the tree too early; it was thus the disobedience that was evil (Grant 1970, 66, 68); correspondingly in the Hymni de parad. XV Ephrem praises the Tree of Knowledge, but nonetheless claims that Adam ate its fruit too early and in sin (esp. stanzas 2-3 and 5-9; Beck 1957b, 62-64; transl. Beck 1957c, 57-59). Cf. also Diogn. 12.2-8. Other examples in Alexandre 1988, 255. Cf. below pp. 332-33.

I shall now attempt to place Contra Manichaeos III.7 in a more detailed relation to possible philosophical assumptions, to related non-Catholic interpretations of Gen. which also contribute to a clarification of the question of Titus's Manichaean sources, as well as to Emperor Julian's related polemic against "the Galileans", which is moreover of interest because of the pagan "renaissance" in the province of Arabia during his reign.

c. The philosophical and Marcionite background for the idea of the Creator's ignorance

In Contra Manichaeos III.7,2-4 a disjunction is established: either God knew beforehand that man would transgress His prohibition, or He did not. The consequences of these two positions are then drawn: if He knew, then the prohibition was not given seriously, and God Himself was responsible for the transgression. Here it is not clear whether the idea is that God's foreknowledge means that man's action was predetermined, or that God was responsible because He did not prevent an event that He knew in advance would happen. The second possibility, and one with which the writer aligns himself, is that God did not know that man would violate the commandment; God is therefore evil, and the prohibition was a plot against man. Here the text operates with two implied premises, namely that the real God must have knowledge of the future, and that "knowledge of good and evil" is a good thing; thus whoever forbids man from acquiring this knowledge is evil.

The argument is clumsily organised; the writer ought to have divided it in two. The explanation may be that he has brought together two lines of thought. On the one hand he has taken over an argument that is known from the Marcionites, which presumed that it was a misfortune for man to eat of the Tree of Knowledge and concluded that the God of Gen. lacked goodness, foreknowl-edge and power, since He did not prevent the catastrophe. Also this argument was structured as a disjunction, and this fact also suggests that the argument in Contra Manichaeos is taken from the Marcionite one. On the other hand the author of Titus's text has also taken over the argument that since knowledge of good and evil is positive, whoever forbade man to acquire this knowledge must be evil, whereas whoever helped man to acquire the knowledge must have been good; as mentioned above, this argument had already long been used in certain Gnostic interpretations of Gen. 2–3.

The two most important testimonies that the Marcionites argued in this way are to be found in Tertullian's Adversus Marcionem II.5,1–2 and IV.41,1.⁸³ As has often been noted, their argument is based on Epicurus's proof that there is no divine Providence in the world,⁸⁴

⁸³ Adv. Marc. II.5,1–2 (Evans 1972, 96, 98): "Iam hinc ad quaestiones omnes, o canes, quos foras apostolus expellit, latrantes in deum veritatis. Haec sunt argumentationum ossa, quae obroditis. Si deus bonus et praescius futuri et avertendi mali potens, cur hominem, et quidem imaginem et similitudinem suam, immo et substantiam suam, per animae scilicet censum, passus est labi de obsequio legis in mortem circumventum a diabolo? Si enim et bonus, qui evenire tale quid nolle, et praescius, qui eventurum non ignoraret, et potens, qui depellere valeret, nullo modo evenisset quod sub his tribus condicionibus divinae maiestatis evenire non posset. Quod si evenit, absolutum est e contrario deum neque bonum credendum neque praescium neque potentem; siquidem in quantum nihil tale evenisset, si talis deus, id est bonus et praescius et potens, in tantum ideo evenit quia non talis deus."—Adv. Marc. IV.41,1 (Evans 1972a, 496): "noli iam de creatore circa Adam retractare quae in tuum quoque deum retorquentur; aut ignorasse illum, qui non ex providentia obstitit peccaturo, aut obsistere non potuisse si ignorabat, aut noluisse si et sciebat et poterat; atque ita malitiosum iudicandum, qui passus sit hominem suum ex delicto perire." Cf. also Adv. Marc. I.22,8–9; II.6,1; IV.38,1–2.

⁸⁴ Lactantius, De ira Dei 13,20–21 (102–11): "20. Quod si haec ratio vera est, quam Stoici nullo modo videre potuerunt, dissolvitur etiam illud argumentum Epicuri. Deus, inquit, aut vult tollere mala et non potest, aut potest et non vult, aut neque vult neque potest, aut et vult et potest. 21. Si vult et non potest, inbecillus est, quod in deum non cadit; si potest et non vult, invidus, quod aequae alienum est a deo; si neque vult neque potest, et invidus et inbecillus est ideoque nec deus; si et vult et potest, quod solum deo convenit, unde ergo sunt mala aut cur illa non tollit?" (Ingremeau 1982, 158, 160). See the references in Pease 1968a, 1222 on the question of Lactantius's sources.—Cf. Sextus Empiricus's Hyp. III.9–11 (Mutschmann 1958, 135–36 [121.12–29]): ἄλλ' εἰ μὲν πάντων προνοεῖ, οὐκ ἦν ἂν οὔτε κακόν τι οὔτε κακία ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ· κακίας δὲ πάντα μεστὰ εἶναι λέγουσιν· οὐκ ἄρα πάντων προνοεῖν λεχθήσεται ὁ θεός. εἰ δὲ τινῶν προνοεῖ, διὰ τί τῶνδε μὲν προνοεῖ, τῶνδε δὲ οὐ; ἦτοι γὰρ καὶ βούλεται καὶ δύναται πάντων προνοεῖν, ἢ βούλεται μὲν, οὐ δύναται δέ, ἢ δύναται μὲν, οὐ βούλεται δέ, ἢ οὔτε βούλεται οὔτε δύναται. ἄλλ' εἰ μὲν καὶ ἡβούλετο καὶ ἡδύνατο, πάντων ἂν προνοεῖ· οὐ προνοεῖ δὲ πάντων διὰ τὰ προειρημένα· οὐκ ἄρα καὶ βούλεται καὶ δύναται πάντων προνοεῖν. εἰ δὲ βούλεται μὲν, οὐ δύναται δέ, ἀσθενέστερός ἐστι τῆς αἰτίας δι' ἣν οὐ δύναται προνοεῖν ὧν οὐ προνοεῖ· ἐστὶ δὲ παρὰ proof that was generally known at the time and also often used against its original intention.⁸⁵ Von Harnack believed that Tertullian had found the argument in Marcion's Antitheses;⁸⁶ this is, as Quispel shows, rather uncertain,⁸⁷ but in my opinion Quispel's own attempt to prove that Tertullian's source was Theophilus's lost writing Adversus Marcionem (see Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica IV.24), is not successful either.⁸⁸ I would similarly reject the theory that Tertullian himself τὴν θεοῦ ἐπίνοιαν τὸ ἀσθενέστερον εἶναι τινος αὐτόν. εἰ δὲ δύναται μὲν πάντων προνοεῖν, οὐ βούλεται δὲ, βάσκανος ἂν εἶναι νομισθεῖν. εἰ δὲ οὔτε βούλεται οὔτε δύναται, καὶ βάσκανός ἐστι καὶ ἀσθενής, ὅπερ λέγειν περὶ θεοῦ ἀσεβοῦντων ἐστίν. οὐκ ἄρα προνοεῖ τῶν ἐν κόσμῳ ὁ θεός. The similarity between Tertullian's texts and Epicurus's proof was noticed in Naumann 1934, 338 n. 3; Woltmann 1971, 32–37 and Gager 1972.

⁸⁵ As examples of Christian literature where this proof is used mention can be made of Minucius Felix, Octavius 12.2; Pseudo-Clement, Rec. II.54 (cf. Gronau 1922, 31). Titus himself uses elements of the proof against the Manichaeans' eschatology in I.40 (Gr. 24.31–25.1) (cf. even the remark οὔτε γὰρ ἀσθενεῖα ἐκωλύετο οὔτε φθόνῳ κατείχετο in Hom. in Luc. 10.21¹, Sickenberger 1901, 194). Also John of Caesarea employed this argument against the Manichaeans (Disp. 27 [1325C–D], ed. Aubineau in Richard 1977, 121; cf. Klein 1991, 72–73, 129). References to pagan writers are found in Gronau 1922, 29–30 n. 1 and Pease 1968a, 1222–23. In De nat. deor. Cicero for example makes C. Cotta, who represents the Sceptical Academy, use related arguments against the Stoic teaching on Providence. The Stoics believed that God had given man reason and thus the possibility of acting freely; man himself, therefore, and not God, was responsible for what was ethically evil, which for the Stoics was the only real evil (see Pohlenz 1948, 100–1; Pohlenz 1949, 57–58). However, on the assumption that reason is the gift of the gods, Cotta (De nat. deor. III.25ff. [65ff.]) maintains that since the gift is chiefly used for evil deeds, it would have been better that man had never received it; particularly in III.31 (76ff.) Cotta makes it clear that the gods ought to have known beforehand that man would misuse the gift. Cf. the notes in Pease 1968a, 1141ff. In III.39 (92) Cotta even applies an argument that seems to be based on Epicurus's; see on this Pease 1968a, 1222–23.—The discussion of theodicy in Antiquity of course forms the background for Leibniz's Theodicee; see the references in Gronau 1922, 29 n. 1.

⁸⁶ Von Harnack 1924, 77–80, 88, 105–6, 269*–70*, 271*–72*.

⁸⁷ Quispel 1943, 83–84.

⁸⁸ Quispel believed that the source of Tertullian's Adv. Marc. II was Theophilus's Adv. Marc., an argument he adduced by comparing particular lines of thought in Book II with Theophilus's preserved Ad Autol. (Quispel 1943, 34–55); as Quispel was aware (1943, 51), the similarities that he found between the texts constituted only a "possibility". Secondly, Quispel saw particular similarities between Adv. Marc. II.5–6 and Irenaeus's Adv. haer. IV.37–39 (Quispel 1943, 46–50), without claiming, however, that Adv. haer. could be Tertullian's source (Quispel 1943, 52–54). Quispel then accepted Loofs's theory that in Adv. haer. IV.37–39 Irenaeus used a particular source that Loofs referred to with the letters IQT, which was identical with Theophilus's Adv. Marc. (Quispel 1943, 50; cf. Loofs 1930, 24ff.), and Quispel could therefore assume that this writing had been the source for both Irenaeus and Tertullian (Quispel 1943, 51–52). This must be regarded as Quispel's main argument, but it is untenable. For Quispel (1943, 53–54) emphasises that Adv. Marc. II.5 construed the argument on the basis of individual and unconnected Marcionite views;⁸⁹ for in Adversus Marcionem I.22 and IV.41,1 Tertullian states that he is using the Marcionites' own proof against themselves. Tertullian would not have formulated it in this way unless he had deals with God's goodness, omnipotence and foreknowledge, just as Adv. haer. IV.38,8 deals with God's power, wisdom and goodness, but the argument from these three attributes comes from the Epicurean proof which as mentioned was common knowledge at the time, a point which Quispel overlooked; this similarity does not therefore imply that Irenaeus and Tertullian had the same source (cf. for example also Irenaeus, Adv. haer. V.4,1; cf. Meijering 1975, 35–36).—Furthermore, there is some disagreement on the correctness of Loofs's theory: Hitchcock 1937 wished to reject it out of hand; however, his argument (1937, 138–39) that Irenaeus did not use a particular source in Adv. haer. IV.38, is not conclusive; cf. Widmann 1957, 163 n. 2, 165. Some scholars recognise that Loofs succeeded in distinguishing a particular source IQT in Irenaeus, but they doubt that IQT was Theophilus's Adv. Marc. (see the references in Kretschmar 1956, 27 n. 3; cf. Widmann 1957). In this context it must be noted that it was not Loofs but Bousset who originally claimed that Adv. haer. IV.37–39 was an independent "treatise" that Irenaeus had taken over (Bousset 1915, 278; cf. Loofs 1930, 9, 24), and that this theory presumably is tenable in itself without necessarily implying that Adv. haer. IV.37–39 belongs to IQT or comes from Theophilus's Adv. Marc. However, Quispel's argument that Tertullian's Adv. Marc. II.5–6 and Irenaeus's Adv. haer. IV.37–39 have the same source only makes sense if Irenaeus's source originally attacked the Marcionites.—I myself believe that the theory that Irenaeus depended on Theophilus can still explain certain factors (see below pp. 230, 355–57).

⁸⁹ This possibility was suggested by Naumann (1934, 337–38; cf. Mühlenberg 1979, 106–7), who thought that the proof was formulated by Tertullian himself with the aim of both making the individual points in his opponents' argument clearer, and establishing a division of points that Tertullian himself could draw on in his refutation of these objections. Naumann stated that the philosophical proof must have been well-known to Tertullian from his rhetorical activity, and that Tertullian himself used the proof in a number of passages.—It is true that Tertullian often uses the Epicurean-Sceptical proof for his own purpose (thus in Adv. Marc. I.11,6–7; I.17,4; I.22; IV.41,1; V.29,4; Adv. Hermog. 10.2–3; cf. also Adv. Hermog. 14; 16; De carne Chr. III.1; Adv. Prax. 10.9; cf. Gronau 1922, 30 n. 1; Naumann 1934, 338 n. 3; Meijering 1977, 37–38). This usage is, of course, as Naumann assumed, yet more testimony to how widespread the original Epicurean proof was at the time, but it cannot determine whether the Marcionites also used it.—I do not think that the remark in Adv. Marc. II.5,1—that man is not just the Creator's "image and likeness" but actually His "substantia" by virtue of his possession of a soul—which is developed and refuted in II.9 has been inserted into the original proof by Tertullian. On the basis of Tertullian's De an. (3.4; 4; 11.2; 22.1–2; 24.2) Quispel (1943, 103) thought that Tertullian was in reality attacking Hermogenes; Waszink (1947, 7*–14*; see also 180–200), who has reconstructed Hermogenes's teaching on the soul, has moreover shown that Tertullian's response in Adv. Marc. II.9 directly refers to his lost writing against Hermogenes's De censu animae. I nevertheless believe that we are dealing with a Marcionite teaching in Adv. Marc. II.5 and II.9: thus as Waszink reconstructs Hermogenes's argument, this does not correspond to the teaching that Tertullian attributes to the Marcionites; in Tertullian's actual reproduction of the Marcionites' teaching in II.9,1 there is furthermore no question of $\pi\omega\eta$ (Gen. 2.7a) been convinced that the proof was used by the Marcionites. Further testimony in this direction is that other sources also attribute the same or kindred arguments to the Marcionites.⁹⁰ Irrespective of the point that there is no reason to assume that the Marcionites learned the argument directly by reading Epicurean or Sceptical literature, we must not in my opinion trivialise the importance of their employment of this widespread argument;⁹¹ it is still proof that they were not simply “radical Paulinists”, but that their horizon and assumptions being translated as spiritus; not until Tertullian’s response in what follows is this translation mentioned on which Hermogenes built.

⁹⁰ Jerome, Dial. contra Pelag. III,6 (PL 23, 603B) thus attributes to Marcion the same argument (cf. Von Harnack 1924, 274*); Von Harnack, who believed that Jerome is here building on Origen, claimed that most of Jerome’s information on Marcion comes from Origen and Tertullian (Von Harnack 1924, 274*, 393*; the belief that the information is generally from Origen and Tertullian Von Harnack has probably taken from Zahn 1892, 426–32). In this case Dial. contra Pelag. III,6 could well be Jerome’s free rendering of Adv. Marc. II.5,1–2 and IV.41,1. On the other hand Ephrem the Syrian’s Contra Marc. I, Mitchell 1921, 57.42–58.8 (transl. Mitchell 1921, XXVII) contains an independent source claiming that the Marcionites put the question: why did the Creator create, if He was one and knew that Adam would sin against him; also here the argument is on the basis of God’s foreknowledge.

⁹¹ Gager (1972, 54–55) believed that Marcion must have found the argument in Epicurus’s writings, which would confirm Tertullian’s claim that Marcion’s idea of the supreme Alien God, who did not (before Jesus’s arrival) intervene in the course of the world was inspired by Epicurus’s teaching that the gods exist in complete tranquillity and do not intervene in the course of the world. This claim appears in Adv. Marc. I.25,3; II.16,2–3; IV.15,2; V.19,7 (cf. also Irenaeus, Adv. haer. III.24,2); cf. more distantly Adv. Marc. I.27,1–2 (cf. Woltmann 1971, 36; Meijering 1977, 81); cf. also Jerome, In Es. VII,XVIII,1/3, Adriaen 1963, 274.51ff. In De praescr. haer. 7.3 and 30.1, however, Tertullian claims, as Meijering (1977, 76) points out, that the same Marcionite concept of God should come from Stoicism. It is Tertullian’s recurrent charge that the heretics have their doctrine from philosophy. Meijering 1977, 76 rightly remarks: “Tertullian bietet natürlich keine objektiv historische Genealogie der Lehre Marcions.” See also Meijering 1977, 75–78, 82–83, 129f.—Also Woltmann (1971, 32, 36–37) thinks that most of the central lines of thought in Marcion are due to Epicurean influence.

– Meijering (1977, 38, 75–76, 100) rightly refers to the fact that Epicurus’s argument was generally known, and that one could grasp the argument without in terms of content being influenced by Epicurus; rather was Marcion in philosophical terms an eclectic, according to Meijering. However, we must be aware that the Marcionite argument is used to deny that there is a Providence in this world. Seen in isolation, the use is in accordance with the original intention with the proof. It is thus testimony to the context into which Marcionism came into being.—A different point is that in the Marcionite (and in general the Christian) context(-s) the concept of “Providence” acquired other meanings than at any rate in philosophical systems such as Stoicism and Platonism: the problem had to do with a personal God’s foreknowledge, while the systems mentioned did not envisage a personal God, and therefore understood πρόνοια as a mechanism and not as God’s caring, saving were also determined by a widely-known concern with problems regarding God's foreknowledge and the presence of evil in the world.

Without doubt Marcionites set great store by their possession of this proof, which transferred a well-known and powerful argument to the Bible. Thus Marcion's highly independent disciple, Apelles, employed other versions of the proof which are also comparable with Contra Manichaeos III.7. This can be seen from some fragments that are preserved in Ambrose's De paradiso, and which probably come from Apelles's Συλλογισμοί; these show that Apelles used a dialectical method,⁹² and that his main interest was finding problems in the Scriptures. Apelles's overall solution to these was a theory that the majority of the OT was fables (for example, the story of Noah's ark), which came from the Angel of Fire who appeared to Moses and who was the God of the Jews, but that other parts of the OT came from other beings, including Christ.⁹³ It is unclear how Apelles regarded the Paradise narrative itself, but since he was considerably occupied with it, Von Harnack thought it most likely that he did not view it as pure fable.⁹⁴ If this is true, then the fragments in De paradiso ought to give us the outlines of Apelles's interpretation of the story.

power in the life of the individual; cf. Dörrie 1977, esp. 62–63, 87. Chrysippus, for instance, is said to have believed that Providence is God's will, and God's will the chain of cause and effect, ergo Providence and fate are only two words for the same thing (Theiler 1966, 56–57).

⁹² Probably the Συλλογισμοί were only concerned with the Pentateuch; in the fragment in De parad. 5,28, where Ambrose writes directly "quorum auctor Apelles" (Schenkl 1896, 284.18), he states that it comes from the 38th book (without doubt of the Συλλογισμοί); the work was thus very long, and even so the fragment only concerns the Tree of Life at the beginning of Gen.. Von Harnack has rendered it probable that seven other fragments in De parad. also come from Apelles (6,30; 6,31; 6,32; 7,35; 8,38; 8,40; 8,41). According to Von Harnack Ambrose was hardly in possession of Apelles's own writing; his source was doubtless Origen (Von Harnack 1890); on Von Harnack's research into Apelles see Von Harnack 1874; 1890; 1900; 1924, 177–96, 404*–20*.

⁹³ Von Harnack claimed that while Marcion did not doubt the truth of the OT but only whether the writings dealt with the supreme God, his pupil Apelles regarded the OT for the most part as a forgery, a collection of fables: most of it came from the Angel of Fire, but other parts were from the Creator (another angel) and yet further parts from Christ himself (Von Harnack 1924, 179, 189, 191–93); Waszink (1947, 300), however, believed that the Angel of Fire and the Creator were one and the same.—Ambrose also treats Apelles's objections as quaestiones, but of course gives a different "solution" to these problems. See further on the quaestiones-genre below pp. 253–54.

⁹⁴ Von Harnack 1924, 193 n. 1 (from 192).

The fragments in De paradiso 6,31 and 32 (esp. 6,31) presumably show that since the God of Gen. 3 is unjust, He is different from the just Creator of the world, in other words, He is an even lower being. But it is also possible that for the sake of the argument Apelles is presupposing the Catholic doctrine that only the Creator of the world is just. The fragment in De paradiso 8,41 does not determine the case; Apelles merely wishes to show that on the basis of the presence of evil in the world the God who allows it is not good. The fragment in De paradiso 7,35 proposes that the God of Gen. was the cause of death; after the humans had eaten of the Tree, this God must either have been so cruel that He would not forgive them, since He could, or so weak that He could not. Here it is uncertain which of the alternatives Apelles prefers,⁹⁵ but perhaps it was the ‘cruel God’ solution if it is otherwise true that he considered that Gen. dealt with a lower being than the Creator of the world. However, Apelles is here using the proof of Epicurus, though simply without including God’s foreknowledge; this he does on the other hand in De paradiso 8,38:

Another problem. Did God know that Adam would violate his commands? Or was He unaware of it? If He did not know, we are faced with a limitation of His divine power. If He knew, yet gave a command which He was aware would be ignored, it is not God’s Providence to give an unnecessary order. It was in the nature of a superfluous act to give Adam, the first created being, a command which He knew would not at all be observed. But God does nothing superfluous. Therefore, the words of Scripture do not come from God. This is the objection of those who do not, by interposing these questions, admit the authenticity of the Old Testament.⁹⁶

Apelles’s disjunction, which has to do with God’s foreknowledge in relation to the transgression, is completely the same as in Contra Manichaeos III.7; but the two texts do not draw the same conclusions

⁹⁵ Cf. Von Harnack (1924, 193 n. 1 [from 192]).

⁹⁶ Transl. by Savage 1985, 315. The original text in Schenkl 1896, 294.9–17: “Iterum quaestio: sciebat praeuaricaturum deus Adam mandata sua an nesciebat? Si nesciebat, non est ista diuinae potestatis adsertio, si autem sciebat et nihilominus sciens neglegenda mandauit, non est dei aliquid superfluum praecipere. superfluo autem praecepit primoplasto illi Adae quod eum nouerat minime seruaturum. nihil autem deus superfluo facit; ergo non est scriptura ex deo. hoc enim obiciunt qui uetus non recipiunt testamentum et has interserunt quaestiones.” Cf. Von Harnack 1890, 116–17; Von Harnack 1924, 415*–16*.

(although when Apelles says that it was superfluous to give the command at all if God knew beforehand that it would be violated he reaches the same conclusion as Contra Manichaeos III.7, which states that in that case the commandment was given in vain). Moreover, the fragment in De paradiso 8,40 also argues that since God either lacked foreknowledge or goodness, He was different from the good God, but the fragment seems to argue partly in relation to Gen. 1.26–27.⁹⁷

It is of interest to note that the fragment in De paradiso 5,28 could be interpreted to mean that Apelles believed that the Tree of Life, which had more power for giving life than the Creator's breath (Gen. 2.7), represented the highest God. The fragment in De paradiso 6,30 claims that it is not wrong if one refuses to obey a command that is not good. The Tree of Knowledge of good and evil was good, since God has this knowledge (Gen. 3.22), therefore the command was unjust. If the line of reason is not just to show that the Paradise narrative is inconsistent, this can mean that Apelles considered it a salvation event that man ate of the Tree. Correspondingly it may be one of the purposes of the fragment in De paradiso 7,35 that death does not come from the Tree of Knowledge, but from the God of Gen.. If these considerations are right, then Apelles's understanding of Gen. 2–3 has moved away from Marcion, but then again it is possible that Apelles merely wishes to demonstrate the single point that the prohibition was unjust.

The portrait in Contra Manichaeos III.7 of an ignorant Creator God in Gen. 2–3 also corresponds to that in a number of Nag Hammadi and heresiological texts that depict the ideas of similar groups; the ignorance is “proved”, however, on a different basis than with the Marcionites and in Contra Manichaeos III.7: it is not linked to the circumstance that the Creator should have known beforehand that His prohibition would be transgressed, but to other factors, and in particular to His ignorance that there is a higher God than Himself. Moreover God's question in Gen. 3.9, “Where are you?” is seen as proof of His ignorance—also incidentally among the Marcionites. Already in Jewish texts the question constituted a problem.⁹⁸ The ⁹⁷ Also the heretical question in Clement of Alexandria's Strom. VI.12 (96.1) (Stählin 1906, 480.6–9) is reminiscent of these disjunctions.

⁹⁸ Gen. 3.9 was thus a problem in several Jewish rabbinical texts (see the references in Pearson 1972, 468 n. 1) and in Philo's Quaest in Gen. I.45 and Leg. all.

Nag Hammadi-texts regard omniscience, or, as Testimonium veritatis puts it, knowledge of the future (πρόγνωσις), as a divine attribute, and it is therefore revealing that with this question the God of Gen. shows Himself to be ignorant. This ignorance is here linked to a little, isolated detail, and is thus not connected with the theodicy problem in the same way as the Marcionite arguments above, which emphasise God's ignorance of the catastrophe which decisively changed the living conditions of man.

When Contra Manichaeos III.7 claims, on the basis of Gen. 3, that God lacked foreknowledge, it is operating with concepts and ideas that have philosophical roots. The argument, however, is best mediated via the Marcionites; Contra Manichaeos III.7 diverges from the Marcionite version, which Tertullian among others knew, by taking the disobedience positively, but it is possible that already the Marcionite Apelles had moved in the same direction. The Marcionite influence on Contra Manichaeos III.7 could indicate that Titus's source was a text by Adda.

3.17 (51ff.). The verse was similarly a problem for the Catholic Christians, and it does not always have to be raised by non-Catholics, see for example Justin Martyr's Dial. XCIX; cf. also Origen, De orat. XXIII.3 (Koetschau 1899, 352.5–6). On the other hand Theophilus in Ad Autol. II.26 (Grant 1970, 68) is without doubt polemicalising against a heresy that could be the Marcionite. At least Tertullian claims in Adv. Marc. II.25,1–3 and IV.20,8 that the Marcionites used Gen. 3.9 to show the Creator God's ignorance, but Tertullian rejects this interpretation of the question and presents another (cf. De ieiun. 6.7) (cf. Von Harnack 1924, 89, 269*–70*; Quispel 1943, 41–42; Meijering 1977, 151). The assumption that the Marcionites used Gen. 3.9 in this way seems to be confirmed by how Dial. Adamant. I.17 (815c), Bakhuyzen 1901, 36.13–14 also has the Marcionite Megethius using it (cf. Von Harnack 1924, 269*). Also in the Nag Hammadi tractates Test. ver. 47.19ff.; Hyp. Arch. 10 (90.19–21) and De or. mund. 105 (119.26–27) Gen. 3.9 witnesses to the Creator's ignorance. According to De or. mund. 105 (119.29–30) the question in Gen. 3.11 is also asked "in ignorance" (ἐν ὀλιγογνωσίᾳ); Test. ver. concludes from 3.9 that the Creator did not have πρόγνωσις, "foreknowledge" (cf. also Williams 1996, 71, 280 n. 69 on the problems with the interpretation of Gen. 3.9).—Cf. here Pseudo-Clement, Hom. III.38,2, where Simon Magus calls the Creator ἀπρόγνωστος (Rehm 1953, 70.24) and claims that there is an other, good God, who is προγνωστικός (Rehm 1953, 70.27) (cf. III.39) (cf. Pearson 1981, 164 n. to Test. ver. 47.21).—When Didymus the Blind's In Gen. 90.9–91.11 (Nautin 1976, 210, 212) deals with a reinterpretation of Gen. 3.9 (cf. Hammond Bammel 1989, 75), it is reasonable to assume that in fact he is polemicalising against an exegesis that from the question inferred the Creator's ignorance, though this is not said directly. See above p. 136 concerning Eusebius of Emesa.

d. The philosophical and Gnostic background for the idea of the Creator's φθόνος

In Contra Manichaeos III.7,9 Titus refers to his source as claiming that the Creator was “envious” or “jealous” (φθονερός), when He banished man from the Tree of Life and Paradise. However, in III.27,8, where Titus sets out to refute this charge, he does not employ the term φθονερός, but βασκανία, which can mean malice, witchcraft and “the evil eye”, though it is also close to φθονερία in meaning.⁹⁹ But to translate φθονερός as “envious” is problematic. W.C. van Unnik has devoted some study to the meaning of the term φθόνος¹⁰⁰ and has pointed out that it could be used in two ways: 1) About a feeling of dislike for another person, when one covets what the other has that one lacks. 2) About a feeling for someone who lacks what one has; this feeling involves not sharing one’s material or spiritual possessions with him. The direction and effect of φθόνος may therefore be completely different.¹⁰¹ It is unproblematic to render the first meaning with the term “envy”, insofar as “envy” precisely designates the “feeling of disappointment and ill will (at another’s better fortune)”;¹⁰² but dictionaries do not mention a meaning of “envy” which corresponds to the second of the meanings that Van Unnik points out; in turn this meaning can almost be covered by the term “jealousy”.¹⁰³ Notwithstanding that the translation “envy” contains advantages by virtue of its etymology and tradition,¹⁰⁴ it is of some significance in the present work to distinguish between the two meanings, and here therefore I will only use “envy” (and the corresponding verbs ⁹⁹ See Liddell, Scott and Jones 1968, 310ab, 1929b–1930a. Cf. also Beyschlag 1966, 300–1.

¹⁰⁰ Van Unnik 1971; 1972; 1973.

¹⁰¹ Van Unnik 1971, 12–13; Van Unnik 1972, 122. Cf. Ranulf 1933, 67–68.

¹⁰² Hornby 1974, 292.—Cf. the Oxford English Dictionary; V, 316–17, which acknowledges broader senses of “envy”, but regards them as out of date.

¹⁰³ The Oxford English Dictionary; VIII, 206–7 gives the meanings thus (207): “[s]olicitude or anxiety for the preparation or well-being of something; vigilance in guarding a possession from loss or damage.” . . . “The state of mind arising from the suspicion, apprehension, or knowledge of rivalry” . . . “in respect of success or advantage: Fear of losing some good through the rivalry of another”. As far as I can see, this meaning could also be covered by “avarice”, since the Oxford English Dictionary; I, 814 mentions the sense figuratively: “[e]ager desire to get or keep for oneself”.

¹⁰⁴ “Envy” comes from the Latin invidia, which in classical Latin texts is also used to render the evil-minded feeling of grudging others what oneself possesses. “Envy” is also used to translate this sense of φθόνος, e.g. in Bury’s (1929, 55) translation of Plato, Tim. 29e, and corresponding verbs and substantives are used in Giversen and Pearson’s above-quoted translation of Test. ver. 47.13–48.15.

and adjectives etc.) about the inimical feeling against those who possess what one lacks, while “jealousy” (and the corresponding adjectives etc.) will be employed for the inimical feeling against those who want what one has and is unwilling to share. In the Manichaean interpretation of Gen. 3.22 in Contra Manichaeos III.7 the term “jealous” must therefore be used, for the idea is not that God envies man anything that He Himself lacks but on the contrary, that He begrudges man something that He Himself possesses. For the term “jealousy” can be supplemented by “grudge” and “begrudge”, which also contain the intended meaning.¹⁰⁵ One objection to this translation method is admittedly that “jealous” is also used to translate the Latin-Greek zelus/ζήλος, whence the word originates etymologically, but in the present context this problem can be solved simply by mentioning the Greek term ζήλος in the contexts where it is the subject under discussion.

It is well-known that writers in Ancient Greece such as Herodotus and Sophocles entertained the idea that the gods intervened negatively if a man was gaining some happiness or success that momentarily raised him above his mortal status; in such situations the writers use the terms φθονέω and φθόνος. Classical philologists, however, seem to disagree on the extent to which this meant that the gods were animated by hateful, irrational feelings.¹⁰⁶ Within certain areas of the Greek philosophical tradition this idea under all circumstances was interpreted to mean that the gods were unjust, and the idea was therefore rejected, as in Plato (φθόνος γὰρ ἕξω θείου χοροῦ ἵσταται, Phaedrus 247a; ἄνευ φθόνου, Epinomis 988b5; ἀγαθὸς ἦν, ἀγαθῷ δὲ οὐδεὶς περὶ οὐδενὸς οὐδέποτε ἐγγίγνεται φθόνος, Timaeus 29e). Plato linked this motive both to the creation of the world and to the acquisition of knowledge.

For Plato, God was identical with the Idea of the Good, and “goodness” excludes φθόνος, as he explains in Timaeus 29e, where he introduces a theodicy: the Demiurge was good and without φθόνος and therefore created the world as good as was possible. Φθόνος

¹⁰⁵ The Oxford English Dictionary; VI, 901: “grudge . . . trans. To be unwilling to give, grant, or allow (something); to begrudge.”

¹⁰⁶ Snell 1928, 72 n. 108; Ranulf 1933 and 1934; Webster 1933 and 1934; Picard 1935; Pohlenz 1937, 110–11; Dodds 1951, 28–31, 41, 44, 50–52, 62 (108), 221; Cornford 1957, 118–19; Nilsson 1967, 734–40; Lloyd-Jones 1971, 3–4, 53–54, 68–71. Cf. also Schoeck 1966.

would have meant that the Demiurge did not wish to create a good world. Goodness without φθόνος meant without reservation to create a good world, even though it was not completely possible, which is not the fault of the Demiurge; his Creation consisted of stamping the “receptacle” (Timaeus 51a) which Aristotle already identified with “matter” (De caelo III,8 [306b18–19]) with order, which is only partly possible.—In Phaedrus 247a and Epinomis 988b5 the idea is that the deity will not maintain a barrier between Himself and man by withholding his divine knowledge. This concept of God’s teaching and upbringing also means that the old idea of the punishment of the gods acquires a new content: the gods punish not to revenge but to improve (De republica II,379–380).¹⁰⁷

Epicurus’s denial of the existence of a divine Providence is undoubtedly directed against Plato, among others, but also his concept of God implies that the divinity is not invidus, a term which as mentioned is equivalent to φθονερός and βάσκανος.¹⁰⁸

There is perhaps a genuine similarity between the Greek idea of the gods’ φθόνος, which Plato had rejected, and Gen. 3.4–5.22. Gen. 3.22 can be read to mean that Yahweh begrudges man eternal life, and if one sees it in this way, Yahweh’s prohibition against eating in Gen. 2.17 has the same cause, for in Gen. 3.22 He indeed says that because the command has been violated, so that man has become like the gods, He will expel him from the Tree of Life. Thus Yahweh confirms the serpent’s claim in Gen. 3.5 that the prohibition was issued in order to prevent man from becoming like God.¹⁰⁹ This real ¹⁰⁷ Milobenski 1964, 21–27; Dörrie 1976, 516–17; Runia 1986, 137, 139; cf. also Koch 1932, 180–201.—Aristotle himself refers thus to his teacher when in Met. I,2,12–14 (982b28–983a5) he explains that it is not “presumption” if man occupies himself with knowledge of the first, divine principles; the poets are lying when they say that the deity is φθονερός, which is impossible (ἀλλ’ οὔτε τὸ θεῖον φθονερόν ἐνδέχεται εἶναι, ἀλλὰ καὶ κατὰ τὴν παροιμίαν πολλὰ ψεύδοντα αἰοῖσι). Cf. Milobenski 1964, 22–23; Johansen 1991, 429.

¹⁰⁸ The fragment of Epicurus in Lactantius, De ira Dei 13,20–21 (see above n. 84) denies that the deity is invidus; corresponding to Tim. 29e invidus here means that the deity can remove evil, but will not do so; the term βάσκανος is used in the same way in the passage in Sextus Empiricus (Hyp. III.9–11) (see above n. 84). Cf. Milobenski 1964, 25 n. 16. Meijering (1975, 35 n. 22) thinks that Epicurus’s argument in Lactantius, De ira Dei should be seen in the context of Plato’s sentence in Tim. 29e that the Demiurge was good and without φθόνος.—Epicurus’s gods were without φθόνος, because φθόνος is a painful passion (Milobenski 1964, 97–105).

¹⁰⁹ Yahweh’s refusal to let man come up to the level of the gods (cf. also Gen. 11.4–7), is, according to Gunkel (1977, 17), the same idea that was widespread in ancient Greece.

similarity between Gen. 3.4–5.22 and the Greek idea of the gods' $\phi\theta\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma$ may have seemed striking to Alexandrian Jews in the 1st century CE. At any rate in Quaestiones in Genesim I.55 (to Gen. 3.22) Philo raised the question among others of how the word of God in Gen. 3.22 is to be understood, when there is no $\phi\theta\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma$ in God; here Philo is clearly alluding to Phaedrus 247a and Timaeus 29e. In line with Timaeus 29e, 30a Philo's preliminary answer consists of a denial that God should participate in evil, or that He should begrudge immortality to the good man; a clear sign of this is that as a benefactor He created the world by ordering the disordered and passive matter. The real answer, however, is that so long as man stayed away from evil, he could enjoy what leads on to piety or immortality, but when he began to turn towards evil, he did not gain immortality, for it is not fitting to immortalise evil, nor is it beneficial to the wicked man, for the longer he lives, the more wicked he becomes, and the more harm he does to himself and others.¹¹⁰ It is possible that Philo has not reckoned that man literally had dwelt in a Garden of Eden, but the answer may also be read to mean that man could have gained immortality in the garden, just as it explains God's motive when He expelled man from it. The question of why God allowed man to turn to evil is not raised directly, but we are perhaps to think that the soul in accordance with Platonic doctrines occupies an intermediate position between matter and higher things, and that it can move in either direction of its own accord.

Philo only touched on the question of God's $\phi\theta\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma$ in connection with the expulsion from the Tree of Life, but Jewish texts also exist in which the Devil claims that God's motive in forbidding man to eat of the Tree of Knowledge was $\phi\theta\omicron\nu\epsilon\rho\acute{\iota}\alpha$ or $\beta\alpha\sigma\kappa\alpha\nu\acute{\iota}\alpha$.¹¹¹ Van ¹¹⁰ Marcus 1953, 32–34; Mercier 1979, 122–27; Petit 1978, 53–55 (cf. Runia 1986, 136, 139, 146; Alexandre 1988, 331).—Philo often mentions that God is without $\phi\theta\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma$, but only here in relation to the Paradise narrative. Alluding to Tim. 29e he stresses in Quod Deus sit immutabilis 23 (107–8); De op. mund. 5 (21–22), 25 (77); De plant. 21 (91) that God is without $\phi\theta\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma$, and that His goodness is the cause of the creation. In De spec. leg. 2.45 (249) and Quod omnis probus liber sit 2 (13) he quotes Phaedr. 247a. Also in De Abr. 36 (203–4); Leg. all. 1.26 (80) and 3.72 (203) Philo states that God is without $\phi\theta\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma$. See also Runia 1986, 131–40 with further references; cf. also Van Unnik 1973, 40–45; Williams 1996, 70–72, 280 n. 73.—Incidentally the idea of God's $\acute{\alpha}\phi\theta\omicron\nu\acute{\iota}\alpha$ is to be found in different passages in Josephus, see Van Unnik 1971, 33f.; Van Unnik 1973, 45.

¹¹¹ Thus Vita Ad. et Ev.; Apoc. Mos. 18,4 = Armenian version I.18, the fundamental part of which is regarded as Jewish and is perhaps from the first half of Unnik showed how widespread was the idea in the Hellenistic world (and particularly in the 2nd century CE) that certain persons “out of φθόνος” withheld their awareness of secret knowledge from others.¹¹² He therefore believes that the use of the φθόνος-motif in Gen. 3 arose on Greek soil, perhaps in a diaspora community, as he knows of no such similar use in the Hebraic or Aramaic linguistic area.¹¹³ This sounds reasonable, but in that case it is also natural to understand the charge against God of acting out of φθόνος on the basis of the philosophical discussion of God’s φθόνος. Jewish groups had been influenced by a philosophical image of God that had affinity with the problems of theodicy.

In some of the Nag Hammadi texts this problem of the Paradise narrative being read in the light of philosophical ideas about the nature of God is solved by positing that the Creator’s φθόνος in Gen. 2–3 means that He cannot be the highest God. In Testimonium veritatis it is both the prohibition against eating of the Tree of Knowledge and the expulsion from the Tree of Life that are due to φθόνος. In 47.15–16 the author remarks that with His prohibition the Creator has demonstrated that He is jealous (ἀ[ϰ]||ῤ̄φθονῆ) of Adam, and in 47.29–30 he notes that the Creator in Gen. 3.22 proved Himself “a jealous begrudger” (ΟΥΒΑΣΚΑΝΟΣ . . . ἸΡΕϰΦΘΟΝΕΙ). In De origine mundi and Hypostasis Archontion φθόνος is only used in connection with the prohibition; in De origine mundi 103 (119.5) and Hypostasis Archontion 9 (90.8) the “beast” (ΠΘΗΡΙΟΝ, De origine mundi 103 [118.26]; the text’s designation for the serpent) and the serpent respectively explain the 1st cent. CE (L.S.A. Wells in Charles 1964, 126–27; Van Unnik 1972, 126). Thus in Apoc. Mosis 18,4 we read: τοῦτο δὲ γινώσκων ὁ θεός, ὅτι ἔσεσθε ὅμοιοι αὐτοῦ, ἐφθόνησεν ὑμῖν καὶ εἶπεν· οὐ φάγεσθε ἐξ αὐτοῦ (Von Tischendorf 1966, 10; transl. [Wells] in Charles 1964, 146); the Armenian version I.18: “Gott weiss, dass, wenn ihr davon esset, ihr sein werdet, wie Gott, zu erkennen das Gute und das Böse. Und indem er eifersüchtig war auf euch, darum gab er euch nicht die Erlaubnis, von diesem zu essen.” (transl. Preuschen 1900, 13) (cf. Van Unnik 1972, 126–27). In the late book Pirke Rabbi Eliezer 13 from the 9th cent. the serpent claims that the prohibition against eating of the Tree of Knowledge is due to הַעַיִן הַרְעָה, “the evil eye” (Luria 1852, 32b; transl. Friedlander 1965, 94; Strack and Billerbeck 1974, 138), cf. Van Unnik 1972, 127 n. 1; Pearson 1972, 468 n. 5. Pearson (1972, 468) points out that הַעַיִן הַרְעָה is the equivalent of βάσκανος; cf. that βασκαίνω etc. in Greek means to bewitch with the evil eye etc., see Liddell, Scott and Jones 1968, 310ab.

¹¹² Van Unnik 1971.

¹¹³ Van Unnik 1972, 127. Pearson (1972, 468) seems to have a different view, but I cannot see why the late text Pirke Rabbi Eliezer 13 does not just reflect a Greek idea.

that the prohibition was issued because God or the highest archon was jealous (ἐκ πρῆθοῦσι). Finally, Simon Magus claims in Pseudo-Clement's Homiliae III.39,3 that Gen. 3.22 shows the Creator God was jealous (φθονεῖ).¹¹⁴

There are two orthodox texts from the 2nd century CE that are linked to this material; Theophilus's Ad Autolyicum II.25 rejects the opinion of some that God's prohibition against eating of the Tree of Knowledge was due to φθόνος, and in Adversus haereses III.23,6 Irenaeus rejects the view of others that God banished Adam from the Tree of Life because He begrudged (inuidens) him it.¹¹⁵ When Loofs and Van Unnik see no direct connection between these two texts because they refer to two different trees,¹¹⁶ they are probably right in the sense that Ad Autolyicum II.25 was hardly the source behind Adversus haereses III.23,6, but if one merely sees the similarity between the two texts as evidence that Irenaeus was dependent on a different, now lost, text by Theophilus, then the similarity is rather important, for it is clear that if one interprets the serpent's words in Gen. 3.5 to mean that the Creator issued the prohibition out of φθόνος, then Gen. 3.22 must be interpreted as the Creator's own confirmation that the serpent was right, and at the same time Gen. 3.22 must mean that from the same motive the Creator will now prevent man's access to the Tree of Life. By virtue of Gen. 3.22 everyone who attributes φθόνος to God in connection with the one tree must also do so in connection with the other tree.

It is therefore also untenable of Van Unnik to derive only the idea that out of φθόνος God forbade man to eat of the Tree of Knowledge from the contemporary idea that some "out of φθόνος" could withhold awareness of secret knowledge from others. It is not just a matter of jealousy of knowledge, but also of jealousy over eternal life. The φθόνος motif in these texts is concerned with the right ¹¹⁴ Rehm 1953, 71.12. Drijvers 1978, 48 thinks that "Simon Magus" here presents Marcionite views.

¹¹⁵ Much later Didymus the Blind's In Gen. (probably with Origen as his source?) claims that according to the Ophites the prohibition against eating of the Tree of Knowledge was because God was jealous; see further below p. 235.

¹¹⁶ Theophilus's Ad Autol. II.25: Grant 1970, 66.—Loofs 1930, 70–71 (71: "Denn es handelt sich . . . bei Irenaeus und Theophilus um ganz verschiedene Dinge: hier um das Verbot des Essens vom Baume der Erkenntnis, dort um die Vertreibung aus der Nähe des Baumes des Lebens"; Hitchcock [1937, 139] appears to have overlooked this remark [his reference to Loofs 1930, 69 nr. 8 is also an error]).—Van Unnik 1972, 126.

understanding of God; the true God must be without jealousy in every respect.

To acquire a more detailed impression of the portrayal in the Nag Hammadi texts of the inferior Creator it might be useful to include two other motifs. For in the first place the Nag Hammadi texts ascribe φθόνος to the Creator not only in the sense that He will not share what He possesses, but also in the sense that He bears a feeling of hatred against those who possess what He lacks, in other words the feeling of envy. This “φθόνος-motif” must, as Van Unnik has rightly seen, have a different origin from the first, since the direction and effect of φθόνος are quite different.¹¹⁷ We find the motif of envy, for instance, in De origine mundi 6 (99.2–11), where the Shadow envies (κωζ) what is mightier than itself, and thereby engenders Envy (πκωζ). Similarly, in De origine mundi 28 (104.13–15), where “all the authorities of chaos” envy (κωζ) Sabaoth because of his light, and in De origine mundi 36 (106.19–24), where Yaldabaoth envies (κωζ) Sabaoth and engenders Death (πκωζ is again in De origine mundi 37 [106.30] begotten by Death). Likewise in Hypostasis Archontion 30 (96.3–8) where Yaldabaoth envies (κωζ) Sabaoth, which becomes the beginning of Envy (πκωζ), which engenders Death.¹¹⁸ The last two passages show that we are dealing here with the Jewish idea of the Devil’s φθόνος which has been transferred to the Creator:¹¹⁹ the Devil envied man his gifts from God, and as a serpent he therefore tempted him, whereby death came into being;¹²⁰—in continuation of the same

Moreover Von Harnack (1924, 271*) and Drijvers (1978, 47–48) thought that the remarks in Irenaeus’s Adv. haer. III.23,6 and Theophilus’s Ad Autol. II.25 were aimed at Marcion, but Van Unnik’s (1972, 125–26) reservation, because terms such as φθόνος are not used in accounts of the Marcionites, is here well-founded.

¹¹⁷ Van Unnik 1972.

¹¹⁸ Van Unnik 1972, 123–24.

¹¹⁹ Van Unnik 1972, 128. Thus also Beyschlag (1966, 48–67, 98–100, 299–303; 1974, 147) and Pearson (1972, 468; 1981, 163), who, however, does not distinguish between the two φθόνος-motifs and therefore also finds the entire origin of the idea of the Creator’s φθόνος in the idea of the Devil’s “envy”; this, however, is not tenable. Beyschlag is sharply criticised in Van Unnik 1972, 131; cf. Beyschlag’s response (1974, 146–47 with n. 35).

¹²⁰ Thus Wis. 2.24; see further references to Josephus and to Jewish apocrypha and rabbinical texts in Beyschlag 1966, 48–52; Pearson 1972, 468; Van Unnik 1972, 128–32; Kronholm 1978, 91–92 n. 19.

Insofar as banishment from the Tree of Life means that man is refused eternal life, and some of the Gnostic groups believed that this was due to φθόνος, it was natural that the two motifs were coupled together: the Creator envies man and brings about death through jealously withholding the Tree of Life. However, the Jewish idea the orthodox Christians' texts also claim that the Devil envied and tempted man.¹²¹

Secondly, the Nag Hammadi texts also ascribe to the Creator the quality of being "jealous", ζήλος, on the basis of Ex. 20.5 (θεὸς ζηλωτής), 34.14; Deut. 4.24; Nah. 1.2 (cf. Is. 45.5–6.22, 46.9, where ζηλωτής is not used); in the Nag Hammadi texts this "jealousy" is an expression for the Creator God's overweening pride and ignorance. The heresiologists also testify that both Gnostic groups and Marcionites used Ex. 20.5 in this way.¹²² According to Van Unnik ζήλος is different from φθόνος, although they are often connected. Ζήλος is a vox media and can be both a virtue and a vice, while φθόνος is always a vice. The Creator God's boast has to do with rivalry, not envy.¹²³ Although Van Unnik is doubtless right that there is a slight difference of meaning between ζήλος and φθόνος, we must be aware that several Nag Hammadi texts translate the two words with the same Coptic word, κωϩ, and that Emperor Julian juxtaposed source material does not couple the two together in this way, which seems to confirm Van Unnik's view (when De or. mund. 109 [120.15–16], in connection with the archons realising that by eating of the Tree of Knowledge Adam is more powerful than them, speaks of "a great envy" [ΟΥΓΗΟΣ ΠΚΩϩ] that was brought into the world solely because of immortal man, it is natural to link this to the fact that in 111–112 [120.24–121.13] they banish man from the Tree of Life; it is stated there, however, that their motive is fear. In De or. mund. 113 [121.13–15] the archons envied Adam and wished to lessen his lifespan; this, however, is after the banishment).

¹²¹ Concerning patristic literature one could simply write passim, but as examples mention may be made of Irenaeus, Dem. 16; Adv. haer. V.24,4; Origen, In Rom. VI.6.36f. (Hammond Bammel 1997, 481); Methodius, De autex. XVII,4–5, Bonwetsch 1917, 190.11–15; John Chrysostom, Hom. in Gen. XVI,2–4 (PG 53, 127, 129–130). Also 1 Clem. 3.4; Theophilus, Ad Autol. II.29 (Grant 1970, 72) has death being instituted through envy, but they state that it came about when Cain murdered Abel (cf. Beyschlag 1966, 48–67; Theophilus, but not Clement, mentions the Devil here).—In Contra Manich. III.10–29 Titus does not mention that the serpent's/Devil's motive for tempting man was "envy", but he refers (III.29,8) to the fact that he will later present a precise account of the Devil; in this account he also mentions the Devil's envy (ⲕⲱⲩⲱ) against mankind (IV.60–61; Sy 159.9.13.16.18), though without referring directly to Gen. 2–3 (cf. above p. 57).

¹²² E.g. in Hyp. Arch. 23 (94.21–22); 26 (95.4–5) (Yaldabaoth; here, however, there is no question of "jealousy"; Test. ver. 48.5 (ⲣⲉϩⲕⲱϩ); Apocr. Joh. (short version: BG 44.14–15, cf. 44.18 [Yaldabaoth Saklas; ⲣⲉϩⲕⲱϩ]; long version: II 13.8–9, cf. 13.13 and IV 20.22–24, cf. 20.29 [Yaltabaoth; ⲣⲉϩⲕⲱϩ] [Waldstein and Wisse 1995, 78–79; synopsis 34.6–7, cf. 34.12]); Tract. Magni Sethi II 64.18–23 (the Archon; ⲣⲉϩⲕⲱϩ); Irenaeus Adv. haer. I.29,4; Tertullian Adv. Marc. II.26,1; IV.27,8 ("zelotes"; cf. May 1987–88, 146 n. 66, who criticises Mühlberg 1979). Cf. more distantly Irenaeus Adv. haer. I.30,7 "Zelantem autem Ialdabaoth" (Rousseau and Doutreleau 1979, 372; cf. Van Unnik 1972, 125).

¹²³ Van Unnik 1972, 124–25.

poses the terms φθονερός and βάσκανος with ζηλοτυπέω and juxtaposes ζηλωτής καὶ βάσκανος.¹²⁴

Van Unnik has demonstrated that the two different forms of φθόνος as well as ζήλος each have a different origin. He therefore splits them, and in so doing loses the context, which is quite indefensible, because it is the same figure, the Creator God, to whom the same texts ascribe φθόνος as “jealousy”, φθόνος as “envy” and ζήλος. In the interpretation the immediate context of the concepts should rank above their origin. The three attributes express the Creator’s inferiority and pettiness, both in relation to man and to the higher powers, thereby presenting an image of an incomplete being who is controlled by his passions, by πάθη.¹²⁵ Moreover, the inferior Creator of the Gnostic and Marcionite texts also has His positive counterpart in their supreme God, who in some testimonies is also singled out for His ἀφθονία.¹²⁶

It is the same inferior Creator that we meet in Contra Manichaeos III.7. On the background of the parallels that we have now examined, we can add that it is of less importance that Contra Manichaeos III.7 explicitly only links the banishment from the Tree of Life with the φθόνος-motif: since the prohibition against acquiring knowledge was a plot (ἐπιβουλή) against man, this probably implies that the motive in this context was also φθόνος.

¹²⁴ On Nag Hammadi see previously p. 231, and on Emperor Julian see below p. 250.

Cf. also Irenaeus Adv. haer. IV.40,3 “Ex tunc enim apostata est angelus hic et inimicus, ex quo zelavit plasma Dei” = “Ἐκτοτε γὰρ ἀποστάτης ὁ ἄγγελος οὗτος καὶ ἐχθρός, ἀφ’ ὅτε ἐζήλωσε τὸ πλάσμα τοῦ Θεοῦ (Rousseau 1965, 978, 980), which Van Unnik 1972, 125 also quotes himself. The reference here is clearly enough to the aforementioned tradition on the Devil’s φθόνος.—Augustine’s attempt to distinguish between different meanings of the term “zelus” is also of interest here (Contra Faust. XXII.18 [Zycha 1891, 606.10–607.19] and 21 [Zycha 1891, 610.26–611.2]).

¹²⁵ On this point Beyschlag (1974, 147) is right: φθόνος is a “Grundzug des Unvollkommenen, Mangelhaften, Unruhigen gegenüber der wahren göttlichen Vollkommenheit, Ruhe und Güte”. But this contrast must be understood on the background of Greek philosophy.

¹²⁶ Thus in Valentinian texts (Ev. ver. 18.36–40 [NHC I,3]; Tract. trip. 62.20, 70.26 [NHC I,5] [cf. Van Unnik 1973, 16–19]), among the Marcionites (Van Unnik 1973, 21 n. 75 refers to the fact that on the subject of Marcion’s “good God” Pseudo-Tertullian, Carm. adv. Marc. I.84 states: “Sed parci cunctis, uitam non inuidet ulli.” [Willems 1954, 1423]) and among the Archontics (Epiphanius, Haer. 40.4,8 [Holl 1922, 85.10]).

e. The positive evaluation of man's acquisition of knowledge in Gnostic texts

Since the prohibition against eating of the Tree of Knowledge is derived in many texts from the inferior Creator's φθόνος, it is not merely because features in the Paradise narrative make such an interpretation natural, but first and foremost because ideas of God at the time had been influenced by Plato's denial that God would withhold any knowledge from man. This does not mean that the writers had read Plato or were philosophers, but that ideas with roots in philosophy had spread beyond their original context and had become generally accepted. It was therefore natural for the authors to evaluate the eating of the Tree of Knowledge positively, and this feature they employed in their polemic against the traditional Judaeo-Christian Creator God.

According to Nagel the positive revaluation of the Tree of Knowledge is the one constant that unites the aggressive-polemical texts (for example Testimonium veritatis 47.17–18; De origine mundi 91 [116.28–29]; 103–4 [118.24–119.19]; Hypostasis Archonton 9 [89.31–90.19]; Apocryphon Johannis [the short version: III 28.6–9 and BG 57.8–12; the long version: II 22.3–5, and IV 34.5–8]).¹²⁷ Nagel makes this revaluation central, and it cannot be denied either that as a consequence of it a whole range of other figures and factors in the narrative must also be revalued so that those texts which undergo this revaluation possess a markedly common stamp.

Contra Manichaeos III.7 also belongs among them, for although the text does not directly mention the Tree of Knowledge by name, it is indisputably the tree in question, and the transgression also leads to the benefit that man gets to know good and evil and becomes seeing. Because the serpent mediates knowledge, that too is also positively revalued.

Nagel points out that although all the texts that evaluate the Tree of Knowledge positively need a figure that performs the task which the serpent has in Gen. 3, valuation of the serpent varies. In Testimonium veritatis 45.23–49.28 the serpent is the one who brings the redeeming knowledge (45.31–46.9) and is identified with Christ (49.6–10); also in Hypostasis Archonton 9 (89.31–32; 90.6) the serpent is the bringer of redeeming knowledge. From heresiological literature testimony to this high evaluation of the serpent as the one who procures for man the crucial knowledge is to be found among others in Irenaeus, Adversus haereses I.30,5 and 7 and 15, in Hippolytus, Refutatio V.16–17, in Pseudo-Tertullian, Adversus omnes haereses III.1 and in Epiphanius's Panarion 37.¹²⁸ Other Nag Hammadi tractates admittedly regard whoever made Adam and Eve eat of the tree as a mediator of redeeming knowledge, but show antipathy towards concluding that this mediator was a “serpent”; this is perhaps the case in De origine mundi 103 (118.24–26), which does not speak directly of “the serpent”, but of “the beast”,¹²⁹ and it is certainly the case in Apocryphon Johannis (short version: III 28.16–23, 30.14–22 and BG 57.20–58.7, 60.16–61.7; long version: II 22.9–15, 23.26–35 and IV 34.15–21, 36.20–37.4), which claims that what was said by the serpent according to Gen. was in reality said by Christ. The serpent was an instrument for Yaldabaoth, and therefore Christ made use of an eagle when he approached the human couple to make them eat of the Tree of Knowledge.¹³⁰ These texts give a positive valuation of the serpent's function in Gen. 3, but since for the authors of the texts “serpents” are symbols of evil, they must gloss over or deny that the beast was a serpent.

¹²⁷ Waldstein and Wisse 1995, 126–27: synopsis 58.5–7.

In Quaestiones in Genesim I.39 Philo rejected the idea that in Gen. 3.7 Adam and Eve were physically blind; since all the animals and plants were created perfect, it is not credible, according to him, that man alone should have lacked one of the body's superior parts such as the eyes, and when Adam gave the animals names in Gen. 2.19–20, we must suppose that he could see them. Instead Philo suggests that ὁφθαλμοί refers to the vision of the soul through which alone are perceived all good and bad, noble and shameful things, and all ¹²⁸ Holl 1922, 50.15–62.14.—Didymus the Blind's In Gen. can also be included here, even though it is not a heresiological work. In Gen. 81.4ff. (on Gen. 3.1–5) claims that every heresy that is called “Ophitic”, has its origin in the wrong interpretation of God's prohibition, which claims that the prohibition did not seek to prevent the first people from being harmed, but rather to prevent them from becoming gods. This interpretation was introduced by the Devil, who maintained that through his prohibition God was φθονερός. Didymus also notes that such heretics claim that God wanted man to live in evil, since whoever does not know good and evil commits evil deeds, and that the heretics honour the serpent, because it taught people the good things (Nautin 1976, 188) (cf. also In Gen. 82.12–14 [Nautin 1976, 192]: the Devil deceived the woman into assuming the φθόνοϛ of God).

¹²⁹ Cf. above p. 229. In this text there is probably an Aramaic wordplay at work: Eve (ܩܝܝܢܐ)—teach (ܣܘܦܝܢܐ)—live (ܣܘܦܝܢܐ)—beast (ܣܘܦܝܢܐ)—teacher (ܣܘܦܝܢܐ)—serpent (ܣܘܦܝܢܐ); see Böhlig and Labib 1962, 73–74, notes.

¹³⁰ Waldstein and Wisse 1995, 126–29, 134–37: synopsis 58.15–59.2, 62.13–63.2.

opposites. There is also, however, an irrational eye that is called opinion (δόξα). In Quaestiones in Genesim I.40 Philo makes it clear that it was precisely this δόξα, the beginning of evil, that was opened, so that the mind conceived the world as alien. Thus at one and the same time Philo is able to spiritualise the eyes that were opened, and to insist that if God's prohibition was violated, the consequences could only be negative.¹³¹ Some of the Nag Hammadi texts also claim that the eyes which were opened were the soul's, but in contrast to Philo they do not believe that it was a lower cognitive ability that was opened. Thus in Testimonium veritatis 46.7–8 the expression $\overline{\text{NBA}} \overline{\text{NPE}} \overline{\text{T}} \overline{\text{N}} \overline{\text{ZHT}}$ is used,¹³² cf. also 46.12–13; in De origine mundi 103 (118.34–119.1) and 104 (119.11–13) it is νοῦς that is opened, cf. also Hypostasis Archontion 9 (90.8–10).

As is also clear from these varying valuations of the serpent, the Gnostic texts have not aimed at a consistent revaluation of all the elements in the Paradise narrative. They concentrate on the Creator, and here the problem of the idea that it should be the true God that hindered the acquisition of knowledge is of particular significance for them. That not all the elements are revalued is also clear from the fact that only in a single case is the positive revaluation of the Tree of Knowledge countered by a negative revaluation of the Tree of Life. In Testimonium veritatis, for instance, the Creator has the same motive, φθόνος, for preventing man from eating of the Trees of Knowledge and Life, but the text fails to explain the relationship between the two trees: while Testimonium veritatis has quite a lot to say about the Tree of Knowledge, the only function of the Tree of Life is apparently to provide the writer with the opportunity to criticise the Creator. But at least there is nothing in Testimonium veritatis that could prevent those who used the text from regarding the Tree of Life as a symbol of salvation.¹³³ The same deliberations can be applied to Contra Manichaeos III.7, which, however, by virtue of its argumentative form deals somewhat hypothetically with the question of the Tree of Life.

¹³¹ Cf. also Williams 1996, 71.

¹³² Cf. Pearson 1981, 160; Williams 1996, 71.

¹³³ Nor is there a negative revaluation of the Tree of Life in De or. mund. 111–112 (120.24–121.13); Hyp. Arch. does not mention the Tree of Life. On the other hand in Apocr. Joh. the Tree of Life is revalued negatively (short version: III 27.14–28.6 and BG 56.10–57.8; long version: II 21.24–22.2, and IV 33.14–34.5 [Waldstein and Wisse 1995, 124–27: synopsis 57.6–58.2]).

f. Comparison with the original Manichaean literature

In the above documentation of the background for Contra Manichaeos III.7 in philosophical ideas and in Jewish and non-Catholic texts I have deliberately excluded Manichaean texts, the better to subject them to a particular examination. As mentioned previously, in referring to the original Manichaean literature, Nagel has contested that Contra Manichaeos III.7 quotes from any one Manichaean text at all. The question now is to provide insight into how this literature interprets the Paradise narrative, i.e. the fragments of Manichaean texts from Turfan and Egypt. Secondly, excerpts and summaries in non- and anti-Manichaean literature can also be included when there is reason to believe in a reliable tradition. To begin with, however, my intention is to omit Augustine's anti-Manichaean oeuvre, since we find such striking parallels there with Contra Manichaeos III.7 that a special examination will provide the most profitable results.

Not a single original Manichaean text is preserved which expounds Gen. 2–3 in its entirety, but in several places there are hints at expositions of these chapters. This means that we cannot be completely sure that in Mani's own works, which were canonical for the Manichaeans, there was a complete exegesis of Gen. 2–3. We can only say for sure that Mani claimed that Jesus himself had instructed Adam, for in Mani's Šābuhragān we read that Xradešahr (i.e. Jesus) gave the first male being wisdom and knowledge.¹³⁴ And even if Mani actually did make a complete presentation based on the Paradise narrative, we cannot be certain that it took the form of an interpretation of Gen. 2–3: though resting on Gen. 2–3 it may have omitted to deal with the text and instead have taken the form of a new and independent presentation of the primal events. That is precisely the case with the Manichaean myth about Jesus and Adam which is found in excerpts of Theodore bar Kōnai's Liber Scholiorum, and which most scholars believe to come from Mani himself.¹³⁵ According to these excerpts, "Jesus the Luminous" awakened Adam ¹³⁴ M 473; 17–19 in MacKenzie 1979, 504.

¹³⁵ Cf. Jonas's view mentioned above.—Feldmann (1987, 93) regards it as an open question whether Mani, who otherwise rejected the OT, had knowledge of the Paradise narrative, and whether he understood it historically or interpreted it allegorically or in some way or other built it into his system. Perhaps it is his disciples, under pressure from the Christians, who are the first to concern themselves with it?

and set him free, gave him knowledge of the divine world and the state of the soul and allowed him to eat of the Tree of Life.¹³⁶ This myth is also known from the Arabian writer Ibn an-Nadīm's Fihrist al-ʿulūm; in his version Jesus, who is accompanied by another god, sets both Adam and Eve free, after which he instructs Adam. No tree is mentioned, however.¹³⁷

Already these small differences demonstrate that the Manichaeans' interpretations of the Paradise narrative differed from one another. The explanation could be that Mani probably had his own interpretation, but omitted to account for a number of details and also allowed many questions to remain open, and that the Manichaeans believed they had the freedom to embellish further, provided that they did not directly contradict their master: according to this line of thought, if Mani only mentioned Adam expressly, for example, it would not be a contradiction to add Eve. This theory fits in with general tendencies in other traditions of religious interpretation which rest on a canonical, authoritative text. The theory implies that we may expect the later Manichaeans to develop Mani's presentation in fairly different directions, but that certain common features would also remain.

If we accept that Theodore bar Kōnai preserved Mani's own presentation, then Mani made Jesus take over the function of the serpent in mediating knowledge to Adam, but left it open as to whether Jesus was also the serpent himself.¹³⁸ At the same time we note that the Tree of Knowledge has been replaced by the Tree of Life, but that "the eyes that were opened" in Gen. 3.5.7 as a result of man eating of the Tree of Knowledge are here a consequence of him eating of the Tree of Life.¹³⁹ Theodore moreover has Jesus waking ¹³⁶ Theodore bar Kōnai, Liber schol. 11, Scher 1912, 317.15–318.4; the Tree of Life is mentioned in Scher 1912, 317.28.—See also Rose 1979, 69–76 concerning this myth.

¹³⁷ Flügel 1862, 91.

¹³⁸ Cf. also the deliberations in Feldmann 1987, 95.

¹³⁹ Assuming that in Theodore bar Kōnai, Liber schol. 11, Scher 1912, 318.1 we read ܘܐ and not ܘܚܐ (cf. Scher's [1912, 318] note 1 and Pedersen 1988, 164 n. 27).—If this is right, then Mani himself has already blurred the difference between the two trees, and it is therefore inadequate of Nagel (1980, 57 n. 26, 69–70) to think that the Manichaeans did not believe that the "Jesus the Splendour" let Adam eat of the Tree of Knowledge, but rather of the Tree of Life.—According to Nagel (1980, 62, 69–70) as a symbol of salvation the Tree of Life is a Christian element, whereas the idea of the Tree of Knowledge as a symbol of salvation expresses the aggressive-polemical tendency and is a non-Christian Gnostic idea.

Adam from sleep and raising him up, and also an-Nadīm has Jesus lifting Adam up; here we find without doubt that Adam's sleep in Gen. 2.21ff. is being interpreted as the well-known Gnostic symbol of the "sleep of forgetfulness".¹⁴⁰

The reason why Mani left open the question of who Jesus was may have been his aversion to saying that the Saviour was a serpent; we have already seen that in Apocryphon Johannis the eagle took over the serpent's function, and that De origine mundi only spoke of "the beast". This antipathy has received even stronger expression in a large number of Manichaean texts where the serpent is placed directly on the side of Darkness, even though it is seldom mentioned in connection with the Paradise narrative.¹⁴¹ Against these texts it is of little consequence that a single text states that like all other living beings serpents also contain the divine elements of light.¹⁴²

Several Manichaean presentations deemed it sufficient merely to say that Jesus revealed himself to Adam, and perhaps also Eve, and gave them knowledge.¹⁴³ Other presentations, however, prefer to ¹⁴⁰ Cf. perhaps Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 179.6–8.—This motif is found in Hyp. Arch. 8 (89.3–17), where the spiritual woman wakes Adam and makes him get up, and in De or. mund. 85–86 (115.30–116.8), where Zoe-Eve makes Adam come alive and raises him up so he opens his eyes; cf. also Apocr. Joh. (short version: III 28.23–30.14 and BG 58.8–60.16; long version: II 22.15–23.26 and IV 34.21–36.21 [Waldstein and Wisse 1995, 128–35; synopsis 59.3–62.7]).

¹⁴¹ Such texts exist in P&B II, Allberry 1938, 60.18–19, 149.12–13.22–25, 156.27–30, 183.1, 192.26, 217.4 (and 43.9 in Wurst 1996, 106–7); cf. perhaps Kephalaia, Böhlig 1966, 287.7–8; Funk 1999, 302.1–2. In one case it is the same hymn, which alludes to the Paradise narrative (Allberry 1938, 149.9) and regards the serpent as demonic (Allberry 1938, 149.12–13.22–25).—In Severus of Antioch's 123rd Homily, which contains fragments of a Manichaean text, the principle of Darkness is compared with a pig and a serpent (Cumont and Kugener 1912, 97.6–98.1 = Brière 1960, 152.22–154.24) (cf. Nagel 1973a, 163–65; Nagel 1980, 57).—In Hymni contra haer. XVII.1–3; XVIII.3 and 9–11; XXI.3 and 6 and 8–9 (Beck 1957, 60.7.10.20; 64.1; 66.1–2.11.19.22; 74.6; 75.4.8.23; 76.5.7.9) Ephrem attacks heretics who among other things include the serpent with the evil nature (cf. Kronholm 1978, 86–90); they could be Manichaeans, but in XXI.10 (Beck 1957, 76.13–21) it appears that the polemic is confined to the Bardesanites and Marcionites; the subject is also found in XLIII.4–6 (Beck 1957, 171.11–25), where the polemic is against the Marcionites. In Ad Hyp. IV, Mitchell 1912, 118.31ff., however, Ephrem claims that the Manichaeans maintain they could defeat the evil one in the serpents and scorpions with the aid of sorcery, which is clear testimony of a negative Manichaean assessment of serpents.—Other relevant references to anti-Manichaean texts in Bennett 2001, 47 with n. 37–38.

¹⁴² According to Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 208.19–20 serpents also contain "the Cross of Light".

¹⁴³ Only Adam is mentioned in P&B I, Giversen 1988, pl. 181.21 and in Kephalaia, follow the Gnostic tradition, in which Eve is the revealer, but in such a way that it is Jesus who reveals himself through her;¹⁴⁴ one presentation seems to identify Jesus with another Manichaean divine hypostasis, Primal Man.¹⁴⁵ The Manichaeans may omit to define which tree Jesus allowed Adam to eat of,¹⁴⁶ but they often follow Mani in making the Tree of Life a symbol and guarantee of salvation;¹⁴⁷ nor are they far from Mani when they link salvation to the Tree of Knowledge.¹⁴⁸ There is no need to assume, however, that Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 56.24–26; 59.27–28, while Kephalaia, Böhlig 1966, 268.2 also mentions Eve.

¹⁴⁴ Thus Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 53.18–54.9; 94.3–4.8–9 (cf. Van Lindt 1992, 188); Psb I, Giversen 1988, pl. 60.3.8; 266.23–25.32; the Sogdian-Manichaean text M 129 (cf. Sundermann 1994 with further discussion); and the Long Abjuration Formula 1464B/C (Lieu 1994, 241).—Sundermann (1994, 322) concludes cautiously: “Hier liegt also ein in Schriften des östlichen wie des westlichen Manichäismus bezeugtes Mythologumenon vor, das zum Urbestand der Lehre gehören dürfte.” I suggest instead that this myth too is a “further development”.

¹⁴⁵ In the late Middle Persian-Manichaean text S 9 (a31–b14 [R]) we are not dealing with Jesus but “Primal Man” (Öhrmizd) (see Salemann 1912, 9; translation and remarks in Henning 1932, 221–24).

¹⁴⁶ Thus Psb I, Giversen 1988, pl. 72.25–26.

¹⁴⁷ In Psb II Jesus is the fruit on the Tree of Life (Allberry 1938, 185.10.21f.) or the Tree of Life itself (Allberry 1938, 116.7; 154.22f.27f.). In Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 20.3–5 Jesus the Splendour is the fruits of “the good tree” (Mt. 7.17–20; Lk. 6.43–44), and according to Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 53.27 apparently before he came to Adam and Eve, Jesus the Splendour has planted the Tree of Life that will produce good fruit (other references in Feldmann 1987, 94 and Rose 1979, 76). The salient point in the Manichaeans’ imagery is that the Tree of Life could also be identified with the Kingdom of Light itself (see Severus of Antioch 123rd Homily [Cumont and Kugener 1912, 96.5; 100.1; 127.6 = Brière 1960, 152.14, 154.9, 166.9]; correspondingly the Kingdom of Darkness is called the “Tree of Death”, “the bad tree” or the “tree of darkness”; Cumont and Kugener 1912, 96.7; 104.2; 104.8–105.1; 112.1–2; 117.7; 118.1.4; 122.8; 125.3 = Brière 1960, 152.16, 156.1.5–6, 158.28, 162.6.9.11, 164.13.25–26). Cf. further Waldschmidt and Lentz 1926, 29–31, 97. “The Tree of Life” is also mentioned in Kellis, Text A 2, 40 (Gardner 1993, 40).—Cf. Nagel 1980, 69–70.

¹⁴⁸ In Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 15.12–13 Adam ate of the Tree of Knowledge, so that his eyes could see. Another example of this idea is found in the allegorical exposition in Acta Arch. XI.1 (Beeson 1906, 18.1–5 [Greek = Epiphanius, Haer. 66.29.1, Holl 1933, 66.6–10], 18.15–19 [Latin (X)]), where the world is the Garden of Paradise, and the trees in it are the desires and other deceptions, but the tree in Paradise, by which mankind knows the good, is Jesus, i.e. his γνῶσις, which is in the world. He who receives from it separates good from evil. Cf. Feldmann 1987, 94. Baur’s idea that the Manichaeans had originally in this way only understood the Paradise narrative allegorically (see above p. 76) is hardly tenable: the narrative in Theodore bar Kōnai is not an interpretation but a new myth that claims to tell of a “real” salvation event (cf. on this point Rose 1979, 70 and concerning Acta Arch. XI.1 Rose 1979, 75–76).

the Manichaeans believed in two salvatory trees, if one accepts that the Manichaeans quite simply identified the Tree of Knowledge with the Tree of Life.¹⁴⁹ This is natural enough, since Gen. 2.9, 3.3 sets the two trees in the same place, namely in the ‘middle’ of the garden.

In Contra Manichaeos III.7 it is simply stated that after eating of the Tree man who was blind could now see he was naked, and used the clothing that was to hand (Gen. 3.7); it is not possible for us to decide whether we are speaking of physical or only of “spiritual blindness”. In Contra Manichaeos III.24, however, Titus presupposes that the Manichaean text intends a physical blindness, which he then confronts with his own allegorising interpretation of the vision of reasoning (III.24–25). It is possible that here Titus unconsciously misunderstands his source, which like himself may have believed that the eyes of cognition were being opened. At any rate there are several Manichaean texts that spiritualise blindness and the eyes that were opened.¹⁵⁰

The original Manichaean texts thus accord with Contra Manichaeos III.7 in regarding Adam’s eating of the Tree of Knowledge as a salvation event, but regardless of the points of contact the distance to Contra Manichaeos III.7 is still great. As pointed out by Nagel, there are no clear parallels to the description of man’s Creator as being without foreknowledge of the violation of His prohibition or as being ruled by φθόνος and βασκανία.¹⁵¹ It must be mentioned, however,

¹⁴⁹ Thus Rose 1979, 73–75; Pedersen 1988, 164–165. Cf. further Pedersen 1996, 306–11. A weak testimony in this direction is P3B I, Giversen 1988, pl. 98.16–17, where I read [M]ἦ ΠΩΗΗ ΠΤΕ ΠΩΗῚ ΠΕ ΠΣΑΛΛΗΕ ΠΠΠΛῚ . Ε[|]ΩΤ ῥἦ ΔΒΑΛ ΠΠΡΕΩΕ ΗΕ ΗΕΣΚΑΡΠΟΣ ῥἦ ΔΒΑΛ . . .], “and (?) the Tree of the Life is the knowledge of the Paraclete (παράκλητος) . . . | . . . from the joy are his fruits (καρπός) from . . .” (cf. Gardner 1993, 49). The “Paraclete” here is Mani. This is a poetic text, but it shows that the Manichaeans associated the Tree of Life with knowledge.—As a parallel example it may be mentioned that the Ophitic diagram found in Contra Cels. VI.33 (Borret 1969, 260.9) has perhaps also identified the two trees: τῷ τε τῆς γνώσεως ξύλω καὶ τῆς ζωῆς (thus Alexandre 1988, 255, otherwise Chadwick 1980, 349).

¹⁵⁰ Thus P3B II, 25.6–11, 149.9 (cf. Nagel 1980, 55–56); P3B I, Giversen 1988, pl. 266.26–31; and probably also Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 15.12–13. The late Middle Persian-Manichaean text S 9 (a16–18 [R]; b3–14 [R]) can probably also be understood along these lines (see Salemann 1912, 9; translation and remarks in Henning 1932, 219, 223–24).

¹⁵¹ Cf. Nagel 1980, 55–57.—On the other hand we find similar ostensibly Manichaean questions of God’s foreknowledge in other anti-Manichaean texts; the Manichaean question in Didymus, Contra Manich. XII (PG 39, 1100D; cf. Klein 1991, 125; Bennett 2001, 40f.), as to why God created anything that would be harmful in the future, is alluding to the creation of the Devil. Similar questions that it is a fundamental feature of the Manichaean myth that before the forces of Darkness have taken any initiative, the Father of Greatness has already planned a counter-measure; the history of salvation is controlled by the Father of Greatness, whose victory is assured. The forces of Darkness cannot be imagined to possess this foreknowledge.¹⁵² The texts do not ascribe jealousy to the Creator, but they do ascribe envy to matter.¹⁵³

Finally, none of the Manichaean texts treated so far directly relate themselves critically and polemically to the source in Gen., as does Contra Manichaeos III.7. Instead they narrate the “new” myths. One explanation for this, however, could be that we are dealing here with devotional literature that was not intended for use in the confrontation with the Early Catholic Church. Other texts may have had this purpose, and if that is so they are reflected at a single point in the Manichaean Psalm Book, which I have so far excluded, where there is a clear polemic against the biblical text and the Catholic interpretation:

When Adam and Eve were created and put in Paradise, who was it that ordered them: ‘Eat not of the Tree’, that they might not distinguish the evil from the good? Another fought against him and made them eat of the Tree.¹⁵⁴

The context shows that the argument here is that the one who gave the command was the God of the OT, who is only “the God of this aeon” (see the Manichaean Psalm Book II, Allberry 1938, 56.31ff., also in John of Damascus, Dial. contra Manich. 34, 70, 73 (Kotter 1981, 372, 388–91; cf. Klein 1991, 126–29; Bennett 2001, 41), here perhaps inspired by Titus.

¹⁵² See also Pedersen 1996, 185–88 with further references.

¹⁵³ This refers to the φθόνος of Darkness against the aeons in PsB II, Allberry 1938, 79.24, and in this sense Titus also uses φθόνος in relation to the “sons of matter” in Contra Manich. I.21 (Gr. 12.34). Satan’s φθόνος is mentioned in Man. Hom., Polotsky 1934, 76.13, 91.7. Particularly important is Kephalaia Ch. 73 (Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 178.24–180.26) “On the envy of matter” (ΕΤΡΕ ΦΘΟΝΟΣ ΗΤΖΥΛΗ, 178.25); here φθόνος is made the first nature, which came into being in the worlds of Darkness, and in the text Mani describes the Manichaean history of salvation, in which the φθόνος of Matter played the inimical role. The text also mentions the φθόνος of Matter against Adam, but unfortunately the text is fragmentary (Kephalaia, Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940, 179.6–8). If the lacuna is to be restored, as the editors propose, this φθόνος refers to Adam’s sleep in Gen. 2.21ff.; at any rate it does not refer to the eating prohibition or the banishment from the Tree of Life.

¹⁵⁴ ΗΤΕΡΟΥΣΜΗΝΕ ΠΑΛΑΜ ΜΗΕΥΖΑ ΔΥΚΩ ΉΝΔΥ ΖΗΝΠΠΑ|ΡΑ|ΔΕΙΣΙΟΣ ΜΗ ΠΕΤΑΥΤ ΑΤΟΤΟΥ ΧΕ ΠΠΩΡΟΥΩΗ Δ|ΒΑΛ ΖΗΠΩΗΗ ΧΕ ΝΟΥΠΩΡΧ ΠΠΠΕΤΖΑΥ ΔΒΑΛ ΠΠ|ΠΕΤ|ΔΗΠΤ · ΔΚΑΙΟΥΕ ΤΩΗ ΟΥΒΗΙΔ ΑΥΤΡΟΥΟΥΩΗ ΖΗΠΩΗΗ (PsB II, Allberry 1938, 57.7–10,—Allberry’s transl.).

cf. 2 Cor. 4.4). The tree is obviously the Tree of Knowledge, which here enables evil to be separated from good. The hymn refers anonymously to “another” who fought against this God and persuaded Adam and Eve to eat of the tree. This “other” has the function of the serpent in Gen., but the obscure expression could suggest that this writer too has had an aversion to saying that the Saviour was a serpent. The “other” could, however, be Jesus.¹⁵⁵ It is also interesting that the hymn immediately goes on to allude probably (the Manichaean Psalm Book II, Allberry 1938, 57.11) to Ex. 20.5; Is. 45.6; 46.9, which as mentioned were Gnostic and Marcionite “proof passages” of the Creator’s ignorance and overweening pride.¹⁵⁶

It is not quite the same presentation which is found in the hymn in question and in Contra Manichaeos III.7, but the polemical and anti-Catholic character of the hymn is of interest. For Mani’s “new myth” about Jesus bringing knowledge to Adam was clearly based on older critical interpretations of Gen. for polemical purposes. The psalm, so to speak, takes the myth back to its historical starting-point as “protest exegesis”.

g. Comparison with Augustine’s portrayal of Manichaeism

The texts that were examined in the previous section might lead some to doubt that Contra Manichaeos III.7 actually contains genuine Manichaean quotations. But it is a different matter the moment we turn to Augustine’s anti-Manichaean authorship. The most important work here is Augustine’s Contra Faustum, because this text contains direct excerpts from Faustus of Milevis’s anti-Catholic writing, his Capitula;¹⁵⁷ these extracts therefore have the same weight as most ¹⁵⁵ Cf. Pedersen 1988, 165.

¹⁵⁶ When the psalm in the following (PsB II, Allberry 1938, 57.11–14) asks who led Adam astray and crucified the Saviour, if the God of the OT really is God, the reference cannot be to the “Fall of Man” in which Adam ate of the Tree of Knowledge. It must be the fall that is narrated in an-Nadīm, Fihrist, Flügel 1862, 92, where Adam had intercourse with Eve after having received instruction from Jesus. Cf. also Man. Hom., Polotsky 1934, 68.14 and TM 393, 16ff. (Henning 1944, 138, 140), where Adam fell no fewer than three times. That the Manichaeans regarded Adam’s intercourse with Eve as his “fall” is also testified to in Augustine; see further Baur 1831, 151–57; Feldmann 1987, 94, 129 n. 70; cf. also M 7983 in Andreas and Henning 1932, 199 (d I R II, 1ff.; new edition in Hutter 1992, 93–95).—It is moreover interesting that the questions in PsB II, Allberry 1938, 57.11–14 have close parallels in M 28 I Ri, 19–23 and Riī, 24–28 (Hymn 2, strophe b and x); see the new edition in Skjærvø 1995, 245, 246 (cf. 243, 244).

¹⁵⁷ See Alfarcic 1919, 121–23.

of the original Manichaean texts that have been found in the 20th century, and cannot be written off as the misunderstanding or distortion of an opponent.

In Contra Faustum XXII.4 we hear the accusations against the Creator of ignorance and jealousy that we sought for in vain in other Manichaean texts; thus Faustus declares of the OT:

These books, moreover, contain shocking calumnies against God himself. We are told that he existed from eternity in darkness, and admired the light when he saw it; that he was so ignorant of the future, that he gave Adam a command, not foreseeing that it would be broken; that his perception was so limited that he could not see Adam when, from the knowledge of his nakedness, he hid himself in a corner of Paradise; that envy made him afraid lest his creature man should taste of the Tree of Life, and live for ever . . .¹⁵⁸

The passage is introduced with a particular interpretation of Gen. 1.4, but then we find precisely the two central points from Contra Manichaeos III.7: God lacked foreknowledge, because He did not know that His prohibition would be violated, and God was jealous, when He cut man off from the Tree of Life. In addition to this we also find the well-known feature of Gnostic-Marcionite literature that God's ignorance "is proved" by His question in Gen. 3.9. In what follows Faustus also attacks the polygamy of the patriarchs, the cruelty against the Egyptians and the theft of their jewellery (Contra Faustum XXII.5), corresponding to Contra Manichaeos III.7,12–13.¹⁵⁹ The familiar accusation from Gnostic and Marcionite texts against the Creator of ζήλος is also found in Faustus's attack on the God of the OT who demanded sacrifices, and, he adds, who was "jealous if they were offered to any one but himself".¹⁶⁰

¹⁵⁸ Transl. Richard Stothert in Schaff 1887, 273.—"Et sane fieri potuit, ut quemadmodum de deo impudenter idem tanta finxerunt, nunc eum in tenebris ex aeterno uersatum dicentes et postea miratum cum uidisset lucem, nunc ignarum futuri, ut praeceptum illud, quod non esset seruaturus Adam, ei mandaret, nunc et inprouidum, ut eum latentem in angulo paradisi post nuditatem cognitam uidere non posset, nunc et inuidum ac timentem, ne, si gustaret homo suus de ligno uitae, in aeternum uiueret . . ." (Zycha 1891, 593.18–25). Cf. Rottenwöhner 1986, 118.—Stothert translates with "envy" where, as mentioned, I would have preferred "jealousy".

¹⁵⁹ These charges can similarly be traced back to the older Gnostic and Marcionite polemic, which I shall not detail here; the Paradise narrative is of particular interest in the present work.

¹⁶⁰ Transl. Richard Stothert in Schaff 1887, 273.—"zelantemque, si et aliis eadem offerentur ut sibi", Contra Faust. XXII.4; Zycha 1891, 593.26–27.

On the other hand, there is no positive assessment of the serpent in Faustus of Milevis; on the contrary, in the only passage where he speaks of the serpents, he says that the Catholics will surround the Manichaeans “like children of the wily serpent”.¹⁶¹ But Augustine’s response to Faustus can be interpreted to mean that the Manichaeans could use the serpent as both a positive and a negative symbol:

Do you call us children of the serpent? You have surely forgotten how often you have found fault with the prohibition in Paradise, and have praised the serpent for opening Adam’s eyes. You have the better claim to the title which you give us. The serpent owns you as well when you blame him as when you praise him.¹⁶²

Just as in Contra Manichaeos III.7 the Manichaeans are believed to have praised the serpent for opening the eyes of man.—In Contra Faustum XV.9 (Zycha 1891, 436.15–17) Augustine states explicitly that the Manichaeans thought that the serpent was Christ.¹⁶³

Following on from Contra Faustum mention must be made of Augustine’s De Genesi contra Manichaeos In De Genesi contra Manichaeos II.XXVIII,42.1–4 we find the same question of God’s foreknowledge in relation to Adam’s transgression as in Faustus and in Contra Manichaeos III.7:

Accordingly, what do they have that they can censure in these books in the Old Testament? Let them ask according to their custom, and let us bring the answers that the Lord considers worthy that we give: ‘Why did God create man, whom He knew would sin?’¹⁶⁴

¹⁶¹ Transl. Richard Stothert in Schaff 1887, 156.—“ex more parentis sui serpentis captiosus”; Contra Faust. I.2; Zycha 1891, 252.5–6.

¹⁶² Transl. Richard Stothert in Schaff 1887, 156.—“cur autem serpentem patrem nostrum dixisti? an excidit tibi, quemadmodum soleatis uituperare deum, qui homini praecceptum in paradiso dedit, et laudare serpentem, quod ei per suum consilium oculos aperuit? puto iustum esse, ut serpentem illum diabolum a uobis laudatum tu potius agnoscas parentem tuum; nam ille te filium etiam modo uituperatus agnoscit.” (Contra Faust. I.3; Zycha 1891, 253.10–16).

¹⁶³ Cf. Feldmann 1987, 95; Decret 1970, 299–300.—It must be emphasised that Titus does not say that the serpent was Christ, but speaks only of the angel of the good. Rose (1979, 75) suggested here that Titus’s source had spoken indeterminately of a “messenger of light”, which Titus interpreted as an angel of light. Another possibility is that Titus found an identification between Christ and the serpent so offensive that he had no wish to mention it.

¹⁶⁴ “Quid habent ergo isti, quod in his litteris veteris testamenti reprehendant? Interrogent secundum morem suum, et respondeamus sicut dominus donare dignatur: Quare fecit deus hominem quem peccatum sciebat?” (Weber 1998, 168).

In what follows Augustine makes the Manichaean ask further questions,¹⁶⁵ which do not, however, have any direct parallels in Titus.¹⁶⁶ According to Augustine the Manichaeans also claimed that the Creator issued his prohibition because He begrudged the human beings the knowledge of good and evil:

... and they invent (the idea) that some god or other from the people of Darkness, as they affirm, gave the command, as though He begrudged men knowledge of good and evil.¹⁶⁷

Explicitly Contra Manichaeos III.7 and Faustus only linked the φθόνος-motif to the banishment from the Tree of Life. But I see no reason to doubt that Augustine's information that the motif was also linked to the prohibition against eating of the Tree of Knowledge, should be right: as already underlined, it is natural to think that if God acted out of φθόνος in the one case, He must have done so in the other.

Finally Augustine also claims in this text that the Manichaeans regarded the serpent as Christ:

But nothing describes and indicates these things more strongly than the serpent saying: "You shall not suffer death; for God knows that on the day you eat of it, your eyes shall be opened." Thus they indeed believe that the serpent was Christ...¹⁶⁸

¹⁶⁵ "Sic eum faceret, inquit, ut non peccaret." (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVIII,42.11 [Weber 1998, 169]).—"Non admitteretur, inquit, diabolus ad eius mulierem." (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVIII,42.13 [Weber 1998, 169]).—"Non fieri, inquit, mulier." (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVIII,42.16 [Weber 1998, 169]).—"Quis fecit diabolum?" (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVIII,42.19 [Weber 1998, 169]).—"Vel ipsum [i.e. the Devil, NAP], aiunt, non faceret deus, si eum peccatum esse sciebat." (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVIII,42.21–22 [Weber 1998, 169]).—"Ergo, inquit, bonus est diabolus, quia utilis est?" (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVIII,42.28 [Weber 1998, 170]). Cf. Bennett 2001, 41.

¹⁶⁶ The closest comparison is with the treatment of the Devil in Book IV, e.g. the Manichaean question in Contra Manich. IV.79, but we do not find the exact same question.

¹⁶⁷ "... et deum nescio quem gentis tenebrarum, sicuti affirmant, illud praeceptum dedisse confingunt, tamquam invideret hominibus scientiam boni et mali." (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVI,39.4–7; Weber 1998, 164).

¹⁶⁸ "Sed nihil vehementius istos designat et notat quam quod dicit serpens: non morte moriemini; sciebat enim deus quoniam quo die ederitis, aperientur oculi vestri. Sic enim isti credunt, quod serpens ille Christus fuerit..." (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVI,39.1–4; Weber 1998, 164). Cf. Sfameni Gasparro 2000, 554–555.—In the following (De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVI,39.7–9; Weber 1998, 164) Augustine often mentions the Ophites.

The views that Faustus and De Genesi contra Manichaeos share must at least have been maintained among the North African Manichaeans. There is therefore no reason to introduce improbable theories, such as that Augustine drew on Contra Manichaeos III.7 in De Genesi contra Manichaeos. This theory also runs adrift when we note that Contra Manichaeos III.7 and Faustus mention the same version of the $\phi\theta\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma$ -motif, but De Genesi contra Manichaeos a different one.¹⁶⁹

Also in De haeresibus XLVI,15 (151–53) Augustine maintains that according to the Manichaeans the serpent was Christ, who persuaded man to eat of the Tree of Knowledge, and here moreover we are told that “the eyes of cognition” were opened:

But they confirm that Christ was the one whom our Scriptures call “the serpent”, by which they claim that (Adam and Eve) were illuminated, so that they opened the eyes of cognition and distinguished between good and evil . . .¹⁷⁰

If one is willing to accept Augustine’s claim that the Manichaeans identified Christ with the serpent, then there are a number of parallels between North African Manichaeism and Contra Manichaeos III.7. It is probable that Faustus drew on the same Manichaean work as Augustine himself used in De Genesi contra Manichaeos and De haeresibus,¹⁷¹ and that it is the same work that Titus gives us a fragment of. This ¹⁶⁹ Titus’s Contra Manich. was translated into Latin and used by Augustine, if one is to believe an unpublished monograph by A. Zacher (Zacher 1961; cf. Ries 1988, 187), which unfortunately has not been available to me. However, Zacher’s results are summarised and commended in Carrozzi 1988, 21–22, 28. Carrozzi (1988, 21, 28) maintains that Titus’s work circulated in North Africa in a Latin translation, and he refers (1988, 21, 28) to a number of similarities between Contra Manich. III.7,1–9 and De Gen. contra Manich. These include a supposed similarity between the disjunction in Contra Manich. III.7,3–4 and the disjunction in connection with Gen. 1.3–4 in De Gen. contra Manich. I.VIII,13.3–4 (“dicunt enim: ergo non noverat deus lucem aut non noverat bonum.” Weber 1998, 79). The context, however, is completely different. Carrozzi further refers to De Gen. contra Manich. II.XXVI,39.1–7 and II.XXVIII,42.1–4.—Sfameni Gasparro (2000, 555), who also finds the hypothesis of Augustine’s dependence on Titus unnecessary, seems to assume that Carrozzi has derived the theory of a translation of Titus into Latin from Jerome, De vir. illustr. CII, but if this is the case, the theory is easy to reject: Jerome of course read Titus in Greek.

¹⁷⁰ “Christum autem fuisse affirmant, quem dicit nostra scriptura serpentem, a quo illuminatos asserunt ut cognitionis oculos aperirent, et bonum malumque dignoscerent . . .” (Plaetse and Beukers 1979, 317–18). Cf. Feldmann 1987, 95. Cf. Van Oort 2000 on De haer.

¹⁷¹ Cf. also De Gen. contra Manich. I.VIII,13.1–4 with Contra Faust. XXII.4 (Zycha 1891, 593.19–20).

text was doubtless a work by Adda/Adimantus to whom Faustus himself referred as an authority at the beginning of his own work, but it was a different work from the one by Adimantus that Augustine refutes in Contra Adimantum.¹⁷² Perhaps Augustine was not aware that the text he used in De Genesi contra Manichaeos and De haeresibus, was also written by Adda?

When Adda reached the Roman Empire as a missionary, he threw himself into the fight against the non-Manichaean religious communities, meaning primarily the well-established Catholic Church. Already Mani had made use of earlier “protest exegesis” interpretations of Gen. by “heretics” as material in his myth concerning Adam’s salvation, but because he did not find himself in a geographical area where the Catholic Church was strong, he did not perhaps think it necessary to insist on the myth’s polemical relation to the Gen. text, which was not a scriptural text for him or one that needed to be known by his supporters. Mani could therefore also avoid taking up a position on whether Jesus had been the serpent. Adda’s situation, however, was different. His mission field had to comprise both older Gnostic and Marcionite groups and the numerous Catholics. The protest exegesis character of Mani’s myth had therefore again to be made explicit, and in this context a decision had to be made on the relationship between Jesus and the serpent; Adda chose to identify them as one and the same.

Adda’s works enjoyed success and proceeded to form the basis of the subsequent Manichaean mission in the Roman Empire. The book of his that primarily deals with Gen. and Ex., circulated in the province of Arabia and Latin North Africa among others, and it became a goldmine for oral agitation and new Manichaean missionary texts. Faustus used it in his anti-Catholic writing, and some of the arguments that convinced the young Augustine in 373 doubtless stem from this book; these include the charge against the polygamy of the patriarchs (Confessiones III.VII) and the punishment of Sodom (Confessiones III.VIII), but also the charge, based on Gen. 1.27, against the Catholic God of being anthropomorphic (Confessiones III.VII).¹⁷³

¹⁷² Otherwise Augustine should have omitted these sections when he wrote Contra Adim., for the motifs in which we are interested are not found there. The accusation against the Creator of ζῆλος shines through, however, when Adimantus claims an incompatibility between Ex. 20.5 and Mt. 5.45, 18.22 (Contra Adim. VII,1) and between Ex. 20.5, 34.14 and Jn. 17.25 (Contra Adim. XI).

¹⁷³ Verheijen 1981, 33–36.

Augustine's story shows precisely why Adda's writing was a success: it based its charges against the OT on suppositions that all well-educated people in the Mediterranean world shared, on cultural assumptions with their roots in philosophy which once had to be defended by a minority but which had long since become common property and self-evident mental goods. Adda's work could therefore very well appeal to pagan circles which shared the same suppositions.

h. Comparison with Emperor Julian's treatise: Contra Galilaeos

In addition to the above comparisons, Contra Manichaeos III.7 can also be compared with the fragments from Emperor Julian the Apostate's book Contra Galilaeos, which are preserved in Cyril of Alexandria's Contra Julianum from c. 435;¹⁷⁴ as mentioned Nagel has actually suggested that Titus is in fact polemicising against this book.

In Contra Galilaeos, Fr. 13 (75AB), Fr. 15 (86A), Fr. 16 (89AB), Fr. 17 (93DE, 94A) the Emperor maintains that the stories in Gen. 2–3 should be regarded as "fables", and to this end he seeks to demonstrate the consequence of seeing them otherwise. Here Julian has probably used ideas from a Gnostic source for his polemic;¹⁷⁵ the question is, however, whether this source could not equally be Adda's work. Common to the Emperor, to Contra Manichaeos III.7 and to Testimonium veritatis is at the least that they attribute ἄγνοια, φθόνος and βασκανία to the Creator, and evaluate the serpent positively.

According to the Emperor, when God says in Gen. 2.18 that He will create woman as man's helper, He must have been unaware that rather than be a help, woman would be the cause of him losing his happy life in Paradise.¹⁷⁶ Thus in contrast to Testimonium

¹⁷⁴ In what follows I refer primarily to the edition of the Contra Gal. fragments in Masaracchia 1990 (which contains fragments numbered 1–107), but also to the edition in Neumann 1880 (transl. Neumann 1880a).

¹⁷⁵ Already Brox (1967) assumed that when Julian attributed ignorance and φθόνος to the Creator and glorified the serpent, these ideas stemmed from the Gnostics, though not directly: rather, the Gnostic interpretation had been included in a general arsenal of anti-Catholic arguments and via this route had found its way to the Emperor. Test. ver. was not yet available to Brox, but Koschorke (1978, 108, 149, 150–51; 1978a, 107 n. 72, 108 n. 76) could point out that the fragments mentioned in Julian's Contra Gal. from a formal angle and in regard to anti-Catholic tendency contain the closest parallel to Test. ver. 45.23ff.; cf. also Pearson 1981, 106–7.

¹⁷⁶ Contra Gal., Fr. 13 (75A) (Masaracchia 1990, 101–2, 252; Neumann 1880, 167; 1880a, 5–6); Fr. 17 (94A) (Masaracchia 1990, 105–6, 253; Neumann 1880, 169; 1880a, 7).

veritatis Julian does not prove God's ignorance on the basis of the question in Gen. 3.9. Nor does Contra Manichaeos III.7 justify the Creator's ignorance on the narrow basis of His creation of woman; it is because He was unaware in general that man would violate His commandment. But the Emperor and Titus may have chosen to quote two different arguments from the same text.

It is on the basis of both God's prohibition and Gen. 3.22 that the Emperor concludes that this God is jealous;¹⁷⁷ by resting his accusation on both Gen. 2.17 and 3.22 the Emperor's presentation corresponds most closely to Testimonium veritatis.

The positive valuation of the serpent is found in Contra Galilaeos, Fr. 17 (93D), and is summarised as follows, perhaps by the Emperor himself: "so that the serpent was a benefactor rather than a destroyer of the human race." (ὥστε τὸν ὄφιν εὐεργέτην μᾶλλον ἀλλ' οὐχὶ λυμεῶνα τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης γενέσεως εἶναι.);¹⁷⁸ the Emperor regarded knowledge of good and evil as necessary for man's moral insight (φρόνησις) (Contra Galilaeos, Fr. 16 [89AB], Fr. 17 [93DE, 94A]).¹⁷⁹ It may be noted that the Emperor—as in most of the other related texts—regards the Tree of Life in a positive light.¹⁸⁰

The Emperor published his book immediately after he had departed from Antioch in the spring of 363, and considering that the pagan reaction played a major role in Arabia, it is credible that the book soon reached the province, where Titus, also by virtue of his clash

¹⁷⁷ βᾶσκανος: Contra Gal., Fr. 17 (93E) (Masaracchia 1990, 105, 253; Neumann 1880, 168–69; 1880a, 6); ζηλοτυπῆσαι: Contra Gal., Fr. 17 (94A) (Masaracchia 1990, 106, 253; Neumann 1880, 169; 1880a, 7); φθονηροῦ and βασκάνου: Contra Gal., Fr. 17 (94A) (Masaracchia 1990, 106, 253; Neumann 1880, 169; 1880a, 7). It can be seen that the Emperor places the terms φθονερός and βᾶσκανος on an equal footing with ζηλοτυπῆσαι; later the Emperor deals with Ex. 20.5; Deut. 4.24 (Contra Gal., Fr. 29 [152C] [Masaracchia 1990, 125, 259; Neumann 1880, 188; 1880a, 20] and Fr. 30 [155CD] [Masaracchia 1990, 126, 260; Neumann 1880, 189; 1880a, 20]), and here he makes the equation ζηλωτῆς καὶ βᾶσκανος (Contra Gal., Fr. 30 [155D] [Masaracchia 1990, 126; Neumann 1880, 189; 1880a, 20]). Van Unnik should probably have emphasised more strongly how much all these terms in Late Antiquity were associated with one another.

¹⁷⁸ Masaracchia 1990, 105, 253; Neumann 1880, 168; 1880a, 6; transl.: Wright 1923, 327.—In contrast to Neumann Masaracchia does not regard the passage quoted as part of the Emperor's own text.

¹⁷⁹ Masaracchia 1990, 104, 252, 105–6, 253; Neumann 1880, 168–69; 1880a, 6–7.

¹⁸⁰ It is outrageous that God banished man from the Tree of Life (Contra Gal., Fr. 17 [93E] [Masaracchia 1990, 105, 253; Neumann 1880, 168–69; 1880a, 6]); to eat of the Tree of Life would have led to immortality (ἀθάνατος ἐκ θνητοῦ γένηται, Contra Gal., Fr. 17 [94A] [Masaracchia 1990, 106, 253; Neumann 1880, 169; 1880a, 7]).

with the Emperor, must have been interested in a refutation. If Titus is in fact at loggerheads with the Emperor, as Nagel believes, it could be an expression of a general polemical technique in Antiquity (and particularly among heresiologists) to refute a contemporary enemy by projecting him into a previous heresy;¹⁸¹ but it is a problem that Titus himself does not state that this is what he is doing. The theory is superfluous, however, if as I believe, Titus is in fact polemicalising against a Manichaean text. Yet even so, the similarity between Contra Manichaeos III.7 and Contra Galilaeos is still of interest: for the fact that the Emperor could take over a Gnostic protest exegesis is a good demonstration of the apparent commonality of values between pagans and Gnostics/Manichaeans which also found expression in Bostra, and served to provoke Titus's response.

i. Problems and different solutions

Titus's source, a text by Adda, united an argument that the Marcionites used to prove that the God of Gen. lacked foreknowledge, since He did not prevent man from being disobedient, with an argument in which knowledge of good and evil is positive and the Creator who forbade man from acquiring this knowledge was jealous. Already in the Greek philosophical tradition the theodicy problem was linked to the question of God's foreknowledge and φρόνος, and the non-Catholic "heretical" traditions that Titus's source continued must be understood on the background of this tradition; they were meant to solve the problems that arose when the Paradise narrative was confronted by a philosophical concept of God. This does not exclude the question of an interpretative type of "aggressive-polemical" text; the solution which these myths propounded implies that a whole range of figures and events had to be reevaluated, and such a value reversal had of necessity to involve a confrontation with, and a polemic against, those groups that could not accept it.

Titus's Manichaean sources asked the (also philosophical) question, whence come the evil things (Πόθεν (λέγοντες) τὰ κακὰ; I.4, Gr. 3.26; I.16, Gr. 9.3-4 (→ Ch. XI.7); II.1, Gr. 26.8-9). The question is often testified to by opponents as being Manichaean (see for example Augustine, Confessiones III.VII,12 ["unde malum"]).¹⁸² There is no reason to doubt that the Manichaeans really did pose such questions and presented their doctrine as an answer or a solution,¹⁸³ and in this way continued the tradition described so acutely by Tertullian in the famous passage De praescriptione haereticorum 7.5:

¹⁸¹ See Vallée 1981, 45, 61-62, 72, 96-97.

¹⁸² Verheijen 1981, 33.—Cf. also De lib. arb. I.II,4,10-11, Green 1970, 213, where

The same subject-matter is discussed over and over again by the heretics and the philosophers; the same arguments are involved. Whence comes evil? Why is it permitted? What is the origin of man? and in what way does he come? Besides the question which Valentinus has very lately proposed—Whence comes God?¹⁸⁴

It was in fact also these questions that Adda raised in relation to the Scripture, presenting his assertions as solutions to questions or aporiae. Because of the biblical context the question was not purely philosophical, yet nor was it purely grammatical and philological. The aporiae stemmed from the text being subjected to ideas that in the final instance were of philosophical origin and linked to the context of theodicy, among others.

Williams is thus right to some extent when he speaks of “hermeneutical problem-solving”, but the phrase is also inadequate, because it obscures the crucial difference between this solution and other, “orthodox” solutions: the “orthodox” or Catholic and the “heretical” interpreter may well raise the same questions in a text from the same philosophical premises, but whereas the “heretic’s” solution involves a partial or total rejection of the OT as Scripture and thus a break with and protest against the traditionalist religious community, the “orthodox” solution means that the entire OT is claimed as a holy text and there must therefore be no break with the tradition, even if the result in effect means a radical reinterpretation of that tradition. Last but not least, we should observe that despite the common premises the theological content of the solutions is very different.

Augustine claims that it was the question of the origin of evil deeds, which drove him into Manichaeism in his youth.—Further references in Puech 1949, 152 n. 271.

¹⁸³ Cf. e.g. Kephalaia Ch. 120 (Böhlig 1966, 286.24–288.18), which claims that the point of origin for the myth, radical dualism, is the best answer to the origin of evil.

¹⁸⁴ “Eadem materia apud haereticos et philosophos uoluitur, idem retractatus implicantur: unde malum et quare? et unde homo et quomodo? et quod proxime Valentinus proposuit: unde deus?” (Refoulé 1954, 192.14–17). Eng. transl. Peter Holmes in Roberts and Donaldson 1993, 246.—Cf. e.g. also Adv. Marc. I.2,2 (Evans 1972, 6), where Tertullian has Marcion asking these questions in relation to passages in the Scriptures.

There are several reasons for this: Titus's application of philosophy, for example, is much deeper and more conscious than that of his opponents, but in particular we should note that even though the problems in Titus and Adda, for instance, could be determined by the same, originally philosophical, premises, the solutions are reached through what I have chosen to call, in a figurative sense, different creeds.

It is nevertheless a fact that there was general agreement between the so-called "heretics" and the "orthodox" on the formulation of problems; indeed, we might even say that the "heretics" contributed to the exegesis and theology of the "orthodox" in the formation of problems. In this context it must be emphasised how Titus allows his source, which both raises problems and offers solutions, to function precisely as a collection of problems: Titus acknowledges the problems, but rejects the solutions. In this way Contra Manichaeos III takes on a certain similarity with the contemporary Christian quaestiones-genre—or προβλήματα καὶ λύσεις-genre,¹⁸⁵ which seem to have been particularly popular in the Syrian-Palestinian region and often concerned itself with the interpretation of Gen.

In this context we must remark that a number of scholars have believed that non-Catholic works such as Marcion's Antitheses and even more so Apelles's Συλλογισμοί, by referring to aporiae in the Scriptures have stimulated the emergence of this genre. However, the genre already had a predecessor in Philo's Quaestiones in Genesim and Quaestiones in Exodum (Ἐπιστάσεις τε καὶ διαλύσεις to Gen. and Ex. is mentioned in Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica II.18,1 and 5), which as stated had already raised the question of God's φθόνος in relation to Gen. 3.22.¹⁸⁶ Moreover it is important to note that also the ¹⁸⁵ Titus's presentation is also coloured by a rhetorical quaestiones-tradition in that Titus himself on the way raises questions from which he can develop his exposition. The questions can be understood not just in continuation of the aporiae in the Manichaean texts, but also arise from another orthodox exegesis or the philosophical tradition, or they are just "rhetorical" questions that serve merely to take the presentation further.

¹⁸⁶ The quaestiones-genre is first clearly represented among the Catholic Christians from the 4th cent., even though already in the 2nd cent. Tatian wrote a book about Problems in the Scriptures to which his pupil Rhodon promised to give solutions (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. V.13,8), and even though Origen often used an aporetic method, which incidentally was often linked to the clash with Apelles. The model for the genre, however, is the pagan quaestiones, and generally it is concerned more with philological than philosophical-theological problems, which suggests that the Gnostic “dialogues”, as shown by Rudolph, may be to a great extent accounted as quaestiones-literature, and to them belong also the Manichaean Kephalaia and Faustus of Milevis’s Capitula.¹⁸⁷ In the present context, however, it is essential to stress the difference between on the one hand Gnostic dialogues, including the Coptic Kephalaia, and on the other hand works such as Marcion’s Antitheses, Faustus’s Capitula and Titus’s hypothetical Adda-source: the first type of work offers edifying revelatory responses for use in one’s congregation, while the latter type employs critical argument or polemic to a much greater degree to shake aberrant religious traditions.

comments on Homer have been more inspiring than the philosophical aporia literature.—Eusebius of Caesarea’s περὶ τῶν ἐν εὐαγγελίοις ζητημάτων καὶ λύσεων (which is mentioned in Dem. ev. VII.3,18 [353d], Heikel 1913, 340.25–26) is the first example from patristic literature of the use of the precise genre title; after this the genre becomes common. Examples are Acacius of Caesarea (Eusebius of Caesarea’s pupil and successor), συμμίκτων ζητημάτων volumina sex; Eusebius of Emesa (Eusebius of Caesarea’s pupil), Quaestiones in Vetus Testamentum, which is apparently identical with the same writer’s Commentarii in Octateuchum et Reges (In Oct.), preserved in a translation into Armenian; Diodore of Tarsus (Eusebius of Emesa’s pupil), In Oct.; Theodoret of Cyrus, Quaest. in Oct. (PG 80, 77ff; Marcos and Sáenz-Badillos 1979).—On the genre as such see Schürer 1909, 644–48; Bardenhewer 1912, 29–30; Bardy 1932; De Labriolle 1934, 488–93; Beck 1937, 112–39; Dörrie and Dörries 1966; Schäublin 1974, 43–65; Neuschäfer 1987, 340–42; Perrone 1992; Kamesar 1993, 82–96; Viciano 1996, 393–94 (with further references); Romeny 1997a, 12–19.

¹⁸⁷ Rudolph 1968; Wurst 2001.

CHAPTER SEVEN

TITUS OF BOSTRA'S PHILOSOPHICAL POSITION

1. Titus's knowledge of philosophers and philosophical texts

As I have attempted to show, since it seems likely that the Manichaean mission among pagans and Catholics in the province of Arabia made use of texts which presented Manichaeism as rational Christianity and attacked Catholic Christianity with arguments of a philosophical origin, Titus of Bostra may himself have been provoked to use the very same strategy, but now against Manichaeism itself. Catholicism was rational Christianity, and Manichaeism could not stand up to a philosophical counter-attack.

The actual content of Titus's counter-attack could not avoid being determined by the Manichaean mission strategy, but it is worth noting that what became important for Titus in Book III was not the profound ideas of Manichaean faith but rather the Manichaean attempts to call Catholic Christianity in question through arguments of philosophical origin. These questions were intended to lead Catholic readers to the ideas of the Manichaean faith, but Titus claimed to provide better answers to the questions while holding the OT and the one Creator God in respect. The purpose of this chapter is to achieve a clearer picture of Titus's own philosophical position, which includes weighing up possible influences from Platonism, Stoicism and Aristotelianism in relation to one another. In this context it would be useful to be able to point directly to the actual philosophers and the philosophical texts that Titus knew for sure, but unfortunately it has proved extremely difficult to achieve any certainty in this area. Various passages are nevertheless of interest; Jerome believed Titus to be acquainted with pagan literature, Titus himself mentions some names and information about philosophers, and finally Aimé Puech has proved beyond dispute a literary connection between a passage in Contra Manichaeos and one of Plato's dialogues. A natural starting-point for an exposition of Titus's philosophical position is an interpretation of these passages.

Already in Titus's immediate posterity he was regarded as a Christian writer who made particular use of pagan philosophy, as can be seen for example in Jerome's letter to the rhetor, Magnus, from c. 399. Here Jerome seeks to show that Church writers have the right to acquire and quote from pagan literature, and he therefore invokes Scripture and the apologists and then refers to various individual writers who have made use of pagan literature, including among others Eusebius of Caesarea, Eustathius of Antioch, Athanasius of Alexandria, Eusebius of Emesa, Triphyllius of Cyprus, Asterius (the Sophist) and the confessor Serapion (of Thmuis), as well as Titus of Bostra together with the Cappadocians Basil, Gregory and Amphilochius, all of whom filled their books to such a degree with the philosophers' doctrines and propositions that one hardly knows which to admire the most in them: their secular erudition or their knowledge of the (Holy) Scriptures.¹

Jerome's understanding may rest on the fact that in Contra Manichaeos IV.19 Titus mentions both Xenophon and the two most important philosophers of Antiquity by name:

But Xenophon writes that "the sages of the Persians of old believed in two opposing principles", so that it was from there that this man [i.e. Mani] had a closeness to barbarism. Aristotle, however, spoke about "matter", but he did not give this name to some living principle as (it is the case with) this "matter" of his [i.e. Mani], (he) who uses and introduces an alien name which does not belong to himself. But, corresponding to the likeness of the name, he [i.e. Aristotle] called that which is not alive and does not have any movement of its own accord "matter". This man [i.e. Mani], however, altered the use of the false name (so that it designated) "evil", and he is not only ungrateful in (the matter of) his theft, but he is also a miserable knave who alters something which is not his own into a fraud. But Plato <taught>, more and more in error, with a clear term the transmigration of souls (Sy 138.4–14 → Ch. XI.46).²

In reality Titus is not quoting Xenophon directly, but can only refer to Araspes's words about the two souls in Xenophon, Cyropaedia

¹ qui omnes in tantum philosophorum doctrinis atque sententiis suos refererunt libros, ut nescias, quid in illis primum admirari debeas, eruditionem saeculi an scientiam scripturarum. (Jerome, Ep. LXX, Hilberg 1910, 700–8; the mention of Titus and the quotation in Ep. LXX.4, Hilberg 1910, 706.13–707.3); cf. Sickenberger 1901, 5.

² Cf. also on this passage Jackson 1925, 256; Allberry 1939, 132 n. 1; Casadio 1992, 121.

VI.1,41. For Titus, the fundamental dualism between the two principles is closely connected with an anthropological dualism; as we shall see, he came very close to claiming that the Manichaeans have a doctrine of two souls. Moreover the passage here is the only one in which Titus explicitly links his accusation against Mani of being a barbarian with his origin inside the Persian Empire.³

Titus's interest in emphasising the difference between Mani's ύλη and Aristotle's concept of matter corresponds to Alexander of Lycopolis's accentuation of the difference between ύλη in Mani and in Plato and Aristotle; although Alexander is also interested in stressing that matter is not movement, there is so great a difference between Alexander and Titus in their choice of words that a dependency relationship is unlikely.⁴

With regard to Titus's remark that Plato taught κἀνταυτ κσανθη (Sy 138.13), the transmigration of souls, it is simply a common criticism among the Church fathers.⁵ What Titus tells us here about Aristotle and Plato is not wrong, but it is difficult to determine where his information originates. Its sparse, summarising character could suggest that it comes from a doxographical manual, but it cannot be the one by Aetius.⁶ As will be shown, it is at any rate doubtful

³ See below concerning the two souls according to the Manichaeans pp. 299–300.—Incidentally Acta Arch. LXVII (LV), which has Basilides maintaining a radical dualism, regards him as a Persian (LXVII.4; Beeson 1906, 96.10–11).

⁴ Alexander of Lycopolis, Contra Manich. opin. disp. II (Brinkmann 1895, 5.3–8): τὴν δὲ ὕλην λέγει οὐχ ἦν Πλάτων, τὴν πάντα γινομένην ὅταν λάβῃ ποιότητα καὶ σχῆμα—διὸ πανδεχῆ καὶ μητέρα καὶ τιθῆν<ην> καλεῖ—καὶ Ἀριστοτέλης, τὸ στοιχεῖον περὶ ὃ τὸ εἶδος καὶ ἡ στέρησις, ἀλλ' ἕτερον τι παρὰ ταῦτα· τὴν γὰρ ἐν ἐκάστῳ τῶν ὄντων ἄτακτον κίνησιν, ταύτην ὕλην καλεῖ. See further Alexander's refutation, Contra Manich. opin. disp. VIff. (Brinkmann 1895, 9.17ff.). Cf. Mansfeld and Van der Horst 1974, 21–23; Villey 1985, 128–33, 204–33.

⁵ There is thus no question of a criticism of Plato's doctrine concerning the soul as such, as Sickenberger 1901, 111 claims; he is wrong in thinking that Titus's remark is testimony to an "Antiochene anti-Platonism".—Apart from this, as Jackson 1925, 256 pointed out, the term κἀνταυτ κσανθη corresponds to μεταγχιμός, the favoured Manichaean term for the transmigration of souls.

⁶ In Augustus's time Aetius compiled a doxographical manual that was used by Philo; in the middle of the 2nd cent. CE it was edited and attributed to Plutarch; another form was used by Stobaeus in the 5th cent. Aetius, Plac. I.9,1–7 (= Stobaeus, Eclog. I.11,1.3.5 and Pseudo-Plutarch, Plac. I.8) (Diels 1879, 307–8) has the heading Περὶ ὕλης; what ύλη is, is explained thus: "Υλη ἐστὶ τὸ ὑποκείμενον πρώτῃ γενέσει καὶ φθορᾷ καὶ ταῖς ἄλλαις μεταβολαῖς (Diels 1879, 307a19–21, 307b5–7). Pseudo-Plutarch summarises Plato and Aristotle's view thus (Stobaeus refers only to Plato): Ἀριστοτέλης καὶ Πλάτων τὴν ὕλην σωματοειδῆ ἄμορφον ἀνείδεον ἀσχημάτιστον ἀποιον μὲν ὅσον ἐπὶ τῇ ἰδίᾳ φύσει, δεξαμενὴν δὲ τῶν εἰδῶν οἷον τιθῆναι καὶ ἐκμαγεῖον καὶ μητέρα γενέσθαι. Οἱ δὲ ὕδωρ λέγοντες ἢ γῆν ἢ πῦρ ἢ ἀέρα τὴν ὕλην οὐκ εἶναι ἄμορφον that Titus has read Aristotle, yet his knowledge has probably been sufficient for him to have been able to formulate the sentences quoted on Aristotle's concept of matter.

Very puzzling is another passage in which Titus apparently mentions a pagan philosopher by name. As an example of a philosophical group which any given Greek could feel sympathy for, Titus speaks in Contra Manichaeos III.69 (Sy 117.16) of κρέων, "Creon's".⁷ The problem here is that no Greek philosopher named Κρέων has apparently ever existed.⁸ Could it be that the name merely signifies a fictive philosopher, somewhat like "so-and-so", or is it possible that Titus is referring to the leader of a local philosophy school in contemporary Bostra?

The discovery of a passage in which we can see the direct use of a philosophical source is due, as mentioned, to Puech, who pointed out that the account in Contra Manichaeos II.24, PG 18 = II.44, Gr. is inspired by the myth that Protagoras tells in Plato's Protagoras 320c–322d.⁹ Thus, in a passage of some length there is almost a word-for-word similarity between the two writers: using the same Greek terms practically all the time Titus and Plato mention first the powerful wild animals, then the weaker animals that are swift of foot, both the armed and the unarmed that are somehow given protection, the birds that are protected by their wings, and other creatures that are protected by living underground. Every animal is therefore looked after (Contra Manichaeos, Gr. 53.7–12 and Protagoras 320d8–321a1). To combat the changing seasons some of them received thick fur and tough skin to guard against the winter chill or the summer heat and to serve as a portable bed (Contra Manichaeos, Gr. 53.14–18 and Protagoras 321a3–7). Some were given a low fertility turnover, while those that were often eaten by others were given a high procreative ability (Contra Manichaeos, Gr. 53.18–21 and Protagoras αὐτὴν λέγουσιν ἀλλὰ σῶμα· οἱ δὲ τὰ ἀμερῆ καὶ τὰς ἀτόμους ἄμορφον (Diels 1879, 308a4–13).—In his doxographical section in Ref. I.19 Hippolytus mentions that according to some Plato taught the transmigration of souls, while others dispute that he did so.

⁷ Smith 1879–1901, 3720 merely remarks "nom. viri, forte Creon, Tit. Bostr. 117. 16."

⁸ None of the persons of this name mentioned in Pauly—Wissowa XI,2, 1709–10 and Pauly—Wissowa Suppl. IV, 1048–60, were philosophers and could fit in with Titus's remark.

⁹ Puech 1930, 559–60.

321b5–6). Both writers also mention the various foodstuffs for all the animals (Contra Manichaeos, Gr. 53.21ff. and Protagoras 321b2–4). Whether Titus is building on Protagoras or, as is perhaps more likely, on another text that has made use of Protagoras's myth to demonstrate the wisdom in nature,¹⁰ this passage shows that Titus was a writer willing to paraphrase his original source word for word and present it as his own text. Ancient writers were admittedly not possessed of the cult of originality of our time, even though a conventional way to attack a writer was to accuse him of "stealing" from others; but whatever the case there is a difference between how "transcriptive" the ancient writers were. If Titus includes an unoriginal paraphrase here, it is likely that he also does so in other places, where no control is possible.

However, genuine knowledge of Titus's philosophical position can only be gained by analysing certain more comprehensive and basic passages.

2. Titus's concept of God and his basic philosophical position

The question of God or the first principle was fundamental in Greek philosophy, particularly towards the close of Late Antiquity. The Catholic Christian apologists assumed that this "philosophical monotheism" formed an analogy to Judaeo-Christian monotheism, and it therefore became one of their most important weapons; this linking of two "monotheisms" is altogether of fundamental significance in the history of ideas, since it was on this level that it became a fulcrum for the merging of the Graeco-Roman and Judaeo-Christian cultural heritages.

In order to draw nearer to Titus's philosophical position it is therefore natural to examine his teaching on God, so as to illuminate the basis of the rest of his theology and his cultural fellowship with the pagans that he invoked in his battle against Manichaeism. For this purpose Book I of Contra Manichaeos is especially relevant; in particular a treatment of Book I chaps. 1–13 could form a good starting-point for understanding Titus's concept of God and some of his other basic definitions. In I.1 Titus acknowledges the heretics' point of departure; they wish to "remove the causes of men's sins from God" (Gr. 1.1–2 → Ch. XI.1), and their aim was in itself "holy and truthful" (Gr. 1.2 → Ch. XI.1). Their solution, however, was wrong; they should have given man the blame for the fact that he sins, but instead they denied that God's Providence reveals itself in everything, and thus "they plunged into the greater and heavy sickness of impiety" (Gr. 1.3–8 → Ch. XI.1). Mani was the worst; "he wanted to show God to be innocent of the evil", and he therefore claimed evil is almost equal to God, uncreated and living (Gr. 1.8–15 → Ch. XI.1). According to the Catholic Church God is also innocent of man's sinning (Gr. 1.22–24), and just like the heretics Titus will put forward a "demonstrative proof in defence of God" (Gr. 1.30 → Ch. XI.2). As I have hinted, the core of the proof is that sin is man's own fault; Mani's solution, which makes evil an independent principle, contains the indecent idea for the concept of God that anyone should be able to oppose God for ever (Gr. 1.20–21),¹¹ and this moreover implies that sins cannot be cured, i.e. man cannot be improved ethically (e.g. I.1, Gr. 2.3–6, and I.2, Gr. 2.15–38). Titus thus accuses the Manichaeans of being determinists.¹²

¹⁰ I find this explanation the most likely, because we do not otherwise get the impression from Titus that he was a reader of the classic philosophical works.

The Manichaeans, however, did not settle for blaming God for the sin of man; they also asked from where did evil things come (Πόθεν (λέγοντες) τὰ κακὰ; Gr. 3.26),¹³ and assuming that the world was a mixture of good and evil, on this basis they censured most of Creation for being evil; e.g. they claimed that beasts of prey were both useless to, and harmful for, men (I.3, Gr. 2.38–3.24; I.4, Gr. 3.24–31).

It is becoming clear that Titus presents Manichaeism in such a way that it may be perceived as a theoretical solution to two of the problems of Greek philosophy: the problem of a theodicy and the origin of evil.¹⁴ It is true that these problems were central for ¹¹ The teaching that anthropomorphisms are not "appropriate" (θεοπρεπές) to God has its roots as far back as Xenophanes and was central to the Church fathers' theology (cf. Jaeger 1960, 49–51); when Titus uses this motif (οὐ τί ἄν γένοιτο τῶν πρεπόντων περὶ θεοῦ λογισμῶν ἀλλοτριώτερον), he therefore seems to be stressing that Mani is pulling God down into a polytheist sphere, where the titans wage war on the gods, etc.

¹² Concerning this accusation see above pp. 171–76.

¹³ Cf. above p. 251.

¹⁴ Because of the existence of evil God's Providence was doubted by the Epicurean and Sceptical philosophers; cf. above (pp. 217–18).

the Manichaeans,¹⁵ but they are of course not just philosophical problems but are also linked to other cultural traditions such as the Jewish or the Iranian. Nevertheless it is probable that the Manichaeans whom Titus is attacking also wanted to associate their own questions with the philosophers' ones. The difference between the Manichaeans and Titus's treatment of the question of evil lies in his distinguishing two aspects of it, namely the question of human sin and the question of evil in nature. The latter kind of evil is not actually evil, according to Titus. Here he is pursuing a philosophical, particularly Stoic, distinction¹⁶ and already on this point he is hoping to establish an anti-Manichaean community with educated pagan readers.

The Manichaeans' solution to the problems is their well-known doctrine of two basic, opposing principles, and therefore Titus wishes to begin by showing that a doctrine of two principles, including even two opposing principles, is unacceptable for the "natural concepts" (I.5, Gr. 4.11–14 → Ch. XI.3). In continuation of this Titus then presents a number of arguments that there can only be one single principle. In a number of cases it is possible to demonstrate how these arguments continue a philosophical tradition.

Thus Titus seems to be continuing old patristic and philosophical arguments, when he turns against the Manichaeans' doctrine that the two principles limit one another, and instead he seeks to show that God is uncircumscribed (ἀπερίληπτος) and everywhere (I.7, Gr. 4.18–28).¹⁷ The Manichaean teaching that the two principles are each in their own place wavers in the face of the question of whether the principles are greater and older than the places, or vice versa; perhaps the places are uncreated and not principles, or perhaps there are four uncreated principles (I.8, Gr. 4.28–5.3). These arguments are already to be found in Athenagoras, Legatio pro Christianos 8; Irenaeus, Adversus haereses II.1,2, II.3,1; Tertullian, Adversus Marcionem I.11,2–3, I.15,2–6; Adamantius, De recta in Deum fide II.1 (822ab),¹⁸

¹⁵ Cf. above p. 252.

¹⁶ Cf. Gronau 1922, passim ("das physische und moralische Uebel"), but esp. 31ff.; Pohlenz 1948, 100; 1948a, 57.

¹⁷ The Church fathers were in agreement that God was uncircumscribed and not tied to a particular place, see e.g. Clement of Alexandria, Strom. V.11 (71.2–5; 74.4–5) (Stählin 1906, 374.4–24, 376.5–13) or Origen, De princ. I.1,6 (Koetschau 1913, 20.24–23.14). This doctrine comes from Middle Platonism; see Lilla 1971, 215–16.

¹⁸ Bakhuyzen 1901, 60.12–20, 62.1–18.

and were common in anti-Manichaean polemic¹⁹ and Early Church polemic in general; their origin, however, is debatable.²⁰

Considerable interest centres around certain chapters in which Titus applies Aristotelian logic and distinctions that were particularly used in the ancient commentaries on Aristotle; in addition to demonstrating Titus's knowledge of this philosophical tradition these chapters also introduce certain anthropological definitions that will be of significance later in this study.

In Contra Manichaeos I.11–12 (Gr. 6.17–32), where Titus is calling into question that the Manichaeans' two principles can be opposites, he bases his argument on the fact that the names (ὀνόματα) of the two principles ("substance" [οὐσία]) and their description (ὑπογραφή) ("living and uncreated" [ζῶσά τε καὶ ἀγένητος], Gr. 6.27) are the same (→ Ch. XI.4).²¹ In the same way Porphyry, Commentarius in Categoriae juxtaposes "name" and "description": "I claim that everything possesses both a name and either a definition or a description."²² Here Porphyry is explaining Aristotle's treatment of homonym, synonym and paronym in Categoriae I (1a1ff.). According to Aristotle synonyms have both the same name and the same account (λόγος) of essence corresponding to the name (τό τε ὄνομα κοινὸν καὶ ὁ κατὰ τοῦνομα λόγος τῆς οὐσίας ὁ αὐτός, Categoriae I [1a6–7]). According to the ancient commentaries on Aristotle λόγος here means both "definition" (ὀρισμός) and "description" (ὑπογραφή); Porphyry says that we are also speak-

¹⁹ E.g. in Alexander of Lycopolis, Contra Manich. opin. disp. VI, Brinkmann 1895, 10.7–11 (although the subject here is "matter" not "place", the argument is closely related); see further Beck 1978, 70ff.; Klein 1991, 54, 59–68.

²⁰ See the argument in Grant 1966, 105–10 (cf. Stead 1976, 132–33). Referring in particular to Adv. Marc. and Dial. Adamant. Grant (1966, 109–10) believes that the one of Athenagoras's arguments that has to do with God's "place" was originally formulated as a semi-philosophical "answer" to Marcion. Malherbe (1970) on the other hand believes that Athenagoras's arguments are based on Middle-Platonic sources. The existence of a similar argument in Alexander of Lycopolis (see previous note) points in my opinion in the same direction, unless one assumes that Alexander had access to Catholic heresiology, which is hardly likely.

²¹ In this context Titus also writes some brief remarks on semantics: according to him names (ὀνόματα) signify (σημαντικά) things (πράγματα), in that they predicate (κατηγορεῖν) what they are "as far as it is possible" (ὡς ἐνδέχεται, Gr. 6.24) (I.11, Gr. 6.23–25). Here Titus appears to be ignoring Aristotle's theory in De int. I (16a1–18), where language does not signify things directly but the concept in the soul that stands for the thing. However, such simplifications also appear elsewhere among Titus's contemporaries (see further Lloyd 1991, 36–37).

²² Transl. by Strange 1992, 38. Busse 1887, 60.15–16: Φημι τοίνυν ὅτι παντὸς πράγματος ὄνομα καὶ ὀρισμὸν ἢ ὑπογραφὴν ἔχοντος, . . .

ing of synonyms when there is merely a common “description”.²³ Titus apparently believes that the Manichaeans’ two principles are “synonyms” (though he does not use this term).²⁴

Titus continues this way of arguing in Contra Manichaeos I.13, where he operates with a large number of Aristotelian concepts, including the categories of substance (οὐσία) and quality (ποιότης), as well as the predicables genus (γένος), species (εἶδος), difference (διαφορά) and accident (συμβεβηκός);²⁵ the last-mentioned term is admittedly not mentioned directly, but it is presupposed when Titus speaks of qualities that come into being (ἐπισυμβαίνειν) and are absent (ἀποσυμβαίνειν).²⁶

²³ Simplicius, In Cat. Ch.1 (Kalbfleisch 1897, 29.16ff.) explains that when Aristotle in Cat. I (1a1ff.) speaks of λόγος and not ὀρισμός, it is in order to include the descriptive explanation (λόγον δὲ αὐτὸν εἶπεν καὶ οὐχὶ ὀρισμόν, ἵνα καὶ τὴν ὑπογραφικὴν ἀπόδοσιν). Cf. Hadot 1990, 50 n. 23, 76ff. Simplicius here is speaking of homonyms; it is of course unnecessary for him to repeat the explanation of these concepts in connection with the synonyms, where the same must be true (cf. Hadot 1990, 105).—Porphyry, In Cat., Busse 1887, 64.14ff. (transl. by Strange 1992, 44). Cf. Lloyd 1991, 44.

²⁴ Naturally Titus is forcing the Manichaean mythology into a context that is foreign to it; this makes a “refutation” easy. But we must be aware that Titus has of course meant that when the Manichaeans’ myths play out in a spatial context, they must stand the test of universal logic. Cf. also how Augustine, as a pious Manichaean, attempted to make his God “fit in” with Aristotle’s Cat. (Conf. IV.XVI,28, Verheijen 1981, 54).

²⁵ In Top. Aristotle reckons with the following predicables: definition (ὄρος, ὀρισμός), property (ἴδιον), genus and accident (Top. I,4 [101b17–23]; I,5 [101b38ff.]); however, in Isag., Busse 1887, 1.4–5 (and passim), Porphyry added species and difference, but omitted definition (see Warren 1975, 11, but cf. Strange 1992, 8). Moreover, the very term praedicabilium (predicable) was not formed until the Middle Ages.—In Contra Manich. I.24 Titus also uses Aristotelian concepts; here he summarises all corporeal things in different species, which in the end are gathered in the highest genus, the body (Gr. 15.26–16.4 → Ch. XI.11).

²⁶ Titus uses ἐπι- and ἀποσυμβαίνειν in such a fixed way that it appears technical: see the use of ἐπισυμβαίνειν in I.13 (→ Ch. XI.5), partly alone (Gr. 7.1.2.3.3–4.17.26), and partly (Gr. 7.13) in tandem with ἀποσυμβαίνειν (Gr. 7.14), further the use of ἐπισυμβαίνειν in II.8 (Gr. 29.31), more distantly the pairing of ἐπι- (Gr. 45.14) and ἀποσυμβαίνειν (Gr. 45.15) in II.31 and the pairing of συμβαίνειν (Gr. 46.30) and ἀποσυμβαίνειν (Gr. 46.31) in II.34 and (Gr. 47.33) in II.37. Aristotle of course used terms such as συμβαίνειν and συμβεβηκός, but not ἀποσυμβαίνειν, and only ἐπισυμβαίνειν in Rhet. III (1426a6) and Anal. pr. II,16 (64b29) (according to Herrmann Bonitz’s “Index Aristotelicus” in Bekker 1870). Sextus Empiricus’s use of ἐπισυμβαίνειν in Adv. Math. IX.371 (Mutschmann 1914, 289 [463.29]); XI.130 (Mutschmann 1914, 403 [572.2]) does not illuminate Titus, but Plotinus’s use of ἐπισυμβαίνειν in Enn. VI.3.8 does. Especially close to Titus’s technical use, however, is Sextus Empiricus’s pairing of συμβεβηκότα/συμβαίνειν and ἀποσυμβαίνειν/ἀποσυμβαίνειν in Adv. Math. VII.281–82 (Mutschmann 1914, 65 [251.26–30]), cf. also Simplicius, In Cat. Ch. 7 (Kalbfleisch 1897, 172.3). Among Catholic writers there is a particularly close parallel in Contra Ar. III,65 (PG 26,

In Contra Manichaeos I.13 (Gr. 7.4–5 → Ch. XI.5) Titus states that it is permissible to find contrary qualities in the existing things, but not contraries to substances: cf. Categoriae V (4a10ff.); VIII (10b12) and V (3b24–29). Titus then gives examples of contrary qualities. White/black are in the first place not contraries—as colours they both belong to the same genus—but on the other hand they are contraries, and precisely as contraries they provide pleasure for the eye (Gr. 7.5–10 → Ch. XI.5). So they are not contraries in all circumstances.—Titus has doubtless acquired this idea from an intermediary, but otherwise white/black is one of Aristotle’s favourite examples of quality in Categoriae (see e.g. Categoriae IV [1b29]; V [4a10–23]; VIII [10b12–18]; XI [14a20–22]).

Titus’s next example has to do with virtue and vice: these are contraries (Gr. 7.11–12 → Ch. XI.5),²⁷ but both belong to the same genus, namely “state” (ἔξις) (Gr. 7.12–13 → Ch. XI.5). In Categoriae VIII (8b29) Aristotle precisely affirms that virtue is a ἔξις, and in Categoriae VIII (8b27–28) that ἔξις is a species of quality.²⁸ Similarly, in Ethica Nicomachea I,13,20 (1103a3–10) Aristotle writes that virtues are ἔξεις, and in Ethica Nicomachea II,5 (1105b19–1106a13) virtue and vice are counted as ἔξεις. On this point, however, there is a difference between Titus and Aristotle. In addition to emphasising that virtue and vice belong to the same genus, Titus states that they are also in the same substance, that is, the soul, and that there they can both come into being (ἐπισυμβαίνειν) and be absent (ἀποσυμβαίνειν), “since the soul that they are in finds itself first in one mood, then in the other” (Gr. 7.14–15) (Gr. 7.12.13–17 → Ch. XI.5). So virtue and 460B), where Athanasius says of the Arians: περὶ . . . τὸν Θεὸν φρόνησιν καὶ βουλήν καὶ σοφίαν ὡς ἔξιν συμβαίνουσιν καὶ ἀποσυμβαίνουσιν ἀνθρωπίνως γίνεσθαι μυθολογοῦσι (cf. Meijering 1974, 67, 83). Cf. also ἐπισυμβαίνειν in De decr. 12 (PG 25, 444C); Ep. ad Aeg. et Lib. 16 (PG 25, 573B); Contra Ar. I,14 (PG 26, 41B); I,20 (PG 26, 53B); De syn. 52 (PG 26, 788B).—Cf. more distantly John Chrysostom, who in In Rom. Hom. XII,6; PG 60,503 claims that sin is not a δύναμις ἐνυπόστατος but the evil deed that always arises and disappears (ἐπιγιννομένην τε καὶ ἀπογιννομένην αἰεί). Athanasius also used the term ἐπίγινγεσθαι to express accidental being (see Meijering 1974, 67–68 with references)—other instances in Löhr 1996, 157 with n. 3.—The fact that Titus uses a terminology that differs from Aristotle perhaps suggests he has not actually read Aristotle himself.

²⁷ Cf. Cat. VII (6b15–16), where virtue and vice are treated as “relatives”; virtue and vice can be referred to both relatives and qualities, see Cat. VIII (11a20ff.) (cf. Porphyry, In Cat., Busse 1887, 114.1ff.; Busse 1887, 140–41).

²⁸ Ἔξις is actually genus for virtue and vice, but in relation to the category of quality ἔξις is a species.

vice are qualities which are true at one point in time, but not at another; they are in other words accidental. Titus is thus interested in stressing that virtue and vice are not stable or permanent qualities. However, when Aristotle spoke of virtue and vice as ἕξεις, he intended to say that they constituted something more lasting or stable; in Categoriae VIII (8b26–28) not only ἕξεις but also διάθεσις, “disposition”, are a species of quality, and the difference between them is that ἕξεις is more lasting and stable than διάθεσις. Admittedly the various ἕξεις, including the virtues, can be displaced, but it is difficult; διαθέσεις on the other hand, meaning for example, cold, heat, sicknesses etc, change quite rapidly, except in the cases where they happen to remain for so long that they become second nature and thus a ἕξις. For states (ἕξεις) are also dispositions (διαθέσεις), but dispositions are not always states (Categoriae VIII [8b29–9a13]). The idea is that a man becomes virtuous by practising virtue through a series of single acts; these must not be an unconscious habit, but must each be performed with intention, so they can be judged morally; by forming a state, however, the previous acts come to influence the choices to be made in new situations. Thus Titus appears to use ἕξις more in the sense in which Aristotle uses διάθεσις in Categoriae, while at the same time still applying ἕξις to describe virtue and vice.²⁹ But since Aristotle also believed that ἕξεις could be displaced, there is no real difference between him and Titus on this point but more a contextually conditioned difference over what is to be emphasised. Titus’s presentation thus accords well with what an accident is according to Porphyry: “What comes into being and passes away apart from the destruction of the substratum is an accident.”³⁰ The reason for Titus’s interest in emphasising that ἕξεις can be absent from the soul, is, as I shall now show, that his presentation is concerned with a difference between the created substances and the uncreated substance.

²⁹ In these questions the Stoics had (at least in certain contexts) a divergent terminology. A “state” that did not permit “more or less” (i.e. it could not be intensified or the opposite) they called διάθεσις; the virtues were such διαθέσεις. The “states” that allowed “more or less” the Stoics on the other hand called ἕξεις (see Simplicius, In Cat. Ch. 8 [Kalbfleisch 1897, 237.25–238.32] [= Von Arnim 1923, 129–30 (SVF II, 393)]; Ch. 10 [Kalbfleisch 1897, 402.19–26] [= Von Arnim 1923a, 57 (SVF III, 238)]; more distantly Porphyry, In Cat., Busse 1887, 137.39–138.1ff.; on this see also Rist 1969, 3; Stead 1977, 124–25; Dihle 1982, 64–65; Strange 1992, 115 n. 320; 152 n. 486; Forschner 1995, 61ff.). As can be seen, Stoic terminology cannot explain Titus’s presentation.

³⁰ Συμβεβηκός δέ ἐστιν ὃ γίνεται καὶ ἀπογίνεται χωρὶς τῆς τοῦ ὑποκειμένου φθορᾶς (Isag., Busse 1887, 12.24–25).—Transl. by Warren 1975, 48.

Titus thus says that virtue and vice come and go, i.e. are accidental qualities; later he also describes them as “separable qualities” (Gr. 7.32–33 → Ch. XI.5). Titus’s next example therefore has to do with quality as “inseparable” (ἀχωριστός). In the case of milk and ravens, white and black are respectively inseparable from their substances, but no one has ever designated the milk or the ravens by these colours (Gr. 7.17–25 → Ch. XI.5). This is good Aristotelianism, even though there turns out to be a terminological difference between Titus and certain passages in Aristotle. I have already mentioned that Titus does not use the term συμβεβηκός, accident, at all but only speaks of virtues and vices which “come and go”. In Aristotle accident means for the most part “separable accident”, corresponding to Titus’s qualities which “come and go”; but occasionally accident means the proper and necessary function of a thing, though without it being part of the definition of that thing,³¹ and posterity speaks therefore of the “inseparable accident” (συμβεβηκός ἀχώριστον). For example in Isagoge Porphyry distinguishes between the separable and the inseparable accident, where the act of sleeping is a separable accident, whereas being black is inseparable both in a raven and an Ethiopian, without being part of their definition.³² It is clear that Titus’s “inseparable quality”, after which the substance is not named, corresponds to the “inseparable accident” that does not enter into the definition. It is also worth noting that Titus and Porphyry use the same example (“the raven” [κόραξ]),³³ which perhaps suggests that we are dealing with traditional examples from elementary philosophical instruction.

All Titus’s examples are simply to show that contraries only concern the qualities (whether they “come and go” or are “inseparable”), not the substances themselves. But this is true solely of the created substances,³⁴ for the uncreated substance (God) has no qualities at all:

³¹ Thus Aristotle mentions this meaning of accident in Met. III,1,8 (995b19–20); V,30,4 (1025a30ff.); Anal. post. I,6–7 (75a18–19, 75a39–75b2). Cf. also Stead 1977, 129, 141–42 with n. 12, 145, 151 n. 22.

³² Busse 1887, 12.24–13.8.

³³ The example comes again in Isag., Busse 1887, 16.20–17.2; cf. Busse 1887, 17.12; 21.15–17; 21.20–22.3; moreover 19.19; 22.5ff.

³⁴ Titus says that one can find contrary qualities (“a contrariety in the qualities”)

But in respect of God every quality is rejected, because none of the things that He is called is something else beside Him, for He is simple and uncompounded (Gr. 7.33–35 → Ch. XI.5).³⁵

Even though Titus's teaching that God is a simple substance without qualities has a certain connection to the negative theology of Platonism in Late Antiquity, it must primarily be said to continue Aristotelian ideas, precisely because it maintains that God is a substance.³⁶

“in the existing things” (ἐν τοῖς οὄσιν, Gr. 7.4 → Ch. XI.5) or “in the subordinate things” (ἐν τοῖς ὑποβεβηκόσιν, Gr. 7.32 → Ch. XI.5); he must thereby be thinking of the created things, above all the world of the senses. In I.4 Titus distinguishes between “the visible things” (τὰ ὀρώμενα, Gr. 3.33), the phenomena (τὰ φαινόμενα, Gr. 3.35–36) or “the things below” (τὰ κάτω, Gr. 3.32), which in the context must be created things (τὰ δημιουργήματα, Gr. 3.28), and “the things above (τὰ ἄνω, Gr. 3.32) or “the invisible” (τὸ μὴ ὀρώμενον, Gr. 3.34). The distinction presumably corresponds to a distinction between “corporeal” and “incorporeal”; in De princ. I.Praef.,9 (Koetschau 1913, 15.20–27); I.1,8 (Koetschau 1913, 24.22–26.14); II.3,6 (Koetschau 1913, 124.19–25); IV.3,15 (Koetschau 1913, 347.5–30); IV.4,1 (Koetschau 1913, 349.7) Origen explains that the Scripture's term “invisible” expresses the same as the philosophical term “incorporeal”. But naturally Titus believes that the Creation embraces both a spiritual and a material part, see e.g. IV.25, Sy 141.23–24: Christ is “the King of Creation, both the corporeal and the incorporeal” (καὶ βασιλεὺς τοῦ κόσμου καὶ τοῦ ἀσώματος).—It is thus Titus's view that the Creation contains a corporeal and an incorporeal part; there is a visible, corporeal οὐσία and an invisible, incorporeal οὐσία (I.24, Gr. 15.32–33 → Ch. XI.11). Being created, both are different from God's οὐσία, which is also invisible and incorporeal: in I.24 Titus envisages incorporeal angels; but neither they nor we have a part in seeing God κατ' οὐσίαν (Gr. 15.19–25 → Ch. XI.11). Even though in I.23 Titus discusses Manichaean views, it is also clearly his own opinion that God is incorporeal (ἀσώματος, Gr. 14.21) and “removed from any sensory participation” (ἀπηλλαγμένῳ πάσης αἰσθητῆς μετουσίας, Gr. 14.10–11). In II.54 Titus advances the rule πᾶν γὰρ ὄρατόν (ἄτε δὴ σῶμα τυγχάνον) ἀντιτίταται φύσει τῷ ἀοράτῳ καὶ ἀσωμάτῳ (Gr. 60.2–3), and here the difference refers to the sun and God as Creator of the sun (Gr. 59.39–60.5; cf. also Dölger 1930, 309 concerning this text).

³⁵ Titus admits, however, that purely intellectually or conceptually (τῇ ἐννοίᾳ, Gr. 6.37, 7.35) it is possible to distinguish between God's being (τό εἶναι) and God's quality (τό τοιούδε εἶναι) (Gr. 6.37–7.4, 7.35–36 → Ch. XI.5).

³⁶ See Aristotle, Met. VII,1,5 (1028a31); XII,7,3–4 (1072a31ff.) (cf. Meijering 1974, 81) (incidentally Plato also writes in Rep. 380d that God is ἀπλοῦς). Aristotle thought that God belongs to the category of substance (Eth. Nic. I,6,3 [1096a23–25]). Already in Clement of Alexandria we find a negative theology in which God is beyond all categories (esp. Strom. V.11 [71.1–5] [Stählin 1906, 373.24–374.24]; V.12 [81.5–82.4] [Stählin 1906, 380.18–381.13]); in Strom. V.12 (81.5–6) Clement underlines that God is without any accident; Früchtel 1937, 592 has proved that the same passage is found almost word for word in Alkinoos, Did. X (165.4–8), which must at least mean that the two writers have used the same source (cf. Lilla 1971, 214–15; Wyrwa 1983, 269–72; Pannenberg 1996, 77–78; Dörrie 1976, 187–88). The Platonic tenet (e.g. in Alkinoos and Porphyry) that Aristotle's categories cannot be applied to the highest principle (see Dörrie 1976, 187–88; cf. 300–1) is not quite the same as Titus's teaching that quality only concerns the Creation; his view does not rep-

It is now clear that when Titus underlines in particular that virtue and vice are “separable qualities” that may be present or absent, it is in order to stress the difference from God, for whom “goodness” is not a quality that He possesses, but is what He is; we find the very same idea in Origen, for example.³⁷ Thus Titus’s disinterest in resent a completely negative theology, since despite everything God is a substance.—When Titus says that “none of the things that He is called is something else beside Him”, it is also reminiscent of a Platonic theory which in the end goes back to Xenophanes’s attack on the anthropomorphisms of popular religion. Xenophanes appears to have written that God “is wholly sight, wholly mind, wholly hearing” (οὐλος ὄραϊ, οὐλος δὲ νοεῖ, οὐλος δὲ τ’ ἀκούει [Diels and Kranz 1951, 135, B 24 (= Sextus Empiricus, Adv. Math. IX.144, Mutschmann 1914, 246 [422.26])]; the quotation is also testified to elsewhere, see further Schoedel 1959, 26; Grant 1967, 104). This understanding of God was already quite widespread in Greek patristics; thus in Irenaeus, Adv. haer. II.13,3: “Multum enim distat omnium Pater ab his quae proueniunt hominibus adfectionibus et passionibus, et simplex et non compositus et similibrembribus et totus ipse sibimetipsi similis et aequalis est, totus cum sit sensus et totus spiritus et totus sensuabilitas et totus ennoia et totus ratio et totus auditus et totus oculus et totus lumen et totus fons omnium bonorum” (Rousseau and Doutreleau 1982, 114, 116); cf. also I.12,2; II.13,8; II.28,4; IV.11,2 (cf. Schoedel 1959, 26, 28–29; Grant 1967, 104–5). Also Clement of Alexandria, Strom. VII.2 (5.5) (Stählin 1909, 6.1–2); VII.7 (37.6) (Stählin 1909, 29.14–15) (cf. Grant 1967, 104). In Ref. I.14,1 Hippolytus also refers to the Xenophanes quotation, but in this case it is not an example of Hippolytus’s own opinion, but a summary of Xenophanes’s teaching.—As can be seen, in the passage quoted Irenaeus, like Titus, emphasises that God is “simple and uncompounded”; this formulation appears to have been a topos in Platonic and Christian literature, cf. e.g. Origen in Contra Cels. IV.14 (Borret 1968, 218), more distantly De princ. I.1,6 (Koetschau 1913, 21.11–12.17–18.19–20, 22.1). Cf. also but more distantly Alkinoos, Did. X (166.5–7). In Basilides’s extremely negative theology these two attributes are negated just after one another (οὐχ ἀπλοῦν, οὐ σύνθετον, Hippolytus, Ref. VII.21,1 [Wendland 1916, 196, 16]). “Uncompounded” is an amplification of “simple”, in that “compounded” means compounded of substance and qualities (accidents), as is clear, for example, from passages in Athanasius, thus Ep. ad Afr. 8 (PG 26, 1044B) (τὸ θέλειν καὶ τὸ μὴ θέλειν ἰσότητος ἴδια, and if one therefore uses these concepts about God, one is saying that God is σύνθετος ἐκ ποιότητος καὶ οὐσίας, even though God in reality is not σύνθετος, but ἀπλή ἐστιν οὐσία, ἐν ᾗ οὐκ ἔνι ποιότης [cf. Meijering 1974, 81]) or De Decr. 22 (PG 25, 453C: Εἰ μὲν οὖν τὸν Θεὸν ἡγεῖται τις εἶναι σύνθετον, ὡς ἐν τῇ οὐσίᾳ τὸ συμβεβηκός . . .) (cf. also that God is not σύνθετος in Ep. ad Aeg. et Lib. 16 [PG 25, 573B]).

³⁷ Based on 1 Tim. 6.16 Origen thus emphasises in In Jo. II.18 (124–25) (Blanc 1966, 288–91) that since only God has immortality, none of the rational creatures substantially (οὐσιωδῶς) possesses immortality as a συμβεβηκός ἀχώριστον. In other places Origen similarly emphasises that only God is good οὐσιωδῶς/substantialiter, while created beings can only be good κατὰ συμβεβηκός/accidentaliter; their goodness is something that comes and goes (see Contra Cels. VI.44 [Borret 1969, 286]; De princ. I.2,4 [Koetschau 1913, 31.16–32.2]; I.2,10 [Koetschau 1913, 44.11–21]; I.2,13 [Koetschau 1913, 46.11–48.8]; I.5,3 [Koetschau 1913, 72.19–73.6]; I.5,5 [Koetschau 1913, 77.19–78.5]; I.6,2 [Koetschau 1913, 80.10–14]; I.8,3 [Koetschau 1913, 100.11–101.3]; II.9,2 [Koetschau 1913, 165.17–24]; IV.4,8 [Koetschau 1913, 360.10ff.]; IV.4,10 [Koetschau 1913, 363.14ff.]). Correspondingly Origen explains emphasising that virtue and vice as ἕξεις are relatively lasting or stable stems from this particular approach to the problem.

On the basis of the account that I have now summarised Titus then builds up his criticism of Manichaean teaching: since the two principles are both named and described identically (as a “living and uncreated substance”), they cannot be opposites, nor can they possess besides the contrary qualities of “good” and “evil” when the uncreated substance does not have qualities: those things which God is called coincide with His substance (Gr. 6.32–7.4, 7.31–8.16). The two substances are therefore either both good or both evil. Only ironically does Titus accept that both could be evil, for his opinion is that the uncreated is also good (Gr. 7.36–8.3). So the two good uncreated substances must be the same and be the cause of all else:

But if being is in complete accord with being, then that is one which alone is in truth and which is the origin of everything's being.” (Gr. 8.15–16).³⁸

Thus Titus maintains that God is a simple, uncompounded substance and therefore without qualities. This concept of God probably has Aristotelian roots, but must without doubt be understood on the background of the Platonic tradition as continued by earlier Catholic writers. A few brief remarks will serve to outline the context in which Titus's concept of God is to be understood.

Among the Platonic philosophers the status of the first principle was debated for a very long time. Many Middle Platonists believed that the first principle was νοῦς; this was the doctrine of Aristotle, according to which God is νοῦς and a simple substance who has Himself as the object of His thought (Metaphysica XII,6–10 [1071b3–1076a4]); also Xenocrates (396–314 BCE), the second leader of the Academy after Plato, claimed that God is νοῦς, perhaps influenced by Aristotle. The Middle Platonists made the object of God's thought in In Matth. XV.10 (Klostermann 1935, 373.28–377.27) that in the proper sense “good” is only used about God, but in a weakened sense the word can also be used about good deeds, people, trees etc. Cf. Koch 1932, 25; Meijering 1974, 67, 78; Vogt 1990, 145 n. 24.—Just like Origen, Athanasius later believed that God was a substance without accidents; thus Contra Ar. I,14 (PG 26, 41B); I,20 (PG 26, 53A–B); I,36 (PG 26, 88A); III,65 (PG 26, 460B); De decr. 12 (PG 25, 444C); 22 (PG 25, 453C); De syn. 52 (PG 26, 788B); Ep. ad Aeg. et Lib. 16 (PG 25, 573B).

³⁸ εἰ δὲ τὸ ὄν τῷ ὄντι πάντως ὁμόλογον, ἐν τὸ καὶ μόνον ἀληθῶς ὄν τοῖς πᾶσι τοῦ εἶναι ἄρχον.

Plato's "ideas", which thus became "God's thoughts"; also this tenet, which is not Aristotelian, may come from Xenocrates, even though it is first testified to in Philo. The doctrines that God has Himself as the object of His thought or that He contains all ideas, appeared to threaten other important doctrines, which had to do with the transcendence, simplicity and unity of God. The Middle Platonists found these doctrines expressed in different places in Plato's dialogues; above all they built on a passage in De republica (VI,509b9), where he writes that:

the good is not being [or "substance"], but lies beyond being and exceeds it with regard to dignity and power (οὐκ οὐσίας ὄντος τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, ἀλλ' ἔτι ἐπέκεινα τῆς οὐσίας πρεσβεία καὶ δυνάμει ὑπερέχοντος), and on the first hypothesis in Plato's Parmenides (137c–142a), where the one is denied all predicates. Since being and thinking in the Platonic tradition are similar or even identical, the question arises of whether the highest principle does not transcend both οὐσία and νοῦς. Already in the first Academy this question had probably been in dispute, as a fragment suggests from one of Aristotle's exoteric works (De Oratore, Περὶ εὐχῆς): "God is either mind or also beyond mind" (ὁ θεὸς ἢ νοῦς ἐστὶν ἢ καὶ ἐπέκεινά τι τοῦ νοῦ). Moreover there was disagreement among Platonic philosophers on who the Creator (the Demiurge) that Plato speaks of in Timaeus, actually was; only a few of them (e.g. Atticus) made the Demiurge the first principle. While the Middle Platonists did not reach any common resolution of these problems, such a solution is to be found in Plotinus's metaphysical system, where the one is both beyond οὐσία and νοῦς, so that νοῦς becomes the second hypostasis and is identified with the Demiurge.³⁹

On the background of Plato's dictum in De republica VI,509b9 and the general disagreement among the Middle Platonists it is not surprising that the Catholic writers also hesitated when faced with the question of whether God is beyond οὐσία and νοῦς. For the Catholic philosophers the problem was further complicated by the challenge that the philosophical concept of God had to be combined with the ideas of God that could be found in Scripture. Already from a biblical background “substance” (οὐσία) for the Catholic writers must be the most appropriate designation that could be used about God; for God says Ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ ὢν in Ex. 3.14LXX (cf. Wis. 13.1).

³⁹ According to Aetius, Plac. I.7,30 (Stobaeus, Eclog. I.1 [2,29]) (Diels 1879, 304b6–7) (= Parente 1982, 130–31, fr. 213) Xenocrates claimed that the first principle or God is νοῦς. See further Dillon 1996, 13, 24, 29.—Aristotle, Περὶ εὐχῆς, Valentinus Rose in Bekker 1870, fr. 46 (1483a27–28) = Simplicius, In De caelo II.12, Heiberg 1894, 485.121–22. Examples of the Middle Platonists' very different solution to these problems can be found in Dillon 1996, 126–28, 199–200, 254–55, 259–60, 280–84, 312–13, 346–47, 355, 357, 363, 366–72, 443. See also Whittaker 1969 with further references.

Thus Clement of Alexandria alludes several times to De republica VI,509b9: the true dialectic ascends to the οὐσία, which is the mightiest of all, and then dares to go beyond (ἐπέκεινα) to the God of the universe (Stromata I.28 [177.1]). The mightiest οὐσία is the Son (Λόγος).⁴⁰ Similarly, Clement explains in Stromata VII.1 (2.2–3) that the Son is the timeless, beginningless beginning (ἀρχή), who is the first fruit of all existing things; through him we can apprehend the transcendent principle (τὸ ἐπέκεινα αἴτιον), the Father of the world.⁴¹ Although Clement does not directly deny here that God is an οὐσία, it nevertheless seems implicit.⁴² Occasionally, on the other hand, Clement claims that God is being, for example in Paedagogus I.8, where he admittedly first (71.1) writes: “but God is one and beyond the one and above the Monad itself” (ἐν δὲ ὁ θεὸς καὶ ἐπέκεινα τοῦ ἑνὸς καὶ ὑπὲρ αὐτὴν μονάδα) (as elsewhere in Clement μονάς here denotes the Son). Clement continues, however, by claiming that God alone is in truth, who was, is and is to come (Rev. 11.17), for which reason He also has received the name of ὁ ὢν (Ex. 3.14) (71.2).⁴³ One possible interpretation is that Clement regards the Father as being, because the Father is νοῦς,⁴⁴ but it is difficult to make this ⁴⁰ Stählin 1906, 109.7–9; see on this Wyrwa 1983, 128–31. See also Pannenberg 1996, 78–79 on the Church fathers' attitude to these questions.

⁴¹ Stählin 1909, 4.5–7.—Although the Son contains the world of (Platonic) ideas as “God's thoughts” (see e.g. Strom. V.3 [16.3] [Stählin 1906, 336.8–9] and further Lilla 1971, 201–12), Clement can also underline the Son's transcendence in relation to the world and the world of ideas; referring to Eph. 1.21, Phil. 2.9, he writes in Strom. V.6 (38.6) that the Lord is above the world, indeed even beyond the intelligible (ἐπέκεινα τοῦ νοητοῦ) (Stählin 1906, 352.13–14), cf. the interpretation in Wyrwa 1983, 130.

⁴² Cf. Whittaker 1969, 93–94: when the Son in Strom. VII.1 (2.2–3) is ἀπαρχὴ τῶν ὄντων, then τὸ ἐπέκεινα αἴτιον must be ἐπέκεινα τῆς οὐσίας.

⁴³ Stählin 1905, 131.18–21. Lilla 1971, 204–7, 216; Wyrwa 1983, 130 with n. 35. Cf. Strom. VI.16 (137.3) (Stählin 1906, 501.14–19) (cf. Whittaker 1969, 94). Cf. also Strom. IV.25 (162.5) (Stählin 1906, 320.16–17), where God is called οὐσία (cf. Stead 1977, 162).

⁴⁴ See Protr. X (98.4) (Stählin 1905, 71.25); Strom. IV.25 (155.2) (Stählin 1906, 317.11); V.11 (73.1–3) (Stählin 1906, 375.11–21); thus Lilla 1971, 222–24. Wyrwa

interpretation accord with Clement's negative theology; moreover he also maintains that God is above all thought and thus cannot be grasped by human reason e.g. in Stromata V.10 (65.2): "For the God of the universe, who is above all speech, all conception, all thought . . ." ⁴⁵ In Stromata V.12 (82.1–2), however, Clement attempts a solution which hardly, as Whittaker believes, can be said to be an expression of quandary. All our designations for God, such as the one, the good, νοῦς, the being itself, Father, God, Creator, Lord, do not express God's name, but merely refer to the power of the Almighty. ⁴⁶ It is thus only figurative when Clement calls the Father οὐσία; Clement's real intention is that He is beyond οὐσία. This understanding of God is thus rather different from Titus's view.

On the other hand Titus seems to have been in line with Origen's views in De principiis, where he states that the Father is νοῦς (mens); also "Monad and unity" (μονὰς καὶ ἐνότης) are predicates that Origen sets on the Father, and therefore he also speaks of the Father's substantia and natura. This natura, however, is simplex (De principiis I.1,6). ⁴⁷ The Father is also incomprehensibilis and inaestimabilis; if we are to perceive or understand God, we must assume that He is much better than our perception of Him (De principiis I.1,5). ⁴⁸ Only the Son contains the world of (Platonic) ideas (De principiis I.2,2–3). ⁴⁹ But in passages in Contra Celsum, Origen treats the issue of God's transcendence in relation to substance as an open question, e.g. in Contra Celsum VI.64, he discusses the issue of God's transcendence and proposes (1983, 130 with n. 35), however, believes that it was Clement's own opinion that God is "nicht- und überseiend"; when he regards God as ὁ ὄν, he is inconsistent. Wyrwa refuses to include the passages where Clement calls God νοῦς to interpret passages where God is called "being", in that here he believes that all that is invisible seen from the perspective of the material world can be regarded as the intelligible. As far as I can see, Wyrwa is right in saying that Clement's own opinion is that God is beyond being. But cannot such statements that God is ὁ ὄν also be seen as figurative statements from the material world's perspective, in that real being is not due to it either—so that there is no need to speak of an inconsistency here?

⁴⁵ ὁ γὰρ τῶν ὅλων θεὸς ὁ ὑπὲρ πᾶσαν φωνὴν καὶ πᾶν νόημα καὶ πᾶσαν ἔννοιαν . . ., Stählin 1906, 369.26–27; transl. by William Wilson in Roberts and Donaldson 1994, 460. See Lilla 1971, 217–20; Wyrwa 1983, 270. Wyrwa finds allusions here to Phil. 4.7 and Eph. 3.20.—Also Strom. II.2 (6.1) (Stählin 1906, 115.28–116.4) must mean that God is above ἔννοια.

⁴⁶ Stählin 1906, 380.25–381.3; cf. Whittaker 1969, 94.

⁴⁷ Koetschau 1913, 20.24ff.

⁴⁸ Koetschau 1913, 20.5ff.

⁴⁹ Koetschau 1913, 28.13–31.4.

that the Son is “the substance of substances” or “the idea of ideas”, and that the Father is beyond all this, thereby implying that the Father is beyond every οὐσία, including intelligible οὐσία.⁵⁰

If one wishes to maintain that God is both a substance and transcendent, one could turn to Athanasius's solution, which was that it is only every created οὐσία that God transcends. According to Athanasius God is the one and the being (τὸν ἕνα καὶ ὄντα, Θεὸν λέγω, Contra gentes 3.23), but nevertheless in Contra gentes 2.6–7 Athanasius writes that God “is beyond all being and human thought” (ὁ ὑπερέκεινα πάσης οὐσίας καὶ ἀνθρωπίνης ἐπινοίας ὑπάρχων);⁵¹ here οὐσία is expanded with ἐπινοία, corresponding to the expansion with νοῦς. However, in Contra gentes 35.3 (“being above all created being”, ἐπέκεινα πάσης γεννητῆς οὐσίας ὑπάρχων) and in Contra gentes 40.12 (“beyond all created being”, ὑπερέκεινα πάσης γεννητῆς οὐσίας)⁵² it becomes clear that here Athanasius understands οὐσία as “created substance”, which includes both the material world and the angels and other intelligible beings. Meijering has pointed out that Athanasius often uses the word ἐπινοία in connection with the worshipping of idols (e.g. Contra gentes 2.4); correspondingly, in Contra gentes 2.6–7 it may mean “perverted imagination” rather than “thought”, making it a polemical remark against the worshipping of idols: unlike the pagans' gods the true God is beyond every creature and man's perverted imaginations.⁵³

Clement and Origen were perhaps in doubt as to whether God

⁵⁰ Ζητητέον δὲ καὶ, εἰ οὐσίαν μὲν οὐσιῶν λεκτέον καὶ ἰδέαν ἰδεῶν καὶ ἀρχὴν τὸν μονογενῆ καὶ πρωτότοκον “πάσης κτίσεως” ἐπέκεινα δὲ πάντων τούτων τὸν πατέρα αὐτοῦ καὶ θεόν (Borret 1969, 340). Similarly Contra Cels. VII.38 (Borret 1969a, 100): Νοῦν τοίνυν ἢ ἐπέκεινα νοῦ καὶ οὐσίας λέγοντες εἶναι ἀπλοῦν καὶ ἀόρατον καὶ ἀσώματον τὸν τῶν ὅλων θεόν . . . See Whittaker 1969, 92–93; Stead 1977, 140–41, 152, 161–62, 168, 169 with n. 23, 186–87, 277. A similar unclarified formulation is perhaps also found in In Jo. XIX.6 (37) (Blanc 1982, 68): through Logos, the truth, one reaches τὸ ἐνιδεῖν τῇ οὐσίᾳ ἢ τῇ ὑπερέκεινα τῆς οὐσίας δυνάμει καὶ φύσει τοῦ θεοῦ.

⁵¹ Transl. by Thomson 1971, 7.

⁵² Transl. of Contra gent. 35.3 in Thomson 1971, 95, and transl. of Contra gent. 40.12 in Thomson 1971, 111.

⁵³ Meijering 1974, 6–8, 126; Meijering 1984, 15–16; Stead 1977, 161.—Meijering (1974, 7; 1975, 9–10) and Van Winden 1971, 73 believe moreover that we already find the sense of “beyond created οὐσία” in Justin, Dial. IV,1 and perhaps in Irenaeus, Dem. 3. Concerning Justin on the other hand Whittaker 1969, 91–92 believes that there is the same uncertainty as he observes in Clement and Origen.—As far as I can see, Origen's solution in In Gen. III (Philoc. 23,20, Junod 1976, 198) points in the same direction; here God is seen as a νοῦς ἀγέννητος, who is ὑπὲρ πάσαν φύσιν (see also on this passage n. 4 in Junod 1976, 199; Benjamins 1994, 81 n. 58).

was a substance or beyond substance, but it is clear that Titus unambiguously maintains that God is a substance. Titus's teaching on the transcendence of God is contained in the distinction between created and uncreated substances, and therefore he could just as well have used Athanasius's reinterpretation of Plato, De republica VI,509b9. Except that he did not know of it. The only allusion to the Plato passage is to be found in Contra Manichaeos III.11,3, where Titus writes that God is "wise beyond all conception" (σοφὸς πάσης ἐννοίας ἐπέκεινα, ed.N 304.18–19 → Ch. XI.36), and here Titus has completely omitted any talk of God being "beyond substance", doubtless because he prefers to say that God is an uncreated substance. According to Titus, God thus differs from the other substances by in the first place being simple and without qualities, and in the second place by being the only one to be uncreated.⁵⁴

The terms ἀγένητος and γένητος can be translated as "uncreated and created" or "unoriginated and originated". Already in Plato it is a fixed predicate of the world of phenomena that it "becomes" (e.g. Timaeus 27d), and Titus is keeping for the most part to this philosophical tradition when he claims that God alone is ἀγένητος.⁵⁵ The difference between that which is and that which becomes is also fundamental to Titus's ontology, but at the same time other passages in Contra Manichaeos show that γένητος must have a further dimension of meaning, so that Titus nevertheless believes otherwise than Plato; he represents a Christian (Catholic) ontology. For according to Titus God allows the non-existing things (τὰ μὴ ὄντα) to have a share in being; the unoriginated things have come into being from the non-existing (III.10,4 and 13; III.11,1–2).⁵⁶ In Titus these for-⁵⁴ As far as I can see, Titus does not say anywhere outright that God is νοῦς; thus on this significant point he does not use Aristotelian ideas. But he does say that God's ineffable σοφία has created and ordered the whole world (e.g. II.2, Gr. 26.16–17; II.48, Gr. 56.20), and he can speak of God's σοφία and the ineffable and incomprehensible νοῦς (II.48, Gr. 56.24–25 → Ch. XI.30). Elsewhere, however, he can claim that God's wisdom transcends νοῦς: "But what can we then say about God's wisdom—being beyond every intellect—which it is fitting that we both stand in awe of and honour both when we understand it and when we do not?" (Gr. 56.36–37 → Ch. XI.31). Another expression for God's transcendence is found as mentioned in II.37 (see above p. 29 and below p. 325).—The Aristotelian features in Titus's concept of God are altogether selective; thus we do not find anything about God being the unmoved telos for all movement etc.

⁵⁵ See further Lebreton 1926.

⁵⁶ See also the brief remarks in IV.4 (things are created by God הוּבַר אֱלֹהִים),

Demiurge put order into matter, can be preserved.⁵⁹ Titus is very careful in his formulations: God is a creator by nature, but this does not mean that He creates out of a necessity of nature, ἀνάγκη . . . τῆς φύσεως (ed.N 302.13) (that is, that God has to create and is not free); rather it means that he does not deliberate or learn by experiment (III.10,2).⁶⁰ Titus also emphasises God's independence by underlining that it is not a question of God Himself needing the Creation; God is perfect (III.10,3.8–9). Precisely because God must not be dependent on the things He creates and provides benefits for, these things must be created or originated, because being good God needs something to be good towards, He created (III.10,4–15).⁶¹

Titus's concept of God, which involves there being only a single principle, has obvious philosophical roots; these roots, however, seem to have a somewhat composite character. Titus does not follow the form of negative theology dominant among the Platonists, where God is beyond οὐσία. For Titus God is a substance, a view that also has a biblical background but which in a philosophical context is particularly Aristotelian, even though it was also continued by certain Platonists. When Titus further defines God as a simple substance, i.e. a substance without qualities (accidents), he is also continuing Aristotelian and Platonic ideas, and it is probably his opinion that God is νοῦς, even though he does not state this explicitly.

In spite of his teaching on God's substantial nature Titus claims ⁵⁹ As is common in patristic exegesis (see May 1978, 146–47), Titus explains in IV.111 that Gen. 1.2 refers to the unformed world, which, however, had already been created (Gen. 1.1) (Sy 184.18–22).—Titus also alludes to Tim. 29e elsewhere, see below . . . The logical contradiction between Athanasius's teaching of creatio ex nihilo and his use of Tim. 29e, as observed by Stead 1980, 389 n. 2 and Meijering 1989, 51, can also be extended to Titus: in Plato it makes sense to say that the Demiurge will not withhold anything from the chaotic matter, but it is difficult to see the meaningfulness in claiming that the Creator will not withhold anything from the absolute nothingness: "Für Missgunst ist die Existenz desjenigen, dem man etwas missgönnt, unerlässlich, aber nach Athanasius existiert vor der Schöpfung ausser Gott ja gerade nichts". Meijering believes that the Catholic writers used Tim. 29e, because it was a useful weapon in the polemic against Marcion, but that "diese Waffe . . . auch gegen die Lehre von der Schöpfung aus dem Nichts verwendet werden könnte, darum kümmerten orthodoxe Theologen sich offenbar nicht." (Meijering 1989, 51).

⁶⁰ God does not therefore create like a human artist, which is a set theme in Early Catholic literature; see further May 1978, 75, 163–64, 173.

⁶¹ Also these ideas are traditional in Early Catholic literature; see thus Irenaeus, Adv. haer. IV.13,4; IV.14,1; cf. May 1978, 179.

that there is a fundamental ontological difference between God and the other substances, and this view contains both peculiar Christian (Catholic) and Platonic elements. Ontologically Titus thus distinguishes between the one, uncreated substance and the other substances that are created from nothing. There is no eternal matter. In this regard Titus is a Catholic Christian, not a Platonist, but his Christian ontology is Platonising⁶² insofar as it integrates a number of elements that derive from Platonism. The Creation is divided into both an invisible, incorporeal part, and a visible, corporeal part; God and the invisible creature are both incorporeal. Titus's thinking is also based on the difference between that which is and that which comes into being.

Our examination so far seems to have confirmed the picture of Titus's philosophical position which I outlined above in the section on the history of scholarship. Titus's concept of God is probably taken from a Platonism that integrates Aristotelian elements, but with Christian modifications. In this context I have not found examples of Stoic elements in Titus's thought, but these exist in other contexts⁶³ and accord well with the fact that the Platonism of Late Antiquity also contained many ideas of Stoic origin.

If the Aristotelian elements in Titus's concept of God are mediated via Platonism, this may also be true of the more extensive use of elements from Aristotelian logic, which we noted particularly in Contra Manichaeos I.13. However, this observation does not determine whether Titus actually read Categoriae and other works by Aristotle or merely works by other writers who employed Aristotelian concepts and forms of thought. Thus, for example, the Platonist Alkinoos ("Albinus"—from the middle of the 2nd cent. CE) incorporated Aristotelian logic into his Didascalicus (Vff.), but assigned the entire philosophy to Plato; however, by the 4th century it is perhaps equally imaginable that Titus indeed read Categoriae, if he was educated at a real philosophical school.⁶⁴ Categoriae introduced the collection of ⁶² I am attempting here to apply Meijering's distinction: "Gibt es also keine christlichen Platoniker, so gibt es doch platonisierende Christen" (Meijering 1975, 13 [quotation]–14, 135).

⁶³ See e.g. below pp. 280, 306–7.

⁶⁴ Titus is naturally an educated man with school training, but this does not necessarily mean that he has trained among philosophers. For a certain amount of philosophy was incorporated in an education in rhetoric. See further on philosophical schools in Marrou 1965, 308–22.

Aristotle's writings on logic and was assiduously commentated. In the philosophical schools it was probably at an early time that Categoriae became the basic introduction to philosophy;⁶⁵ at any rate as a result of the efforts of Plotinus's pupil Porphyry (c. 233–305) Categoriae became the standard introduction to logic in the Neo-Platonic schools, together with Porphyry's Isagoge, an introduction and elementary commentary on Categoriae; incidentally, Isagoge and Categoriae retained this function for over a thousand years. Porphyry also wrote two proper commentaries on Categoriae; the shorter one is preserved, while the longer one is lost, but Simplicius's Commentarius in Categorias contains material from earlier lost commentaries.⁶⁶ We saw above that some of Titus's concepts and lines of thought were amenable to interpretation with the aid of these texts.

It is far from certain, however, that Titus himself was educated at a philosophical school, and we must also note that the Church fathers only rarely appear to have had a solid knowledge of Aristotle. Stead believes that in the 2nd–3rd century CE the commentaries on Aristotle were hardly read by other than experts, and that Categoriae was not especially well-known; at any rate the Church fathers seldom mention this text, and what they know of Aristotelian logic appears to come rather from doxographical works and other popular manuals. Admittedly in Refutatio VII.15ff. Hippolytus refers directly to Categoriae; but Clement has only second-hand knowledge of Aristotelian logic, including the definition of homonyms and synonyms that was also widely known because it had been included in textbooks on grammar; it is therefore also mentioned in the works of other Church fathers. Also more philosophical concepts were incorporated into rhetorical works that were in general use for teaching.⁶⁷ This situation had not changed significantly in the 4th century.

I also regard it as unlikely that Titus was educated in philosophy.

⁶⁵ Gottschalk 1987; cf. also Lloyd 1955–56, 64; Strange 1992, 7–8, 32 with n. 13.

⁶⁶ Blumenthal 1996, 54.

⁶⁷ Stead 1963, 54–55; Stead 1977, esp. 110–13, 117, 125, 141; Dihle 1987, esp. 69. It is in Strom. VIII.6 (17.1ff.) (Stählin 1909, 90.9ff.) that Clement presents his second-hand knowledge of Aristotelian logic. In Strom. VII.16 (101.4) (Stählin 1909, 71.18) it is Chrysippus whom Clement gives prominence to as the great dialectician, while Aristotle is underlined for his knowledge of nature.—Also Origen's use of Aristotelian ideas appears second-hand and moreover very limited; see Bardy 1932a.—Runia 1989 does not illuminate the question, because it has to do with a doxographical question (“Aristotle in the Greek Patres”, not “Aristotelianism in the Greek Patres”).

In the above chapters I drew attention to several peculiarities in Titus's terminology. It is true that we could explain why Titus uses the Aristotelian term ἕξις to claim that virtue and vice are not stable or permanent qualities, but it remains an open question as to why Titus does not use the term "synonyms", if that is what he is speaking of in connection with the two principles having the same name and description. Why does Titus not use the precise technical term accident (συμβεβηκός), but speaks instead of qualities that come (ἐπισυμβαίνειν) and go (ἄποσυμβαίνειν)? Why does he speak of the "inseparable quality" and not the "inseparable accident"? It would suggest that Titus had not actually read Aristotle himself, as one must assume would have been the case if he had been educated in a Neo-Platonic school. Nevertheless, even though Titus did not attend a philosophical school, his library may well have contained philosophical textbooks. Thus the concept ὑπογραφή suggests that Titus knew of a text from the same philosophical tradition as the commentaries on Aristotle. "The raven" is used as an example of the same subject in Titus and in Porphyry's Isagoge. But Isagoge is hardly Titus's direct source; there are also too many terminological deviations between this text and Titus's account. However, the whole of Contra Manichaeos I.13, with its examples of milk and ravens, bears the stamp of an "introductory textbook". We might therefore consider whether Titus used a now-vanished philosophical textbook in the same style as Porphyry's Isagoge. Titus's account in Contra Manichaeos IV.19 of Aristotle's teaching on matter, treated above,⁶⁸ could even be based on this textbook. It is a much simpler hypothesis, however, to assume that Titus's imprecise terminology is due to the fact that he is building on an earlier anti-Manichaean writing, presumably by George of Laodicea, which combined Porphyry's Isagoge with other material. Titus, who did not himself have first-hand knowledge of this literature, did not always understand which of the concepts were the central technical terms that he should adduce in his summary of George's argument. Similarities with Didymus's polemic could perhaps also support the assumption that Titus is building on an earlier text, in that they could both be dependent on a third writer, but this is uncertain and could be explained in other ways.⁶⁹

⁶⁸ See above pp. 256–58.

⁶⁹ Titus, Contra Manich. I.13 has similarities to Didymus, Contra Manich. I (PG 39,

3. The “common concepts”

Above I quoted Contra Manichaeos I.1 where Titus derived “the way of truth” as much from the “common concepts” (κοινὰ ἔννοιαι) as from the Bible (→ Ch. XI.2); in III.1 he further explained that up to this point his presentation in the first two books was based on the “common concepts” and that this should strengthen the mind (νοῦς), also in those outside the Church, so they did not approve of the blasphemy against the Creator. He would now turn his attention to the issue of the interpretation of the Bible (→ Ch. XI.32). Titus is thus claiming to present a universal argument that is just as relevant for Catholics as for non-Catholics. He has a practical purpose for this approach, namely to alienate pagan groups in relation to the Manichaean mission and instead to forge an anti-Manichaean alliance between the Catholics and the pagans. But the very fact that Titus believes a universal, non-specific Christian argument is possible and legitimate is extremely interesting. His approach seems more to resemble medieval scholasticism than early patristic theology in that he apparently reckons on a ratio, which can be distinguished from the Scriptures’ auctoritas and be treated independently of it. Nevertheless, on this point it is also possible to find more or less complete analogies to Titus’s approach in the major early patristic writers.

Titus would not have found the term κοινὰ ἔννοιαι in the Bible; it is, as Beck and Stroumsa point out, of Stoic origin, where it signals an argument ex consensu omnium gentium, which was used amongst others to claim the existence of the divine. Titus, however, uses not only κοινὰ ἔννοιαι but also a number of other terms which in advance could be thought to mean the same or could be limited in their meaning in relation to κοινὰ ἔννοιαι. Already now we must note that Titus never explains what these terms precisely refer to, which makes an interpretation rather difficult. By way of introduction an overview of the entire terminology will therefore be useful:⁷⁰ 1085C–1088A), but nevertheless a whole range of special features in Titus is lacking in Didymus.—Bennett (2001) reckons on a very limited knowledge of Manichaeism in Didymus and does not argue for dependences on an earlier anti-Manichaean work.

⁷⁰ Cf. also Poirier and Sensal 1990a, 317.

- I. Κοινὰ ἔννοιαι
- I.1 τῶν κοινῶν ἐνοιῶν (Gr. 1.28 → Ch. XI.2),
 קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 3.1).
- I.7 τῶν κοινῶν ἐνοιῶν (Gr. 4.26–27),
 קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ מִיַּת קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 6.14).
- I.12 τῶν κοινῶν ἐνοιῶν (Gr. 6.28–29 → Ch. XI.4), קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 9.5).
- I.15 τὰς κοινὰς ἐνοίας (Gr. 8.34–35 → Ch. XI.6), קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 12.3).
- I.17 τῶν κοινῶν ἐνοιῶν (Gr. 10.25–26),
 קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 14.8).
- III.1 τῶν κοινῶν ἐνοιῶν (Gr. 66.29 → Ch. XI.32),
 קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 82.5).
- II. Αἰ κατὰ φύσιν ἐννοιαι
- I.5 αἰ κατὰ φύσιν ἐννοιαι (Gr. 4.12–13 → Ch. XI.3), קוֹמְיָהוּ קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 5.30–31).
- III. Φυσικοὶ λογισμοί
- I.11 οἱ φυσικοὶ λογισμοί (Gr. 6.17), קוֹמְיָהוּ קוֹמְיָהוּ קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 8.25).
- IV. Οἱ κατὰ φύσιν λογισμοί
- II.44 τοῖς κατὰ φύσιν λογισμοῖς (Gr. 52.33), קוֹמְיָהוּ קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 65.31).
- V. Κοινὴ δόξα
- II.12 κοινὴ δόξη (Gr. 31.31),
 קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 40.11).
- II.23 τὴν κοινὴν δόξαν (Gr. 40.12–13 → Ch. XI.24),
 קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 50.33).
- II.39 τῆς κοινῆς δόξης (Gr. 50.9–10),
 קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 62.26).
- VI. Κοινοὶ λογισμοί
- II.62 τοὺς κοινὸς λογισμούς (Gr. 63.39–64.1), קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 78.35).
- VII. Φυσικὰ ἔννοιαι
- IV.91 τῶν φυσικῶν ἐνοιῶν (PG 18, 1264A → Ch. XI.48), קוֹמְיָהוּ קוֹמְיָהוּ (Sy 172.13).
- VIII. קוֹלֵי קוֹמְיָהוּ
- IV.45 (Sy 151.23).

A priori it is improbable that all these terms should each be technical in the sense that they had different meanings. Before I move on to determining the meaning of the terms in each individual case, I shall include some information on the history of the common concepts and suchlike, which can form the basis of an interpretation.

The general rhetorical argument that refers to a universal consensus was first introduced into Greek thinking when the philosophical interest through the Sophists began to gather around a common human nature. The universal idea of “the gods” could thereby be regarded as “natural”, as is the case in Xenophon’s Memorabilia, where Socrates claims that the idea of the gods is implanted or innate in everyone (Memorabilia I.4,13–16). For Aristotle, common opinions and consensus were part of the phenomena that are altogether the starting-point of philosophy; they may be valid as criteria of the truth, because they too express nature, the common structure for all people, whose highest expression is reason. Aristotle therefore reckoned both with opinions that are generally shared by all mankind and with opinions on which there was only consensus among philosophers. The common consensus served amongst others to confirm theories that could be established on the basis of other, stricter grounds.

The consensus hominum argument was also further developed by the Stoics with their teaching on κοινὰ ἔννοια, where it was linked to a systematic theory of cognition and psychology.⁷¹ Scholars disagree, however, on how these κοινὰ ἔννοια should be situated and understood in relation to other Stoic concepts and the Old Stoic teaching in its entirety. The disagreement comes about because the source material is insufficient; we possess only fragments of Old and Middle Stoicism, and only late Stoic writings are preserved in their entirety; various interpretations can be briefly named. According to Bonhöffer’s theory, which almost everyone has now abandoned, the common concepts are innate to man, albeit only in embryo, and are developed independently of the sense perception.⁷² Instead on the basis of the Old Stoic view that cognition can only be achieved through sense perception, it follows that every concept comes into being through the central commanding organ of the human soul, τὸ ἡγεμονικόν, apprehending the general characteristics in a long series of similar “presentations” that are stored in the memory but which originally arose through movements outside man when he perceives through his senses. Προλήψεις or “natural concepts”, φυσικαὶ ἔννοιαι, are a group of undeveloped concepts that are formed naturally or unconsciously in the child, and in Sandbach’s opinion κοινὰ ἔννοιαι are to be understood as the sub-group of προλήψεις that is universal. Pohlenz on the other hand claimed that those common concepts which are value judgements, although not innate, do not originate solely from the perception of the external world but also from man’s inner perception of himself; e.g. the idea of “the gods” is also to be regarded as a προλήψις, developed from man’s inner perception of himself, namely as a reasoning by analogy from the inner feeling of inadequacy and dependence. According to Todd, κοινὰ ἔννοιαι must definitely not be regarded as a sub-group under προλήψεις, but as generalisations formed on the basis of προλήψεις and shared by all people. While the “natural concepts” are criteria of truth in relation to the “presentations”, κοινὰ ἔννοιαι constitute an a posteriori criterion of truth for theories which on another basis (presumably as logical deductions) are established by the reason.⁷³

⁷¹ Jaeger 1960, 206 n. 44, 94, 226 n. 36, 114, 172–79, 247–48; Oehler 1969, 235–42; Todd 1973, 47, 59, 60–61, 62, 72–73 n. 78; Owen 1968, 167–77; Lloyd 1991, 21.

⁷² Bonhöffer 1890, 187–232; cf. Sandbach 1996, 22–23.

Whether or not the Stoics’ “common concepts” were a sub-group under προλήψεις, the distinctions were eradicated when other philosophical movements, e.g. Middle Platonists and Peripatetics, took over Stoic terminology, and the distinction was no longer made between κοινὰ ἔννοιαι, φυσικαὶ ἔννοιαι and προλήψεις. Frequently the common concepts were regarded precisely as innate ideas, thus also in Cicero, through whom they acquired tremendous historical influence on thinking in the west.⁷⁴ Insofar as this terminology and the meanings linked to it were also adopted by Catholic writers, we must assume that the mediation to them may have taken place via many and various philosophical schools and not merely via the Stoics. In order to understand the degree to which the reception of this terminology was a matter of course for the Church fathers, it is imperative to realise that even though the NT texts do not speak directly of κοινὰ ἔννοια, we nevertheless find there certain fundamental ideas which have their origin in a Stoicism watered down into popular philosophy and which continued into the time of the Church fathers in the general culture of the educated. For the Church fathers there was a clear coincidence of canon and culture in this area. Of particular importance here is Rom. 2.14–15, where Paul envisages a natural ethical knowledge, and Acts 17.22–31, where man is in kinship with God and where God can be known from the order of the world, an idea which again is found in Rom. 1.19ff. The inner knowledge in Rom. 2.14–15 corresponds to the common, ethical concepts.⁷⁵

⁷³ Sandbach 1996; Pohlenz 1948, 54–59; Pohlenz 1949, 32–35; Todd 1973.—An account of later scholarship debate, which however does not take into consideration all the relevant contributions, is also to be found in Kugelman 1986, 113–21.

⁷⁴ See Todd 1973, 61–62 on the blurring of the terminological differences.—See Pohlenz 1948, 58, 355; Oehler 1969, 243–46; Dillon 1996, 67, 68–69, 92, 94, 99, 104, 276, 292; Pannenberg 1996, 63 n. 66, 99–101, 118, 158–59 on the “common concepts” in Antiochus of Ascalon, the Middle Platonists generally and Cicero.—See Koch 1932, 234; Witt 1971, 11–12; Lloyd 1955–56, 60–61; Todd 1973, 62; Whittaker and Louis 1990, 84–87 n. 57–67; Dillon 1996, xv, 271, 276, 291–92 esp. on Alkinoos, and Pohlenz 1948, 363; Pohlenz 1949, 177; Todd 1973, 62–63, 72 n. 72–73, 73 n. 80, 74 n. 88 esp. on Plutarch.—See Todd 1973, 47, 59, 60–61, 62, 72 n. 73; Pohlenz 1948, 363; Pohlenz 1949, 177 on the terminology in the “Aristotelian” context.

It therefore comes as no surprise that almost all patristic theologians subscribe to a meaningful, universal “knowledge” of God; God could be known through the order of Creation, man was in kinship with God, and man had a lex naturae in his inner being. This complex of ideas was roughly what in later times was called “natural theology”,⁷⁶ except that we must be aware that in general the Church

⁷⁵ Cf. e.g. Pohlenz 1948, 317 (and 1949, 158), 377 (and 1949, 183–84), 402–4; Michel 1978, 100–1, 121–26; Barr 1993, 21–57; Pannenberg 1988, 87, 131–32.—See Schelkle 1959, 53–55, 58–60, 81ff. concerning the Church fathers’ understanding of Rom. 1.19ff.; 2.14–15.—There are of course also other texts in the canon that could point forward to ideas of a universal ethical knowledge and knowledge of God, e.g. in the OT and in the Apocrypha, which were part of LXX and canonical for the Church fathers; cf. Barr 1993, 58–101.—In this context Gen. 1.26–27 was also a central text for the Church fathers, because their interpretation of the image of God in man as a predisposition for reason (see further below pp. 321–26) was naturally linked to the reference to the use of natural law in Rom. 2.14–15.—In passing, it should be noted that ideas of κοινὰ ἔννοια among the Church fathers should not be confused with their use of the idea of consensus in canon law, e.g. in connection with the election of bishops and conciliar decisions (cf. Oehler 1969, 254ff. concerning this idea of consensus).

⁷⁶ The concept theologia naturalis is admittedly from Antiquity, but it was originally not formulated in contrast to a “supernatural” theology, nor did it refer to a knowledge of God that has its source in man’s nature, but to a knowledge of God’s nature. The modern meaning has arisen partly through the term being used about Cicero’s interpretation of the Stoic κοινὰ ἔννοια as “innate ideas”, partly through this “innate knowledge” being related to a “supernatural knowledge”, the “special revelation”. To shed light on the history of the concept, including modern theological fathers did not conceive of the relationship between “natural theology” and the revelation of Christ as being between a “natural” and a “supernatural” knowledge of God. For the natural knowledge of God is also “revealed”, in that it is the same Logos that first shows God to man’s inner being and through the Creation, and later as incarnate shows God to man. These are degrees or steps in the one and same knowledge of God.⁷⁷ When already Justin Martyr claimed that all peoples have a common ethical knowledge of what is just and sinful, but in consequence of the bad influence of society and evil spirits have lost, or rather suppressed, these “natural concepts” (τὰς φυσικὰς ἐννοίας),⁷⁸ he must be understood in the context of his well-known teaching on man’s reason as part (λόγου σπορά or σπέρμα τοῦ λόγου) of the divine Λόγος which this has sown or implanted (ἐμφυτός) in man and in the philosophers; “it is in the nature of man to know good and evil” (Apologia II.14,2).⁷⁹

Justin was apparently only interested in an innate common ethical knowledge, but in the case of another early apologist, Athenagoras, innate reason also had a physical aspect, a link with the nature and purpose of the creation and man.⁸⁰ The κοινὰ ἔννοιαι ideas swiftly became very much part of the general thought of most of the Church fathers, and since Titus was presumably influenced by Alexandrian theologians, a limitation of comparative material to the Alexandrian Church fathers Clement and Origen is therefore meaningful.⁸¹

Clement of Alexandria believed that by virtue of their innate reason all people are disposed towards knowing God; to some degree this discussions, see Jaeger 1960, 1–10; Von Arnim 1923, 299–300 (SVF II, 1009); Pohlenz 1948, 198; Pohlenz 1949, 100; Augustine, De civ. Dei IV.27; VI.2ff. (esp. VI.5); Pannenberg 1988, 83–94, 120–21; Pannenberg 1996, 99–100; Barr 1993, passim, esp. 1–3.

⁷⁷ Cf. Spanneut 1957, 286–88.

⁷⁸ Dial. XCIII,1 (Archambault 1909a, 94, 96), cf. also Dial. XLVII,2 (Archambault 1909, 210); cf. Pohlenz 1948, 408; Spanneut 1957, 253.

⁷⁹ Transl. in Roberts and Donaldson 1989, 193.—τὸ ἐν τῇ φύσει τῇ τῶν ἀνθρώπων εἶναι τὸ γνωριστικὸν καλοῦ καὶ αἰσχροῦ (Krüger 1915, 72,16–17); cf. Apol. I.46,4–5; II.8,1,4; II.10,8; II.13,3,5–6; Krüger 1915. Cf. Pohlenz 1948, 412–13; Pohlenz 1949, 199; Spanneut 1957, 253; Lilla 1971, 21–26.

⁸⁰ Thus De res. XIII, XIV, XXIV; cf. Pohlenz 1948, 408; Pohlenz 1949, 196; Spanneut 1957, 206–10, 253. Grant 1954 claims that De res. is not a genuine work of Athenagoras, in contrast to Barnard 1984; Pouderon 1992, 330–34.

⁸¹ Cf. also ideas of κοινὰ ἔννοιαι in writers in the tradition of Origen: Eusebius of Caesarea, cf. Pohlenz 1948, 429; Pohlenz 1949, 208; Didymus the Blind, In Gen. 85.2–5, 87.21 (Nautin 1976, 198, 204) (cf. Hammond Bammel 1989, 76, 90 n. 62).

knowledge may be said to be acquired, but all acquire it, because their reason originates from God and is predisposed to achieving this knowledge.⁸² The universal human reason also contains a natural, ethical knowledge,⁸³ and it is also in other contexts the basis of further knowledge.⁸⁴ Clement explained the universal mind by referring to the biblical creation narratives.⁸⁵

According to Origen, Christianity differs from paganism by cor-

⁸² In Strom. I.19 (94.1–7) Clement presents four different explanations of the origin of philosophy. The second possible explanation (Strom. I.19 [94.2] [Stählin 1906, 60.15–18]) is the reference to a knowledge of God by virtue of a “natural concept” (φυσικὴ ἔννοια) or a “common intellect” (κοινὸς νοῦς). As pointed out by Molland 1936, 65–75 the four possible explanations should not be regarded as alternatives that exclude each other.—Cf. also Strom. V.13 (87.2ff.) (Stählin 1906, 383.21ff.).—Man is thus disposed to know God, but beyond the knowledge of God that the philosophers could achieve through their human reason, Clement also states that they received a special, divine inspiration (see Lilla 1971, 16–18).—Clement can say that the general pre-philosophical knowledge of God is “innate and not learned” (ἐμφύτως καὶ ἀδιδάκτως); immediately after, however, he understands it as acquired, in that it arises from the child’s fear (later developed through reasoning of one’s own power), and on this point Clement’s view is close to Stoicism. The original knowledge of God is common to all peoples, and Clement understands it as a προλήψις, a preconception, or faith, πίστις (Strom. V.14 [133.7–9], Stählin 1906, 416.17ff.). Cf. Molland 1936, 67; Kugelmann 1986, 121; Prümm 1937.—The pagans’ general knowledge of God is of course very undeveloped and hazy; cf. Strom. V.14 (134.3), Stählin 1906, 417.19–21; VI.8 (64.5–6), Stählin 1906, 464.7–12.

⁸³ See e.g. Protr. X (95.3) (Stählin 1905, 70.5), where Clement claims that a rational consideration of the good presupposes “an innate faith in the good” (τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ ἔμφυτον . . . πίστιν), or Strom. I.29 (182.1) (Stählin 1906, 111.18–19), where Clement distinguishes between a law that is given together with the creation and is nature’s law, and a law that is given later and is learned; both are from God and in reality are one and the same law.

⁸⁴ See e.g. Strom. VIII.3 (7.5) (Stählin 1909, 83.30) or VIII.1 (2.4) (Stählin 1909, 81.1–2), where Clement requests examinations to find the truth, examinations on the basis both of Scripture and the κοιναὶ ἔννοιαι; cf. Lilla 1971, 13 n. 1. Cf. also Strom. VII.16 (95.9) (Stählin 1909, 68.1–5): as an analogy to Clement’s distinction between the simple faith of the church, where one has only tasted Scripture, and “the Gnostic’s” developed knowledge of truth he says that in ordinary life the expertise of craftsmen surpasses the “common concepts” (κοιναὶ ἔννοιαι) of ordinary people.

⁸⁵ According to Clement human reason is the πνοὴ ζωῆς which according to Gen. 2.7 God breathed into man (Strom. V.13 [87.4], Stählin 1906, 383.20–384.3; V.14 [94.3], Stählin 1906, 388.10–11). By virtue of this breath it is excluded that man can be completely without a concept of the deity (θεΐας ἐννοίας) (Strom. V.13 [87.4]); to this original spiritual equipment Christians are given the Holy Spirit in addition (Strom. V.13 [88.2]) (Stählin 1906, 384.5–6). Cf. Lilla 1971, 13–14; Wyrwa 1983, 283–84.—When man according to Gen. 1.26–27 is created κατ’ εἰκόνα θεοῦ, it means that man’s νοῦς (τὸ ἡγεμονικόν) is an image of the divine εἰκόν, which is Λόγος or God’s Son (Strom. V.14 [94.4–5], Stählin 1906, 388.13–16). Cf. Lilla 1971, 14–15.

responding to the natural cognition of God. He thus emphasises that the Christian faith is in harmony with κοινὰ ἔννοιαι; for ἡ κοινὴ ἔννοια demands that one does not imagine God as corruptible, nor does one honour Him through man-made statues.⁸⁶ The “natural concept” of God has a rather precise content: God is incorruptible, simple, uncompounded and indivisible, even though the Epicureans have not clearly understood this.⁸⁷ The natural knowledge God has its origin both in the contemplation of the universe and in the fact that all rational creatures have a share in the divine Λόγος;⁸⁸ from this it follows that by nature they have certain κοινὰ ἔννοιαι, which imply an ethical consciousness, a common lex naturalis. Through the common concepts the natural law is written in man’s ἡγεμονικόν as his conscience, and this law develops with increasingly greater clarity through the maturation of reason.⁸⁹ It is thus clear that for Origen ⁸⁶ Contra Cels. III.40; Borret 1968, 94. Cf. Koch 1932, 49–50; Chadwick 1984, 104.

⁸⁷ Οὐδὲ γὰρ δεδύνηται οὗτοι τρωνῶσαι τὴν φυσικὴν τοῦ θεοῦ ἔννοιαν ὡς πάντη ἀφάρτου καὶ ἀπλοῦ καὶ ἀσυνθέτου καὶ ἀδιαρέτου (Contra Cels. IV.14; Borret 1968, 218).

⁸⁸ De princ. I.3,6 (Koetschau 1913, 56.19–57.1); In Jo. I.37 (269–75) (Blanc 1966, 194, 196–98); II.2 (13)–3 (33) (Blanc 1966, 214–29); Hom. in Jer. XIV.10 (Nautin and Husson 1977, 84.24–86.30). Cf. Koch 1932, 51–52.

⁸⁹ Lex naturalis/lex naturae: see e.g. In Rom. II.6–7 (8–9) (Hammond Bammel 1990, 130–38); III.2, where the distinction is made between the written laws of the cities, the Mosaic Law and the inner, natural law (Hammond Bammel 1990, 203–13; Scherer 1957, 130–38); III.3–4 (6–7) (Hammond Bammel 1990; 221–35; Scherer 1957, 144–56); VI.8 (Hammond Bammel 1997, 496–506); cf. also Schelkle 1959, 81–82 on Origen’s interpretation of Rom. 2.14.—Cf. the interesting passages in Philoc. 9 (esp. 9.2–3, Harl and De Lange 1983, 352, 354, 356, 358), which probably also come from Origen’s In Rom., see Hammond Bammel 1981. Note esp. Philoc. 9.2.11–14, Harl and De Lange 1983, 354: Παρὰ δὲ πάντα ταῦτα λέγεται νόμος ὁ κατὰ τὰς κοινὰς ἐννοίας ἐνεσπαρμένος τῇ ψυχῇ καὶ, ὡς ὀνομάζει ἡ γραφὴ, ἐγγεγραμμένος τῇ καρδίᾳ λόγος, προστακτικὸς μὲν ὧν ποιητέον, ἀπαγορευτικὸς δὲ ὧν οὐ ποιητέον. and 9.2.19–23, Harl and De Lange 1983, 354: Ὅ γὰρ γραπτὸς ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις νόμος καὶ ἐν ἐθνικοῖς φύσει τὰ τοῦ νόμου ποιοῦσιν οὐκ ἄλλος ἐστὶ τοῦ κατὰ τὰς κοινὰς ἐννοίας φύσει ἐγγεγραμμένου τῷ ἡγεμονικῷ ἡμῶν, καὶ τραναιτέρου μετὰ τῆς συμπληρώσεως τοῦ λόγου ὡς ἡμεῖς γινόμενον.—Cf. also Contra Cels. I.4 (Borret 1967, 84); V.37 (Borret 1969, 110, 112, 114); VII.46 (Borret 1969a, 124); VIII.52 (Borret 1969a, 288); De princ. III.1,3 (Koetschau 1913, 197.11ff., 198.9ff.); In Gen. III (Philoc. 23.9, Junod 1976, 160); In Matth. ser. 59 (Klostermann 1933, 134.19); Hom. in Num. X.3 (Baehrens 1921, 74.19); Hom. in Luc. XXXV.1 (Crouzel, Fournier and Périchon 1962, 412); In Cant. cant. I (Baehrens 1925, 91.9), II (Baehrens 1925, 160.1). Cf. further In Jo. I.37 (273) (Blanc 1966, 169), where Origen—resembling Stoicism—thinks that the child’s primitive concepts are further developed; this is also God’s work: Logos can be in man in regard to the completion of the concepts that happens in everyone who has moved beyond childhood; cf. In Matth. XIII.16 (Klostermann 1935, 221.1–5). Cf. Koch 1932, 52–53; Pohlenz 1948, 426–27; Pohlenz 1949, 205; Benjamins 1994, 124.

the most important aspect of the κοινὰ ἔννοιαι was to be found within morality and religion, though he appears also to have recognised the common concepts in other areas.⁹⁰

Of particular interest in the present context is De principiis IV.1,1, because κοινὰ ἔννοιαι and evidence (ἐνάργεια) from visible things are here explicitly distinguished from Scriptural evidence as a different source of cognition;⁹¹ this division resembles Titus's view, but is naturally already implied in the other passages in Origen and in the other Church fathers considered in the present context. It differs from Titus, however, in that the idea is not to treat the two sources of knowledge separately, but on the contrary to combine and allow each to shed light on the other.⁹² A combination does not exclude the possibility of dividing the argument into a "rational" and a "scriptural" side, as is the case in De principiis III.1: first Origen develops the idea that the preaching of the Church implies man's free choice (ἀυτεξούσιον),⁹³ but then he declares that to grasp what free choice is, one must first unfold its concept (ἔννοια).⁹⁴ The development of this "concept" is admittedly a re-examination of the doctrine of free choice implicit in the faith, but this re-examination takes place as a strictly rational line of argument, in which Origen does not use Christian articles of faith or biblical passages;⁹⁵ the conclusion also begins: "Reason (ὁ λόγος) thus shows" etc.⁹⁶ On the other hand, in the remainder of De principiis III.1 the argument has the character of biblical interpretation.⁹⁷ The similarity to the structure of Titus's work lies in the recognition of the possibility of a purely rational line ⁹⁰ This is admittedly not the case according to Koch (1932, 52–53), but in Contra Cels. IV.84 (Borret 1968, 392) the animals, according to the common concepts of all, are irrational, and here the "common concepts" are not to do with morality and religion.

⁹¹ Koetschau 1913, 292.9.—Cf. Pohlenz 1949, 206.

⁹² See Koetschau 1913, 292.8–293.1.—In Contra Cels. I.4 Origen also claims an agreement between the two kinds of cognition.

⁹³ De princ. III.1,1 (Koetschau 1913, 195.4–9).

⁹⁴ De princ. III.1,1 (Koetschau 1913, 196.1–2).—Cf. here Berner 1982, 156.

⁹⁵ De princ. III.1,2–5 (Koetschau 1913, 196.3–201.2).

⁹⁶ De princ. III.1,5 (Koetschau 1913, 201.2–6).

⁹⁷ De princ. III.1,6–24 (Koetschau 1913, 201.7–244.9).—De princ. III.1,6 contains special arguments for the result from III.1,2–5; in III.1,7–23 Origen discusses some apparent counter-arguments drawn from Scripture; III.1,24—the final section—summarises all the results in Ch. III.1; these results, however, are not identical with the result in III.1,5, but go beyond it.—Cf. also Perrone 1992, 34ff. concerning Origen's twofold argument on the basis of reason and Scripture.

of argument, which disregards revelation, but the difference is also patent: rational argument serves to illuminate a doctrine derived from Scripture and must then be compared with the Scripture's testimony in order to be valid.⁹⁸ We are thus only speaking of an incomplete parallel to Titus's separation of universal and scriptural argument. The possibility of separating rational and scriptural argument is without doubt present in Origen, but he does not realise it, unlike Titus.

As far as I can see, however, Titus's form of argument also has a narrower heresiological background besides the background in the idea of the "common concepts" in philosophy and in Alexandrian theology. This heresiological background is obvious in Irenaeus, the first known Catholic writer to refute heretics by referring to universal reason. Irenaeus did not refer to "common concepts", but more to what he termed "[a] sound mind",⁹⁹ a kind of "common sense". In itself the presentation of the heretical systems in Adversus haereses Book I revealed their lack of inner cohesion, so that Irenaeus can conclude: "They have now been fully exposed; and simply to exhibit their sentiments, is to obtain a victory over them".¹⁰⁰ In Adversus haereses I.16,3 Irenaeus writes to the recipient of his book that he knows that this recipient when reading of the Valentinians' teaching will laugh heartily at such follies, even though they should in fact be wept over. In addition he calls them "old crones' fables". In Adversus haereses II.26,3 Irenaeus deals with those who would count up sand and pebbles, the waves of the sea and the stars of heaven and then speculate on the cause of the numbers they have found, and he asks:

would not his labour be in vain, and would not such a man be justly declared mad, and destitute of reason, by all possessed of common sense?¹⁰¹

⁹⁸ Already in De princ. I. Praef. (Koetschau 1913, 7–16) Origen envisages areas which the preaching of the Church does not clearly illuminate, and he also refers here to the use of a purely rational argumentation, e.g. in De princ. I. Praef., 10 (Koetschau 1913, 16.13–15).

⁹⁹ "Sensus . . . sanus" / 'Ο . . . ὑγιῆς νοῦς (Adv. haer. II.27,1; Rousseau and Doutreleau 1982, 264).—Transl. by Roberts and Rambaut in Roberts and Donaldson 1989a, 398.

¹⁰⁰ Transl. by Roberts and Rambaut in Roberts and Donaldson 1989a, 358.—"Detectio autem eorum haec est, siue aduersus eos uictoria est sententiae eorum manifestatio" (Adv. haer. I.31,3; Rousseau and Doutreleau 1979, 388).

¹⁰¹ "nonne in uanum laborans et delirus hic talis et irrationabilis ab omnibus qui sensum habent iuste dicitur?" (Rousseau and Doutreleau 1982, 262).—Transl. by Roberts and Rambaut in Roberts and Donaldson 1989a, 398.

Here common sense is set up against philosophical and scientific speculation, which Irenaeus believes is the core of the heresies, and if, as is probable, he is influenced here by the Sceptics, he is using the philosophical doubt to refer the reader to the rule of faith.¹⁰² Since Irenaeus also assumes a natural, innate knowledge of God,¹⁰³ it is logical to link this to his idea of man's sound non-philosophical reason.—Also Titus's refutations on the basis of κοινὰ ἔννοιαι draw on this rhetorical "common sense"; as we have seen, Manichaeism is precisely "ridiculous nonsense". But as we shall see, Titus is clearly referring to a reason that is open to and developed by philosophy.

If we now return to Contra Manichaeos, we can first of all demonstrate relatively easily that a number of the listed terms that Titus uses do not have different technical meanings. At the close of I.5 Titus declares that he will begin by showing that both a doctrine of two principles in general and a doctrine of two principles in conflict with each other are unacceptable to the "natural concepts" (αἱ κατὰ φύσιν ἔννοιαι, Gr. 4.12–13 → Ch. XI.3). In connection with the argument in I.11ff. already referred to—that the two principles cannot be opposites, when they have the same name and the same description—Titus first declares that the "natural thoughts" (or "reasonings") (οἱ φυσικοὶ λογισμοὶ) would hardly be able to allow anything like that (I.11, Gr. 6.17); and then in I.12 (Gr. 6.28–29) he states that Mani's view shows that for him the consequence (ἀκολουθία) from the common concepts (κοινὰ ἔννοιαι) has been destroyed (→ Ch. XI.4). From this we can conclude that both κοινὰ ἔννοιαι and αἱ κατὰ φύσιν ἔννοιαι as well as οἱ φυσικοὶ λογισμοὶ in these contexts must mean almost one and the same. It is thus probable that οἱ φυσικοὶ λογισμοὶ and οἱ κατὰ φύσιν λογισμοὶ as well as αἱ κατὰ φύσιν ἔννοιαι and φυσικὰ ἔννοιαι are no more than stylistic variants; on this background κοινὸν λογισμὸν in II.62 is probably also merely a new variant. We are left with κοινὴ δόξα, where we cannot yet say that this is just a stylistic variation.

¹⁰² Grant 1967, 163–64 (= 1949, 46–47); Schoedel 1959, 24; cf. Brox 1966a, 201–8.

¹⁰³ "Inuisibile enim eius, cum sit potens, magnam mentis intuitionem et sensibilitatem omnibus praestat potentissimae et omnipotentis eminentiae." . . . "tamen hoc ipsum omnia cognoscunt, quando Ratio mentibus infixus moueat ea et reuelet eis quoniam est unus Deus, omnium Dominus." (Adv. haer. II.6,1; Rousseau and Doutreleau 1982, 60).

For the most part, therefore, the meaning that Titus confers on these terms has nothing to do with variants; more often it is purely for stylistic reasons or out of sheer forgetfulness that he employs them. But another question of course is whether the terms always mean the same; κοινὰ ἔννοιαι could indeed mean different things in different contexts.

In I.1 and III.1 Titus states that the argumentation in Books I–II is for the most part based on κοινὰ ἔννοιαι; from I.1 it is also clear that κοινὰ ἔννοιαι is a “way of truth” (→ Ch. XI.2, XI.32). In which way the common concepts can function as a way of truth is then hinted at elsewhere.

In I.5 the question is, whether the “natural concepts” (αἱ κατὰ φύσιν ἔννοιαι) “allow for” (παραδέχομαι, Gr. 4.12, and δέχομαι, Gr. 4.14) two principles in the existing things (→ Ch. XI.3), i.e. the truth of the Manichaean teaching is being determined by whether or not it can be accepted by these common concepts. Correspondingly in I.11 the issue is whether the “natural reasonings” (οἱ φυσικοὶ λογισμοὶ) “allow for” (παραδέχομαι, Gr. 6.17) two opposite substances. In I.12 and in the same context we hear that ἡ ἀκολουθία (Gr. 6.29) from the common concepts (κοινὰ ἔννοιαι) has been destroyed for Mani (→ Ch. XI.4). Here the precise meaning of the term ἀκολουθία is important. Smyth translates it with a Greek loanword κωλυ (Smyth 9.5), i.e. τάξις, “order”; Torres translates with “consecutio”. The translation “logical consequence” is probable; for the Stoics it was by virtue of the concept of ἀκολουθία, succession or consequence, that man could draw inferences from empirical data, and the concept was moreover important in connection with physics and ethics;¹⁰⁴ in addition I assume that τῶν κοινῶν ἐννοιῶν is here a “genitivus originis”.¹⁰⁵ In which case Titus is claiming that the Manichaeans are incapable of drawing consequences from the common concepts, and these must indeed be considered as a primeval form of knowledge upon which secondary consequences should be built.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰⁴ Long 1996a, 87, 95–96, 102.

¹⁰⁵ Smyth 1984, 331 §1410.

¹⁰⁶ On this background it is possible that there is a slight difference of meaning between οἱ φυσικοὶ λογισμοὶ in I.11 and κοινὰ ἔννοιαι in I.12; λογισμοὶ could correspond to ἡ ἀκολουθία.—In favour of interpreting Titus’s term ἀκολουθία in a more precise philosophical sense is its use among Early Church theologians: Titus’s line of thought corresponds to Athenagoras’s (or Pseudo-Athenagoras) in De res. XIV,1–2 (Pouderon 1992, 268); cf. also Spanneut 1957, 208; cf. also the use of

In I.17 Titus declares that Mani's presentations are put together without the κοινὰ ἔννοιαι, and that they bring about their own (αὐτόματον) refutation among wise men (Gr. 10.25–27). The context shows that he is referring to the “fables” (the mythological material) and to the main point of Mani's teaching, dualism. In claiming that Mani's teaching brings about its own refutation among wise men, Titus is presumably referring to the philosophers' demand for logical coherence; in other words, Manichaeism is full of contradictions. Here too Titus appears to be juxtaposing the common concepts with logical coherence.

In the contexts under treatment Titus thus claims that the “common concepts” and the consequences from them imply that there can only be one principle or one God, but he does not make it clear which element in his arguments is a “common concept”.

Nor is it clear what κοινὰ ἔννοιαι means quite precisely in I.15. Titus claims here that the Manichaeans call the good principle “incorruption” (ἀφθαρσία) and the evil “corruption” (φθορά).¹⁰⁷ If indeed the evil is φθορά, one must then ask what it corrupts or destroys. According to Titus there are only two possibilities: the evil destroys either something else or itself. If it destroys something else, it can only be the good (since there are only two principles), but that is impossible, for the good is indeed ἀφθαρσία. If on the other hand the evil destroys itself, it cannot of course exist or be everlasting. Precisely because the evil is corruption, its existence is excluded, “for it is impossible that corruption is incorruptible according to what the common concepts intend” (Gr. 8.34–35 → Ch. XI.6).

Here it is a reasonable possibility that the “common concepts” are quite simply ἀφθαρσία and φθορά. In that case Titus claims that the Manichaeans are using the two concepts meaninglessly, in conflict with their common meaning. But the problem with this interpretation is that despite all the uncertainties, the earlier tradition with the term “common concepts” seems to have aimed at certain transcending, generalised concepts, and I therefore assume that at this ἀκολουθία in Clement and Origen according to Rist 1981, 65–66, cf. Perrone 1992, 38 n. 14.

¹⁰⁷ It is possible that it is only Titus's conclusion that evil must thus be φθορά. The argument corresponds to Didymus, Contra Manich. II (PG 39, 1088B–1089B), but whether this is due to a common source is an open question. Cf. also Klein 1991, 55, 75–76.

point by κοινὰ ἔννοιαι Titus means something on the lines of a universal concept of logical coherence in the use of concepts.

In the passages treated so far Titus has claimed that the common concepts necessitate the existence of only one principle. However, it is not only monotheism that is implied in the common concepts, but also God's presence everywhere and God's uncircumscribed nature: in I.7 Titus points out that Mani's teaching is outside κοινὰ ἔννοιαι, which instills (ὀποβάλλω) in us the knowledge that God is everywhere, and that his nature is uncircumscribed. Here then, Titus is maintaining that men have a common knowledge of God's nature. We are reminded of Origen's view in Contra Celsum IV.14, mentioned above, where the "natural concept" of God also turned out to have a rather precise content.

In IV.91 we find the expression φυσικὰ ἔννοιαι in the context of Titus's exegesis of Paul; Titus explains what faith in God means and claims that the Mosaic Law ranks below the faith that itself established a law; ". . . and (faith) of its own accord finds what is pleasing to God, and it is not the case that it learns (this) from outside."¹⁰⁸ In continuation the Greek text is preserved, because it was quoted by John of Damascus in his Sacra Parallela:

Faith in God is a knowledge of God through the visible Creation and the natural concepts, together with the affection for and love of Him according to the cognition of virtue and vice—which is pleasing to God. (→ Ch. XI.48).

I take this passage to mean that faith in God is equated with a developed knowledge of God that has come into being from several sources. On the one hand there is the knowledge of God that is gained through the visible Creation and the natural concepts, and on the other hand affection for and love of God, which in one way or another is contained in the ethical cognition that Titus calls ἐπιστήμη. It is reasonable to interpret this as Titus's distinction between a knowledge of God that has come about as an inference on the basis of the order and rationality of the Creation, and a knowledge of God that is inward and innate. Something else that the passage probably tells us is that Titus does not regard the natural knowledge of God and faith as two different types of knowledge, but rather as steps in a development where the earlier steps are contained in the following ones.

¹⁰⁸ . קאלי יאל קא קאמ קלא קמלד יאקא קיא אק קאצא קיא קא
(Sy 172.11–12).

Titus also speaks of “common concepts” and suchlike in connection with his defence of the Creation. In II.38–41 he refutes Mani, whose mockery ostensibly also falls on the wild animals that are supposed to be evil. Titus claims partly that God wishes to chastise us with the wild animals, partly that “evil” is an ethical entity that can only be used about rational creatures; the animals merely follow their nature. Moreover, snake poison for example, which should be “evil”, can also be used in curative medicine. In II.44 Titus refers to the fact that in the chapters in question, with the aid of “reasonings in accordance with nature” (τοῖς κατὰ φύσιν λογισμοῖς) he showed that the animals were neither evil nor came from the evil, but that they are beneficial for men by instilling fear. At this point the “reasonings” appear to aim at secondary reflections which accord with the observation of animals and human beings; this is not an innate knowledge, but more a natural knowledge, inasmuch as it is derived from nature.

The same meaning is to be found in II.62. Ostensibly Mani criticised the oxen, which have a soul from the good, slaving for the farmers (Gr. 63.35–38). Titus objects that if the earth had not been cultivated, man would not be able to get food and survive (Gr. 63.38–39), and it must thus be natural for domestic animals to slave for man, to whose use they have been entrusted (Gr. 64.2–3). Mani has therefore invented his accusations against the Creation contrary to the common reasonings (κοινοὶ λογισμοὶ) (Gr. 63.39–64.2). Titus thus assumes that what has a purpose for man already from the hand of nature must be his purpose, i.e. God has created domestic animals in order for them to slave for man, and it is this way of arguing that he calls a common reasoning.

Without Titus having a completely firm terminology, it thus looks as if he reckons with a form of basic, natural, common human knowledge; closely connected with, and building on, this knowledge are a number of consequences and reasonings. In IV.45 (§y 151.5–29), where the original Greek text is not preserved, Titus also seems to believe in a common human knowledge of an anthropological condition, namely that man can make himself a slave of his passions. Titus deals with the interpretation of Mt. 6.24, where Mani interprets the two masters as the two principles (§y 151.5–11). Titus points out that the text does not refer to two principles, but to God and mammon (Sy 151.11–12). Mammon describes a passion of the mind¹⁰⁹ and not another principle (Sy 151.12–16); it is through our own will that we often allow the passions to control us, just as we can free ourselves from them (Sy 151.16–20.26–29). Here Titus is referring to Rom. 6.12, where Paul warns the faithful against letting themselves be controlled by sin (Sy 151.20–21). The common concepts also know of the use of such meanings, such as that the soul's passions stand as masters of itself (Sy 151.22–24), and it is common to say that a given person can be a slave of wine or controlled by his anger (Sy 151.24–26). On this, Titus finds his view confirmed both by Scripture and by common knowledge and ordinary manners of speaking.

We come now to Titus's use of κοινή δόξα. In II.39, in connection with the question of whether the wild animals derive from the evil principle, Titus seeks to show that this principle does not exist at all. Here he builds on the assumption that according to Mani evil is without reason,¹¹⁰ and he argues inter alia in the way that evil cannot recognise its own evilness and cannot therefore be evil; the designations "good and evil" presuppose that one knows them both in relation to one another, and whoever knows the good does not have an evil nature. Titus states that nor do we call an insane person evil who kills someone with a sword but does not know what he is doing. It is clear to all as a judgement and a common, natural consequence (κρίσις αὕτη κοινή τε καὶ φύσεως ἀκολουθία, Gr. 50.5–6) that we do not call someone evil who does not know what he is doing. From other contexts it is obvious that Titus distinguishes between "judgements", which characterise decisions on the basis of previous reflection, and innate knowledge.¹¹¹ But even if Titus is not thinking directly of an innate knowledge, he is nevertheless aiming at an everyday consensus, and he therefore derives a common, natural consequence from it. Titus concludes that Mani has posited evil outside the common opinion (κοινή δόξα, Gr. 50.9–10); by this Titus is presumably referring to the consensus mentioned, both the judgement and its consequences.

In II.12 Titus attacks the view that some people cannot be held responsible for their evil deeds, because they are controlled by the passions. One of Titus's counter-arguments is that when, according to κοινή δόξα with the help of laws, human society punishes those who act evilly, it shows that the perpetrators are not forced by their nature, but have chosen the offence with intent and are therefore worthy of punishment. The use of punishment thus reveals a consensus regarding man's responsibility. The argument is a common one, deriving from Aristotle.¹¹² Κοινή δόξα describes the consensus that is contained in the laws of society.

¹⁰⁹ Cf. p. 314 below concerning this expression.

¹¹⁰ See above p. 172.

¹¹¹ See below pp. 308, 313.

In II.23 Titus is concerned with Manichaeism's view that death is evil, which is exemplified by death in war. In this context he remarks:

But how could they scold death, when it indeed releases the soul from matter, according to the deceiver's teaching? That is why death is in no way an evil according to common opinion. For that which of necessity befalls everyone is not evil. (Gr. 40.10–14 → Ch. XI.24).

First Titus finds a contradiction in Manichaeism: why should death be evil if it means the release of the soul? By speaking of "the teaching of the deceiver" Titus shows that he does not consider death in quite the same way; a further point, however, is that for Titus death really is a refreshment. I shall return to Titus's view of death;¹¹³ for the time being it is sufficient to note that because one can observe that death is nature, all agree, according to Titus, that death is not evil.

In conclusion we can say that Titus does not explain what the common concepts actually are, and that for this reason there is something loose and imprecise about his use of this terminology; often it works as a summary of the content of an argument. It nevertheless seems that for Titus the common concepts are a base for his argumentation from which he can draw consequences that thereby also become "common" and "natural"; perhaps in some cases there is a difference in nuance between “concepts” and “reasonings”, namely that the latter correspond to the consequences. The common concepts have something to do with a logical coherence, and they imply that there is only one God, and that He is uncircumscribed and present everywhere. In a single passage Titus distinguishes between knowledge of God from the natural concepts and from the Creation; here it is reasonable that the first knowledge of God is innate. In the same passage Titus seems to believe that this innate knowledge of God can be incorporated into a more comprehensive knowledge of God, which he calls faith. The common concepts also imply a knowledge of man in relation to his passions. Finally, the term κοινή δόξα seems to have a further and even more imprecise meaning than the “common concepts”, in that its aim is altogether one of consensus.

¹¹² In Eth. Nic. III,5,7–9 (1113b21–1114a2) Aristotle finds his arguments for man himself being responsible for his actions confirmed by the law-makers punishing the law-transgressors. This is also the case when the transgressors act in ignorance, but are themselves responsible for their ignorance (e.g. if their ignorance can be traced back to their decision to drink themselves senseless). Here there is hardly any difference from Titus's view in II.39, for Aristotle himself states that one does not punish those who were not the cause of their ignorance (see Eth. Nic. III,5,7 [1113b24–25]).

¹¹³ See below pp. 343–52.

On this background and following on from G.G. Stroumsa one can claim that Titus was more a rhetorical than a philosophical polemicist. But it is nevertheless debatable as to whether this evaluation is not too hard. Titus has not managed to reflect on and systematise his use of all the concepts, but this need not mean that his purpose, or important parts of it, could not have been expressed more consistently and yet remain the same. Titus does not otherwise make use opportunely of polemical ad hoc-arguments; views that he presents in one context often also tune up in new contexts, and he is not content merely to use polemic, but often also puts forward his own positive opinions.

However, an examination of Titus of Bostra's philosophical views cannot be limited to an account of the concept of God and the other common concepts. A further central area is the nature of man and the character of ethical action. Here again we find certain themes already treated above, namely the accidental character of good and evil and the question of man's innate knowledge.

4. Titus's philosophical psychology

Regarding Titus's psychology it must be reiterated that even though he really does grapple with some of the problems of his time, he does not succeed in working out a particularly precise or detailed conception, which is partly due to his insistence on maintaining a rhetoric against other views. Another problem that impedes an interpretation is his unstable use of concepts. Titus does not give any coherent presentation of his anthropology; instead it must be strung together from various remarks in sundry places. However, a reasonably clear purpose and the contours of a coherent view can nevertheless be seen.

As mentioned, the real interest in Chapter I.13 is to show that there can only be one uncreated οὐσία, not two. In the context, however, it was necessary to give examples of created οὐσία, and as an example Titus included the soul, which precisely qua created οὐσία has accidental qualities, namely ἕξεις such as virtue and vice, which “come and go”, i.e. can be separated from the soul.

Thus the soul is an οὐσία, but a created οὐσία, and for Titus this presumably means that it is not pre-existent. Nowhere does Titus write that it should be so, and various brief remarks in Book IV suggest at least that Titus did not follow Origen’s favourite Platonising hypothesis. Thus in IV.30 Titus writes that both the soul and the body are God’s work (§y 143.35–144.1),¹¹⁴ and in IV.28 Titus states that the body is a friend of the soul and not only because it has come into being together with the soul (דגמחמ חכ ר כלסור חקא, §y 143.16–17), but also because it helps the soul to good actions (§y 143.16–17). The passage hints that the soul is created together with the body. It must be added that in II.22 Titus expresses himself in a somewhat ambiguous way, in that on the one hand he writes that God grants existence and birth to non-existing souls, yet on the other hand that He thereby “gives” them something (→ Ch. XI.23), which seems to presuppose that they somehow already exist. But here we are facing the phenomenon already remarked upon that Titus uses a Platonic form of expression which does not really make sense within his thought universe.¹¹⁵

Although souls are not immortal, but created from nothing, it is, however, not their nature to die (IV.39, §y 148.5–6). The soul’s immortality is central in Titus’s understanding of death; at the death-event the soul is separated from the body,¹¹⁶ and at the final day Titus imagines that the soul is united again with resurrected, now uncorrupted bodies (IV.99–101, §y 178.6ff. and partly → Ch. XI.50–51). Although Titus differs from Platonism by teaching that the soul is created from nothing, he nevertheless approaches it with his teaching on the soul's immortality, and this proximity to Platonism becomes even clearer when we examine the soul's nature as Titus perceives it; for according to him the soul is incorporeal (ἀσώματος, I.32, Gr. 20.17 → Ch. XI.13) and immutable (ἀμετάβλητος, I.32, Gr. 20.24 → Ch. XI.13). On this point Titus is clearly Platonising, but when we press deeper into his psychology, it turns out to contain elements that stem from other philosophical schools.

¹¹⁴ Cf. Klein 1991, 100.

¹¹⁵ See above p. 276 and below p. 344.

¹¹⁶ See further below pp. 343–44.

Titus imagines Mani's teaching to be that the soul is compounded or mixed (I.29, Gr. 18.2–5; I.32, Gr. 20.11–16.22–31 → Ch. XI.12–13), and he therefore attacks this position; it is apparent, however, that on this point Titus has no positive knowledge, but is guessing;¹¹⁷ these passages cannot therefore tell us anything about the Manichaeans' understanding of the soul,¹¹⁸ but they are still of interest for the ¹¹⁷ Beck (1978, 122) also observes that this is a “purely subjective” suspicion from Titus's side; he believes moreover that the hypothetical way in which Titus presents his suspicion suggests that the Manichaeans did not in fact believe this—in his time and in his area. Cf. Klein 1991, 99. However, it is hardly reasonable to conclude otherwise than that Titus's sources could not answer his questions. Nor can it be excluded that Titus's guess is actually his own interpretation of the statement δύο φύσεις ἐναντίας ἡμῖν οὐσας, which we find in II.13, Gr. 31.34 (→ Ch. XI.19), and which we might better imagine he found in his Manichaean sources. Cf. also the Manichaeans' interpretation of Rom. 7.23 in IV.90 (see above pp. 60–61).

¹¹⁸ Baur (1931, 164–65) otherwise included these passages from Titus to shed light on Augustine's accusation against the Manichaeans for teaching two souls (esp. in De duab. anim.), but thought that Titus was not speaking of two souls but of one and the same soul, which has taken a foreign element into it (otherwise in Bianchi 1988, 311 n. 3). Baur (1831, 162–77) also doubted that on this point Augustine was reproducing the authentic Manichaean teaching, which has since been widely debated; see further Bianchi 1988 and Sundermann 1992, 22–24 with further references; cf. also Klein 1991, 99, 106; Fitschen 1992, 45.—It must also be emphasised that the doctrine of two souls was one of the problems, and a standard accusation in Late Antiquity; see thus Origen, De princ. III.4 (Koetschau 1913, 263.11–270.29) together with references in Langerbeck 1967, 50–56; Görgemanns and Karpp 1992, 603–5 n. 3, 886; Dihle 1982, 77–78, 199–200; Deuse 1983, 71 n. 34, 80, 91, 215; Dillon 1996, 175, 376, 448–49.—Also the “Messalians”, who like Titus (in his description of Manichaeism) used metaphors of mixing, were accused of teaching two souls; see further Stewart 1991, passim, but esp. 170–203 on “mixing language” in Pseudo-Macarius.

Beck (1978, 122–23) establishes convincingly that Titus's reasoning builds on a Platonic distinction between a rational and irrational part of the soul (he believes on the other hand that the North African Manichaeans that Augustine refuted had moved further on to an evil soul by personifying matter). In the light of Origen, De princ. III.4, Koetschau 1913, 263.23–264.11 Titus's charge can be detailed as follows: we are not dealing with the third theory mentioned by Origen, “anima nostra, cum una sit per substantiam, ex pluribus tamen constat”, but with the first understanding of Titus. He states, for example, that according to the Manichaeans man's body is from evil and man's soul from good (I.29, Gr. 18.3–4 → Ch. XI.12), and then guesses that the Manichaeans either teach that the soul is homogeneous (μονοειδής, I.29, Gr. 18.5; I.32, Gr. 20.14–15 → Ch. XI.12–13) from the good principle, or that it is a “composition of contraries” (σύνθεσις τῶν ἐναντίων, I.29, Gr. 18.5; I.32, Gr. 20.14 → Ch. XI.12–13) or “mingling of contraries” (κρᾶσις τῶν ἐναντίων, I.32, Gr. 20.12–13 → Ch. XI.13).¹¹⁹ The first possibility, that the soul is homogeneously good and has been mixed with the evil material body, is refuted by Titus on the basis of the two premises that the Manichaeans believe that matter was without consciousness or mind before it was mixed with the good,¹²⁰ and that the evil is sin, which presupposes knowledge and consciousness; for it follows from this that it is the connection with the good that can first have made matter evil (I.29–30).¹²¹ Titus refutes the second possibility by saying that if the soul consists of a good and an evil part, the evil things i.e. the sins, must nonetheless stem from the good part, for this must be the rational part, and sin demands consideration (I.32, Gr. 20.11–16 → Ch. XI.13).¹²² As is clear here, and becomes explicit in what follows, Titus, as correctly seen by Beck, works on the basis that a distinction between a good and an evil part of the soul must be a Platonic distinction between τὸ λογιστικόν and τὸ ἀλόγιστον in the soul (I.32, Gr. 20.29–31 → Ch. XI.13).¹²³ theory of two souls, for Titus attacks precisely a teaching in which substance is not one. This theory, however, must be understood in context with Plato's Tim., cf. Langerbeck 1967, 50–56.—That Titus is referring to a real doctrine of two souls is also rendered probable by his inclusion in Contra Manich. IV.19 of Araspes's statement on the two souls in Xenophon, Cyropaed. VI.1.41, see above pp. 256–57 and → Ch. XI.46.

¹¹⁹ Titus thus treats the terms σύνθεσις and κρᾶσις as synonyms; in De gen. et corr. I,10 (327a30–328b22) Aristotle on the other hand distinguished between a “mixture”, μίξις or κρᾶσις (these terms are synonymous, see De gen. et corr. 328a8–9), and a “compound”, σύνθεσις. In De an. I,4, however, Aristotle also includes discussions where the terms are synonymous; De an. I,4 (407b30ff.): ἀρμονίαν γὰρ τινα αὐτὴν [i.e. the soul] λέγουσι· καὶ γὰρ τὴν ἀρμονίαν κρᾶσιν καὶ σύνθεσιν ἐναντίων εἶναι, καὶ τὸ σῶμα συγκείσθαι ἐξ ἐναντίων. Titus's formulation is perhaps inspired by this, but the theory that he hypothetically ascribes to the Manichaeans has more to do with the views that Aristotle refutes in De an. I,5 than those that he refutes in I,4.

¹²⁰ This premise, however, is hardly tenable; see above p. 172.

¹²¹ Cf. Beck 1978, 121–22.

¹²² Cf. Beck 1978, 122.

¹²³ Beck 1978, 122–23.

This does not necessarily mean, however, that Titus himself distinguishes between τὸ λογιστικόν and τὸ ἀλόγιστον in the soul; he only says that if the Manichaeans believe such and such, this teaching must hang together with a teaching concerning λογιστικόν/ἀλόγιστον.¹²⁴ Perhaps Titus is interested in lumping the Manichaeans together with certain Platonists, and it is conceivable that he makes use of arguments from an internal Platonic polemic. If such a doctrine implies a composition (σύνθεσις) in relation to substance (κατ' οὐσίαν), that at least is not Titus's view:

The soul is incorporeal, however, in that it in no way permits a composition with regard to substance, and particularly not a composition of contraries. (I.32, Gr. 20.16–18 → Ch. XI.13).

Titus apparently believes that it is only corporeal substances that can be compounded (and thereby corruptible and mortal). Titus then moves on to attack a new point of view which also implies that the soul is compounded:

For those who believe that it [i.e. the soul] is composed from differences have not introduced a substance that is diversified and different in relation to itself, but on the basis of visible things they have written about its activities, in that they could not make one simple and comprehensible account about it. (I.32, Gr. 20.18–22 → Ch. XI.13).

This view is hardly identical with the (hypothetical) Manichaean one; in connection with the Manichaeans Titus also spoke of a σύνθεσις of ἐναντία, whereas here he mentions a σύνθεσις of διαφοραί. It is not clear whom the reference is to. Nor is it clear whether Titus merely wishes to defend the teaching of the persons in question against distortion and otherwise only criticises them mildly,¹²⁵ or whether he believes that by speaking of the soul as composed from differences they have actually wished to introduce a diversified substance, but that they failed, since all that they have managed is merely to describe the soul's activities on the basis of the visible things. Moreover Titus's actual description could resemble a programme ¹²⁴ It is Beck's (1978, 150–51) view that also Titus himself at this point supports the doctrine of parts to the soul.

¹²⁵ In other words they have not introduced a variegated substance or claimed that the soul is different in relation to itself, but merely on the basis of visible things they have written about its activities; however, in all circumstances it must be a criticism that they could not make a simple, understandable λόγος of it.

through which, on an empirical basis, one draws conclusions concerning the soul's nature.

Titus continues by stating:

For even if it [i.e. the soul] is different—first in this way and then in that way—in relation to itself through the different qualities that it assumes, nevertheless it is according to its substance God's work and immutable . . . (I.32, Gr. 20.22–24 → Ch. XI.13).

Here it appears that the soul's activities are the same as its qualities, and thus we are back with the soul being an οὐσία with accidental qualities, ἕξεις such as virtue and vice, which “come and go” or can be separated from the soul. Under no circumstances will Titus accept that one can speak of “parts of the soul”,¹²⁶ and he believes that this point finds excellent expression in a distinction between the one indivisible soul, and its mutable qualities or activities.

To express that the soul is an οὐσία with accidental qualities, Titus now uses in II.7–8 the particular distinction between καλός and ἀγαθός.¹²⁷ Man's οὐσία is from nature, from the Creator's hand, neither good nor bad, but beautiful. The infant is thus neither good nor bad, corresponding to gold and precious stones that are beautiful, but not good. Good and evil are accidental qualities which must be acquired and which do not exist before they are done in practice; they come partly through upbringing and partly through the choices that reasoning (λογισμός) or calculation (πρόθεσις) make ¹²⁶ When Titus nonetheless occasionally speaks explicitly in what follows of “parts of the soul”, it is, as far as I can see, his attempt to enter hypothetically a line of thought which he imagines could be the Manichaean: thus he writes in I.32: “Hence, when desire is dangerously stirred either from the body alone or also from the part of the soul that belongs to evil . . .” (Gr. 20.31–33 → Ch. XI.13), but it is not Titus's opinion that there should be such a μέρος τῆς ψυχῆς: in the first place it is clear that when speaking of the part of the soul that is in contact with evil, Titus must be referring to the previously mentioned hypothesis that Mani believes in something irrational (ἀλόγιστον) that belongs to evil (κακία) (I.32, Gr. 20.30 → Ch. XI.13), and secondly it is clear that all of Titus's subsequent reasoning results in his conclusion that on the one hand sin is due neither to the body nor to some part or other of the soul, and on the other hand that irrational evil does not exist at all: “Hence it is clear that the sins are attributed to the soul's reason on good grounds and not to the body or any other part of this [i.e. of the soul], so that the irrational evil has got rid of being the cause of the evils that are among us, because this evil does not exist either . . .” (I.32, Gr. 21.2–6 → Ch. XI.13). Also “the best part of the soul” (τῷ βελτίονι μέρει τῆς ψυχῆς), referred to in I.35, Gr. 23.1, must only be understood as the position that Mani's views imply.

¹²⁷ Cf. Fitschen 1992, 52.

it should be mentioned that Plotinus referred ἀγαθόν to the One and καλόν to lower things, but this distinction does not really have the same point as in Titus.¹³² On the other hand it is clear that Titus's point is also to be found in other Church fathers; it is just not expressed through the distinction καλός—ἀγαθός.¹³³ It would therefore be reasonable to conclude that the distinction is Titus's own work, but it is nevertheless unlikely: it does not belong in II.7–8, because Titus's own programme is not to argue on the basis of Scripture, and in IV.84 it is unnatural to introduce it suddenly in connection with the Devil. Rather, it would be natural that the distinction came at the beginning of Book III, where Titus interprets Gen., but there on the other hand it is missing. In other words Titus created καλός καὶ ἀγαθός.—Theophilus's interpretation of Gen. 1.31 in Ad Autol. II.17, Grant 1970, 54–55 takes καλόν as the opposite of the ethical κακόν.—Nor does Didymus the Blind distinguish between καλός and ἀγαθός. For example, in In Gen. 33.9–17 (to Gen. 1.12), Nautin 1976, 90, Didymus says that καλόν refers both to the sensuous things but much more to what has to do with the virtues etc. “For it is beautiful to go from vice to virtue” (Καλὸν γὰρ ἢ ἀπὸ κακίας εἰς ἀρετὴν μετέσταςις) says Didymus in In Gen. 52.25ff. (to Gen. 1.25), Nautin 1976, 136. It is precisely in In Gen. 72.20–25 to Gen. 1.31, Nautin 1976, 178, 180 that Didymus explains that the beauty of sensuous things is graduated, and that those things which belong to virtue are correspondingly graduated for a purpose that should be “very” (λίαν) praised. Here λίαν refers precisely to virtue, unlike in Titus. And in his In Hi. (Tura) 2,11–15 Didymus uses Gen. 1.31 just as in Titus about the Devil before his fall, but refers to an original ethical perfection.—Cf. also Alexandre 1988, 210–11.

¹³² Plotinus, Enn. VI.9. According to Van Winden 1971, 74 this teaching originates with Plotinus.—Already Aristotle distinguishes in Met. XIII,3,10–11 (1078a31–b6) between τὸ ἀγαθόν and τὸ καλόν (cf. Tarán 1981, 42) where τὸ ἀγαθόν admittedly is ἐν πράξει, and τὸ καλόν is ἐν τοῖς ἀκινήτοις, but no line to Titus is likely here either.—Titus is drawing not on Stoicism, at least not terminologically, even though there are of course similarities of content, cf. Pohlenz 1948, 116 (on the Stoic Zeno's view of man): “Nur sein Denken und Verhalten unterliegt darum dem sittlichen Werturteil der Mitmenschen, deren Consensus die Handlungen, die der menschlichen Natur und dem Vernunftgesetz entsprechen, als ‘schön’, als καλά, anerkennt, und die gegenteiligen als ‘häßlich’, αἰσχροί, verwirft. So nannte ja der Hellene das, was wir als ‘sittlichgut’ oder ‘sittlichschlecht’ bezeichnen. Zeno war das eigentümliche ästhetische Empfinden, das einen Hellenen wie Plato zur Gleichsetzung von Gut und Schön trieb, innerlich fremd; aber den Sprachgebrauch hat er natürlich festgehalten.”

¹³³ The point of Titus's distinction lies close to the point of the other distinctions, e.g. Irenaeus's distinctions between εἰκών and ὁμοίωσις, between πνοή and πνεῦμα etc. (see Koch 1925; cf. below p. 325).—That the underage child's soul knows neither good nor evil is a general idea in Greek patristics; cf. Gross 1960, 44, 72, 78, 81, 94–95, 99, 104–8, 123, 132, 170, 186, 213–14; Hauke 1993, 53, 55, 97, 101, 102, 248, 268–71, 421, 423, 483 n. 312, 550–53, 575–76, 647, 654–59, 690, 712–13, 714, 717.—See above pp. 268–69 on man's goodness as accidental in Origen.

has introduced this distinction unsystematically but where it seemed appropriate.

However, to return to the main purpose, Titus's polemic against the soul containing both τὸ λογιστικόν and τὸ ἀλόγιστον must of course be set within the ancient discussion of whether the soul is a unity without "parts". Plato reckoned on parts of the soul, μέρη, but was already criticised by Aristotle, who preferred to speak of "faculties", δυνάμεις τῆς ψυχῆς. In general the Middle Platonists followed Plato, while on this point the Neo-Platonists were closer to Aristotle.¹³⁴ The material that Titus uses probably stems from Middle-Platonic sources; here one can at least find clear expression for the view that the soul is compounded, σύνθετος, and not homogeneous, μονοειδής,¹³⁵ and moreover in Severus one can find a polemic against the division into a rational and irrational part of the soul which has certain similarities with Titus.¹³⁶ Explicitly, as far as I can see, however,

¹³⁴ Plato occasionally envisaged three parts of the soul, e.g. τὸ λογιστικόν; τὸ θυμοειδές; and τὸ ἐπιθυμητικόν in Rep. 434d–441c, but in Tim. 69c–72d he lumps together the two irrational parts of the soul into one, corresponding to the theory that Titus hypothetically ascribes to the Manichaeans. Aristotle criticised Plato inter alia in De an. I,5, esp. 411b5–10. See Deuse 1983 and Blumenthal 1996 on Middle- and Neo-Platonists. Cf. also Tertullian, De an. 14ff., Waszink 1947, 17ff. and Waszink's comment (1947, 209ff., esp. 215).

¹³⁵ See thus Plutarch, De virt. mor. 3, 441Dff., which is quoted in Deuse 1983, 105 n. 45. Titus, however, is not claiming either that the soul is μονοειδής, and this could be because he believed that although it has no "parts", it nonetheless has "faculties"; for example, in the much later work of John Philoponus, the two theories that the soul is μονοειδής or that it has faculties are couched as opposites, see Philoponus, In De an., Hayduck 1897, 33.7–12: ἀλλ' ἐπειδὴν εὐρωμεν ὅτι οὐσία ἐστὶ, πάλιν ζητοῦμεν πότερον σῶμα ἢ ἀσώματον, καὶ εἰ σῶμα, ἀπλοῦν ἢ σύνθετον, καὶ εἰ ἀσώματον, χωριστὸν ἢ ἀχώριστον· καὶ πότερον μία ἐν ἐκάστῳ ψυχῇ ἢ πολλαί, καὶ εἰ μία, μονοειδής ἢ πολυδύναμος, καὶ τίς ἢ τῶν δυνάμεων διαφορά· (cf. De an. I,1, 402b1ff.); cf. Blumenthal 1996, 76, 199 n. 8.—However, Titus nowhere states that the soul has "faculties".

¹³⁶ In a fragment preserved in Eusebius, Praep. ev. XIII.17 the Middle Platonist Severus (perhaps c. 200 CE) believes that Plato's teaching that the soul is composed of an impassible and a passible substance, must be relinquished, because it implies that the soul is corruptible. Ἀλλὰ γὰρ οὐκ ἔστι ψυχῇ τρίτον τι πρῶγμα ἐκ δύο ἐναντίων ἀλλήλοις σύνθετον, ἀπλοῦν δὲ καὶ τῇ αὐτῇ φύσει ἀπαθὲς καὶ ἀσώματον· Severus writes in XIII.17,4 (Mras 1956, 240), and here, despite certain differences there are also similarities with Titus in terminology and content (cf. also Tertullian, De an. 14.1, Waszink 1947, 17). Note too that just as Titus uses σύνθεσις and κρᾶσις synonymously, Severus in XIII.17,2 (Mras 1956, 239) also parallels the elements which are τὰ . . . κραθέντα καὶ μυχθέντα with the soul, which is composed of impassible and passible substance, even though it is not here, but later, that he uses συντίθημι. When οἱ . . . πολλοὶ according to Severus in XIII.17,5 (Mras 1956, 240) infer the soul's παθητὴ οὐσία and mortality from the presence of πάθη, there is we do not find in Titus Aristotle's or Severus's solution¹³⁷ that the soul has faculties (δυνάμεις) instead of parts (μέρη).

The Stoics' interests were related to these tendencies, insofar as—materially—they understood the soul as an organic, vitalistic unity. Nevertheless the Stoics spoke of eight parts to the soul, μέρη, only that these “parts” should be understood as functions of the one soul: the five senses, as well as the power of speech and procreateness were streams of πνεῦμα, which emanated from and were controlled by the eighth part, τὸ ἡγεμονικόν. Within τὸ ἡγεμονικόν moreover the Stoics distinguished between different faculties (δυνάμεις). According to Pohlenz, however, it was not until Chrysippus that Stoic psychology was driven into extreme monism and intellectualism. Chrysippus rejected any idea of an irrational part or faculty of the soul. Every aspect of the soul's life was interpreted here as the soul or τὸ ἡγεμονικόν (which is identified with διάνοια and λογισμός) in a particular state. It is a question of constantly changing qualitative states (the category πὼς ἔχον), which involves among other things that also the passions are διάνοια in a particular state.¹³⁸

Titus is influenced by Stoic ideas in several regards. Thus the idea of the one substance of the soul that takes on different qualities already resembles the Stoic idea of ἡγεμονικόν πὼς ἔχον; however, as previously demonstrated, Titus here uses Aristotelian concepts. It turns out in addition that Titus believes that the soul contains a particular “mind”, which he unsystematically designates with a series of names including λογισμός, λογικόν, λογιστικόν, which in I.32 (Gr. 20.31–21.3 → Ch. XI.13) for example, are used indiscriminately, or νοῦς (e.g. in I.34, Gr. 22.21.31). Titus does not give us any explanation, however, as to what status this mind has in the soul, when it is not a “part”.¹³⁹ In I.35 it even seems that Titus envisages not perhaps a certain similarity with those who according to Titus write about the soul's activities and possibly infer a variegated substance.

¹³⁷ Eusebius, Præp. ev. XIII.17.6, Mras 1956, 240: τὰς ἐν ἡμῖν ἐνεργούσας δυνάμεις. On the Severus fragment see furthermore Deuse 1983, 102–8.

¹³⁸ See further presentations in Pohlenz (1948, 55, 61, 87–93, 143–44, 198–99, 224–27 with references in Pohlenz 1949) and Forschner (1995, 59–60, 97, 115f., 120, 122, 134–35, 138f.), who differs only on few points.

¹³⁹ In II.7, Gr. 29.20–28 Titus even uses Plato's image from Phaedr. 247c of the charioteer and horses, but even though he allows the charioteer to be νοῦς (τὸν ἡνίοχον νοῦν, Gr. 29.26), he uses the image so freely that we cannot conclude anything about “parts of the soul” (→ Ch. XI.16). Also in III.13.9 man's natural rea-only the mind of the soul but also a mind of the mind, so to speak. For he talks of τὸ λογιστικὸν καὶ ἡγεμονικώτατον τοῦ νοῦ (Gr. 22.36–37) and of τὸ . . . ἡγεμονικώτατον τῆς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου διανοίας (Gr. 22.38–39). Here διάνοια does not, as is otherwise the case, seem to denote “thought” or “intention”, but to be synonymous with νοῦς;¹⁴⁰ what is especially noteworthy, however, is that Titus distinguishes λογιστικὸν/ἡγεμονικώτατον within man’s νοῦς; the aim of the superlative ἡγεμονικώτατον, ‘super-commanding’, is presumably the same. Either Titus has identified ψυχή and νοῦς, or there is also in a way a further νοῦς within νοῦς. But whatever the case, the term τὸ ἡγεμονικόν is Stoic in origin.

Here then it is interesting that Titus can also identify this commanding centre in the soul with the heart; at least, in IV.84 (Sy 168.34–35) he quotes Lk. 6.45 (cf. Mt. 12.35) and explains in the context the meaning of καρδιά, heart: “and the term ‘heart’ indicates the authority and the mind’s ability to govern” (καρδιά κενον οὐκ ἔστιν ἡ καρδιά, Sy 168.35); soon after he juxtaposes, and perhaps also distinguishes between, “mind” (νοῦς) and “heart” (καρδιά) (Sy 169.2–3).¹⁴¹ It was precisely the Stoics’ view that the whole of τὸ ἡγεμονικόν was concentrated in the heart.¹⁴²

However, Titus’s polemic against a doctrine of a soul of parts was not concerned with how the soul’s commanding rational centre is to be understood in relation to the soul as such, but with the fundamental distinction between a rational and an irrational part of the soul. But according to Titus the soul’s commanding mind is awarded the responsibility for sin, which he believes the Manichaeans refer to an irrational part of the soul. For the idea that sin originates in an irrational part of the soul is for Titus yet another example of the son (λόγος ὁ κατὰ φύσιν, ed.N 310.7) has supervision of nature (φύσις), and man is capable of being his own steersman and charioteer.

¹⁴⁰ Thus perhaps also in I.34, Gr. 22.13, where διάνοια could be a synonym for the following λογισμός, which presumably denotes the same as νοῦς.

¹⁴¹ καρδιά renders νοῦς in e.g. Sy 4.6 (cf. Gr. 2.35) and λογισμός in 52.6 (cf. Gr. 41.14) (but also γνώμη [Sy 82.32/Gr. 67.17] and διάνοια [Sy 51.35/Gr. 41.9]).— Cf. also IV.47: in Lk. 6.45 Christ calls the heart a treasury because of the freedom of the will (Sy 152.21–22).

¹⁴² See further Pohlenz 1948, 87–88. As Pohlenz also notes, the Stoics could of course here lean on the role of the heart in everyday language and popular ideas, which on this point were closely related to biblical ideas of the heart (cf. Lk. 6.45), see Baumgärtel and Behm 1938; Dihle, Jacob, Lohse, Schweizer and Tröger 1973.

Manichaean determinism that acquits man himself, and this determinism precludes Titus's own theodicy that the guilt is man's. Altogether Titus's interest in man's rationality is always concerned with its moral responsibility.¹⁴³

According to Titus it is not possible for an action (πρᾶξις), e.g. an evil action (a sin), to be carried out merely by desire (ἐπιθυμία) being set in motion; from the point of view of desire it is only a matter of a reflection (ἐνθύμησις) which need not go any further, since at one and the same time it blazes up and goes out. For desire to lead to action a preliminary consideration (σκέψις) and deliberation (βουλή) are required in man, and then a decision (κρίσις) and a choice (αἵρεσις) of action (πρᾶξις), which is performed by the mind of the soul (λογισμός, λογικόν etc.) (I.32, Gr. 20.31–21.3 → Ch. XI.13). Titus seems to envisage two processes in man here, partly that desire is moved and partly a rational process that proceeds in two steps: first a consideration of the aim of the action (σκέψις/βουλή) and then a decision (κρίσις/αἵρεσις), which finally concludes with a third step, the action itself.¹⁴⁴ The rational consideration thus takes priority over the will, but both are rational acts.¹⁴⁵

Since Titus now identifies on the one hand virtuous and rational acts and on the other hand evil and irrational ones, but derives sinful actions from the rational planning and choice of the mind, it means that the irrational action is performed by man's mind with full knowledge; for the alternative would be that there was an irrational part of the soul:

¹⁴³ It also seems as if Titus is willing to completely reduce the reason's area of operations to that of practice; when he states in I.24 that neither we nor the angels have a part in seeing God κατ' οὐσίαν (Gr. 15.22–23 → Ch. XI.11), he is at least writing off the possibility of the highest form of contemplation.

¹⁴⁴ In most cases the expressions σκοπός (e.g. Gr. 22.1.3.11.18.26.29), διάνοια (e.g. Gr. 22.27.34) and πρόθεσις (e.g. Gr. 29.30.32), which are used in other contexts, seem to denote the same step as σκέψις/βουλή. But as mentioned διάνοια can also mean the mind itself.

¹⁴⁵ Seen in the context of the history of ideas, Titus's concept of the will is of course pre-Augustine; cf. Dihle 1982 (German: Dihle 1985): although as far as I can see Titus envisages volition as a phenomenon, he is still so close to classical philosophy that this will is regarded as a natural continuation of the planning by the intellect. The will cannot therefore be evaluated morally independent of the evaluation of the aim of the action. Cf. Titus, who in I.34 with several examples explains that it is the underlying purpose (σκοπός) that decides whether an act is righteous or wicked: e.g. both the murderer and his judge kill, "but the purpose separates what is done" (ὁ δὲ σκοπὸς δίδισθαι τὸ πραττόμενον, 21.39–22.1) (21.37–22.1).

For if the soul, through not knowing the quality of the desire,¹⁴⁶ had moved on to act irrationally, one could definitely claim that the things which are done irrationally are brought about as though they were from the irrational part (of the soul). (I.32, Gr. 21.8–11 → Ch. XI.13).

This passage is best illuminated by another in II.3:

And with a word of reproach sin is well named as being committed “against reason”—which as a matter of fact can be applied everywhere—so that all that is committed “against reason” is sin, even if it takes its origin in those things that are in accordance with nature. (Gr. 27.6–9 → Ch. XI.15).¹⁴⁷

Reason can be applied everywhere, also against itself. Precisely because they have their source in reason certain actions are sinful or irrational, despite their source being in nature. When Titus here claims that reason can be used irrationally, it is clear that he is repeating the Stoics' ideas of the “irrational movement” (ἄλογος κίνησις) of reason, which is against true reason (παρὰ τὸν ὀρθὸν λόγον), and which was directed among other things against Plato's idea of an irrational part of the soul.¹⁴⁸ Plato's interpretation of Socrates's teaching of οὐδεὶς ἐκὼν ἀμαρτάνει (e.g. Gorgias 467c ff.; Protagoras 358b–c) implies precisely a determinism in Timaeus 81e–87b, especially 86b ff., where sicknesses, errors and moral evils are derived from weaknesses in the body and the parts of the soul that are most closely linked to it. In Timaeus 69c–d determinism is linked to the irrational part of the soul: in the body another kind of soul is lodged, namely the mortal, which has fearful and unavoidable passions within itself (ἄλλο τε εἶδος ἐν αὐτῷ ψυχῆς . . . τὸ θνητόν, δεινὰ καὶ ἀναγκαῖα ἐν ἑαυτῷ παθήματα ἔχον, Timaeus 69c). These views are close to what Titus imagines that the Manichaeans believed, and it turns out that Titus's strategy is to identify Manichaeism with particular tendencies in Platonism.¹⁴⁹ Here ¹⁴⁶ The quality (ποιότης) of the desire must mean here, “the kind of desire in question”; the expression cannot be aimed at the quality of “vice”, for that is precisely the result of the mind's choice, whereas desire precedes the choice.

¹⁴⁷ Cf. II.46: παρὰ λόγον, Gr. 55.24; τῷ παραλόγῳ, Gr. 55.27; παραλόγως, Gr. 55.37. Cf. also that in III.28,5 Titus can write of Eve, who was tempted by the Devil (the serpent): λόγῳ γὰρ ἀπατηλῷ ὡς λόγου μετέχουσα καὶ γνώσεως μεταφέρεται. (ed.N 342.11–12), cf. also III.29,6 ἐπιβούλῳ γνώμῃ (ed.N 344.18). Cf. also IV.60–61.64.

¹⁴⁸ See further Pohlenz 1948, 89–90, 143–44, 224–25 with references in Pohlenz 1949; Forschner 1995, 121–26.

¹⁴⁹ Cf. Langerbeck (1967, 52–56), who shows how the anti-heretical polemic in Clement of Alexandria and Origen includes precisely such passages in Plato. Cf. perhaps also Löhr 1996, 81, 100–1.

therefore Titus is presumably continuing a polemic that was originally directed against Platonists, and elsewhere he also appears to be continuing an attack on Platonic doctrines regarding the evilness of matter.¹⁵⁰ Indeed Titus also rejects directly the doctrine that οὐδεὶς ἐκὼν ἀμαρτάνει:

However, if the reasoning faculty on the one hand often chooses desire, in that it has voluntarily subjugated itself to a bad way of life, and then once more rejects desire, when a fear, of whatever kind, or at least a desire for virtue that draws towards itself, restrains it [i.e. the reasoning faculty], it is clear that it is the reasoning faculty alone that as its own actions both perform those that are done beautifully and those that are done differently. (I.32, Gr. 21.11–16 → Ch. XI.13).¹⁵¹

¹⁵⁰ In Contra Manich. I.21 Titus quotes from a Manichaean book that describes the point in Mani's myth when the demons of darkness or matter see the beauty of light and desire it. Titus objects that it is good to desire or love the good (cf. also the related arguments in I.23–25; cf. Klein 1991, 57–58). This type of argument is not particular to Titus but is found in a number of anti-Manichaean writings, e.g. Alexander of Lycopolis, Contra Manich. opin. disp. IX, Brinkmann 1895, 15.9–16.8; see further Baur 1831, 46–49; Beck 1978, 82, 85, 87–88; Villey 1985, 245–46; Klein 1991, 73, 75. The form of the argument that evil cannot be evil if it desires the good appears in Aristotle in Met. XIV,4 (1092a1–5), where he attacks the Platonic view that there should be a (material) principle that is evil and yet can receive the good; in that case the material principle participates in and longs for the good which destroys it (. . . καὶ τὸ κακὸν τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ χάραν εἶναι, καὶ μετέχειν καὶ ὀρέγεσθαι τοῦ φαρτικοῦ· φαρτικὸν γὰρ τοῦ ἐναντίου τὸ ἐναντίον). It is possible that Aristotle's argument in fact comes from Speusippus (thus Dillon 1996, 15). Speusippus denied that in an ethical sense the One (τὸ ἓν) could be called "good" and the Multiplicity (τὸ πλῆθος) "evil". Merlan (1968, 96–140) has argued that Ch. 4 in Iamblichus's De comm. math., Festa 1975, 15.6–18.12 comes from Speusippus; this chapter posits two principles, the One and the Multiplicity, and argues in this way among others that the Multiplicity is not evil or ugly: even though the One is not in a real sense "good", we praise it for its self-sufficiency, and because it is the cause of beauty in numbers. Since the Multiplicity naturally receives the One, it is illogical to describe it as evil or ugly; on the contrary, the Multiplicity should also be praised (Festa 1975, 16.2–9). Tarán (1981, 86–107), however, disputes that Ch. 4 in Iamblichus's De comm. math. comes from Speusippus; instead he proposes that the chapter was perhaps written by "a Neopythagorean or Neoplatonic sympathizer", and that the writer has at least used Aristotle's Met. (Tarán 1981, 107; moreover the argument in Met. 1092a3–5, according to Tarán [1981, 343], also comes from Aristotle and not Speusippus). On the other hand Merlan's hypothesis is defended in Dillon 1984 (cf. Dillon 1996, 430). It is not possible here to deal more closely with the problem; whatever the case, the anti-Manichaean argument is of philosophical origin, whether contrived by Speusippus or Aristotle. The argument can also be independent of both, insofar as it, as pointed out by Merlan (1968, 114), goes back to Plato, Symp. 203e and Lysis 217b.

¹⁵¹ Cf. e.g. also II.46, Gr. 55.32–33 (τὸν πράττοντα . . . ἐκόντα πλημμελοῦντα).—Titus admittedly connects sin to ignorance, error or madness: man sins out of ignorance (II.22, Gr. 39.22–23 → Ch. XI.23). Men received penitence and forgiveness,

First and foremost the passage raises the question of what entity ἐπιθυμία, “desire”, actually is in Titus. Does he in reality believe that desire is an irrational impulse from a lower part of the soul, or a faculty within it, which can hardly be consistent with his other statements?

The mind or reasoning power can choose desire, apparently understood as a wicked way of life, but it can also reject this (wicked) desire, among others through a desire for virtue that draws towards itself.¹⁵² In other words the mind relates itself to contrary desires. In this context we can also recall the passage from I.32 referred to above, where it is said that ἐπιθυμία may be “moved”, yet without the contribution of the reasoning power will nevertheless remain in its place, because it is only a reflection (ἐνθύμησις) which flares up and goes out at one and the same time (Gr. 20.31–21.2 → Ch. XI.13).

The purpose of these passages becomes clear in II.13, however, where Titus returns to his theory that the Manichaeans regard the soul as being compounded of contraries, but now in the formulation “that two opposing natures exist in us” (Gr. 31.34 → Ch. XI.19), which is again a conclusion drawn from “thinking (ἐνθυμέομαι) first bad things, then good things” (Gr. 31.34–35 → Ch. XI.19).¹⁵³ Titus’s task is thus to present an alternative explanation for the presence of these contrary thoughts, and as its point of origin this explanation is based on one of firmest assumptions in Titus’s polemic, namely that from nature man is gifted with the knowledge of good and evil. This fundamental assumption must without doubt be related to the idea of “common concepts”, understood to mean in the area of ethics.¹⁵⁴ God has handed over virtue and vice to man himself “in because they are in a body and fell “into error” (صلاص) (IV.108, § 183.9–11). Cf. also Titus’s wordplay on Mani’s name (see above p. 168). But ignorance does not mean that man sins involuntarily, since Titus does not believe that ignorance comes from an irrational part of the soul: the soul or the reason are responsible for their ignorance.

¹⁵² This ἐπιθυμία . . . ἀρετῆς (Gr. 21.14) could be inspired by Gal. 5.17, where the apostle actually also reckons that the spirit can desire in opposition to the flesh.—Cf. also I.34, Gr. 22.23, where Titus mentions a πάθος τῆς ἀρετῆς.

¹⁵³ Cf. also the conclusion, II.13, Gr. 32.19–22 → Ch. XI.19.

¹⁵⁴ Stroumsa and Stroumsa 1988, 50 thus note pertinently that the natural knowledge of good and evil that Titus is discussing is “in the field of ethics, the equivalent of the koinai ennoiai in epistemology.”—Cf. the earlier Church fathers, e.g. already in Justin the “natural concepts” have to do with a common ethical knowledge (see above p. 285), or lex naturalis in Origen (see above p. 287).

that He has beforehand placed knowledge of both (qualities) in his nature” (II.3, Gr. 26.38–39 → Ch. XI.14), in the sense of possibilities that man is free to realise in practice:

Therefore man is honoured through freedom to both virtue and vice, in that he possesses by nature the knowledge of these two, which can be performed but which do not exist until they are performed. (II.9, Gr. 30.21–24).¹⁵⁵

It is reasonable to conclude that this knowledge is quite simply “innate”, and it is probably also the intention, even though in Titus we can also find the view that children just like the animals lack cognition and are thus not rational creatures,¹⁵⁶ a view that again places Titus close to Stoicism.¹⁵⁷ The theory of the natural knowledge of good and evil also seems to have the advantage for Titus that it permits him to adhere to Plato and Chrysippus’s philosophical insight that the evil is necessary in order to know the good,¹⁵⁸ or, as Titus formulates it in II.36, the knowledge and the power to choose and to realise the lie is necessary, so that the truth, which is stronger than the lie, can also be chosen (Gr. 47.2–32).¹⁵⁹

¹⁵⁵ ἐλευθεριότητι τοιγαροῦν τετίμηται ἄνθρωπος ἀρετῆς τε καὶ κακίας, τούτων φύσει τὴν γνώσιν ἔχων δυναμένων πραχθῆναι, πρὶν δὲ πραχθῆναι μὴ ὄντων.—Cf. also II.7, where Titus presupposes that God has gifted man’s φύσις with both power and knowledge of virtue and vice (Gr. 29.20–22 → Ch. XI.16).—That knowledge of good and evil is contained in man’s nature is also important in Book III’s interpretation of the Paradise narrative (e.g. III.15.5; III.17.11; III.18.3; III.18.7; III.23.9; III.23.11–13; III.23.17; III.28.1–3; III.29.1–2; III.29.5), see below pp. 321–26.—Natural knowledge of good and evil is not for man alone but for all rational beings that are created (IV.83), including the Devil (IV.60–61) and the demons (IV.64).

¹⁵⁶ At least as far as I understand II.40 (Gr. 50.10–22), in particular the remark πρὶν δὲ γνῶναι, <νήπιος ὑπάρχων>, οὐδέτερον τῶν ἄκρων καλεῖται, Gr. 50.17–18 → Ch. XI.28. Cf. also II.7, Gr. 29.11ff. → Ch. XI.16.

¹⁵⁷ See above pp. 283, 286–87.

¹⁵⁸ Plato, Theaet. 176a. Concerning Chrysippus see the fragments in Von Arnim 1923, 335–36 (SVF II, 1169), 339–40 (SVF II, 1181–82).

¹⁵⁹ However, because this has to do with truth and falsehood, Titus would hardly be able to define them both as accidental qualities; the entire interest in II.36 concerns the idea that just as darkness in the corporeal world is without substantial existence, an absence of light (cf. Stead 1977, 140), so is the case with falsehood.—Cf. also other formulations of Titus’s view in II.4 (Gr. 27.20–28.18): the possibility of vices also allows for the virtues; “But if anyone will object that just like God we ought to be unable to experience the contraries (of the virtues)—both intemperance and injustice—, this person is saying nothing other than that we ought not to be human beings.” (εἰ δὲ τις ἀντιλέγοι ὡς· δέον ἡμᾶς ἀνεπίδέκτους εἶναι τῶν ἐναντιῶν (ἀκολασίας τε καὶ ἀδικίας) ὥσπερ ὁ θεός, οὐδὲν ἕτερον ὁ τοιοῦτος λέγει ἢ ὡς δέον εἶναι ἡμᾶς οὐκ ἀνθρώπους, Gr. 28.12–15). Cf. also II.39 (Gr. 49.19–50.10),

The explanation as to why human beings conceive wicked and virtuous thoughts alternately is that since the knowledge of both is natural to us we are of necessity moved towards thoughts of them. It is an advantage that we cannot escape thoughts of evil things, because that enables us to have a basis on which to make a better choice (II.13, Gr. 31.35–38 → Ch. XI.19). Because man is gifted with knowledge of justice and injustice, thought will quite naturally take both into consideration.¹⁶⁰ On such a basis the intention (πρόθεσις) inclines in the direction it will as a voluntary movement, but, Titus emphasises, if there was no possibility of inclining towards the wicked, there would be nothing praiseworthy about virtue (II.13, Gr. 31.39–32.4 → Ch. XI.19).¹⁶¹ If we relate this presentation to the one above in I.32, it seems clear that ἐπιθυμία or the ἐνθύμησις that is linked to ἐπιθυμία is not to be understood as an impulse from an irrational part of the soul, but as an intellectual consideration directed towards a natural, given knowledge of good and evil.¹⁶² In II.13 Titus also finds occasion to stress yet again that the process he has described esp. 49.35–37: “For every proof is the contrary of its contrary, (the proof that) precisely (takes place) through cognition and judgement, but it is clear that without cognition neither of them exists for the other.” (→ Ch. XI.27).

¹⁶⁰ Here, however, it relates to given possibilities for action, as detailed in the following: the thought moves towards different possibilities that can happen, and it considers them with the help of the natural knowledge of good and evil in order thereafter to make its choice, see Gr. 32.8–11: . . . ἡ ἐνθύμησις . . . ἀναγκαιῶς κινεῖται πρὸς <τὰ> τὸ γενέσθαι ἐνδεχόμενα, οὐ βιαζομένη πρὸς αὐτὰ τὴν ψυχὴν, ἀλλὰ γνῶσει φυσικῇ ἐπιβάλλουσα τούτοις (→ Ch. XI.19).—The reflection is presented in the context of a comparison with the mind’s differentiation between visual impressions that can lead to evil or good actions (Gr. 32.5–9 → Ch. XI.19).

¹⁶¹ Whereas Gr. 32.3 reads ἐνθύμησις, so the reference is to the thought’s examination of available knowledge, Sy 40.25 reads $\rho\acute{\omicron}\delta\lambda\iota$, which presumably renders ἐπιθυμία. But here Sy may well have been the original reading, for the intellectual examination of fundamental knowledge is apparently, what Titus understands by ἐπιθυμία.—Titus applies the term ῥέπω in Gr. 32.4, which actually refers to the dipping of the scales to one, to the direction that one decides on, and he uses as a full parallel the corresponding substantive ῥοπή in II.11, Gr. 31.13; in a philosophical context the terms are originally Stoic, but were used by this time by both Platonic and Catholic writers, see further Dihle 1982, 58, 193 n. 54, 213 n. 10, 221 n. 65, 223 n. 72, 227 n. 82, 227 n. 84, 231 n. 107; Meijering 1974, 75–76; Blumenthal 1996, 81.—When Titus links praise and blame to voluntary actions, it is obvious to refer to Aristotle, e.g. Eth. Nic. III,1,1 (1109b30f.: καὶ ἐπὶ μὲν τοῖς ἐκουσίοις ἐπαίνων καὶ ψόγων γινομένων, . . .).

¹⁶² It is presumably also because we naturally have knowledge of good and evil and are therefore of necessity moved towards thoughts of virtue and vice that Titus can say in I.34 that the desire for sinful actions is innate (ἐμφυτος) in us (Gr. 21.29–30).

does not mean that the soul consists of different parts but must be understood as activities of the soul (Gr. 32.4–5 → Ch. XI.19).

Titus thus proves himself to be Stoicising: in a monistic way he manages to relate everything to the autonomous processes of reason; only the one element of external events remained that thought related itself to given possibilities for action. Even though it is thus clear that wickedness and vice are the passions or sufferings of reason (“for wickedness and vice are the suffering of the reasoning power”, πονηρία γὰρ καὶ κακία λογισμοῦ πάθος [II.39, Gr. 49.20–21]), the given possibilities of action or the external circumstance are nevertheless the conditions of man,¹⁶³ and in this context we must perhaps also understand the remark quoted from II.3 that sin is committed against reason, even if it originates in things that are in accordance with nature (Gr. 27.9 → Ch. XI.15). τὰ κατὰ φύσιν is actually a Stoic term,¹⁶⁴ that Titus also uses in the following:

For the irrational use of the things that are in accordance with nature brings about sin, whereas the reason within us examines the things that are in accordance with nature, and therefore the sin that is committed is not unnoticed. (II.3, Gr. 27.9–12 → Ch. XI.15).

The meaning of τὰ κατὰ φύσιν is best illustrated by II.45–46, where Titus seeks to refute Mani’s “accusations” against, for example, lethal iron or death itself of being evil. In II.46 (Gr. 55.18–37) it becomes clear that τὰ κατὰ φύσιν are quite simply all created things, the law or nature of which cannot be changed, and which are not evil but which the mind can use irrationally. This is true of iron and wood, but it is also true, for example, of adultery or murder, where Titus additionally explains that the murder brings about death, which is something natural, and that it is only the murderer who has used his reason irrationally who should be charged. One can also compare this with II.58 (Gr. 61.37–62.13), where τὰ κατὰ φύσιν amongst others is exemplified in food and wine and the sexual drive, which ¹⁶³ Titus also concerns himself with sin in a being without a body, like the Devil: the cause of the Devil’s fall was pride, for as an incorporeal being he had no corporeal desire (IV.74, Sy 164.5–22), but as with all rational creatures this was a desire that built on the misuse of natural reason (IV.82, Sy 167.29–168.7; Klein’s reference and interpretation [1991, 116 with n. 276] are here misleading).

¹⁶⁴ See, for example the indexes in Pohlenz 1948 or Forschner 1995. According to Forschner 1995, 149 n. 42, however, the Stoics had taken the term from the Old Academy; cf. Pohlenz 1948, 118.

be endowed with passions (σάρξ ἐμπαθής); a heavy body will not live together again with the passions, etc.¹⁷¹

If one now thinks that Titus's picture of sin as brought about by the considerations and choice of the mind is an expression of a naive image of man, one should also add that this image achieves a greater depth through Titus assigning great significance to ἔξεις, habits and upbringing. Thus he presupposes in I.33 that also those who train themselves in chastity have a ἔξις to desire (ἐπιθυμία), which is stirred (Gr. 21.20–23). But he maintains that one can hinder the desire of nature through the reasoning power, from which it follows that the reasoning power is both that which sins and that which does good, and that the reasoning power is what knows both virtue and vice (Gr. 21.25–29). In II.11 he claims that virtue and vice can suddenly appear in man where they have otherwise not been present by virtue of long-continued practice (συνήθεια), which proves that they are determined by the will (προαιρετικός); virtue acquired is thus in danger of being lost, if one shows even the merest indifference (Gr. 31.7–17). In II.12 Titus then introduces the objection against this presentation that there are people who wish to refrain from bad deeds without being able to (Gr. 31.17–19 → Ch. XI.18). Titus explains this fact by saying that just as it is difficult to remove a long-standing bodily suffering (πάθος), it is not easy either to drive out a ἔξις in the soul that is not good but which through long custom has become stiffened unless a good passion (πάθος) that is greater comes in and drives out the passion that had previously been received (Gr. 31.19–23 → Ch. XI.18).¹⁷² The line of thought that a given person is after all responsible for a vice which cannot be removed simply by a decision because it is the result of him not training in virtue, is also found in Aristotle, Ethica Nicomachea III,5,13–14 (1114a12–21), who also makes the comparison with bodily illnesses, though not in quite the same way. We do not find in this passage of Aristotle the idea of the good πάθος driving out the bad, but at the least it is hardly Stoic.—In II.3 we find another expression of Titus's viewpoint:

¹⁷¹ Pitra 1888, 53 = PG 18, 1260A1–4 → Ch. XI.50,II.

¹⁷² Examples of such good passions which can overcome the bad habit are either fear of punishment, or calling the law to mind, see Gr. 31.23–29.

So if we train our immanent reason hard like a body for the exercise of virtue, we make it healthy and strong through a well-measured movement. But if we do not regard it as worthy of training and care, it becomes weaker from illnesses and in the end, because it is neglected, it becomes lame. (Gr. 27.12–16 → Ch. XI.15).¹⁷³

It is clear enough that the idea that the reason must be trained in virtue has ancient roots in Greek culture, but the fact that in Contra Manichaeos Titus uses concepts such as ἔξις and προαίρεσις (προαιρητικός) makes it probable that he is particularly continuing the traditions with roots in Aristotle's ethics, which placed a special emphasis on the moral significance of ἔθος, but which had been disseminated to both the Stoics and the Platonists.¹⁷⁴

I have now attempted to give an outline of Titus's philosophical views, mainly though not exclusively, on the basis of Books I–II. It should by now be clear that Titus actually drew many of his fundamental views from contemporary literate culture, which cannot be called opportunism or disingenuousness, when he claimed that large parts of what he had to say could be presented independently of Scripture as “common knowledge”. The reason that he resorted to such a presentation, which was unusual for a Catholic writer at the time, is the particular conditions in Bostra, where the Manichaean mission was influencing the already strained relationship between pagans and Catholics, and where the Manichaeans in polemic against Catholic Christianity sought to present themselves as representatives of rational Christianity.

Even though Titus's presentation independent of Scripture and on the basis of the common concepts was unusual, it was made possible by the previous generations of Catholic theologians, who in principle had accepted an innate knowledge in man. Nor was Titus's incorporation of philosophical forms of thought and concepts new to theology. Yet the philosophical element in Titus's understanding of Christianity was not merely a continuation of the tradition, but also the result of an actual strategy. This becomes clear when we note that Adda's philosophically-oriented problems were so important for Titus that he was willing to make a significant revision of the traditional interpretation of the Paradise narrative which brought it into better accord with philosophical assumptions.

¹⁷³ Cf. e.g. also II.13, Gr. 32.16–17 (→ Ch. XI.19).—In IV.30, Sy 144.1 the soul's error is attributed to its “negligence” (صغیر).

¹⁷⁴ Cf. e.g. Dihle 1982, 55, 63, 105, 134, 240 n. 81. Cf. e.g. also that the cultivation of the soul and the earth can be compared both in Eth. Nic. X,9,6 (1179b23–26) and in Contra Manich. II.6, Gr. 27.18–20; II.13, Gr. 32.17–19 (→ Ch. XI.19). Cf. also Sickenberger 1901, 83–85 on the concept προαίρεσις in Titus.

CHAPTER EIGHT

TITUS OF BOSTRA'S INTERPRETATION OF THE PARADISE NARRATIVE

1. Introductory remark

In the last chapters we saw how Titus could relate to Adda's questions on Gen. 3, because these sprang from a set of values with roots in philosophical traditions from the cultures of Mediterranean world which Titus also shared. It was appropriate to call the questions a "protest exegesis" since they not only contained a protest against the traditional interpretation of the text but also against the traditional exegetes and their God. These questions are not merely devotional; they are meant to shake their audience and thereby pave the way for an alternative explanation of God, evil, the world and man. Titus, however, would give a different set of answers to the questions, which allowed his readers to retain their creed.¹

In this context Adda's attack was directed against the first article of faith, and it is also only this article that Titus defends in Contra Manichaeos III.10–29, through a theodicy that seeks to show that the creation of the world and of man was good and rational, and that the course of events in the Paradise narrative was similarly good and rational, an expression of God's Providence. Curiously, in the process Titus almost completely loses sight of the second and third articles. Protology and eschatology are not linked. It is true that God's οἰκονομία is a keyword, but God's plan aims only towards the individual himself being able to return to Paradise through virtuous effort (Contra Manichaeos III.22,2–3 and III.31). Titus is so engaged in finding God's good intent in permitting the very first sin that this sin loses its seriousness and cannot therefore be presented as a justification for the incarnation. An apparent exception appears in Contra Manichaeos

¹ The "creed" refers here not to a particular confessional formula but to the main points which—against both Marcionites and Gnostics—already in the 2nd cent. had become established as "rule of faith", that is, the Trinitarian confession with God the Father as Creator.

III.29,7–8 (ed.N 344.19–346.5), where Titus compares the serpent's ignorance of God's οἰκονομία in Adam's transgression with the ignorance by the rulers of this world of God's greatest οἰκονομία in the crucifixion (1 Cor. 2.8). But on closer examination we note that these are merely two examples of God's divine dispensation being compared: there is no organic connection between them, as there would have been if the intent was that the transgression had been permitted with a view to the crucifixion.

The theory that it was precisely because of the anti-Manichaean bias that in the 4th and 5th centuries the Eastern Church toned down the "doctrine of original sin" and emphasised the "free will"² can find some support in Titus's work; admittedly in Titus these tendencies are carried to extremes, but simultaneously the extremism shows precisely how a theodicy that is too attached to the creation can come to weaken the significance of the redemption. It is important, however, that such a theory does not tacitly and anachronistically presuppose that the theologians of the Eastern Church ought really to have had the same doctrine of original sin as Augustine. What should be asserted, according to the theory, is firstly that because Eastern theology was also interested in asserting the necessity of the Saviour, it was aware of ideas of a catastrophic Fall resulting in man's alienation from God. These ideas resemble Augustine's doctrine without being identical to it, and they serve a similar purpose; Hauke's term "Erbunheil" is therefore a more adequate concept. Secondly, the theory claims that there was a tension between these "ideas of original sin" in the Eastern Church and its interest in the "free will", and that they did not manage to coordinate the soteriology and the theodicy into a coherent interpretation, in brief, that also the synergism is an unclear and imprecise doctrine, full of tensions.

2. The image of God in man

Titus's reproduction in III.7,1–9 (→ Ch. XI.34) of the question ostensibly from Mani but in my opinion originally formulated by Adda, began as mentioned with a doubt as to why the world came into being (III.7,1); this fundamental problem is therefore the first to be solved by Titus, namely in III.10–III.11,5. I have already taken the opportunity to deal with these sections in the previous pages,³ and I will therefore settle here for pointing out that Titus's response alludes to Timaeus 29e and emphasises the fundamental point throughout the theodicy that God is good.

² See above p. 91.

In III.7,1 Titus also summarised his presentation in III.4–6 by showing that Mani held man to be created from the principle of evil. In III.6 Titus had already stated that man is “in fact the most regal and most qualified to rule of all living creatures in the corporeal world” (τὸ βασιλικώτατον καὶ ἀρχικώτατον πάντων δὴ τῶν ἐν τῷ σωματικῷ κόσμῳ ζώων, Gr. 69.2–3), and in III.11,6–III.12 he defends man on this premise and thus links together the creation of the world and of man by stating that the sole use of all created things is to exist for the sake of man. For Titus, man's position as ruler within the cosmos is clearly central—man being “that part of the world which to the highest degree is its own master”, τὸ κυριώτατον τοῦ κόσμου μέρος, III.11,11, ed.N 306.14–15), as he concludes from Scripture; in III.13,1–2 he follows Gen. 1.26 in connecting man's creation in God's εἰκὼν and ὁμοίωσις with the fact that he is set to rule over the animals (ed.N 308.11–15). This position as ruler, the createdness κατ' εἰκόνα, is contained in the fact that man is by nature gifted with reason; by virtue of his reason he is in contrast to all the animals a citizen of the world (III.13,3).⁴ It is clear that Titus is asserting the same philosophically-influenced teaching on man as in Books I–II,⁵ only now with explicit reference to Scripture.

The image of God in man has not only to do with his particular position in relation to the animals; the same is true of the command-

³ See above pp. 275–76.

⁴ ἄρχων ἄρα κατεσκευάσθη τῶν ἀπάντων ἄνθρωπος πρὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, ὁ λογικὸς τῶν ἀλόγων, ὁ συνέσει πολιτευόμενος τῶν ἀνάγκη φύσεως πεπεδημένων, ὁ σχεδὸν ἐπὶ τῷ λόγῳ τῆς φύσεως καὶ τὴν φύσιν ἔχων., ed.N 308.16–19.

⁵ Compare Contra Manich. III.13,3 (previous note) with II.3, Gr. 26.34–27.2, esp. 26.34–39:

“So over this [i.e. the world] God has set man as a rational citizen, even though he is only part of the whole. Everything else, which can neither look towards virtue nor vice, God has kept to Himself to control, but He has brought it about that virtue alone or vice should depend on himself [i.e. man], in that He has beforehand placed knowledge of both (qualities) in his nature . . .” (→ Ch. XI.14). Parallel with this and in contrast to the animals man is here a citizen by virtue of his reason, which is his nature.

ment not to eat of the Tree, which “Mani” (Adda) precisely criticised. For man it is an honour and a cognitive source of God to receive a commandment (III.14). This raises the question of the relationship between the image of God in man and the commandment. The image of God, which must be regarded as an innate knowledge,⁶ anticipated the commandment to obey the Creator, but this passive knowledge had precisely to be translated into action and trained through the keeping of a commandment (III.15, partly → Ch. XI.37). The commandment is thus interpreted as an ascetic exercise in obedience, a promise of temperance (III.23–24, partly → Ch. XI.43), a view which in Titus’s time is also found in Basil the Great.⁷

Also on another point the doctrine of man’s natural knowledge of good and evil could appear to be in conflict with the Paradise narrative; for at first sight the narrative appears to regard this knowledge as a supernatural knowledge linked to a tree that was not acquired until man ate of it. According to Titus, however, “the Tree of the Knowledge of good and evil” only got its name because man was to learn to practise his innate knowledge of good and evil by not approaching it; for the commandment not to eat of the Tree had only a coincidental link to the Tree itself (III.23–24, partly → Ch. XI.43). Nevertheless Titus also respects the view that the Tree really caused the eater to know good and evil, provided this only means that the innate knowledge was increased (III.29,1–5).⁸ Titus also has problems with God’s statement that Adam has become “like

⁶ Cf. above pp. 311–12.

⁷ Basil the Great claims in Quod Deus non est auctor malorum 9 that the Tree was in existence to the end that a commandment could be given that would test our obedience, the virtue of self-control (PG 31, 348CD). More specifically the commandment is to be regarded as a commandment to fast (Quod Deus non est auctor malorum 7 [PG 31, 344D]; De ieiun., hom. I,4 [PG 31, 168B]). Cf. Gross 1960, 141; Hauke 1993, 461.

⁸ Perhaps Titus also has an interest here in simply advancing several possible solutions to a problem; in that case it is an interest which is typical of his time; cf. Romeny 1997a, 18–19.—The view that the Tree itself contains cognition is well-known, e.g. from Theophilus, Ad Autol. II.25, which confirms that the Tree of the Knowledge of good and evil was good, and that its fruit was good. The Tree did not contain death, which instead was the result of the disobedience. In the Tree there was nothing other than cognition, but cognition is good if it is used properly (Grant 1970, 66). Like Titus Theophilus states that cognition is good, but unlike him he believes that cognition really was in the Tree. Theophilus, however, sees it as negative that man was disobedient and that he acquired cognition too soon (Grant 1970, 68). Cf. other examples in Alexandre 1988, 255; cf. above p. 215.

one of us, to know good and evil” (Gen. 3.22), but he solves them by arguing that the reference is to Adam’s original nature and not that Adam first acquired the knowledge through his disobedience (III.28).⁹ And again: the fact that Eve already had knowledge could actually raise the question of how she could be seduced by the serpent, assuming a reliance on the Socratic-Platonic teaching that οὐδείς ἐκὼν ἀμαρτάνει, but the problem is overcome by Titus through speaking of something like a deceptive reason that can seduce (III.28,5, ed.N 342.11–12).¹⁰

In III.13,10 Titus summarises the image of God in man in three points; (1) man’s rule over nature (both the animals and himself), (2) man’s reason and (3) man’s freedom.¹¹ These three definitions are merely aspects of the same fact—the rule is precisely reason and freedom. There is therefore hardly any divergence from the teaching in Contra Manichaeos II.11, where it is otherwise only freedom that is underlined as the content of the image of God in man:

In this way God then has honoured man by creating him in His own image, in order that he can be an emulator of God through the freedom of his will just as He Himself is good through the freedom of His nature, in that man does not keep away from sinning because of his weakness of nature, but honours virtue through his freedom. (Gr. 31.3–7 → Ch. XI.17).¹²

The passage is one of the places in Books I–II where in spite of his own programme Titus nonetheless alludes to Scripture (Gen. 1.26–27); perhaps he thought that also the pagans would agree with his idea of the image of God in man.¹³

⁹ See esp. III.28,1, “But this (word), which has been spoken by God, ‘See! Adam has become like one of us, to know good and evil’, refers to the natural Creation, (as it was) from the beginning, (and it is) not (the intention) that he (only) through the disobedience reached the knowledge of virtue and vice.” (ed.N 342.1–4: Τὸ δὲ «ἰδοὺ Ἄδὰμ γέγονεν ὡς εἷς ἐξ ἡμῶν τοῦ γινώσκειν καλὸν καὶ πονηρὸν» πρὸς θεοῦ λελεγμένον τὴν ἐξ ἀρχῆς πλάσιν τῆς φύσεως σημαίνει, οὐχ ὡς προ{σ}κόψαντος αὐτοῦ διὰ τῆς ἀπειθείας ἐπὶ τὴν ἀρετῆς τε καὶ κακίας γνῶσιν).

¹⁰ Cf. above p. 309.

¹¹ “. . . for which reason it is also testified by Scripture that because of both (his) natural position as ruler and possession of reason and freedom (man) is created in God’s image” (ὅθεν καὶ κατ’ εἰκόνα θεοῦ δεδημιουργῆσθαι πρὸς τῆς γραφῆς ὁμολόγηται διὰ τὸ ἀρχικὸν τε καὶ τὸ λογικὸν καὶ τὸ ἐλευθέριον τῆς φύσεως., ed.N 310.9–12).

¹² The remark that man does not refrain from sinning as a result of a weakness in his nature presumably means that it cannot be because of a weakness in his nature that man omits to sin—it must instead be due to an act of freedom.

¹³ Cf. also Plato’s definition of κόσμος as εἰκὼν τοῦ νοητοῦ in Tim. 29a–c, 92c.

The context (II.8–10) is that the right thing to say is that God cannot commit evil—not because He is weak, but because He never wishes to, and His nature is immutable.¹⁴ It is for this purpose that the passage builds in a distinction between God and man in the relationship designated by the phrase, “the image of God”: God is good through the freedom of nature, but man must imitate God, i.e. strive to be good, through the freedom of intention or of the will.¹⁵

Titus's interpretation of the image of God in man as rule, reason and freedom continues widespread traditions within ancient Judaism and patristics that were linked to particular philosophical definitions of man and were thus generally known in Titus's time.¹⁶ Also the distinction in Contra Manichaeos II.11 between God and man in the relationship designated by “the image of God” (the freedom of πρόθεσις in man—the freedom of φύσις in God) probably originates in the preceding tradition; the similarity with definitions in other Church fathers points in this direction.¹⁷ If the elements in Titus's

¹⁴ This idea appears again in II.37, where, however, it can be formulated in this way: “Accordingly He who has made the natures is above (His) nature and is Himself free of natural necessity.” (οὐκοῦν φύσεως μὲν ἐπάνω ὁ φύσει κατασκευάσας, αὐτὸς δὲ φύσεως ἀνάγκης ἐλεύθερος., Gr. 48.22–24). These definitions correspond factually to the presentation in Contra Manich. I.13 (see above pp. 266ff.).

¹⁵ The understanding of man's goodness as something that is to be acquired through endeavour reappears in Titus's theory in II.7 on καλός and ἀγαθός, which was based on Gen. 1.31 (see above pp. 302–5 and → Ch. XI.16). It would have been natural for Titus also to present this theory in Book III, but the fact that this is not the case may be due to Titus working with different sources to which he did not relate completely freely.

¹⁶ See Jervell 1960 on ancient Judaism, Gnosis and Paul; a survey of the doctrine of the image of God in man among a number of important Church fathers is to be found in Strucker 1913 (the development up to and including Irenaeus); Hamman 1987; cf. also Cairns 1953. Among individual studies see Bernard 1952 (on Athanasius); Burghardt 1957 (on Cyril of Alexandria); Crouzel 1956 (on Origen); Fantino 1986 (on Irenaeus); Leys 1951 (on Gregory of Nyssa); Merki 1952 (on Gregory of Nyssa); Sullivan 1963 (on Augustine). Cf. also Dihle 1980 concerning the Church fathers' teaching on free choice.—The interpretation of the image of God as dominion follows already from Gen. 1.26 itself, (cf. Ps. 8); see further Sir. 17.1ff.—See Hamman 1987, 106–13 concerning Philo.—Justin Martyr, who as mentioned believed that mankind has a common ethical knowledge (see above p. 285), emphasises in Apol. I.28,3; I.43,8 that God has created the human race with reason and the ability to choose the true and the good; explicitly, however, he does not link this anthropology with man's creation κατ' εἰκόνα, but see Irenaeus in Dem. 11; Adv. haer. IV.4,3; IV.37–39.—Unlike many Eastern fathers (already the Valentinians [Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I.5,5] and Irenaeus [esp. Adv. haer. V.6,1; V.16,2]), Titus does not draw a particular distinction between εἰκὼν and ὁμοίωσις.

¹⁷ Titus's definitions resemble both the somewhat different doctrines in Irenaeus teaching on the image of God are therefore traditional, it becomes of interest which elements he does not take over, and here we note that Titus does not give the εἰκών-theme any clear christological or ecclesiological point.¹⁸

3. God's foreknowledge and man's disobedience

God's immutable good nature and man who must first become good, are the two fundamental components of Titus's interpretation of Adam and Eve's disobedience. Titus believes that they both support each other and point in the same direction: God must always have wanted man to leave Paradise, because precisely this path made his moral progress possible.

Adda's disjunction in III.7,2–9 proposed as the first possibility that God knew beforehand that Adam would violate His commandment (III.7,3), but Adda preferred the second possibility, an ignorant God who in reality was the principle of evil (→ Ch. XI.34). In III.15,7 Titus makes it clear that it is the first possibility that he himself supports: "To be sure, God, who gave the order, knew what would happen . . .", ed.N 314.7 → Ch. XI.37). According to Adda, this possibility had to mean that the commandment not to eat was given in vain, and that God was the cause of the violation; these are conclusions which, as we shall see, Titus was unwilling to draw. In my opinion, the explanation for Titus's belief in God's foreknowledge of the transgression is to be found in a number of remarks of great principle significance which show that God's foreknowledge of the transgression is necessary for the very concept of God. The exegetical arguments for this foreknowledge in Contra Manichaeos III.20–21 are clearly secondary, supportive arguments, whether or not Titus himself has constructed them or taken them from the tradition.¹⁹

(cf. Meijering 1975, 19–30) and Athanasius (cf. Meijering 1974, 76). There are also considerable similarities with the doctrine of the image of God in man in Tertullian, which is precisely grounded in freedom of choice and action, but where God's goodness is natura, while man is good by institutio (see Adv. Marc. II.5,5; II.6,2–4). Also in Augustine God is characterised with the phrase non posse peccare (cf. Lamberigts 1990, 283f. with further references).

¹⁸ As one would expect by virtue of the influence from Paul (e.g. Rom. 8.29; 1 Cor. 15.45–49; 2 Cor. 3.18–4.6; Col. 1.15; 3.10), cf. e.g. Irenaeus.

¹⁹ Some of these arguments may well be older, yet at the same time of particular significance for Titus; with regard to the argument in Contra Manich. III.20,6–7

In III.21,3 Titus declares that from the beginning man was formed for his present state, and in III.21,4 he continues thus:

And (the acts of) disobedience did not alter the (human) creature, as if there was the one dispensation from the beginning, but another when the disobedience was known in God's foreknowledge. (ed.N 326.11–14 → Ch. XI.41).

Οικονομία and πρόγνωσις must not be separated in such a way that God's foreknowledge is to be understood merely as a passive perception of a future state of affairs that does not influence His plans, which on the other hand must be changed now that man has become disobedient; this of course also means that man must be changed. God's plans have naturally from the very beginning been determined by what He knew beforehand.

Titus's line of thought is in direct contrast to every form of doctrine of "original sin", which must involve a change to the very Creation. The change that he is thinking of here is presumably mortality—Titus attacks the doctrine that man was destined to remain in an immortal primeval state, but that this state was lost—though the two thought complexes, mortality and "original sin"/distortion of the relationship with God, belong together—because, as we shall see, the immortal primeval state is also thought of as a sinless state. In another passage to which we shall return Titus also rejects the idea that the Creation was changed in the sense of being cut off from salvation or becoming "incurable".²⁰ Thus it is precisely the ideas of the Eastern Church, which Hauke has gathered under the concept of "Erbinheil", that Titus rejects.

If God did not know that man would be disobedient, or if God's foreknowledge and dispensation were two separate factors that did that Adam and Eve did not have children until after the banishment from Paradise, because the procreation of children is only a necessity for those who are to die, Sickenberger (1901, 97–98) rightly refers to Titus of Bostra's Hom. in Luc., schol. to Lk. 20.34 (Sickenberger 1901, 234–35): διὰ τί τοίνυν ἀπιστεῖτε τῷ ἐπαγγελιαμένῳ; οὐ διὰ τοῦτο ἀνιστάμεθα, ἵνα πάλιν παιδοποιήσωμεν· ἡ γὰρ παιδοποιία παραμυθία τῆς θνητότητος· ὅταν δὲ ἀθάνατοι εὐρεθῶμεν, οὐ χρεῖα διαδοχῆς, δι' ἣν ὁ γάμος (Sickenberger 1901, 235).—The viewpoint also bears a considerable similarity to the argument in a fragment in the Catena in Gen. commenting on Gen. 1.29–30, no. 175 (Petit 1991, 125–26); Petit has not identified where the fragment is from; the manuscript Leningrad, Bibliothèque publique, Gr. 124 attributes it to John Chrysostom, but the other manuscripts do not reveal anything about the source.

²⁰ See below pp. 329–30 and p. 363.

not influence one another, this would have serious consequences for the concept of God: for it would mean that man's disobedience had forced God to impose death on man and banish him from Paradise (III.22,1):

God was therefore not forced by man's disobedience to prescribe death for him and remove him from Paradise, but on the contrary it pleased Him to take the starting-points in Himself, in the divine dispensation. (ed.N 328.5–8 → Ch. XI.42).²¹

Thus the alternatives are either that God was forced by events that were not anticipated or at least not included in His plans, or that the starting-point for God's actions always lies within Himself, in His own plans, and thus that God is free in relation to this world. We can compare this with the question in III.16,1, whether God's "will" or "purpose" (βούλημα) was not defeated by man's disobedience (ed.N 316.8–10): if man's disobedience was the precise opposite of God's plans, then God was weak—and also from this angle He would have been forced to act through circumstances over which He did not have full control.²²

These remarks should be understood on the background of Titus's philosophical concept of God, as presented above:²³ none of the things that God is called is anything beside Himself, since He is simple and uncompounded; consequently God's foreknowledge and dispensation cannot pursue two separate paths. God is the uncreated substance, the cause of all else in existence, but God does not create out of natural necessity: God is perfect and does not need the Creation; correspondingly the starting-point for God's actions lies within Himself, not in man's disobedience. All events must both be anticipated and planned if God is not to lose His freedom. We can also formulate this freedom as God's immutability: if everything had not from the beginning been contained in God's plan, then it must be changed continuously, which would mean that God lost His transcendence.

²¹ That God should be forced is not a conclusion which the Manichean text in III.7 draws, but the danger that Titus notes must be a consequence of God not knowing beforehand what would happen, and therefore having to kill man, since He had laid down the punishment of death for eating of the Tree; this also appears from Titus's use of the word τοῦτον.

²² As can be seen, Titus believed both that God takes Himself as the starting-point of His acts and that man's free choice can be maintained. In the last resort this position is probably untenable, for even though God's economy is just as eternal as His foreknowledge, man's free choice will nevertheless be God's starting-point, if it has to be maintained that this choice really is free.

²³ See above pp. 261–77.

Titus's explanation of why God gave man a commandment that He knew would not be kept is that the course of events promoted the development of morality; the preliminary disobedience was a necessary experience,²⁴ which enabled a later obedience: man experienced being harmed so that he could later be more cautious. Man learned to know his freedom and the power to choose that lies in his nature. Only by knowing disobedience was man able to know its opposite, obedience. The reason why man was not to be forced was that he can only be praised for his good acts, if they are freely performed,²⁵ and it is not possible for a free being to be always without sin; that is why God does not demand it (III.15,8–10.13–18; 16,1–3; 17,5–6; 18,7; 21,6).

This positive assessment of the disobedience also means that Titus must disclaim any doctrine of "original sin" and in general minimise the seriousness of Adam's "fall". This becomes explicit in a number of remarks which show that Titus was well aware of the Eastern ideas of "original sin" or rather "Erbunheil": God may have humbled man after he had been disobedient, but He in no way excluded the free man—who from now on wants to live virtuously—from acquiring a good reputation (III.17,3, ed.N 318.3–5). Adam's disobedience had no catastrophic consequences:

For when man had been disobedient, he did not then perish either or make himself incurable (III.17,7).²⁶

²⁴ The passage in question (III.17,5) is admittedly rather different in Sy and V (→ Ch. XI.38): whereas Sy claims that the experience was necessary, V argues that it was almost necessary! The difference is clearly dogmatically conditioned; either Titus did not dare to go the whole length, while Sy has removed the indecisive, vacillating μονοβουχί; or Sy retains the original text, which was too radical for V (it claims that evil is a necessity), which has therefore emended it. I assume here that Sy has preserved the original version, because this best fits in with the rest of Titus's presentation.

²⁵ This was indeed also Aristotle's view (cf. above p. 213), which is generally common in the Church fathers, e.g. in Irenaeus, Adv. haer. IV.37ff.

²⁶ οὐδὲ γὰρ ἀπειθήσας ἄνθρωπος τὸ τηνικάδε ἀπόλετο ἢ ἀνήκεστα διέθηκεν ἑαυτόν., ed.N 318.14–15.

God did not provide Adam with a new legislation immediately after the disobedience, for by nature Adam already knew what was right and wrong (III.17,10–11). Nor did God advise Adam to repent (μετανοέω); he had no need to be healed for his disobedient action, because he did not remain in it (III.17,12–13). In other words we are not dealing with a Fall but with a single isolated sin.

The reason why Titus has to reject the idea that the creature was changed or became incurable is clearly because in his opinion this doctrine is hard to reconcile with the idea of foreknowledge; it therefore bears its flank to the Manichaean attack, for it was precisely God's ignorance that Adda was keen to assert. It is thus important to note that Titus in no way claims that these ideas of Fall and original sin are Manichaean. For, as Beatrice has rightly pointed out, the Manichaean teaching on Adam contained no idea of a Fall, but rather of an evil nature that was linked to Adam from the time of his creation by the archons, and the very same event that we regard as a Fall was to their way of thinking a deliverance. Adda's protest exegesis deals precisely with this. Titus wishes to write off a non-Manichaean position, an idea of fall and loss, which cannot be defended in the light of the Manichaean attacks. Whether he also wishes to insinuate that in the last resort this idea resembles Manichaean ideas of determining, physical evil is another matter; he never directly postulates such an equation.

Who could it have been that claimed that the Creation was changed and man became incurable through a Fall? If we confront the question with some of the theories that we mentioned in the summary of the history of scholarship, we might mention Beatrice's Encratite Messalians or Scheffczyk and Hauke's ideas from the Eastern Church of a Fall and a collective, spiritual death and suchlike. However, we must note that Titus does not attack the idea of biological, sexually-transmitted sin, and even though we must not exaggerate the significance of such an e silentio argument, there is at least no need to include Beatrice's Messalians. It is rather that Titus is writing a polemic against such a strong tradition among orthodox theologians—as Scheffczyk and Hauke point out.²⁷

²⁷ See on Beatrice, Scheffczyk and Hauke above pp. 98–101—Scheffczyk is right that Titus's views were called forth by his anti-Manichaean errand, but they can nevertheless only be interpreted as a direct rejection of the ideas in the Eastern Church of a Fall and a collective, spiritual death.

The ideas of God's foreknowledge, man's freedom and moral development were admittedly well-known throughout the "orthodox" tradition of the Eastern Church, and one might therefore object that Titus is only saying what was already consensus and that he can hardly have opposed the tradition. The question, however, is not whether Titus's ideas were new, but to what extent they were combined in a new way in his work. In the following sketch I shall attempt to show, through a selected number of examples from Early Church writers, that it is unlikely that Titus was saying the same thing as the mainstream writers.²⁸ Titus chose particular elements in the tradition at the expense of others and wove them together in his own way; in so doing he came to create a new interpretation or, at the least, an interpretation that was only potentially present in earlier presentations.

4. Comparison with earlier writers

It is clear that the tradition awarded God foreknowledge, but it does not necessarily follow that it linked this foreknowledge to Adam and Eve's transgression or reflected on it in connection with the Paradise narrative. The very idea of divine πρόγνωσις or πρόνοια naturally has both philosophical and biblical roots.²⁹ In several places in the NT we read that God had already made His plan of salvation before the foundation of the world (esp. Rom. 16.25–26; 1 Cor. 2.7; Eph. 1.9–10; 3.9; Col. 1.26; 1 Pet. 1.20); on this background it would be reasonable to assume that God had anticipated the Fall of Man, since He knew that salvation would be necessary. This supposition makes it easier to understand why later Christian writers came to ²⁸ For practical reasons this sketch focuses not on immortality and death, but on the question of God's foreknowledge and the evaluation of man's transgression; not until the next section does the problem of death become a theme. Both sections moreover omit Eusebius of Caesarea and "the Antiochene School", who are treated in a separate context in the following.

²⁹ See e.g. Theiler 1966, 46–103 ("Tacitus und die antike Schicksalslehre"); Dörrie 1977 concerning the doctrine of Providence in philosophy. See also various articles in Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament concerning the biblical texts: Behm 1942 (προνοέω, πρόνοια); Bultmann 1933 (προγινώσκω, πρόγνωσις); Michel 1954 (οἰκονομία); Schmidt 1954 and 1954a (ὀρίζω and προορίζω). The actual term 'Divine πρόνοια' is not used in the Bible. See further Dihle 1987; Dihle 1987a concerning the Church fathers' doctrine of Providence.

think along these lines but it ignores what the texts explicitly say. We also find only few and incomplete reflections on God's foreknowledge and the Paradise narrative in the earliest Church fathers.

Theophilus of Antioch is the first Christian writer from whose hand we have preserved something that resembles a commentary on the first chapters of Gen., and although we find in him an attempt to connect the Paradise narrative with God's foreknowledge, this attempt cannot be said to constitute a precursor of Titus's position, since it fails to deal with God's foreknowledge of Adam and Eve's disobedience in the garden. In Ad Autolyicum II.28 Theophilus claims that God revealed Himself as προγνώστης by creating woman from man's rib: God knew that errancy through the serpent would lead to the worship of many gods, and in order not to allow people the opportunity to believe that man and woman were created by different gods, He did not create woman separately.³⁰

Theophilus's explanation as to why God forbade man to eat of the Tree of Knowledge,³¹ is also of interest in the present context, however. In the first place it states that Adam was not yet mature enough to receive the knowledge in the right way, because he was a child, and in the second place God wished to test man's obedience, just as parents test children's obedience; in short, God preferred man as an obedient child to remain in simplicity and innocence for a time. Knowledge should first be acquired when the ability to think had been developed for it.³² Regarding the view of man's development Theophilus and Titus clearly share the evolutionary view of man's morality, and therefore agree that Adam was inexperienced. But after that their ways part: in Theophilus there is no positive evaluation of the disobedience, on the contrary:

It was not that the Tree of Knowledge contained anything evil, but that through disobedience man acquired pain, suffering, and sorrow, and finally fell victim to death. (Ad Autolyicum II.25).³³

³⁰ Grant 1970, 70.

³¹ For Theophilus rejected that the commandment was due to φθόνος (Ad Autol. II.25); see above p. 230.

³² Ad Autol. II.25 (Grant 1970, 66, 68).

³³ οὐ μέντοι γε ὡς κακοῦ τι ἔχοντος τοῦ ξύλου τῆς γνώσεως, διὰ δὲ τῆς παρακοῆς ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐξήντηλῆσεν πόνον, ὀδύνην, λύπην, καὶ τὸ τέλος ὑπὸ θάνατον ἔπεισεν. (Grant 1970, 68, translation 69).

Theophilus's idea that man was destined to develop or grow is also found in Irenaeus. A number of Irenaeus interpretations are here of particular interest in that they claim that the disobedience was presented by Irenaeus as actually being beneficial, which in the present context would mean that Titus was closer to Irenaeus than Theophilus.

In Irenaeus there are a number of passages in which man and woman in the Garden of Paradise are regarded as children destined for development or growth towards perfection, and this idea is claimed to be incompatible with other passages that contain the so-called doctrine of recapitulation, according to which through the Fall the first two lost their likeness to God or their special spiritual capacity, which is first restored by Christ.³⁴ If the recapitulation passages are incompatible with the development passages, it must mean that the transgression in the latter passages loses its character of "fall" and must rather be regarded as essential and useful for man's growth. Titus's emphasis that it was a natural necessity that Adam was without experiences, so that the disobedience was necessary, which meant a minimalisation of the seriousness of Adam's "fall", can in that case be compared with the passages in Irenaeus (e.g. in Adversus haereses IV.38,4) which claim that the cause of the first human beings' disobedience was their weakness, in that they were children, or (e.g. in IV.40,3) that the disobedience originated in negligence, not in wickedness.³⁵—But development and recapitulation are not incompatible ideas in Irenaeus; they are compatible if one agrees with many more recent Irenaeus scholars and assumes that what was lost at the Fall was admittedly not a perfect state but was nevertheless a foretaste or anticipation of the final status of the saved.³⁶ This means that if Titus was inspired by the development passages in Irenaeus, he detached them from their more comprehensive context.

Of further interest for a comparison with Titus is Hugo Koch's related attempt to reconcile Irenaeus's various ideas on development and recapitulation. Koch actually disputed that recapitulatio could mean "restitution";³⁷ Adam and Eve did not lose a perfection which they ³⁴ Thus already Wendt 1882, 20–30, esp. 28; similarly Von Harnack 1931, 588–96.

³⁵ See further on these passages e.g. Hauke 1993, 201–2, 211–13, 226–28, 268–71, 275.

³⁶ Thus e.g. Wingren 1947; cf. Jacobsen 1998, 115–23; Jacobsen 2002, 91–94.

³⁷ Koch 1925, 198–99.

were in possession of, but only one that they had a prospect of. In this context Koch claimed that according to Irenaeus Adam and Eve's transgression was already from the beginning a part of God's plan for the world and salvation. Man was created to be saved by Christ, and the Fall was in the context an educational necessity, because man was to be brought to realise that incorruptibility is not something one can possess by nature.³⁸ This interpretation, which on this point can receive support from passages such as Adversus haereses III.20,1; III.22,3; III.38,4; V.36,1 (cf. V.21,3), is not without true elements, and as such there also appear to be real similarities between Irenaeus and Titus: God knew beforehand that Adam would violate his commandment, and on that background Irenaeus was also able to find a positive purpose in the Fall, though this purpose had more to do with a negative experience than a step in a progression. Fundamentally, however, I do not believe that Koch's interpretation is tenable: admittedly what Adam and Eve lost was not perfection itself, but nor was it merely something that was presented to them as a prospect. In the Garden of Paradise Adam and Eve were in possession of a real "foretaste" of the final state of salvation.³⁹ Bearing this in mind, the crucial differences between Irenaeus and Titus again become apparent. Titus did not see Adam's act of disobedience as a decisive break or fall, but only as a useful experience; the educational purpose of the disobedience was therefore to be found in its contribution to man's own virtuous effort. For Irenaeus on the other hand the teaching of the Fall was that man became aware of his own limitation; this is clearly a more sceptical attitude about man's own efforts. It is also important to note that even though Irenaeus already believed that God must have anticipated the Fall, he does not need to have concluded that it was a necessary link in His Providence; rather Irenaeus imagined that with His sovereign power God could extract something good out of an in itself evil fall.⁴⁰ The distance between Titus and Irenaeus becomes even clearer when one ³⁸ Koch 1925, 210–13.

³⁹ Irenaeus clearly claims a special intimate connectedness between God and man in the Garden of Paradise; see e.g. Dem. 12: the Logos itself was walking round the garden and talking to man and in this way anticipating the future. Man was immortal in Paradise, but the preservation of this immortality was dependent on the keeping of God's law (Dem. 15). Cf. also the criticism of Koch in Hauke 1993, 215.

⁴⁰ Cf. Hauke 1993, 228–29.

notes that in Contra Manichaeos III.17,12–13 Titus is perhaps in reality attacking Irenaeus. Here Titus claims that Adam did not need to do penance, but according to Adversus haereses III.23,5 Adam indeed did penance (fig-leaves as garments of penitence).⁴¹—I will not reject out of hand the possibility that Titus may have drawn on several motifs from Irenaeus's theology, but in that case it is not before he has detached them from their original context and meaning.

Although it is excluded that Titus can be influenced by Tertullian, a comparison is nevertheless of interest, because Tertullian concerned himself directly with the Marcionite question of God's goodness, foreknowledge and power (bonitas, praescientia and potentia) in relation to Adam and Eve's fall, and because Tertullian may have been influenced by Greek anti-Marcionite texts which Titus also knew. Corresponding to Titus's answer Tertullian also allowed the Marcionites' claim that the Creator possesses goodness, foreknowledge and power (Adversus Marcionem II.5,3–4), and that His foreknowledge also embraced the Fall of Man (Adversus Marcionem II.5,4).⁴² Since God could have prevented the Fall and yet it nevertheless took place, the explanation must be sought in man, whom God had equipped with the freedom of choice and the power to act (Adversus Marcionem II.5,5–7). The Fall was thus man's own fault and not God's (Adversus Marcionem II.6,1; II.6,8). If God gave man free will, it was implicit that he could use it as he wished; otherwise his will was not free. In other words by creating man God voluntarily limited His own freedom and power. Of course God knew that man would abuse his freedom, but if He intervened when Adam and Eve were about to abuse it, He would not have retained a consistency and fidelity towards His own decision; He would be abrogating His own will, which was that man should be free. According to Tertullian, the reason that God does not avert that which is not His will, namely the Fall of Man, is because He wishes to preserve that which is His will, namely man's freedom (Adversus Marcionem II.7). And from this we can clearly see that even though Tertullian just like Titus argued for God's foreknowledge of the Fall, he believed the reference to man's freedom was a sufficient theodicy; Tertullian did not see any difficulty in claiming that God foresaw an event which went against His plans.

⁴¹ Hauke (1993, 228) rightly rejects the claim that Irenaeus's idea of Adam's penance should be an attempt to render the Fall of Man harmless (thus e.g. Gross 1960, 90); on the contrary it expresses a powerful consciousness of guilt. This interpretation would correspond to Titus's polemic. But Titus could also be imagined to be attacking others than Irenaeus. Another possibility is Theophilus's Ad Autol. II.26, where God's question in Gen. 3.9 is interpreted to mean that God was not ignorant but wished to give Adam the occasion for μετάνοια and ἐξομολόγησις (Grant 1970, 68). The same interpretation of Gen. 3.9 was presented in Titus's time by Eusebius of Emesa (partly in the discourse De hom. assumpt. II [4–6], Buytaert 1953, 373.5–374.15, see above p. 136, partly in In Oct. on Gen. 4.7, Hovhannessian 1980, 39).—Titus's distance from Athanasius, De inc. 7 is also clear and instructive: according to Athanasius penitence would have been good, if Adam's transgression had only been a sin without the ensuing corruption, which was not the case, however. On the other hand, for Titus the sin is so superficial that it was not even worthy of penitence, and the whole idea of a subsequent catastrophic state of corruption in which death is not just natural but also a punishment, is in contrast to his positive conception of death as God's benefaction. Cf. also Meijering 1989, 82–85 concerning De inc. 7.

⁴² “certe ipsam transgressionem, quam nisi praescisset, nec cautionem eius delegasset sub metu mortis” (Evans 1972, 98).

If it is true that historically Titus's theological position lies in the junction between Alexandria and Antioch,⁴³ it must be of particular interest to include the Alexandrian Church fathers, Clement and Origen. In Clement, however, the first chapters of Gen. do not play so important a role that much can be gained by the comparison. It may be mentioned that like Titus Clement believed that God created man imperfect, but with the possibility of acquiring virtue and saving himself,⁴⁴ though he does not appear to have regarded the disobedience as a positive step in man's development.⁴⁵

Nor as far as I can see can Origen's understanding of Adam's fall⁴⁶ be said to have anticipated Titus's position, even though this is harder to determine, since the main source for Origen's understanding of Adam's fall, his Commentarius in Genesim, has for the most part been lost. On the whole, however, there is nothing to suggest that the particular features of Titus's interpretation were shared by the great Alexandrian. Even though Origen was also sometimes interested in minimalising the extent of Adam's sin,⁴⁷ he did not take the ⁴³ Cf. above p. 144–45.

⁴⁴ Strom. VI.12 (96.1ff.); Stählin 1906, 480.

⁴⁵ See e.g. Strom. II.19 (98.3–4); Stählin 1906, 167.1ff.

⁴⁶ I will not go into the problem here of how the soul's pre-existence, which Origen believed in, relates to Adam and Eve's existence in Paradise, but I follow the view that the Paradise narrative in Origen cannot be reduced to merely an allegorical expression for the pre-existential Fall; see further Crouzel 1978; Bammel 1989; Hauke 1993 with further references.

⁴⁷ In Hom. in Jer. XVI.4 (Nautin and Husson 1977, 142) Origen explains Gen. 3.8 by arguing that although Adam sinned, his sin was not extremely bad; that is line that the disobedience was developmental; for example, Origen argues in his Commentarius in Johannem XIII.37 (236–43) that the rational creature was not imperfect in Paradise, but became so through the disobedience.⁴⁸ Titus's allegorical interpretation in Contra Manichaeos III.24–25 of Gen. 3.6–7—which argues that man could all the time see with his sense organs, so that he was seeing with his reasoning faculty when he was disobedient, and thereby demonstrating a useful cognitive growth—differs not only from Philo's allegorical interpretation,⁴⁹ but also from Origen's, where it is precisely sensuous sight that we find in Gen. 3.7, and thus a “fall”.⁵⁰ Even though Origen's interpretation of the Paradise narrative does not therefore point forward to Titus's view, there are nevertheless other aspects of his thought that may be said either to pave the way for Titus's views or at least to add perspective to them.

Titus's interest in claiming that God's economy is everlasting, that man's disobedience did not alter God's plans, seems to be a particular elaboration of the Church fathers' general interest in making the claim for God's immutability and impassibility,⁵¹ which in Prestige's words means, “that His will is determined from within instead of why he hid from the face of God and thus showed his shame, while Cain was a greater sinner and departed from the face of God. Cf. Koch 1932, 104 n. 1 (note to 103); Hammond Bammel 1989, 77–78; Hauke 1993, 256–57.

⁴⁸ Blanc 1975, 158, 160. Origen, however, appears to believe that the perfection in Christ will be far more solid than it was in Paradise before the Fall (see esp. In Jo. XIII.37 (241), Blanc 1975, 160 with quotation from Heb. 5.14), cf. Hammond Bammel 1989, 83, 93 n. 101; Hauke 1993, 353–54. In general the whole of Titus's interpretation is in conflict with Origen's doctrine of “original sin” (on this see further Williams 1927, 208–31 [who wrongly locates this theory only in the last part of Origen's life, his time in Caesarea]; Hammond Bammel 1989; Hauke 1993, 283–439).

⁴⁹ See above pp. 235–36.

⁵⁰ Origen claimed that the first human beings had not opened their physical eyes before the transgression: in Contra Cels. VII.39, Borret 1969a, 104.1ff. Origen states that Gen. 3.6 showed that man was capable of seeing with a kind of eye, the eye of the soul, while Gen. 3.5.7 dealt with another kind of eye, namely the sense organ. To begin with the human beings closed their corporeal eyes so as not to be distracted from seeing with the eyes of the soul; but then as a result of sin they later closed the eyes of the soul. Origen makes a similar distinction in Hom. in Num. XVII.3, Baehrens 1921, 157.6ff. between “the eyes of the earth” or “the sense of the flesh”, which are opened in Gen. 3.7 and the “better eyes” which are found in Gen. 3.6. Cf. Hammond Bammel 1989, 77. We find a corresponding interpretation in Didymus the Blind's In Gen. 81.19ff. (Nautin 1976, 190, 192), 83.1ff. (Nautin 1976, 194).

⁵¹ See e.g. Grant 1966, passim, but esp. 111–14.

being swayed from without".⁵² God cannot therefore contain feelings such as pity and anger, which would make Him dependent on the created universe.⁵³ It is thus reasonable to compare Titus's views with Origen's anti-Marcionite remarks in De principiis II.4,4 that God does not contain πάθη, anger or penitence, though Origen does not apply this viewpoint to the Paradise narrative.⁵⁴

As should by now be apparent, Titus believed both that God's starting-point for His actions is Himself, and that man's free choice can be upheld. In the last resort this position is probably untenable, for even though God's economy is just as eternal as His foreknowledge, man's free choice will nevertheless be God's starting-point, if we are to insist that his choice is free, which must be irrenunciabile, since this freedom to choose forms the core of Titus's theodicy or "demonstrative proof in defence of God". Titus's wish to keep the divine foreknowledge and economy together should perhaps be interpreted as an attempt to take into account one of philosophical problems of his time, even though it is questionable whether he seriously takes up the problem, which is that on the one hand God's infallible foreknowledge threatens to destroy man's freedom of choice, while on the other hand man's freedom of choice threatens to destroy the infallible foreknowledge. Titus does not even seem to have reflected on the character of God's foreknowledge, such as whether, in line with contemporary philosophy, it is to be understood as thinking through a causal chain, that is, a true foreknowledge in time.⁵⁵ Here he differs from Origen, who was pre-eminently interested in ensuring that God's foreknowledge does not disavow the doctrine of the freedom of choice, and who thought that God's foreknowledge indeed has to do with a causal chain. Although God's foreknowledge is infallible, events in the future must not take place out of necessity. God's knowledge is thus conditioned by future, contingent cognitive objects. Ostensibly, free choice is awarded priority; it is this that is the object of God's foreknowledge, and only on this foreknowledge can God plan or predestine the path of the soul's existence with rewards, pun-

⁵² Prestige 1952, 7.

⁵³ "[a]ny such view leads straight to Manichæan dualism", Prestige 1952, 6–8, quote 7.

⁵⁴ Koetschau 1913, 131.24–132.11.

⁵⁵ See further Theiler 1966, 46–103; Huber 1976.

ishments and so on. God's foreknowledge does not preclude man's free choice, as Origen pregnantly states, e.g. in Commentarius in Genesim:

And if it is necessary to say so, we should like to state that God's foreknowledge is not the cause of the things that happen—for God has no contact with the one whom He has anticipated will sin when he sins—on the contrary—it is admittedly paradoxical yet nevertheless true—that what is going to happen is the cause of God's foreknowledge of it, such as it is. For it is not because it is (cognitively) known that it happens, but it is known because it would happen. (Commentarius in Genesim III)⁵⁶

The argument that predestination—and in general what is ordered for man—is moreover subject to this foreknowledge seems to be justified particularly on the basis of Rom. 8.29f., where προέγνω is placed before προώρισεν.⁵⁷

However, Origen's alteration to the causal sequence so that the future event becomes the cause of God's foreknowledge contains for ⁵⁶ Philoc. 23,8, Junod 1976, 156: Καὶ εἰ χρή λέγειν οὐ τὴν πρόγνωσιν αἰτίαν τῶν γινομένων (οὐ γὰρ ἐφάπτεται τοῦ προεγνωσμένου ἀμαρτησομένου ὁ θεός, ὅταν ἀμαρτάνῃ), ἀλλὰ παραδοξότερον μὲν ἀληθές δὲ ἐροῦμεν, τὸ ἐσόμενον αἴτιον τοῦ τοιάνδε εἶναι τὴν περὶ αὐτοῦ πρόγνωσιν. Οὐ γὰρ ἐπεὶ ἔγνωσται γίνεται, ἀλλ' ἐπεὶ ἔμελλεν γίνεσθαι ἔγνωσται. Cf. also Benjamins 1994, 83–84; Koch 1932, 115–16.—Origen often repeats this view (see references in Junod 1976, 156–57 n. 1), cf. also In Rom. VII.6 (Hammond Bammel 1998, 591.89–91): “Nam et si communi intellectu de praescientia sentiamus non propterea erit aliquid quia id scit Deus futurum, sed quia futurum est scitur a Deo antequam fiat.” (on this cf. also Pannenberg 1993, 478 n. 10).

This inversion of the causal relation is also mentioned in John Chrysostom, In Matth. Hom. LX,1 (οὐδὲ ἐπειδὴ προεῖπε, διὰ τοῦτο γίνεται· ἀλλ' ἐπειδὴ πάντως ἔμελλεν ἔσεσθαι, διὰ τοῦτο προεῖπεν·, PG 58, 574) and Jerome, In Hiezech. I,ii,5 (Glorie 1964, 28); see Klingner 1966, 97 with n. 6. The same inversion is also mentioned in the late Neo-Platonists (see Huber 1976, 30–33; Gruber 1978, 389); Huber (1976, 31–32, 33) argues that the Church fathers found it in philosophical texts.

⁵⁷ See Schelkle 1959, 309–10, more distantly 336ff.; Pannenberg 1993, 477–78; Benjamins 1994, passim, but esp. 99–116, 138–47 concerning these remarks on Origen. Concerning the interpretation of Rom. 8.29f. see Origen, In Rom. VII.5–6 (7–8) (Hammond Bammel 1998, 582–93) and the fragment of In Rom. in Philoc. 25,1–3, Junod 1976, 212, 214, 216, 218, 220, 222, 224, 226.—The same view, though not presented as an interpretation of Rom. 8.29f., is already to be found up to a point in Clement of Alexandria, Strom. V.14 (141.3), Stählin 1906, 421.12–14; cf. Schelkle 1959, 308–9; according to Schelkle 1959, 310 the mentioned interpretation of οὗς προέγνω, καὶ προώρισεν is instituted by Origen. Pannenberg 1993, 477–78 regards Origen's presentation as a systematisation of the anti-Gnostic Church fathers' general viewpoints and compares it (478–80) with that of Augustine, who rejected the idea that the predestination was dependent on God's foreknowledge of man's free choice. Origen's view also corresponds on this point to the young Augustine, before he changed his view (see e.g. Nygren 1956, 42; Schelkle 1959, 311–12).

a Platonist a problem that perhaps Origen was himself aware of and which is formulated thus by Peter Huber:

Die Umkehrung der Begründungsrichtung lässt die Vorsehung abhängig werden vom Eintreffen oder Nichteintreffen menschlicher Taten. Damit scheint die Seinsordnung, in der das Ewige das Zeitliche begründet, in ihr Gegenteil verkehrt: das Zeitliche bestimmt das Ewige.⁵⁸

As far as I can see, this problem also applies to Titus's presentation, even though his wish to keep οικονομία and πρόγνωσις together is an attempt to maintain God's immutability and transcendence.⁵⁹

Because Athanasius in Contra Arianos II is explicitly concerned with problems concerning God's foreknowledge, it is also relevant to include him in order to illuminate Titus's position. As a fundamental element of his interpretation Meijering emphasises that in Contra Arianos Athanasius argues that although God is not subject to necessity, His will transcends the human accidental free will. God's being and will are one.⁶⁰ But according to Meijering, Athanasius does not answer consistently the question of how anything that happens in time can then be caused by God's will; he sought nevertheless to prove that God's decision to create is eternal, while time is created.⁶¹ But it becomes more difficult to argue such a case regarding the time after the creation, because here Scripture speaks clearly of God's ⁵⁸ Huber 1976, 35 with reference to Boethius's De cons. phil. V,3,15 ("Iam uero quam praeposterum est ut aeternae praesentiae temporalium rerum euentus causa esse dicatur!" Bieler 1957, 92). Huber (1976, 31 with n. 11, 35) interprets Origen's remarks εἰ χρὴ λέγειν, παραδοξότερον μὲν ἀληθές δὲ in In Gen. III to mean that Origen himself had been aware of the problem mentioned (otherwise in Benjamins 1994, 83ff.). See also Benjamins's further remarks on Origen's formulation (1994, 92–98).—The problem could perhaps have been solved with the aid of the apparently later Neo-Platonic model of thought, where it is not just a matter of God's temporal foreknowledge, but of God's eternal present knowledge (see further Huber 1976), but Titus probably did not know this model.

⁵⁹ In Titus God's economy is based on His foreknowledge, and since the same structure is found in Origen, it has doubtless directly or indirectly reached Titus via Origen, even though it was also formulated before Origen, though less pregnantly (cf. Pannenberg 1993, 477–78; Benjamins 1994, 104 n. 106).

⁶⁰ See Meijering 1974, 66–85. Meijering shows how this speculation was generally accepted in the 3rd–4th cent. (e.g. in Plotinus). In this context I note that Titus also claims the same difference between man's accidental goodness and God's goodness, which is identical with His being (see above pp. 263–69). The free will is ambiguous and uncertain, because man can make decisions which go in different directions; this is not true of God, whose will is timeless (Meijering 1974, 72–85).

⁶¹ Meijering 1974, 85–91.

actions, which appear to take place in time; it was a problem for Athanasius how to maintain that these actions did not involve any change in God's being.⁶² We shall not examine Athanasius's various solutions here,⁶³ but only the problem in Contra Arianos II,75–77 (PG 26, 305B–312B) that is particularly related to the Paradise narrative: God's actions in time are a consequence of His eternal decisions. This means that God had already prepared the incarnation before the world came into being.⁶⁴ Since He knew that man would violate the law and be banished from Paradise, in His goodness He prepared man's salvation through His Logos, so that he could be saved from sin and death and live for ever (Contra Arianos II,75 [PG 26, 305B–C], II.76 [PG 26, 309A] and II.77 [PG 26, 309B–C]).⁶⁵

Meijering is doubtless right to say that Athanasius's intention was "that God's actions in time are a consequence of God's decision taken in eternity",⁶⁶ but it is important to note that Athanasius does not fully implement his intention: even though God's action in time is dependent on His eternal decision, this decision remains dependent on another event that is contingent and temporal, namely the Fall of Man.⁶⁷ The argument therefore does not lead to Athanasius

⁶² Meijering 1974, 91–92.

⁶³ Meijering (1974, 92–102) goes through the various solutions.

⁶⁴ Meijering 1974, 102; 1975, 13, 143. Cf. further Cremers 1921, 63ff.; Roldanus 1968, 212–21.

⁶⁵ Meijering 1974, 103. Here Meijering sees a contrast to De inc. 6–8 and 11f.: in De inc. 4f. and 11f. God indeed anticipates the Fall, but will only save man through the revelation through the image of God, the harmony of the universe and the prophets, whereas in De inc. 8 the decision of the Logos to incarnate is described as a decision taken in time; Athanasius has apparently since changed his mind (Meijering 1974, 42–43, 103).

⁶⁶ Meijering 1974, 102.

⁶⁷ Cf. Roldanus's (1968, 212–21) presentation; see e.g. the remark in Roldanus 1968, 216: "Cela veut dire que, non seulement dans l'histoire de l'humanité, mais aussi dans le décret éternel de Dieu, l'incarnation du Fils pour la re-création de l'homme, dépend uniquement de la chute de l'homme, soit comme fait accompli, soit comme fait prévu"; Roldanus 1968, 220: Athanasius "ne détache jamais de la réalité du péché ce décret que Dieu avait pris déjà à l'origine des temps." These remarks are also relevant in the present context, even though Roldanus's presentation is directed towards a different problem, namely to reject interpretations of Athanasius which claim that according to him the incarnation was not primarily motivated by the Fall of Man. E.g. Contra Ar. II,54 (PG 26, 261AB) excludes that these interpretations can be right (cf. Roldanus 1968, 214).—In particular medieval scholasticism discussed whether the primary justification for the incarnation was the Fall of Man; some scholars, e.g. D'Alès 1916; Koch 1925; Altermath 1975, believe that this problem is relevant to Irenaeus. Presumably this is an anachronism, but finding anything positive in the Fall, or including it as a beneficial part of God's plans; he argues on the other hand that God anticipated a disruption to His plans.⁶⁸ In the beginning men were καλοί (305B); deceived by the serpent they fell and risked remaining νεκροί (305C); being weak by nature they required help and salvation (309B). God's foreknowledge therefore did not imply that man is created with a view to mortal life, but only that the means to overcome this have been prepared from eternity.

A further example that theologians around the time of Titus accepted that God beforehand knew sin, is to be found in Gregory of Nyssa's Oratio catechetica magna 37b–c (PG 45), where he rejects the Creator of man as being the cause of evil, being Himself ignorant of the future or being Himself subject to the impulse to evil. Of course God knew what would happen, but in spite of this anticipation of sin, it was nevertheless better that He gave man existence, since He could later save him and through penitence heal him. Although Gregory thus argued for God's foreknowledge in connection with the Fall of Man, this did not lead, as the context shows, to him denying the immortal primeval state or the catastrophic nature of the Fall.

Summarising, it may be said that even though most of the elements that are included in Titus's interpretation of the Paradise narrative were already present in the preceding tradition, they were not linked together with a view to the purpose we find in Titus. The notion of development already exists, for example in Theophilus and Irenaeus; yet neither regarded the transgression as a necessity and in itself a beneficial step in man's development. In denying that God's plans were changed by man's disobedience, Titus was admittedly expressing the general theology of the Early Church on the immutability of God, but in a new context.

However, a complete picture of Titus's interpretation of the Paradise narrative cannot be drawn without including his view of death. Apart from individual remarks, I have so far left this subject in parenthesis in order to give it fuller treatment below.

in any case Athanasius was quite in line with the Nicene Creed, which speaks of the incarnation δι' ἡμᾶς τοὺς ἀνθρώπους καὶ διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν σωτηρίαν.

⁶⁸ E.g. in 309B God is compared with a wise master builder who predicts that his construction will be exposed to damage and therefore prepares how to mend the damage.

5. *Death as a benefit*a. Titus's view of death in Book II and Book IV

Because the Manichaean text claimed that God showed Himself to be φθονερός when He cut man off from the Tree of Life and immortality, the view of death is crucial if one is to show that man's disobedience did not in fact have catastrophic consequences. According to Titus death is natural and a benefaction of God. Titus had already revealed this understanding of death in Book II, which thus becomes the natural starting-point for the present account.

I concluded above that according to Titus the soul is created, but is thereafter incorruptible by nature.⁶⁹ From this it follows that it can only be the body that is actually corruptible. The Church fathers understood physical or corporeal death solely on the basis of an anthropology that distinguishes between soul and body, and they described death, understood as the death-event, as "the soul's separation from the body".⁷⁰ Titus also accepts this description (ἀναχωρεῖν ψυχὴν ἀπὸ σώματος, II.22, Gr. 39.15 → Ch. XI.23). It is this physical death that he is concerned with in detail in the comprehensive theodicy of Book II.

In II.22, where Titus deals exhaustively with war, he states that death in nature is not evil, since birth and death have been ordered by God through the law of nature, so that those who end their lives do not perish, while those who are born are added to those who already exist. For it would not be good, if God was content with giving existence and birth to those who already exist (cf. Plato, Timaeus 29e); on the other hand it is good to prepare those who do not yet exist to come into being, and God does so partly by allowing them to receive the entrance to birth and partly by letting those who have already been born and have sufficiently run through life's arena, receive death as a rest after the race. For their struggle leads them not to destruction (cf. 1 Cor. 9.25–26; Phil. 3.14; 1 Tim. 6.12; 2 Tim. 4.7; Heb. 12.1), but they are led to the other side in accordance with what they deserve (II.22, Gr. 39.1–11 → Ch. XI.23); Titus is of course referring to salvation and damnation here.

⁶⁹ See pp. 298–99.

⁷⁰ See e.g. Clement of Alexandria; Strom. II.7 (34.2), where θάνατος is used in the sense of τὸν διαλύοντα ψυχὴν ἀπὸ σώματος (Stählin 1906, 131.2); III.9 (64.2); καὶ συνῶδο ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος ἢ τούτων διάλυσις ἀκολουθεῖ (Stählin 1906, 225.25–26); VII.12 (71.3): ὁ θάνατος "χωρισμὸς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ σώματος" (Stählin 1909, 51.18–19); Origen (In Jo. XIII.23 [140]: τὸν χωρισμὸν τῆς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ τοῦ σώματος [Blanc 1975, 106]; In Matth. XIII.9: καθ' ὃν ἀποθνήσκουσιν οἱ σύνθετοι ἐκ ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος χωριζομένης αὐτῶν τῆς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ τοῦ σώματος . . . [Klostermann 1935, 203.25–28]; In Matth. ser. 138, Klostermann 1933, 283.17–18; further instances in Crouzel 1978, 25 n. 36). Methodius, De res. I.38,1: οὐδὲν γὰρ ἄλλο ὁ θάνατος ἢ διάκρισις καὶ διαχωρισμὸς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ σώματος (Bonwetsch 1917, 280.3–4). This description comes from the philosophy; see e.g. Phaed. 67d χωρισμὸς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ σώματος. Cf. also Fischer 1954, 25–27, 34–38, 53.

Titus continues by explaining that since the death that is ordained by law in nature is not evil, in whatever way it comes, one should not otherwise examine the differing circumstances under which it occurs (as will be remembered, the context for the consideration is war), but one should realise that there is a way of death common to all who exist, i.e. the soul withdraws from the body, not without some distress and suffering, but remains for as long as its natural habitation survives unimpaired (II.22, Gr. 39.11–16 → Ch. XI.23). In this natural, common death, however, there is some fear present; the fear is necessary for there to be a suspicion of punishment. This is admittedly not present in everyone, but only present in those whose disposition is ready to sin in order to disturb this disposition. For he who is wise with regard to virtue is released from sinning and from believing that death is evil, whereas he who loves sin fears death out of the same ignorance that makes him sin (II.22, Gr. 39.16–26 → Ch. XI.23).

Those who wage war are themselves to blame for their visible punishment,—that is, that they fall—but in truth, Titus points out, death cannot possibly be called a punishment (τιμωρία), because through the common nature it is determined for all. Through God's all-wise Providence death occurs in an admirable way; it is both a benefaction for those who fall in war, and for those who survive: it is a benefaction for the ungodly, because it puts an end to their sin, and it gives those who survive an example that there is something to fear. If any of the righteous should finally come to participate in war—which however Titus regards as quite improbable—and should actually fall, death is in a way the beginning of their crown of victory (cf. 1 Cor. 9.25; Phil. 3.14; 2 Tim. 2.5; Jas. 1.12; 1 Pet. 5.4). After death the pious will enjoy the fruits of their labour for virtue, and this is better than merely refraining from evil (II.22, Gr. 39.26–40.5 → Ch. XI.23).

Already in Ch. II.22 Titus has in a sense set out his full view of the natural death; the following Ch. II.23 elaborates this view and it is from this chapter that I shall therefore emphasise various points. Titus's Manichaean source had claimed that death "releases the soul from matter" (Gr. 40.11–12 and 40.34 → Ch. XI.24–25), but according to Titus the Manichaeans are thereby contradicting their own claim that death in war is evil (Gr. 40.10–12 → Ch. XI.24);⁷¹ moreover matter does not exist at all (Gr. 40.34 → Ch. XI.25). Titus's main point, however, is that death is not evil; nor is it indifferent, but rather it is good ("Since death is now found to be good—and not merely not evil", Gr. 40.32–33 → Ch. XI.25), and not because it releases the soul from matter (Gr. 40.32–35 → Ch. XI.25), but for the following reason: the generality of death proves that it is not evil but natural; it is also "the common opinion" (Gr. 40.12–14 → Ch. XI.24).⁷² If death was not determined for all people, it would have improper consequences: sweat would be the only reward that the righteous received for their exertions for virtue, while the unrighteous would be immortal in their sinful pleasures (Gr. 40.19–32 → Ch. XI.25). This passage together with II.22 (Gr. 40.3–5 → Ch. XI.23) also shows that in contrast to the Stoics Titus did not believe that virtue bears its own reward.

At different places in Book II Titus returns to these views,⁷³ but he only rarely adds new aspects to them. A few points need to be made, however. When Titus disputes in II.22 that natural death is a punishment, he appears at first sight to be in conflict with Paul's words in Rom. 6.23, —τὰ γὰρ ὀψώνια τῆς ἀμαρτίας θάνατος; but it is a point of view that Titus repeats several times. In II.17 he states that natural death can come without punishment, so that also in the form of the death penalty from which one can flee it is something other than the inevitable punishment that strikes those who act against the law (Gr. 35.34–38 → Ch. XI.21). The inevitable punishment must be the punishment after death. Also in II.28 Titus states that death "is not laid down by God in respect of men for punishment" (Gr. 44.7 → Ch. XI.26). Similarly in II.47, where Titus claims that death happens neither in order to harm the righteous nor to punish the unrighteous: what is natural cannot be a punishment (τιμωρία); natural death happens with a view to an example or to preventing the worst evils (Gr. 56.7–9 → Ch. XI.29). Titus's strong-willed emphasis that natural death is not a punishment, raises the question of how as a Catholic bishop he could meet his obligation to Paul's exposition.

⁷¹ Cf. above p. 296. Cf. Baur 1831, 321–22; Pedersen 1996, 196–97 concerning the Manichaeans' view of death.

⁷² Cf. above p. 296.

⁷³ E.g. II.17 (Gr. 35.34–38 → Ch. XI.21); II.19 (Gr. 36.15–28 → Ch. XI.22); II.28 (Gr. 43.37–38, 44.1–15 partly → Ch. XI.26); II.45 (Gr. 55.9–14); II.47 (Gr. 55.37–56.17 partly → Ch. XI.29).

Although natural death is never a punishment, Titus does admit that for the ungodly it is followed by a punishment. It would not be a giant step from this to say that even though physical death in itself is good, it may be qualified by what follows after death, and that is why for example it may be described as a "death of condemnation". In Book II Titus says nothing explicitly to this end, but in IV.94, which deals with the interpretation of Rom. 7.24b (τίς με ῥύσεται ἐκ τοῦ σώματος τοῦ θανάτου τούτου;), we find remarks that clearly point in this direction:

"Who", then, "will deliver me from this body of death", for—unless a strong goodness will shine forth in me—the body through the bodily passions <in my limbs> gathers for me natural death of condemnation. And he is calling it "body of death"—not because of this general death, but (because of) the kind of death which is from condemnation through the threat, if those (conditions) of sin will remain. (Sy 175.7–12 → Ch. XI.49)⁷⁴

The idea of death as condemnation suggests itself by virtue of its exposition in Paul, where death is regarded as a "condemnation" of all people (Rom. 5.16 and 18) and is depicted as a contrast to the immortal life in Christ (e.g. Rom. 5.15–21).⁷⁵ However, Paul claims that Adam's transgression led to condemnation for all mankind, while Titus apparently wishes to distinguish ordinary death from the death of condemnation—and so Titus is still not in line with Paul's presentation. Titus, though, does not treat the entire Pauline interpretation, which would be able to demonstrate how he has imagined he could solve the difficulties.

⁷⁴ See also further Schelkle 1959, 243–58 concerning the Church fathers' interpretations of Rom. 7.24.

⁷⁵ Death of condemnation can of course also find inspiration in many other passages in the Bible. In Wis. 2.23–24, which belonged in the Church fathers' canon, we read that "for God created man for incorruptibility and made him an image of His own eternity; but through the Devil's envy death came into the world, and those who belong to him experience it." The idea that only the unrighteous "experience" death must imply that death is not just the corporeal death but also a punishment after death. Rev. 2.11; 20.6.14, which did not belong to Titus's canon, if they followed Antioch in Bostra (cf. Metzger 1977, 44, 48, 65–66), calls condemnation "the second death".

In II.19 we find that Titus can also use the word “death” about something other than “the natural death” and “the death of condemnation”:

But even if it should happen that someone is punished who is not only an innocent but also an admirable man, and he is thus punished for his virtue, what harm should it inflict on him who suffers this? For although it may be true that this is a charge against those who do (such a thing against him), yet it does not harm him, since he endures, even if he had to bear the consequences of the groundless punishment till death. For such a man has already beforehand because of his mortality taken care of what concerns life. For when nothing of what is pleasant or unpleasant for the majority is so for him, there is no reason why he who is like this has not become dead to life also even before death. He receives that which is considered an injury as a sign of grace, by which he hopes to obtain greater blessings after the present life than those which he seems to leave behind, and when he is about to be swiftly sent by his enemies towards (these greater blessings), then he has as his benefactors those who plot against him. And otherwise God's allowance of painful testing is necessary among men, so that the choice of virtue can be more genuine, if anyone should not even fear death. (Gr. 36.15–28 → Ch. XI.22).

So Titus can say that one is “dead to life” (νεκρὸς τοῦ βίου), and here of course we are approaching the well-known early Christian ideas of “mortification”. We might therefore consider whether there is a hidden allusion here to Gal. 6.14 (Ἐμοὶ δὲ μὴ γένοιτο καυχᾶσθαι εἰ μὴ ἐν τῷ σταυρῷ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, δι' οὗ ἔμοι κόσμος ἐσταύρωται καὶ γὰρ κόσμῳ)⁷⁶ or passages such as Rom. 6.2.10–11; Col. 3.3. For it seems to be Titus's intention that the person in question is precisely admirable because he is already living in the hope of the coming blessings, dead to life.

Titus's considerations, however, are concentrated on physical death. Death as condemnation and the more spiritualising or metaphorical

⁷⁶ Cf. Theodore of Mopsuestia, In Gal. 6.14, Swete 1880, 108.20–24: “sed haec (inquit) mihi semper dignum gloriae reputari, id est, crucem Christi, per quem mihi praesens mundus uidetur esse mortuus, dum animo iam illa quae futura sunt considero. nam et ego praesenti uitae sum emortuus, in illis iam me conuersare existimans.”

“dead to life” do not receive much attention. It can be illustrative to compare Titus’s position with Origen’s. Clearly and explicitly Origen distinguishes between three forms of death: death to sin, the death of the soul and physical death. Death to sin and the death of the soul are spiritualising forms of death: death to sin means a dying away from sin, a mortification, and thus a good death. The death of the soul denotes sin understood as the soul’s separation from God, and this is an evil death. Physical death on the other hand is common to all people and is neither good nor evil, but somewhere in between or ethically indifferent.⁷⁷

Titus’s reference to the righteous man who is dead to life bears a certain resemblance to Origen’s dying away from sin, but since the motif in Titus is only hinted at, it is unlikely to have had its roots in Origen’s firmly-constructed concept and doctrine; it is more likely sufficient explanation to refer to the Bible and the general

⁷⁷ Thus e.g. Origen, In Rom. VI.6 (Hammond Bammel 1997, 479–83) (here two further meanings of “death” are added: the Devil and Hades as death); Dial. cum Heracl. 24.18–27.8 (Scherer 1960, 102–7); In Jo. XIII.61 (427ff.) (Blanc 1975, 266, 268); In Matth. XIII.9 (Klostermann 1935, 203.23ff.) (here referring only to the physical death and the soul’s death); further references and more detailed treatment in Crouzel 1978.—The doctrine of “the soul’s death” is not in conflict with the doctrine of the soul’s immortality, since “life” and “death” must be taken in two senses: The soul can at one and the same time be living and spiritually dead (cf. Dial. cum Heracl. 24.23ff.; In Jo. XIII.61 [427ff.]) (just as Origen reckons with three kinds of death, he also reckons with two kinds of immortality: the soul’s ordinary immortality and immortality in relation to sin; see further Crouzel 1978, 81ff.). Common to the three kinds of death is that they all constitute a “separation”—from sin, from God and from the body. The distinction between them is incidentally based on a Stoic distinction between virtue, which is good, the corporeal, which is indifferent, and the vice, which is evil (Crouzel 1978, 20–21).—Origen’s background in the Alexandrian tradition is obvious; with regard to the soul’s death Philo is thus one of the predecessors: esp. in Leg. all. 1.33 (105–108) he distinguishes between man’s and the soul’s death; man’s death means the separation of soul and body, while the soul’s death means that the soul is buried in passions and vices. When Gen. 2.17 uses the phrase to “die the death”, the reference is to the soul’s by being entombed in the body, which Philo, following Plato, regards as a punishment, apparently for a pre-existent Fall. The idea of “the soul’s death” also appears in Clement of Alexandria, e.g. in Strom. II.7 (34.2), where we find θάνατος in the sense of τὸν διαλύοντα ψυχήν ἀπὸ ἀληθείας (Stählin 1906, 131.2–3); III.9 (64.1): καὶ θάνατος ψυχῆς ἢ ἀμαρτία λέγεται (Stählin 1906, 225.18–19). Death to sin similarly appears in Clement of Alexandria, e.g. in Strom. VII.12 (71.3), where he speaks of cognition as a rational death that leads the soul away from the passions and separates it from them and guides it into the life of good deeds (ἡ γνῶσις . . . ὁ λογικὸς θάνατος, ἀπὸ τῶν παθῶν ἀπάγων καὶ χωρίζων τὴν ψυχήν καὶ προάγων εἰς τὴν τῆς εὐποίας ζωῆν, Stählin 1909, 51).

Christian tradition of piety and ethos. Also death as condemnation can be compared with “the death of the soul”, but again it is a problem that Titus only treats death as condemnation in a single place.

The physical death that Titus and Origen speak of is naturally the same phenomenon; as mentioned it is also described in the same way. But nevertheless on this point there turns out to be a decisive difference between them: for Origen the physical death was μέσος καὶ ἀδιάφορος θάνατος;⁷⁸ Titus on the other hand declares that this death is not indifferent, but good. Thus the doctrine of the goodness of physical death does not come from Origen, but from other Christian traditions. We shall now see that in Titus's view it was this good, natural death that was instituted in Gen. 3, and we shall see from where this idea gains its origin.

b. Death did not harm man

Just like the Manichaean text that Titus is concerned with (III.7,8–9 → Ch. XI.34), so does his answer (III.27,8–9 → Ch. XI.44) link the two problems together, namely God's ἀφθονία and the explanation for death. Implicitly Titus connects the question of God's φθόνος in Gen. 3.22 with the fundamental idea from Timaeus 29e that God being good has given man existence (III.18,2). Death thereby becomes a special problem within the larger context of theodicy, as can also be seen from the fact that Titus opens his entire refutation by referring to God's creative goodness (III.10–11).

Titus underlines also that God is without φθόνος in other places where he is not interpreting Gen. 2–3. Titus stresses this fact at different points in order to demonstrate God's open-handed Creation order,⁷⁹ but in addition he does so in three passages where he explains that it was precisely due to God's ἀφθονία that He also gave the rational creatures freedom to commit evil;⁸⁰ Titus could easily have included this aspect in Contra Manichaeos III.10–29, where, however, the motif of God’s ἀφθονία is incorporated only explicitly in connection with death and the banishment from the Tree of Life.

⁷⁸ In Matth. XIII.9 (Klostermann 1935, 203.24–25): θανάτου . . . τοῦ μέσου καὶ <ἀ>διάφορου.

⁷⁹ See Contra Manich. II.44 (ἄφθονος, Gr. 53.22); II.45 (ἄφθονος, Gr. 54.36); II.56 (τὸ ἄφθονον, Gr. 60.29).

⁸⁰ Thus Contra Manich. II.8 (Gr. 29.36): If the Creator not had given man power to perform the evil or to let it alone, He would seem out of φθόνος to have deprived him of the honour of himself defeating the evil and have deprived him of freedom.

When the Manichaean text claims that death is due to God’s jealousy, it presupposes that death is to man’s detriment, and therefore the problem can also be raised in this way in Contra Manichaeos III.15,11:

But perhaps someone might say: “How the disobedience, of which the prescriber [i.e. God] was not ignorant, has harmed man!”⁸¹

The harm that Titus is thinking of here is not that Adam was “incurable” (as in III.17,7), but rather the subsequent “punishment” (III.15,12), that is: death and tilling the soil (cf. Gen. 3.16ff.), which the Manichaean text regarded as a manifestation of God being jealous. At first Titus postpones his response to the question (III.15,12), but in III.18,1 he raises it again in order to concern himself in what immediately follows with the subject of death. Here, Titus takes as his starting-point the fundamental idea from Tīmaeus that God being good has given man existence (III.18,2). God has not only given Adam freedom of choice in relation to virtue and vice, but has also fashioned man with a body, so that he can dwell in a corporeal world (III.18,3),—the idea appears to be that mortality presupposes corporeality; for the soul is immortal by nature. Titus therefore also continues by directly adding that God wanted man to be mortal (III.18,4; ed.N 320.12 → Ch. XI.39).⁸² God has not without a pre-

Contra Manich. II.14 (Gr. 32.25) states that because the Creator is good and ἀφθονος, He has implanted in man’s nature the power to sin, for otherwise man could not himself acquire virtue.—Contra Manich. IV.84 (here applied to another rational creature than man, namely the Devil) states that evil is planned in reason through the power that exists in the nature of freedom, because the Creator is good and without φθόνος (𐌲𐌹𐌸𐌹 𐌳, Sy 168.27). The formulation ‘good and without φθόνος’ contains an allusion to Tim. 29e. Incidentally, without using the term “φθόνος” Titus also alludes to Tim. 29e in Contra Manich. II.22 (see above p. 343 and → Ch. XI.23).

⁸¹ ἀλλ’ ἄρα φαίη τις ἄν· ὡς ἔβλαψεν ἡ ἀπειθεία τὸν ἄνθρωπον, ἣν οὐκ ἠγνόει ὁ ἐντελλόμενος., ed.N 314.11–12.

⁸² Sy differs here (→ Ch. XI.39), which Nagel 1967, 18 rightly states as an example of “Dogmatisch bedingte Varianten”. He sides, however, with Sy as the original text, even though it is more likely that Sy has taken exception to Titus’s formulation. According to Titus it was clearly God’s will that man should be mortal, even though he left it to man to effect this.

text instituted the barrier of death for man (cf. Gen. 2.17); it was ordained out of regard for the disobedience, which God knew of beforehand, and it is necessary and very frightening (III.18,5–6, partly → Ch. XI.39).

Titus's view of death is very much the same in Book II, to which he also directly refers (III.18,10): admittedly death contains a (fearful) suspicion of punishment, but it is also a wonderful and unexpected benefaction for man from God's side (III.18,9), because he for whom it is a habit to live in deliberate wickedness does not continue to do so since he is not immortal; and vice versa, he who exercises himself in the struggle for virtue has to abide patiently the incessant sweat (of effort) (III.18,11 → Ch. XI.40). For the virtuous also have a need of death. When Titus in III.18,7 claims that it is impossible that free beings like men are always without sin, it is of course not because he believes that they find themselves in the "state of sinfulness"; this is merely an assessment of what is most likely, for in III.19,4 Titus also imagines the possibility that all men through toil and asceticism ("exercise") really did live without sin. Even then, death would also be necessary as refreshment after the labouring for virtue.⁸³

For the virtuous, death actually means a return to the Garden of Paradise; and the experience of a better existence that Adam enjoyed by being in Paradise, is necessary so that man can return to Paradise

⁸³ The important point for Titus seems to have been to maintain that from the beginning man was destined for his present state, where virtue requires struggle (indeed virtue only exists because it is won in battle); on the other hand how well the individual people otherwise manage in this struggle is an empirical question. When Titus in IV.100 expounds 1 Cor. 15.53, which begins with corruptibility and mortality (Δεῖ γὰρ τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσασθαι ἀφθαρσίαν, καὶ τὸ θνητὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσασθαι ἀθανασία), he also states that the body was originally heavy, earthy and filled with fleshly desire, which was appropriate, because the soul should win renown in the struggle for virtue (the original text is preserved in John of Damascus's Sacra Parallela): "but these souls of the saved will exist in blessedness after having regained the body that was united with them. However, it is no longer heavy and earthy and full of fleshly desire as it was in the beginning, when it was fitting that (the souls) won renown in the struggle for virtue." (Pitra 1888, 54 = PG 18, 1260C5–10; cf. Sy 179.8–11 → Ch. XI.51). Of importance here is that Titus neither imagines that the body originally had the same status as the resurrected body will be given, nor that it could have acquired this status; on the contrary, it was fitting that it was an occasion for sin, so that the soul gained the possibility of performing virtuous actions.

and with even greater reputation (III.22,2–3, partly → Ch. XI.42).⁸⁴

However, the idea that God wanted man to be mortal and promised him death for a disobedience which He knew would take place does not mean, according to Titus, that God is to blame that man dies. God was not the cause of the disobedience (III.17,3)⁸⁵ since Adam fell of his own free will (III.17,8). God has allowed man to procure for himself the cause of death (III.19,1), because he is free, and in order for God in truth to show Himself as the benefactor through the means by which He appears to punish (III.19,2). But when God allowed man to procure for himself the cause of death, He did not intend that man should not appear to be created mortal (III.19,2). This remark may seem surprising, but must be interpreted to mean that man was created mortal because of something that happened later, and that death, which was already potentially present as mortality, did not become reality until man had been disobedient. This interpretation partly goes further than what can be found in Titus's explicit formulations, but it receives some support from similar formulations and problems concerning the interpretation of Theodore of Mopsuestia.⁸⁶

A further misunderstanding must be removed: it must not be thought that man's disobedience was welcome to God, even though He wished man to be mortal. On the other hand the disobedience of itself elicited what was fitting and necessary from God's side, and therefore the disobedience also demands such solicitude in order that after having got a beginning, it may also have a conclusion (III.19,3). The fitting, necessary solicitude here means death, the idea being that although God has allowed the disobedience, because there is a need for it, He is not the cause of it, because it is in itself an evil, and that God precisely accomplishes death in order to put an end to it.

⁸⁴ The greater reputation is of course achieved by the virtuous life.—Incidentally, the idea of a return to Paradise comes again in III.31 in connection with the murder of Abel.

⁸⁵ The Manichaean text which Titus refutes claimed, as stated above, that the consequence of claiming that God knew beforehand that man would sin must be that God was responsible for the sin, whether that means He did not prevent the sin, or that His infallible foreknowledge must imply that everything is determined (cf. p. 216); Titus seems here to regard it in the latter way, though he never works seriously with this old philosophical problem, but merely assumes that it is possible to claim both God's foreknowledge and man's freedom (cf. above pp. 328, 337–39).

⁸⁶ See below p. 413.

c. The background to these ideas in the earlier tradition

In continuation of the previous sections the question now is to decide, through selected examples, whether Titus's remarks on God's ἀφθονία and his explanation of death fall into the tradition or are in some way or other new.

I emphasised above the Platonic roots of the ἀφθονία-motif, as well as how Philo explained, using exactly Timaeus 29e, that Gen. 3.22 is not a testimony to God's φθόνος; already here Titus's closeness to Philo is shown. I further argued that also the use of the φθόνος-motif in non-Catholic texts is to be understood in this philosophical context: the Creator God of the OT is jealous, φθονερός, and also governed by related passions such as envy and ζήλος, but the true God must be good and not ruled by His passions, πάθη. The belief that the true God is without φθόνος was common to Catholics and non-Catholics alike; their disagreement was over the Creator's status. Titus is thus not the first orthodox Christian writer to claim God's ἀφθονία or to claim it in an anti-heretical polemic; in the Catholic literature God is very often underlined as being ἄφθονος, without φθόνος, that is "open-handed" or "generous", and even though this motif is not only used in anti-heretical contexts,⁸⁷ a characterisation of the Creator as ἄφθονος may also have contained an unspoken attack against the heretics, in that it is not an unreasonable consideration to assume that the Platonising tendencies in the theology of the Early Church are concerned to a great extent with combating heretics who distinguished between the Creator and the highest God and used the φθόνος-motif in order to deny a divine order to the universe.⁸⁸

⁸⁷ E.g. in Clement of Alexandria we find the motif in Paed. III.7 (40.3) (Stählin 1905, 260.6); Strom. II.18 (86.1) (Stählin 1906, 158.12); V.4 (24.2) (Stählin 1906, 341.2); V.10 (63.7) (Stählin 1906, 368.26–27—as a proverb); VI.11 (90.1) (Stählin 1906, 477.3); VII.2 (7.1–2) (Stählin 1909, 7.4–6) (cf. Van Unnik 1973, 27–31); in Origen we find it e.g. in Contra Cels. VIII.21 (Borret 1969a, 220) (here directed against Celsus's use of it) and in In Jo. II.2 (17) (Blanc 1966, 218); in Eusebius of Caesarea e.g. in Dem. ev. II.3,38 (Heikel 1913, 67.19); III.4,21 (Heikel 1913, 114.1); IV.1,8 (Heikel 1913, 151.28); Praep. ev. XI.21.2 (Mras 1956, 47.1–12); XV.5.2 (Mras 1956, 356.6–7); in Athanasius in Contra gent. 41; De inc. 3; 42 (cf. Dörrie 1976, 516–17; Meijering 1974, 41–42, cf. 89; Meijering 1975, 13–16, 27–28 n. 22, 114–27, 133–46; Meijering 1984, 30, 135–36; Meijering 1989, 50–51, 295–96).—The use of the motif in texts close to the orthodox tradition such as the Od. Sal. may also be mentioned (Ⲡⲉⲙⲉ Ⲙⲓ/Ⲡⲉⲙⲉ Ⲙⲓ [3.6; 7.3; 11.6; 15.6; 17.12; 20.7; 23.4; cf. Van Unnik 1973, 3–32]). Drijvers (1978, 41–48) believes that the Od. Sal. is here attacking the Marcionites; this argument in my view is not strictly binding, since there can also be other relevant "heretics"; cf. above pp. 225–33.—The motif is also found in Doctrina Silv. 101.17–20 (NHC VII,4); cf. Van Unnik 1973, 19–20.

This motif is found not only in anti-Manichaean literature;⁸⁹ it is widespread in early heresiology. I have already mentioned Theophilus's Ad Autolyicum II.25, where it is explained why the commandment not to eat of the Tree of Knowledge is not due to φθόνος.⁹⁰ Also in Irenaeus the ἀφθονία-motif appears very often, and frequently for a polemical purpose against the heretics.⁹¹ Most important in the present context is Adversus haereses III.23,6, where as mentioned Irenaeus rejects the idea that God drove Adam away from the Tree of Life because He begrudged (inuidens) him it, since here we are dealing ⁸⁸ Also in this context I cannot accept Van Unnik's explanation of the frequency of the motif in Christian texts being the determining cause (cf. above pp. 230–31, 233). Van Unnik thinks that the surfacing of the motif is in the context of an upswing of religious "esotericism" which the Roman Empire experienced from the middle of the 2nd cent; those who did not gain a share in the secrets that brought salvation believed that they met with φθόνος, and if they did gain a share they wished to be assured that they were told everything, that they were informed ἀφθόνως. This has to do of course with relations between people, but since God was the source of the saving secrets it was extended to Him (Van Unnik 1973, 47–50, 53–55). However, the motif is not only concerned with secret knowledge in the Christian texts.

⁸⁹ Titus is not the only anti-Manichaean polemicist who uses the ἀφθονία-motif against the Manichaeans; cf. e.g. Augustine in Contra Faust. XXII.9, Zycha 1891, 597.22–25; cf. also Alexander of Lycopolis, Contra Manich. opin. disp. X, Brinkmann 1895, 17.3–4, who with an allusion to Phaedr. 247a directs a charge against the Manichaeans' God: καὶ μὴν πάντα μὲν τὰ κακὰ ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ χοροῦ ἀπελήτταται, ὁ ζῆλος δὲ μάλιστα καὶ ὁ φθόνος. In what follows, though, it is the context between Titus and the earlier heresiology that is of interest.

⁹⁰ See above p. 230 and p. 332.

⁹¹ In Irenaeus there is often clear influence of Plato, esp. Tim. 29e, cf. Meijering (1975, 19–30; 1974, 41–42; 1989, 51); this is the case in Adv. haer. III.25,5, where there is a direct reference to Leg. IV,715e–716a and Tim. 29e, where Plato is contrasted with Marcion (see III.25,3–4) and the other heretics (cf. Van Unnik 1973, 23; Meijering 1975, 15, 20; Meijering 1989, 51), and in Adv. haer. IV.38,3, where the allusion is to Tim. 29e (cf. Van Unnik 1973, 25–26; Meijering 1975, 20). In Adv. haer. V.24,4 Irenaeus alludes to Phaedr. 247a and contrasts God's ἀφθονία with the Devil's φθόνος, which presumably means that God's ἀφθονία here refers to the absence of the feeling of hate in its forms of envy and jealousy (otherwise in Van Unnik 1973, 26–27, 53).—Also of interest is Adv. haer. V.4,1, where Irenaeus uses the "Epicurean" proof (see above pp. 217–19) against those heretics who claim another Father beyond the Creator; their God is not merely both weak and powerless, but even full of jealousy.—On the other hand passages such as Adv. haer. III, Praefatio; IV.1,2; IV.14,2; IV.16,5 do not necessarily contain allusions to the Platonic motif (see also Van Unnik 1973, 22–25 concerning these places).

with linking the φθόνος-motif to the explanation of death. Above I underlined the possibility that the similarity with Ad Autolyicum II.25 could indicate that Irenaeus is drawing on a now vanished text by Theophilus.⁹² This view can now be strengthened through a comparison between Philo, Theophilus and Irenaeus.

In Quaestiones in Genesim I.55 Philo took Timaeus 29e, 30a as his starting-point to explain that God's word in Gen. 3.22 does not imply that there is φθόνος in God; death was ordained in order not to immortalise evil.⁹³ Although the explicit φθόνος-motif appears in another context in Theophilus, namely in Ad Autolyicum II.25 in connection with the Tree of Knowledge, we nonetheless find an aspect of Philo's explanation in Ad Autolyicum II.26: when He banished man from Paradise God conferred a great benefit upon man, so that he did not remain in sin for ever. Within a delineated period of time man can through punishment atone for his sin, in order to be later recalled after having been disciplined. When man was twice placed in Paradise (Gen. 2.8.15), it is a mysterious way of expressing that he will return to Paradise after the resurrection and the judgement. Death can be compared with the remelting and recasting of a vessel that had faults; in death man is broken up potentially in order that he may at the resurrection be found to be sound, i.e. blameless, righteous and immortal.⁹⁴ The significant resemblance to Philo's presentation is the feature that banishment/death⁹⁵ is defended with the argument that otherwise evil would be immortalised (Philo), or man would remain in sin for ever (Theophilus); but there is probably a further similarity in the writer's terminology in that both speak of God's "benefaction".⁹⁶ The crucial difference between them lies

⁹² See above p. 230.

⁹³ See above p. 228.

⁹⁴ Grant 1970, 68: Καὶ τοῦτο δὲ ὁ θεὸς μεγάλην εὐεργεσίαν παρέσχεν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ, τὸ μὴ διαμεῖναι αὐτὸν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα ἐν ἀμαρτίᾳ ὄντα. ἀλλὰ τρόπον τινὲ ἐν ὁμοίωματι ἐξορισμοῦ ἐξέβαλλεν αὐτὸν ἐκ τοῦ παραδείσου, ὅπως διὰ τῆς ἐπιτιμίας τακτῶ ἀποτίμῃ χρόνον τὴν ἀμαρτίαν καὶ παιδευθεὶς ἐξ ὑστέρου ἀνακληθῆ. διὸ καὶ πλασθέντος τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ μυστηριωδῶς ἐν τῇ Γενέσει γέγραπται, ὡς δις αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ τεθέντος· ἵνα τὸ μὲν ἅπαξ ἢ πεπληρωμένον ὅτε ἐτέθη, τὸ δὲ δεύτερον μέλλῃ πληροῦσθαι μετὰ τὴν ἀνάστασιν καὶ κρίσιν. οὐ μὴν ἀλλὰ καὶ καθάπερ σκευῶς τι, ἐπὶ ἀνπλασθέν αἰτίαν τινὰ σχῆ, ἀναχωνέυεται ἢ ἀναπλάσσεται εἰς τὸ γενέσθαι καινὸν καὶ ὁλόκληρον, οὕτως γίνεται καὶ τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ διὰ θανάτου· δυνάμει γὰρ τέθραυσται ἵνα ἐν τῇ ἀναστάσει ὑγιῆς εὐρεθῆ, λέγω δὲ ἄσπιλος καὶ δίκαιος καὶ ἀθάνατος.

⁹⁵ Theophilus does not mention the Tree of Life explicitly, but speaks only about the banishment from Paradise.

⁹⁶ Referring to the creation the Armenian translation of Philo uses an expression in the eschatological purpose with which Theophilus invests death; Philo does not touch on the purifying function of death, nor on man's return to Paradise.⁹⁷ If we now include Adversus haereses III.23,6, Irenaeus on the one hand follows Philo by introducing the φθόνος-motif and by speaking not only of the banishment from Paradise but also of the banishment from the Tree of Life, but on the other hand he repeats Theophilus's eschatological point, combined with formulations that are closer to Philo:

Wherefore also He drove him out of Paradise, and removed him far from the Tree of Life, not because He envied him the Tree of Life, as some venture to assert, but because He pitied him, [and did not desire] that he should continue a sinner for ever, nor that the sin which surrounded him should be immortal, and evil interminable and irremediable. But He set a bound to his [state of] sin, by interposing death, and thus causing sin to cease, putting an end to it by the dissolution of the flesh, which should take place in the earth, so that man, ceasing at length to live to sin, and dying to it, might begin to live to God.⁹⁸

The fact that Irenaeus's presentation seems to follow both Philo's Quaestiones in Genesim and Theophilus's Ad Autolyicum can be explained if Irenaeus's source was Theophilus's Adversus Marcionem, which built on Quaestiones in Genesim but expanded Philo's justification of God with an eschatological motif, and if one further assumes that Ad Autolyicum contains abbreviated forms of more comprehensive arguments in Adversus Marcionem.

The complex of motifs in Philo, Theophilus and Irenaeus that are which Mercier 1979, 124 renders as "benefactor", and which Marcus 1953, 33 n. m believes renders εὐεργετών; Theophilus uses the expression μεγάλην εὐεργεσίαν about death.—The original Armenian text (Aucher 1826) has unfortunately not been available to me.

⁹⁷ Perhaps Theophilus is influenced here by Rom. 6.7 (ὁ γὰρ ἀποθανὼν δεδικαίωται ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας.; cf. Schelkle 1959, 214), despite the fact that Paul seems to be thinking here of baptism as death and not ordinary death. Cf. also 1 Pet. 4.1.

⁹⁸ Transl. by Roberts and Rambaut in Roberts and Donaldson 1989a, 457.—"Quapropter et eiecit eum de Paradiso et a ligno uitae longe transtulit, non inuidens ei lignum uitae, quemadmodum audent quidam dicere, sed miserans eius, et non perseueraret semper transgressor neque immortale esset quod esset circa eum peccatum et malum interminabile et insanabile. Prohibuit autem eius transgressionem, interponens mortem et cessare faciens peccatum, finem inferens ei per carnis resolutionem quae fieret in terra, uti cessans aliquando homo uiuere peccato et moriens ei inciperet uiuere Deo.", Rousseau and Doutreleau 1974, 460, 462.—In contrast to Roberts and Rambaut's translation I prefer to use the term "begrudge".

pointed out here can be found again in later Christian writers. It is clear that here we are dealing with some form of dependence on the earliest presentations, though no attempt will be made here to adduce a direct genealogy.

Like Origen, Methodius distinguishes in his De resurrectione between physical death and what he calls “sin’s death”; physical death as a means of chastisement to conversion is to be regarded as good.⁹⁹ According to Methodius, God saw that evil had become immortal through the Devil’s cunning and by making skin garments (Gen. 3.21) He clad man in mortality, so that the evil that had arisen in him should die through the dissolution of the body (De resurrectione I.38,5).¹⁰⁰ God did not banish man from the Tree of Life because He did not want him to live, but in order to prevent evil from becoming immortal (De resurrectione I.39,5).¹⁰¹ Methodius is particularly interested in maintaining that it was always God’s purpose that man should be immortal, and in this context he appeals to God’s immutability, goodness and foreknowledge,¹⁰² which actually leads him to the exact opposite views of Titus.

Like Theophilus and Irenaeus, Methodius thus combines Philo’s motif of sin that must not be immortalised with the eschatological motif of the purifying death. Even though Methodius does not use the term φθόνος in these contexts, or explain that God did not act out of φθόνος, it is just as clear as in Theophilus that his errand is theodicy.

⁹⁹ Methodius, De res. I.38,2: καλὸν οὖν ὁ θάνατος, εἰ καθάπερ παισὶ πρὸς ἐπιστροφήν δίκην πληγῶν εὐρέθη, οὐχ ὁ τῆς ἀμαρτίας, ᾧ σοφάτατοι, ἀλλ’ ὁ τῆς διαζεύξεως τῆς σαρκὸς καὶ τοῦ χωρισμοῦ. (Bonwetsch 1917, 280.7–9).

¹⁰⁰ Bonwetsch 1917, 281.11–282.2.

¹⁰¹ Bonwetsch 1917, 283.13–16. See further e.g. De res. I.39,6 (Bonwetsch 1917, 284.5–8); I.40,4–6 (Bonwetsch 1917, 285.2–11); I.41,1 (Bonwetsch 1917, 286.5–11); I.42,3 (Bonwetsch 1917, 288.13–289.8); I.45,5–6 (Bonwetsch 1917, 295.5–12).—Just like Theophilus previously, Methodius uses the remelting image in De res. I.43,2–44,2 about this fact (Bonwetsch 1917, 289.12–293.8). See also Methodius, Symp. IX.2 (Bonwetsch 1917, 116.9–17).

¹⁰² See De res. I.39,6: ἐπεὶ διὰ τί τὸν Χριστὸν ἀπὸ τῶν οὐρανῶν ἀπέστειλεν εἰς τὴν γῆν, εἰ ὅλως ἤθελε ζωῆς τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἄγευστον ἀποθανεῖν εἰς τὸ παντελές; εἰ δὲ ἐκ μεταμέλου φαίη τοῦτο πεποιηκέναι τὸν θεὸν ὁ ἀντιλέγων, ἀσθενῆς αὐτῷ ὁ λόγος, μεταγινώσκοντα τὸν θεὸν εἰσάγων. ἀλλ’ οὔτε ἀσύνητος τοῦ μέλλοντος ὁ θεὸς οὔτε κακοποιός, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἄκρως ἀγαθὸς καὶ προγινώσκων τὰ μέλλοντα. ὥστε οὐκ ἄρα διὰ τὸ μὴ σφῆσθαι εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα φαγόντα αὐτὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ ξύλου τῆς ζωῆς ἐξέβαλεν, ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸ νεκρωθῆναι πρῶτον θανάτῳ τὴν ἀμαρτίαν, ἵν’ οὕτως μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν ἔκτακείσης τῆς ἀμαρτίας ἐγερθεὶς ὁ ἄνθρωπος καθαρὸς φάγη τῆς ζωῆς. (Bonwetsch 1917, 283.16–284.8).

Another interesting example of the reappearance of some of these motifs in later writers is to be found in Didymus the Blind's Commentarius in Genesim 110.24–26 (a commentary on Gen. 3.22), where in an allusion to Phaedrus 247a, Didymus claims that there is no φθόνοϛ in God, and on this basis rejects the view that it was out of φθόνοϛ that God cut man off from the Tree of Life. Instead he explains in the following (Commentarius in Genesim 111.1ff.) that only the evil ones are excluded from the Tree of Life, and that this is also for their benefit, because it can either drive them to conversion or at least guarantee that being evil they do not gain access to divine things.¹⁰³ The φθόνοϛ-motif is obvious here and Philo's motif is also suggested.

Titus's position can now be determined more precisely through a comparison. In contrast to Theophilus, Irenaeus and Methodius, Titus does not seem to believe that death is a purification, but only that it is good for the sinner that he cannot do any more harm, which is also Philo's motif. Instead of the purifying motif Titus introduces the idea of virtuous men who receive death as a rest after their labours; the return to Paradise thus happens solely as a reward, not through a purifying punishment. It is also clear that the purifying motif would be quite unable to find expression in Titus's interpretation, because this motif presupposes precisely that Adam and Eve's transgression was a real Fall, a serious sin, with far-reaching consequences; in Titus this transgression is only a minor matter.

Titus believes that some people do not sin, or do not seriously sin, so that the only purpose that death can be thought to have for them must be as a rest after labour. For Titus, physical death has no essential connection with sin, but rather with man's status as an ethical being; death is necessary for both the sinner and the righteous man. Since it has always been God's intention that man should be an ethical being in the struggle for virtue, it has always been His intention that man should die.

Above I interpreted Titus's presentation as arguing that on the one hand God is not to blame that man dies, in that He was not the cause of the disobedience, but that on the other hand He had created man mortal, though this mortality was at first only potentially present, the purpose being that man himself should make it real. Without doubt Titus joins all the other Church fathers in taking the view that it is man himself who is responsible for his own dying. The Creator is acquitted, even though he imposes death on man. As we shall see, Titus is otherwise not the only one to believe that from the beginning man was potentially mortal. What is particular about his position is his view that man was intended from the beginning to make this potential mortality real. I have already dealt with the question of man's primeval state, that he was originally created with a real "foretaste" of the final state of salvation or quite imperfectly with a view to developing to perfection.¹⁰⁴ It is clear, however, that the same problem can be formulated with immortality or mortality as its content.

¹⁰³ Nautin 1976, 260.

Titus's view must not be confused with Theophilus's teaching in Ad Autolyicum II.24–25 and II.27 that Adam was created neither mortal nor immortal. In II.24 Theophilus says that God created man to grow, become complete and having been made divine, enter into heaven. He continues:

for man was created in an intermediate state, neither entirely mortal nor entirely immortal, but capable of either state; similarly the place Paradise—as regards beauty—was created intermediate between the world and heaven.¹⁰⁵

In II.27 Theophilus rejects the idea that man by nature was created mortal, immortal or as nothing:

In fact, man was neither mortal nor immortal by nature. For if God had made him immortal from the beginning, He would have made him God. Again, if He had made him mortal, it would seem that God was responsible for his death. God therefore made him neither immortal nor mortal but, as we have said before, capable of both.¹⁰⁶

Adam could either through obedience win immortality or through disobedience become the cause of his own death. The difference

¹⁰⁴ See above pp. 332–37.

¹⁰⁵ Transl. by Grant 1970, 67, original text 66: μέσος γὰρ ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐγεγόνει, οὔτε θνητὸς ὀλοσχερῶς οὔτε ἀθάνατος τὸ καθόλου, δεκτικὸς δὲ ἑκατέρων· οὕτως καὶ τὸ χωρίον ὁ παράδεισος, ὡς πρὸς καλλονήν, μέσος τοῦ κόσμου καὶ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ γεγένηται . . .

¹⁰⁶ Transl. by Grant 1970, 69, 71, original text 68, 70: οὔτε οὖν φύσει θνητὸς ἐγένετο οὔτε ἀθάνατος. εἰ γὰρ ἀθάνατον αὐτὸν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς πεποιήκει, θεὸν αὐτὸν πεποιήκει· πάλιν εἰ θνητὸν αὐτὸν πεποιήκει, ἐδόκει ἂν ὁ θεὸς αἴτιος εἶναι τοῦ θανάτου αὐτοῦ. οὔτε οὖν ἀθάνατον αὐτὸν ἐποίησεν οὔτε μὴν θνητόν, ἀλλά, καθὼς ἐπάνω προειρήκαμεν, δεκτικὸν ἀμφοτέρων . . .

from Titus is clear: in Titus it is stated unambiguously that man is mortal by nature, and in reality death was the only conceivable ending to the Paradise narrative. In Theophilus on the other hand Adam's mortality or immortality is maintained as undecided; both states were real possibilities for the first person.

Theophilus's teaching perhaps came to him on the basis of Jewish ideas.¹⁰⁷ To a great extent it resembles the views of the much later Nemesius of Emesa (c. 400), who, however, formulated it differently; instead of saying that Adam was neither mortal nor immortal before the Fall, but capable of becoming both, Nemesius argues that Adam was mortal, but capable of becoming immortal.¹⁰⁸ Because immortality was a real possibility, Nemesius' doctrine is not the same as Titus's either, despite them both explicitly saying that Adam was mortal from the beginning.

It has been claimed that Nemesius's doctrine comes from Origen's Commentarius in Genesim, but this can hardly be the case, since as mentioned Origen seems to have believed that in an unstable way man was perfect in Paradise,¹⁰⁹ which must also mean that he was immor-¹⁰⁷ E.g. Theophilus may have been inspired by the doctrine that Philo presents in De op. mund. 46 (134–135), but in that case he has completely changed its meaning. According to Philo man constitutes a borderland between mortal and immortal nature in that he is compounded of a mortal body and an immortal soul. According to Theophilus, however, in the Paradisal state it was a question of whether this compound should be permanent or not. Cf. also Hauke 1993, 131–32 with further references.—Theophilus's idea that Adam was created neither immortal nor mortal, but in between could also have other Jewish roots: see the reference to the Palestinian Targum-tradition in Brock 1990, 58.

¹⁰⁸ Nemesius's De nat. hom. 1 (Morani 1987, 6.5–7.12), where further arguments are developed from a premise which is attributed to “the Hebrews” (presumably Philo in De op. mund. 46 [134–135], cf. Jaeger 1914, 141, and probably not Theophilus [as Grant 1970, 71 n. 2 believes]), and from which Nemesius then adduces the following as his own view: to “suppose man to have been created mortal, but capable of becoming immortal when brought to perfection by moral progress; which is the same thing as being potentially immortal.” (ὅτι θνητός μὲν κατεσκευάσθη, δυνάμενος δὲ ἐκ προκοπῆς τελειούμενος ἀθάνατος γενέσθαι, τούτεστι δυνάμει ἀθάνατος., Morani 1987, 6.18–20). What follows (Morani 1987, 6.20ff.) shows that the idea is that this development towards immortality was aborted by the Fall of Man.—Even though Nemesius knew Philo, his own ideas are more likely taken from another writer, e.g. Theophilus.—There are also other testimonies to Christian doctrines that are very close to Theophilus's and perhaps influenced by him: thus Ephrem the Syrian, e.g. In Gen. II.17 (Tonneau 1955, 34. 28–29); see further Gross 1960, 211–12; Kronholm 1978, 76–77; Brock 1990, 57–62.

¹⁰⁹ See above pp. 336–37.—It is not possible to delve deeper into the particular problem of how the pre-existence of the soul that Origen claimed relates to Adam and Eve's existence in Paradise; see further Crouzel 1978; Hammond Bammel 1989; Hauke 1993 with further references.

tal: just as perfection in Paradise lacked a firmness, so could immortality or incorruptibility in Paradise admittedly also be lost,¹¹⁰ but this is nevertheless a quite different understanding of the primeval state than what is found in Nemesius.¹¹¹

However, the question of in what sense Origen believed that man was originally immortal, immediately raises itself—was it immortality in relation to physical death or in relation to the soul's death?¹¹² It is now clear that the state of immortality in Paradise was concerned first and foremost with the circumstance that the soul was not yet dead, i.e. had sinned; it was thus primarily the soul's death that was instituted in Gen. 3.¹¹³ But this does not necessarily exclude the possibility that also physical death was instituted on the same occasion, which is precisely what seems to be the case.¹¹⁴ Nor does Origen's interpretation of the Paradise narrative appear to constitute a preliminary stage of Titus's view. The great Alexandrian believed in a fall and a rupture.

In this area Titus is thus even further from Origen than from Theophilus and Nemesius; he nevertheless shares the latter's interest

¹¹⁰ In Jo. I.20 (121), Blanc 1966, 124 (κτισθεὶς δὲ, ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐπὶ ἀφθαρσία κεκρατήκει τῆς ἀφθαρσίας); XIII.34 (224), Blanc 1975, 150 (Καὶ ἀθάνατος ἂν ἔμεινεν ὁ ἄνθρωπος, εἰ ἀπὸ παντὸς ξύλου τοῦ ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ βρώσει ἦσθιεν, ἀπὸ δὲ τοῦ ξύλου τοῦ γινώσκειν καλὸν καὶ πονηρὸν μὴ ἦσθιεν.). Cf. Hammond Bammel 1989, 72.

¹¹¹ According to Jaeger (1914, 138–43), Skard (1936, 29–31) and Telfer (1955, 238–40) the passage in Nemesius comes from Origen's In Gen. (otherwise in Koch 1932, 216ff.).

¹¹² Cf. above p. 348.

¹¹³ See e.g. In Jo. XX.25 (220–30) (Blanc 1982, 264–71) (esp. 224–25), Hom. in Gen. XV.2 (Baehrens 1920, 128.24–129.1) or In Rom. VI.6 (Hammond Bammel 1997, 480–81), where through a quotation from Wis. 2.24 it is also clear that it is the death of the soul that is instituted in Gen. 3: “Et rursus separatio animae a Deo mors appellatur quae per peccatum uenit. Haec aperte mala est, quae et peccati stipendium nominatur. Hanc mortem Deus non fecit neque laetatur in perditione uiuorum; sed inuidia diaboli mors haec introuit in orbem terrarum.” See further also in Hammond Bammel 1989, 78; Hauke 1993, 370–73.

¹¹⁴ In Rom. V.1 (Hammond Bammel 1997, 371) Origen explains that physical death is a shadow of the soul's death, which always follows it: “‘Et per peccatum inquit mors;’ illa sine dubio mors de qua et profeta dicit: ‘quia anima quae peccat ipsa morietur;’ cuius mortis hanc corporalem mortem umbram merito quis dixerit; quocumque enim illa inceserit hanc necesse est subsequi uelut umbram corpus.” See further Crouzel 1978, 26–28; Hauke 1993, 373–74 with further references.—That the separation of soul and body is man's φύσις does not imply that it was already his nature from the beginning (there are also Early Church theories claiming both that from the beginning death belonged to man's φύσις, and that man was immortal from the beginning, since God's grace suspended nature, thus Athanasius, De inc. 4–6).

in playing down the ideas of an extraordinary or elevated primeval state. We must note in this context how in III.26–27 Titus rejects theories that in Paradise Adam and Eve were still without flesh (ἄσαρκοι) and not mortal, because the time was still not ripe to reproduce children (III.26.1–2).

The question is, however, whether Titus himself nevertheless has freed himself entirely of these theories. For in III.27,7 he states it as his opinion that from the moment they had eaten of the Tree they regarded each other “in a more corporeal state” (σωματικωτέρα διαθέσει), an expression that recalls a phrase in Titus’s reproduction of the theories mentioned, namely that before Adam and Eve were disobedient, the time of a “fleshly state” (σαρκικῆς διαθέσεως, ed.N 338.4) had not yet come (III.26,1). If, however, Titus still believes in degrees of corporeality, the idea must be that the less corporeal flesh in question, before man and woman ate of the Tree, was already equipped with sense organs such as eyes. If Titus is thinking of a difference between a body of finer particles and a body of thicker particles, it would to some degree fit in with Adam and Eve finding themselves in his opinion somewhere else in the universe than on the physical earth, for he continues by saying that they then “were transferred to the earth, from which they were also formed in the beginning” (III.27,7), a statement which suggests that Titus believed that the Garden of Paradise was situated in the third heaven.¹¹⁵ But the interpretation seems to break down on the fact that precisely here Titus is stating that the body originally comes from the earth. Titus obviously believes that man was originally created on and of this earth and only secondarily removed up to Paradise in the third heaven. For the idea of a position in the third heaven is not necessarily connected to the theory of heavy and light bodies. Perhaps ¹¹⁵ . . . σωματικωτέρα διαθέσει λοιπὸν θεωμένοις ἀλλήλους, ὅθεν καὶ μετατίθενται εἰς τὴν γῆν, ἀφ’ ἧς καὶ τὴν ἀρχὴν ἐπλάσθησαν., ed.N 340.11–13.—The idea that Paradise was situated in the third heaven comes originally from ancient Judaism and is shared, e.g. by Irenaeus, who identified the Garden of Paradise with the third heaven and the Paradise mentioned in 2 Cor. 12.2–4 (see Adv. haer. V.5,1). Origen too appears to have placed the Garden of Paradise in the third heaven (Hammond Bammel 1989; Hauke 1993, 207–8; 322ff.), and in Origen, or perhaps only in later Origenists, this position was connected with a theory that through successive falls the soul had become clad in increasingly rougher bodies (see further Hammond Bammel 1989).

Titus took the expression σωματικωτέρῃ διαθέσει from earlier theories, but he means something else by it; e.g. it may have been his view that the first human couple were indifferent to their corporeality before and until they ate.

Also in his understanding of death Titus appears to be breaking new ground in relation to earlier patristics. Like Origen he regards physical death as natural, but the fundamental difference is that whereas for Origen it is indifferent, for Titus it is good. Death is not a punishment, nor is it good in the sense that it purifies man of sin. Death is good because it puts an end to the sinner's deeds and gives the righteous man rest. For there is no essential connection between sin and death.

Death is necessary for the ethical struggle that man has always had to wage, and it has therefore never been the intention that man should not die. It was not thus that man was immortal in heaven, nor was it thus that he could have become so. For Adam and Eve's transgression was not a real Fall, but merely a bagatelle, in the last resort a useful experience.

6. Summarising remarks

It has now been demonstrated that Adda's attack really did help to reshape Titus's theology, or, as I actually believe, for another anti-Manichaean whom Titus relied on. Titus believed that he had to defend himself through a theodicy that surrendered certain important elements in the tradition and insisted on and combined the remaining elements in a new way. We cannot deny that the result very much resembles Pelagianism. Man was not immortal in Paradise, and was not changed or did not become incurable through his disobedience, which was not a Fall but a useful experience; this in the long view enabled him to return to Paradise through his own virtuous efforts. It was always the intention that man should die, and death is natural and good, not a punishment.

Titus's polemic is directed not only against the Manichaeans, but also against the tradition, which in his opinion did not contain a convincing response to the Manichaean criticism. Scheffczyk is therefore mistaken in claiming that Titus was not a "direkten Gegner einer Erbübel- oder Erbverderbnislehre". On this point the assessments by Sickenberger, Gross and Beatrice are more correct. Yet nor are Gross and Beatrice right in arguing that a presentation such as Titus's was typical of, or at least expressed, the genuine tendency in other Greek patristics. On the contrary, Titus's criticism of the tradition is a testimony that he had moved a long way away from it. This does not mean that Titus was a "heretic" himself. He was concerning himself with an area of Church doctrine where no binding decisions had yet been made, and where he was therefore quite within his rights to revise the main tendency in the previously unclear mass of traditions, so much the more since this revision further contained a continuity, for Gross is of course right that Titus's solution was a cultivation of one of the possibilities amid the tensions of theology in the Early Church.

To determine how great the similarities are between Titus's theology and Pelagianism would require a specific examination which it is not my intention to conduct here. Doubtless there would be a number of differences too. It is perhaps a particular feature of Titus's Pelagian characteristics that they are not only the result of a specific anthropology or ethic, but are also determined by his desire to safeguard the transcendence of God. Titus also believes in the necessity of help from God, which suggests a concept of grace, though not an Augustinian one: Petitdidier and Scheffczyk are thus right to point out that II.16 Titus states about man that God has also made man for the sake of this good deed, in order that on the one hand he should receive existence from God, but on the other hand receive from himself the good in addition, through God's assistance (Gr. 34.10–12 → Ch. XI.20).

This assistance, this "synergy" from God's side, is best illustrated in my opinion by Titus's interpretation of Rom. in Contra Manichaeos IV.90–95, where Paul's text makes it necessary for Titus to emphasise grace (ⲕⲉⲃⲁⲗⲁ = χάρις, Sy 173.20.22.24.25, 175.22.23.25). Titus, who always believes that the individual sins can lead to a sinful habit or ἔξις fastening itself to the soul, underlines that ⲕⲁⲗ ⲕⲉⲛ ⲕⲉⲓⲛⲁⲣⲉ, "another good passion/feeling" (IV.93, Sy 174.14) can overcome this habit. ⲕⲉⲛ presumably translates πάθος, and the expression and line of thought seem to correspond exactly to τι μείζον ἀγαθὸν πάθος in II.12 (Gr. 31.22–23 → Ch. XI.18). Grace, or the good πάθος is much the same as the ⲕⲉⲃⲁⲗⲁ, "benefit" or "goodness" that we find in IV.94 (Sy 175.8.21, partly → Ch. XI.49). Faith in God and love of God are "given in addition" (ⲁⲃⲟⲁⲑⲓⲃⲁⲣⲉ, IV.94, Sy 175.33). Faith demands that man receives something “extra” (κτῆμα, IV.95, Sy 176.19). And, as can be seen, Petitdidier was also right that this grace consists not only of the outward trials but also involves the inner effect on man. With these definitions Titus is moving some way beyond his “cooler”, rationalist understanding, corresponding to what I emphasised above, namely that in Contra Manichaeos IV.91 Titus may depict faith in God in a very intellectualist way, but he also stresses that it contains εὐνοια and ἀγάπη towards God (→ Ch. XI.48).¹¹⁶

¹¹⁶ Cf. above p. 62, p. 293 and p. 317 concerning these Titus-passages.—The difference in Greek patristics between a Stoic-inspired, “unfavourable” attitude to πάθος and a more positive, Platonic-Aristotelian inspired view of πάθος is underlined in Ware 1989, and Titus’s view is at least to some degree illuminated by the texts to which Bishop Ware draws attention there.

CHAPTER NINE

COMPARISON BETWEEN THE EXEGESIS OF GENESIS IN TITUS OF BOSTRA AND IN A NUMBER OF WRITERS IN “THE ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL”

1. Plan for the following comparison

The examination in the previous chapter revealed that many of the motifs that appear in Titus’s interpretation of the Paradise narrative recur in the earlier and contemporary Church fathers, but it also showed that the motifs are combined in a new way and with a new purpose in Titus. The argument that God had anticipated the disobedience and therefore created man to become mortal, and that in reality the disobedience and death were beneficial and necessary is not found in its entirety in the writers under discussion. On this background it is reasonable to conclude that Titus—under the constraint of Adda’s arguments—was able to revise the traditional interpretation independently.

But the examination is only half finished, for even though Titus’s interpretation looks like a new departure in relation to the earlier tradition, it is not so different from the interpretation in certain texts by his younger contemporary, Theodore of Mopsuestia. As mentioned, the similarity between Titus and Theodore was noted by Gross, who suggested that Theodore had been influenced by Titus. However, one could also imagine that this similarity instead indicated that Titus and Theodore represented an older tradition, and in that case it would not be justifiable to claim that Titus’s interpretation of the Paradise narrative came about in reaction to Adda’s criticism. It could be that in the face of this criticism Titus mobilised a number of interpretations that had already been formulated in another context, so that it would be wrong to see Titus of Bostra’s theology as an extreme example that the clash between Manichaeans and Catholics had a significant impact on Greek theology in the 4th and 5th centuries. It is also a possibility, however, that the hypothetical older tradition was precisely an anti-Manichaean tradition, so that the important point in Titus’s interpretation of the Paradise narrative had already been formed as a reaction to Adda's criticism. If this is the case, we are then back with views on which I have already focussed, namely that Titus of Bostra had a relation to the early "Antiochene School", that this was characterised by an anti-Manichaean concern, and even perhaps that Titus had a literary dependence on George of Laodicea's anti-Manichaean work.

The problem requires that a comparison be drawn not only between Titus of Bostra and Theodore of Mopsuestia's interpretations of Gen. but also with the interpretation among other "Antiochene theologians". For practical reasons, however, this examination will not include all the texts that could be relevant for a comparison, but limit itself to certain writers and texts.¹ A brief, incomplete sketch of Eusebius of Caesarea's interpretation of the Paradise narrative in Historia ecclesiastica and Theophania will form a "prologue", so to speak, to what follows. As we have seen, one of this Eusebius's pupils was Eusebius of Emesa, whose Commentarius in Octateuchum on Gen. among others, is known from an Armenian translation and from Greek catenae fragments; not only these Greek fragments will be included, but also other material that is only preserved in the Armenian version, where I build on specific excerpts from L. van Rompay and J.J.S. Weitenberg's unpublished French translation, to which R.B. ter Haar Romeny has kindly given me access. Romeny is reworking this preliminary translation for publication.² Eusebius of Emesa's pupil, Diodore of Tarsus, also wrote a commentary, Commentarius in Octateuchum, which is only known in fragments and which I also include.³ Finally,

¹ One could also quite reasonably assign to the Antiochene theologians Nemesius of Emesa, who for practical reasons was treated in the previous chapter (pp. 360–62).

² The Armenian translation appears in Hovhannessian 1980. That this text really is a translation of Eusebius of Emesa's In Oct., was finally proved by Lehmann (1984); cf. Lehmann 1975, 17–18, 31–33; 1986; 1986a; 1987; 1989. A thorough account of the entire text tradition of Eusebius of Emesa's In Oct. is to be found in Romeny 1997a, 19–33, including the catenae. Romeny 1997a also gives the reader to a certain extent the possibility of gaining an impression of the parts of In Oct. which are preserved only in the Armenian version.—In the present context it is not possible to go deeper into the questions on the relationship between the different catenae and compilations that comment on Gen. (and their relation to among others Theodoret of Cyrus's Quaest. in Oct. and Procopius's In Gen.); it is particularly Françoise Petit's scholarship and editing that have clarified these questions and made the texts available. In addition to Romeny's account see Petit 1977; 1979; 1986; 1991; 1993; 1995; 1996; 1996a. Of special importance for the present work are the Catena in Gen., Ch. 1–3 (Petit 1991) and Collectio Coisimiana (Petit 1986).

³ I use the new edition of the fragments in Petit 1986; cf. also the earlier edition in Deconinck 1912, 84–173.—Diodore's commentary, like Eusebius of Emesa's,

Diodore's pupil, Theodore of Mopsuestia, composed a Commentarius in Genesim, of which again there are only fragments, though these are preserved in several different contexts.⁴ It is unclear whether a particular catena fragment which is important in the present context (Petit 1986, no. 115) comes from Diodore's Commentarius in Octateuchum or Theodore's Commentarius in Genesim, so this fragment will be treated separately in a special section. Furthermore, the Commentarius in Genesim was perhaps already composed when Theodore was a young man, and it appears to have built on the commentaries of both Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore.⁵ Since Gross, Beatrice and Scheffczyk have, as mentioned, compared Titus precisely with Theodore, it is clearly of particular importance to include this commentary, but the ostensible similarities between Titus and Theodore are to be found even more in certain fragments that are said to come from a work that Theodore wrote against the adherents of the seems to have belonged to the quaestiones-genre (see above p. 254), and in it he leaned on his teacher to such an extent that one can actually speak of plagiarism (thus Petit 1979, 284; see further Romeny 1997a, 131–35). Perhaps this fact can provide a weak basis for dating Diodore's In Oct.: for does not such a severe dependence on his teacher's work show that Diodore was still a young man who had not yet freed himself from the older man's influence?

⁴ See primarily the thorough account in Devreesse 1948, 5–25 (together with Devreesse 1959, 174–77), which now needs a supplement and a revision, however.—The most important fragments are to be found in the following places: a brief characterisation of Theodore's commentary appears in Photius, Bibl., cod. 38 (8a22–25) (Henry 1959, 23); cod. 43 (9a13–17) (Henry 1959, 27); cod. 240 (322b27–30) (Henry 1967, 167); cf. Devreesse 1948, 5. Some fragments exist as direct quotations in John Philoponus's De op. mund. (Reichardt 1897), cf. Devreesse 1948, 5–6. Other fragments appear in catenae and similar compilations, cf. Devreesse 1948, 6; see PG 66,636–45; PG 87,1, 21ff.; Devreesse 1948, 5–25; Devreesse 1959, 174–77; but esp. the new editions by F. Petit (see above p. 367). A number of fragments exist in the acts of the fifth ecumenical synod in Constantinople in 553; see Straub 1970, 64–66 (actio quarta 66–71). Other fragments are preserved in Syriac translation: Sachau 1869, 1–34; Tonneau 1953; Jansma 1962. Further fragments are to be found in Petit 1987. See finally the more comprehensive account in Petit 1987, 269–71.

⁵ An attempt to date Theodore's works appears in Vosté 1925, who assumes that Theodore began by commenting on the OT as a young, i.e. as a pupil of Diodore and a young priest in the period 370–385. Vosté's theory is that the NT commentaries were the last that Theodore wrote, and that this explains why the reaction against Theodore came late (Vosté 1925, 56). However, Vosté does not get any closer to dating the Gen.-commentary. His theory rests on a weak foundation, cf. McLeod 1999, 27–28.—As Diodore's pupil Theodore must have known his commentary, but he seems also to have known Eusebius of Emesa's In Oct.; see Romeny 1997a, 27, 28.

doctrine of original sin, and one which must have been composed when Theodore was an elderly man.⁶ Occasionally, however, I have also attempted with the help of other texts to illuminate individual aspects of these writers' interpretations of the Paradise narrative. In conclusion I add some brief remarks on the interpretation of the Paradise narrative in the Constitutiones Apostolorum, which have sometimes been placed together with Theodore and Titus, and which therefore are not without interest for the present examination.

Of all the texts mentioned it is Eusebius of Emesa's commentary which most obviously relates to the dualistic "heresies",⁷ even though the theme is also present in Diodore as a clear continuation of Eusebius. The question is, however, whether certain problems with their roots in the anti-dualistic conflict are not also present in Theodore, even though they are no longer explicitly related to the conflict.

2. Outline of the interpretation of the Paradise narrative in Eusebius of Caesarea

Above I noted various similarities between Titus and Eusebius of Caesarea and his pupil, Eusebius of Emesa, and I further mentioned a somewhat loose theory that Titus could have been Eusebius of Caesarea's pupil. Without in any way determining whether Eusebius of Caesarea should be assigned to "the Antiochene School", it might at least make sense to begin with some remarks about Eusebius of Caesarea's interpretation of the Paradise narrative.⁸

The natural starting-point for a comparison must be Titus's interpretation of the image of God in man. As I have underlined, Titus does not distinguish between εἰκὼν and ὁμοίωσις, and man's createdness κατ' εἰκόνα in Book III has to do with his rule over nature, his reason and his freedom, whereas Book II only concentrates on his freedom. It is of decisive importance, however, that the image of God in man has as its starting-point an innate knowledge which through voluntary obedience to the commandments develops man in virtue so that he comes to resemble God. Titus thus places the image of God in the ethical choices that are made by reason, and he does not appear to be particularly interested in the image of God as contemplation; and although he describes observance of the commandments as the mediation of the knowledge of God or as participation in the divine reason, he also emphasises that this participation has its limits.⁹

⁶ The dating follows from the work being supposedly directed against Jerome's Dial. contra Pelag. libri III from 415. Theodore died in 428.—See further below p. 407 on the transmission of this work by Theodore.

⁷ In addition to the passages that I treat in what follows, see references in Romeny 1997, 137–38; 1997a, 12, 15, 18, 93, 94, 253–58, 265–71, 277–85, 316–23.

⁸ See further the interpretations in Berkhof 1939, 102–13; Gross 1960, 163–68; Scheffczyk 1981, 152–54.

Eusebius underlines the link between the image of God in man and man's rule over the animals,¹⁰ just as Titus does. As in Titus, moreover, man's rule is based on his capacity for reason, which is contrasted with the animal's slavery under the law of nature, which shows that these exist for man's sake.¹¹ Even though there is only a difference of nuance here, it should be noted that to a greater degree than Titus Eusebius seems to stress that man's createdness in the εἰκὼν and ὁμοίωσις is to be found in the kinship of the immortal soul with the Logos.¹² On this point the inheritance from Platonism and Origen is probably stronger than is the case with Titus, who, as mentioned, seems more interested in the ethical realisation in the world of the image of God than in the transcendence of the soul. The influence of Origen is also present when Eusebius points out that by virtue of his reason, which is in kinship with the Logos, man on earth is destined to grow with a view to life in heaven.¹³

Did Eusebius of Caesarea believe in a break at this point in man's development, a catastrophic Fall? One of his presentations can at the least be read to mean that not just Adam but also his immediate successors lived a simple, holy life without polytheism, but this may only refer to Adam in Paradise before the Fall.¹⁴ In other pre-

⁹ Contra Manich. III.14,3–6 (ed.N 310.17–312.6); these limits (ὅσον ἐνδέχεται, “as far as it is possible”, ed.N 312.3) perhaps correspond with the argument mentioned in I.24 (Gr. 15.22–23 → Ch. XI.11) where Titus rejects the claim that we have a part in seeing God κατ’ οὐσίαν (cf. above p. 308).

¹⁰ Theoph. I.48 (Lee 1842, [25.19ff.]; Gressmann 1904, 65*.23ff.).

¹¹ Theoph. I.44–45 (Lee 1842, [21.26–22.13]; Gressmann 1904, 61*.28–62*.6).

¹² Theoph. I.68 (Lee 1842, [30.21–25]; Gressmann 1904, 70*.17–23).

¹³ Theoph. I.40 (Lee 1842, [18.8–14]; Gressmann 1904, 57*.34–58*.6).

¹⁴ Theoph. I.42 (Lee 1842, [19.23–20.12]; Gressmann 1904, 59*.17–60*.4). The interpretation in Gross 1960, 164 assumes that Eusebius is referring both to Adam and to his immediate successors (as well as to the Hebrews), which is also possible. He may mean only Adam and the later Hebrews, however.

sentations, however, and most clearly in Historia ecclesiastica I.2,17–19,¹⁵ Eusebius claims that the consequence of Adam's disobedience of God's commandment was that he "fell at once to this mortal and perishable life, and exchanged the former divine delights for this earth with its curse" (Historia ecclesiastica I.2,18),¹⁶ and that through continued evilness his successors "destroyed" (διαφθείροντες)¹⁷ the innate reason of the soul (Historia ecclesiastica I.2,19). We are dealing with a process of decline which was introduced with the Fall of Man. Related to this account is a somewhat unclear passage in which Eusebius seems to imagine that the first human was a child who through obedience to God's commandment could have been released from the earthly, corruptible life. This development was arrested by the Fall, however, and God therefore gave man a body that in the end could deliver him from corruptibility;¹⁸ presumably here Eusebius imagines that the soul in heaven was clothed in fine garments which at the Fall were replaced by a heavier body which through death could purify man from sin.¹⁹

Also in Eusebius therefore we find a number of the elements that are contained in Titus's interpretation of the Paradise narrative; but there are still crucial differences: Adam originally had a real possibility through obedience to develop himself to immortality, and his disobedience was therefore a fall, a break with his purpose.

3. Comparison with Eusebius of Emesa's interpretation of the Paradise narrative

Eusebius of Caesarea's pupil, Eusebius of Emesa, did not devote much attention in Commentarius in Octateuchum to the image of God in man, but in another text he placed this image within man's ruling functions,²⁰ a feature which corresponds to presentations in both ¹⁵ Bardy 1952, 10.

¹⁶ εἰς τουτονὶ τὸν θνητὸν καὶ ἐπίκηνον βίον καταπέπτωκεν καὶ τὴν ἐπάρατον ταυτηνὴ γῆν τῆς πάλαι ἐνθέου τροφῆς ἀντικατηλλάξατο . . . (Bardy 1952, 10).—Eng. transl. by Lake 1965, 21, 23.

¹⁷ Bardy 1952, 10.

¹⁸ Theoph. II.69 (Lee 1842, [30.26–31.9]; Gressmann 1904, 70*.23–71*.3).

¹⁹ Here I mainly follow the interpretation in Gross 1960, 165–66, 167–68.

²⁰ De incorp. et invisib. Deo [5], Buytaert 1957, 81–82. Cf. Schweizer 1942, 61 n. 239.

Eusebius of Caesarea and Titus of Bostra, but which is also insufficient for a closer comparison. With regard to the location of the Garden of Paradise, however, there is a clear difference from Titus, who as mentioned seems to have placed it in the third heaven; ostensibly Eusebius of Caesarea believed something similar. Characteristically on the other hand, it was Eusebius of Emesa's view that the garden was on this earth, and despite disagreements on other matters this view was held by both Diodore of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia.²¹

When Titus claims that man, being created in God's image, already knew good and evil, and therefore argues that the Tree of Knowledge did not have that appellation because it contained this knowledge, but because man's knowledge was exercised by not approaching it, his view corresponds exactly to Eusebius of Emesa's: in Commentarius in Octateuchum on Gen. 2.9²² Eusebius explains that while the Tree of Life naturally mediated immortality to whoever ate of it, the Tree of Knowledge did not contain in its nature cognition of the contraries (i.e. good and evil). Eusebius attempts to prove this by arguing that already when man was forbidden to eat of the Tree of Knowledge under threat of punishment by death in Gen. 2.16–17, he must have been capable of knowing evil, namely in knowing that it was evil to eat of the Tree: it would have been superfluous to give man a commandment that he did not understand, and it would be outrageous (ἄτοπος) to punish man with death for a transgression that was committed in ignorance. Man therefore already possessed the knowledge of good and evil not only before he ate but also before he received the commandment, and it could therefore look as though both the Tree and the commandment were superfluous.

²¹ In the Armenian version of In Oct. on Gen. 3.24, Hovhannessian 1980, 36, a passage is preserved in which Eusebius of Emesa directly attacks the view that the Garden of Paradise should have been in heaven. That the garden is on the earth, however, is also clear from a Greek fragment in Petit 1991, 167–68 (no. 237 on Gen. 2.8); Hovhannessian 1980, 18,72–19,94. Diodore: see Petit 1986, 88 (no. 86). Theodore: see Petit 1991, 158–59 (no. 228) (= Devreesse 1948, 16 n. 4); Petit 1991, 159 (no. 229) (= Devreesse 1948, 16–17 n. 4); Petit 1991, 159–60 (no. 230) (= PG 66,637B3–8; cf. Devreesse 1948, 17 n. 2); Petit 1991, 160–61 (no. 231) (= PG 66,637B8–C11; cf. Devreesse 1948, 17 n. 2); Petit 1991, 176–77 (no. 252) (= Devreesse 1948, 17 n. 1; PG 66,637B3–8). Concerning all these writers see Romeny 1997a, 192–200 (Fr. V); more distantly 118, 128, 137.

²² Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 2.9 in Petit 1991, 169–70 (no. 241); cf. Hovhannessian 1980, 19,113–21,159.

It may be added that if one were to assume that the Tree itself contained knowledge of good and evil, this would mean that whoever prevented man from eating of it was jealous (φθονερός), and that the commandment was superfluous because man would only be in need of laws and prohibitions when he had eaten of the Tree and thereby acquired the knowledge that allows him room for a free choice (τὸ αὐτεξούσιον). Of course it is not Eusebius of Emesa's view that the Tree of Knowledge and God's commandment against eating of it were superfluous, and he asks:

So how then is this to be understood?²³ Man had a power of reason that was capable of receiving both good and evil, but did not have knowledge of them. When God wished to make room for free choice and cognition of the contrary (qualities) [i.e. good and evil], He showed them a tree and forbade them to eat of it, and he threatened them with death if they transgressed (the commandment), so they could understand that the act of violation is evil, and the act of obedience is good. The tree by which both these things became known was then rightly given its name after them, i.e. after obedience and disobedience.²⁴

It is important to note here that Eusebius clearly believes that the Tree of Knowledge, was in a sense a random tree that God used in order to train man, and that it acquired its name because that was the purpose it was used for. Moreover it is obviously the intention ²³ Πῶς οὖν αὐτὸ νοητέον;, Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 2.9 in Petit 1991, 170 (no. 241.18).

²⁴ Εἶχον μὲν λογισμὸν δεκτικὸν καλοῦ τε καὶ κακοῦ, τὴν δὲ γνῶσιν οὐκ εἶχον. Ὁ δὲ θεὸς χάραν δοῦναι τῷ αὐτεξουσίῳ βουλόμενος καὶ τῶν ἐναντιῶν τὴν γνῶσιν, δένδρον ὑποδείξας ἀπαγορεύει τὴν βρώσιν, ἀπειλήσας θάνατον παραβαίνουσιν, ὡς ἂν εἰδείεν τὸ παρακοῦσαι κακὸν καὶ τὸ πειθαρχεῖν ἀγαθόν. Τὸ οὖν δένδρον δι' οὗ τούτων ἐκότερον ἐγινώσκειτο, ἐκ τούτων εἰκότως ἐκάλεσεν, τουτέστιν ὑπακοῆς τε καὶ παρακοῆς; Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 2.9 in Petit 1991, 171 (no. 243.1–7) followed originally straight after the text that Petit carries in no. 241 (see previous note), as can be seen both from the Armenian translation and from Procopius of Gaza's In Gen. (PG 87,1, 161B–164A). No. 243 is erroneously attributed to Theodore of Mopsuestia in Devreesse 1948, 17 n. 3.—Cf. Irenaeus, who in Adv. haer. IV.39,1 states that man's knowledge of good and evil is innate, but that he needs experience and training through the commandment, and that the good is obedience and the evil disobedience; presumably Eusebius of Emesa has been influenced by this directly or indirectly, but the particular interpretation of the name of the Tree of Knowledge is not found in Irenaeus.—In the continuation (Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 2.9 in Petit 1991, 171–72 [no. 243.7–19]) Eusebius seeks to render his interpretation probable by referring to a number of other passages in the OT where places receive names after the events that happened at them.—Petit 1991, 171 (no. 243) corresponds to Hovhannessian 1980, 21,159–22,188.

that the knowledge which man possessed beforehand is in fact only to be understood as a disposition towards knowing good and evil; this innate faculty to discriminate had first to be aroused to activity through God's commandment. Man does not gain knowledge by eating of the Tree, but by trying to keep the commandment. The similarity to Titus lies of course in the fact that both bishops claim that man already had cognition, before he ate as well as in the fact that they both argue for this view by referring to the fact that the commandment must have been given to an apprehending creature, and that they furthermore both perceive the commandment as a form of training and as a realisation of dormant knowledge; both moreover claim that the Tree of Knowledge acquired its name from this exercise.²⁵

Eusebius of Emesa thus introduces the $\phi\theta\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma$ -motif in connection with the prohibition, but like Titus he also knows it in connection with man's banishment from the Tree of Life (Gen. 3.22–23), where Eusebius relates the motif to unnamed heretics,²⁶ who could be, for ²⁵ In In Oct. in the Armenian version it is also mentioned in other places that the knowledge was not in the Tree, and it is even stated in passage, on Gen. 3.5 that the opposite view was the Devil's temptation: "Par conséquent, ce n'est pas dans la nature de l'arbre que la connaissance se trouvait, mais Satan disait qu'elle se trouvait là et il promettait que la nourriture du fruit leur donnerait la connaissance. Aussi, lorsqu'ils avaient mangé, ne savaient-ils rien de plus que ce qu'ils savaient auparavant. Qu'est-ce qu'ils savaient auparavant? (Ils savaient) que s'ils mangeaient, ils deviendraient mortels." (Hovhannessian 1980, 31; Van Rompay and Weitenberg's translation). Thus Eusebius would not have been able to join the compromise that Titus accepts in Contra Manich. III.29, namely that the Tree could perhaps increase the knowledge that man already possessed. Altogether Eusebius of Emesa apparently prefers to argue that man's dormant ethical knowledge once and for all was made complete by God's commandment. He therefore also rejects an increase of knowledge through the act of disobedience; the serpent's word in Gen. 3.5 that their eyes would be opened he would simply not have understood literally, as can be seen from the Armenian version of In Oct. on Gen. 3.5, Hovhannessian 1980, 29, in Van Rompay and Weitenberg's translation: "Est-ce que peut-être (ceux-ci) étaient fermés? Mais il désigne les yeux de l'esprit." However, according to Eusebius, this was only the Devil's deception: he promised man a knowledge that man was already in possession of; this is clear from a passage a little later in In Oct., Hovhannessian 1980, 31, in Van Rompay and Weitenberg's translation: "Est-ce que peut-être (ceux-ci) étaient fermés? Mais il parle du fait que des (êtres) doués de connaissance seraient amenés à la connaissance." When Gen. 3.7 actually speaks of the eyes being opened, it does not mean that the Devil's words were confirmed; in Gen. 3.7 it is not a question of the knowledge of good and evil, but instead only of knowledge of nakedness (Hovhannessian 1980, 31–32, Van Rompay and Weitenberg's translation).

²⁶ In Van Rompay and Weitenberg's translation (the Armenian version of Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 3.22, Hovhannessian 1980, 34): "Les hérétiques critiquent example, Manichaeans. Eusebius of Emesa's answer in its entirety is only preserved in the Armenian version, the introduction to which states that since the Fall meant that man sank into a mortal nature, God did not wish that with this nature man should live for ever, nor that sin should be rewarded. The continuation is also preserved in Greek, where it forms the second part of a composite fragment, the first part of which cannot come from Eusebius, even though it too employs the φθόνος-motif.²⁷ In the present context it is Eusebius of Emesa's part that is of course the most important:

Since he has now sinned once and for all, (God) does not want him to remain in the eternal life, in order that he does not in other circumstances too find the Devil trustworthy and God jealous (βάσκανος). For in that way he would also regard himself as God. But now he believed God, who said, "You shall surely die", and he understood that he was weak by nature, but appreciated by God's love of man.²⁸

The central question, however, must be how Eusebius of Emesa perceived Adam and Eve's status before the Fall. Here there is help from the commentary on Gen. 2.25, which is also preserved in Procopius of Gaza. Eusebius explains Adam and Eve's lack of shame over their nakedness by arguing that because they were immortal, they did not sense their own nakedness and therefore had no need of clothing. This state can be compared with the resurrection, where again there will be no need for garments, because the resurrected will be clothed in incorruptibility (cf. 1 Cor. 15.53). Their nature was changed to a mortal nature, and their immortal way of thinking (φρόνημα) was changed so that they felt their nakedness and had to live in shame. But this leads to a new problem. If Adam and Eve ce qu'il dit: 'Expulsons Adam du jardin, de peur qu'il n'étende sa main, prenne de l'arbre de vie, mange et vive pour l'éternité.' Par ceci ils représentent le Dieu de l'Ancien Testament (comme) jaloux, comme s'Il avait empêché l'homme de vivre pour toujours." Cf. Romeny 1997a, 15, 18 with n. 57, 215–16.

²⁷ The first part of the fragment (Petit 1991, 289–90 no. 450.1–9) says that the word of God in Gen. 3.22 was not spoken in jealousy (φθονῶν), and instead explains God's motive with the aid of the remelting metaphor, which illustrates the idea of death as purification (cf. above pp. 355–57).

²⁸ Νῦν δὲ ἀπαξ ἁμαρτόντα, οὐ βούλεται μένειν ἐν αἰδίῳ ζωῇ, μὴ πρὸς τοῖς ἄλλοις, καὶ πιστὸν ἡγήσῃται τὸν διάβολον καὶ βάσκανον τὸν θεόν. Οὕτω γὰρ ἂν καὶ θεὸν ἐνόμισεν ἑαυτὸν· νῦν δὲ ἐπίστευσε τῷ θεῷ τῷ Θανάτῳ ἀποθανεῖσθε εἰπόντι, καὶ ἑαυτὸν ἔγνω ὡς φύσει μὲν ἀσθενής, τιμηθεὶς δὲ φιλανθρωπία θεοῦ., Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 3.22 in Petit 1991, 289–90 no. 450.10–15; the same text in Hovhannessian 1980, 34,579–35,588.

were incorruptible, they had no need of food, yet God nevertheless actually gave them food (cf. Gen. 2.16). Eusebius's explanation is that God gave the food beforehand, and that it was partly because of the commandment and the reward that follows from its observance, and partly because God knew beforehand the change in their free will and their nature. Thereafter Eusebius states that the food which they had no need of was given beforehand for the purpose of examination/test (δοκιμασία),²⁹ which presumably refers to the test of whether man would refrain from eating of the Tree of Knowledge.

This fragment shows both the distance to Titus and the closeness. Both writers reject, in contrast to Eusebius of Caesarea, the claim that Adam and Eve did not have bodies of flesh, and in my view Titus also believes that Adam and Eve were indifferent to their nakedness; but in Titus there can be no question of the first humans being immortal and incorruptible. Their nature was thus not changed by their transgression; on the contrary, the institution of death was a realisation of their nature and destiny. This means that unlike Titus Eusebius of Emesa maintains the catastrophic nature of the transgression.³⁰ There is otherwise nothing in the fragment to suggest that Eusebius of Emesa finds a beneficial purpose in the transgression. Admittedly, more or less like Titus, he believes that God anticipated the transgression and therefore prepared for the situation afterwards by giving food to the first humans, but there is nothing to suggest that he also drew the conclusion that the intention was that they should violate the commandment. Although Eusebius of Emesa is well aware of the general interest in the Early Church in maintaining God's immutability and impassibility, unlike Titus this interest is not allowed to have a reforming effect on his interpretation of the Paradise narrative.³¹

²⁹ Eusebius of Emesa's In Oct. on Gen. 2.25 in Procopius of Gaza, In Gen., PG 87,1, 177C8–180A8, which, as Petit (1991, 216, n. to no. 318) points out, corresponds to Hovhannessian 1980, 24,252–25,291. Petit believes that the same view is expressed in another fragment (Petit 1991, 216 no. 318 on Gen. 3.1 [2.25]) which cannot be identified, but which claims that because Adam and Eve in the Garden of Paradise were held fast by grace, they did not have the passions of mortal nature, since they had not yet become mortal.

³⁰ Further light is shed on Eusebius of Emesa's view in this area by other fragments from In Oct. on Gen. 3.21, compiled as Fr. IX in Romeny 1997a, 211–18.

³¹ Among the anti-heretical problems in Eusebius of Emesa's In Oct. Romeny (1997a, 18) mentions polemic against the views that God was not omniscient, or that God should repent, but these problems are not applied to the Paradise narrative, cf. above pp. 337–38.

Pointing in the same direction is a further passage in which Eusebius allows that although it was the Devil who spoke through the mouth of the serpent, the Devil did not have the power to transform the serpent's nature and give it the power of speech. This was reserved for God, who both allowed the Devil to tempt the first human couple and opened the serpent's mouth so that the Devil could use it. The reason was that God is "He who through the free choice procures garlands for the champions" (ὁ διὰ τοῦ αὐτεξουσίου στεφάνους παρασκευάζων τοῖς ἀθληταῖς), i.e. God will test Adam and Eve and give them the opportunity to gain honour for themselves through virtuously resisting the temptation. The same was indeed later the case when God allowed the Devil to test Job. However, God anticipated that Adam would desire to become God, and He therefore threatened him with death and blamed him afterwards.³² The passage seems to show that Eusebius believes it to be a real possibility that Adam and Eve could have resisted the temptation, and there is nothing to suggest that he follows Titus in believing that genuine disobedience experiences were necessary for man's moral progress.³³

Finally this interpretation appears to be confirmed by a passage in Eusebius of Emesa that is concerned with both Gen. 3.5 and 3.22. Here Eusebius explains that the word of God concerning man, who "has become like one of us", actually means that man did not become so; the remark is ironical.³⁴ In this context it is of less significance that at this juncture Eusebius chooses a solution that is ³² Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 3.1 in Petit 1991, 217–18 no. 320; quote from lines 14–15, corresponding to Hovhannessian 1980, 25,292–28,384. The passage is also found in Procopius of Gaza, In Gen. PG 87,1, 180C2–181B3.

³³ That Eusebius did not believe that disobedience experiences were necessary for man's moral progress also appears from a passage on Gen. 3.5 in the Armenian version of In Oct. Hovhannessian 1980, 29–30, where in Van Rompay and Weitenberg's translation we read: "Mais Dieu avait préparé pour eux par le commandement la connaissance du bien et du mal: la possession de la connaissance du mal, mais l'exécution de la pratique du bien. C'est cela que je (veux) dire: par la promulgation du commandement (Dieu) enseigna qu'il était mauvais de désobéir et que l'obéissance était bonne. Il prescrivit et proposa de goûter la pratique (du bien) en même temps que la connaissance du bien et de connaître seulement la pratique du mal, et de bénéficier sous deux aspects, de la pratique du bien—je veux dire l'obéissance—et de s'abstenir de ce qui y est opposé." According to God's plans there was apparently sufficient knowledge of the evil in the actual commandment, so that only the good needed to be realised in practice. The evil was not to be enjoyed or realised.

³⁴ Cf. also Romeny 1997a, 209.

different from the one we met in Titus (namely that the reference is to man's fundamental nature).³⁵ What is important is that on this occasion man acquired his mortal nature, even though it had for him become possible to become immortal provided that he continued to keep God's commandment: but man fell from immortality.³⁶

Everything thus favours the assumption that Eusebius of Emesa did not regard Adam and Eve's disobedience as either beneficial or necessary; that is why it involved a change of their nature from immortality to mortality. The idea of such a change means beyond doubt that Eusebius also considered death to be a punishment.³⁷ But this of course does not exclude the possibility that Eusebius may have interpreted the punishment of death to mean that it also acquired an aspect of benefit, and indeed this is precisely the case. Though I have not found any statement to suggest that Eusebius saw death as purifying, it is clear enough from the above quoted fragment no. 450 to Gen. 3.22 that he believed that Adam received death in order for him not to sin for all eternity, or more precisely, to continue to trust the Devil and believe God to be jealous; perhaps it is precisely this that Eusebius regards as God's φιλανθρωπία. Yet another fragment appears to contain the idea that man should not sin for ever, even though Eusebius here stays fairly close to, and paraphrases, the text of the Bible.³⁸

³⁵ Cf. above pp. 323–24—What is in focus in Eusebius of Emesa's interpretation is the dangerous claim that man should have become like God. Titus focuses instead on another dangerous problem, namely that apparently man was created without ethical knowledge.

³⁶ Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 3.5 (Fr. VIII in Romeny 1997a, 206–10), which in the Armenian version appears in Hovhannessian 1980, 32,513–33,548, though small fragments of the original text are also to be found in among others Petit 1991, 288–89 no. 449, lines 15–16 and Petit 1991, 290–91 no. 452, lines 1–2 (Romeny 1997a, 206–8). Cf. concerning Fr. VIII also Romeny 1997a, 74, 80, 81; Lehmann 1986, 224–25.—That the disobedience in the Garden of Paradise resulted according to Eusebius of Emesa in a truly catastrophic Fall also clearly appears from many passages in In Oct. which are preserved in the Armenian version, e.g. Hovhannessian 1980, 30.

³⁷ Cf. Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 3.24 (Petit 1991, 299–300 no. 466): Neighbourship to Paradise was granted Adam (Gen. 3.24) by way of punishment, in order that when he saw Paradise, the flaming sword and the cherub, he could remember his banishment and strengthen his sons.

³⁸ I refer here to the remarks in lines 3–7 in Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 2.9, Petit 1991, 169–70 (no. 241) (Hovhannessian 1980, 19–20): "Ὅτι μὲν οὖν τῷ ἔσθλῳ τῆς ζωῆς ἐνέκειτο ἀθανατίζειν φυσικῶς τὸν ἐσθίοντα, δηλοῖ τὸ ἐκβληθῆναι τὸν Ἀδὰμ παραβάντα τὴν ἐντολήν, ἵνα μὴ τοῦτου φαγῶν ζῆσεται εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα· οὐ γὰρ περὶ τοῦ ζῆν ἀπλῶς λέγει—ἔξω γὰρ καὶ μὴ φαγόντες—, ἀλλὰ περὶ ἀθανασίας.

In spite of all this, however, it is probable that Eusebius of Emesa believed that man himself of his own accord should overcome the consequences of the catastrophe, i.e. himself come to act righteously and thus regain immortality as an assured reward after death. Of particular power therefore is a passage to which Romeny refers, in which Eusebius of Emesa rejects the argument that the righteous can inherit the curse of their fathers; sin and justice are individual qualities.³⁹ To some extent this position, which sits somewhat uneasily with the understanding of the first disobedience as a catastrophic Fall, corresponds better to what we have found in Titus of Bostra.

4. Comparison with Diodore of Tarsus's interpretation of the Paradise narrative

I have discussed above how Eusebius of Emesa's pupil, Diodore of Tarsus, in a lengthy work directed an attack on the Manichaean Adda's book, The Bushel, and that the last 18 books of Diodore's work dealt with the interpretation of the Bible. It would therefore be reasonable to expect to find an attack on Adda in the fragments of Diodore's Commentarius in Octateuchum, but this expectation may be premature. We have no firm evidence whatsoever on which to date Diodore's anti-Manichaean work, and it could in fact be decades after Commentarius in Octateuchum. Diodore may therefore have had no inkling of Adda's book, when he wrote Commentarius in Octateuchum.

On the one hand a fragment of Diodore's Commentarius in Octateuchum shows that his doctrine of the image of God continues Eusebius of Caesarea and Eusebius of Emesa's apparent concentration on man's ruling function, but on the other hand it also appears that Diodore is moving in new directions; the image of God is not so much located within the soul as such, but is more to be found in man's position as ruler, τὸ ἀρχικόν . . . τὸ ἐξουσιαστικόν, together with the idea that the image of God is reserved for the male sex.⁴⁰ Thus Diodore's doctrine of the image of God in man does not immediately appear to imply an innate law; but if we turn to the fragments of his commentary on Rom., Diodore at the least states, with reference to Rom. 2.14, that man has within himself the faculty to discriminate (τὸ διακριτικόν), which the law completes.⁴¹ The “inner” character of the law also appears in another way in a fragment from Commentarius in Octateuchum where Diodore claims among other things that God did not give Adam the commandment not to eat of the Tree of Knowledge with a sensuous voice, but in keeping with His particular influence imprinted (ἐντυπῶ) both cognition of the law and obedience (ἀκοή) in him.⁴²

³⁹ Eusebius of Emesa, In Oct. on Gen. 15.8 (Petit 1995, 48–49 [no. 952] and 50–51 [no. 954]; Hovhannessian 58,260–59,303; Procopius of Gaza, In Gen., PG 87,1, 337D5–340B11); Romeny 1997a, 17–18 with n. 54, which also refers to other passages that point in this direction.

⁴⁰ Diodore, In Oct. on Gen. 1.26 (Petit 1986, 67–68 [no. 70]). cf. Schäublin 1974, 46–47; McLeod 1999, 58–59.

Presumably Diodore of Tarsus is building on Eusebius of Emesa when by way of introduction in a fragment commenting on Gen. 3.7 he explains that on the basis of this scriptural passage “some of the heretics” say that the serpent was a benefactor (εὐεργέτης) in getting Adam and Eve to eat of the Tree, because this led to the eyes of thought (διάνοια) being opened, and to man being imbued with knowledge of good and evil. These heretics are slandering God and praising the Devil, for they say that the serpent gave Adam and Eve a share in the things that God “begrudged them” (αὐτοῖς ἐφθόνησεν).⁴³—There are several similarities between this fragment and the passage in Titus’s Contra Manichaeos III.7, for even though the Manichaean quotation in Titus does not draw directly on the φθόνος-motif in connection with the Tree of Knowledge, but only with the Tree of Life, this line of thought is presumably to be understood, and a spiritualisation of the eyes that were opened is also without doubt what the text in Titus is speaking of (→ Ch. XI.34), even though Titus later brings a distorting interpretation.⁴⁴ The heretics in question in Diodore could therefore well be the Manichaeans. Both Petit and Schweizer, however, refer to the Ophites, even though Schweizer is also aware that the Manichaeans are a possibility.⁴⁵ Perhaps Diodore is quite simply referring to all the heretical groups

⁴¹ Diodore, In Rom. 7.7, Staab 1933, 87.5–20; cf. Schelkle 1959, 233.

⁴² Diodore, In Oct. on Gen. 3.1 (Petit 1986, 107–9 [no. 106]).

⁴³ Diodore, In Oct. on Gen. 3.7, Petit 1986, 113–15 no. 109 (109.1–8). However, a further decision on whether Diodore’s In Oct. on this point really builds on Eusebius of Emesa’s In Oct. requires a thorough comparison with the Armenian version of the latter text.

⁴⁴ See above p. 241.

⁴⁵ Schweizer 1942, 51 n. 109 believes that αἰρετικοί here must mean the Ophites; he refers to Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I.30,7, but remarks with reference to the myth in that were presenting “protest-exegetical” interpretations, including the Ophites and the Manichaeans.

However, Diodore rejects the heretics’ interpretation with the justification that it was not good that the eyes were opened, for it gave Adam and Eve the knowledge that they were naked and led to them being ashamed of what they had done. The disobedience changed the nature of the first human couple, so that they became mortal, as God had threatened, but together with their nature other things were also changed that were to do with their way of thinking. Before Adam and Eve became disobedient, although they had bodies they did not sense that they were naked, since immortal beings have no need of clothing. Correspondingly the resurrected beings in the Kingdom of God will have no desire for marriage, food, heat and cold, clothing and nakedness etc., all of which belong to the mortal body. With the change in their nature, however, Adam and Eve plunged into mortality.⁴⁶

This fragment shows first and foremost how Diodore’s ideas on the primeval state and the Fall continue those of Eusebius of Emesa; like him there is no positive content in the disobedience and opening of man’s eyes, and it is here that the distance to Titus clearly reveals itself. Finally it may be mentioned that as in Eusebius of Emesa God’s immutability and impassibility are an important doctrine in Diodore, who stresses that God has no passions—for instance He neither repents in a real sense⁴⁷ nor is He ignorant,⁴⁸—but who does not in the preserved fragments connect this problem to the Paradise narrative.

As long as one bases the interpretation on the fragments of Diodore’s work to which I have hitherto referred, Gross seems right in point-

Theodore bar Kōnai (see above pp. 237–38) that perhaps the reference is to “die manichäische Weiterbildung”. Petit 1986, 115 (no. 109), note (a) suggests that the sect is the one mentioned in Procopius of Gaza’s In Gen., PG 87,1, 184A10–12: ἐξ οὗ καὶ ἡ τῶν Ὀφιανῶν συνέστηκεν αἴρεσις, θεοποιούντων τὸν ὄφιν, ὡς ἂν ἀγαθόν τι προξενεῖν ἡμῖν ἐθέλησαντα.—Kamesar (1993, 160) also favours the Ophites.

⁴⁶ Diodore, In Oct. on Gen. 3.7, Petit 1986, 113–15 no. 109.—In In Oct. on Gen. 3.21 (Petit 1986, 120–21 no. 118; cf. Romeny 1997a, 212–13) Diodore rejects the idea that the “coats of skin” should mean the flesh; he believes instead that they were created by God after Adam had received his mortal nature.

⁴⁷ Diodore, In Oct. on Gen. 6.6 in Petit 1986, 145–47 no. 145; cf. Schweizer 1942, 57.

⁴⁸ Diodore, In Oct. on Gen. 22.11–12 in Petit 1986, 199–200 no. 204, line 8ff., cf. Schweizer 1942, 57.

ing out that Diodore argued for an original immortal nature which through the disobedience was changed into a mortal one, and that herein lies the crucial difference between Diodore and his pupil Theodore.⁴⁹ The problem may change tack, however, if a fragment that Gross refers to Theodore in fact turns out to come from Diodore.

5. Problems concerning Coisliniana, fragment no. 115

Of particular importance but also problematic is the fragment Coisliniana no. 115 (Petit's numbering) (Csl. 115) on the following point; the tradition refers it both to Diodore and to Theodore, but in several works, including Gross's, it has acquired without detailed discussion great importance for an understanding of Theodore's theology. The interpretation of either Diodore's or Theodore's views is dramatically changed when the fragment is attributed to one or the other. By way of introduction I append a translation of the long fragment:

Because I have heard some ask the question, "If God knew beforehand that Adam would disobey, why did He then give him an occasion to be disobedient by presenting him with the commandment?" I will answer that it was because God definitely knew that mortality would be profitable for men—for if they remained immortal, they would sin for all eternity—and moreover it would profit them in that when the body is dissolved in death, the body of sin is also dissolved together with it. However, God did not immediately give them this advantage, lest He be accused of not having given man immortality from the beginning. But first He gave them the commandment, which He knew they would not keep, in order to show that even though He offered them immortality by being obedient and threatened them with death for disobedience, they would distrust their Creator and benefactor to such a degree that they would not only hope to acquire immortality if they were disobedient, but would actually hope to receive the worthiness of the divinity. If their flesh had received immortality, how much the more should they not have believed that they would become gods through disobedience? For since the threat of death was not enough to make them keep the commandment, the secure possession of immortality would definitely have led to overboldness and perseverance in sinning, since the certainty of immortality would have encouraged them. First therefore God showed, by giving Adam the commandment and through his disobedience, that mortality is advantageous, and then He gave it to him, thus at one and the same time teaching men and not withholding the things that were to their advantage. For the very forming of man into the male and the female, which indeed shows that the procreation of children was potentially present from the very beginning (cf. Gen. 1.26–27), makes it clear that God had prepared man for mortal life. Thus the creation of man made ready for a mortal life, but the commandment which God granted trained beforehand man's freedom of choice and gave his power of judgement an opportunity for self-chosen struggles and showed the advantage of mortality.⁵⁰

⁴⁹ Compare the Diodore interpretation in Gross 1960, 179–81 with the Theodore interpretation in Gross 1960, 190–205.

The tradition is divided here, because some manuscripts assign this fragment to Diodore and others to Theodore; in Migne, PG 66 it is published under Theodore's name, while Deconinck published it among the doubtful Diodore fragments, and thus the superscription is "Διοδώρου (?)" in Petit's edition; she indicates which manuscripts support each of the two readings, and she adds "La tradition manuscrite hésite entre Διοδώρου et Θεοδώρου. L'accord des traditions C et Mo soutient l'attribution à Diodore, mais l'argument n'est pas décisif."⁵¹

⁵⁰ Ἐπειδή τινων ἀκήκοα πυνθανομένων· εἰ προῆδει ὁ θεὸς ὅτι παρακούσει ὁ Ἀδάμ, τίνος ἔνεκεν τῇ δόσει τῆς ἐντολῆς παρέσχε τῇ παρακοῇ πρόφασιν; τοσοῦτον ἔρω, ὅτι μάλα εἰδῶς ὁ θεὸς συμφέρουσιν ἀνθρώποις τὴν θνητότητα—μένοντες γὰρ ἀθάνατοι, πταίσουσιν ἀθάνατα—, καὶ ὅτι λυσιτελεῖ τοῖς τοιοῦτοις, θανάτῳ λυομένου τοῦ σώματος, συγκαταλυθῆναι καὶ τὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, οὐκ εὐθὺς ἔδωκε τὸ συμφέρον, ἵνα μὴ βλασφημῆται ὡς μὴ δεδωκὸς ἐξ ἀρχῆς τὴν ἀθανασίαν· ἀλλὰ πρότερον δίδωσι τὴν ἐντολήν, ἧς οὐκ ἀνεξομῆτους ἦδει, ἵνα δεῖξῃ ὅτι εἰ καὶ προτεινομένης αὐτοῖς ἀθανασίας ἀπὸ τῆς ὑπακοῆς, καὶ θανάτου ἀπειλουμένης διὰ τὴν παρακοήν, τοσοῦτον ἠπίστησαν τῷ ποιητῇ καὶ εὐεργέτῃ, ὡς ἐλπῖσαι εἰ παρακούσειαν, οὐ μόνον τὴν ἀθανασίαν ἔξιν ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ τῆς θεότητος ἀξίωμα προσλήψασθαι. Εἰ καὶ ἡ σὰρξ αὐτοῖς εἰλήφει τὴν ἀθανασίαν, πῶς οὐ μᾶλλον ἂν ἐπέστησαν εἶναι θεοὶ διὰ τῆς παρακοῆς; Οἷς γὰρ οὐκ ἤρκεσαν ἀπειλὴ θανάτου εἰς τὴν φυλακὴν τῆς ἐντολῆς, τὸ τῆς ἀθανασίας βέβαιον πάντως ἂν ἀδεῖς εἰς τὸ πταίειν ἦν καὶ διηνεκές, τῷ τῆς ἀθανασίας ἀσφαλεῖ τεθαρρηκόσιν. Πρῶτον οὖν δείκνυσσι τῇ δόσει τῆς ἐντολῆς καὶ διὰ τῆς παρακοῆς τῶν περὶ τὸν Ἀδάμ, ὅτι συμφέροι ἢ θνητότης, καὶ τότε ταύτην δίδωσιν, ὁμοῦ καὶ πείθων ἀνθρώπους καὶ τῶν συμφερόντων οὐκ ἀφιστάμενος. Ὅτι γὰρ τῷ θνητῷ βίῳ τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἠτρέπιζεν, αὐτὸ τὸ σχῆμα τοῦ ἄρρενος καὶ τοῦ θήλεος δείκνυσιν, ἐν τῇ δυνάμει τὴν παιδοποιεῖαν εὐθὺς καὶ ἐκ πρώτης ἐπιδεικνύμενον. Ὡστε ἡ μὲν πλάσις ἠτοιμάσθη τῷ θνητῷ βίῳ· ἡ δὲ τῆς ἐντολῆς δόσις, καὶ τὸ αὐτεξούσιον προεγύμνασεν, καὶ ἔδωκε τῇ γνώμῃ τῶν ἀυθαιρέτων ἀγόνων τὴν πρόφασιν, καὶ τὸ τῆς θνητότητος συμφέρον ἔδειξεν., on Gen. 2.16–17 and 3.1–7: Petit 1986, 118–19 (no. 115); also published in PG 66, 640C–641A and Deconinck 1912, 159–60 (Fr. 79).

⁵¹ Petit 1986, 118, 119.—Perhaps also relevant in this context is the argument of Schweizer (1942, 38) in connection with the catenae on Paul, which are attributed

Earlier the fragment was without further discussion part of the basis for descriptions of Theodore's theology.⁵² Without assigning it to Diodore, however, Devreesse in his book on Theodore tried in a somewhat unclear manner to weaken its authenticity by merely writing: "Mais une objection se présente: Si Dieu savait qu'Adam violerait sa défense, pourquoi lui a-t-il donné l'occasion de pécher? La réponse de Théodore nous manque".⁵³ Devreesse's laconic remarks are peculiar, because the fragment actually contains a comprehensive answer and they should be interpreted to mean that he did not think the answer was authentic, presumably because he compared it with the view of Adam's primeval state which he believed he could conclude from some passages in Theodore's commentary to the Pauline epistles: "créé immortel, Adam est devenu mortel par suite de son péché."⁵⁴ On the other hand, in a later work Devreesse was inclined to believe the entire fragment to be a genuine Diodore fragment, but without referring to or clarifying his earlier remarks.⁵⁵ With regard to method it must also be said to be arbitrary to acknowledge that the question is genuine but not the answer: either Csl. 115 comes in its entirety from Theodore, or the fragment in its entirety must be rejected.

However, Devreesse's remarks on Theodore's view of Adam's primeval state met with a vehement protest from Gross, who in connection with Csl. 115 claimed that the "answer" was also without doubt genuine, since it contains by and large the same views as in Theodore's Commentarius in Epistulam ad Galatas. Here Gross referred to certain passages where the views are undeniably cognate to the to both Theodore and Diodore: "Da Diodors Schriften leichter seinem berühmten Schüler unterschoben werden konnten als umgekehrt, ist sein Name außerdem lectio difficilior."

⁵² E.g. Jugie 1933, 353–56.

⁵³ Devreesse 1948, 22; in n. 2 Devreesse adds: "Les chaînes ne donnent que la question: Nicéphore, 98 [P. G., 640 C-641 A]; Barb., ff. 70–71, sous le nom de Diodore." Devreesse would also locate various other Theodore-fragments in this context, see below pp. 385–86.

⁵⁴ Devreesse 1948, 98.

⁵⁵ Devreesse 1959, 156. In his earlier work Devreesse (1936, 218) also stated: "je pencherais très volontiers vers une restitution à Diodore." However, elsewhere in the same work (1936, 380) he locates no. 115 under Theodore without saying anything like "the answer is missing", which he later stated was the case in his book on Theodore (Devreesse 1948).—Also Schweizer (1942, 38 n. 8 [cont. from 37]) regarded it as probable that Csl. 115 was a genuine Diodore-fragment, and he used it to illuminate Diodore's theology (e.g. Schweizer 1942, 58 n. 216).

present fragment in that they claim that from the beginning God created us mortal out of regard for this existence.⁵⁶ Apparently, though, Gross was unaware of the possibility that Csl. 115 could be the work of Diodore, and that the similarities between it and the passages in Theodore that he himself adduced could also be explained by Theodore building on tendencies in his teacher. In continuation of Gross, Norris also regarded Csl. 115 as a genuine Theodore fragment and gave it considerable space in his interpretation of Theodore's theology,⁵⁷ as did Dewart⁵⁸ and Scheffczyk.⁵⁹

An examination of the problem must pursue the following path: first one must point out the formal and stylistic features that could assign Csl. 115 to Theodore and Diodore respectively. Since I then take for granted that theologically speaking Csl. 115 could come from Theodore, the question arises as to whether it would be theologically impossible for it to come from Diodore.

In favour of Theodore's authorship is the similarity with the fragments of Theodore's Commentarius in Genesim which are preserved in Pope Vigilius's Constitutum de tribus capitulis and in the acts of the Concilium Universale Constantinopolitanum sub Iustiniano habitum, the fifth ecumenical synod in Constantinople in 553 CE.⁶⁰ Devreesse also ⁵⁶ Gross 1960, 192–93; however, the difference, which Gross did not stress, is precisely that Csl. 115 actually claims that Adam was originally created immortal, even though immortality was not a secure possession. But also Theodore, as we shall see, is ambiguous on this point, and Gross proved beyond doubt that no theological grounds exist for rejecting the possibility that Csl. 115 could stem from Theodore.

⁵⁷ Norris 1963, 182–84.—Koch (1965, 70) creates confusion by claiming that Csl. 115 comes from the acts of the fifth ecumenical synod in Constantinople in 553.

⁵⁸ Dewart 1971, 38–39.

⁵⁹ Scheffczyk 1982, 172.

⁶⁰ Vigilius, Constitutum, ep. 83: Ch. LVIII, Guenther 1895, 283–84 (191–92); Ch. LIX, Guenther 1895, 284 (195); Ch. LX, Guenther 1895, 285 (197–98). Concil. Univ. Const., Actio quarta in Straub 1970, 64–66; the passages in question are LVII,66–LXII,71, where LVII,66–LVIII,67 and LX,69 directly state that the quotations are taken from the book De creatura, and where the other fragments are placed in such a context that it is clear that they come from the same text. The passages LVIII,68; LX,69 and LXII,71 also appear only in the acts of the synod.—Devreesse (1930, 366–67) also assumed that the last part of LXII,71 had been forged by Theodore's opponents, but later on he apparently gave up this assumption (Devreesse 1948, 23 n. 4 [cont. on p. 24]), and after the publication of new Syriac fragments of Theodore's In Gen., which among others contain the same text as the whole of LXII,71 (Tonneau 1953, 63), the authenticity of the passage is raised beyond all doubt (see further Sullivan 1956, 102–3). In my opinion this fact increases the probability that all quotations of acts of the synod from Theodore's assumed that the first five fragments of the acts of the synod had had their place in Theodore's Commentarius in Genesim shortly after Csl. 115, or rather the "preserved" question in Csl. 115.⁶¹ From a theological point of view these fragments could agree with Csl. 115, but there are also interesting similarities in language and argument between Csl. 115 and the first of the fragments in the acts of the synod, which I therefore quote:

It was therefore not involuntarily and without premeditation that God instituted death for men, nor was it in vain that He gave them access to sin,—for if He had not wished to, He would not have needed to do so. But because God knew that it was of benefit to us and even more so for all rational creatures [i.e. angels and suchlike] that He first allowed an access to evil and wicked things, but then destroyed them and introduced something better, He has divided the Creation into two states, a present and a future. In the (future) state He will lead all to immortality and immutability, but for the time being in the present Creation He sends us away to death and mutability. For if from the very beginning He had made us immortal and immutable, we would not have been different from the irrational creatures [i.e. the animals], in that we would have been ignorant of our own particular benefit. For since we did not know mutability, we did not know the benefit of immutability; since we were ignorant of death, we were ignorant of the advantage of being immortal; since we did not know corruptibility, we did not praise incorruptibility; since we were ignorant of the trouble with the passions, we did not admire impassibility. In brief, for I will not make a long speech: since we were ignorant of any experience of evil things, we could not acquire knowledge of the aforementioned good things.⁶²

In Gen. are genuine, and make it unlikely that they should have been taken from another work than In Gen. (the possibility is mentioned in Amann 1946, 271); cf. also the title De creatura with the title of Theodore's commentary in Photius, Bibl., cod. 38 (8a15) (Henry 1959, 23): ἐρμηνεία τῆς κτίσεως.

⁶¹ Devreesse 1948, 22 n. 2; Devreesse 1948, 22 with n. 3 would also place another fragment which is now edited as no. 418 in Petit 1991, 273 in this context. Cf. Devreesse 1936, 380.

⁶² "Nec igitur mortem non sponte et praeter iudicium suum intulit hominibus neque peccato aditum ad nullam utilitatem dedit, (nec enim hoc fieri nolens non poterat), sed quoniam sciebat utile esse nobis, magis autem omnibus rationabilibus, prius quidem malorum et deteriorum fieri aditum, postea autem deleri quidem haec, introduci autem meliora, ideo in duos status diuisit deus creaturam, praesentem et futurum, in illo quidem ad immortalitatem et immutabilitatem omnia ducturus, in praesenti uero creatura in mortem et mutabilitatem interim nos dimittens. nam si quidem statim ab initio immortales nos fecerit et inmutabiles, nullam differentiam ad irrationabilia haberemus, proprium nescientes bonum; ignorantes enim mutabilitatem immutabilitatis ignorabamus bonum, nescientes mortem immortalitatis lucrum

The introductory “igitur”, “therefore” (Straub 1970, 64.25), could refer to a preceding account, and this could very well be Csl. 115, which can indeed be said to claim that God did not institute death involuntarily and without premeditation. The two fragments also share a number of phrases: παρέσχε τῇ παρακοῇ πρόφασιν (Petit 1986, 118, no. 115.4) is reminiscent of “peccato aditum . . . dedit” (Straub 1970, 64.26); συμφέρουσαν, συμφέρει, τῶν συμφερόντων, συμφέρον (Petit 1986, 118–119, no. 115.5.22.24.31) recalls “utilitatem” (Straub 1970, 64.26) (there is also a similarity between Csl. 115 and another fragment of Theodore’s Commentarius in Genesim, where Csl. 115 says that God offered immortality through obedience and threatened man with death because of disobedience, and the fragment on Gen. 3.5, which has God making use of ἐπαγγελία καὶ φόβος,⁶³ though here the similarity is very general).

But there is no absolute compulsion in these arguments, and in my opinion equally good stylistic arguments could be put forward for Csl. 115 being by Diodore. In favour of this is the formulation of a question or problem followed by an answer, a similar structure to most of the other fragments of Diodore’s Commentarius in Octateuchum, which appear to belong to the quaestiones-genre.⁶⁴ But one could then ask, is Csl. 115 not in direct conflict with Diodore’s theology as we know it from the other fragments of Commentarius in Octateuchum?

There is in fact the difference between Csl. 115 and the first fragment of Theodore’s Commentarius in Genesim preserved in the acts of the synod that Csl. 115 believes precisely in Adam’s immortal primeval state. Adam was immortal, but immortality was something that could nesciebamus, ignorantes corruptionem non laudabamus incorruptionem, nescientes passionum grauamen impassibilitatem non mirabamur. compendiose dicere, ne longum sermonem faciam: nescientes malorum experimentum bonorum illorum non poteramus scientiam mereri.”, Concil. Univ. Const., Actio quarta, No. LVII,66, Straub 1970, 64–65; Vigilius, Constitutum, ep. 83: Ch. LVIII, Guenther 1895, 283–84 (191–92).

⁶³ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 3.5, Petit 1991, 227–28 no. 336.

⁶⁴ Schäublin 1974, 49–65; cf. Schweizer 1942, 51ff.; Viciano 1996, 378; cf. above p. 254, however, Theodore also uses such a form of presentation, e.g. in In Rom.; cf. Wickert 1962, 84–85. The question-answer form is not a compelling argument. The argument that Theodore should have composed commentaries, which in their entirety belonged to the quaestiones-genre, must nevertheless be considered unlikely, despite evidence in Syriac literature that points in this direction, cf. Clarke 1962, 10.—The expression τῶν περὶ τὸν Ἀδάμ (Petit 1986, 119, no. 115.22) is not decisive, since both Diodore (e.g. Petit 1986, 108, no. 106.12) and Theodore (e.g. Petit 1991, 220, no. 322.4–5) can speak of οἱ περὶ τὸν Ἀδάμ.

be lost; by contrast the first fragment seems to assume that God did not make men immortal from the beginning. The difference is not necessarily real, though, for perhaps the immortality that could be lost can from another angle be described as mortality. Moreover, as we shall touch on below, it is well-known that Theodore's authorship on this point contains particularly frictional formulations.

It is indisputable, however, that precisely because Csl. 115 claims original immortality for Adam the fragment at least does not clash with Diodore's view that Adam and Eve were immortal before they became mortal, as we find in the Commentarius in Octateuchum-fragment on Gen. 3.7, though a difficulty remains that this fragment rejects the idea that mortality and the perception of nakedness were beneficial consequences of the disobedience, while Csl. 115 regards mortality as "an advantage" that God has imposed on man. The disparity could be solved to some extent if we assumed that it is not in the same sense that the Commentarius in Octateuchum-fragment on Gen. 3.7 and Csl. 115 regard mortality as being to man's harm or man's benefit respectively. It could make sense that mortality belongs with the disobedience and as such is not good, for neither the Commentarius in Octateuchum-fragment on Gen. 3.7 nor Csl. 115 treat man's disobedience as anything good. Since, however, the disobedience is inevitable, mortality is also beneficial in that it puts a stop to this disobedience.

I have been unable to find arguments sufficiently powerful to be called decisive that Csl. 115 should come from the hand of either Diodore or Theodore. Everything speaks for it probably coming from one or the other of them, and as such it remains an important testimony to the interpretation of the Paradise narrative within the Antiochene School; for this reason it is worth subjecting it to closer analysis and a comparison with Titus.

Fundamentally Csl. 115 differs from Titus's position in not regarding the disobedience as a useful and necessary growth in knowledge, and in this it belongs to the earlier tradition in, for example, Origen.⁶⁵ Nor does Csl. 115 seek to trivialise the act of disobedience in the Garden of Paradise; on the contrary, the fragment blames man's disobedience in strong terms: man did not trust his benefactor's words, but wanted himself to be God!

⁶⁵ See above pp. 336–37.

Csl. 115 begins by raising the good question as to why God gave Adam occasion to sin if He had foreknowledge of his disobedience. This question, which is assigned to an undefined group in the plural, is a new variant on the type of question that we have already seen posited by Marcionites and Manichaeans, and which had its roots in the earlier questions of the Epicureans and the Sceptics.⁶⁶ Csl. 115 takes it for granted that God had this foreknowledge, and the fragment's explanation as to why God nevertheless gave Adam occasion to sin is in the first place that mortality would be profitable to man. For if men had remained immortal, they would have sinned as immortal; in this Csl. 115 is merely continuing the tradition from Philo and Theophilus.⁶⁷ Csl. 115 further claims that mortality is profitable to man, for when the body is dissolved at death, the body of sin is dissolved with it, an argument that we have already met in Theophilus, Irenaeus and Methodius.⁶⁸ It is also sufficiently clear that Csl. 115 alludes to Rom. 6.6, where the body of sin is destroyed through baptism to Christ's death, but that Csl. 115 does not directly refer to death in baptism, but to death as such. However, Csl. 115's observation may perhaps be understood in a wider context, so that death, which is instituted in the Garden of Paradise, receives its real meaning by being linked together with Christ's death and Christian baptism.⁶⁹

So far Csl. 115 has argued, rather traditionally, for mortality being a benefit (though the fragment does not use this term⁷⁰). The reason why God did not give men mortality from the beginning was in order to avoid the accusation of not making man immortal from the beginning, which in reality is the accusation of φθόνος.⁷¹ At first ⁶⁶ See above pp. 216–24.

⁶⁷ See above pp. 355–56.

⁶⁸ See above pp. 355–57.

⁶⁹ In Diodore's interpretation in In Rom. 6.1–4, Staab 1933, 85.11–17 "death" in Rom. 6.1ff. only refers to baptism's sacramental death to sin and the world (cf. Schelkle 1959, 197–98, 201), but probably Diodore could also understand physical death in the light of baptism (especially with a freer application of the passage in a new context)? Interestingly, in Theodore we find the same remelting image as in Theophilus and Methodius (see above pp. 355–57), but there linked to baptism, and at the same time in such a way that baptism and the resurrection on the last day are associated: Theodore, Hom. cat. XIV.13, Tonneau 1949, 428–29. This could of course be an argument in favour of Csl. 115 being by Theodore, but again it is just as possible that Theodore is here continuing an idea from Diodore.

⁷⁰ A little later (Petit 1986, 118 no. 115.14), however Csl. 115 calls God εὐεργέτης.

⁷¹ Like earlier writers such as Origen (see above pp. 337, 360–61) Csl. 115 claims this line of argument does not answer the question asked, but Csl. 115 makes it clear that God did not merely wish to demonstrate His goodness by first creating man immortal; He was in general pursuing an educative purpose throughout the entire scene in the Garden of Paradise. The commandment, the occasion for the sin, was given precisely to demonstrate that man would become a sinner and thus to prove that mortality was not only beneficial but even had, prior to the disobedience and banishment from the garden, the educative value of training man's freedom of choice (τὸ ἀυτεξούσιον) and giving his judgement (γνώμη) occasion for self-chosen contests. In these considerations Csl. 115 comes undeniably close to Titus. For although the fragment argues for an insecure immortality in Paradise and an offer that this immortality could become certain, and although it claims that the disobedience was evil, the primeval state nonetheless loses its meaning of being a state that in reality could have continued everlasting immortality: the purpose of the primeval state becomes a preliminary training in ethical obedience, and man is from the beginning destined for mortality.

The closeness of Titus and Csl. 115 becomes even clearer when we concentrate on the relationship between foreknowledge and mortality. Without a doubt Csl. 115 seeks to maintain that God was not responsible for the actual disobedience and that the punishment of death was therefore effected; for the text stresses that God left the choice to man, and that He had presented him with various consequences of the available choices. God anticipated that man himself would choose to fall, but He had not predestined him to fall. Implicitly this is the same view that we found in Origen and in Diodore's pupil John Chrysostom: it is not God's foreknowledge that is the cause of Adam's Fall, but the Fall that is the cause of God's foreknowledge.⁷² However, in the light of His foreknowledge God that Adam and Eve's original immortality lacked certainty and could be lost: that is why the fragment says that the first couple did not have "the secure possession of immortality" (τὸ τῆς ἀθανασίας βέβαιον, Petit 1986, 118 no. 115.19) and lacked "the certainty of immortality" (τῷ τῆς ἀθανασίας ἀσφαλεῖ, Petit 1986, 118 no. 115.20). Simplifying matters, this can also be expressed in the way that their flesh had not yet received immortality (Petit 1986, 118 no. 115.16), and that immortality was still only something in the future that God had promised them (Petit 1986, 118 no. 115.11–12).

⁷² See above pp. 338–39.

could predetermine man to the mortal state that would be the consequence of his freely choosing disobedience. Correspondingly, in line with the tradition from Origen and general assumptions in contemporary Greek culture Diodore claims in his Commentarius in Epistulam ad Romanos that God's foreknowledge already knows the future virtue and sin but does not revoke man's freedom of choice and that God's blessings and curses are based on this foreknowledge.⁷³ This structure, consisting of foreknowledge of disobedience and predestination to death, corresponds exactly to the structure in Titus, and in addition both Titus and Csl. 115 employ the same argument: just as Titus believes that God's promises in Gen. 1 must have aimed at a broader humanity, but there was first a need for procreation of children in the light of death,⁷⁴ so Csl. 115 claims that already beforehand God had created man in two sexes, because generation was to succeed generation.

In summary we can say that in contrast to Titus Csl. 115 places greater emphasis on the immortal character of the primeval state, censures the disobedience and perhaps makes a reference to baptism. On the other hand Csl. 115 and Titus are agreed that despite His foreknowledge God cannot be held responsible for man's disobedience, while simultaneously claiming either that the disobedience happened of necessity (Titus), or that God gave occasion for sin, which He knew would occur (Csl. 115). Both texts argue that from the very beginning the whole of man's destiny has been an ethical battle for virtue with death as its ending. It is hardly wrong to say that Titus has managed to a far greater extent to cultivate this interpretation, one which fundamentally Csl. 115 also shares.

⁷³ This is the case in both Diodore's commentaries In Oct. and In Rom. e.g. In Oct. on Gen. 9.24–25 in Petit 1986, 161–62 no. 164.1–13. Particularly clear is In Rom. 8.29–30, Staab 1933, 95.11–19, where completely in line with Origen (see above p. 339) Diodore emphasises that προγινώσκειν is before προορίζειν, and that God's πρόγνωσις is not ἀναγκαστική and does not invalidate τὸ αὐτεξούσιον; cf. Schweizer 1942, 57–58; Schelkle 1959, 310, cf. 337–38.—Thus Diodore has not attempted to solve, and barely even reflects on, the old problem of whether man nevertheless has a free choice if God has infallible foreknowledge.—Diodore's views on this are also continued by Theodore (see below pp. 402–3), so we cannot be helped here either to decide the provenience of Csl. 115.

⁷⁴ See above pp. 38, 326–27.

6. Comparison with Theodore of Mopsuestia's interpretation of the Paradise narrative in his commentary on Genesis, illustrated by other Theodore fragments

The most important writer that should be compared with Titus is Diodore of Tarsus's pupil, Theodore of Mopsuestia, who was undoubtedly the greatest of all the theologians of "the Antiochene School". The problem with such a comparison, however, is the same that applied in Diodore's case: our knowledge of Theodore's understanding of the Paradise narrative is fragmentary because it builds on fragments! The two most important groups of fragments in this area come from respectively Theodore's Commentarius in Genesim and from his work against the adherents of the doctrine of original sin, and it would surely be methodically incorrect to treat them under the same umbrella. As mentioned, it is possible that decades have passed between the two writings.

Both Gross and Scheffczyk claimed as stated that Theodore's teaching on the two Ages, more precisely his view of "Adam's primeval state", was influenced by Titus of Bostra's Contra Manichaeos. Already for this reason a comparison is of interest, but here we are moving into a minefield, for there has been wide dispute as to what Theodore actually believed as regards Adam's primeval state. Basically there have been two points of view in Theodore scholarship. Either it has been claimed that according to Theodore Adam and Eve were created mortal and mutable, and that the Fall of Man was a necessary consequence of mortality and indispensable for man's growth as an ethical being.⁷⁵ Or it is been claimed that the first humans were created immortal and that death was a consequence of the Fall of Man and thus not a part of God's created order.⁷⁶ In Norris there is an excellent survey of the scholarship in relation to this question.⁷⁷ Some scholars have claimed that evidence for only one of these interpretations can be found in Theodore's texts, but that at least is not so; it is beyond dispute that these texts contain two lines of thought that are hard to combine.⁷⁸ On the one hand there are various passages in which Theodore claims that Adam was originally created immortal, so that there would not have been an existence like the present, if he had not become mortal through sin.⁷⁹ It is reasonable to understand this type of passage in the context of those places where Theodore emphasises the catastrophic nature of the Fall of Man, that it was a break with man's destiny as God's image in the world, so that we can say that man's present state proves to be "etwas Nichtseinsollendes", as expressed by G. Koch.⁸⁰ On the other hand we find passages which claim that Adam was created mortal by God,⁸¹ and it is to these passages that the fragments of Theodore's Commentarius in Genesim from the fifth ecumenical synod are most closely attached; thus the comment in the first fragment seems implicitly to exclude an immortal primeval state:

⁷⁵ Thus Von Harnack 1931, 151–53. Von Harnack (1931, 151) claimed that in Greek patristics only the Antiochene School, and in particular Theodore, decided on the one of Irenaeus's two "conceptions", which posited a developmental view of man (cf. above p. 333). Otherwise, according to Von Harnack, both conceptions continued to be held simultaneously, or the second conception, recapitulation or similar ideas was preferred.

⁷⁶ Devreesse (1948, 98–103, cf. 109) claimed, for example, that Adam was created immortal, but became mortal in consequence of his sin. Theodore did not regard the state of Creation as the first Age, but rather the state of being a sinner. All fragments that suggest anything else are forgeries or spurious.

For if from the very beginning He had made us immortal and immutable, we would not have been different from the irrational creatures.⁸²

The problem complex contains for much of the way a close analogy to the question of whether Irenaeus's teaching on development and recapitulation can be combined, but this does not mean that the solution which is relevant in Irenaeus's case can be applied to Theodore, where, however, there are also many different proposals

⁷⁷ Norris 1963, 239–45 ("Appendix I: Anthropology and Christology in Fifth- and Sixth-century Discussion of Theodore") and 246–62 ("Appendix II: Anthropology and Christology in Modern Discussion of Theodore").

⁷⁸ As accepted by the majority, e.g. Norris 1963, 173ff.; Koch 1965, 60–72.

⁷⁹ Pregnant examples of such passages are: In Gal. 1.3–5, Swete 1880, 7.23–26 and 7.5–10 (cf. Norris 1963, 174; Koch 1965, 60 n. 95); In Gen. 3.17–20 (no. 418 in Petit 1991, 273), which calls the immortality that Christ grants a δευτέρα ἀθανασία, implying that man was originally immortal (thus Koch 1965, 65).

⁸⁰ E.g. Hom. cat. XII,8 (Tonneau 1949, 332–35) (cf. Koch 1965, 64). Quote: Koch 1965, 66.

⁸¹ E.g. In Gal. 2.15–16, Swete 1880, 25.17–26.11; Hom. cat. XIV.14 (Tonneau 1949, 432–33); cf. Gross 1960, 193; Norris 1963, 174–75.

⁸² "nam si quidem statim ab initio immortales nos fecerit et immutabiles, nullam differentiam ad irrationabilia haberemus", Concil. Univ. Const., Actio quarta, No. LVII,66, Straub 1970, 64.31–65.2; cf. Koch 1965, 69.

as to how the contradictions between the two types of passages can be resolved, or at the least explained. Typical elements in these explanations are, for example, that Theodore's contradictory views are due to his undergoing a development, or that he felt himself bound by several different traditions without being able to resolve their contradictory character, as was the case, for instance where Slomkowski pointed out that according to Theodore man was originally immortal, but death was simultaneously man's nature: the first type of statement represents the Church tradition, the second type the philosophical tradition.⁸³

Slomkowski is also right in his observation that Theophilus's teaching that man was originally neither mortal nor immortal differs from Theodore's thinking in the second type of statement, "pour qui l'homme est positivement mortel".⁸⁴ On this point Slomkowski differed from the later, distinctive interpretation of Theodore by Julius Gross. According to Gross, the Church fathers generally held that there were three stages in the salvation plan (the immortal and sin-free primeval state, the epoch of sin and death, and Christ's restitution of the primeval state), and when Theodore only operates with two Ages, those of mutability and immutability, it does not necessarily mean that Adam's original state cannot be distinguished from man's present state.⁸⁵ For Theodore the Fall of Man was a consequence of man's mortality, because mortality implies mutability and thus an inclination to sin; Adam and Eve were like children, who may have contained desire but did not yet allow it to make itself heard. At the Fall, desire was strengthened, and the natural death also acquired the character of punishment.⁸⁶ Theodore, however, regarded death as a punishment for Adam's sin, as the natural fate of all people,

⁸³ Slomkowski 1928, 119–28. The view is cognate with Vööbus's (1964, 116–17) explanation, which argued partly that being duty-bound to several different layers of tradition Theodore occasionally felt forced into certain compromises, and partly that this fact is particularly at work in his commentaries on Scripture, which is precisely the portion of Theodore's work that is best preserved in the original language: "Here his hands were not free. We cannot expect him to ignore the interpretation already given by Paul. He had to seek for byways."

⁸⁴ Slomkowski 1928, 129. Slomkowski (1928, 130–31) also accepted that there were similarities between Diodore's interpretation of the Paradise narrative and Theodore's, but emphasised that Theodore's interpretation could not be reconciled with Diodore's idea of a change in nature from immortality to mortality.

⁸⁵ Gross 1960, 193–94.

⁸⁶ Gross 1960, 195–96.

and as a punishment for personal sins; “[e]s dürfte schwer fallen, Theodors Aussagen über den Tod miteinander in Einklang zu bringen” remarked Gross,⁸⁷ who suggested, however, that one could remove the contradiction between the statements claiming that Adam was created both immortal and mortal, if one assumes that, with Theophilus for example, man was created neither mortal nor immortal, but was receptive to both. This means that Theodore used expressions from the tradition on Adam’s immortality without sharing the view that was generally connected with them.⁸⁸ The determining factor is that Theodore did not regard Adam’s disobedience as a “Bruch in der Heilsgeschichte,” but “vielmehr ein Anfang, die erste Episode der gegenwärtigen Weltphase, in welcher Tod und Sünde dominieren.”⁸⁹ Finally it must be mentioned that Gross proposed that towards the end of his life (in his work against the supporters of original sin) Theodore unequivocally renounced the traditional interpretation of death as a punishment for Adam’s sin.⁹⁰

The tensions in Theodore’s view of death which Gross noted were developed into one of the most important problems in Norris’ monograph on Theodore, which pointed out two tendencies in Theodore’s authorship: on the one hand Theodore claimed that the weakness of the corporeal nature is the root of moral evil, so that the moral struggle is a struggle between a rational soul and a mortal body, and here Norris believed that Theodore was building in particular on forms of thought of Platonic origin that were circulating at the time. On the other hand Theodore maintained that the root of sin is to be found in the soul’s conscious disobedience, i.e. in the will, which according to Norris is very much a biblical Christian thought inasmuch as this voluntarist view is in conflict with Platonism’s intellectualism.⁹¹ Norris did not believe, though, that the Paradise narrative was the logical starting-point for Theodore’s anthropology or teaching on the two Ages, but because Theodore felt under obligation

⁸⁷ Gross 1960, 196–97.

⁸⁸ Gross 1960, 197.

⁸⁹ Gross 1960, 199.

⁹⁰ Gross 1960, 203–4.

⁹¹ Norris 1963, passim, e.g. 154.—The weakness and mutability of the corporeal nature are what Theodore also called “mortality”. The problem is in other words that Theodore argued both that sin was a consequence of mortality, and that mortality was a consequence of sin.

to explain his anthropology through this narrative, he was also impelled to seek a solution to the contrary strains of his thought.⁹² The doctrine of death as a punishment for Adam's sin was of value because it maintained the conscious character of sin, but conversely it could not explain Adam's sin; as an explanation Platonism's doctrine of a weakness in relation to the body is better. Theodore also attempted to explain why man was ever equipped with a body, and he argued that for God the struggle with the body's temptations had educative value.⁹³ According to Norris, Theodore achieved a partial reconciliation of his conflicting views through a teaching of God's foreknowledge of Adam's sin, which simultaneously made it possible to regard death as God's punishment for the anticipated sin, His instrument for the extermination of sin and His method of educating man morally.⁹⁴

The present study does not aim to bring a complete interpretation of Theodore's theology, and accordingly I do not dismiss Norris' presentation of the problems and models of explanation. I believe, however, that they require more light and shade when Norris rejects the argument that the roots of Theodore's anthropology and teaching on the two Ages are to be found in the Paradise narrative. It is clear, to be sure, that it is not this story as such that has been the originator of Theodore's interpretations, but it is important to maintain that the narrative which Theodore met was already encased in interpretations that served to form fundamental aspects of his own theology. The similarities with Titus of Bostra's interpretation of the Paradise narrative must not be ignored, for even though the explanation is probably not that Theodore builds on Titus, they mean under all circumstances that Theodore continued a tradition of interpretation in the Syrian-Palestinian region. A historical and genetic model of explanation must be one of the means to explain the tensions in Theodore's theology.

It is now sufficiently clear that Theodore's interpretation of the Paradise narrative was influenced by earlier Antiochene commentaries, as they are known from Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore of Tarsus, which in the following I will try to exemplify. However, the rejection of the teaching on the immortal primeval state could come from the anti-Manichaean literature, as its presence not just in Theodore but also in Titus could suggest. Admittedly Theodore's texts do not contain open attacks on dualist heretics, as was the case with Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore, even though occasionally there is a trace of a polemic that could be adopted from earlier writers,⁹⁵ but that is not the determining point, since my theory is precisely that in Theodore the anti-Manichaean theology becomes loosened from its original context and presented without reference to Manichaeism.

⁹² Norris 1963, 173.

⁹³ Norris 1963, 177.

⁹⁴ Norris 1963, 182–89. Here Norris builds on Csl. 115 among others.

The doctrine of the image of God in man that is partly known from fragments of Theodore's Commentarius in Genesim, is more complicated than that which we find in Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore of Tarsus insofar as we can say anything at all about these two. Basically Theodore distinguished between εἰκών and ὁμοίωσις, but did not employ this distinction to the same end as Irenaeus and other Early Church fathers. Man, according to Theodore, being comprised of an invisible, rational and immortal soul and a visible and mortal body, was the bond of union (σύνδεσμος) of the whole of Creation, and in this very function he was God's εἰκών, i.e. he represented God in the world. As a representative he must also possess a similarity (ὁμοίωσις), and Theodore found this in a number of faculties, namely the creative faculty, the rational faculty to intentionally be different places in the world, and the power and authority to pass judgement; finally Theodore saw a similarity between the internal structure of the Trinity and the relation between man's soul, reason (λόγος) and life (ζωή).⁹⁶ These definitions bear no particular resemblance to Titus's doctrine of the image of God; when Norris interprets them to mean that Theodore would not describe the sanctification as a deification or believe in a noetic contemplation of God,⁹⁷ one can nevertheless argue that on the general level he shared with Titus an antipathy to contemplation.

⁹⁵ When Theodore (In Gen.) emphasises that God's question in Gen. 3.13 was not engendered by ignorance, but was aimed at leading to acknowledgement of sin and correction (Petit 1991, 254–55 no. 381), it resembles a hidden polemic against groups that on the basis of His question believed God to be ignorant. Cf. also In Gen. on Gen. 3.7 below p. 403.

⁹⁶ See further Petit 1987; Norris 1963, 140–48; el-Khoury 1990; McLeod 1999.

⁹⁷ Cf. Norris 1963, e.g. 131–32.

When according to Theodore, however, the Creation's ὁμοίωσις with God also included man's authority to pass judgement, we are dealing with the same teaching that we remarked in Eusebius of Emesa and probably also Diodore of Tarsus, namely that man is created with a faculty to discriminate which is disposed to knowing good and evil. This is seen even more clearly in other passages in Theodore's authorship.⁹⁸ The faculty to discriminate is realised in the meeting with God's commandment not to eat of the Tree of Knowledge, which implies as in Eusebius of Emesa and Titus of Bostra that it must be the commandment which is crucial, not the Tree. In Theodore's Commentarius in Epistolam ad Romanos on Rom. 7.8, we hear that had Adam not received a law to refrain from the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, it would not have been a sin to eat of it, as of the other trees; according to Theodore the actual content of the order was abstention.⁹⁹ It cannot therefore come as a surprise that in Commentarius in Genesim Theodore also claims that the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil acquired its name ἐκ . . . συμβεβηκότος, since he rejects the possibility of ἐκ φύσεως,¹⁰⁰ and that elsewhere in the same commentary he takes the opportunity to present ideas in the same direction.¹⁰¹

Like Eusebius of Caesarea and Titus, for example, Theodore distinguishes fundamentally between the animals which are bound by natural necessity and man who is free, but his view resembles espe-

⁹⁸ This is particularly stressed in Wickert (1962, 66, 91–92): the innate faculty of discrimination is aroused by the law of God, by which Theodore means both the Law of Moses and God's commandment to Adam; Wickert also suggests that Theodore construed the relationship between innate faculty of discrimination and the reason activated by the law on the basis of the pair of Aristotelian concepts potency and act. Cf. also Schelkle 1959, 232–33; Norris 1963, 166; Dewart 1971, 50. A particularly significant example exists in In Rom. 7.8, Staab 1933, 127.26–28: . . . ὅτι ἀναγκαιῶς μὲν κατὰ τὸν παρόντα βίον νόμοις πολιτευόμεθα, ὑφ' ὧν ἡ ἔμφυτος ἀνακινεῖται διάκρισις, παιδευομένων ὧν τε ἀπέχεσθαι καὶ ἃ ποιεῖν προσήκει, ὡστε καὶ τὸ λογικὸν ἐν ἡμῖν ἐνεργὸν εἶναι.

⁹⁹ Staab 1933, 126.34–127.3. Cf. Wickert 1962, 90–91; Schelkle 1959, 232–33.

¹⁰⁰ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 2.9 (Petit 1991, 173–74 [no. 246]);—in the fragment Theodore also rejects this possibility in connection with a corruptible tree such as the Tree of Life, a view which has no parallel in Titus.

¹⁰¹ In In Gen. on Gen. 3.8–9 (Petit 1986, 99–100 [no. 96]) Theodore argues among other things that the Tree of Knowledge was a fig tree, and in this context he takes the opportunity to emphasise ὅτι μὴ τῇ ποιότητι τοῦ ξύλου μηδὲ τῇ καινότητι τῆς βρώσεως τὰ ἁμαρτήματα κρίνεται, ἀλλὰ τῇ δόσει τῆς ἐντολῆς· ἦν ἐφ' ὅτου δῆποτε παραβῆναι ἴσην ἔχει τὴν μέμψιν.

cially that of Titus and Eusebius of Emesa. Titus and Theodore also agree that the unrealised knowledge of good and evil should be put into practice and trained by the commandment, which is understood as a command to abstinence.¹⁰² However, Theodore does not seem like Titus to believe that observance of the commandment brings about knowledge of God; to be sure, this idea in Titus shares a certain similarity with a remark about Adam in Theodore: “but in order that he may know from the laws that have been given him the One who has made him” (ἀλλ’ ἵνα ἐκ τῶν τεθέντων αὐτῷ νόμων, τὸν πεποιηκότα γνωρίζῃ), though this refers not to the commandment not to eat of the Tree of Knowledge, but to the cultivation and custody of the garden which Adam was charged with in Gen. 2.15.¹⁰³—By only regarding man’s knowledge of good and evil as formal and unrealised both Titus and Theodore could maintain that it is not a compulsion of nature, but probably Theodore did not express this circumstance with the help of Titus’s particular distinction between καλός and ἀγαθός, which was based on a reading of Gen. 1.31,¹⁰⁴ as it appears to be substantiated by another passage in Theodore.¹⁰⁵

The idea that man was only distinguished by a faculty to discriminate which was to be trained and that the training began with God’s commandment does not in itself exclude the possibility that Theodore could have claimed obedience and immortality as a real future perspective for Adam and Eve; indeed, the degree to which the same doctrines around this time could be given fine distinctions and combined in different ways should in general be clear from this presentation. As indicated, the presence in Theodore of two different and barely compatible statements on the original state of the first human couple is now a fact that should be taken ad notam. My intention is not to explain this away but partly to illuminate it and partly to demonstrate the similarity between Titus’s position and the type ¹⁰² See the analysis of Theodore in Wickert 1962, 89ff. (cf. also Norris 1963, 130) and cf. with the presentation of Titus above pp. 323.

¹⁰³ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 2.15 (Petit 1991, 181–82 [no. 261]; quote lines 1–2) (= Devreesse 1948, 17 n. 4).

¹⁰⁴ See above pp. 302–5.

¹⁰⁵ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 1.29–31 (Petit 1991, 126–27 no. 176; cf. Devreesse 1948, 15 n. 3); the passage also appears in Sachau 1869, حد (28).14–حج (29).10, translation 17–18.—Cf. Theodore’s use of the pair of concepts κακός—καλός, e.g. In Rom. 13.10, Staab 1933, 163.3.

of statement in Theodore which argues that from the beginning Adam was created for mortality.

The two types of statement must not be oversimplified with the result that we are left merely with the question of whether Adam was originally mortal or immortal? There is very little to suggest that Theodore of Mopsuestia ever believed that Adam simply was created mortal; the problem is rather whether Adam's preliminary "immortality" was a foretaste of the eschatological salvation and a real future possibility, or was merely a preparation before the predestined mortality was set in motion. In Csl. 115, which is either by Diodore or Theodore, one could argue as mentioned both that Adam and Eve's immortality lacked certainty and could be lost and that they were still not immortal.¹⁰⁶ When Theodore occasionally says that Adam and Eve were created mortal, it is probably his opinion that they were created with a view to becoming mortal. This does not resolve the contradiction between the two series of statements, but it does make clear that the contradiction is not quite simply whether Adam was originally immortal or mortal, but whether a lasting stay in Paradise was ever a real possibility for him. In Theodore's Commentarius in Genesim we very seldom find examples of texts which unequivocally belong to the series in which primeval immortality is a real possibility; the clearest example appears to be the fragment in which Theodore calls the immortality which Christ bestows a δευτέρα ἀθανασία,¹⁰⁷ because it is reasonable to argue here that man's original immortality was of the same kind, at least potentially, as the immortality of the last days. But of course this may just be a case of Theodore perpetuating a traditional terminology to which he is not seriously committed.

On the other hand a fragment on Gen. 3.5 can point in both directions; Theodore states that in the Garden of Paradise God used promise and fear as means of education; the Tree of Life is here a ¹⁰⁶ See above pp. 389–90.—If Csl. 115 does come from Theodore, we should note that these statements may to some degree be thought of as slipping together: on the one hand the fragment states that before sin entered, the flesh had not yet acquired any secure immortality, and on the other hand Theodore precisely associates mutability and mortality and makes them the cause of sin.—Schweizer (1942, 43) also stressed that Theodore's "Lehre von der Sünde, die durch die Sterblichkeit bedingt ist" is missing in Diodore.

¹⁰⁷ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 3.17–20 (Petit 1991, 273, no. 418).

promise which implies that immortality was not yet in Adam's possession, at least not as a certain, inalienable possession:

Two things, namely promise and fear, lead us away from the wicked and bring us to the better things. Fear drags us away from evil, but the promise leads us to the good. As a safeguard against the commandment being violated, God therefore also came with a threat of punishment, but with the promise of the Tree of Life He urged them to keep the commandment.¹⁰⁸

The promise of reward worked for Adam as a prompting to virtuousness, but in the fragment Theodore does not take up a position on whether it was ever realistic or God's intention that Adam should be given permission to eat of the Tree of Life.

Aside from the doubtful Csl. 115, the fragments from Commentarius in Genesim in which Theodore most obviously regards death as man's destiny from the beginning are those which are preserved in the acts of the fifth ecumenical synod. In the first fragment, which I quoted above, Theodore begins by pointing out that God did not institute death for men "involuntarily and without premeditation" ("non sponte et praeter iudicium suum"), and, as is clear from a later fragment, God's actions were not determined by his foreknowledge.¹⁰⁹ In the same way as Titus, Theodore clearly believes that it is a necessity to defend God's freedom in relation to the Paradise narrative.¹¹⁰ Koch is thus quite right to point out that Theodore's teaching on man as being mortal from the beginning is not just motivated by a regard for man's responsibility, but also by the wish to protect the sovereignty and omniscience of God.¹¹¹ Correspondingly, Theodore emphasises in In Gal. 2.15–16 that God did not, against His original plan, create us mortal out of anger or penitence but with His ineffable wisdom has made us mortal from the beginning in order to exercise us in virtue.¹¹²

¹⁰⁸ Δύο ταῦτα ἐξάγει τε ἡμᾶς τοῦ χειρόνος καὶ προσάγει τοῖς κρείττοσιν, ἐπαγγελία καὶ φόβος, ὁ μὲν ἀφέλκων τοῦ κακοῦ, ἡ δὲ ἄγουσα τῷ καλῷ. Τοῦτου γὰρ ἕνεκεν καὶ ὁ θεὸς τῇ τε ἀπειλῇ τῆς τιμωρίας ἠσφαλίσατο τῆς ἐντολῆς τὴν παράβασιν, καὶ τῇ ἐπαγγελίᾳ τοῦ ξύλου τῆς ζωῆς ἐπὶ τὴν φυλακὴν αὐτῆς προετρέψατο., Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 3.5 (Petit 1991, 227–28 no. 336.1–6; cf. Devresse 1948, 21 n. 1). Cf. Norris 1963, 176–77.

¹⁰⁹ Concil. Univ. Const., Actio quarta, No. LXI,70, Straub 1970, 65: "Nam sciebat quidem quod peccabunt omnino;" etc.

¹¹⁰ Cf. above pp. 327–28.

¹¹¹ Koch 1965, 72. Similarly Wickert 1962, 89.

¹¹² Swete 1880, 25.17ff. Cf. Gross 1960, 193; cf. also Norris 1963, 161.

The exercise of virtue is the more anthropological justification for the expediency of death; the fragment of Commentarius in Genesim under treatment also emphasises to an extent the educative value of mortality and mutability, but only as a purely negative experience. The fundamental instability that we experience through evil things such as mutability, death, corruptibility and trouble with the passions, is a precondition for our being able to acquire knowledge of the good things, i.e. immutability, immortality, incorruptibility and impassibility.¹¹³ Here Theodore is clearly taking up the well-known philosophical theme from Plato and Chrysippus that evil is a necessity in order to know the good, or that virtue cannot exist unless vice does too,¹¹⁴ but he also decisively changes the theme by giving it an eschatological edge: we meet evil in the present age, but this completely negative experience teaches us what is that we lack. Put this way the argument has no parallel in Titus, but in return it parallels the very same idea from Commentarius in Epistulam ad Galatas, where mortality makes possible the struggle for virtue and real progress in the present age; we also find this idea in the synodal fragments, e.g. when Theodore explains that “it is necessity that all rational creatures together . . . endure the present mutability here so that we can be educated in the best teaching of piety and put in possession of a good will.”¹¹⁵ It is altogether well-known from Theodore’s works that man’s freedom of choice, his ἀντεξούσιον or προαίρεσις,¹¹⁶ and the παιδεία-idea of existence as God’s education and training of man in virtue¹¹⁷ were indispensable concerns for Theodore. Like Diodore therefore, Theodore also appears to subject God’s election and predestination to His foreknowledge of man’s future choices, even though it is possible that on this point too Theodore was on the way to parting company with his teacher’s position.¹¹⁸

¹¹³ Theodore propounded the same views in Concil. Univ. Const., Actio quarta, No. LXI,70, Straub 1970, 65–66.

¹¹⁴ See above p. 312.—The same theme is also found in Concil. Univ. Const., Actio quarta, No. LXI,70, Straub 1970, 65–66.

¹¹⁵ Concil. Univ. Const., Actio quarta, No. LVIII,67, Straub 1970, 65: “Necesse est autem omnia simul rationabilia . . . hic quidem praesentem mutabilitatem pati, ut optimam erudiamur doctrinam religiositatis et ad beniuolentiam constituamur.” Here, however, the reference is to the soul’s mutability.

¹¹⁶ See e.g. references in Wickert 1962, passim, but esp. 41 n. 169, 61–77, 83–88; Norris 1963, 129ff.

¹¹⁷ See e.g. Wickert 1962, 89–101 (94–95 on death’s positive significance for the training of virtue); Norris 1963, 160–72, 175, 177.

¹¹⁸ See Schelkle 1959, 310, 337; Wickert 1962, 77–89; cf. Gross 1960, 199. Here

It is now not surprising that like Titus in Contra Manichaeos III.24–25 Theodore finds a useful purpose in the eyes being opened in Gen. 3.7. This is demonstrated by a number of fragments of which the introduction to a Csl.-fragment is of particular interest: Ἀνοήτως τινὲς ἔφασαν πεπληρώσθαι τὸ παρὰ τοῦ διαβόλου πρὸς τὴν γυναῖκα ῥηθέν, “Some have foolishly said that what was spoken by the Devil to the woman has been fulfilled”, because the Devil’s word in Gen. 3.5 is confirmed in Gen. 3.7.¹¹⁹ The reference is clearly to the heretics that Diodore was refuting; he has merely put in “the Devil”, where the heretics would have said “the serpent”. However, Theodore rejects the argument that Gen. 3.5 and 7 express the same idea. In Gen. 3.7 the subject is the knowledge of nakedness, not Divine knowledge which the Devil had promised in Gen. 3.5. Because Adam and Eve had never sinned, they did not know shame, and here Theodore compares them with young children who in the bath realise that they are naked but in their innocence are not ashamed of it. After they had sinned, however, God imbued them with shame to protect them from sin, and it was necessary for shame to be linked first to the sexual organs in order to protect man from inadmissible sexual Theodore can, for example, also be based on an interpretation of Rom. 8.29, cf. Theodore, In Rom. 8.29 in Staab 1933, 141.27–142.11 (cf. here Schelkle 1959, 310; Wickert 1962, 200–1); cf. Wickert 1962, 79ff., incl. 80 n. 22, 88 concerning Diodore–Theodore; on this point Wickert, however, claims a certain distance between Diodore and Theodore. Wickert actually believes (1962, 77–89) that Theodore has undermined the precedence relation between foreknowledge and predestination; he writes (1962, 81–82): “Doch wie Gottes Macht sich nicht nur im gleichsam passiven Vorauswissen, sondern zumal in der aktiven Hervorbringung der künftigen Ereignisse offenbart, so führt die Idee der Präsenz Gottes durch sich selbst notwendig zu derjenigen der Prädestination. . . . Gott hat zwar im Blick auf die menschliche Entscheidung seine Wahl getroffen, aber diese bedingt umgekehrt selbst die Entscheidung. Mit diesem Zirkel muß man sich abfinden, und es scheint, als habe Th., soweit es ihm mit den Mitteln seines Denkens möglich war, alles gesagt, was zum Thema zu sagen ist.” (cf. Wickert 1962, 89 n. 1: “Das ‘Wissen’ Gottes schließt aber für Th. stets ein ‘Wollen’ mit ein.”). If Wickert’s interpretation is valid, it is reasonable to assume, however, that Theodore’s circle has its source in the above-mentioned problem that man’s freedom of choice undermines God’s sovereignty (see above p. 338). On the other hand, the old problem of futura contingentia and “Tomorrow’s Sea Battle”, doubtless lie outside Theodore’s horizon, not least because, as Wickert also stresses, man’s real freedom is indeed irrenunciabile for Theodore.— It is also hardly unreasonable to say that Wickert’s interpretation in the last resort means that Theodore’s standpoint (in the terminology of a later time) is “synergistic” or “semi-Pelagian”; cf. the interpretation of Theodore in Norris 1963, 186–88. Cf. also Koch 1965, 65.

¹¹⁹ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 3.7 (Petit 1986, 115, no. 110.1–7; quote lines 1–2).

intercourse;¹²⁰ these ideas are developed in other fragments.¹²¹ Thus shame made Adam and Eve sew garments for themselves of leaves, which Theodore underlines were fig-leaves from the same tree as the Tree of Knowledge, which was simply a fig tree.¹²²

The fragments emphasise on this point Adam and Eve's original "undevelopedness", which as in Irenaeus can of course have been combined with a teaching of an original spiritual endowment, but this is hardly likely when we evaluate these fragments in the light of the others from the acts of the synod. In addition, Theodore's assessment of the opening of the eyes as beneficial—in the light of sin—to some degree conflicts with Diodore's view. One can compare Theodore's remark ("But because they sinned in doing the opposite of God's laws, the knowledge of shame was put in them by God as a help against sin, in that it is sufficient to destroy the impulse from sin", Ἐπειδὴ δὲ ἥμαρτον τὰναντία τοῖς τοῦ θεοῦ διαπραξάμενοι νόμοις, ἐνετέθη μὲν αὐτοῖς ὁ λογισμὸς τῆς αἰσχύνῃς ὑπὸ θεοῦ εἰς τὴν τῆς ἀμαρτίας βοήθειαν, αὐτάρκης ὧν ἐκκόπτειν αὐτῆς τὴν ὁρμήν.)¹²³ with Diodore's ("that their eyes were opened was in no way for the good", τὸ διανοιχθῆναι τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς οὐ πάντως ἐπὶ καλῷ γέγονεν.)¹²⁴

As has also been observed by others,¹²⁵ Theodore is clearly constructing a theodicy, and this is the case even though we do not find the φθόνοσ-motif explicitly in his Commentarius in Genesim, for example.¹²⁶ As we saw from the acts of the synod, however, this theodicy has the character of a doctrine of two Ages or states. Since Gross and Scheffczyk claimed that Theodore acquired this particular doctrine from Titus, a comparison of the two is also important ¹²⁰ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 3.7 (Petit 1986, 115–16, no. 110). Cf. Gross 1960, 195.

¹²¹ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 3.7 (Petit 1991, 235–36, no. 348); on Gen. 3.7 (Petit 1991, 239, no. 353).

¹²² Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 3.7 (Petit 1991, 239, no. 353); on Gen. 3.8–9 (Petit 1986, 99–100, no. 96).

¹²³ Theodore, In Gen. on Gen. 3.7 (Petit 1986, 116, no. 110.25–28).

¹²⁴ Diodore, In Oct. on Gen. 3.7 (Petit 1986, 113, no. 109.8–9).

¹²⁵ E.g. Norris 1963, 172.

¹²⁶ The φθόνοσ-charge is not mentioned, since like Eusebius of Emesa Theodore interprets Gen. 3.22 so that the remark is ironical (In Gen. on Gen. 3.22, Petit 1991, 288–89, no. 449 [only lines 4–14]; Tonneau 1953, 52–53; cf. Petit 1991, 289; Romeny 1997a, 209 n. 114).—Elsewhere, however, Theodore can emphasise God's ἀφθονία, e.g. in In Rom. 8.28, Staab 1933, 141.29–142.2, διὰ πάντων εὐεργετεῖν ἔθος τῷ θεῷ τοὺς ἀγαπῶντας αὐτόν, ἀφθονον αὐτοῖς τῶν ἀγαθῶν τὴν χορηγίαν παρεχόμενος . . .

on this point. Little effort is required, though, before we discover that despite all the similarities in the interpretation of the Paradise narrative Titus does not know of an actual doctrine of two Ages along the lines of Theodore. This is due to Titus's extremely individualist point of view: the Paradise narrative is not linked to Christ's work of salvation or to eschatology; individual people will on their own initiative return to Paradise. This is linked to the fact that even though Titus also believed that from the beginning man was created with a view to mortal life, and even though he of course taught the resurrection of the body on the final day, his interest is not in a future, collective state, but in the soul's individual salvation after death.¹²⁷ This interpretation of the Paradise narrative which we know from Titus undoubtedly served to inspire Theodore to formulate his teaching of the two Ages, but there is no doubt that this is his own work. The fact that we find no trace of such a teaching in Diodore of Tarsus points in the same direction.¹²⁸

¹²⁷ Titus's major interests are to do with rest after labour and the crown of victory which the virtuous souls receive after death, see above pp. 343–44. This is otherwise in Theodore; Norris (1963, 162) rightly underlines that “[t]here is no question of Theodore's identifying in practice the Future Age with an eternally real ontological realm which is future only from the point of view of the individual who has not yet realized his membership in it.” In the fragment of the work Against the Magians, which is found in Dadišo Qaṭraya's In Isaiam Sket. XV,16–18 (see above p. 141), Theodore indeed claims very energetically that the soul's life after death is different from the perfection of the second Age. El-Khoury (1990, 69) actually believes that Theodore taught that the immortal soul sleeps until the last day, when it is reunited with its body, which could fit into this picture, because with the help of this doctrine of the sleeping soul Theodore could effectively maintain the entire eschatology is collective-futurist, but as far as I can see, on the pages in question Dadišo Qaṭraya is right to say that Theodore did not regard the intermediate state of the soul between human death and reunification with the body as an unconscious torpor.—On this point Titus could better be compared with John Chrysostom, who otherwise for practical reasons is not included at length in this study, and whose ideas on Adam and Eve's primeval state, on the basis of their presentation in Gross 1960, 182, 184 were also distant from those of Theodore and Titus. In In Rom. Hom. X,3; PG 60, 478 Chrysostom argues that death is a gain for us, if we are continent. We do not sin in an immortal body, and death admonishes us to live a virtuous life; cf. Gross 1960, 185.

¹²⁸ Schweizer (1942, 42–43) remarks: “Theodor trägt bei jeder möglichen und unmöglichen Gelegenheit seine Lehre von den zwei Katastasen, den παρόντα und den μέλλοντα, vor. Seine ganze Erlösungslehre prägt er in diese Begriffe. Bei Diodor findet sich gar nichts davon auch an Stellen, wo es zu erwarten wäre.”; cf. Schweizer 1942, 71.—A fragment from The Book of Memorials, which is preserved in The Book of the Bee LX (Budge 1886, 300, 5–8, translation 139 [cf. Abramowski 1949, 60–61]), distinguishes between the present and the coming world age; the present world age is determined by penance, but the coming world age by retribution. Abramowski

With regard to man's innate faculty to discriminate, over the Tree of Knowledge and the function of the prohibition, there are several points of contact between Theodore and Titus; as we have seen, these points also exist in the interpretations of the Paradise narrative by both Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore of Tarsus. The problem looks different, however, when we look at the passages in Theodore where man was destined for mortality from the beginning. Here the contact surface with Titus's presentation is very broad; on the other hand we do not find anything similar in Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore.¹²⁹ Alongside these bold passages we also find passages in Theodore's texts which reckon more traditionally with an immortal primeval state and a catastrophic Fall. It is clear that the presentations in the two types of passages cannot in all contexts be reconciled with each other, but at the least this is not sufficient cause to claim that the "bold passages" are forgeries;¹³⁰ in the present context therefore it must be reasonable to concentrate our interest solely on them. Here I have emphasised a number of similarities. The most significant difference is that Theodore's conception, unlike Titus's, demands that sin is not trivialised; to a far greater degree Theodore is interested in stressing the negative, dark character of sin. Both writers believe it to be God's intention that man should have negative experiences, but Titus emphasises primarily that these experiences must form the starting-point for our own real progress in virtue, while Theodore emphasises that they should teach us our imperfection with a view to what will be given us in the second Age. Accordingly the comparison implies that Theodore was of a deeper nature with a darker view of life than Titus: in the age of this world the negative experiences dominate. Both through his contrast between this world's negative experiences, linked to mortality and mutability, and through the positive experiences of the coming age Theodore was able to avoid the easy optimism and banality that could have followed from other aspects of his thought. But this (1949, 60–61) assumed that the fragment was from Diodore, which would have at least meant so much that he actually did speak of "two ages". As proved by Weis 1968, 222–24, we are not dealing here with a Diodore-fragment.—Cf. also Wickert 1962, 100 n. 66, 105 on the question of Theodore's inheritance from Diodore.

¹²⁹ If Csl. 115 really does stem Diodore, the problem of course shifts to some degree.

¹³⁰ See above p. 392.

difference between Titus and Theodore does not change the fact that there are major and particular similarities between their interpretations of the Paradise narrative that do not exist in Eusebius of Emesa or Diodore of Tarsus.

7. Comparison with Theodore of Mopsuestia's work: Against those who say that men sin by nature and not by intention

Theodore's most radical position, and the one that places him closest to Titus is to be found in the tradition that as one of the few Easterns he took part in the Pelagian controversy with a work against the adherents of the doctrine of original sin. The work in question is mentioned first by Photius, who gives as its title, πρὸς τοὺς λέγοντας φύσει καὶ οὐ γνώμῃ πταίειν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, Against those who say that men sin by nature and not by intention,¹³¹ secondly in the Syriac version,¹³² and thirdly in the few fragments preserved in a Latin translation.¹³³

From the summary by Photius it appears that Theodore's work was directed against a person called "Aram", who had instigated a new heresy that had infected the western churches. From the description this person can only have been Jerome, and reference is made to his Dialogus contra Pelagianos.¹³⁴ The new heresy taught, according to Theodore, that man does not sin by intention but by nature, by which the heretics mean not the good nature with which God originally created Adam but the nature he had after his sin, when he exchanged his originally good and immortal nature for a bad and mortal one. The heretics believe that this sinful nature descends to his successors, even to newborn babies. No man is righteous, nor is even Christ free of sin, because he has taken upon himself the sinful nature; from the heretics' writings we can see, however, that they do not believe that the incarnation has taken place in truth and ¹³¹ Photius, Bibl., cod. 177 (121b) (Henry 1960, 177). The entire cod. 177 (121b–123a) exists in Henry 1960, 177–82.

¹³² See the account of the background for the work in Barhadbešabba, Hist. eccl. XIX [24], Nau 1913, 512.3–9. The work is also mentioned in Abdišo's Catal. XIX (Assemani 1725, 34.1; transl. by Badger 1852, 365) and in Chron. Seert. LIII [178], Scher 1910, 290.

¹³³ However, according to Bruckner 1897, 4–5, 84–85, 124 Julian of Eclanum also reveals knowledge of this work.

¹³⁴ Photius, Bibl., cod. 177 (121b) (Henry 1960, 177), cf. n. 2 in Henry 1960, 177–79; Gross 1960, 201.

nature, but only in appearance (σχήματι). Furthermore the new heretics say that marriage and the entire sexual life by which our race is sustained, are the works of the evil nature.¹³⁵

As several scholars have remarked, however, neither Jerome nor Augustine claimed all the things that Theodore accuses them of here. Gross pointed out, for instance, that Jerome, who did not fully understand Augustine's "doctrine of sin by nature", never claimed all the doctrines that Theodore ascribes to him; "[o]ffenbar war der Bischof von Mopsuestia, der schwerlich lateinisch verstand, über die pelagianische Kontroverse nur mangelhaft unterrichtet", commented Gross.¹³⁶ Beatrice stressed that neither Jerome nor Augustine claimed a docetism and a condemnation of sexual life, and instead he proposed that in reality Theodore is here attacking the Messalians,¹³⁷ whose ostensible "doctrine of original sin" Beatrice nevertheless regarded as essentially the same as Augustine's.

Beatrice's views cannot be directly dismissed, because Theodore's work comes from a time when anti-Messalian activity was particularly strong in Asia Minor, and because Theodore's picture of the "doctrine of original sin" actually resembles the picture of "Messalianism" that heresiologists and synods tried to draw.¹³⁸ We must be aware, however, that heresiology always distorted the heresies by depicting them with earlier heresies as their model. The heresiologist's conception of the new heresies' teaching and character was always a combination of new knowledge and existing prejudices. The "Messalians", for instance, were accused of supporting a docetic Christology, and whether or not the charge was linked to a misunderstanding of passages in Pseudo-Macarius,¹³⁹ one naturally "misunderstood", because one read with a previous knowledge gained ¹³⁵ Photius, Bibl., cod. 177 (121b–122a) (Henry 1960, 177–79).

¹³⁶ Gross 1960, 202. Thus also earlier in Amann 1946, 270–77, esp. 271–72.

¹³⁷ Beatrice 1978, 242–50.

¹³⁸ See thus Stewart 1991, 35, 89 (here, however, Stewart rejects such interpretations of the "doctrine of original sin" in Pseudo-Macarius which precisely Beatrice represents).

¹³⁹ See Stewart 1991, 65–66 on the accusations of docetism against the "Messalians".—If Theodore's polemic against Jerome in reality included a polemic against the Messalians, then according to him they must have been Christological docetists, and Beatrice (1978, 224, 249) actually also referred to the docetism in Julius Cassianus, from where the Encratite-Messalian tradition stemmed, according to Beatrice. But this genealogy seems doubtful, just as on the background of Stewart 1991 it is advisable not to operate with too firm an idea of "Messalianism".

from the anti-Manichaean business.¹⁴⁰ Probably Theodore also interpreted “the new heresy”, i.e. Jerome’s battle with Pelagius, in the light of Manichaeism. As we have seen above, it was precisely the Church fathers’ accusation that the Manichaeans taught that man does not sin by will but by nature, and whatever the degree of evidence for this charge in Manichaean texts, it is at least clear that here the Church fathers were also depicting Manichaeism in the light of heresiology’s image of various Gnostic heresies, especially Valentinianism, and that this picture was in turn influenced by earlier philosophical polemic against the Stoics among others.¹⁴¹ Theodore merely continues the old heresiological style by understanding and impugning new heresies by depicting them in the light of earlier heresies that there was already a consensus to condemn. That this is the case here is underlined by the fact that Theodore further accuses “the new heresy” of docetism, which effectively places it alongside Manichaeism. It is quite clear that Theodore has the Manichaean model in mind, since he draws a distinction when stating that “the new heresy” does not claim that man sins by virtue of his original created nature, but by virtue of a nature that was first acquired at the Fall.¹⁴² Theodore appears here to underline the specific element in “the new heresy” precisely in contrast to Manichaeism or similar heresies that made evil a part of man’s original constitution.

Among Theodore’s refutations of this new heresy Photius mentions the view, from which he also dissociates himself, that Adam had been mortal from the beginning, and that it was only apparently that God imposed death on us as a punishment for sin, in order, that is, to make us hate sin.¹⁴³ Theodore’s view here corresponds to the synodal fragments from his Commentarius in Genesim, but is even ¹⁴⁰ Cf. Dörries 1978, 15, 23, 30, 55–56, 59, 77–95, 101, 243, 388, 457 on both the accusations against the “Messalians” of “Manichaeism” and the background for this in Pseudo-Macarius. Dörries accepted that there are similarities between Manichaeism and Pseudo-Macarius, but he underlined that the charge was a “Mißdeutung”.

¹⁴¹ See above p. 173.

¹⁴² Photius, Bibl., cod. 177 (122a5–15) (Henry 1960, 177–78).

¹⁴³ Photius, Bibl., cod. 177 (122a) (Henry 1960, 179): “Ἐτι δὲ οὐδὲ τὸ λέγειν αὐτὸν ἅπ’ ἀρχῆς μὲν θνητὸν πεπλάσθαι τὸν Ἀδάμ, ἐνδείξει δὲ μόνον, ἵνα μισήσωμεν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, σχηματῖσαι οὕτω τὸν Θεὸν ὡς διὰ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ἀντὶ τιμωρίας ἐπιτίθεται ὁ θάνατος . . .”

closer than them to Titus's position because according to Photius Theodore actually claimed that the death's aspect of being a punishment was only apparent. The similarity with Titus raises the question of whether Theodore is not here taking over a doctrine from the Antiochene anti-Manichaeism against "the new heresy" which Theodore precisely conceived of as "a new Manichaeism"?

In addition to Photius's summary we have a series of Latin fragments handed down in Collectio Palatina, which the compiler of this work believes to be directed against Augustine.¹⁴⁴ The authenticity of the fragments has been the subject of vigorous dispute, because they present a more radical, less "ecclesiastical" picture of Theodore than, for instance, his Homiliae catecheticae.

Amann admittedly accepted that the fragments were genuine, but he pointed out that as excerpts they could give a false impression of the work against the adherents of the doctrine of original sin; read in its entirety the writing would perhaps have proved to be more "Augustinian", more like the Homiliae catecheticae; Amann also, however, considered the possibility of a development in Theodore's views in relation to his previous writings.¹⁴⁵

It was Devreesse in particular who regarded as forgeries the fragments from Theodore's writing against the adherents of sin as nature; nothing of what these and similar fragments contain is to be found "dans l'œuvre authentique de Théodore, absolument rien", he claimed.¹⁴⁶ Devreesse accepted that such fragments contiennent, sans conteste, quelques-unes des expressions favorites de notre auteur et, à leur lecture, on retrouve le mouvement général de son style. Mais ils contredisent sa pensée authentique, les accorder avec elle est une entreprise vaine; il n'y a pas de place ici pour un concordisme."¹⁴⁷

¹⁴⁴ Collectio Palatina in Schwartz 1924–26; the five relevant fragments Schwartz 1924–26, 173.15–176.33, and they are introduced (173.15–17) with: "Theodori Mampsuestini episcopi de secundo codice libro quarto, folio decimo contra sanctum Augustinum defendentem originale peccatum et Adam per transgressionem mortalem factum catholice disserentem." Earlier it was thought that the five fragments were compiled by Marius Mercator, but Schwartz (1924–26, VIIIff.) has shown that the fragments were more likely collected in the 6th cent.—The five fragments are also available in Swete 1882, 332–37.

¹⁴⁵ Amann 1946, 275–76.

¹⁴⁶ Devreesse 1948, 102, cf. 196. According to Devreesse, this was also true of the text to which Photius refers.

¹⁴⁷ Devreesse 1948, 103.

Gross disagreed with Devreesse on this point, arguing for the authenticity of the fragments partly by showing that their teaching on Adam's original mortality is also found in the writings of Theodore which Devreesse acknowledges as genuine, and partly by demonstrating that Theodore's fundamental teaching on the two Ages only makes sense if Adam belonged to the first Age from the beginning.¹⁴⁸ While especially Wickert followed Gross,¹⁴⁹ Koch in particular has found it difficult to accept that the fragments were authentic, without it being possible to say his arguments are strong.¹⁵⁰

Gross is without doubt right that precisely because the ideas in these fragments are also found in the other vestiges of Theodore's oeuvre, they must be accepted as authentic. Naturally this does not exclude the possibility of imprecise translations into Latin,¹⁵¹ and the compiler's interest renders it likely that Amann is correct in arguing that the fragments give a wrong general impression of the work. I should like to underline, however, that an interpretation of many of the ideas in the fragments as being a perpetuation of an anti-Manichaean tradition can form a supplementary argument in favour of their authenticity, because the interpretation shows that it is not so remarkable or improbable that a writer in the 5th century presented the views that it contains.

The main concern of the fragments is to refute those who are so demented as to believe that God was unaware that Adam would sin, and therefore only made Adam immortal for six hours in order ¹⁴⁸ Gross 1960, 192–99.

¹⁴⁹ Wickert 1962, 101ff. Cf. also Norris 1963, 179f.

¹⁵⁰ Koch (1965, 19 n. 52, 59 n. 92, 70–71) accepted that the fragments contain ideas from Theodore and can be said to develop the thoughts that also exist in the fragments from the fifth ecumenical synod and in Csl. 115, but he was nevertheless inclined to regard them as forgeries, since Theodore's ideas have become "ins Extrem überspitzt" (70), and because he considered their transmission as dubious. Koch also suggested, however, that it might be a question of "jene polemischen Übertreibungen und Vereinseitigungen . . . zu denen unser Autor neigt" (70–71), which could also be understood in the context of the bitter nature of the Pelagian controversy. Precisely on this point Koch was doubtless right, for Theodore's ideas must almost certainly have been sharply honed in a polemical treatise. Collectio Palatina also presumably quotes only the passages from Theodore in which he expresses himself most vehemently and, from the compiler's viewpoint, most heretically. Unless they are forged, the fragments can therefore give a false overall impression of the work.—Devreesse's views are followed also in e.g. Kelly 1977, 373.—Clark (1992, 204–6) omitted to take a position on the question of authenticity.

¹⁵¹ Cf. Gross 1960, 203.

to make him mortal after he had sinned. If God had wanted Adam to be immortal, the Fall of Man could not change His mind; for God did not make the Devil mortal, when he sinned.¹⁵² Theodore's opponents say that in anger and fury God made Adam mortal, and that he punished all mankind for one man's transgression.¹⁵³

Against this Theodore claims that God knew that Adam would sin and without doubt die because of this.¹⁵⁴ In line with Wickert's view¹⁵⁵ this must mean that also in this work Theodore to some degree reckoned death to be the punishment or consequence of sin. As a prominent point, however, Theodore also claims the naturalness of death: just as Adam initiated the first status (i.e. κατάστασις), that of mortality, so has Christ initiated the second immortal status, and that is why Christ also had to traverse all the stages of human life in order to be able to lead men from the first to the second status.¹⁵⁶ As Wickert has pointed out, in this context Theodore employs 1 Cor. 15.48–49, where Paul actually establishes the order earthly-heavenly as an argument that mortal status always goes before immortal.¹⁵⁷ Here there is a striking similarity with Titus's corresponding argument on the basis of 1 Cor. 15.53 in Contra Manichaeos IV.100.¹⁵⁸

Thus, according to Theodore, death belongs to nature, in contrast to sin:

And he [i.e. Christ] has therefore taken death upon him, but in no way sin; he remained completely untouched by this, however. For he has without doubt taken upon himself that which was natural, i.e. death, but he has in no way taken upon himself sin, which was not natural but of the (free) will. For if there had been sin in nature, as that extremely wise (writer) claims, then he would of necessity have taken upon himself sin, which (in that case) was present in nature.¹⁵⁹

¹⁵² Coll. Pal. 51.8, Schwartz 1924–26, 176.13–23 (Fr.1, Swete 1882, 332–33).

¹⁵³ Coll. Pal. 51.4, Schwartz 1924–26, 174.33–35 (Fr. 3, Swete 1882, 334.1–4).

¹⁵⁴ Coll. Pal. 51.7, Schwartz 1924–26, 175.30ff. (Fr. 1, Swete 1882, 333.1–2).

¹⁵⁵ Wickert 1962, 103.

¹⁵⁶ Coll. Pal. 51.7, Schwartz 1924–26, 176.15–16 (Fr. 3, Swete 1882, 335.13ff.).

¹⁵⁷ Coll. Pal. 51.7, Schwartz 1924–26, 175.25–176.3 (Fr. 3, Swete 1882, 335.25–30); Wickert has also pointed out that Theodore argues in similar fashion in In Cor. I 15.45–47 (Staab 1933, 195.6–20; cf. also In Cor. I 15.48–49, Staab 1933, 195.21–29); Wickert 1962, 104.

¹⁵⁸ See above p. 351 and → Ch. XI.51.

¹⁵⁹ “et mortem quidem propterea suscepit, peccatum uero nequaquam, sed ab hoc immunis omnino permansit. quod enim erat naturae, id est mortem, indubitanter assumpsit; peccatum uero, quod non erat naturae, sed uoluntatis, nullo pacto suscepit. quod si fuisset in natura peccatum iuxta sapientissimi huius eloquium, pec-

As Wickert in particular has pointed out, Theodore is also essaying an explanation as to how death can be both nature and a punishment for Adam's sin. Adam and Eve were mortal from the beginning, but not until and by virtue of their transgression did they become worthy ("digni essent") to be imparted with "the experience of death" ("mortis experientiam") or the sentence of death ("mortis sententiam").¹⁶⁰ Wickert interpreted this argument as follows, daß eine Möglichkeit, die der Mensch seit seiner Erschaffung besaß, infolge seiner Sünde, durch Gottes Urteil, für ihn zur Wirklichkeit wurde. Man kann fragen, inwieweit das aristotelische Begriffspaar δύναμις—ἐνέργεια im Hintergrund steht.¹⁶¹

To a considerable degree this form of thought resembles Titus's considerations, which are that man is indeed created mortal, but that God has allowed him to procure for himself the cause of his death.¹⁶²

In both the information on and the fragments of Theodore's work Against those who say that men sin by nature and not by intention we thus meet some of the same examples of Theodore's closeness to Titus of Bostra's position that we found in his Commentarius in Genesim as well as new examples of this closeness. The similarity precisely with Titus and the Manichaeanising distortions of Jerome's teaching suggest that Theodore's understanding of the Paradise narrative is determined by the earlier Antiochene anti-Manichaean literature. This does not necessarily mean that Theodore was influenced by Titus—at any rate there is no basis for claiming such influence through considerable terminological similarities and suchlike—but rather it raises the question of Theodore and Titus's common dependence on the lost Antiochene anti-Manichaean texts.

catum in natura prorsus existens necessario suscepisset.", Coll. Pal. 51.7, Schwartz 1924–26, 176.7–12 (Fr. 3, Swete 1882, 335.35–336.3). Cf. Gross 1960, 203.—The passage shows which deduction formed the basis of the charge referred to by Photius against "Aram" for teaching that Christ took sin upon himself.

¹⁶⁰ Coll. Pal. 51.1, Schwartz 1924–26, 173.21–28 (Fr. 4, Swete 1882, 336.9–18).

¹⁶¹ Wickert 1962, 105.—Clark's (1992, 206, cf. 204) presentation of Theodore's reasoning is wrong on the other hand ("Theodore, like Rufinus, believes that Adam and Eve were created mortal in body and would have received immortality only later, had they remained obedient"): according to Theodore there was no real possibility of immortality in the Garden of Eden.

¹⁶² See above p. 352.

8. Comparison with the Constitutiones Apostolorum

Yet another piece in the puzzle may well be found in the similarity between Theodore's position and the Constitutiones Apostolorum which, as mentioned, was emphasised by Turmel, Slomkowski, Gross and Beatrice.¹⁶³ In a comparison, however, we must note that the Constitutiones Apostolorum hardly contains a coherent interpretation of the Paradise narrative, but only scattered passages that must be interpreted separately.

At one point, for example, the Constitutiones Apostolorum can speak of God's Providence, which included Adam when he received the commandment in Paradise, but also included him after he had sinned and was justly banished, in that the education of Adam and his successors continued through the goodness of God.¹⁶⁴ This statement in such a passage perhaps suggests a continuity between the education of Adam before and after the disobedience, but also sets the stage for an understanding of disobedience as sin and banishment as punishment. A passage in the Constitutiones Apostolorum V points in a different direction, claiming that God could have made all men immortal if He had wanted to, as we can see in relation to Enoch and Elijah.¹⁶⁵ The passage can be read in several ways, but that it points in the direction of Titus's teaching on death is made likely by a second passage soon after which emphasises that death is not a punishing payment (μη μισθὸν τιμωρίας εἶναι τὸν θάνατον), since both the saints and their lord, Jesus Christ, also suffered death.¹⁶⁶

With regard to Constitutiones Apostolorum VIII.XII,16–20¹⁶⁷ there are doubtless aspects that could also be compared with the texts that we are examining; thus Adam was given an innate law, so that by himself and from himself he has the germ of the cognition of God.¹⁶⁸ The human body is soluble and from the four elements,¹⁶⁹ but immortality is presented apparently as a real goal that could have been ¹⁶³ See above pp. 98–99.

¹⁶⁴ Constitutiones Apostolorum VII.XLIII,4, Funk 1905, 448.25–30.

¹⁶⁵ Constitutiones Apostolorum V.VII,8, Funk 1905, 253.9–11.

¹⁶⁶ Constitutiones Apostolorum V.VII,9, Funk 1905, 253.14–17.

¹⁶⁷ Funk 1905, 500.20–502.14.

¹⁶⁸ κὰν τῷ ποιεῖν νόμον δέδωκας αὐτῷ ἔμφυτον, ὅπως οἴκοθεν καὶ παρ' ἑαυτοῦ ἔχοι τὰ σπέρματα τῆς θεογονώσεως (Constitutiones Apostolorum VIII.XII,18), Funk 1905, 500.33–502.2.—Cf. Constitutiones Apostolorum VIII.IX,8 (Funk 1905, 486.20–21).

¹⁶⁹ Constitutiones Apostolorum VIII.XII,17, Funk 1905, 500.25–27.

reached if Adam had kept the commandment in Paradise.¹⁷⁰ Similarly we read later that God made man mortal by virtue of his constitution and promised him resurrection (θνητὸν ἐκ κατασκευῆς ποιήσας καὶ ἀνάστασιν ἐπαγγελλόμενος . . .).¹⁷¹

The scattered passages are unsystematic, but at least in the Constitutiones Apostolorum V.VII there are particular considerations that resemble Titus's and Theodore's. As a minimum we can say that Titus, Theodore and the Constitutiones Apostolorum constitute a common testimony to a specific interpretation of the Paradise narrative in the Syrian region. Any explanation demanding a little more must bear in mind that the compiler was an Arian. This has been convincingly argued by C.H. Turner, who suggested that the compiler was an Antiochene writer from somewhat before 400, e.g. c. 360–380, because around 400 there would hardly any longer have been any movement that attempted to Arianise Catholic literature.¹⁷²

Among the theologians that we have dwelt on, Eusebius of Caesarea demonstrated at least periodically some sympathy for Arius, and even though his pupil Eusebius of Emesa was not an Arian, his friendship with George of Laodicea is testimony to an environment in which there could be close ties with full-blood Arians. Diodore and Theodore on the other hand were unambiguous Nicenes. It seems most likely that similarities between the Constitutiones Apostolorum and Theodore are due to their common access to texts from the first half and the middle of the 4th century, where contact between Arians and the burgeoning Antiochene tradition was not an impossibility.

9. Hypotheses to explain similarities between interpretations of the Paradise narrative

The above examinations show that although there are striking similarities between on the one hand Titus of Bostra's interpretation of the Paradise narrative and on the other hand the interpretations in Eusebius of Caesarea, Eusebius of Emesa and Diodore of Tarsus, when it comes to the decisive point, the disobedience, the differences are deep: what according to Titus is useful, necessity and man's destiny, is for the others a fall and a catastrophe. This result of course requires some modification if Csl. 115 proves to be by Diodore, but this fragment can just as well come from Theodore.

¹⁷⁰ Constitutiones Apostolorum VIII.XII,19, Funk 1905, 502.2–5.

¹⁷¹ Constitutiones Apostolorum VIII.XLI,4, Funk 1905, 550.22–23.

¹⁷² Turner 1915.

But as for the crucial point, the disobedience, there is in contrast a broad similarity between Titus and most of Theodore's presentations; also passages in the Constitutiones Apostolorum appear to express the same as these two writers. In this way the examinations have confirmed and underpinned earlier assumptions that Theodore's radical interpretation of the Paradise narrative was not only his own work, but also continued a tradition in the Syrian region. I also assume that this tradition comes from vanished anti-Manichaean works, and that it was in the early or middle of the 4th century when Titus was also writing it influenced the compiler of the Constitutiones Apostolorum.

Even though further uncertainty creeps in when we try to develop this argument with further clarifications, the attempt will still be of value, since evaluating the different possibilities that the weak source material provides gives rise to historical models of explanation that offer more context in the results and thus sets up certain fundamental points of orientation for our understanding. I have attempted to draw up three good explanatory models which are all worthy of consideration; I myself prefer the third of these.

The first is really Gross and Scheffczyk's model, that Theodore was dependent on Titus. The simplicity is of course its strength, while its weakness has to do with the fact that the similarities between Titus and Theodore are more related to content than terminology, so that perhaps it is preferable to explain them through a common dependence on another writer, which presumably could better allow for the possibility for different formulations of the same basic ideas.

The second model of explanation is that both Theodore and Titus built on Diodore's vanished anti-Manichaean treatise. It is easy to imagine that Theodore used a Diodore-text. If Titus used Diodore, it may be for this reason that Theodoret wove Titus and Diodore together in Haereticarum fabularum compendium I.26. The theory fits in to some degree with the statement by Heraclianus that both Titus and Diodore used Adda-texts; for Diodore's part it was only Μόδιος, while Titus used several Adda-texts which can also have included Μόδιος. Titus may have become interested in Diodore's treatise, because it related to one of the same texts that he himself was concerned with. The theory also receives slight support from the fact that not until the final eighteen books does Diodore deal with the Manichaeans' use of biblical quotations, which is reminiscent of the fact that Titus only concerns himself with the Bible in the last two books; but here we must remember that Μόδιος, which was Diodore's subject in the first seven books, can also have concerned itself with the Bible, if indeed it was a kind of commentary on Mani's Living Gospel.

The objections to this explanation must have to do among other things with the chronology. We do not know when Titus and Diodore were born, but since Titus was already Bishop in 362 and died at the latest in 378, while Diodore did not become Bishop until 378 and died some time before 394, Diodore was doubtless considerably younger than Titus. Of course Titus can have used a younger man's work, but another problem is that Diodore's Commentarius in Octateuchum precisely did not, as far as we can see, contain the decisive point of similarity between Titus and Theodore, where God's foreknowledge and plan of salvation mean that the disobedience in the Garden of Eden has lost its catastrophic character. If Commentarius in Octateuchum is the work of Diodore's youth, while the anti-Manichaean writing was composed later, Diodore can of course have changed his view, but in that case Titus, who at the most can have had access to the works of Diodore's youth, can hardly have been dependent on Diodore.

I would therefore prefer the third model of explanation, which builds on my suggestion above that Heraclianus's information that George of Laodicea's refutations of Manichaeism were almost the same as Titus's refutations can be explained by Titus drawing on George's work. The particular interpretation of the Paradise narrative which Titus and Theodore share comes in reality from George. To be sure Theodore can have had direct access to George's work, but because the antagonism between Theodore and the Arians was so acute, it is perhaps more probable that also Diodore's anti-Manichaean writing was based on George's, so that it was Diodore's work that was Theodore's immediate source. Although Diodore too was a strict Nicene, his relationship as pupil to his teacher Eusebius of Emesa can have made him more open to a use of texts that stemmed from his teacher's friend. These contexts may even have been clear to Theodoret, who therefore in Haereticarum fabularum compendium I.26 first mentioned Titus and Diodore in an interlinked way and immediately after George and Eusebius of Emesa. Finally it was natural for the Arian compiler behind the Constitutiones Apostolorum to use ideas that came from his fellow-believer George.

This model of explanation is extremely uncertain because firstly it only deals with theological similarities and cannot be developed further through a demonstration of common passages, quotations and suchlike, and secondly because it refers to no fewer than two vanished texts (George's and Diodore's), but it has at least the advantage that it gives a coherent and not improbable explanation of the theological similarities that we elaborated above. What remains now is the question of whether there is anything in our otherwise slender knowledge of George of Laodicea's life and works which renders the theory impossible.

Assuming that all the references to "George of Laodicea" really are to the same person, we hear that George was originally a presbyter in Alexandria who already in 322 was living in Antioch and occupying a sharply Arian position. In Antioch he was one of those who opposed the city's Nicene Bishop, Eustathius, who banished him from the city in c. 326. Later George became Bishop of Laodicea and a leading Church politician; he now modified his previously sharply Arian views and became a supporter of the $\delta\mu\iota\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$ -formula and an opponent of Aetius and his Neo-Arians. In the 340's he helped Eusebius back to Emesa, from where he had earlier been banished by the local inhabitants, and he composed a eulogy to Eusebius on his death in 359 which was used as a source by the Church historians, Socrates and Sozomen.¹⁷³ Brief letters and fragments of letters by George are preserved, as well as a long letter in Epiphanius from 359 or 358, where George's authorship is not completely certain; but all this material deals with the Son's relationship to the Father and not with the Paradise narrative.¹⁷⁴ Since there is otherwise no clear or necessary link between the interpretation of the Paradise narrative which we hypothetically ascribed to George and an Arian teaching on Christ (for the particular interpretation of the Paradise narrative was also used by Titus and Theodore, who were not Arians), the only support for my theory is the fact that at least there is nothing in our fragile knowledge of George's environment and education that could gainsay it.

¹⁷³ See Hanson 1988, 44, 136–37, 209, 350, 365–71, 381–82, 388.

¹⁷⁴ Hanson 1988, 44, 365–71.—The long letter is in Epiphanius's Haer. 73.12,1–73.22,8 (Holl 1933, 284.11–295.32).

George's Alexandrian background, his career in Antioch and the Syrian region and his friendship with Eusebius of Emesa thus make it probable that he too, like Titus, was a writer who found himself midway between Alexandria and Antioch. As I pointed out, the particular interpretation of the Paradise narrative contains a considerable Platonising element, namely an interest in emphasising God's transcendence and immutability—that His plans are as eternal as His foreknowledge. It is natural to meet this Platonising element in a writer with an Alexandrian background. In this context we must note that Theodoret stressed George's philosophical education in Haereticarum fabularum compendium I.26 precisely in connection with George's anti-Manichaean writing.

Fundamentally I do not at any rate believe that it would in any way be likely that the similarities between Titus and Theodore could be explained by the two writers, independently of one another, developing similar conceptions. Their interpretation of the Paradise narrative was an innovation and was not an expression of the same ideas that the other writers had asserted. Retrospectively we can see how all the elements in their interpretation were present in the tradition, but also how these elements were welded into other structures. Titus's interpretation of the Paradise narrative came into being through a clash with the main trend in Greek patristics, and it is for this reason that in Contra Manichaeos III.17,7 he must underline: οὐδὲ γὰρ ἀπειθήσας ἄνθρωπος τὸ τηνικάδε ἀπώλετο ἢ ἀνίκηστα διέθηκεν ἑαυτόν.

CHAPTER TEN

SUMMARY OF THE STUDY'S MOST IMPORTANT CONCLUSIONS

In conclusion the results of this comprehensive examination will be briefly summarised and possible perspectives outlined. The subject has been Bishop Titus of Bostra's lengthy work Contra Manichaeos, and the unifying point of interpretation has been the idea that the work is best understood on the background of the contemporary situation, namely, a two-pronged Manichaean mission to particular pagan and Catholic groups in the province of Arabia which presented Manichaeism as the rational, philosophical and moral Christianity with the best solution to the theodicy question. The pagans who could be attracted by this mission were precisely those who were also open to the Catholic Church, and a particularly dangerous situation had therefore arisen since the relationship between Catholics and pagans was already very poor as a result of the conflicts under the Emperors Constantius II and Julian the Apostate. The Manichaean mission might also make inroads into Titus's own flock, where there were similar groups with an open attitude to alternative questions and messages.

On this background Titus of Bostra composed his refutation. As its basis he drew on some of the Manichaeans' own texts and on previous Christian heresiology, including earlier anti-Manichaean literature, as well as perhaps pagan philosophical works. In relation to the pagan readers who were attracted by Manichaeism, it was his primary intention to warn them and prevent their conversion to Manichaeism; secondarily, however, he also hoped that he could interest them in his positive message and his Church; in relation to Catholic readers his aim was quite simply to hold them firm in the Church context where they already found themselves. These aims required both that the correctness of the Manichaeans' view of themselves be denied, and that the questions and interests that had put wind in the Manichaean sails received a different response and were met in a different way.

The attack on the Manichaeans' presentation of themselves set out to show that this was in no way a rational and moral movement. On the contrary, Manichaeism was an irrational—and therefore ridiculous—asocial and barbarian movement, which with a totally deterministic world-view rendered moral appeals impossible and was actually itself engaged in lawless actions. Although Titus's polemic on the one hand thus wrote off any claim of Manichaeism to serious interest, he also on the other hand took its claim to have solved the theodicy problem seriously, because it was in this that he judged the Manichaeans' real strength to lie. According to Titus, Manichaeism's doctrine of eternal matter was an attempt to release God from the responsibility for evil, i.e. for men's sins and for the evil works of Creation, but in this area Titus knew better ways to defend God: the responsibility for sin lay in man, not in any matter, and the works of Creation were not evil but contributed to the education of mankind.

Titus's defence of God was based on man's innate reason, which expressed itself in common, universal concepts, and this defence was advanced almost without reference to the Bible, because it was also intended to be read by the pagans who were attracted to Manichaeism. The defence also bore the hallmarks of ideas originating from Greek schools of philosophy. Titus's concept of God contains in particular Platonic and Aristotelian ideas, the idea of the common concepts comes from Stoicism, while Titus's doctrine of the soul and ethical action is compounded of ideas from all three philosophical branches. Even though there was a concrete cause for him to present this philosophical theology, we must note that philosophical ideas had already long been employed by the Early Catholic theologians; in this sense there was nothing new in Titus's theological profile. Nevertheless, his dispute with one of the philosophy-oriented Manichaean texts resulted in parts of the traditional interpretation of Scripture—namely the interpretation of the Paradise narrative—having to be revised in new ways in relation to the philosophical objections that the Manichaean text raised.

While the earlier tradition had always interpreted Adam and Eve's disobedience in the Garden of Paradise as a catastrophic Fall, Titus accepted the objection in the Manichaean texts that by virtue of His foreknowledge God must have anticipated man's transgression; this foreknowledge must also imply, according to Titus, that from the very beginning the future transgression had been included in God's plans, for otherwise the consequence would be unacceptable for the concept of God, namely that God lost His freedom and was ruled by man's disobedience. If the disobedience was a step in God's plans for man, it could not then be understood as a fall, but must instead be a good, useful step in man's moral development. From the beginning it was God's intention both that man should struggle for virtue, learn from his initial transgression and end his earthly life with death, which was similarly beneficial for man and not a punishment, since death either put an end to man's sins or procured for the virtuous man rest after his efforts. Titus thus made God's immutable Providence and man's free moral progress converge in a presentation in which the incarnation apparently disappears off the face of the earth.

Titus's revision of the Paradise narrative is one of many examples of the fact that the philosophical theology in the first two books of Contra Manichaeos continues in the last two books, which are concerned with the proper understanding of the Bible and ostensibly are directed only to Catholic Christians. When Titus here too engages in demonstrating the rationality of the Church's teaching, the inference is that, just like the pagan groups, the people within Titus's church who were attracted by Manichaeism, had been influenced by the Manichaean claim to be on the side of reason. Moreover, it was probably also Titus's intention that the pagans affected should proceed further after the first two books and be influenced by the presentation in the last two books of Catholic Christianity as rational and philosophical.

It is of importance that with Contra Manichaeos we have an example of an Early Catholic text in which the inclusion of philosophical ideas and forms of thought in the theology is so clearly being linked to real strategies in relation to concrete groups inside and outside the Catholic Church. Even though on the one hand it is a particular feature that Titus rejects the understanding of Adam and Eve's transgression as a fall, it is clear on the other hand that his emphasis on man's innate reason, ethical freedom of choice and moral progress is a continuation of important themes in the theology of the Eastern Church. Contra Manichaeos can—as an extreme example—be said to underpin the suggestions that have been to the fore that the prominent position of these themes was in the context of a bias against Gnostic and Manichaean “heresies”, because the theology of these groups was regarded as deterministic systems that denied the possibility of ethical choice and development.

This context between a moralist-rationalist theology and the battle against heresies must be particularly relevant for theologians from the Antiochene School, to whom Titus possibly had a particular affiliation, since a number of them wrote several works against the Manichaean and similar heresies. In addition the special features of Titus's interpretation of the Paradise narrative are not unique; similar interpretations are to be found in fragments of Theodore of Mopsuestia's writings. Even though Theodore did not himself devote any particular attention to the battle against Manichaeism, I suggest that his interpretations on this point derive from earlier Antiochene anti-Manichaeism, just as I make the case that ultimately there must be a common source behind these interpretations and that of Titus; this source could be George of Laodicea's lost anti-Manichaean work.

As can be seen, these studies have centred around a clear historical interest, namely to knit the theological and philosophical material together with a particular situation in the province of Arabia in the second half of the 4th century. At first sight this interest ties the material to limited and special circumstances, but on closer inspection 'limited' and 'special' contain features of something that is in fact typical of early Christianity. A concern with Contra Manichaeos thus contributes to sharpening the attention to a circumstance that may never have been forgotten, but at times has been under-emphasised, namely that the history of Early Catholic theology should not merely be studied and explained as an internal development of the tradition, but should also be understood as being defined by the increasingly external relations to the surrounding pagan society and divergent Christian groups who were regarded as heretical. This study thus points towards a more comprehensive historical perspective for interpretation that can contribute to further knowledge in the field.

The present work examines in a historical context the content of the discussion in which Titus participated, i.e. the questions as to what evil, the soul, ethical action and God actually are. To be sure, this discussion may lay claim to contain universal statements, but it is nevertheless the historian's task to place it in a past context. However, considering the distance of modern culture to Antiquity, the contextualisation of texts that lay claim to universality is in reality a precondition for all further engagement with them. The wider importance of this study is, I hope, as a stimulus to further discussions across the disciplines.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

CRITICAL EXAMINATIONS OF THE TEXT

Sigla

Bibl. =	Photius, Bibliothèque , ed. Henry 1967
Bibl.A =	Bibl. , cod. 232, ed. Henry 1967. Marcianus Gr. 450
Bibl.M =	Bibl. , cod. 232, ed. Henry 1967. Marcianus Gr. 451
C =	Sacra Parallela , Codex Coislinianus 276. I have used the edition in Pitra 1888 together with the corrections in Casey 1928
corr =	emendations without direct support in a manuscript
ed.L and ed.L (H) =	De Lagarde 1859, i.e. De Lagarde's edition of H ed.L59a =	De Lagarde 1859a, i.e. De Lagarde's edition of Sy ed.N =	Nagel 1973, i.e. Nagel's edition of Contra Manichaeos III.7–30 transmitted in V ed.N67 =	Nagel 1967, i.e. Nagel's unpublished edition of Contra Manichaeos III.7–30 transmitted in V
ed.N67s =	Nagel 1967, i.e. Nagel's unpublished edition of Contra Manichaeos III.7–30 transmitted in Sy
G =	Congregazione della Missione urbana di S. Carlo, Genoa, cod. 27. I have used copies of the manuscript
H =	Hamburg, Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek, cod. phil. 306 (olim Stadtbibliothek, Philosophi gr. in fol. XVI). I have not used the actual manuscript
R =	Sacra Parallela , the recension in Codex Rupefucaldinus. I have used the edition in Lequien 1712, as found in PG 18
Sy =	British Museum add. 12,150. I have used copies of the manuscript. The references, however, are to page and line numbers in De Lagarde 1859a
Torres =	Franciscus Turrianus's translation of Titus into Latin in Canisius 1604, here following PG 18
V =	Athos Vatopaedi No. 236. I have used copies of the manuscript, together with ed.N and ed.N67

Number 1

I.1, Gr. 1.1–16

Πᾶσι¹ μὲν οἷς γέγονε διὰ σπουδῆς τῶν ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἀμαρτανομένων τὰς αἰτίας ἐξελεῖν θεοῦ, ὅσιός τε καὶ ἀληθῆς γέγονε κατὰ τοῦτο τῶν τοιούτων ὁ σκοπός, εἴγε μὴ διαφυγόντες τὸ προνοεῖν τῶν καθ' ἡμᾶς τὸν θεὸν εὐλόγως² καὶ φιλαλήθως ἀνθρώποις ἀνέθηκαν τὰ σφῶν αὐτῶν ἀμαρτήματα, ἐπείτοιγε³ μικρὸν ἰᾶσθαι τι βουλευθέντες μείζονι καὶ χαλεπῷ νοσήματι τῆς ἀσεβείας περιέπεσον, εἰς ἄρνησιν τῆς ἐν παντὶ φαινομένης τοῦ θεοῦ προνοίας ἐμπεσόντες—ὁ δὲ Μάνης,⁴ ἐκ βαρβάρων <ὦν>⁵ καὶ τῆς μανίας αὐτῆς ἐπόνουμος, ἔτι πρὸς ἀσέβειαν⁶ βλαβερωτέρῳ φαρμάκῳ κατεχρήσατο. κακίας γὰρ ἀνάιτιον ἀποδείξει τὸν θεὸν βουληθεὶς κακίαν <παρόμοιον>⁷ ἀντέστησεν αὐτῷ, ἀγένητον⁸ (ὡς φησιν) ἀγενήτῳ,⁹ καὶ¹⁰ ζῶσαν ζῶντι, αἰεὶ μὲν ἐπανισταμένην καὶ μαχομένην (καὶ οὐπόποτε¹¹ μὴ οὐχὶ πράγματα παρέχουσαν αὐτῷ),¹² ἀναιρεθῆναι¹³ δὲ πρὸς αὐτοῦ παντελῶς μὴ δυναμένην ὡς αἰδιόν τε καὶ συμπληρωμένην τὴν οὐσίαν ὡς¹⁴ ἀγένητον¹⁵—καὶ καπνὸν (ὡς φασί) φεύγων ἐμπέτωκεν εἰς τὸ πῦρ.

- 1 Πᾶσι V ed.L(H); Π omitted in G—the scribe perhaps planned to write it later, transposed to the left, but then forgot to do so.
- 2 θεὸν εὐλόγως V ed.L(H); θεὸν δὲ εὐλόγως G.
- 3 ἐπέτιογε G ed.L(H); ἐπέτιοι V.
- 4 Μάνης V corr.ed.L; μανεῖς G H(acc.to ed.L). The wordplay is perhaps clearer with μανεῖς; but Sy 2.7 has ܡܢܐ, not ܡܢܝܢ ܡܢܐ.
- 5 <ὦν> corr.ed.L; omitted in V G H(acc.to ed.L). <ὦν> supported by ܡܘܨܠܟܝ in Sy 2.7; perhaps lost through haplography (βαρβαρωνων → βαρβαρων).
- 6 πρὸς ἀσέβειαν V G ed.L(H); Sy 2.8–9 on the other hand has ܘܘܗܝܟ ܠܡܢܝܢ ܠܘܘܟܘܢ ܠܡܘܘ ܕܡܠܟܘܬܐ, Mani “used a yet more harmful poison of impiety”—perhaps a correction due to the Greek text being regarded as meaningless?
- 7 <παρόμοιον> corr.ed.L—presumably based on Sy 2.10–11 ܠܘܘܟܘܢ ܡܘܨܠܟܝ ܠܘܘܟܘܢ ܡܠ ܡܘܨܠܟܝ, “evil which in equality is like him”; προῖων V G H(acc.to ed.L).
- 8 ἀγένητον G ed.L(H); ἀγέννητον V. In Titus’s time, however, there was no clear semantic distinction between ἀγένητος and ἀγέννητος (cf. Lebreton 1926).
- 9 ἀγενήτῳ G ed.L(H); ἀγεννήτῳ V. Cf. Number 1, n. 8.
- 10 καὶ V—supported by ܘܐ, “and”, in Sy 2.11; omitted in G ed.L(H).
- 11 οὐπόποτε V G—supported by ܠܝܬ ܠܡܢ ܡܘܨܠܟܝ ܘܐ ܡܠ ܠܘܘܟܘܢ, ܡܘܨܠܟܝܬܐ in Sy 2.12–13, “and which never even ceases from harming him.”; οὐποτε ed.L(H).
- 12 This parenthesis has been added to clarify the meaning.
- 13 ἀναιρεθῆναι G ed.L(H); ἀνταναιρεθῆναι V.
- 14 ὡς V G—supported by ܟܝܘܢ, “as”, in Sy 2.15; καὶ ed.L(H).
- 15 ἀγένητον G ed.L(H); ἀγέννητον V. Cf. Number 1, n. 8.

As for all those who are eager to remove the causes of men’s sins from God, their aim in this regard is both holy and truthful, if they do not flee from the (reality) that God takes care of things among us, and with reason and openness ascribes to men their own sins.(a) Since it was indeed something insignificant that they wished to heal, they plunged into the greater and heavy sickness of impiety, ending up by denying that God’s Providence reveals itself in everything.(b)

Manes, who was from the barbarians and was rightly named after “madness” (μανία), used a yet more harmful medicament against impiety:(c) because he wanted to show God to be innocent of the evil, he set up evil against God, making it almost equal to Him, uncreated—so he says—against uncreated, and living against living, as one who has always on the one hand rebelled against God and fought with God—but has never at any time caused God trouble—yet on the other hand has been completely unable to take anything from God, because the substance, being uncreated, is both eternal and perfected. And, as the saying goes, “he who flees the smoke has fallen into the fire”.(d)

- a) Titus maintains that it is a legitimate concern to release God from the responsibility for human sin and instead lay the entire blame on mankind, provided that this does not lead to the denial of Providence.
- b) Titus means that attributing the blame for mankind’s sin to God is an insignificant impiety compared to the denial of Providence.
- c) i.e. against the impiety of holding God responsible for evil.
- d) A well-known proverb: see Pseudo-Diogenianus, Par. VIII,45: Τὸν καπνὸν φεύγων, εἰς τὸ πῦρ ἐνέπεσον· ἐπὶ τῶν τὰ μικρὰ τῶν δεινῶν φευγόντων, καὶ εἰς μείζονα δεινὰ ἐμπιπτόντων (Von Leutsch and Schneidewin 1839, 314.1–3), also Macarius Chrysocephalus, Rhod. VIII,42 (Von Leutsch 1851, 220.1); Michael Apostolius, Coll. par. IX,59a (Von Leutsch 1851, 474.15) and XVI,93 (Von Leutsch 1851, 684.21–22), cf. Poirier and Sensal 1990, 3 n. 15; Lieu 1994, 128 with n. 441, 192–93 with n. 159.

Number 2

I.1, Gr. 1.22–30

ὅτι μὲν γὰρ¹ εὐσεβὲς τῶν² παρὰ ἀνθρώποις ἀδικημάτων ἀνάιτιον παντὶ σθένει τὸν θεὸν ὁμολογεῖν, πρῶτος πρεσβεύειν ἐσπούδακε τῆς καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας ὁ λόγος· ζητούμενου δὲ τίνα τρόπον πλημμελοῦμεν ἡμεῖς, τοῦ θεοῦ μὴ βουλομένου, οὐ³ περὶ μειζόνων κατηγοροῦμεν θεοῦ, περὶ μικροτέρων ὡσπερ ἐκείνος ἀπολογεῖσθαι βουλόμενοι, ἀλλ’ αὐτὴν τῆς ἀληθείας τὴν ὁδὸν ἔκ τε τῶν ἁγίων γραφῶν καὶ τῶν κοινῶν ἐννοιῶν ἔχοντες ἀσφαλῶς ὀδεύομεν⁴ πρὸς τὴν τοιαύτην ζήτησιν, τῷ γε ἑαυτοῖς φιλαλήθως προσεγκαλεῖν εὐσεβῆ τὴν ἀπόδειξιν τὴν ὑπὲρ θεοῦ ποιούμενοι.

1 γὰρ ed.L(H) cf. ⲓ, “for” in Sy 2.22; omitted in V G.

2 τῶν V ed.L(H); omitted in G.

3 οὐ ed.L(H) cf. ⲛ in Sy 2.25; omitted in V G, perhaps lost through haplography (βουλομενουου → βουλομενου).

4 ὀδεύομεν V ed.L(H); ὀδεύωμεν G.

For the teaching of the Catholic Church endeavours to give priority to (the point) that it is pious to confess with full vigour that God is innocent of the injustices that exist among men. When we examine in what way we sin, since God does not wish us to do so, we do not accuse God of great things, since like him(a) we wish to defend Him with regard to minor things. On the contrary: since we possess the very way of truth both from the Holy Scriptures and from the common concepts, we are walking assuredly towards the examination that is thus constituted, and by sincerely directing the charges against ourselves, we make the demonstrative proof in defence of God a pious one.

(a) 'him': i.e. Mani.

Number 3

I.5, Gr. 4.11–14

τοιγαροῦν λοιπὸν ἐπὶ τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς μυθώδους ἀσεβείας αὐτῶν ἔλθωμεν, ἐξετάζοντες, εἰ παραδέχονται γοῦν αἱ κατὰ φύσιν ἔννοιαι δύο ἐναντίας ἀρχὰς τῶν ὄντων.¹ εἰ² γὰρ μηδὲ συμφωνούσας δέξαιντ' ἄν, ἤπου γε μαχομένας;

1 τῶν ὄντων V G ed.L(H); omitted in Sy 5.31.

2 εἰ V ed.L(H); ἢ G.

Hereafter therefore let us come to their fabulous principle of impiety, in that we shall examine whether the natural concepts at least allow for two opposite principles in the existing things. For if the natural concepts will not even allow for two concordant principles, how will they then be able to allow for two conflicting principles?

Number 4

I.12, Gr. 6.25–32

<ἄρα εἰ>¹ ἑκάτερον τῶν παρὰ τῷ μανέντι νομιζομένων ἐναντιῶν οὐσία ζῶσά τε καὶ ἀγένητος² ὀνομάζεται, <οὐ δῆλον>³ ὡς, ἐκ βαρβάρων τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς τοιαύτης λαβούσης πλάνης, διέφθαρται <παρ' αὐτῷ>⁴ τῶν κοινῶν ἐννοιῶν⁵ ἢ ἀκολουθία; ὀλόκληρος γὰρ καὶ ἡ αὐτὴ ἐπ' ἴσης τυγχάνει ἑκατέρου ὑπογραφῆ, οὐ μόνον ἐναντιότητος πάσαν ὑπομίαν ἐξορίζουσα, ἀλλ' οὔτε διαφορὰν τινα συγχωροῦσα ἐν τοῖς ὀνομαζομένοις ὑπάρχειν.

- 1 <ἄρα εἰ> corr.ed.L—supported by $\aleph \Delta \alpha \alpha \alpha$, “And now therefore, if . . .”, in Sy 9.1; ἄρ’ οὖν VGH(acc.to ed.L).
- 2 ἀγέννητος G ed.L(H); ἀγέννητος V. Cf. Number 1, n. 8.
- 3 <οὐ δῆλον> corr.ed.L—supported by $\pi \omega \kappa \lambda \kappa \omega \kappa$, “is it not evident that . . .” in Sy 9.3; εὐδηλον VGH(acc.to ed.L).
- 4 <παρ’ αὐτῶ> corr. on the basis of $\sigma \theta \alpha \lambda$ in Sy 9.4; παρ’ αὐτῶν VGH (probably attraction to the following), but in G above the line corrected to -οῖς; παρ’ αὐτοῖς ed.L(H).
- 5 ἐννοιῶν G ed.L(H)—supported by Sy 9.5; omitted in V.

If each of the two which are regarded by the madman(a) as opposites is called “a living and uncreated substance”, is it not then clear that since the origin of such a misconception is taken from the barbarians, the consequence from the common concepts is destroyed for him? For the description of both of them is also to the same extent completely the same, in that it not only removes the entire suspicion of an opposition but also does not allow any difference to be present in the mentioned (substances).

a) ‘the madman’: i.e. Mani.

Number 5

I.13, Gr. 7.4–36

ποιότητων μὲν οὖν ἐναντιότητα ἔστιν ἐν τοῖς οὖσιν εὐρεῖν, οὐσίας δὲ οὐδαμοῦ. λευκὸν γὰρ πρὸς μέλαν ἐναντίως ἔχει, ἐκάτερον δὲ ἐν σώματι τῆ αὐτῆ¹ οὐσία. ἔχει μέντοι αὐτὰ πῆ μὲν ἐναντίως πρὸς ἄλληλα, πῆ δὲ οὐκ ἐναντίως. πρῶτον μὲν γὰρ ὑφ’ ἐν γένος ἐστί (χρῶμα γὰρ ἐκάτερα), ἔπειτα εἰ καὶ ἐναντία εἶναι δοκεῖ, ἀλλὰ γε τῆ ὄψει ποικίλως προσάγει τὴν ἀπόλαυσιν. οὐδέτερον γὰρ αὐτοῖν τῆ ἀσυμμετρία λυπεῖ ταύτην. ἀλλὰ καὶ ἤδη ἀρετὴ τε καὶ κακία ἐν ψυχῇ, ὡς ἐναντία μὲν καὶ ταῦτα, οὐ μόνον δὲ ἐν τῆ αὐτῆ οὐσία, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν ἐνὶ γένει προσαγορεύεται (ἕξις γὰρ ἐκάτερα), ἄτινα² καὶ ὡς ἐπισυμβαίνοντα ψυχῇ ἐνυπάρχει, ὅθεν καὶ ἀποσυμβαίνειν ἐνδέχεται, τῆς ἐν ἧ ἐστί ταῦτα ἄλλοτε ἄλλως διακειμένης· ὡς εἶναι δῆλον, ὡς ὁ μὲν περὶ τῆς οὐσίας λόγος ἀφώρισται, ὁ δὲ περὶ τῶν ταύτη ἐπισυμβαίνόντων ἕτερος τυγχάνει. καίτοι τὸ μὲν λευκὸν τε καὶ μέλαν ἔστιν ὅτε καὶ ὡς ἀχώριστα ἐνυπάρχει τοῖς ἐν οἷς ἐστί, καὶ ὅμως οὐδεὶς πώποτε ἀπὸ τούτων ὠνόμακεν ἐκεῖνα, ἐν οἷς ἐστί ταῦτα. οὐδεὶς γὰρ θελήσας γάλα σημῆναι οὐχὶ μᾶλλον πρὸ τοῦ κατὰ τοῦ εἶδους³ τῆς οὐσίας ὀνόματος κεμένου κατεχρήσατο τῶ⁴ τῆς λευκότητος, ἵνα μὴ ἀνθ’ ἐνὸς πολλὰ σημαίνειν δόξῃ οἷς λευκότης⁵ πρόσεστιν. ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ κόρακα οὐ τῶ μέλανος⁶ σημαίνομεν, ἀλλὰ τῷ τοῦ ζῆου καὶ τοῦ εἶδους ὀνόματι.⁷ αὐται μὲν οὖν καὶ τοιαῦται ἀχώριστοι ποιότητες, ἀρετὴ δὲ καὶ κακία ἐν ψυχῇ τῶν ἐπισυμβαινουσῶν ποιότητων εἰσίν, ὡς μᾶλλον προσήκειν μηδαμῶς ἀπὸ τούτων τὴν οὐσίαν δοκεῖν⁸ τὴν ἀνθρώπου κατηγορεῖσθαι, δεῖν δὲ ταύτην ἰδίως σημαίνεσθαι. οὐδεὶς γοῦν τὸ τί ἐστὶν ἀνθρώπος ἐκ τῆς ἐνούσης τῷ τινὶ κακίας ἐσήμανεν, ἀλλὰ πρῶτον τῆς οὐσίας⁹ τὸ εἶδος εἰπὼν, εἶτα καὶ τὸ τίς προσειπὼν ὕστερον κατηγορεῖ τὴν ποιότητα. ποιότητων μὲν οὖν (ὁ¹⁰ προλαβὼν εἶπον) εὗροι τις ἂν ἐν τοῖς ὑποβεβηκόσιν ἐναντιότητα τῶν μὲν χωριστῶν, τῶν δὲ καὶ ἀχωριστῶν· ἐπὶ δὲ τοῦ θεοῦ πᾶσα μὲν ποιότης ἐκβέβληται, ἐπειδὴ γε οὐδὲν ὦν καλεῖται ἕτερον παρ' αὐτόν (ἀπλοῦς γὰρ καὶ ἀσύνθετος ἐστίν), ὅμως δὲ τῇ ἐννοίᾳ (ὁ προλαβόντες εἶπομεν) προτερεῦε τὸ εἶναι τοῦ τοιόνδε¹¹ εἶναι.

1 αὐτῇ V G; αὐτοῦ ed.L(H).

2 ἄτινα G ed.L(H); ἄ V.

3 τοῦ εἶδους G ed.L(H) (lectio difficilior); τὸ εἶδος V.

4 τῷ V G; τὸ ed.L(H).

5 λευκότης V G—cf. λευκότης, "whiteness", in Sy 10.8; omitted in ed.L(H).

6 τῷ μέλανος V; τῷ μέλανι G ed.L(H).

7 καὶ τοῦ εἶδους ὀνόματι G ed.L(H); καὶ τῷ τοῦ εἶδους ὀνόματι V.

8 δοκεῖν V G—cf. δοκεῖν, "seems", in Sy 10.14; δεῖν ed.L(H).

9 οὐσίας G ed.L(H)—cf. οὐσία = οὐσίας in Sy 10.17; κακίας V.

10 ὁ G ed.L(H); ὡς V.

11 τοῦ τοιόνδε G ed.L(H); τοιοῦτον δὲ V.

One can admittedly find a contrariety in the qualities of the existing things, but in no way in the substance. For white is contrary to black, but both are in the body of the same substance. For they are precisely on the one hand contrary to one another and on the other hand not contrary to one another: in the first place they belong to a single genus in that both are colours; and if they then seem to be contraries, they still provide pleasure for the eye through the variety of colour. For neither of them causes harms to pleasure by their lack of symmetry. Moreover, there is both virtue and vice in the soul, and although these are also contraries, they are not only in the same substance, but are also designated in a single genus, for they are both a state, and they are also present in the soul as something accidental, for which reason it is also possible that they are accidentally absent, since the soul that they are in finds itself first in one mood, then in the other. Thus it is clear that one thing is the account of the substance, another is the account of the things that come into being in this(a) by accident.

And indeed, white and black are sometimes in a way inseparable from the things they are in, but nevertheless no one has ever given the things they are in a name after them. For no one who has wished to signify “milk” has used the name of whiteness instead of the name that in accordance with its species is given to its substance—in order not to seem to signify the many things to which the name of whiteness is attached instead of a single thing. Of course we do not signify the raven by the name of blackness either, but we signify it by the name of the animal and the species. These and similar qualities are inseparable, but virtue and vice in a soul are qualities that have come into being by accident, so that it is more appropriate that man’s substance in no way seems to be predicated from these things, but that it should be signified in a particular way. At least no one has signified what man is from the evil that is present in this or that man, but first one has stated the species of the substance, and then named who it is, and only finally predicated the quality.

Now one could then, as I anticipated before, find a contrariety of qualities in the subordinate things, partly in the separable qualities, partly in the inseparable qualities. But in respect of God every quality is rejected, because none of the things that He is called is something else beside Him, for He is simple and uncompounded, but nevertheless, as I mentioned previously, “being” takes precedence from the perspective of thinking over “being such as this”.

a) ‘this’: i.e. substance.

Number 6

I.15, Gr. 8.27–35

ἔπειτα εἰ καλοῖεν τὰ γὰθὸν ἀφθαρσίαν, φθορὰν ὀνομάσουσιν τὸ κακόν. τίνος δ’ ἂν εἴη φθορὰ ἢ φθορά; τοῦ μὲν γὰρ ἀγαθοῦ ἀδύνατον· εἰ δ’ ἑαυτῆς¹ εἴη φθορά, ἐν πολλοῖς τοῖς αἰῶσι διέφθαρκεν ἑαυτὴν καὶ μάτην αὐτὴν εἶναι φαντάζονται. πῶς δ’ ἂν εἴη φθορὰ ἑαυτῆς ἢ φθορά;² πάντως γὰρ ἕτερόν τι φθείρει, οὐχ ἑαυτὴν. εἰ δὲ ἑαυτὴν ἔφθειρεν,³ οὐδ’ ἂν τὴν ἀρχὴν ὑπέστη.⁴ ὀφθήσεται⁵ γὰρ ἑαυτὴν φθείρουσα μᾶλλον⁶ ἢ οὐσα· φθορὰ γὰρ ἀφθαρτος⁷ ἀδύνατον κατὰ γε τὰς κοινὰς ἐννοίας⁸ ἐπινοηθῆναι.⁹

1 ἑαυτῆς G ed.L(H); αὐτῆς V.

2 πῶς δ’ ἂν εἴη φθορὰ ἑαυτῆς ἢ φθορά: πῶς δ’ ἂν εἴη φθορὰ V G ed.L(H); πῶς ἀν εἴη φθορά ἐαντῆς ἢ φθορά Bibl.A 288b25–26; πῶς ἂν φθορά ἐπ’ αὐτῆς ἢ φθορά Bibl.M 288b25–26;—Sy 11.33–34 seems largely to support Bibl., though the particle δ’ is supported by Sy: ܕܬܝܢ ܕܠܡܝܫܝܩܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ ܕܢܘܫܝܢ—the syntax is admittedly rather puzzling; in a letter (dated 20th October 2001) Sebastian Brock has suggested two possible ways of taking it: “(i) take ܕܢܘܫܝܢ as standing in apposition to ܕܝܡ (= ܕܠܡܝܫܝܩܝܢ)”: “But how is it possible that it (evil)—corruption—should be the corruptor of itself?” “or (ii) take ܕܢܘܫܝܢ as fem. abs. of the adjective”: “But how is it possible that it should be a corruptor, the corruptor of itself?”—δ’ is of course omitted in Bibl., because this sentence introduces Photius’s quotation from Titus.

- 3 ἔφθειρεν Bibl. 288b27—supported by ܕܠܡܝܫܝܩܝܢ in Sy 11.35; omitted in V G ed.L(H).
- 4 οὐδ’ ἂν τὴν ἀρχὴν ὑπέστη V G ed.L(H); οὐδὲ τὴν ἀρχὴν ἂν ὑπέστη Bibl. 288b27.
- 5 ὀφθήσεται V G ed.L(H); φθαρήσεται Bibl. 288b28; omitted in Sy 12.1.
- 6 φθείρουσα μᾶλλον V G ed.L(H); μᾶλλον φθείρουσα Bibl. 288b28.
- 7 φθορά γὰρ ἀφθαρτος V G ed.L(H); φθορὰν γὰρ ἀφθαρτον Bibl. 288b28–29.
- 8 ἐννοίας V G Bibl. 288b29; ἐπινοίας ed.L(H).
- 9 ἐπινοηθῆναι V G ed.L(H)—supported by Sy 12.2–3; ἐπινοηθῆναί ποτε Bibl. 288b29–30.

Furthermore: If they call the good “incorruption” they will doubtless give evil the name “corruption”. But what is it that the corruption corrupts? It is impossible that it is the good. But if it is corruption itself that is corrupted, it has been corrupted for many eternities, and they fantasise to no purpose that it (still) exists. But how can corruption be corruption of itself? For it is at any rate something other that is corrupted by it, and not itself. But if it was itself it corrupted, it would not have existed to begin with either, for it should be noted that (in that case) it would rather have been corrupted than have existed: for it is impossible that corruption is incorruptible according to what the common concepts intend.

Number 7

I.16, Gr. 9.1–4

ὅταν μέντοι τοιούτων ἀκούωσι λόγων οἱ ἐκ τοῦ μανέντος ὀρμώμενοι, ἀποροῦντες Πόθεν οὖν¹ (φασί) τὰ κακά; πόθεν δὲ (λέγουσιν) ἢ ἐν τοῖς πράγμασιν ἐμφαινομένη ἀταξία;

1 οὖν G ed.L(H); εἰςὶ V.

But when those who issue from the madman hear such words, they ask the questions: “From where,” they say, “do evil things come?” “From where,” they say, “does the disorder come that reveals itself in the things?”

Number 8

L.17, Gr. 9.25–38

γένεονε τοίνυν μίξις καὶ κρᾶσις τοῦτον (φησί) τὸν τρόπον τῆς τε καταποθείσης δυνάμεως τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ καὶ τῆς καταπιούσης ὕλης, καὶ οὕτως ἐξ ἀμφοῖν ἐδημιουργήθη τόδε τὸ¹ πᾶν, ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ δηλαδὴ· οὐ γὰρ ἂν προῦνόησεν ἢ κακία κόσμου γενέσεως. ἐντεῦθεν δὴ (φασί) τὰ μὲν ἀγαθὰ, τὰ δὲ κακὰ, τῆς κράσεως ἐκείνης καὶ τῆς συνόδου τοῖν δυοῖν διὰ τῆς ἐναντιότητος τῶν τῆδε πραγμάτων ἐμφαινομένης. ὀρίζεται δὲ ψυχὴν μὲν ἅπασαν εἶναι τῆς μερίδος τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, σῶμα δὲ² καὶ τὴν σάρκα τῆς ὕλης, πῆ μὲν κατέχουσιν³ ὡς ἐν εἰρκτῇ τὴν ψυχὴν, πῆ δὲ κατεχομένην ὡς θηρίον πρὸς⁴ τῆς ἐπφδῆς. οὕτω μὲν δὴ σοφισάμενος τὴν ὕλην ὁ ἀγαθὸς κόσμου (φησί) γέγονε δημιουργός, οὐκ ἀντιποιηθείς γε τοῦ δημιουργῆσαι αὐτόν (ἀνθίσταται γὰρ αὐτῷ), ἀλλὰ διὰ τὴν ἐπανάστασιν τῆς κακίας, ἣν σωφρονίσαι⁵ διενόηθη.

1 τόδε τὸ ed.L(H); τόδε G; τὸ δὲ V.

2 δὲ G ed.L(H); omitted in V.

3 κατέχουσιν ed.L(H); κατέχον G; κατέχων V. Since the two πῆ are parallel, it is reasonable to assume that the participles also are, hence the text of H is preferred here.

4 πρὸς G ed.L(H)—supported by ⚡, “by”, in Sy 13.11; πρὸ V.

5 σωφρονίσαι V G; σωφρονῆσαι ed.L(H).

So in this way a mixture and a mingling have arisen,—he says,(a)—of the power of the good one, which has been devoured, and by the matter that has devoured it, and thus this universe was created out of both, manifestly(b) by the good one, for the evil does not concern itself with the genesis of the world. It is precisely for this reason, they say, that both good things and bad things exist, since the mentioned mingling and fusion of the two forces in question shows itself here through the opposition between things. But he declares that the entire soul is part of the good, and that the entire body and the flesh are part of matter; matter holds the soul as in a prison, but is itself held like an animal by an incantation. Then since the good one has fooled matter in this way, he is, he says,(a) the Creator of the world; true he did not strive to create (the world), for he stands against it, but he did so because of the rebellion of evil, which he had in mind to quell.

- a) ‘he’: i.e. Mani.
 b) ‘manifestly’ is probably intended ironically; cf. δηλαδῆ in Liddell, Scott and Jones 1968, 384b.

Number 9

I.17, Sy 13.32–34

This passage is omitted in Gr. 10.17—also in G+V

ⲕⲉⲗⲁⲙⲁⲥⲁ ⲉⲛ ⲗⲏⲧⲏ ⲗⲁⲕ ⲡⲟⲩ ⲕⲁⲛⲁⲛⲟⲩ ⲙⲁⲛⲉⲛⲧⲟⲩ ⲉⲗⲗ ⲗⲁⲕ ⲉⲗⲗ ⲓⲛⲙⲉⲗⲗ ⲕⲉⲟⲩⲱ ⲗⲁⲙⲁⲥⲁ

It is probably best to regard this passage as part of Titus’s original text, which by mistake has slipped out of the Greek text transmission. Sy has no particular interest in adding it independently.

For he has concealed his books and has placed them in darkness because he feared the refutation which would be (made) against them on the basis of(a) them.

- a) ‘of’: lit. ‘from’.

Number 10

I.21, Gr. 13.2

ὡς γε ὁ τὰ τοῦ μανέντος συγγράφων φησὶν¹ “ἐπιθυμοῦντες”

1 ὁ τὰ τοῦ μανέντος συγγράφων φησὶν V G ed.L(H): otherwise in Sy 17.8 ⲙⲁⲛⲉⲛⲧⲟⲩ ⲙⲁⲛⲉⲛⲧⲟⲩ ⲕⲁⲛⲁⲛⲟⲩ, “the mad Mani says in his book”. The difference is probably best explained by Sy simplifying the original.

... as he, who writes down the madman’s teachings, says, “they desired” ...

Number 11

I.24, Gr. 15.19–37

αὐτίκα οὐχ ἡμεῖς μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ἀγγέλων αἱ ἀναβεβηκυῖαι δυνάμεις, ὅτι μὲν ἔστι τάγαθὸν γινώσκωμεν, τῇ γνώσει καὶ μόνη πρὸς τὴν εὐσέβειαν τρεφόμενοι, ἀγγέλων δηλαδή ἀναβεβηκότων κατὰ τὴν γνῶσιν ὅσον καὶ κατὰ φύσιν· τοῦ δὲ θεόν¹ κατ' οὐσίαν ἰδεῖν οὐθ' ἡμῖν οὔτε ἐκείνοις μετόν· ὅπου ἡμῖν οὐδ' ἀγγέλους αὐτούς², ἐν ὅσῳ τὸ κατὰ φύσιν περικείμεθα σῶμα, δυνατὸν ἰδεῖν. δῆλον γὰρ καὶ σαφῶς ὁμολογούμενον ὡς ὅ τι³ βλέπων ὅμοιον ἑαυτῷ ὄν τοῦτο βλέπει. εἰ δὲ τις ἀπαιδεύτως οἰηθεῖ σαθρὸν εἶναι τὸ ῥηθὲν (ἐμβλέπομεν γὰρ ἥλιον καὶ σελήνην καὶ ἀστέρας, ἔτι μὴν ὑφ' ἡμᾶς λίθους⁴ χρυσόν τε καὶ ἄργυρον καὶ συνόλωσ τὴν τε <γῆν καὶ τὴν>⁵ θάλασσαν καὶ τὰ ζῶα σύμπαντα, καὶ οὐ δῆπου τούτοις ὅμοιοί ἐσμεν), μανθανέτω ὡς εἰ καὶ διάφορα τὰ εἶδη τῶν κατηριθμημένων, ἀλλὰ γε τούτων ἀπάντων ἀναβεβηκὸς γένος τὸ σῶμα. τῆς γὰρ οὐσίας τὸ μὲν ἀόρατον ὡς ἀσώματον, τὸ δὲ ὄρατὸν⁶ ὡς σῶμα. ἢ τοίνυν πρώτη τομὴ πάντα τὰ ταῦτα⁷ ὡς ἂν γένος ἀφορίζει <σῶμα ὄν>.⁸ σῶμα τοίνυν σῶμα βλέπει, καὶ καθ' ὃ σῶμα, ὅμοιον καὶ συγγενὲς τὸ ὄρων τῷ ὄρωμένῳ, εἰ καὶ διάφορα τούτων τὰ εἶδη διὰ τὸ ποικίλον καὶ κόσμιον τῷ παντί.⁹

1 θεόν V G; θεοῦ ed.L(H).

2 ἀγγέλους αὐτούς G ed.L(H); ἀγγέλοις αὐτοῖς V.

3 ὅ τι ed.L(H); ὅτι ὁ V G.

4 λίθους G ed.L(H)—supported by $\kappa\epsilon\tau\iota\lambda$, “stones”, in Sy 20.25; λίθων V.

5 <γῆν καὶ τὴν> corrected on the basis of $\kappa\epsilon\tau\iota\epsilon\lambda$, “the earth”, in Sy 20.25.

6 τὸ δὲ ὄρατὸν G ed.L(H); τὸ δὲ ὄρατὸν τὸ δὲ ὄρατὸν V (dittography).

7 πάντα τὰ ταῦτα ed.L(H); πάντα ταῦτα V G.

8 <σῶμα ὄν> corr. on the basis of $\kappa\epsilon\tau\iota\lambda\ \mu\omicron\sigma\alpha\delta\epsilon\kappa\iota$, “which is the body”, in Sy 20.32.

9 διὰ τὸ ποικίλον καὶ κόσμιον τῷ παντί V—supported by $\kappa\omicron\lambda\omicron\sigma\epsilon\delta\iota\ \Delta\psi\ \Delta\alpha\sigma\iota\ \kappa\omicron\lambda\omicron\sigma\epsilon\delta\epsilon\sigma\sigma\alpha$, “because of the adornment and variety of the whole” in Sy 20.34–35; κόσμιον τὸ παντί ed.L(H); κόσμιον τῷ τοῦ παντὸς παντί G (acc. to Pitra 1888, 61 the text is now partially illegible), presumably a gloss.

For example, not only we but also the angels' superior powers know that the good exists, in that through knowledge and through that alone we are brought up to piety, since with regard to knowledge the angels are clearly just as superior as they are with regard to their nature. But neither we nor they have a part in seeing God in substance. Nor are we therefore able to see the angels themselves, as long as we are clad in the natural body. For it is clear and a recognised fact that he who sees, sees what resembles himself. But if anyone should unwisely believe that what has been said is untenable—because we see the sun, moon and stars, and beneath us rocks and gold and silver and altogether the earth and the sea and all the animals, and yet we surely do not resemble them—he shall know that even if the species of the enumerated things are different, the body is nevertheless the superior genus for all these species. For the substance is divided into the invisible, insofar as it is incorporeal, and the visible, insofar as it is a body. The first division thus determines all this as a genus, which is the body. So a body then sees a body, and as a body it both resembles and is kin to what is seen, even if their(a) species are different because of the diversity of colours and good order in everything.

a) ‘their’: i.e. ‘he who sees’ and ‘what is seen’.

Number 12

I.29, Gr. 17.36–18.6

καὶ τολμῶν ἐπάγει ὅτι δὴ κατεκοίμισε¹ τὴν ὕλην ἢ ἀποσταλεῖσα τοῦ θεοῦ δύναμις ὡς τὸ θηρίον ἐπωδῆ, οὐ μόνον ἀπιθάνως τὰ ἄκρως ἐναντία τῷ λόγῳ κινῶν καὶ τὰ μηδαμῶς κατὰ φύσιν ἐνδεχόμενα τῷ ἰδίῳ πλάσματι χαρίζομενος, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸυναντίον ἢ βούλεται καὶ ἐνταῦθα κατασκευάζων. ἐξ ἀμοφῶν μὲν γὰρ τοῦτοι² φησὶ θεὸν δημιουργῆσαι τότε τὸ πᾶν, τοῦ δὲ ἀνθρώπου εἶναι μὲν τὸ σῶμα τῆς κακίας, εἶναι δὲ τὴν ψυχὴν τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, εἴτε μονοειδῆ εἴτε συγκειμένην³ ἐκ τῶν ἐναντίων⁴ καὶ ταύτην,⁵ ὡς ἐκάτερον μικρὸν ὕστερον δεῖξομεν, σύστασιν οὐδεμίαν ἔχον.

1 κατεκοίμισε V G; κατεκοίμησε ed.L(H).

2 τοῦτοι² ed.L(H)—supported by $\kappa\lambda\sigma$. . . $\lambda\sigma\omega\ \tau\theta$, “both of these two” in Sy 23.17; τοῦτον V G (should then belong to θεὸν and not to ἀμοφῶν).

3 συγκειμένην V ed.L(H); συγκειμένων G.

4 The punctuation and parenthesis ἐξ ἀμοφῶν . . . τῶν ἐναντίων are changed as compared to ed.L(H), based on another analysis and translation of the text.

5 ταύτην V G; ταύτη ed.L(H).

And he dares to add that the power sent out by God has indeed lulled matter to sleep like an animal with an incantation, in that in his speech he not only improbably mixes together the greatest contradictions and with his own fabrication generously grants (much) to those things which by nature are in no way possible, but he also contrives the opposite of what he (actually) intends—also here. For he says that it is from these two(a) that God created this universe, and that man’s body came from evil, but that his soul came from the good, whether it is homogeneous or it is also composed of contraries. Below we will thus show that both (possibilities) have no proof at all.(b)

a) 'these two': i.e. evil and good.

b) cf. Contra Manichaeos I.32.

Number 13

I.32, Gr. 20.10–21.20

φέρει δὴ τὰ πραττόμενα κακὰ πρὸς ἀνθρώπων¹ κατίδωμεν τίνι προσήκε² φιλαλήθως. ἐπιχειρήσει μὲν γὰρ ἴσως καὶ τῆς ψυχῆς κράσιν εἰσηγήσασθαι τῶν (ὡς ὑπέλιπεν) ἐναντίων· εἶτε δὲ αὐτὴ μονοειδῆς ὑπάρχοι³ ἐκ τὰγαθοῦ παρ' αὐτῷ εἶτε καὶ ἐκ συνθέσεως τῶν ἐναντίων, ἐκ τῆς μερίδος τοῦναντίου⁴ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ ῥαδίως ἀποδειχθήσεται κατὰ τὴν ἀσεβῆ ταύτην ὑπόθεσιν τὰ κακὰ γινόμενα· ἔστι μὲν οὖν ἀσώματος ἡ ψυχὴ καὶ μηδαμῶς σύνθεσιν κατ' οὐσίαν καὶ μάλιστα ἐναντίων ἐπιδεχομένη⁵· οἱ γὰρ ἐκ διαφόρων συντιθέναι δόξαντες αὐτὴν οὐ τὴν οὐσίαν ποικίλῃν καὶ πρὸς ἑαυτὴν διαφορομένην εἰσηγήσαντο, ἀλλὰ τὰς ἐνεργείας αὐτῆς ἐκ τῶν ὁρωμένων ὑπέγραψαν, ἕνα λόγον ἀπλῶν καὶ περιληπτικὸν αὐτῆς ποιήσασθαι μὴ δυνηθέντες. εἰ γὰρ καὶ ταῖς διαφοραῖς ποιότησιν, ἃς ἐπιδέχεται, ἄλλοτε ἄλλως διαφέρεται πρὸς ἑαυτήν, ὅμως κατ' οὐσίαν ἔργον ὑπάρχουσα τοῦ θεοῦ ἀμετάβλητός τε ἐστὶ καὶ οὐκ ἐκ διαφόρων σύγκειται, ἐναντίων μὲντοι κράσεων τοσοῦτον ἀφέστηκεν, ὅσον καὶ τοῦ καθ' ἑαυτὴν σῶμα εἶναι δοκεῖν. θῶμεν δὲ κατὰ τὴν ἐκείνου ψευδολογίαν (εἶγε καὶ τοῦτο λέγειν ἐπιχειροίη), ὡς καὶ ἡ ψυχὴ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου συνέστηκεν ἐξ ἀγαθοῦ καὶ κακοῦ· οὐχὶ τὸ μὲν λογιστικὸν αὐτῆς κατ' ἐκείνον ἀναθετέον τῷ ἀγαθῷ, τὸ δ' ἀλόγιστον εἶγε εἴη τῇ κακίᾳ;⁶ δῆλον ὡς οὐδὲν ἂν ἕτερον εἰπεῖν ἔχοι. τῆς τοίνυν ἐπιθυμίας κινουμένης σφαλερῶς εἶτε ἐκ μόνου τοῦ σώματος εἶτε καὶ ἐκ τοῦ προσήκοντος τῇ κακίᾳ μέρους τῆς ψυχῆς, ἂρ' αὐτόματος πρόεισιν ἢ πράξις; οὐχὶ δὲ φθάνει μὲν ἐν ἀνθρώπῳ σκέψις καὶ βουλή, ἔπειτα κρίσις καὶ αἴρεσις τῆς πράξεως, καὶ οὕτως εἰς ἔργον ἡ ἐπιθυμία προφέρεται; ἔγκλημα⁷ δὲ⁸ κακίας ἐκ τῆς πράξεως, οὐκ ἐκ τῆς ἐπιθυμίας γίνεταί, ὡς εἰ μείνειεν ἐπὶ χώρας ἢ ἐνθύμησις τῆς ἐπιθυμίας, εἰς ἔργον τῇ αἰρέσει τοῦ λογισμοῦ μὴ προϊούσα, πρῶτον μὲν ἂν παυθεῖ⁹ θάττον, ἐξαπτομένη τε ἅμα καὶ σβεννυμένη, ἔπειτα οὐδαμῶς ἂν ἔγκλημα¹⁰ νομισθεῖ οὐ μόνον κοινόν, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ κατὰ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ἀρετῆς εἰ κρίνοιτο. φαίνεται τοίνυν τῷ λογικῷ τῆς ψυχῆς εὐλόγως ἀνατιθέμενα τὰ ἀμαρτήματα καὶ οὕτε τῷ σώματι οὕτε ἄλλῳ μέρει τινὶ ταύτης, ὡς τὴν μὲν ἀλόγιστον κακίαν ἀπηλλάχθαι τῆς αἰτίας¹¹ τῶν παρ' ἡμῖν κακῶν ἅτε μὴδὲ ὑπάρχουσαν, κινδυνεύειν δὲ κατὰ τὸν ἐκείνου λόγον ἐκ τῆς μερίδος τὰγαθοῦ ταῦτα προφέρεσθαι, εἶ γε μὴ ἐτέρῳ χρησαίμεθα φιλαλήθει λόγῳ. εἰ μὲν γὰρ μὴ διαγινώσκουσα τὴν ποιότητα τῆς ἐπιθυμίας, ἐπὶ τὴν πράξιν ἀλογίστεως ἐχώρει ἢ ψυχῇ, δισχυρίζαιτ' ἂν τις ὡς ἐκ τοῦ ἀλογίστου μέρους φέρεσθαι¹² τὰ παραλόγως πραττόμενα· εἰ δὲ πολλακίς αὐτὸς¹³ ὁ λογισμὸς πῆ μὲν αἰρεῖται ὡς ὑποκατακλινόμενος ἐκὼν ἀγωγῇ φαύλη τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν, πῆ δὲ παραιτεῖται πάλιν, ὅταν φόβος αὐτὸν ὅστις οὖν ἀναστείλῃ ἢ ἐπιθυμία γοῦν ἀρετῆς ἀνθελκούσης πρὸς ἑαυτήν, δηλὸν ὡς ὁ λογισμὸς ἐστὶν ὁ μόνος οἰκειούμενος τὰ καλῶς τε καὶ ὡς ἑτέρως πραττόμενα, καὶ πρὸς τὸυναντίον ἐνταῦθα χωρεῖ τῶν ἀποδεικνυμένων τῷ μανέντι κακῶς ἢ ἐξέτασις. οὐδὲν γὰρ τῆς ὕλης (ὡς ἔοικεν¹⁴) ἐν τοῖς καθ' ἡμᾶς ἀμάρτημα, ἀλλὰ τῆς ψυχῆς (ἢ τοῦ ταύτης λογιστικοῦ), ἢ τῆ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ μοίρα¹⁵ προσῆκε κατ'¹⁶ ἐκείνων.

- 1 ἀνθρώπων G ed.L(H)—supported by Sy 26.7 (𐤒𐤓𐤕 𐤇𐤍); ἄνθρωπον V.
- 2 προσῆκε G ed.L(H)—supported by Sy 26.7 (. 𐤍𐤓𐤓 𐤍𐤗 𐤒𐤓𐤕𐤓, “and let us consider for whom they are fitting”); προσεοῖκε V.
- 3 ὑπάρχοι V G; ὑπάρχει ed.L(H).
- 4 τὸυναντίον ed.L(H); τὸυναντίον V G. Presumably Beck (1978, 122 n. 33) is nevertheless right that the word is a gloss from an ignorant scribe: “Im Text (Lag. 20,15) ist das störende τὸυναντίον zu streichen. Beweis: S. 21,7: ἐκ τῆς μερίδος ταγαθοῦ (sic!)”. Beck thinks that for Titus κακὰ are the sins; if the Manichaeans believe that the soul consists of a good and an evil part, the good part, in Titus’s eyes, must be the part with reason, and since sin requires deliberation, it must stem from the good part. One might object to Beck that the word still makes sense if one translates as “from the contrariety which is the good”, but the fact that there is no equivalent in Sy 26.11–12 favours Beck’s view; the word is therefore also omitted in the present translation.
- 5 ἐπιδεχομένη V G; ἀποδεχομένη ed.L(H).
- 6 τὸ δ’ ἀλόγιστον εἶ γε εἴη τῇ κακίᾳ V,—supported by 𐤒𐤓 𐤓𐤁𐤗𐤒 𐤒𐤗 𐤒𐤓𐤕𐤓 𐤓𐤕𐤔𐤓 𐤓𐤁𐤗𐤒 𐤒𐤗, “but its ignorance, if it exists, he supposes (to be) from evil”, in Sy 26.25–26; τὸ δ’ ἀλόγιστον εἴη τῇ κακίᾳ G ed.L(H).
- 7 ἔγκλημα V G; ἔ<γ>κλημα corr.ed.L(H).
- 8 δὲ G ed.L(H)—supported by 𐤒𐤓 in Sy 26.32; omitted in V.
- 9 παυθεῖν V G—supported by 𐤓𐤁𐤗𐤒, “stand still” in Sy 26.35, cf. also “desinere” in Torres; ἀρπα<σ>θεῖν ed.L(H).
- 10 ἔγκλημα G ed.L(H)—supported by Sy 27.1–2; ἐγκλήματα V.
- 11 αἰτίας G ed.L(H)—supported by 𐤒𐤁𐤗𐤒, “cause” in Sy 27.6; κακίας V.
- 12 φέρεσθαι V G; φέρεται ed.L(H).
- 13 αὐτὸς G ed.L(H); αὐτὸς μὲν V.
- 14 ἔοικεν V G; ἔοικε<ν> corr.ed.L(H).
- 15 ἢ τῆ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ μοίρα G ed.L(H); ἢ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ μοίρα V.
- 16 κατ' V G corr.ed.L; μετ' H(acc.to ed.L).

Let us regard the evil things that are committed by men, and let us openly perceive to whom they belong. For he(a) will perhaps dare(b) also to introduce a mingling of contraries in the soul, as he supposes. But whether it be homogeneous from what is good according to him, or it be also from the composition of contraries, it is easily demonstrated that according to this ungodly assumption evil things have come into being from the part of the good.

The soul is incorporeal, however, in that it in no way permits a composition with regard to substance, and particularly not a composition of contraries. For those who believe that it is composed from differences have not introduced a substance that is diversified and different in relation to itself, but on the basis of visible things they have written about its activities, in that they could not make one simple and comprehensible account about it. For even if it(c) is different—first in this way and then in that way—in relation to itself through the different qualities that it assumes, nevertheless it is according to its substance God's work and immutable, and it is not composed of differences, but on the contrary it is just as much removed from a mingling of contraries as it is from seeming to be a body in itself.

However, let us assume, following his false talk—in case he should also dare to say this—that man's soul too has been put together from good and evil. Must one not then, according to him, ascribe the soul's reasoning faculty to the good, but ascribe that which is irrational, if it really exists, to evil? It is obvious that he would not be able to say otherwise. Hence, when desire is dangerously stirred either from the body alone or also from the part of the soul that belongs to evil, is the action then performed of its own accord? Do not consideration and deliberation come first in man, and thereafter come the decision and the choice of action, and desire then moves to (realise) the deed? But this fault(d) (which is linked to) evil, comes into being from the action, not from the desire, so that if the reflection of the desire remained in its place and did not through the choice of the reasoning faculty move to (realise) the deed, then firstly it could be brought to an end more quickly, since it would blaze up and go out at one and the same time, and secondly it would in no way be regarded as a fault, not only in general, but not even if it was judged according to the highest virtue.

Hence it is clear that the sins are attributed to the soul's reason on good grounds and not to the body or any other part of this,(e) so that the irrational evil has got rid of being the cause of the evils that are among us, because this evil does not exist either, and that these evils, according to his argument, seem likely to emanate from the part of the good, unless we use another argument out of regard for the love of truth. For if the soul, through not knowing the quality of the desire,(f) had moved on to act irrationally, one could definitely claim that the things which are done irrationally are brought about as though they were from the irrational part (of the soul). However, if the reasoning faculty on the one hand often chooses desire, in that it has voluntarily subjugated itself to a bad way of life, and then once more rejects desire, when a fear, of whatever kind, or at least a desire for virtue that draws towards itself, restrains it,(g) it is clear that it is the reasoning faculty alone that as its own actions both perform those that are done beautifully and those that are done differently. And here the examination of what is to be demonstrated turns out badly against the madman(a) and in favour of the opposite. For none of our sins comes from matter, as they (otherwise) say, but from the soul or from its reasoning faculty, which according to him belongs to the good part.

- a) i.e. Mani.
- b) ἐπιχειρήσει, cf. Beck 1978, 122 n. 32: “der potentielle Sinn dieses Futurs kann hier bewiesen werden; denn in der folgenden Wiederholung des Ausdrucks heißt es: εἴγε καὶ τοῦτο λέγειν ἐπιχειροῖ (!).”
- c) ‘it’: i.e. the soul.
- d) ‘fault’: the translation of ἔγκλημα as “reproach” could also make sense here, but not, as far as I can see, in what follows.
- e) ‘of this’: i.e. of the soul.
- f) ‘the quality of the desire’: i.e. ‘which kind of desire it is about’.
- g) ‘it’: i.e. the reasoning faculty.

Number 14

Π.3, Gr. 26.31–27.2

κόσμον τοίνυν κατεσκευάκεν¹ ὁ θεὸς καὶ περὶ τούτου πρὸς οὓς ὁ λόγος οὐ διαχειμάζονται. εἰ γὰρ δὴ καὶ εἰς ἀκοσμίαν κόσμιον ὄντα τὸν κόσμον μεταβάλλουσιν, περὶ τε τρόπου² καὶ τῆς αἰτίας τοῦ γενέσθαι ὁμολογοῦσι.³ τούτῳ⁴ δὴ μέρος μὲν⁵ ὄντα τοῦ παντός, ὅμως δὲ πολίτην ἐπιστήσας λογικὸν τὸν ἄνθρωπον ὁ θεὸς τὰ μὲν ἄλλα ὅσα μήτε πρὸς ἀρετὴν μήτε πρὸς κακίαν ὀρᾶ ἑαυτῷ τετήρηκεν⁶ οἰκονομεῖν, ἀρετὴν δὲ μόνον ἢ κακίαν ἐπ’ αὐτῷ εἶναι πεποίηκε, τῇ φύσει προενθεῖς ἐκατέρου τὴν γνῶσιν, ἵνα ὀφθαλμοῦ δίκην ταύτην ἐπαγόμενος οὐ μόνον μετὰ τελείας ἐπιστήμης τὸν βίον ὀδεύη, ἀλλὰ καὶ αὐτουργὸς τῶν τῆς ἀρετῆς κατορθωμάτων ὑπάρχη.

1 κατεσκεύακεν V G; κατεσκεύασεν ed.L(H).

2 περί τε τρόπου V G; ἀλλά γε περί τε τρόπου ed.L(H).

3 The text in Sy 34.4–6 is different: αὐτὸς κωλύει τὴν κτίσιν ἐκ τῆς φύσεως. πᾶσι δὲ ταῖς ἀρεταῖς ταῖς ἀρεταῖς. ἡμεῖς δὲ πᾶσι κτῆσι κτῆσι ἐκ τῆς φύσεως; “For even if they are blamed by (saying) this (word) that ‘the world is without order’, and they are in doubt over the manner and the cause of its coming into being, nevertheless they acknowledge this: that it came into being from God.”

4 τούτῳ ed.L(H); τοῦτο G; τοῦτον V.

5 δὴ μέρος μὲν G ed.L(H); μὲν δὴ μέρος V.

6 τετήρηκεν οἰκονομεῖν ed.L(H)—supported by Sy 34.8–9; τετήρηκε τοῦτον οἰκονομεῖν V G.

So God has made the world, and those against whom the treatise is directed are not raging about this point. For even if they manifestly change the world that is ordered into disorder, they agree on its character and the cause of its coming into being. So over this(a) God has set man as a rational citizen, even though he is only part of the whole. Everything else, which can neither look towards virtue nor vice, God has kept to Himself to control, but He has brought it about that virtue alone or vice should depend on himself(b), in that He has beforehand placed knowledge of both (qualities) in his nature, in order that while being driven on in accordance with this insight, he can not only go through life with complete knowledge, but can also be the author of the accomplishments of virtue.

- a) ‘over this’: H’s text (τούτῳ) appears to be an intelligent correction and is followed here, since it presumably refers to κόσμος. ἐφίστημι is often construed with the dative for that over which something is placed; cf. also τυφλὸν . . . ἡνίοχον ἐφίσταν ἄρματι ὄξυτάτῳ, Gr. 29.23 (= Number 16).
- b) “on himself”: i.e. on man.

Number 15

Π.3, Gr. 27.6–16

καὶ καλῶς γε λόγῳ ἐγκλήματος ἢ ἀμαρτία¹ καλεῖται παρὰ λόγον (ὅ γε δυνατόν ἐστι χρήσασθαι πανταχοῦ) πραττομένη, ὡς εἶναι ἀμαρτίαν πᾶν τὸ παρὰ λόγον πραττόμενον, εἰ καὶ ἐκ τῶν κατὰ φύσιν λαμβάνει τὴν ἀφορμὴν. τῶν γὰρ κατὰ φύσιν ἢ ἀλόγιστος χρήσις ποιεῖ τὴν ἀμαρτίαν, λόγος δὲ ἐν ἡμῖν δοκιμαστικός τῶν² κατὰ φύσιν, ὅθεν οὐ λανθάνει πρατομένη. εἰ μὲν τοίνυν πρὸς ἄσκησιν ἀρετῆς τὸν λόγον διαγυμνάζοιμεν τὸν ἐν ἡμῖν ὡσπερ σῶμα,³ τῇ εὐμέτρῳ κινήσει⁴ ὑγιῆ καὶ εὖρωστον τοῦτον ἀπεργαζόμεθα· εἰ δὲ γυμνασίας καὶ ἐπιμελείας τοῦτον μὴ <ἀξιῶμεν>,⁵ ἀσθενῶν ἀμαυρότερος γίνεται καὶ τέλος ἀμελούμενος πηροῦται.

1 ἡ ἀμαρτία ed.L(H)—supported by $\kappa\alpha\lambda\omega\mu$, “sin”, in Sy 34.17; ἡ ἀμαρτία ἀμαρτία V G (presumably dittography).

2 τῶν G ed.L(H); omitted in V.

3 σῶμα G ed.L(H); σῶματι V.

4 τῇ εὐμέτρῳ κινήσει G ed.L(H); εὐμέτρῳ κινήσει V.

5 <ἀξιῶμεν> corr.ed.L; ἀξιῶμεν V G H(acc.to ed.L).

And with a word of reproach sin is well named as being committed “against reason”—which as a matter of fact can be applied everywhere—so that all that is committed “against reason” is sin, even if it takes its origin in those things that are in accordance with nature. For the irrational use of the things that are in accordance with nature brings about sin, whereas the reason within us examines the things that are in accordance with nature, and therefore the sin that is committed is not unnoticed. So if we train our immanent reason hard like a body for the exercise of virtue, we make it healthy and strong through a well-measured movement. But if we do not regard it as worthy of training and care, it becomes weaker from illnesses and in the end, because it is neglected, it becomes lame.

Number 16

Π.7, Gr. 29.9–28

οὕτω δὴ κατεσκεύακε τὸν ἄνθρωπον φύσει μὲν οὔτ’ ἀγαθὸν οὔτε κακόν, ἐπιτρέψας δὲ τῷ λογισμῷ τοῦ κρείττονος τὴν αἴρεσιν. εἰ δέ τοι μήτ’ ἀγαθὸν μήτε κακόν, τί ἂν εἴη λοιπὸν ζητεῖται. σκοπητέον τὸ βραχὺ παιδίον τῇ τῶν ἄκρων ἀναιρέσει γνωριζόμενον, λέγω δὴ οὔτ’ ἀγαθὸν οὔτε κακόν.¹ ἡ μὲν γὰρ οὐσία τούτου καλή, τὸ δὲ κατ’ ἀρετὴν ἀγαθὸν οὕτω προσεῖληφεν. οὕτω δὴ καὶ χρυσὸς φύσει καλός, λόγῳ δὲ ἀρετῆς οὐκ ἀγαθός, ἄψυχος ὢν. καὶ λίθοι τίμιοι παραπλησίως καὶ πάντα τὰ ὄντα,² ἕκαστον κατὰ τὸ ἴδιον ἐν ὄψει κάλλος. κατὰ δὲ τοῦτον τὸν λόγον καὶ ἄνθρωπος, καλὸς μὲν καὶ λίαν καλὸς οὐσία τε καὶ αὐτῷ τῷ εἶναι, τὸ δὲ ἀγαθὸν τὸ διὰ μόνης ἀρετῆς προσ-γινόμενον πόνῳ κτάται· δι’ ὃ θεὸς ἐπ’ αὐτῷ εἶναι τοῦτο πεποίηκεν. εἰ οὖν³ ἔδωκε μὲν τὴν ἐξουσίαν, οὐ προεντέθεικε δὲ τῇ φύσει τὴν γνώσιν ἀρετῆς τε καὶ κακίας, τυφλὸν ἂν ἔδοξεν ἠνίοχον ἐφιστάν ἄρματι ὄξυτάτῳ. εἰ δὲ ἄμα συνεκέρασεν ἄμφω, ἐξουσίαν τε⁴ πρὸς κτῆσιν τοῦ καλλίου⁵ καὶ γνώσιν πρὸς διάκρισιν καὶ πρὸς⁶ ἀσφάλειαν τῆς αἰρέσεως, τεχνίτην μὲν <προανέδειξε>⁷ τὸν ἠνίοχον νοῦν, ἐλάσει δὲ σῶον οὗτος τὸ ἄρμα τῆς φύσεως, εἴ γε μὴ⁸ ὑπνώσας⁹ κατὰ τὸ στάδιον¹⁰ ὑπὸ τῶν ἡδονῶν ἀναβληθῆι.¹¹

- 1 ἐπιτρέψας δὲ τῷ λογισμῷ τοῦ κρείττονος τὴν αἴρεσιν. εἰ δέ τοι μήτ' ἀγαθὸν μήτε κακόν, τί ἂν εἴη λοιπὸν ζητεῖται. σκοπητέον τὸ βραχὺ παιδίον τῆ τῶν ἄκρων ἀναιρέσει γνωριζόμενον, λέγω δὴ οὐτ' ἀγαθὸν οὔτε κακόν. G ed.L(H) Sy 37.3–8; omitted in V.
- 2 πάντα τὰ ὄντα G ed.L(H); τὰ πάντα ὄντα V.
- 3 εἰ οὖν G ed.L(H); εἰ μὲν οὖν V.
- 4 τε G ed.L(H); καὶ V.
- 5 καλλίου V G; καλ<λ>ίου corr.ed.L(H).
- 6 πρὸς G ed.L(H); omitted in V.
- 7 <προανέδειξε> corr. Lampe 1961, 1164b—supported by ⲡⲓⲛⲁ ⲛⲓⲟ, 'made beforehand', in Sy 37.22; προσανέδειξε V G ed.L(H).
- 8 εἴ γε μὴ G ed.L(H); εἰ μὴ γε V.
- 9 ὑπνώσας G ed.L(H); ὑπνώσει V.
- 10 κατὰ τὸ στάδιον G ed.L(H); κατὰ τὸ στάδιον καὶ V.
- 11 ἀναβληθῆι G ed.L(H); ἀν<α>βληθῆι V.

God has thus indeed constructed man so that he is neither good nor bad by nature, but He has transferred the choice of what is better to his reasoning faculty. Now, if he is neither good nor bad, it must be asked what he may then be. One must then look at the infant child, which is characterised by a negation of extremes, i.e. it is neither good nor bad. For even though its substance is beautiful, it has nevertheless not yet acquired the good in relation to virtue. Similarly, gold is also beautiful by nature, but not good with regard to the reasoning of virtue, since it is inanimated. And likewise precious stones and all that exists, each of them with regard to its own beauty in appearance. In fact according to this explanation man is on the one hand beautiful, indeed "very beautiful"(a), both in substance and in his very essence(b), but the good that is added through virtue alone is acquired through toil. That is why God has brought it about that it depends on man alone. So if He had given him the power but had not placed the knowledge of virtue and vice in his nature beforehand, it would have looked as if a blind charioteer was in charge of a very swift team of horses. But if at the same time He has mixed the two—the power to acquire what is more beautiful and the knowledge to distinguish and to choose surely—then He has beforehand demonstrated the guiding mind as an expert, but this mind will drive nature's team of horses safely on if, having fallen asleep on the racecourse, he really is not to crash because of his lusts.

- a) λίαν καλὸς alludes to Gen. 1.31aLXX; cf. above p. 303.
 b) αὐτῷ τῷ εἶναι is, as Torres also realised ("essentia ipsa"), the Aristotelian technical term, which is rendered in Latin as essentia; see Liddell, Scott and Jones 1968, 489a.

Number 17

Π.11, Gr. 31.3–7

οὕτω μὲν δὴ¹ τὸν ἄνθρωπον τετίμηκεν ὁ θεός, κατ' εἰκόνα ἑαυτοῦ δημιουργήσας² αὐτόν, ἵν' ὡσπερ αὐτὸς ἐλευθερότητι φύσεως ἀγαθός, οὕτω δὴ καὶ ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐλευθερότητι προαιρέσεως³ ζηλωτῆς ὑπάρχη θεοῦ, οὐκ ἀδυναμία φύσεως τοῦ ἀμαρτάνειν ἀπεχόμενος, ἐλευθερότητι⁴ δὲ τὴν ἀρετὴν τιμῶν.

1 δὴ G ed.L(H); οὖν V.

2 δημιουργήσας V G corr.ed.L; δημιουργήσαντος H(acc.to ed.L).

3 προαιρέσεως V; προθέσεως G ed.L(H).

4 ἐλευθερότητι V G; ἐλευθεριότητα ed.L(H).

In this way God then has honoured man by creating him in His own image, in order that he can be an emulator of God through the freedom of his will just as He Himself is good through the freedom of His nature,(a) in that man does not keep away from sinning because of his weakness of nature, but honours virtue through his freedom(a).

- a) ἐλευθεριότης is the substantive for ἐλευθέριος, which acc. to Liddell, Scott and Jones 1968, 532a means 'acting like a freeman', 'fit for a freeman' etc., while ἐλευθεριότης means 'the character of an ἐλευθέριος', especially 'freeness in giving, liberality', 'generosity'. Lampe 1961, 449b, however, reckons on a change of meaning to 'free will', and although the only references are to this passage in Contra Manichaeos, the meaning 'freedom' is supported by Sy, which in 39.19 renders ἐλευθερότητι προαιρέσεως with ܡܘܨܚܐܢܐ ܩܪܝܐܝܩܐ and the two other ἐλευθερότης with ܩܪܝܐܝܩܐ in 39.18.21. But whether or not ἐλευθερότης in the manuscripts instead of ἐλευθεριότης should also be regarded as a new formation must be left open.

Number 18

Π.12, Gr. 31.17–23

εἰ δέ τις κατὰ τοῦ λόγου παράγοι τὸν βουλόμενον μὲν¹ ἔστιν ὅτε φαύλων ἀπέχεσθαι, φάσκοντά γε μὴν ἀδυνάτως ἔχειν, μανθανέτω ὡς χρόνιον μὲν καὶ κατὰ σῶμα πάθος οὐ ῥαδίως μετακινεῖσθαι πέφυκεν· οὕτω δὴ καὶ τῆς ψυχῆς ἔξις οὐκ ἀγαθῆ χρόνῳ παγεῖσα οὐκ εὐκόλον² ἔχει τῶν ἐν πολλῇ γε συνηθείᾳ τὴν ἀποφυγὴν, πλὴν εἰ μή τι μείζον ἀγαθὸν πάθος ἐπεισελθὼν τὸ προλαβὼν ἐκβάλοι.

1 μὲν G ed.L(H); omitted in V.

2 εὐκόλον ed.L(H)—supported by Ψ $\alpha\sigma\tau\epsilon\delta\iota\tau\ \mu\epsilon\lambda\ \delta\upsilon\kappa\ \delta\upsilon\kappa\epsilon\lambda\iota\tau\ \mu\epsilon\lambda\ \mu\epsilon\lambda\ \mu\epsilon\lambda$, “it is not easy for her [i.e. the soul] to flee from those things” in Sy 40.2–3; εὐλογον V G.

But if anyone against this treatise should bring forward the one who sometimes wants to restrain himself from bad deeds, but nevertheless claims to be unable to do so, let him learn that it is not the nature of a lengthy bodily suffering to change at once either. Nor, in similar fashion, is it easy for the bad state of the soul, which has been stiffening for a long time, to release itself from the things that are part of a long custom, unless some greater passion enters and drives out the passion that had previously been received.

Number 19

Π.13, Gr. 31.33–32.22

ἐπεὶ δὲ καὶ ἄλλως οἱ ἐκ τοῦ μανέντος πειρῶνται δύο φύσεις ἐναντίας ἡμῖν οὔσας ἀπελέγχειν τῷ ποτὲ μὲν ἡμᾶς ἐνθυμεῖσθαι φαῦλα, ἄλλοτε δὲ ἀγαθά, ἐπισημαντέον ὡς φυσικῆς ἐν ἡμῖν οὔσης τῆς γνώσεως ἐκατέρων, ἀναγκαίως¹ ἐπὶ τὴν ἐνθύμησιν ὧν γινώσκουμεν κινούμεθα, ζημιούμενοι μὲν οὐδ² ὅτι οὖν, κερδαίνοντες δὲ τὸ πᾶν τῇ τοῦ καλλίονος προτιμήσει. πῶς γὰρ ἂν ἡ ἐπὶ τὸ κρεῖττον ἀνθρώποις ἐκούσιος ἐμαρτυρήθη κίνησις,³ μὴ τῆς ἐνθυμήσεως ἐκατέροις φυσικῶς ἐπιβαλλούσης, ἀδικία τε καὶ δικαιοσύνη; ἡ μὲν γὰρ γνῶσις ἀναγκαία πρὸς διάκρισιν, ἡ δὲ ἐνθύμησις⁴ ψηλαφᾷ τὰ ἐγνωσμένα, ἡ δὲ πρόθεσις ἐφ’ ὃ βούλεται ῥέπει· ταῦτα δὲ οὐχὶ μέρη ψυχῆς διάφορα, ἀλλ’ ὡς ἐνέργειαι ταύτης. οὕτω⁵ μέντοι τῷ ἡμετέρῳ ὀφθαλμῷ πρόσεστι φυσικῶς τὸ ὄραν ἄλλο, εἰ τυχοίη⁶ πράξεις κακάς τε καὶ ἀγαθὰς, καὶ οὐδετέρων αἴτιος ἂν εἴη (διαδέχεται⁷ γὰρ ὁ νοῦς τὴν ὄψιν καὶ διακρίνει τὰ ὀρώμενα), οὕτω δὴ καὶ ἡ ἐνθύμησις ὀφθαλμοῦ δίκην ἀναγκαίως κινεῖται πρὸς <τὰ>⁸ τὸ γενέσθαι ἐνδεχόμενα, οὐ βιαζομένη πρὸς αὐτὰ τὴν ψυχὴν,

But because those who come from the madman(a) also try besides to prove that two opposing natures exist in us, namely through us thinking first bad things, then good things, one must declare that knowledge of both is naturally present in us, and we are therefore inevitably drawn towards the thought of the things that we know(b), in that we are not deprived of (knowledge of) anything at all, but (simultaneously) we gain everything by preferring what is better.

For how should one have extolled people's voluntary movement towards what is better unless the thought had by nature submitted itself to both sides, both injustice and justice? For knowledge (of injustice and justice) is necessary to be able to distinguish (between them); the thought examines the things that are (thus) known, and the intention inclines towards what it wants. But these things are not different parts of the soul, but in a way its activities. Precisely in this manner it is by nature characteristic of our eye to see (something) else, if it(c) by chance meets evil or good actions, and yet it will not be the cause of either of them(d)—for the mind receives the visual impression and distinguishes what it has seen—thus after the manner of the eye the thought is also inevitably moved towards the things that can happen, in that the thought does not force the soul towards them,(e) but through natural knowledge submits itself to them. For example, we think of contrary things at the same time, if we wish to, but we cannot do contrary things at the same time. Similarly, the action is determined by the choice of the intention, but the thought testifies to the natural knowledge of virtue and vice.

For if we had not known these things(f) beforehand, we would have not been able to think or choose the better, since we completely lacked (the ability) to choose beforehand and preferred the worse through bad ways of living. That is precisely the reason why people should be more concerned for the education of children than the farmers are for the growth of their plants.

So taking our thought as proof of the two opposing natures (in us) could be like saying that sight is a mingling of all colours, because it is devoted to all of them.

- a) 'the madman': i.e. Mani.
- b) i.e. 'the bad and the good'.
- c) 'it': presumably 'the eye'.
- d) 'them': i.e. the 'evil or good actions'.
- e) 'them': i.e. 'the things that can happen'.
- f) 'these things': i.e. 'virtue and vice'.

Number 20

Π.16, Gr. 34.7–14

ὅλως δὲ οὔτε τὸ πλουτεῖν μακάριον οὔτε τὸ πένεσθαι ἐλεεινόν, ἐπειδὴ γε μόνος ἐκεῖνος μακάριος,¹ ᾧ πρόσεστιν ἡ βέβαιος τῆς ψυχῆς κατ' ἀρετὴν εὐπραγία (κᾶν τε πλούσιος κᾶν² πένης ὑπάρχηι ὁ τοιοῦτος), ἧς ἔνεκεν πρὸς θεοῦ ἄνθρωπος³ γέγνηται, ὡς δέον παρὰ μὲν θεοῦ τὸ εἶναι λαβεῖν, παρ' ἑαυτοῦ δὲ τὸ ἀγαθὸν προσγενέσθαι λαβεῖν, συνεργῶντος θεοῦ.⁴ βούλεται γὰρ θεὸς⁵ καὶ παρ' ἑαυτοῦ⁶ τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἔχειν τὸ λογικόν⁷ ὄντα πρὸς ἔνδοξον παρρησίαν.

- 1 μακάριος ed.L(H)—supported by. κῶααδ, μαααααδ αα αααα ΔΔα, “because he alone is blessed”, in Sy 43.10; omitted in V G.
- 2 κᾶν: κᾶν ed.L(H) (but iota subscriptum from that edition is omitted here); κᾶν τε V G.
- 3 πρὸς θεοῦ ἄνθρωπος G ed.L(H); ἄνθρωπος πρὸς θεοῦ V.
- 4 θεοῦ V G ed.L(H); τοῦ Θεοῦ C.
- 5 θεὸς V G ed.L(H); ὁ Θεὸς C.
- 6 ἑαυτοῦ C; αὐτοῦ V G ed.L(H).
- 7 τὸ λογικόν G; ἂν τὸ λογικόν ed.L(H); λογικόν V; τι λογικόν C.

But in general it is neither happy to be rich nor piteous to be poor, because he alone is happy to whom belongs the soul's steadfast good deed in relation to virtue, whether this one be rich or poor. God has also made man for the sake of this good deed, in order that on the one hand he should receive existence from God, but on the other hand receive from himself the good in addition, through God's assistance. For God also wants man to have the rationality from himself, since he has it by virtue of his well-known frankness.

Number 21

Π.17, Gr. 35.34–38

θάνατος γὰρ ὁ κατὰ φύσιν καὶ δίχα κολάσεως ἂν ἐπέλθοι, ὥστε ἄλλη μὲν ἐστὶ τοῖς παρανομοῦσιν ἢ ἀφυκτος τιμωρία, διαφεύγουσι δὲ τὴν ἐφ' ἡμῶν¹ οἱ πλείους, ἵνα τὸ ἐνδεχόμενον τοῦ λαθεῖν βάσανος γένηται τοῦ ἀνθρωπίνου λογισμοῦ.

- 1 ἡμῶν G ed.L(H); ἡμᾶς V; omitted in Sy 45.18.

For natural death would also come without punishment, so that the unavoidable punishment is another one for offenders (than death), whereas the greater number escape the punishment prevailing among us, so that the possibility of hiding oneself shall become a test of the human reasoning power.

Number 22

Π.19, Gr. 36.15–28

εἰ δὲ καὶ κολάζεσθαι τινα συμβαίνοι οὐκ ἀναίτιον μόνον ἀλλὰ καὶ θαυμάσιον ἄνδρα, καὶ δίκην ἀρετῆς ἀπαιτεῖσθαι τοῦτον, τί ἂν βλάβος προσαγάγοι τῷ πάσχοντι; διελέγχει μὲν γὰρ τοὺς ποιῶντας, οὐ βλάπτει δὲ τὸν ὑπομένοντα, κἂν ἕως θανάτου φέρηται τὰ τῆς ἀλόγου τιμωρίας. φθάσας γὰρ ὅ γε τοιοῦτος νεκρότητι τὰ πρὸς τὸν βίον μεμελέτηκεν. ᾧ γὰρ μηδὲν μὲν ἡδὺ τῶν τοῖς πολλοῖς ἢ ἀηδές, πῶς οὐχὶ νεκρὸς τοῦ βίου καὶ πρὸ θανάτου ὅ γε τοιοῦτος καθέστηκεν; εἰς χάριν τὴν γε νομιζομένην ἐπιβουλήν δεχόμενος, ἢ μετὰ τὸν παρόντα βίον προσδοκᾷ μείζοσιν ἀγαθοῖς ἐντεύξεσθαι ὧν ἀπολιπεῖν δοκεῖ, ἐφ' ἃ πρὸς τῶν ἐχθρῶν ταχέως παραπεμπόμενος ὡς εὐεργέτας τοὺς ἐπιβουλεύοντας ἔχει. καὶ ἄλλως ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἀναγκαῖα τῆς βασάνου¹ ἢ παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ συγχώρησις, ὡς ἂν δοκιμωτέρα τυγχάνοι ἢ αἴρεσις τῆς ἀρετῆς, εἰ μηδὲ² θάνατον εὐλαβοῖτο.

1 τῆς βασάνου V G ed.L(H);  = τοῦ βασκάνου in Sy 46.19.
2 μηδὲ G ed.L(H); δὲ μὴ V.

But even if it should happen that someone is punished who is not only an innocent but also an admirable man, and he is thus punished for his virtue, what harm should it inflict on him who suffers this? For although it may be true that this is a charge against those who do (such a thing against him), yet it does not harm him, since he endures, even if he had to bear the consequences of the groundless punishment till death. For such a man has already beforehand because of his mortality taken care of what concerns life. For when nothing of what is pleasant or unpleasant for the majority is so for him, there is no reason why he who is like this has not become dead to life also even before death. He receives that which is considered an injury as a sign of grace, by which he hopes to obtain greater blessings after the present life than those which he seems to leave behind, and when he is about to be swiftly sent by his enemies towards (these greater blessings), then he has as his benefactors those who plot against him. And otherwise God's allowance of painful testing is necessary among men, so that the choice of virtue can be more genuine, if anyone should not even fear death.

Number 23

Π.22, Gr. 38.30–40.5

ἐπειδὴ δὲ καὶ τοὺς πολέμους τῇ κακίᾳ προσνέμουσι, τίνα τρόπον εἰμαρμέναι διάφοροι κατ' αὐτοὺς πολλῶν ἔστιν ὅτε χιλιάδων ὑφ' ἓνα καιρόν, μᾶλλον δὲ ὑπὸ μίαν ὥραν πιπτουσῶν; ἄρα μία¹ τις εἰμαρμένη συνάπτει τούτους ὑφ' ἑαυτῆ;² καὶ πῶς οὐ πάντη τοῦτο γε³ ὑπολαμβάνειν γελοιότατον; ὅθεν τὸ μὲν ἄνισον τῆς εἰμαρμένης (τὸ χαλεπὸν τῶν πεπλανημένων νόσημα)⁴ χώραν ἐν τοῖς πράγμασιν οὐκ ἔχει, πόλεμοι δὲ τὴν μὲν ἀρχὴν ἐκ πλεονεξίας λαμβάνουσι, τὴν δὲ ἐνέργειαν πρὸς θεοῦ συγχωρουμένην ἔχουσι. κακὸν μὲν γὰρ τούτων ἡ ἀφορμὴ (λέγω δὴ τῆς πλεονεξίας ἢ ἐπιθυμίας), ὅπερ ἀνθρώπων, ἀλλ' οὐχὶ θεοῦ πλημμέλημα τοῖς ἔμπροσθεν δέδεικται, θάνατος δὲ τῆς φύσεως οὐ κακός. γένεσις γὰρ καὶ θάνατος πρὸς θεοῦ φύσει νομοθετῆται, οὐ τῶν γε τελευτάντων⁵ ἀπολλυμένων, ἀλλὰ τῶν γινομένων τοῖς οὐσί προστιθεμένων· ἀγαθοῦ γὰρ οὐκ ἂν εἴη τὸ μόνοις τοῖς οὐσιν ἀνθρώποις τὸ εἶναι τε καὶ γεγονέναι δωρεῖσθαι, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοὺς μὴ ὄντας προκατασκευάζειν τοῖς οὐσιν, ὡς ἂν οἱ⁶ τε γενόμενοι διαδραμόντες αὐτάρκως τοῦ βίου τὸ στάδιον, ἀντὶ ἀναπαύσεως τοῦ δρόμου τὸν θάνατον λάβωσιν (οὐκ εἰς ἀπώλειαν αὐτοὺς ἄγοντα, ἀλλ' ἑτέρωσε κατὰ τὴν ἀξίαν ἐκάστους⁷ μετάγοντα) οἷ τε μὴ ὄντες πάροδοι εἰς τὸ γενέσθαι λάβωσιν. οὐκοῦν θάνατος ὁ τῇ φύσει νομοθετημένος οὐ πονηρός, κἂν ὀπωσοῦν⁸ ἐπίοι. οὐδὲ γὰρ τὸ διάφορον τῶν περιστάσεων δι' ὧν ἔπεισιν ἐξεταστέον, ἓνα δὲ τρόπον⁹ κοινὸν τοῖς πᾶσιν ὄντα γνωστέον, λέγω δὴ τὸ μὴ δίχα περιστάσεώς τινος καὶ ἀνάγκης ἀναχωρεῖν ψυχὴν ἀπὸ σώματος, ἀλλὰ παραμένειν ἕως ἂν τὸ φυσικὸν αὐτῆς καταγώγιον ἀκαθαίρετον διαμένει. τούτῳ μέντοι τῷ φυσικῷ καὶ κοινῷ συνυπάρχει τι δέος, ὅπερ εἰς τιμωρίας ὑποψίαν ἀναγκαίως παρείληπται, οὐ μέντοι ἐν τοῖς πᾶσιν, ἀλλ' οἷς γε ἡ διάνοια πρόχειρος εἰς ἀμαρτίαν, πρὸς ἀνατροπὴν ταύτης,¹⁰ ὁ μὲν γὰρ ἔμφρων¹¹ κατ' ἀρετὴν ἄρα γε¹² τοῦ πλημμελεῖν καὶ τοῦ οἶεσθαι μοχθηρὸν εἶναι τὸν θάνατον ἀπήλλακται, ὁ δὲ φιλαμαρτήμων ἀπὸ μὲν¹³ τῆς αὐτῆς ἀνοίας ἀφ' ἧσπερ καὶ πλημμελεῖ, τὸν θάνατον εὐλαβεῖται. ἀναγκαῖον μέντοι τῆς ἀνοίας ἔχει τὸ τοιοῦτον¹⁴ παρακολούθημα, ἵνα τὸ¹⁵ ἀδεὲς δεδιώς, <οὔ>¹⁶ προσῆκεν ἀληθῶς δεδιέναι (λέγω δὴ τῆς ἀμαρτίας) διαφύγη τὴν βλάβην. ἐπειδὴν οὖν πλεονάσῃ παρ' ἔθνεσι τὰ τῆς ἀμαρτίας, ἧς γε τυγχάνει ἐν εἶδος τὸ τῆς ἀπληστίας, ἑαυτοῖς¹⁷ παραίτια γίνεταί τῆς κατὰ τὸ φαινόμενον τιμωρίας, ἥτις κατὰ μὲν τὸ ἀληθές ὡς οὐκ ἂν εἴη τιμωρία λέλεκται, φύσει κοινή κατὰ πάντων ὀρισμένη, εὐεργετῆ δὲ τούτῃ τε πίπτοντας ἐν πολέμῳ καὶ τοὺς διασωζομένους, τοῖς μὲν ἀμαρτίας τέλος παρέχουσα, τοῖς δὲ ὑπόδειγμα δέους ἐμποιοῦσα· εὐεργετῆ δὲ¹⁸ κἄν δίκαιοι τῷ πλήθει συναπέλθωσιν· ὡς γὰρ τοῖς ἀδίκους τέλος τῆς ἀδικίας ὁ θάνατος, οὕτω δὲ καὶ δικαίοις ὡς νικηταῖς τρόπον τινὰ στεφάνων ἀρχή· ὥστε θαυμάσιον διὰ τῆς πανσόφου προνοίας τοῦ θεοῦ συμβαίνει· τὸ γὰρ δοκοῦν¹⁹ κολάζειν εὐεργετῆ καὶ οὐδὲ δι' ὧν αὐτὸς ἄντικρυς κατασκευάζει ἀνιαρῶν εἶναι δοκούντων, ἀλλὰ δι' ὧν ἀνθρώποις αὐτομολοῦσι συγχωρεῖ· ὥστε πόλεμος οὐκ ἔργον θεοῦ ἀλλὰ συγχώρησις ἀναγκαία, εἰς μὲν ὑποψίαν τιμωρίας κατὰ τῆς ἀμαρτίας, κατὰ δὲ τὸ ἀληθὲς εἰς τέλος αὐτῆς, ἔνθα κἄν δίκαιοι πέσῃ (δίκαιον δὲ πολεμεῖν ἀπεικός) μειζόνως εὐεργετῆται. μειζόν γὰρ τοῦ παυθῆναι κακίας τὸ καρπῶν ἀπολαύσαι τῶν τῆς ἀρετῆς πόνων, ὅπερ εὐσεβέσι μετὰ θάνατον ὑπάρχει.

- 1 μία G ed.L(H)—supported by כַּלְמָהּ אַחַד, “one destiny” in Sy 49.6–7; μή V.
- 2 ἑαυτῆ ed.L(H); ἑαυτῶν V G.
- 3 καὶ πῶς οὐ πάντῃ τοῦτο γε G ed.L(H); καὶ πῶς καὶ οὐ πάντῃ γε τοῦτο V.
- 4 ὅθεν τὸ μὲν ἄνισον τῆς εἰμαρμένης (τὸ χαλεπὸν τῶν πεπλανημένων νόσημα) V G ed.L(H); otherwise in Sy 49.8–9: כַּלְמָהּ שְׁתֵּי הַמַּלְאָכִים לֹא יָשָׁר וְלֹא יָשָׁר לְהַמְלָכִים אֲשֶׁר יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה לָהֶם, “From this inequality of fate there is not place in the affairs (of men) for the severe illness of those erring ones.”
- 5 τελευτώντων V G corr.ed.L; τελευτόντων H(acc.to ed.L)
- 6 οἱ G ed.L(H); οἰοί V.
- 7 ἐκάστους V G; ἐκάστου ed.L(H).
- 8 ὅπως οὖν V G corr.ed.L; ὅποσόν H(acc.to ed.L).
- 9 τρόπον ed.L(H); τὸν τρόπον V G.
- 10 αὐτῆς G ed.L(H); αὐτῆς V.
- 11 ἔμφρων ed.L(H)—supported by כְּהַרְוֵהוּ אִם כְּסוּפֵהוּ אִם יָשָׁר אִם יָשָׁר, “for he who is wise and is in (a state of) virtue”, in Sy 49.33–34; ἐμφέρων V G.
- 12 ἄρα γε G (concluding); ἀρά γε V ed.L(H).
- 13 μὲν G ed.L(H); omitted in V.
- 14 τοιοῦτον G ed.L(H); τοιοῦτο V.
- 15 ἵνα τὸ G ed.L(H); ἵνα δὲ τὸ V.
- 16 <οὔ> corr.ed.L; ὃ V G H(acc.to ed.L).
- 17 ἑαυτοῖς G ed.L(H); ἑαυτῷ V.
- 18 δὲ G ed.L(H); καὶ V.
- 19 δοκοῦν G ed.L(H); δοκεῖν V.

But because they also assign wars to evil, (the question arises) how is it according to them in the case of the different destinies, when sometimes many thousands fall at one and the same time, or rather, indeed, in one and the same hour? Surely one destiny or another unites them under itself? It really is in every way the most ridiculous thing to suppose this. In such circumstances there is no room for the inequality of destiny in things, (and the argument on this basis is otherwise) the errant men's heavy sickness, and (furthermore it is a fact) that wars have their beginnings in covetousness, but are realised (in practice) because God allows it. For their occasion, i.e. the desire of covetousness, is admittedly an evil that is due to the sin of men—not of God—as has been shown previously, but death in nature is not evil.

For birth and death are ordained by God in nature, in that those who die are in no way lost, while those who are born are added to those who (already) exist. For it would not be characteristic of a good being to give existence and birth only to the men who (already) exist, but on the contrary to prepare those who do not exist to be, so that both those who have been born receive death—which should be regarded as a rest after the race when they have run through life's arena sufficiently, since death does not lead them to destruction, but leads each of them away to the other side according to their deserts—and those who do not exist receive the entrance to birth. Surely then, death, which is ordained by nature, is not evil, whichever way they should come upon it. For the difference between the circumstances by which they come upon it should not be examined either, but one must know that there is one common manner for all, i.e. that the soul does not withdraw from the body without some distress and pain, but that it holds out for as long as its natural lodging may persist unimpaired. In this natural and common (death) there is admittedly a certain fear present, namely the fear one has of necessity with regard to the suspicion of punishment; it is true that it is not present in them all, but it is at least (present) in those whose intention is ready to sin, with a view to disturbing this intention. For while it is true that he who is wise with regard to virtue, is released from sinning and from thinking that death is evil, yet he who loves sin fears death out of the same ignorance through which he also sins. Precisely the same consequence follows inevitably from ignorance, in order that he who fears what is not to be feared will escape being harmed by that which it is in truth fitting to fear, namely sin.

When the sinful (desires) then swell up in the peoples(a), among which one kind is indeed (the desire of) greediness, they become guilty of the visible punishment, which admittedly cannot in truth be called a punishment, since it is destined for all through their common nature, but on the contrary is a benefaction both for those who fall in war and for those who come through it safely: for the fallen by putting an end to their sin, and for the survivors by instilling in them an example of what there is to fear. But also if some of the righteous have joined the crowd (in war), death is similarly a benefaction. For just as death puts an end to the injustice of the unjust, so it is also for the righteous—as it is for the victors—in a manner the beginning of the crowns of victory. Therefore death occurs wonderfully through God’s all-wise Providence. For what seems to punish is a benefaction, nor is it a case of punishment through those things that He Himself openly brings about, which are (otherwise) considered to be unpleasant things, but (only) through those things that He simply allows men themselves to be involved in.

Thus war is not the work of God, but His permission is necessary. With regard to sin, war is to be sure (appointed) for the (fearful) suspicion of punishment, but with regard to the truth (it is appointed) in order to put an end to sin, and even if a righteous man should then fall—but it is unlikely that a righteous man prosecutes war—a major benefaction has been performed. For greater than the abstaining from evil is it to enjoy the fruits of one’s labour for virtue which is prepared for the pious after death.

a) ἔθνεσι could also be translated here as ‘gentiles’.

Number 24

II.23, Gr. 40.10–14

πῶς δ’ ἂν τὸν θάνατον κακίσαι δυνηθεῖεν, ἀπολούντά γε τῆς ὕλης (κατὰ τὸν λόγον τοῦ ἀπατεῶνος) τὴν ψυχὴν; ὥστε κατὰ μὲν τὴν κοινὴν δόξαν ἥκιστα γε θάνατος κακόν. τὸ γὰρ ἀναγκαίως τοῖς πᾶσι συμβαίνει οὐ κακόν¹.

1 κακόν G ed.L(H); κακός V.

But how could they scold death, when it indeed releases the soul from matter, according to the deceiver’s teaching? That is why death is in no way an evil according to common opinion. For that which of necessity befalls everyone is not evil.

Number 25

II.23, Gr. 40.19–37

ὅτι δὲ ὁ θάνατος ἤκιστα κακός, δειχθείη μάλιστα ἂν ἐκείνως. εἰ γὰρ μὴ κατὰ πάντων ὄριστο, ὅ τε δίκαιος διὰ παντός ἂν ἐπίνει πρὸς ἀρετὴν, οὐδὲν πλέον τῶν ἰδρώτων καρπούμενος, ὅ τε ἄδικος ἐν ἡδοναῖς ἂν τῶν ἀμαρτημάτων ἀθάνατος διήγεν· καὶ ἦν ἂν ἐκάτερον λίαν ἄτοπον. ὁ δὲ θάνατος¹ καὶ τὴν ἄδικον ἡδονὴν τῷ πλημμελοῦντι καταστέλλει καὶ τὸν δίκαιον πόνον τῷ δικαιοπραγοῦντι καταπαύσει. ἐπειδὴ γὰρ ἀναγκαῖον ἀνθρώποις τὸ δύνασθαι ἀμαρτάνειν, αἴτιον ὄν τοῦ δύνασθαι κατορθοῦν, ἢ δὲ ἐξουσία παρὰ θεοῦ δοθεῖσα πρὸς τὴν τοῦ καλοῦ² κάγαθοῦ κτήσιν παρὰ τοῖς πλείοσι πρὸς τὸ εὐκόλον τῆς ἀμαρτίας ἀποκλίνει,³ ὡς θαυμασιωτέραν εἶναι τὴν ἀρετὴν δυσχερεῖα συγκεκραμένην, ὠφέλιμός⁴ γε ὁ θάνατος ἑκατέρους, δικαίῳ τε καὶ ἀδίκῳ, τῷ μὲν ἀνάπαυλαν τῶν πόνων, τῷ δὲ τέλος τῶν ἀμαρτημάτων παρέχων.⁵ ἀγαθοῦ τοίνυν εὕρισκομένου (οὐχὶ μόνον μὴ κακοῦ) τοῦ θανάτου, οὐ κατὰ τὸν μανέντος λόγον, ὡς ἀπολύοντος τῆς μὴ οὐσίας ὕλης τὴν ψυχὴν, ἀλλὰ τὸν εἰρημένον τρόπον, τοῦ τίνος⁶ χάριν ἀρχὴν κακίας ἐπινοήσαιμεν ἂν τοῖς πολέμοις, οὐχὶ δὲ μόνον τὴν ἄδικον πρόθεσιν τῶν χρωμένων διαβαλοῦμεν;⁷

1 ὁ δὲ θάνατος G ed.L(H)—supported by Sy 51.10; ὁ δὲ θάνατος αὐτῶν V.

2 τοῦ καλοῦ V G; καλοῦ ed.L(H).

3 ἀποκλίνει G ed.L(H); ἀποκλίνειν V.

4 ὠφέλιμός V G corr.ed.L; ὠφέλιμος H(acc.to ed.L).

5 παρέχων G ed.L(H); παρέχων V.

6 τοῦ τίνος G ed.L(H); τοῦ V.

7 διαβαλοῦμεν G ed.L(H); διαβάλλομεν V.

But that death is in no way evil may especially be shown in the following way: for if it were not destined for everyone, the righteous man would forever have laboured for virtue without reaping anything beyond the pearls of sweat, while the unrighteous man would have spent the time as an immortal in sinful lusts. And both facts would have been quite improper. But death ends both the unrighteous lust in the sinner and stops the righteous labour of him who acts rightly. For since being able to sin is necessary for men, because it is the cause of them (also) being able to act virtuously, while the power to acquire the beautiful and the good, which is given by God in the majority of men, tends towards a readiness to sin, so that virtue can be more admirable when it involves difficulty, death is beneficial for them both, the righteous as well as the unrighteous:

for the righteous as rest after his efforts, but for the unrighteous it puts an end to his sins.

Since death is now found to be good—and not merely not evil—not in the way according to the madman’s teaching, where it releases the soul from the—non-existent—matter, but in the way described, for what reason should we imagine a principle of evil behind wars, and not just blame the unrighteous intention among those who make use of it?

Number 26

Π.28, Lag Gr. 44.6–9

οὔτε θάνατος (κἂν πολὺς¹ ἀθρόως ἐπενεχθείη) πονηρός,² οὐκ ἐπὶ ζημία κατὰ ἀνθρώπων ὑπὸ θεοῦ κείμενος, ἀλλ’ ἐπ’ ὠφελείᾳ τῆ ἀνωτάτω δικαίους τε καὶ ἀδίκους ὀρισμένος.

1 πολὺς G ed.L(H); πολλ (abbreviated) V.

2 πονηρός G ed.L(H); πονηρός ὡς V.

Nor is death evil, even if it should occur in a great number suddenly, since it is not laid down by God in respect of men for punishment, but is determined in the highest degree for the benefit of both righteous and unrighteous.

Number 27

Π.39, Gr. 49.35–37

ἔλεγχος γὰρ πᾶν ἐναντίον ἐναντίου, γνώσει μέντοι καὶ κρίσει, ἄνευ δὲ γνώσεως οὐδέτερον θατέρω¹ δῆλον.

1 θατέρω ed.L(H); θατέρου G; διὰ θατέρου V.

For every proof is the contrary of its contrary, (the proof that) precisely (takes place) through cognition and judgement, but it is clear that without cognition neither of them exists for the other.

Number 28

Π.40, Gr. 50.15–18

οὕτω δὴ γνοὺς μὲν ἄνθρωπος ἄμφω, ἀρετὴν τε καὶ κακίαν, ὅπερ ἂν ἔλη-ται (φθάνει γὰρ ἢ γνῶσις τὴν αἴρεσιν), ἀπ' ἐκείνου καλεῖται. πρὶν δὲ γῶναι, <νήπιος ὑπάρχων>,¹ οὐδέτερον τῶν ἄκρων καλεῖται.

1 <νήπιος ὑπάρχων> corr.ed.L; νήπιον ὑπάρχων V G H(acc.to ed.L).

Thus, since man is cognisant of both, virtue and vice, whichever (of them) he may choose—for knowledge comes before choice—he is designated by that, but before he has knowledge, as long as he is a child, he is not designated by either of the two extremes.(a)

a) 'extremes': i.e., 'good and evil', cf. Number 16 above.

Number 29

Π.47, Gr. 56.6–9

δικαίῳ γὰρ καὶ ἀδίκῳ κατὰ διάφορον αἰτίαν ταὐτὸ¹ συμβαίνει, οὔτε τῷ δικαίῳ πρὸς βλάβην οὔτε τῷ ἀδίκῳ πρὸς τιμωρίαν. οὐ γὰρ ἂν εἴη τιμωρία τὸ κατὰ φύσιν, ἀλλὰ πρὸς ὑπόδειγμα ἢ πρὸς κώλυσιν² ἀνηκέστων κακῶν.

1 ταὐτὸ G ed.L(H)—supported by οἱ αὐτοὶ αὐτῶν, “the same”, in § 69.30; τοῦτο V.

2 κώλυσιν V G—supported by κωλύει, “hindrance” in § 69.32; κόλασιν ed.L(H).

For the same happens for different reasons to the righteous and the unrighteous, and neither to the damage of the righteous nor as punishment for the unrighteous. For what is natural cannot be a punishment, but serves as an example or for the prevention of incurable evils.

Number 30

Π.48, Gr. 56.23–28

οὐ γὰρ¹ ἐχρῆν γε² (ὡς ἔοικε) βατὰ³ τοῖς πᾶσιν ὑπάρχειν τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ⁴ σοφίας⁵ τὰ τεκμήρια καὶ τὸν ἄρρητον καὶ ἀκατάληπτον νοῦν πάντη γυμνὸν⁶ εἶναι ἀνθρώπους, ὅπου γε καὶ βασιλέως ἀνθρώπου καὶ ἄρχοντος ἔστιν ὅτε⁷ τὰ πλείστα τῶν βουλευμάτων κέκρυπται,⁸ ὡς καὶ τὸ πραττόμενον ἄδηλον εἶναι ὅτῳ λόγῳ πράττεται.

- 1 οὐ γὰρ V G ed.L(H)—supported by 𐤀𐤍 𐤓𐤁𐤓 , “for not even”, in Sy 70.11; Οὐκ R C.
- 2 γε V G ed.L(H); δὲ C; omitted in R.
- 3 βατὰ G ed.L(H)—supported by 𐤁𐤏𐤃𐤁 , “are comprehensible”, in Sy 70.12; κατὰ V R C.
- 4 τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ C; τῆς θεοῦ V G ed.L(H); τοῦ θεοῦ R.
- 5 σοφίας V G ed.L(H) C—supported by Sy 70.12; omitted in R.
- 6 γυμνὸν V G ed.L(H) C—supported by Sy 70.13; γνῶριμον R.
- 7 ἄρχοντος ἔστιν ὅτε V G ed.L(H) C—supported by 𐤁𐤓 , “sometimes”, in Sy 70.15; ἄρχοντός ἐστιν, ὅτι R.
- 8 κέκρυπται V G ed.L(H) C; κρύπτεται R.

For it seems as though it was at the least not appropriate that the signs of God’s wisdom were accessible to all, and that the ineffable and incomprehensible mind was everywhere laid bare to men, since most of the resolutions of a man who is a king and a ruler are occasionally also covert, so that it is unclear for what reason that which is done is being done.

Number 31

II.48, Gr. 56.36–37

τί δ’ ἂν εἴποιμεν¹ περὶ τῆς ὑπὲρ ἅπαντα² νοῦν σοφίας τοῦ θεοῦ, ἣν³ προσήκε⁴ νοοῦντας⁵ καὶ μὴ νοοῦντας ἐκπλήττεσθαί τε⁶ καὶ τιμᾶν;

- 1 εἴποιμεν V G corr.ed.L C; ἴποιμεν H(acc.to ed.L); εἴποιμι R.
- 2 ἅπαντα V G ed.L(H); πάντα R C.
- 3 ἣν G ed.L(H) R C—supported by Sy 70.26; omitted in V.
- 4 προσήκε V G ed.L(H); προσήκε καὶ R C.
- 5 νοοῦντας V G ed.L(H); νοοῦντας τε R C.
- 6 ἐκπλήττεσθαί τε G ed.L(H) R C; ἐκπλήττεσθαι V.

But what can we then say about God’s wisdom—being beyond every intellect—which it is fitting that we both stand in awe of and honour both when we understand it and when we do not?

Number 32

III.1, Gr. 66.28–67.9

Τὰ μὲν οὖν ἔμπροσθεν ἕκ τε τῶν πραγμάτων αὐτῶν καὶ τῶν κοινῶν ἐννοιῶν εἰρημένα πάντων ἂν ἴσως καὶ τῶν ἐκτὸς τῆς ἐκκλησίας τὸν νοῦν ἀσφαλίσαιτο μηδαμῶς προσείσθαι τοῦ μανέντος τὴν κατὰ τοῦ δημιουργοῦ τῶν ὄλων¹

βλασφημίαν, ἐπειδὴ δὲ² θήραν ἑτέραν κατὰ τῶν ἀπὸ τῆς ἐκκλησίας μεμελέτηκε δεινὴν τε καὶ χαλεπὴν, ῥήσεις τινὰς³ τῶν ἀγίων γραφῶν ἐκβιαζόμενος πρὸς τὴν αὐτοῦ ψευδολογίαν, ὥρα⁴ δὴ καὶ τοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν θείων γραφῶν ἐλέγχους⁵ κατ' αὐτοῦ κινήσαι πρὸς ἀσφάλειαν τῶν πεπιστευκότων,⁶ ταῖς⁷ ἀλλοκότοις καὶ λίαν ἀπιθάνοις ἐρμηνείαις ἔστιν ὅτε πρὸς τῶν ἐκείνου πλανωμένων.⁸ ποικίλως γὰρ μεθοδεύων ἦν⁹ ἐπενόησε συνεργεῖα τοῦ διαβόλου πλάνην, ἰσχύειν ἐπιχειρεῖ.¹⁰ παρ' Ἑλλησι μὲν οὐ τὰ ἐκείνων ἀνατρέπων, τὰ δὲ ἐλάττω κακὰ πρὸς μείζονα ἀσεβείας ὄγκον ἐξαίρων, κακοηθέστερον ἑλληνισμὸν ὑφηγεῖται,¹¹ οἷς σχεδὸν πρὸς ἅπασαν¹² συμπεριαγόμενος φάσιν ὁμοδοξία κακῶν καὶ σφαλερῶν μαθημάτων τὴν προσθήκην τῶν ἐαυτοῦ πλασμάτων παρεμβάλλει—παρὰ δὲ χριστιανοῖς τὰ χριστιανῶν δῆθεν μετιῶν καὶ πιθανότητι ὀνόματός τε χριστοῦ καὶ ῥημάτων τῆς γραφῆς καὶ¹³ ἐπεικειάς ἐμφάσει τὸν μὲν λύκον (ὅπερ αὐτός ἐστιν) ἔνδοθεν σκέπων,¹⁴ τὸ δὲ κώδιον ἔξωθεν περιτιθέμενος, ἀπάτη ἀστέρος¹⁵ τῷ ποιμνίῳ γίγνεται, καὶ οὕτω δὴ τοὺς ἤττον ἔμφονας¹⁶ καταβλάπτει.¹⁷

1 τῶν ὅλων V G ed.L(H); omitted in Sy 82.8.

2 δὲ G ed.L(H)—supported by 𐤒.𐤓 in Sy 82.8; omitted in V.

3 τινὰς G ed.L(H); τὸν V (meaningless); omitted in Sy.

4 ὥρα V G corr.ed.L; ὄρα H(acc.to ed.L).

5 ἐλέγχους V G ed.L(H); singular in Sy 82.10 (𐤒𐤀𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤃𐤁𐤃, “refutation”)—perhaps 𐤒𐤀𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤃 is merely forgotten.

6 πεπιστευκότων V, although the reduplicatory πϵ is added above the line; πιστευόντων G ed.L(H).

7 ταῖς ed.L(H); αὐταῖς V G.

8 πρὸς τῶν ἐκείνου πλανωμένων V G ed.L(H); otherwise in Sy 82.12–13: 𐤒𐤀𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤃 𐤀𐤓𐤏𐤓 𐤏𐤓𐤏𐤓𐤁𐤏𐤃𐤁𐤃 𐤒𐤀𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤃, “to those who are led into error by his disciples”.

9 ἦν G ed.L(H); omitted in V.

10 ποικίλως γὰρ μεθοδεύων ἦν ἐπενόησε συνεργεῖα τοῦ διαβόλου πλάνην, ἰσχύειν ἐπιχειρεῖ. V G ed.L(H); Sy 82.13–14 is rather different: 𐤒𐤀𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤃 𐤀𐤓𐤏𐤓 𐤏𐤓𐤏𐤓𐤁𐤏𐤃𐤁𐤃 𐤏𐤓𐤏𐤓 𐤏𐤓𐤏𐤓𐤁𐤏𐤃𐤁𐤃 𐤒𐤀𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤃 𐤀𐤓𐤏𐤓 𐤏𐤓𐤏𐤓𐤁𐤏𐤃𐤁𐤃, “By all sorts of means he is made crafty by the wealth (= abundance) of his error, with Satan’s assistance, and . . .”—Also in the following lines there are wide differences between Sy and the Greek text.

11 ὑφηγεῖται G; ἐφηγεῖται ed.L(H); ἐξηγεῖται V.

12 ἅπασαν ed.L(H); ἅπαντα V G.

13 καὶ V G—supported by 𐤒𐤀𐤋 in Sy 82.21; omitted in ed.L(H).

14 σκέπων ed.L(H)—the structure with the following περιτιθέμενος could favour this as a correct emendation; σκέπει G; omitted in V (error, for it is found in Sy 82.22 [𐤒𐤀𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤃]).

15 ἀστέρος V G ed.L(H); omitted in Sy 82.23.

16 τοὺς ἤττον ἔμφονας G ed.L(H); τοὺς ἔμφονας ἤττον V.

17 καταβλάπτει V G—supported by ⲁⲗⲉⲛⲁ ⲕⲁ , “harms and damages”, in Sy 82.24; καταλάμπει ed.L(H).

What has now been said above—both from their actions(a) and from the common concepts—may perhaps strengthen the mind, also in all those outside the Church, so that it in no way sanctions the madman’s blasphemy against the Creator of all things; but because he has set another trap(b) for those who are from the Church, both fearful and dangerous, by violating certain words from the Holy Scriptures for his own false narrative, the time is now also ripe to set in motion refutations from the Divine Scriptures against him to strengthen those who believe (and) in defence of those who are occasionally led astray by him through outlandish and highly improbable interpretations. For while he artfully deceives with frauds, which he has invented in collaboration with the Devil, he strives to become strong. Among the Greeks he does not overthrow their teachings, but he raises the lesser evils to the greater standing of impiety and (thus) he instructs a worse kind of Greekness; in them(c) he has inserted an addition of his own inventions, in that he carries his claim round to nearly everyone with a similar tenet on evil and unreliable doctrines, but with the Christians the deception of a star comes into being for the flock,(d) in that he forsooth(e) follows the things that are the Christians’ and with both the persuasiveness that lies in the name of Christ and with a presentation that builds on the words of Scripture and reasonableness he partly hides the wolf—which is himself—on the inside and has partly donned sheep’s clothing on the outside, and in this way he destroys the less intelligent.

- a) ‘from their actions’: πράγματα must summarise one of the bases of the argument in Books I–II, in which Titus has been concerned with the actions of the Manichaeans to only a limited degree, however. Sy 82.5 translates with $\text{ⲕⲁⲑⲁⲗⲁⲙⲓⲡⲉⲓ ⲕⲁⲗⲁ ⲁⲩⲁ ⲁⲩⲁ}$, “both from their affairs”, and Torres “tum ex rebus ipsis”.
- b) ‘trap’: θήρα, lit. ‘hunt’, see Liddell, Scott and Jones 1968, 799a; Lampe 1961, 651a. Torres’ “aliam venationem” is a direct translation. However, the meaning here must be the one mentioned in Arndt and Gingrich 1960, 361a: “net, trap”. The meaningless ⲕⲁⲗ in Sy 82.8 must of course be corrected to $\text{ⲕⲁⲗ} = \text{θήρα}$.
- c) ‘in them’ refers either to ‘the lesser evils’ or to ‘teachings’.
- d) perhaps an allusion to Jude 13.
- e) ‘forsooth’ (δῆθεν) is probably ironical here.

ܐܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢ ܕܠܐ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ
 ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ
 ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ
 ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ ܕܥܡܪܘܢܝܢ

And soon after he says again: “Because of this each one of them, that is the archons of matter,—in that way as we say beforehand—, because of that trembling which had come to pass, and because of that one who first showed himself for the redemption of the soul, and when the doors first were opened by their consternation which was not by their will, each one of them dismissed the power which was in them, and each depicted itself as a snare for the soul and formed his likeness on earth so that by it(a) souls might, with difficulty, be snatched away because of the coercion of the enticement of error.

a) ‘it’: i.e. the snare.

Number 34

III.7, Gr. 69.5–25 (= ed.N 296.1–298.6)

<Ἐπαπορῶν>¹ μὲν δὴ καὶ περὶ τοῦ παντὸς κόσμου, τοῦ χάριν ἐγένετο, περὶ δὲ ἀνθρώπου δεικνύειν ἐπιχειρῶν ὡς οὐκ ἔστι πλάσμα θεοῦ, κινεῖ μὲν ἀνοήτως καὶ ἕτερα, πῶς δὲ καὶ² ἐντολὴν ἐδίδου (φησὶν) ὁ θεὸς τῷ Ἀδάμ; δυοῖν γὰρ θάτερον· ἢ ἐγίνωσκεν ὡς παραβήσεται καὶ οὐ μάτην μόνον ἐδίδου, ἀλλὰ καὶ αἴτιος αὐτοῦ,³ ἢ ἀγνοοῦντα λέγειν ἀνάγκη⁴ τὸν θεὸν ἀγνοῖα περιβεβλήσθαι, ὡς τὴν ἐντολὴν δεδόσθαι μὲν,⁵ εἰς ἐπιβουλήν δὲ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου πρὸς τῆς κακίας (ὡς οἶεται) καὶ οὐδενὸς ἐτέρου, ὠφελῆσθαι⁶ δὲ τὰ μέγιστα καὶ ἡλευθερωθῆσθαι⁷ τὸν ἄνθρωπον, πεισθέντα⁸ συμβουλή τοῦ ὄφραως, ὃν ἄγγελον εἶναι τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ διορίζεται. τυφλὸς μὲν γὰρ ἦν, φησί, γευσάμενος δὲ τοῦ ἀπηγορευμένου εἶδεν ἑαυτὸν ὅτι γυμνὸς ἦν καὶ σκέπη τῇ εὐρεθείῃ κατεχρήσατο καὶ ἔγνω τὰ γαθὸν τε καὶ κακόν.⁹ οὕτως μάλιστα ὠφέληται,¹⁰ παραβεβηκῶς τὸ πρόσταγμα τοῦ ἐπιβούλως πλάσαντος. πῶς δὲ (φησί) πρέποι ἂν¹¹ θεῷ λέγειν „ἰδοὺ Ἀδὰμ γέγονεν ὡς εἷς ἐξ ἡμῶν τοῦ γινώσκειν καλὸν καὶ πονηρόν· καὶ νῦν, μήποτε ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα λάβῃ τοῦ ξύλου τῆς ζωῆς καὶ φάγη καὶ ζήσεται εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα“; εἰ γὰρ <(ὡς φησι)>¹² ἐνῆν ἀθανασίαν ἀπολαβεῖν,¹³ φθονερὸς δὴ ὁ ἐξελαύνων τοῦ παραδείσου τὸν ἄνδρα¹⁴ καὶ ἀποκλείων αὐτῷ τὴν μετουσίαν τοῦ ξύλου τῆς ζωῆς, οὐ μετέχων εἰς αἰεὶ τὴν ἀθανασίαν ἔχειν οἴος τε ἦν.

1 <Ἐπαπορῶν> corr.ed.L; ἐπαπορεῖν VGH(acc.to ed.L).

2 δὲ καὶ VGH(H); omitted in Sy 84.28.

- 3 αὐτοῦ G ed.L(H); αὐτῷ V; the text in Sy 84.31 is ⲁⲙ ⲛⲟⲩⲗⲁ ⲉⲛ ⲛⲁⲕⲁⲗⲁⲗⲁⲃⲟⲥ ⲛⲓ ⲛⲓ ⲕⲁⲟⲩ, “but he was also the cause of the disobedience”, which ed.N suggest could render αἰτία τῆς ἀπειθείας.
- 4 λέγειν ἀνάγκη V G ed.L(H); ⲕⲁⲛⲁ ⲛⲟ, “and it is not likely”, in Sy 84.32, which ed.N (with a question mark) suggests could render ἀλλ’ οὐ δοκεῖ. The difference, however, is more likely one of perspective, and is due to the Catholic view of Sy, see above pp. 196–97.
- 5 μὲν V ed.L(H); μὲν ὄν (for ὄν?) G (meaningless).
- 6 ὠφελῆσθαι G ed.L(H); ὠφελεῖσθαι V.
- 7 ἠλευθερώσθαι G corr.ed.L; ἐλευθερώσθαι V H(acc.to ed.L) (error).
- 8 πεισθέντα G ed.L(H); πειθήσαντα V; ⲛⲟ ⲕⲁⲛⲁ ⲛⲟ ⲛⲓⲱⲗⲁⲕⲁ ⲕⲁⲛⲁ ⲛⲁⲗⲁⲥ ⲛⲟⲩⲗⲁⲗⲁⲃⲟⲥ, “and man was (thus) liberated through his disobedience at the serpent’s advice”, in Sy 84.34–35 can acc.to ed.N be explained by an original ἀπειθήσαντα, a suggestion supported to an extent by V’s πειθήσαντα, which is only used poetically when it is not negative.
- 9 κακόν V G; τὸ κακόν ed.L(H).
- 10 ὠφέληται G ed.L(H); ὠφέλητο V.
- 11 πρέποι ἄν V G; πρέποι ed.L(H).
- 12 <(ὡς φησι)> corr. from ⲛⲟ ⲕⲁ ⲡⲁⲓ in Sy 85.8 (cf. ed.N); omitted in V G ed.L(H).
- 13 ἀθανασίαν ἀπολαβεῖν V G ed.L(H); ⲛⲟⲩ ⲛⲟ ⲛⲟⲩⲁⲗⲁⲃⲟⲥ ⲛⲟⲩ, “not to lose his immortality”, in Sy 85.8–9, which ed.N suggests could render μὴ ἀπολέσαι.
- 14 τοῦ παραδείσου τὸν ἄνδρα G ed.L(H); τὸν ἄνδρα τοῦ παραδείσου V.

(1) He(a) thus also doubts why the whole world came into being, but as for man, he strives to demonstrate that he is not God’s creature. (2) He(a) examines also other things foolishly: “In what way,” he says “has God given Adam a commandment?” (3) For one of two reasons: Either He knew that he would transgress, (and in that case) He not only gave the commandment in vain but was also responsible for it,(b) (4) or one must say that God was ignorant and was endowed with ignorance, so that the commandment was indeed given, but by (the principle of) evil as a plot against man, as he(a) believes, and by none other. (5) But it has been of the greatest benefit and has set man free when he followed the serpent’s advice, which he(a) claims was the angel of the good. (6) “For man was blind,” he says, “but when he had tasted the forbidden, he saw that he was naked, and he made use of the clothing that he found, and he learned to know good and evil.” (7) Thus he(c) has above all benefit from transgressing the order from the one who created him with guile. (8) “But how”, he says, “can it be fitting for God to say, ‘See,

Adam has become like one of us knowing good and evil, and now, lest he ever stretch out his hand to take from the Tree of Life and eat and live forever!?” (9) “For,” he says, “if it is possible to take away immortality, then He is jealous (φθονερός) who expels the man from Paradise and excludes him from sharing the Tree of Life, from which the participant could forever possess immortality.”

- a) he: i.e. Mani.
 b) ‘responsible for it’ (αἷτιος αὐτοῦ), i.e., ‘responsible for him transgressing’. The text of Sy is possibly just a free translation to render the same. αἷτιος αὐτῷ in V, however, must be the dative of interest.
 c) he: i.e., man.

Number 35

III.8,2, ed.N 300.12–13

συνηγορήσει δὲ ἑαυτῷ ὡς¹ οὐ μάτην ἐτόλμησε καὶ τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης τὰ πλείιστα περιγράψασθαι.

1 ὡς V; omitted in ed.N.

But he(a) says in his defence that he has not undertaken to excise most of the new covenant in vain.

- a) ‘he’: i.e., Mani.

Number 36

III.11,3, ed.N 304.18–20

ὡς δὲ σοφὸς πάσης ἐννοίας ἐπέκεινα τῶν γενομένων ἤρμοσεν ἕκαστον καὶ <ποικίλας>¹ τὸ κόσμιον² συγκατεσκεύασεν αὐτοῖς.

1 <ποικίλας> corr.; ποικίλας V ed.N.

2 τὸ κόσμιον V; cf. ραδιλας, “their ornament” (= τὸ κόσμιον . . . αὐτοῖς), in Sy 87.9; τὸν κόσμον ed.N.

But as wise beyond all conception He has joined together every single created thing, and having made them varied He has established the order for them.

Number 37

III.15,7–9, ed.N 314.7–10

ἦδει μὲν ὁ θεὸς ὁ ἐντελλόμενος τὸ ἐκβησόμενον. οὐκ ἀφήρετο δὲ τὸ ἐλευθέριον τοῦ γενομένου οὐδὲ σιωπῶ τὴν ἐντολὴν εἰς ἀργίαν τοῦ ἐλευθερίου δόξαντος τὴν ἀρχὴν οὕτω γενέσθαι τὸν ἄνθρωπον κατ' εἰκόνα θεοῦ,¹ ἀξίως² γε τοῦ ποιήσαντος.

1 κατ' εἰκόνα θεοῦ V; omitted in ed.N; κατὰ τὴν εἰκόνα τοῦ θεοῦ in Sy 89.27, which acc.to ed.N renders καθ' ὁμοίωσιν θεοῦ, is presumably just a translation of κατ' εἰκόνα θεοῦ.

2 ἀξίως V; κατὰ in Sy 89.27 renders ἄξιον acc.to ed.N.

(7) To be sure, God, who gave the order, knew what would happen, (8) but He did not remove freedom from the creature, nor is He silent about the commandment so that freedom becomes inactive, (9) since from the beginning He had in this way intended that man should be in God's image, worthy of the Creator.

Number 38

III.17,5, ed.N 318.6–10

ὁ γὰρ πειραθεὶς τῇ ἐνεργείᾳ ὡς ἄμφω δύναται,¹ ὑφ' ἑαυτοῦ μαθάνει τὸ κρεῖττον ἐλέσθαι τῇ πείρᾳ τοῦ μονονουχὶ ἀναγκαίου προβλήματος ἀποδεικνύντος αὐτῷ τὸ ἐλευθέριον καὶ τὴν ἐξουσίαν τῆς φύσεως.

1 δύναται V; δύναται ed.N (printing error).

For he who by his activity experienced that he is capable of both things learns from himself through this experience to choose what is better, since the almost necessary task showed him the freedom and the power of (his) nature.

Sy 90.24–27

αὐτὸς ἑαυτῷ διὰ τὴν ἐνεργείαν ὡς ἄμφω δύναται, ὑφ' ἑαυτοῦ μαθάνει τὸ κρεῖττον ἐλέσθαι τῇ πείρᾳ τοῦ μονονουχὶ ἀναγκαίου προβλήματος ἀποδεικνύντος αὐτῷ τὸ ἐλευθέριον καὶ τὴν ἐξουσίαν τῆς φύσεως.

1 αὐτὸς Sy ed.N67s; αὐτὸς ed.L59a

2 ed.N suggests that κατὰ τὴν εἰκόνα τοῦ θεοῦ could render the text τῆς προπέρας ὄντως ἀναγκαίας ἀποδεικνύσης αὐτῷ.

Above all the difference between the two texts appears to be theological; they disagree over whether evil is necessary (cf. above p. 329).

For he(a) who through the act knew by experience how he is able to do both things(b) of his own accord, learnt to choose that which is preferable, for the experience in front of him, which indeed had inevitably happened, had shown him his freedom and also the authority that his (human) nature had.

a) ‘he’: i.e. man

b) ‘both things’: i.e. virtue and vice.

Number 39

III.18,4–5, ed.N 320.12–14

θνητὸν μὲν εἶναι τοῦτον βεβούληται.¹ οὐ μὴν ἀπροφασίστως² κατ’ αὐτοῦ τὸν ὅρον ἐκτέθεικε τοῦ θανάτου, ἀλλ’ ἐπὶ τῇ ἀπειθείᾳ τοῦτον ὥρισεν, ἣν ἂν σαφῶς προεγίνωσκεν.³

1 θνητὸν μὲν εἶναι τοῦτον βεβούληται V; otherwise in Sy 91.14–15: ܩܕܝܫܘܬܐ ܕܥܠܝܘܬܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܠܝܘܬܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܠܝܘܬܐ, “He (i.e. God) wants it to be on his own (i.e. man’s) authority whether to choose life or death”. ed.N suggests that this renders εἰς τὸ ἐλέσθαι ζῶν τε καὶ κακίαν ἐπ’ αὐτῷ βεβούληται (sic, read θάνατον for κακίαν). But it seems rather more a question of Sy’s own reformulation (cf. p. 350).

2 ἀπροφασίστως V; ἀποφρασίστως ed.N (printing error).

3 προεγίνωσκεν V cf. also ed.N67; προγίνωσκεν ed.N (printing error).

(4) However, He(a) has wanted him(b) to be mortal. (5) He has in truth not laid down the limit of death for him without a pretext, but He fixed it on the grounds of the disobedience, which He clearly knew of beforehand.

a) ‘He’: i.e. God.

b) ‘him’: i.e. man.

Number 40

III.18,11, ed.N 322.1–6

τὸ μὴ αἰεὶ μήτε τὸν παραλαμβανόμενον εἰς ἀγωγὴν ἀμαρτημάτων ἀθανάτως ζῆν ἐν κακίᾳ προθέσεως, καὶ πολλῷ γε πλέον, εἰ μηδενὸς τοῦ μετὰ θάνατον ἐξῆς ἀπειλουμένου, <μήτε>¹ τὸν γυμναζόμενον εἰς ἀγῶνα ἀρετῆς ἀδιάλειπτον ὑπομένειν ἰδρῶτα, ἐκάτερον δὲ ἐπὶ εὐεργεσία μεγίστη τε καὶ² ἀγνωτάτῳ³ λαβεῖν τὸ <τοῦ> βίου⁴ τὸ τέλος.

1 <μήτε> corr.ed.N; μὴ δὲ V.

2 τε καὶ V; καὶ ed.N.

3 ἀγνωτάτῳ ed.N, doubtless correct; τῇ ἀγνωτάτῳ V.

4 τὸ <τοῦ> βίου corr.; τὸ βίου V; τοῦ βίου ed.N.

The critical apparatus in ed.N also points out other variants in Sy.

(Death is a benefit in that) neither he who is controlled by a sinful way of life always lives immortally in deliberate wickedness—and that would be much more (harmful), if (it meant that) nothing of what followed after death threatened him—nor that he who exercises himself in the struggle for virtue has to abide patiently the incessant sweat (of effort), but that they both, through the greatest benefaction and most inconceivable profit receive the conclusion of life.

Number 41

III.21,3–4, ed.N 326.6–14

τὸ δὲ “ἰδοὺ δέδωκα <ὑμῖν>¹ <πάν>² χόρτον σπόριμον σπείρον σπέρμα, ὃ ἐστὶν ἐπάνω τῆς γῆς, καὶ πᾶν ξύλον, ὃ ἔχει ἐν ἑαυτῷ καρπὸν σπέρματος σπορίμου—ὑμῖν ἔσται εἰς βρῶσιν” πῶς οὐ δηλοῖ, ὅτι τὴν ἀρχὴν πρὸς ταύτην ἐπλάσθημεν τὴν κατάστασιν, ἐν ἧ τυγχάνομεν ὄντες; καὶ οὐ τὰ τῆς ἀπειθείας τοῦ πλάσματος μετέβαλλεν, ὡς ἄλλην μὲν οὐδσαν ἐξ ἀρχῆς τὴν³ οἰκονομίαν, ἀλλὴν δὲ τῆς ἀπειθείας τῇ προγνώσει τοῦ θεοῦ προδήλου τυγχανούσης.

1 <ὑμῖν> corr.ed.N on the basis of LXX.

2 <πάν> corr.ed.N on the basis of LXX; πάντα V.

3 τὴν V; omitted in ed.N.

The critical apparatus in ed.N also points out other variants in Sy.

(3) But this saying: “See, I have given you every seed-bearing corn there is on earth that sows a herb, and every tree that has in itself the fruit of (its own) seed-bearing germ; to you it shall be for food”—surely these words clearly show that from the beginning we were formed for the very condition in which we find ourselves. (4) And (the acts of) disobedience did not alter the (human) creature, as if there was the one dispensation from the beginning, but another when the disobedience was known in God’s foreknowledge.

Number 42

III.22,1–2, ed.N 328.5–12. Some words in III.22,2 (ed.N 328.8–12) which are also in ed.N67, have unfortunately been omitted from the printed text (ed.N). The correct text is:

Οὐ τοίνυν ἐβιάσθη <θεὸς>¹ δι' ὧν ἠπειθήσεν ἄνθρωπος πρὸς τε τῷ θανάτῳ περιβαλεῖν αὐτὸν καὶ πρὸς τε παραδείσου χωρίσαι, ἀλλὰ παρ' αὐτοῦ, τῆς θείας οἰκονομίας, λαμβάνειν ἔδοξε τὰς ἀφορμάς· οὕτως μέντοι βεβούληται. εἰ δὲ μὴ θεὸς ἐβιάσθη οὐδὲ ἄνθρωπος ἐζημιώθη πρὸς τοῦτο καταστάσεως ἐλθῶν, ὅπερ αὐτῷ καὶ προπαρεσκευάσθη παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ² ποιήσαντος, ἀναγκαῖα δὲ τῆς καλλίονος διαγωγῆς ἢ πείρα ἐκεῖθεν ὠρμημένῳ πρὸς τὸ διὰ πόνων ἀρετῆς τε καὶ εὐσεβείας ἑαυτῷ πραγματεύασθαι³ τὴν ἐκεῖσε ἐπάνοδον μετὰ μείζονος ἔτι ἀξιώματος.

1 <θεὸς> corr.ed.N on the basis of Sy 93.21.

2 τοῦ V; omitted in ed.N and ed.N67.

3 πρὸς τὸ διὰ πόνων ἀρετῆς τε καὶ εὐσεβείας ἑαυτῷ πραγματεύασθαι V cf. also ed.N67; omitted in ed.N.

The critical apparatus in ed.N also points out other variants in Sy.

(1) God was therefore not forced by man's disobedience to prescribe death for him and remove him from Paradise, but on the contrary it pleased Him to take the starting-points in Himself, in the divine dispensation. Thus He has actually willed it. (2) But if God was not forced, and man did not suffer harm, when he came to this (kind of) condition, which was also prepared for him from God the Creator's side, then the experience of an (originally) better way of life must have been necessary for the one who set out from that place in order through the labours of virtue and piety and for himself to procure the path back with an even greater reputation.

Number 43

III.24,7–11, ed.N 334.10–20

οὕτως εἶδοι τις ἂν τὰς αὐτὰς τῶν πράξεων καὶ πρακτέας καὶ ἀπηγορευμένας τῇ διαφορᾷ τοῦ σκοποῦ πρὸς τὴν ἐκάστου τῆς προθέσεως ἐπαγγελίαν.¹ ἂ γὰρ ποιεῖν ἐξόν, εἴ τις ἐπαγγείλαιο καρτερίας μεταποιούμενος μὴ ποιεῖν, ἀπέκλεισε λοιπὸν ἑαυτῷ τὸ ἐξεῖναι ποιεῖν. καὶ οὐχ ἡ πρᾶξις ὅποια τις ἐστὶν ἔτι καθ' ἑαυτὴν ἀνακρίνεται, ἀλλ' ἡ πρόθεσις τοῦ ἐπαγγειλαμένου <ἄλλην>² ποιότητα τῇ πράξει ἐπεισάγοντος τῷ ἰδίῳ σκοπῷ τῆς ἐπαγγελίας. οὕτω δὴ καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ Ἀδάμ. οὐχ ἡ γεῦσις τοῦ ξύλου ποιότητα πράξεως εἶχε διαβεβλημένην, ἀλλ' ἐντολὴ τὸ ἐξεῖναι κωλύουσα ἀγῶνα παρασκευάζει τῷ δεχομένῳ.

1 ἐπαγγελίαν V; ἀπαγγελίαν ed.N (printing error).

2 <ἄλλην> corr.ed.N on the basis of ~~ⲁⲗⲗⲏ~~ in Sy 95.17; ἀλλὰ τὴν V.
The critical apparatus in ed.N also points out other variants in Sy.

(7) One would thus see that the same actions both must be performed and are being forbidden according to their different purposes with regard to the intention of each one's vow. (8) For if anyone who has adopted abstinence vows not to do those things which it is possible to do, he has for the future excluded himself from doing what is (otherwise) possible (for him). (9) And the question is not asked about how the action is in itself, but about the promiser's intention, since with the particular aim of the vow he also introduces another quality through the action. (10) Thus it is too with relation to Adam: (11) It was not the tasting of the tree that had the blameworthy quality of an action, but the commandment that hindered what was possible and prepared the struggle for its recipient.

Number 44

III.27,8–9, ed.N 340.13–19

οὐ διὰ βασκανίαν¹ ἀποκλείοντος αὐτοῖς τοῦ θεοῦ τὴν χρῆσιν τοῦ ξύλου τῆς ζωῆς κατὰ τὴν ἐπαπόρησιν τῶν ἐκ τοῦ μανέντος, ἀλλ' ἐπειδὴ ζῆν ἀθανάτως τὸν πολλὴν ἔχοντα προχειρότητα πρὸς ἁμαρτίαν διὰ τὸ ἐλευθέριον τῆς φύσεως ἀσύμφορον ἦν. ἵνα μὴ συναπαθανατισθῆ τοῦτο παρὰ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, ἀνείργει θεὸς λυσιτελῶς τὴν χρῆσιν τοῦ τὴν ἀθανασίαν ἐμποιοῦντος δόξαν² καλῶς θνητὸν εἶναι τὸν ἄνθρωπον.

1 βασκανίαν V; βασκανίας ed.N.

2 δόξαν V; δόξας ed.N.

ed.N also points out other variants in Sy.

(8) It was not because of jealousy that God excluded them from the use of the Tree of Life (which it otherwise would be) according to the doubt (adduced) by supporters of the madman, but because by reason of the freedom of nature it was harmful that anyone who has a great predisposition for sin, lives immortally. (9) In order for what issues from sin not to be made immortal in the same way,

But Xenophon writes that “the sages of the Persians of old believed in two opposing principles”, so that it was from there that this man(a) had a closeness to barbarism. Aristotle, however, spoke about “matter”, but he did not give this name to some living principle as (it is the case with) this “matter” of his(b), (he) who uses and introduces an alien name which does not belong to himself. But, corresponding to the likeness of the name, he(c) called that which is not alive nor has any movement of its own accord “matter”. This man,(a) however, altered the use of the false name (so that it designated) “evil”, and he is not only ungrateful in (the matter of) his theft, but he is also a miserable knave who alters something which is not his own into a fraud. But Plato <taught>, more and more in error, with a clear term the transmigration of souls(d).

- a) ‘this man’: i.e., Mani.
- b) ‘of his’: i.e., of Mani.
- c) ‘he’: i.e., Aristotle.
- d) The present translation of the last lines about Plato seems better than the one to be found in Jackson 1925, 256: “But Plato erroneously taught in terms more clear [than Mānī] the transfusion of souls (tašp k^t ā d^hnap^hšāt^hā):”

Number 47

IV.86, Sy 169.34–170.3

ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ
 ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ
 ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ
 ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ܠܗ

1 ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ; ܘܢܘܨܢܘܢܝܢ ed.L59a.

Paul said that he (only) knows a little out of much, and he (only) prophesies a little out of much, but when perfection comes, (then) that which was a little comes to an end. Now because he speaks through me, perfection has been introduced precisely through me, and also that which was a little is being repaired and cleansed.

How would you say that the body rises, if flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God?—"Therefore," they say, "the resurrection of the dead does not exist". And they neither direct their attention to the (scriptural passages) that are mentioned above in abundance, nor do they understand the (passages) added subsequently, but like people who are extremely unrighteous when circumstances persist, they choose the (proposition) which they presume to be pleasant for them in relation to their own impiety, and (so) they do not choose what is righteous—"No longer (is) the risen flesh (endowed with) passion," says the apostle, "nor does a heavy body live again in fellowship with the passions."

Number 51

IV.100 (last half), IV.101 (last part)

I, C R, corresponding to Sy 179.1–11 and 179.17–19

Εἰ μὲν γάρ τις τοῦτο ἔλεγεν, ὅτι ἡ σὰρξ ἅμα τοῖς ἐμφύτοις πάθεσιν αὐθις ἀναστᾶσα ζήσεται, τὰ αὐτὰ πάσχουσα¹ τε καὶ δρῶσα¹ ἅμα τῇ ψυχῇ, ἣν ἂν ἄλογος² οὐκ ἔχουσα ἀγαθὴν ἐλπίδα.³ Εἰ δὲ μεταβολὴν αὐτὸ δὴ τοῦτο λαμβάνει κρείττονος καὶ μακαρίας ἕξεως, ὅπερ δεικτικῶς σημαίνει⁴ φάσκων· δεῖ γὰρ τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσασθαι ἀφθαρσίαν καὶ τὸ θνητὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσασθαι ἀθανασίαν.⁵ Δικαία μὲν τοῦ συγκαμόντος ἐργαλείου τῇ ψυχῇ ἡ ἀπόδοσις·⁶ οὐκ ἐπιζήμιος δὲ καὶ αὐθις⁷ ἐπίπονος αὐτῇ· ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ μακαρίῳ ταύτας ἔσεσθαι τῶν σωζομένων τὰς ψυχὰς ἀπειληφῆσθαι μὲν τὸ σύμφυτον αὐταῖς σῶμα, οὐ μέντοι βαρὺ καὶ γεῶδες, καὶ σαρκικῆς ἐπιθυμίας γέμον, καθάπερ τὴν ἀρχὴν, ὅτε δὴ προσήκον ἦν τῷ ἀγῶνι τῆς ἀρετῆς ἐνευδοκιμησαὶ ταύταις.⁸

The following conclusion to the fragment is rediscovered in Sy 179.17–19, where it is part of IV.101:

Ἄδικία γὰρ, εἰ μὴ τὸ συμπονήσαν τῇ ψυχῇ σῶμα, κατὰ τήνδε τὴν πολιτείαν ἀποδῆθαι συναπολαύσοντα αὐτῇ τῶν ἐπάθλων.⁹

1 δρῶσα C; δρώμας R (corr. <δρῶσα> PG 18, 1259, n. 66*).

2 ἣν ἂν ἄλογος C R; omitted in Sy 179.3–4.

3 οὐκ ἔχουσα ἀγαθὴν ἐλπίδα C R; otherwise in Sy 179.3–4.

4 σημαίνει R; σημενει C (merely αι>ε), a later hand, however, has changed it to σημαίνει.

5 καὶ τὸ θνητὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσασθαι ἀθανασίαν C R; omitted in Sy 179.6.

6 ἡ ἀπόδοσις R; ἀπόδοσις C.

7 αὐθις C; ἔτι R; ⲁⲟⲃ in Sy 179.7 can render both αὐθις and ἔτι.

- 8 What follows in Sy 179.11–13 is the ending of Ch. 100, which is placed in the following as Number 51,II.
- 9 συναπολαύσοντα αὐτῆ τῶν ἐπάθλων C—supported by ܠܝܬܐ ܡܝܢ ܡܫܘܒܐ ܠܗܘܪܐ in Sy 179.18–19; συναπολαύσιν R.

For if anyone said that the risen flesh will again live together with its innate passions, since the same passions both suffer and act together with the soul, it(a) would be without reason, since it did not have a good hope. In the opposite case this very (body) receives a change to a better and blessed condition which he (also) demonstrably indicates, saying: “For this corruptible must put on incorruptibility and this mortal put on immortality.”(b) It is just that the instrument that has toiled together with the soul is given back to it, and it is not harmful and on the other hand laborious for it, but these souls of the saved will exist in blessedness(c) after having regained the body that was united with them. However, it is no longer heavy and earthy and full of fleshly desire as it was in the beginning, when it was fitting that (the souls) won renown in the struggle for virtue.

In conclusion an extract from IV.101:

For it is an injustice if the body that toiled together with the soul in this (earthly) citizenship is not to be returned to it, so that together they can enjoy the prizes for battle.

a) ‘it’: i.e. the risen flesh.

b) 1 Cor. 15.53.

c) ‘in blessedness’; βίω is not implied or has been omitted, as the editors of C R believed: cf. ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ, “in blessedness”, in Sy 179.8.

II, Sy 179.11–13 (conclusion of IV.100)

ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܝܡܝܢܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܡܝܢ ܠܝܬܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ
 ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ ܠܗܘܪܐܘܠܐ

In this way, then, the apostle elucidates by means of many words the doctrine about the resurrection, and he introduces the statement about the beatitude which is (based) on it.

This page intentionally left blank

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abramowski, Rudolf 1931: "Untersuchungen zu Diodor von Tarsus." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche; 30. Berlin, 234–62.
- 1949: "Der theologische Nachlaß des Diodor von Tarsus." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche; 42. Berlin, 19–69.
- Adam, Alfred 1958: "Das Fortwirken des Manichäismus bei Augustin." Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte; Vierte Folge VI. LXIX Band. Stuttgart, 1–15.
- 1969: Texte zum Manichäismus. Ausgewählt und herausgegeben von Alfred Adam. 2. verbesserte und vermehrte Auflage. Kleine Texte für Vorlesungen und Übungen; 175. Berlin.
- Adler, Ada 1967: Suidae Lexicon edidit Ada Adler. Pars II Δ-Θ. Editio stereotypa editionis primae (MCMXXXI). Sammlung wissenschaftlicher Commentare. Lexicographi Graeci; I. Stuttgart.
- Adriaen, M. 1963: S. Hieronymi presbyteri Opera. Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina; LXXIII. Pars I. Opera exegetica. 2. S. Hieronymi presbyteri Commentariorum in Esaiam, libri I–XI. Cura et studio Marci Adriaen. Turnhout.
- Aigrain, R. 1924: "Arabie." Dictionnaire d'Histoire et de Géographie Ecclésiastiques; III. Paris, 1158–1339.
- Aland, Barbara 1973: "Marcion. Versuch einer neuen Interpretation." Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche; 70. Tübingen, 420–47.
- 1978: "Gnosis und Kirchenväter. Ihre Auseinandersetzung um die Interpretation des Evangeliums." Gnosis. Festschrift für Hans Jonas. Herausgegeben von Barbara Aland. Göttingen, 158–215.
- Aland, Barbara and Juckel, Andreas 1991: Die Neue Testament in syrischer Überlieferung. II. Die paulinischen Briefe. Teil I: Römer- und 1. Korintherbrief. Herausgegeben und untersucht von Barbara Aland—Andreas Juckel. Arbeiten zur neutestamentlichen Textforschung; 14. Berlin and New York.
- D'Alès, Adhémar 1916: "La doctrine de la récapitulation en Saint Irénée." Recherches de Science Religieuse; 6. Paris, 184–211.
- Alexandre, Monique 1988: Le commencement du livre Genèse I–V. La version grecque de la Septante et sa réception. Christianisme antique; 3. Paris.
- Allard, Paul 1903: Julien l'Apostat. III. Julien et les chrétiens: La persécution et la polémique. La guerre de Perse. Paris.
- Allberry, G.R.C. 1938: A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II (Manichaean Manuscripts in the Chester Beatty Library; II). Stuttgart.
- 1939: "Symbole von Tod und Wiedergeburt im Manichäismus." Eranos-Jahrbuch; 1939. Vorträge über die Symbolik der Wiedergeburt in der religiösen Vorstellung der Zeiten und Völker. Herausgegeben von Olga Fröbe-Kapteyn. Zürich, 113–49.
- Alfaric, Prosper 1918: Les Écritures Manichéennes I. Vue Générale. Paris.
- 1919: Les Écritures Manichéennes II. Étude Analytique. Paris.
- Alt, A. 1937: "Bischöfliche Kirche und Mönchskirche im nördlichen Ostjordanland." Palästinajahrbuch des Deutschen Evangelischen Instituts für Altertumswissenschaft des Heiligen Landes zu Jerusalem; 33. Berlin, 89–111.
- Altermath, F. 1975: "The Purpose of the Incarnation according to Irenaeus." Studia Patristica. Papers presented to the Sixth International Conference on Patristic Studies held in Oxford 1971; XIII. Part II: Classica et Hellenica, Theologica, Liturgica, Ascetica. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 116. Berlin, 63–68.

- Amand, David 1973: Fatalisme et liberté dans l'antiquité grecque: Recherches sur la survivance de l'argumentation morale antifataliste de Carnéade chez les philosophes grecs et les théologiens chrétiens des quatre premiers siècles. Recueil de travaux d'histoire et de philologie; 3^{me} sér., 19^e fasc. Réimpression de l'édition Louvain 1945. Amsterdam.
- Amann, É. 1946: "Théodore de Mopsueste." Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique, XV, 1. Paris, 235-79.
- Andreas, F.C. and Henning, Walter Bruno 1932: "Mitteliranische Manichaica aus Chinesisch-Turkestan I." Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philologisch-historische Klasse; 1932. Berlin, 173-222.
- 1933: "Mitteliranische Manichaica aus Chinesisch-Turkestan II." Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philologisch-historische Klasse; 1933. Berlin, 292-363.
- 1934: "Mitteliranische Manichaica aus Chinesisch-Turkestan III." Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philologisch-historische Klasse; 1934. Berlin, 846-912.
- Andresen, Carl 1978: "Antike und Christentum." Theologische Realenzyklopädie, III. Berlin and New York, 50-99.
- Andresen, Carl 1984: "The Integration of Platonism into Early Christian Theology." Studia Patristica. Papers presented to the Seventh International Conference on Patristic Studies held in Oxford 1975; XV. Part I: Inaugural Lecture, Editiones, Critica, Biblica, Historica, Theologica, Philosophica, Liturgica. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 128. Berlin, 399-413.
- Archambault, Georges 1909: Justin, Dialogue avec Tryphon. Texte grec, traduction française, introduction, notes et index par Georges Archambault. I. Textes et documents; 8. Paris.
- 1909a: Justin, Dialogue avec Tryphon. Texte grec, traduction française, introduction, notes et index par Georges Archambault. II. Textes et documents; 11. Paris.
- Arndt, William F. and Gingrich, F. Wilbur 1960: A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature: A translation and adaptation of Walter Bauer's Griechisch-Deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments und der übrigen urchristlichen Literatur, 4. rev. and augmented edition 1952. Chicago.
- Von Arnim, Hans 1923: Stoicorum veterum fragmenta collegit Ioannes ab Arnim. II. Chryssippi fragmenta logica et physica. Leipzig and Berlin (= SVF II).
- 1923a: Stoicorum veterum fragmenta collegit Ioannes ab Arnim. III. Chryssippi fragmenta moralia, fragmenta successorum Chryssippi. Leipzig and Berlin (= SVF III).
- Arnold, Gottfried 1729: Unpartheyische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie, Vom Anfang des Neuen Testaments Biss auf das Jahr Christi 1688. Frankfurt am Main.
- 1729a: Fortsetzung und Erläuterung Oder Dritter und Vierdter Theil der unpartheyischen Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie Bestehend In Beschreibung der noch übrigen Streitigkeiten im XVIIIden Jahrhundert Nebst den Supplementis und Emendationibus über alle vier Theile. Frankfurt am Main.
- Arnou, R. 1936: "Nestorianisme et Néoplatonisme. L'unité du Christ et l'union des 'Intelligibles'." Gregorianum; XVII. Rome, 116-131.
- Asmussen, Jes Peter 1965: X^oästvän ft. Studies in Manichaeism. Acta Theologica Danica; VII. Copenhagen.
- 1975: Manichaean Literature. Representative Texts Chiefly from Middle Persian and Parthian Writings. Selected, introduced, and partly translated by Jes P. Asmussen. Persian Heritage Series; 22. Delmar (New York).
- Assemani, J.S. 1725: Bibliotheca orientalis clementino-vaticana, in qua Manuscriptos Codices Syriacos, Arabicos, Persicos, Turcicos, Hebraicos, Samaritanos, Armenicos, Æthiopicos, Græcos, Ægyptiacos, Ibericos, & Malabaricos, jussu et munificentia Clementis XI, pontificis maximi, Ex Oriente conquisitos, comparatos, avectos, & Bibliothecæ Vaticanæ addictos, una cum iis, quos Sacra Congregatio de Fide Propaganda, In eandem Bibliothecam inferi jus-

- sit: Recensuit, digessit, excerptis, & genuina scripta a spuris secrevit, praemissa singulorum auctorum vita*, Joseph Simonius Assemanus. III. Pars prima de scriptoribus syris nestorianis. Rome.
- Astruc, Ch., Conus-Wolska, W., Gouillard, J., Lemerle, P., Papachryssanthou, D., and Paramelle, J. 1970: "Les sources grecques pour l'histoire des pauliciens d'Asie Mineure. Texte critique et traduction." Centre de recherche d'histoire et civilisation byzantines. Travaux et mémoires; 4. Paris, 1-228. [III. Photius. Récit de la réapparition des manichéens. pp. 99-184].
- Aubineau, Michel 1980: Les homélies festales d'Hésychius de Jérusalem. Publiées par Michel Aubineau. II. Les homélies XVI-XXI et tables des deux volumes. Subsidia hagiographica; 59. Brussels.
- 1983: Un Traité inédit de Christologie de Sévérien de Gabala. In Centurionem et contra Manichaeos et Apollinaristas. Exploitation par Sève d'Antioche (519) et le Synode du Latran (649). Cahiers d'Orientalisme; V. Geneva.
- Aucher, J.B. 1826: Philonis Judaei Paralipomena Armena: libri videlicet quatuor in Genesim, libri duo in Exodum, sermo unus de Sampsonem, alter de Jona, tertius de tribus angelis, etc. Venice.
- Badger, George Percy 1852: The Nestorians and their Rituals: With the narrative of a mission to Mesopotamia and Coordistan in 1842-1844, and of a late visit to those countries in 1850; also, researches into the present condition of the Syrian Jacobites, Papal Syrians, and Chaldeans, and an inquiry into the religious tenets of the Yezedees. II. London.
- Baehrens, W.A. 1920: Origenes. Werke. VI. Homilien zum Hexateuch in Rufins Übersetzung. Herausgegeben von W.A. Baehrens. I. Die Homilien zu Genesis, Exodus und Leviticus. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 29. Leipzig.
- 1921: Origenes. Werke. VII. Homilien zum Hexateuch in Rufins Übersetzung. Herausgegeben von W.A. Baehrens. II. Die Homilien zu Numeri, Josua und Judges. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 30. Leipzig.
- 1925: Origenes. Werke. VIII. Homilien zu Samuel I, zum Hohelied und zu den Propheten. Kommentar zum Hohelied in Rufins und Hieronymus' Übersetzungen. Herausgegeben von W.A. Baehrens. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 33. Leipzig.
- Bakhuyzen, W.H. van de Sande 1901: Der Dialog des Adamantius. ΠΕΡΙ ΤΗΣ ΕΙΣ ΘΕΟΝ ΟΡΘΗΣ ΠΙΣΤΕΩΣ. Herausgegeben von W.H. van de Sande Bakhuyzen. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 4. Leipzig.
- Balty, Janine and Jean Ch. 1974: "Julien et Apamée. Aspects de la restauration de l'Hellenisme et de la politique antichrétienne de l'Empereur." Dialogues d'histoire ancienne; 1. Paris, 267-304.
- Bardenhewer, Otto 1913: Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur; I. Freiburg im Bressgau.
- 1914: Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur; II. Freiburg im Bressgau.
- 1912: Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur; III. Freiburg im Bressgau.
- Bardy, Gustave 1932: "La littérature patristique des 'quaestiones et responsiones' sur l'Écriture sainte." Revue biblique; 41. Paris, 210-36.
- 1932a: "Origène et l'aristotélisme." Mélanges Gustave Glotz; I. Paris, 75-83.
- 1947: "Le florilège d'Étienne Gobar." Revue des Études Byzantines; V. Bucharest, 5-30.
- 1952: Eusèbe de Césarée, Histoire ecclésiastique. Livres I-IV. Texte grec, traduction et notes par Gustave Bardy. Sources chrétiennes; 31. Paris.
- 1955: Eusèbe de Césarée, Histoire ecclésiastique. II. Livres V-VII. Texte grec, traduction et notes par Gustave Bardy. Sources chrétiennes; 41. Paris.
- Bardy, Gustave and Périchon, Pierre 1987: Eusèbe de Césarée, Histoire ecclésiastique. IV. Introduction par Gustave Bardy. Index par Pierre Périchon. Sources chrétiennes; 73. Paris.
- Barnard, L.W. 1984: "The Authenticity of Athenagoras' De Resurrectione." Studia

- Patristica. Papers presented to the Seventh International Conference on Patristic Studies held in Oxford 1975; XV/4. Part I: Inaugural Lecture, Editiones, Critica, Biblica, Historica, Theologica, Philosophica, Liturgica.* Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 128. Berlin, 39–49.
- Barnes, Timothy D. 1980: "The Editions of Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History." Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies; 21. Cambridge (Massachusetts), 191–201.
- 1981: Constantine and Eusebius. Cambridge (Massachusetts) and London.
- Barr, James 1993: Biblical Faith and Natural Theology. The Gifford Lectures for 1991 Delivered in the University of Edinburgh. Oxford.
- Basnage, Jacques 1725: Thesaurus Monumentorum Ecclesiasticorum et Historicorum sive Henrici Canisii Lectiones antiquae, Ad Saeculorum Ordinem digestae, Variisque Opusculis Auctae, Quibus Praefationes historicas, animadversiones criticas, et notas in singulos auctores, adiecti Jacobus Basnage, Cum Indicibus locupletissimis. I. Amsterdam.
- Bauer, Walter 1964: Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum. Zweite, durchgesehene Auflage mit einem Nachtrag von Georg Strecker. Tübingen.
- 1971: Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity. Second German edition with added appendices, by Georg Strecker. Translated by a team from the Philadelphia Seminar on Christian Origins and edited by Robert A. Kraft and Gerhard Krodel. Philadelphia.
- Baumgärtel, Friedrich and Behm, Johannes 1938: "καρδία, καρδιογνώστης, σκληροκαρδία." Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament herausgegeben von Gerhard Kittel. III. Stuttgart, 609–16.
- Baumstark, Anton 1922: Geschichte der syrischen Literatur mit Ausschluß der christlich-palästinensischen Texte. Bonn.
- 1931: "Der Text der Mani-Zitate in der syrischen Übersetzung des Titus von Bostra." Oriens Christianus. Halbjahrshefte für die Kunde des christlichen Orients; 28. Leipzig, 23–42.
- 1935: "Die syrische Übersetzung des Titus von Bostra und das Diatessaron." Biblica; 16. Rome, 257–99.
- Baur, Ferdinand Christian 1831: Das Manichäische Religionssystem nach den Quellen neu untersucht und entwickelt. Tübingen.
- 1852: Die Epochen der kirchlichen Geschichtschreibung. Tübingen.
- Beatrice, Pier Franco 1978: Tradux peccati. Alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale. Studia Patristica Mediolanensia; 8. Milan.
- De Beausobre, Isaac 1734: Histoire critique de Maniché et du Manichéisme. Amsterdam.
- 1739: Histoire de Maniché et du Manichéisme. Où l'on trouve aussi l'Histoire de Basilide, de Marcion, de Bardesanes, &c. & de leurs sentimens; & où l'on découvre l'origine de plusieurs Cultes, Cérémonies, &c. qui se sont introduits dans le Christianisme. II. Amsterdam.
- Beck, Edmund 1957: Des heiligen Ephraem des Syrsers Hymnen contra haereses. Herausgegeben von Edmund Beck. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 169. Scriptores Syri; 76. Louvain.
- 1957a: Des heiligen Ephraem des Syrsers Hymnen contra haereses. Übersetzt von Edmund Beck. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 170. Scriptores Syri; 77. Louvain.
- 1957b: Des heiligen Ephraem des Syrsers Hymnen de Paradiso und Contra Julianum. Herausgegeben von Edmund Beck. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 174. Scriptores Syri; 78. Louvain.
- 1957c: Des heiligen Ephraem des Syrsers Hymnen de Paradiso und Contra Julianum. Übersetzt von Edmund Beck. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 175. Scriptores Syri; 79. Louvain.
- 1978: Ephräm's Polemik gegen Mani und die Manichäer im Rahmen der zeitgenössischen griechischen Polemik und der des Augustinus. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 391. Subsidia; 55. Louvain.

- 1978a: “Bardaisan und seine Schule bei Ephräm.” Le Muséon; 91. Louvain, 271–333.
- 1978b: “Die Hyle bei Markion nach Ephräm.” Orientalia Christiana Periodica; XLIV, fasc. I. Rome, 5–30.
- Beck, Hans-Georg 1959: Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich. Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft. Zwölfte Abteilung. Byzantinisches Handbuch im Rahmen des Handbuchs der Altertumswissenschaft. II. Teil, 1 Band. Munich.
- Beck, Hildebrand 1937: Vorsehung und Vorherbestimmung in der theologischen Literatur der Byzantiner. Orientalia christiana analecta; 114. Rome.
- Beeson, Charles Henry 1906: Hegemonius: Acta Archelai. Herausgegeben von Charles Henry Beeson. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 16. Leipzig.
- Behm, Johannes 1942: “προνοεω, πρόνοια.” Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament herausgegeben von Gerhard Kittel. IV. Stuttgart, 1004–12.
- Bekker, Immanuel 1831: Aristotelis Opera edidit Academia Regia Borussica. I. Aristoteles graece ex recognitione Immanuelis Bekkeri. Berlin.
- 1831a: Aristotelis Opera edidit Academia Regia Borussica. II. Aristoteles graece ex recognitione Immanuelis Bekkeri. Berlin.
- 1870: Aristotelis Opera edidit Academia Regia Borussica. V. Aristotelis qui ferebantur librorum fragmenta. Scholiorum in Aristotelem supplementum. Index aristotelicus. Berlin.
- Bellet, P. 1957: “Excerpts of Titus of Bostra in the Coptic Catena on the Gospels.” Studia Patristica; I (Papers presented to the Second International Conference on Patristic Studies held at Christ Church, Oxford 1955. Part I. Edited by Kurt Aland and F.L. Cross). Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 63 (= V. Reihe, Band 8). Berlin, 10–14.
- Benjamins, H.S. 1994: Eingeordnete Freiheit. Freiheit und Vorsehung bei Origenes. Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae; XXVIII. Leiden.
- Bennett, Byard 2001: “Didymus the Blind’s Knowledge of Manichaeism.” The Light and the Darkness. Studies in Manichaeism and its World. Edited by Paul Mirecki and Jason BeDuhn. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; L. Leiden, 38–67.
- 2001a: “Iuxta unum latus erat terra tenebrarum: The Division of Primordial Space in Anti-Manichaean Writers’ Descriptions of the Manichaean Cosmogony.” The Light and the Darkness. Studies in Manichaeism and its World. Edited by Paul Mirecki and Jason BeDuhn. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; L. Leiden, 68–78.
- Berkhof, H. 1939: Die Theologie des Eusebius von Cäsarea. Amsterdam.
- Bernard, Régis 1952: L’image de Dieu d’après saint Athanase. Théologie. Études publiées sous la direction de la Faculté de Théologie S.J. de Lyon-Fourvière; 25. Paris.
- Berner, Ulrich 1982: Untersuchungen zur Verwendung des Synkretismus-Begriffes. Göttinger Orientforschungen. Reihe Grundlagen und Ergebnisse; 2. Wiesbaden.
- Bethge, Hans-Gebhard 1980: “Die Ambivalenz alttestamentlicher Geschichtstraditionen in der Gnosis.” Altes Testament—Frühjudentum—Gnosis. Neue Studien zu “Gnosis und Bibel” herausgegeben von Karl-Wolfgang Tröger. Berlin, 89–109.
- Beyschlag, Karlmann 1966: Clemens Romanus und der Frühkatholizismus. Untersuchungen zu I Clemens 1–7. Beiträge zur historischen Theologie; 35. Tübingen.
- . 1974: Simon Magus und die christliche Gnosis. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament; 16. Tübingen.
- Bianchi, Ugo 1988: “Sur la question des deux âmes de l’homme dans le Manichéisme.” A Green Leaf. Papers in Honour of Professor Jes P. Asmussen. Acta Iranica; 28. Deuxième série, hommages et opera minora; XII. Leiden, 311–16.
- Bidez, Joseph 1930: La Vie de l’Empereur Julien. Collection d’études anciennes publiée sous le patronage de l’Association Guillaume Budé. Paris.
- 1960: L’empereur Julien. Oeuvres complètes. Lettres et fragments. Tom. I, 2^o partie. Texte revu et traduits par J. Bidez. Paris.

- 1960a: Sozomenus. Kirchengeschichte. Herausgegeben von Joseph Bidez. Eingeleitet, zum Druck besorgt und mit Registern versehen von Günther Christian Hansen. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 50. Berlin.
- Bieler, Ludwig 1957: Anicii Manlii Severini Boethii Philosophiae consolatio. Edidit Ludovicus Bieler. Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina; XCIV. Turnhout.
- Birdsall, J. Neville and Thomson, Robert W. 1963: "A Biography of Robert Pierce Casey." Biblical and Patristic Studies in Memory of Robert Pierce Casey. Edited by J. Neville Birdsall and Robert W. Thomson. Publication of the Vetus Latina Institute Beuron. Freiburg im Bressgau, 9–10.
- Blanc, Cécile 1966: Origène, Commentaire sur Saint Jean. I (Livres I–V). Texte grec, avant-propos, traduction et notes par Cécile Blanc. Sources chrétiennes; 120. Paris.
- 1975: Origène, Commentaire sur Saint Jean. III (Livre XIII). Texte grec, avant-propos, traduction et notes par Cécile Blanc. Sources chrétiennes; 222. Paris.
- 1982: Origène, Commentaire sur Saint Jean. IV (Livre XIX et XX). Texte grec, introduction, traduction et notes par Cécile Blanc. Sources chrétiennes; 290. Paris.
- De Blois, François 2000: "Dualism in Iranian and Christian Traditions." Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society; Third Series, Vol. 10, Part 1. London, 1–19.
- Blumenthal, H.J. 1996: Aristotle and Neoplatonism in Late Antiquity. Interpretations of the De Anima. London.
- Den Boeft, J. 1981: "[Review of] P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccati." Vigiliae Christianae; 35. Amsterdam, 307–11.
- Böhlig, Alexander 1966: Kephalaia. I. Zweite Hälfte. Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin. Stuttgart.
- 1968: "Christliche Wurzeln im Manichäismus." Alexander Böhlig: Mysterion und Wahrheit. Gesammelte Beiträge zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte. Arbeiten zur Geschichte des späteren Judentums und des Urchristentums; VI. Leiden, 202–21.
- 1968a: "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums." Alexander Böhlig: Mysterion und Wahrheit. Gesammelte Beiträge zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte. Arbeiten zur Geschichte des späteren Judentums und des Urchristentums; VI. Leiden, 222–27.
- 1968b: "Neue Kephalaia des Mani." Alexander Böhlig: Mysterion und Wahrheit. Gesammelte Beiträge zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte. Arbeiten zur Geschichte des späteren Judentums und des Urchristentums; VI. Leiden, 252–66.
- 1986: "Denkformen hellenistischer Philosophie im Manichäismus." Perspektiven der Philosophie. Neues Jahrbuch; 12. Amsterdam, 11–39.
- Böhlig, Alexander and Labib, Pahor 1962: Die koptisch-gnostische Schrift ohne Titel aus Codex II von Nag Hammadi im Koptischen Museum zu Alt-Kairo. Herausgegeben, übersetzt und bearbeitet von Alexander Böhlig und Pahor Labib. Deutsche Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin. Institut für Orientforschung; Veröffentlichung Nr. 58. Berlin.
- Bonhöffer, Adolf 1890: Epictet und die Stoa. Untersuchungen zur stoischen Philosophie. Stuttgart.
- Bonner, Gerald 1981: "[Review of] Tradux peccati: alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale. By Pier Franco Beatrice." The Journal of Ecclesiastical History; 32. Cambridge, 85–87.
- Bonwetsch, Nathanael 1917: Methodius. Herausgegeben von Nathanael Bonwetsch. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 27. Leipzig.
- Borret, Marcel 1967: Origène, Contre Celse. I (Livres I et II). Introduction, texte critique, traduction et notes par Marcel Borret. Sources chrétiennes; 132. Paris.
- 1968: Origène, Contre Celse. II (Livres III et IV). Introduction, texte critique, traduction et notes par Marcel Borret. Sources chrétiennes; 136. Paris.

- Borret, Marcel 1969: Origène, Contre Celse. III (Livres V et VI). Introduction, texte critique, traduction et notes par Marcel Borret. Sources chrétiennes; 147. Paris.
- 1969a: Origène, Contre Celse. IV (Livres VII et VIII). Introduction, texte critique, traduction et notes par Marcel Borret. Sources chrétiennes; 150. Paris.
- Le Boulluec, Alain 1985: La notion d'hérésie dans la littérature grecque, II^e-III^e siècles. I. De Justin à Irénée. Paris.
- 1985a: La notion d'hérésie dans la littérature grecque, II^e-III^e siècles. II. Clément d'Alexandrie et Origène. Paris.
- Bousset, Wilhelm 1915: Jüdisch-christlicher Schulbetrieb in Alexandria und Rom. Literarische Untersuchungen zu Philo und Clemens von Alexandria, Justin und Irenäus. Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments; 23, NF 6. Göttingen.
- Bowersock, G.W. 1978: Julian the Apostate. London.
- 1983: Roman Arabia. Cambridge (Massachusetts).
- 1986: "An Arabian Trinity." Harvard Theological Review; 79. Cambridge (Massachusetts), 17–21.
- 1990: Hellenism in Late Antiquity. Thomas Spencer Jerome Lectures; 18. Ann Arbor.
- Boyce, Mary 1960: A Catalogue of the Iranian Manuscripts in Manichean Script in the German Turfan Collection. Deutsche Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin. Institut für Orientforschung. Veröffentlichung; Nr. 45. Berlin.
- Brière, Maurice 1960: Les Homiliae cathedrales de Sévère d'Antioch. Traduction syriaque de Jacques d'Édesse. Introduction générale à toutes les Homélie. Homélie CXX a CXXV. Éditées et traduites en français par Maurice Brière. Patrologia Orientalis; tom. XXIX, fasc. 1. Paris.
- Brinkmann, August 1894: "Die Streitschrift des Serapion von Thmuis gegen die Manichäer." Sitzungsberichte der Königlich Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin; 1894, 1. Philosophisch-historische Classe. Berlin, 479–91.
- 1895: Alexandri Lycopolitani Contra Manichaei opiniones disputatio edidit Augustus Brinkmann. Bibliotheca scriptorum graecorum et romanorum teubneriana. Leipzig.
- Brock, Sebastian 1990: Saint Ephrem Hymns on Paradise. Introduced and translated by Sebastian Brock. New York.
- Browning, Robert 1975: The Emperor Julian. London.
- Brox, Norbert 1966a: Offenbarung, Gnosis und gnostischer Mythos bei Irenäus von Lyon. Zur Charakteristik der Systeme. Salzburger patristische Studien; I. Salzburg and Munich.
- 1967: "Gnostische Argumente bei Julianus Apostata." Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum; Jahrgang 10. Münster, 181–86.
- 1967a: "Antignostische Polemik bei Christen und Heiden." Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift; 18. Munich, 265–91.
- 1986: "Häresie." Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum; XIII. Stuttgart, 248–97.
- Bruckner, Albert 1897: Julian von Eclanum. Sein Leben und seine Lehre. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Pelagianismus. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der althristlichen Literatur; 15,3. Leipzig.
- Budge, Ernest A. Wallis 1886: The Book of the Bee edited by Ernest A. Wallis Budge. Anecdota Oxoniensia. Texts, Documents, and Extracts chiefly from Manuscripts in the Bodleian and other Oxford Libraries. Semitic Series; I, II. Oxford.
- Bultmann, Rudolf 1933: "προγινώσκω, πρόγνωσις." Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament herausgegeben von Gerhard Kittel. I. Stuttgart, 715–16.
- 1984: Die Exegese des Theodor von Mopsuestia posthum herausgegeben von Helmut Feld und Karl Hermann Schelkle. Stuttgart.
- Burghardt, Walter J. 1957: The Image of God in Man according to Cyril of Alexandria. Studies in Christian Antiquity; 14. Woodstock (Maryland).
- Burnet, John 1900–07: Platonis opera recognovit brevis adnotatione critica instruxit Ioannes Burnet. I–V,2. Oxford.

- Bury, R.G. 1929: Plato. With an English Translation. Timaeus. Critias. Cleitophon. Menexenus. Epistles. By R.G. Bury. The Loeb Classical Library. London and Cambridge (Massachusetts).
- Busse, Adolf 1887: Porphyrii Isagoge et In Aristotelis Categorias Commentarium. Edidit Adolfus Busse. Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca; IV. Berlin.
- Buytaert, É.M. 1948: "L'authenticité des dix-sept opuscules contenus dans le ms. T. 523 sous le nom d'Eusèbe d'Émèse." Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique; XLIII. Louvain, 5–89.
- 1949: L'héritage littéraire d'Eusèbe d'Émèse. Étude critique et historique. Textes. Bibliothèque du Muséon; 24. Louvain.
- 1953: Eusèbe d'Émèse, Discours conservés en latin. Textes en partie inédits. I. La Collection de Troyes (Discours I à XVII). Spicilegium sacrum lovaniense, études et documents; 26. Louvain.
- 1957: Eusèbe d'Émèse, Discours conservés en latin. Textes en partie inédits. II. La Collection de Simond (Discours XVIII à XXIX). Spicilegium sacrum lovaniense, études et documents; 27. Louvain.
- Cairns, David 1953: The Image of God in Man. London.
- Canisius, Heinrich 1604: Antiquae lectionis. V. Bipartitus, in quo L. vetera monumenta, nunquam visa, pauculis exceptis. Quorum Catalogum versa pagina indicat. Omnia nunc primum ex manuscriptis codicibus edita. Ab Henrico Canisio. Ingolstadt.
- Carreyre, J. 1935: "Pin (Louis-Ellies du)." Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique; XII,2. Paris, 2111–15.
- Carrozzi, L. 1988: Sant'Agostino La Genesi. I. La Genesi Difesi Contro i Manichei. Libro Incompiuto so la Genesi. Testo latino dell'Edizione Maurina confrontato con il Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum. Introduzioni generali di A. di Giovanni—A. Penna. Introduzioni particolari, traduzioni, note e indici di L. Carrozzi. Nuova Biblioteca Agostiniana. Opere di Sant'Agostino edizione latino-italiana. Parte I: Libri—Opere esegetiche. IX/1. Rome.
- Casadio, Giovanni 1992: "The Manichaean Metempsychosis: Typology and Historical Roots." Studia Manichaica. II. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus. 6.–10. August 1989 St. Augustin/Bonn. Herausgegeben von Gernot Wießner und Hans-Joachim Klimkeit. Studies in Oriental Religions; 23. Wiesbaden, 105–30.
- Casey, Robert Pierce 1928: "The Text of the Anti-Manichaean Writings of Titus of Bostra and Serapion of Thmuis." Harvard Theological Review; 21. Cambridge (Massachusetts), 97–111.
- 1931: Serapion of Thmuis, Against the Manichees. Edited by Robert Pierce Casey. Harvard Theological Studies; XV. Cambridge (Massachusetts).
- 1937: "Titus v. Bostra." Paulys Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft. Neue Bearbeitung. Begonnen von Georg Wissowa unter Mitwirkung zahlreicher Fachgenossen herausgegeben von Wilhelm Kroll und Karl Mittelhaus. Reihe 2, Band 6. Stuttgart, 1586–91.
- Cavallera, Ferdinand 1912: Patrologiae cursus completus accurate J.-P. Migne. Series Graeca. Indices digessit Ferdinandus Cavallera. Turnhout.
- Cerny, Gerald 1987: Theology, Politics and Letters at the Crossroads of European Civilization. Jacques Basnage and the Baylean Huguenot Refugees in the Dutch Republic. Archives internationales d'histoire des idées—International Archives of the History of Ideas; 107. Dordrecht.
- Chadwick, Henry 1979: "The Relativity of Moral Codes: Rome and Persia in Late Antiquity." Early Christian Literature and the Classical Intellectual Tradition. In honorem Robert M. Grant edited by William R. Schoedel and Robert L. Wilken. Théologie historique; 54. Paris.
- 1980: Origen: Contra Celsum. Translated with an introduction & notes by Henry Chadwick. Cambridge.
- 1984: Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition. Studies in Justin, Clement, and Origen. Oxford.

- 1991: Saint Augustine, Confessions. Translated with an introduction and notes by Henry Chadwick. Oxford.
- Charles, R.H. 1964: The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English with Introductions and Critical and Explanatory Notes to the Several Books edited in conjunction with many scholars by R.H. Charles. II. The Pseudepigrapha. Oxford.
- Charlesworth, James Hamilton 1977: The Odes of Solomon. The Syriac Texts edited with translation and notes by James Hamilton Charlesworth. Texts and Translations; 13. Pseudepigrapha Series; 7. Missoula (Montana).
- Chatillon, F. 1954: "Adimantus Manichaei discipulus." Revue du Moyen Age Latin. Études-Textes-Chronique bibliographique; X. Lyon, 191–203.
- Clackson, Sarah, Hunter, Erica and Lieu, Samuel N.C. 1998: Dictionary of Manichaean Texts. I. Texts from the Roman Empire (Texts in Syriac, Greek, Coptic and Latin) compiled by Sarah Clackson, Erica Hunter and Samuel N.C. Lieu in association with Mark Vermes. Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum; Subsidia II. Turnhout.
- Clark, Elizabeth A. 1986: Ascetic Piety and Women's Faith. Essays on Late Ancient Christianity. Studies in Women and Religion; 20. New York and Toronto.
- 1992: The Origenist Controversy. The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate. Princeton.
- Clarke, Ernest G. 1962: The Selected Questions of Ish bar Nūn on the Pentateuch. Edited and translated from Ms Cambridge Add. 2017. With a Study of the Relationship of Ish 'ādāh of Meru, Theodore bar K n and Ish bar Nūn on Genesis. Edited by Ernest G. Clarke. Studia post-biblica; 5. Leiden.
- Cornford, Francis MacDonald 1957: From Religion to Philosophy. A Study in the Origins of Western Speculation. New York.
- Cremers, Victor 1921: De Verlossingsidee bij Athanasius den Grooten. Proeve eener wijsgeerig-theologische Synthese. Bijdragen tot de Geschiedenis van het Dogma. Turnhout.
- Crouzel, Henri 1956: Théologie de l'image de Dieu chez Origène. Théologie. Études publiées sous la direction de la Faculté de Théologie S.J. de Lyon-Fourvière; 43. Aubier.
- 1978: "Mort et immortalité selon Origène." Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique; 79. Toulouse, 19–38, 81–96, 181–196.
- Crouzel, Henri, Fournier, François and Périchon, Pierre 1962: Origène: Homélie sur S. Luc. Texte latin et fragments grecs. Introduction, traduction et notes par Henri Crouzel, François Fournier, Pierre Périchon. Sources chrétiennes; 87. Paris.
- Cumont, Franz 1908: Recherches sur le Manichéisme. I. La cosmogonie manichéenne d'après Théodore bar Khōni. Brussels.
- Cumont, Franz and Kugener, Marc-Antoine 1912: Recherches sur le Manichéisme. II. Extrait de la CXXIII^e Homélie de Sévère d'Antioche. III. L'Inscription de Salone. Brussels.
- Daur, Klaus-D. 1985: Sancti Aurelii Augustini Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum. Commentarium Orosii et Sancti Aurelii Augustini Contra priscillianistas et origenistas. Edidit Klaus-D. Daur. Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina; XLIX. Aurelii Augustini opera, pars XV,3. Turnhout.
- Deconinck, Joseph 1912: Essai sur la chaîne de l'Octateuque avec une édition des commentaires de Diodore de Tarse qui s'y trouvent contenus par Joseph Deconinck. Bibliothèque de l'École des Hautes Études. Sciences historiques et philologiques; fasc. 195. Paris.
- Decret, François 1970: Aspects du manichéisme dans l'Afrique romaine. Les controverses de Fortunatus, Faustus et Felix avec saint Augustin. Études augustiniennes. Paris.
- 1978: L'Afrique manichéenne (IV^e-V^e siècles). Étude historique et doctrinale; I. Texte. Études augustiniennes. Paris.
- 1978a: L'Afrique manichéenne (IV^e-V^e siècles). Étude historique et doctrinale; II. Notes. Études augustiniennes. Paris.
- 1982: "Basile le Grand et la polémique antimanichéenne en Asie Mineure au IV^e siècle." Studia Patristica; Vol. XVII, Part Three. Edited by Elizabeth A. Livingstone. Oxford, 1060–64.

- 1986–94: “Adimantum Manichei discipulum (Contra-).” Augustinus-Lexikon. Herausgegeben von Cornelius Mayer. I. Basel, cols. 90–94.
- 1986–94a: “Adimantum.” Augustinus-Lexikon. Herausgegeben von Cornelius Mayer. I. Basel, cols. 94–95.
- Deuse, Werner 1983: Untersuchungen zur mittelpatonischen und neuplatonischen Seelenlehre. Akademie der Wissenschaften und der Literatur. Abhandlungen der geistes- und sozialwissenschaftlichen Klasse (Mainz); Einzelveröffentlichung 3. Wiesbaden.
- Devreesse, Robert 1930: “Par quelles voies nous sont parvenus les commentaires de Théodore de Mopsueste?” Revue Biblique; XXXIX. Paris, 362–77.
- 1936: “Anciens commentateurs grecs de l’Octateuque.” Revue biblique; XLV. Paris, 201–20, 364–84.
- 1945: Le Patriarcat d’Antioche depuis la paix de l’église jusqu’à la conquête arabe. Études Palestiniennes et Orientales. Paris.
- 1948: Essai sur Théodore de Mopsueste. Studi e Testi; 141. Vatican City.
- 1959: Les anciens commentateurs grecs de l’Octateuque et des rois (fragments tirés des chaînes). Studi e Testi; 201. Vatican City.
- Dewart, Joanne McWilliam 1971: The Theology of Grace of Theodore of Mopsuestia. The Catholic University of America. Studies in Christian Antiquity; 16. Washington (D.C.).
- Diels, Hermann 1879: Doxographi Graeci. Collegit recensuit prolegomenis indicibusque instruxit. Berlin.
- Diels, Hermann and Kranz, Walther 1951: Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker. Griechisch und deutsch von Hermann Diels. Sechste verbesserte Auflage herausgegeben von Walther Kranz. I. Berlin.
- Dihle, Albert, Jacob, Edmond, Lohse, Eduard, Schweizer, Eduard and Tröger, Karl-Wolfgang 1973: “ $\psi\upsilon\chi\eta$ κτλ.” Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament herausgegeben von Gerhard Friedrich. IX. Stuttgart, 604–61.
- Dihle, Albrecht 1980: “Das Problem der Entscheidungsfreiheit in frühchristlicher Zeit. Die Überwindung des gnostischen Heilsdeterminismus mit den Mitteln der griechischen Philosophie.” Gnadenwahl und Entscheidungsfreiheit in der Theologie der Alten Kirche. Vorträge, gehalten auf der Patristischen Arbeitsgemeinschaft, 3.–5. Januar 1979 in Bethel. Herausgegeben von Fairy v. Lilienfeld und Ekkehard Mühlenberg. Oikonomia. Quellen und Studien zur orthodoxen Theologie; 9. Erlangen, 9–31, 90–94.
- 1982: The Theory of Will in Classical Antiquity. Berkeley.
- 1985: Die Vorstellung vom Willen in der Antike. Göttingen.
- 1987: “Philosophische Lehren von Schicksal und Freiheit in der frühchristlichen Theologie.” Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum; 30. Münster, 14–28.
- 1987a: “Die Schicksalslehren der Philosophie in der alten Kirche.” Aristoteles: Werk und Wirkung. Paul Moraux gewidmet. II: Kommentierung, Überlieferung, Nachleben. Herausgegeben von Jürgen Wiesner. Berlin and New York, 52–71.
- Dillon, John 1984: “Speusippus in Iamblichus.” Phronesis; XXIX. Assen, 325–32.
- 1996: The Middle Platonists. A Study of Platonism 80 B.C. to A.D. 220. Revised edition with new afterword. London.
- Dillon, John and Long, A.A. 1988: “Introduction”. The Question of “Eclecticism”. Studies in Later Greek Philosophy. Edited by John M. Dillon and A.A. Long. Hellenistic Culture and Society; III. Berkeley, Los Angeles and London, 1–13.
- Dodds, E.R. 1951: The Greeks And The Irrational. Sather Classical Lectures; 25. Berkeley and Los Angeles.
- Dölger, Franz Joseph 1930: “Konstantin der Große und der Manichäismus. Sonne und Christus im Manichäismus.” Antike und Christentum. Kultur- und religionsgeschichtliche Studien von Franz Joseph Dölger; II,4. Münster, 301–14.
- Dörrie, Heinrich 1976: Platonica Minora. Studia et testimonia antiqua; VIII. Munich.

- 1977: "Der Begriff 'Pronoia' in Stoa und Platonismus." Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie; 24. Freiburg, 60–87.
- Dörries, Herrmann 1978: Die Theologie des Makarios/Symeon. Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen. Philologisch-historische Klasse. Dritte Folge; Nr. 103. Göttingen.
- Dörrie, Heinrich and Dörries, Herrmann 1966: "Erotapokriseis." Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum. Sachwörterbuch zur Auseinandersetzung des Christentums mit der antiken Welt; VI. Stuttgart, 342–70.
- Donini, Pierluigi 1988: "The history of the concept of eclecticism." The Question of "Eclecticism". Studies in Later Greek Philosophy. Edited by John M. Dillon and A.A. Long. Hellenistic Culture and Society; III. Berkeley, Los Angeles and London, 15–33.
- Dorner, J.A. 1853: Entwicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die neueste dargestellt. Zweite, stark vermehrte Auflage in zwei Theilen. Zweiter Theil. Die Lehre von der Person Christi vom Ende des vierten Jahrhunderts bis zur Gegenwart. Berlin.
- Dräseke, Johannes 1887: "Ueber eine bisher unbeachtet gebliebene Schrift gegen die Manichäer." Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie; XXX. Leipzig, 439–62.
- Draguet, René 1972: Commentaire du livre d'Abba Isaïe (logoi I–XV) par Dadišo Qa raya (VII^e s.), édité par René Draguet. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 326, Scriptorum Syri; 144. Louvain.
- 1972a: Commentaire du livre d'Abba Isaïe (logoi I–XV) par Dadišo Qa raya (VII^e s.), traduit par René Draguet. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 327, Scriptorum Syri; 145. Louvain.
- Drewery, Benjamin 1978: "Antiochien II." Theologische Realenzyklopädie; III. Berlin and New York, 103–13.
- Drijvers, Han J.W. 1966: Bardai an of Edessa. Studia Semitica Neerlandica; 6. Assen.
- 1978: "Die Oden Salomos und die Polemik mit den Markioniten im syrischen Christentum." Symposium Syriacum 1976. Orientalia Christiana Analecta; 205. Rome, 39–55.
- Ehrhard, A. 1893: "Zur Catalogisirung der kleineren Bestände griechischer Handschriften in Italien." Centralblatt für Bibliothekswesen; Zehnter Jahrgang. Leipzig, 189–218.
- Ermoni, V. 1901: "Diodore de Tarse et son role doctrinal." Le Muséon; N.S. 2. Louvain, 422–44.
- Van Esbroeck, Michel 1975: Les plus anciens homéliaires géorgiens. Étude descriptive et historique. Publications de l'Institut Orientaliste de Louvain; 10. Louvain.
- Eustratiades, Sophronios and Arcadios 1924: Catalogue of the Greek Manuscripts in the Library of the Monastery of Vatopedi on Mt. Athos. Harvard Theological Studies; XI. Cambridge (Massachusetts).
- Evans, Ernest 1972: Tertullian: Adversus Marcionem. Books 1 to 3. Edited and translated by Ernest Evans (Oxford Early Christian Texts). Oxford.
- 1972a: Tertullian: Adversus Marcionem. Books 4 and 5. Edited and translated by Ernest Evans (Oxford Early Christian Texts). Oxford.
- Fantino, Jacques 1986: L'homme, image de Dieu chez saint Irénée de Lyon. Paris.
- Feldmann, Erich 1987: Die "Epistula Fundamenti" der nordafrikanischen Manichäer. Versuch einer Rekonstruktion. Altenberge.
- Festa, N. 1975: Iamblich De communi mathematica scientia liber. Ad fidem Codicis Florentini edidit Nicolaus Festa (MDCCCXCI). Editionem addendis et corrigendis adiunctis curavit Udalricus Klein. Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana; 1443. Stuttgart.
- Fischer, Joseph A. 1954: Studien zum Todesgedanken in der alten Kirche. Die Beurteilung des natürlichen Todes in der kirchlichen Literatur der ersten drei Jahrhunderte. I. Munich.

- Fitschen, Klaus 1992: Serapion von Thmuis. Echte und unechte Schriften sowie die Zeugnisse des Athanasius und anderer. Patristische Texte und Studien; 37. Berlin and New York.
- Flügel, Gustav 1862: Mani, seine Lehre und seine Schriften. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Manichäismus. Aus dem Fihrist des Abū'l-faradsch Mu ammad ben Is a al-Warrā , bekannt unter dem Namen Ibn Abī Ja' ūb an-Nadīm, im Text nebst Uebersetzung, Commentar und Index zum ersten Mal herausgegeben von Gustav Flügel. Leipzig.
- Foerster, Richard 1921: Libanii Opera. Recensuit Richardus Foerster. X. Epistulae 1-839. Leipzig (Teubner). (Editio stereotypa. 1963. Hildesheim. Reprographischer Nachdruck).
- Forschner, Maximilian 1995: Die stoische Ethik. Über den Zusammenhang von Natur-, Sprach- und Moralphilosophie im altstoischen System. Darmstadt.
- Frankenberg, W. 1938: "Die Streitschrift des Titus von Bostra gegen die Manichäer." Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft; 92 (NF 17), Leipzig, 28-29.
- Freund, W.H.C. 1952: The Donatist Church. A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa. Oxford.
- 1953: "The Gnostic-Manichaean Tradition in Roman North Africa." The Journal of Ecclesiastical History; IV. London, 13-26.
- Friedlander, Gerald 1965: Pir ē de Rabbi Eliezer (the Chapters of Rabbi Eliezer the Great) According to the Text of the Manuscript Belonging to Abraham Epstein of Vienna. Translated and annotated with introduction and indices by Gerald Friedlander. New York.
- Froidevaux, Léon-Marie 1962: "Les Questions et Réponses sur la Sainte Trinité attribuées à Hippolyte, évêque de Bostra." Recherches de science religieuse; 50. Paris, 32-73.
- Früchtel, Ludwig 1937: "Clemens Alexandrinus und Albinus." Philologische Wochenschrift; 57. Leipzig, 591-92.
- Funk, Franz Xaver 1905: Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum edidit Franciscus Xaverius Funk. I. Paderborn.
- Funk, Wolf-Peter 1997: "The Reconstruction of the Manichaean Kephalaia." Emerging from Darkness. Studies in the Recovery of Manichaean Sources. Edited by Paul Mirecki and Jason BeDuhn. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XLIII. Leiden, 143-59.
- 1999: Kephalaia I. Zweite Hälfte. Lieferung 13/14. Bearbeitet von Wolf-Peter Funk. Manichäische Handschriften der staatlichen Museen zu Berlin; I. Stuttgart.
- Gager, John G. 1972: "Marcion and Philosophy." Vigiliae Christianae. A review of early Christian life and language; 26. Amsterdam, 53-59.
- Gallandi, Andreas 1769: Bibliotheca veterum Patrum antiquiorumque scriptorum ecclesiasticorum. Cura et studio Andreae Gallandii presbyteri congregationis Oratorii; V. Venice.
- Gardner, Iain 1993: "A Manichaean Liturgical Codex Found at Kellis." Orientalia. Commentarii periodici pontificii instituti biblici; 62. Rome, 30-59.
- Gardner, Iain and Worp, Klaas A. 1997: "Leaves from a Manichaean Codex." Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik; 117. Bonn, 139-55.
- Gardner, Iain, Alcock, Anthony and Funk, Wolf-Peter 1999: Coptic Documentary Texts from Kellis. 1. P. Kell. V (P. Kell. Copt. 10-52; O. Kell. Copt. 1-2). Edited by Iain Gardner, Anthony Alcock and Wolf-Peter Funk with a contribution by C.A. Hope and G.E. Bowen. Dakhleh Oasis Project; Monograph 9. Oxford.
- Gardner, Iain 2001: "The Reconstruction of Mani's Epistles from three Coptic Codices (Ismant el-Kharab and Medinet Madi)." The Light and the Darkness. Studies in Manichaeism and its World. Edited by Paul Mirecki and Jason BeDuhn. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; L. Leiden, 93-104.
- Gero, Stephen 1981: "The True Image of Christ: Eusebius' Letter to Constantia Reconsidered." The Journal of Theological Studies; N.S. XXXII. Oxford, 460-70.
- Giannelli, C. 1950: Codices Vaticani Graeci. Codices 1485-1683. Recensuit Cyrus Giannelli. In Bybliothecca Vaticana. Vatican City.

- Gimaret, Daniel and Monnot, Guy 1986: Shahrastani Livre des religions et des sectes. I. Traduction avec introduction et notes par Daniel Gimaret et Guy Monnot. Collection Unesco d'œuvres représentatives. Série arabe. Louvain.
- Giversen, Søren 1963: Apocryphon Johannis. The Coptic Text of the Apocryphon Johannis in the Nag Hammadi Codex II with Translation, Introduction and Commentary. Acta Theologica Danica; V. Copenhagen.
- Giversen, Søren 1988: The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Facsimile Edition. III. Psalm Book Part I. Cahiers d'Orientalisme; XVI. Geneva.
- Glenthøj, Johannes Bartholdy 1997: Cain and Abel in Syriac and Greek Writers (4th–6th centuries). Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 567. Subsidia; 95. Louvain.
- Glorie, Francisci 1964: S. Hieronymi presbyteri opera. Pars I. Opera exegetica. 4. Commentariorum in Hiezechielem libri XIV. Cura et studio Francisci Glorie. Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina; LXXV. Turnhout.
- Görgemanns, Herwig and Karpf, Heinrich 1992: Origenes. Vier Bücher von den Prinzipien. Herausgegeben, übersetzt, mit kritischen und erläuternden Anmerkungen versehen von Herwig Görgemanns und Heinrich Karpf³. Texte zur Forschung; 24. Darmstadt.
- Gottschalk, H.B. 1987: "Aristotelian philosophy in the Roman world from the time of Cicero to the end of the second century AD." Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt (ANRW). Geschichte und Kultur Roms im Spiegel der neueren Forschung. Teil II: Principat. Band 36,2. Berlin and New York.
- Graf, David F. 1997: Rome and the Arabian Frontier: from the Nabataeans to the Saracens. Variorum Collected Studies Series; CS594. Great Yarmouth (UK).
- Grant, Robert M. 1949: "Irenaeus and Hellenistic Culture." Harvard Theological Review; 42. Boston, 41–51. (= Grant 1967, 158–69).
- 1954: "Athenagoras or Pseudo-Athenagoras." Harvard Theological Review; 47. Cambridge (Massachusetts), 121–29.
- 1966: The Early Christian Doctrine of God. James W. Richard Lectures for 1965–66. Charlottesville.
- 1967: After the New Testament. Philadelphia.
- 1970: Theophilus of Antioch Ad Autolycom. Text and translation by Robert M. Grant. Oxford Early Christian Texts. Oxford.
- 1972: "Manichees and Christians in the Third and early Fourth Centuries." J. Bergman et al., eds., Ex Orbe Religionum: Studia Geo Widengren; I. Leiden, 430–39.
- 1980: Eusebius as Church Historian. Oxford.
- Green, W.M. 1970: Sancti Aurelii Augustini De libero arbitrio libri tres. Cura et studio W.M. Green. Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina; XXIX. Aurelii Augustini Opera. Pars II, 2. Sancti Aurelii Augustini Contra academicos—De beata vita—De ordine—De magistro—De libero arbitrio. Turnhout, 205–322.
- Grégoire, Henri and Kugener, Marc-Antoine 1930: Marc le Diacre, Vie de Porphyre, évêque de Gaza. Texte établi, traduit et commenté par Henri Grégoire et Marc-Antoine Kugener. Collection Byzantine publiée sous le patronage de l'Association Guillaume Budé. Paris.
- Gressmann, Hugo 1903: Studien zu Eusebs Theophanie. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 23, NF 8,3. Leipzig.
- 1904: Eusebius. Werke. III. Band, 2. Hälfte. Die Theophanie. Die griechischen Bruchstücke und Übersetzung der syrischen Überlieferungen. Herausgegeben von Hugo Gressmann. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 11,2. Leipzig.
- Grillmeier, Alois 1979: Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche. 1. Von der Apostolischen Zeit bis zum Konzil von Chalcedon (451). Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna.
- Gronau, Karl 1922: Das Theodizeeproblem in der altchristlichen Auffassung. Tübingen.
- Gross, Julius 1960: Geschichte des Erbsündendogmas. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Problems

- von Ursprung des Übels. I. Entstehungsgeschichte des Erbsündendogmas. Von der Bibel bis Augustinus. Munich.
- Gruber, Joachim 1978: Kommentar zu Boethius De consolatione philosophiae. Texte und Kommentare. Eine altertumswissenschaftliche Reihe; 9. Berlin and New York.
- Guenther, Otto 1895: Epistulae imperatorum pontificum aliorum inde ab a. CCCLXVII usque ad a. DLIII datae, avellana quae dicitur collectio recensuit commentario critico instruxit indices adiecit Otto Guenther. Pars I. Prolegomena. Epistulae I–CIV. Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum; XXXV. Vienna.
- Gunkel, Hermann 1977: Genesis übersetzt und erklärt von Hermann Gunkel. 9. Auflage. Mit einem Geleitwort von Walter Baumgartner. Göttingen.
- sHaase, Erich 1959: Einführung in die Literatur des Refuges. Der Beitrag der französischen Protestanten zur Entwicklung analytischer Denkformen am Ende des 17. Jahrhunderts. Berlin.
- Hadot, Ilsetraut 1969: "Die Widerlegung des Manichäismus im Epiktettkommentar des Simplicios." Archiv für Geschichte der Philosophie; 51. Berlin, 31–57.
- 1972: "Einige Bemerkungen zur Darstellung des Manichäismus bei Simplicios". Papers presented to the Fifth International Conference on Patristic Studies held in Oxford 1967. Edited by F.L. Cross. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 108. Studia Patristica; 11. Berlin, 185–91.
- 1990: Simplicius Commentaire sur les Catégories. Traduction commentée sous la direction de Ilsetraut Hadot, fasc. III. Préambule aux Catégories. Commentaire au premier chapitre des Catégories (pp. 21–40, 13 Kalbfleisch). Traduction de Ph. Hoffmann (avec la collaboration d'I. Hadot, P. Hadot et C. Luna). Commentaire et notes à la traduction par C. Luna. Philosophia Antiqua. A Series of Studies on Ancient Philosophy; 51. Leiden.
- Hæuser, Philipp 1922: Des heiligen Cyrillus Bischofs von Jerusalem Katechesen. Aus dem Griechischen übersetzt und mit einer Einleitung versehen von Philipp Hæuser. Bibliothek der Kirchenväter. Kempten.
- Hamman, A.-G. 1987: L'homme, image de Dieu: Essai d'une anthropologie chrétienne dans l'Église des cinq premiers siècles. Relais-études; 2. Paris.
- Hammond Bammel, Caroline P. 1981: "Philocalia IX, Jerome, Epistle 121, and Origen's Exposition of Romans VII." The Journal of Theological Studies; New series XXXII. Oxford, 50–81.
- 1989: "Adam in Origen." The making of orthodoxy. Essays in honour of Henry Chadwick. Edited by Rowan Williams. Cambridge, 62–93.
- 1990: Der Römerbriefkommentar des Origenes. Kritische Ausgabe der Übersetzung Rufins. Buch 1–3. Vetus latina. Die Reste der altlateinischen Bibel. Aus der Geschichte der lateinischen Bibel; 16. Freiburg.
- 1997: Der Römerbriefkommentar des Origenes. Kritische Ausgabe der Übersetzung Rufins. Buch 4–6. Zum Druck vorbereitet und gesetzt von H.J. Frede und H. Stanjek. Vetus latina. Die Reste der altlateinischen Bibel. Aus der Geschichte der lateinischen Bibel; 33. Freiburg.
- 1998: Der Römerbriefkommentar des Origenes. Kritische Ausgabe der Übersetzung Rufins. Buch 7–10. Aus dem Nachlaß herausgegeben von H.J. Frede und H. Stanjek. Vetus latina. Die Reste der altlateinischen Bibel. Aus der Geschichte der lateinischen Bibel; 34. Freiburg.
- Hamnick, Christian 1981: Maximos Holobolos in der kirchenslavischen homiletischen Literatur. Wiener Byzantinistische Studien; XIV. Vienna.
- Hansen, Günther Christian 1995: Sokrates. Kirchengeschichte. Herausgegeben von Günther Christian Hansen. Mit Beiträgen von Manja Eirinjan. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; Neue Folge, 1. Berlin.
- Hanson, R.P.C. 1988: The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God. The Arian Controversy 318–381. Edinburgh.
- Harl, Marguerite and De Lange, Nicholas 1983: Origène: Philocalie, 1–20. Introduction,

- texte, traduction et notes par Marguerite Harl. Et La lettre à Africain sur l'histoire de Suzanne. Introduction, texte, traduction et notes par Nicholas de Lange. Sources chrétiennes; 302. Paris.
- Von Harnack, Adolf 1874: De Apellis gnosi monarchica. Commentatio historica quam summe venerandi theologorum ordinis. Leipzig.
- 1890: Sieben neue Bruchstücke der Syllogismen des Apelles. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 6,3. Leipzig, 109–20.
- 1900: Unbeachtete und neue Quellen zur Kenntnis des Häretikers Apelles. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 20,3. Leipzig, 93–100.
- 1924: Marcion: Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott. Eine Monographie zur Geschichte der Grundlegung der katholischen Kirche. Zweite, verbesserte und vermehrte Auflage. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 45. 3. Reihe, 15. Band. Leipzig.
- 1924a: Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten. Vierte, verbesserte und vermehrte Auflage mit elf Karten. II. Die Verbreitung. Leipzig.
- 1931: Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte. Zweiter Band: Die Entwicklung des kirchlichen Dogmas. I. Fünfte, photomechanisch gedruckte Auflage. Tübingen.
- Harrington, Daniel J. 1980: "The Reception of Walter Bauer's Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity during the last decade." The Harvard Theological Review; 73. Cambridge (Massachusetts), 289–98.
- Hatch, W.H.P. 1946: An Album of Dated Syriac Manuscripts. Boston.
- Hauke, Manfred 1993: Heilsverlust in Adam. Stationen griechischer Erbsündenlehre: Irenäus—Origenes—Kappadozier. Konfessionskundliche und kontroverstheologische Studien; LVIII. Paderborn.
- Hayduck, Michael 1897: Ioannis Philoponi In Aristotelis De anima Libros Commentaria. Edidit Michael Hayduck. Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca; XV. Berlin.
- Heiberg, I.L. 1894: Simplicii In Aristotelis De Caelo Commentaria. Edidit I.L. Heiberg. Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca; VII. Berlin.
- Heikel, Ivar A. 1913: Eusebius. Werke. VI. Die Demonstratio evangelica. Herausgegeben von Ivar A. Heikel. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 23. Leipzig.
- Helm, Rudolf 1924: "Eusebius' Chronik und ihre Tabellenform." Abhandlungen der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften; Jahrgang 1923, Philosophisch-historische Klasse, Nr. 4. Berlin.
- 1956: Eusebius. Werke. VII. Die Chronik des Hieronymus. Hieronymi Chronicon. Herausgegeben von Rudolf Helm. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 47 (24 und 34). Berlin.
- Henning, Walter Bruno 1932: "Ein manichäischer kosmogonischer Hymnus." Nachrichten der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen; 1932. Göttingen, 214–28.
- 1944: "The Murder of the Magi." Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland; 1944. London, 133–44.
- Henrichs, Albert 1968: Didymos der Blinde Kommentar zu Hiob (Tura-Papyrus). Teil I. Kommentar zu Hiob Kap. 1–4 in Zusammenarbeit mit dem Ägyptischen Museum zu Kairo herausgegeben, übersetzt, erläutert von Albert Henrichs. Papyrologische Texte und Abhandlungen; 1. Bonn.
- Henrichs, Albert and Koenen, Ludwig 1970: "Ein griechischer Mani-Codex (P. Colon. inv. nr. 4780)." Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik; 5. Bonn, 97–216.
- Henry, René 1959: Photius Bibliothèque. I ("Codices" 1–84). Texte établi et traduit par René Henry. Collection byzantine. Paris.
- 1960: Photius Bibliothèque. II ("Codices" 84–185). Texte établi et traduit par René Henry. Collection byzantine. Paris.
- 1965: Photius Bibliothèque. IV ("Codices" 223–229). Texte établi et traduit par René Henry. Collection byzantine. Paris.

- 1967: Photius Bibliothèque. V ("Codices" 230–241). Texte établi et traduit par René Henry. Collection byzantine. Paris.
- Hilberg, Isidor 1910: Sancti Eusebii Hieronymi Epistulae. Pars I: Epistulae I–LXX. Recensuit Isidorus Hilberg. Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum; LIV (S. Eusebii Hieronymi Opera [Sect. I Pars I]). Vienna and Leipzig.
- Hilgenfeld, Adolf 1966: Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums urkundlich dargestellt. Unveränderter reprografischer Nachdruck der Ausgabe Leipzig 1884. Darmstadt.
- Hitchcock, F.R. Montgomery 1937: "Loofs' Theory of Theophilus of Antioch as a Source of Irenaeus." The Journal of Theological Studies; 38. Oxford, 130–39, 255–66.
- Hjelde, Sigurd 1994: Die Religionswissenschaft und das Christentum. Eine historische Untersuchung über das Verhältnis von Religionswissenschaft und Theologie. Studies in the History of Religions (Numen bookseries); LXI. Leiden.
- Holl, Karl 1896: Die Sacra Parallela des Johannes Damascenus. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der alchristlichen Literatur; NF I,1. Leipzig.
- 1915: Epiphanius (Ancoratus und Panarion). Herausgegeben von Karl Holl. I. Ancoratus und Panarion. Haer. 1–33. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 25. Leipzig.
- 1922: Epiphanius (Ancoratus und Panarion). Herausgegeben von Karl Holl. II. Panarion. Haer. 34–64. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 31. Leipzig.
- 1933: Epiphanius (Ancoratus und Panarion). Herausgegeben von Karl Holl. III. Panarion. Haer. 65–80. De fide. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 37. Leipzig.
- Hopfner, Theodor 1936: Patrologie cursus completus accurante J.-P. Migne. Series Graeca. Theodorus Hopfner, Index locupletissimus tam in opera omnia omnium auctorum veterum quam in adiectas praefationes, dissertationes, commentationes omnes omnium virorum doctorum recentium per capita operum omnium argumenta complectens. Accedit indiculus auctorum ex ordine tomorum, indiculus auctorum ex ordine alphabetico, quorum operum titulis editionum recentiorum conspectus adnectitur, indiculus methodicus. II. Paris.
- Hornby, A.S. 1974: Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary of Current English. London.
- Hovhannessian, Vahan 1980: Eusèbe d'Émèse, I. Commentaire de l'Octateuque. Préparé par P. Vahan Hovhannessian, mekhitariste. Bibliothèque de l'Académie Arménienne de Saint Lazare. Saint-Lazare, Venice.
- Huber, Peter (Thomas Morus) 1976: Die Vereinbarkeit von göttlicher Vorsehung und menschlicher Freiheit in der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius. Zürich.
- Hutter, Manfred 1992: Manis kosmogonische Šābuhragān-Texte. Edition, Kommentar und literaturgeschichtliche Einordnung der manichäisch-mittelpersischen Handschriften M 98/99 I und M 7980–7984. Studies in Oriental Religions; 21. Wiesbaden.
- Ingremau, Christiane 1982: Lactance, La Colère de Dieu. Introduction, texte critique, traduction, commentaire et index par Christiane Ingremau. Sources chrétiennes; 289. Paris.
- Iturbe, Francisco Javier Caubet 1969: La cadena árabe del Evangelio de san Mateo. I. Texto. Studi e testi; 254. Vatican City.
- 1970: La cadena árabe del Evangelio de san Mateo. II. Versión. Studi e testi; 255. Vatican City.
- Jackson, A.V. Williams 1925: "The Doctrine of Metempsychosis in Manichaeism." Journal of the American Oriental Society; 45. New Haven, 246–68.
- Jacobsen, Anders-Christian Lund 1998: Opstandelsens menneske. En undersøgelse af antropologien og eskatologien hos Irenæus og Origenes. Ph.D.-afhandling indleveret til Det Teologiske Fakultet, Aarhus Universitet, maj 1998. Aarhus (unpublished).
- 2002: Kødets opstandelse? Mennesket og målet hos Irenæus og Origenes. Copenhagen.
- Jaeger, Werner Wilhelm 1914: Nemesios von Emesa. Quellenforschungen zum Neuplatonismus und seinen Anfängen bei Poseidonios. Berlin.

- 1960: The Theology of the early Greek Philosophers. The Gifford Lectures 1936. Reprinted lithographically in Great Britain at the University Press, Oxford from sheets of the first edition 1947. Oxford.
- Jansma, T. 1962: "Théodore de Mopsueste. Interprétations du Livre de la Genèse. Fragments de la version syriaque (B.M. Add. 17,189, fol. 17–21)." Le Muséon; 75. Louvain, 63–92.
- Jervell, Jacob 1960: Imago Dei. Gen 1,26f. im Spätjudentum, in der Gnosis und in den paulinischen Briefen. Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments; NF 58; Der ganzen Reihe 76. Göttingen.
- Joannou, Perikles-Petros 1962: Discipline générale antique. I,1: Les canons des conciles oecuméniques. Ed. Perikles-Petros Joannou. Pontificia commissione per la redazione del codice di diritto canonico orientale. Fonti, fasc. IX. Grottaferrata (Rome).
- Johansen, Karsten Friis 1991: Den europæiske filosofis historie. Bind 1. Antikken. Copenhagen.
- Jonas, Hans 1934: Gnosis und spätantiker Geist. Teil 1. Die mythologische Gnosis. Mit einer Einleitung zur Geschichte und Methodologie der Forschung. Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments; NF, 33. Heft, Der ganzen Reihe, 51. Heft. Göttingen.
- 1963: The Gnostic Religion. The Message of the Alien God and the Beginnings of Christianity. Second edition, revised. Boston.
- Jones, F. Stanley 1997: "The Astrological Trajectory in Ancient Syriac-speaking Christianity (Elchasai, Bardaisan, and Mani)." Atti del Terzo Congresso Internazionale di studi "Manicheismo e oriente cristiano antico." Arcaacata di Rende—Amantea 31 agosto–5 settembre 1993. A cura di Luigi Cirillo & Alois Van Tongerloo. Manichaean Studies; III. Louvain and Naples, 183–200.
- Jülicher, Adolf 1902: "[Bespprechung von] Sickenberger, Joseph, Titus von Bostra. Studien zu dessen Lukas-homilien. (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur. Neue Folge. VI. Band, Heft 1. Leipzig 1901.—Harnack, Adolf, Diodor von Tarsus. Vier pseudojustinische Schriften als Eigentum Diodors nachgewiesen. (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur. Neue Folge. VI. Band, Heft 4.) Leipzig 1901." Theologische Literaturzeitung; 1902. Nr. 3. Leipzig, 79–86.
- Jugie, M. 1933: "Péché originel." Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique contenant l'exposé des doctrines de la théologie catholique, leurs preuves et leur histoire; XII,1. Paris, 275–624.
- Junod, Éric 1976: Origène: Philocalie 21–27. Sur le libre arbitre. Introduction, texte, traduction et notes par Éric Junod. Sources chrétiennes; 226. Paris.
- Kalbfleisch, Karl 1897: Simplicii In Aristotelis Categorias Commentarium. Edidit Carolus Kalbfleisch. Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca; VII. Berlin.
- Kamesar, Adam 1993: Jerome, Greek Scholarship, and the Hebrew Bible. A Study of the Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesis. Oxford Classical Monographs. Oxford.
- Karst, Josef 1911: Eusebius. Werke. V. Die Chronik aus dem Armenischen übersetzt mit textkritischem Commentar herausgegeben von Josef Karst. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 20. Leipzig.
- Kelly, J.N.D. 1977: Early Christian Doctrines. London.
- Kessler, Konrad 1889: Mani. Forschungen über die manichäische Religion. Ein Beitrag zur vergleichenden Religionsgeschichte des Orients. I. Voruntersuchungen und Quellen. Berlin.
- Khosroyev, Alexandr 1995: Die Bibliothek von Nag Hammadi. Einige Probleme des Christentums in Ägypten während der ersten Jahrhunderte. Arbeiten zum spätantiken und koptischen Ägypten; 7. Altenberge.
- el-Khoury, Nabil 1990: "Der Mensch als Gleichnis Gottes. Eine Untersuchung zur Anthropologie des Theodors von Mopsuestia." Oriens Christianus; 74. Leipzig, 62–71.
- Kindler, A. 1983: The Coinage of Bostra. Warminster (UK).
- King, Karen L. 1992: "A Progress Report on the editing of the Manichaean Synaxeis Codex." Actes du IV^e Congrès Copte. Louvain-la-Neuve, 5–10 septembre 1988. II. De

- la linguistique au gnosticisme*. Publications de l'Institut Orientaliste de Louvain; 41. Louvain, 281–88.
- Klein, Wolfgang Wassilios 1991: Die Argumentation in den griechisch-christlichen Antimanichaica. Studies in Oriental Religions; 19. Wiesbaden.
- Klingner, Friedrich 1966: De Boethii Consolatione philosophiae. 2. unveränderte Auflage. Zürich and Dublin.
- Klostermann, Erich 1933: Origenes. Werke. XI. Matthäuserklärung. II. Die lateinische Übersetzung der Commentarium series. Herausgegeben von Erich Klostermann. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 38. Leipzig.
- Klostermann, Erich 1935: Origenes. Werke. X. Matthäuserklärung. I. Die griechisch erhaltenen Tomoi. Herausgegeben von Erich Klostermann. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 40. Leipzig.
- Koch, Günter 1965: Die Heilsverwirklichung bei Theodor von Mopsuestia. Münchener Theologische Studien. II. Systematische Abteilung; 31. Munich.
- Koch, Hal 1932: Pronoia und Paideusis. Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte; 22. Berlin and Leipzig.
- Koch, Hugo 1925: "Zur Lehre vom Urstande und von der Erlösung bei Irenäus." Theologische Studien und Kritiken. Eine Zeitschrift für das gesamte Gebiet der Theologie; 96/97. Gotha, 183–214.
- Koenen, Ludwig and Römer, Cornelia 1988: Der Kölner Mani-Kodex. Über das Werden seines Leibes. Kritische Edition aufgrund der von A. Henrichs und L. Koenen besorgten Erstedition herausgegeben von Ludwig Koenen und Cornelia Römer. Abhandlungen der Rheinisch-Westfälischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Sonderreihe. Papyrologica Coloniensia; XIV. Opladen.
- Koetschau, Paul 1899: Origenes. Werke. II. Buch V–VIII Gegen Celsus. Die Schrift vom Gebet. Herausgegeben von Paul Koetschau. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 3. Leipzig.
- 1913: Origenes. Werke. V. De principiis [ΠΕΡΙ ΑΡΧΩΝ]. Herausgegeben von Paul Koetschau. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 22. Leipzig.
- Koschorke, Klaus 1975: Hippolyt's Ketzereibekämpfung und Polemik gegen die Gnostiker. Eine tendenzkritische Untersuchung seiner "Refutatio omnium haeresium". Göttinger Orientforschungen; VI. Reihe: Hellenistica. Band 4. Wiesbaden.
- 1978: Die Polemik der Gnostiker gegen das kirchliche Christentum. Unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Nag-Hammadi-Traktate "Apokalypse des Petrus" (NHC VII,3) und "Testimonium Veritatis" (NHC IX,3). Nag Hammadi Studies; XII. Leiden.
- 1978a: "Der gnostische Traktat "Testimonium Veritatis" aus dem Nag-Hammadi-Codex IX. Eine Übersetzung." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche; 69. Berlin, 91–117.
- Kotter, Bonifatius 1981: Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. Herausgegeben vom Byzantinischen Institut der Abtei Scheyern. IV. Liber de haeresibus. Opera polemica. Besorgt von Bonifatius Kotter. Patristische Texte und Studien; 22. Berlin and New York.
- Krause, Martin and Labib, Pahor 1962: Die drei Versionen des Apokryphon des Johannes im koptischen Museum zu Alt-Kairo. Abhandlungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts Kairo. Koptische Reihe; 1. Cairo.
- Kretschmar, Georg 1956: Studien zur frühchristlichen Trinitätstheologie. Beiträge zur historischen Theologie; 21. Tübingen.
- Kronholm, Tryggve 1978: Motifs from Genesis 1–11 in the genuine Hymns of Ephrem the Syrian with particular reference to the influence of Jewish exegetical tradition. Uppsala.
- Kroymann, A. 1954: Q.S.Fl. Tertulliani De carne Christi. Cura et studio Aem. Kroymann. Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina; II. Quinti Septimi Florentis Tertulliani Opera. Pars II. Opera montanistica. Turnhout, 871–918.
- Krüger, Gustav 1915: Die Apologien Justins des Märtyrers herausgegeben von Gustav

- Krüger. Vierte, völlig neubearbeitete Auflage. Sammlung ausgewählter kirchen- und dogmengeschichtlicher Quellenschriften; Erste Reihe. Erstes Heft. Tübingen.
- Kugelman, Lothar 1986: Antizipation. Eine begriffsgeschichtliche Untersuchung. Forschungen zur systematischen und ökumenischen Theologie; 50. Göttingen.
- De Labriolle, Pierre 1934: La Réaction païenne. Étude sur la polémique antichrétienne du I^{er} au VI^e siècle. Paris.
- De Lagarde, Paul A. 1859: Titi Bostreni quae ex opere contra Manichaeos edito in codice Hamburgensi servata sunt graece e recognitione Pauli Antonii de Lagarde. Accedunt Iulii Romani epistolae et Gregorii Thaumaturgi KATA ΜΕΡΟΣ ΠΙΣΤΙΣ. Berlin.
- 1859a: Titi Bostreni contra Manichaeos libri quatuor. Syriace. Paulus Antonius de Lagarde edidit. Berlin.
- 1863: Anmerkungen zur griechischen Übersetzung der Proverbien. Leipzig.
- 1886: Catena in evangelia aegyptiaca quae supersunt. Studio et sumptibus edita Pauli de Lagarde. Göttingen.
- 1924: [reprint of De Lagarde, Paul A. 1859a.] Hannover.
- 1967: [reprint of De Lagarde, Paul A. 1859 and De Lagarde, Paul A. 1859a in a single volume with the title:] Titus Bostrenus syriace et graece. Osnabrück.
- Lake, Kirsopp 1965: Eusebius, The Ecclesiastical History. With an English Translation by Kirsopp Lake. I. The Loeb Classical Library. London and Cambridge (Massachusetts).
- Lamberigts, Mathijs 1990: "Julien d'Éclane et Augustin d'Hippone. Deux conceptions d'Adam." Augustiniana; 40. Louvain, 373–410.
- 2001: "Was Augustine a Manichaean? The Assessment of Julian of Aeclanum." Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West. Proceedings of the Fribourg-Utrecht Symposium of the International Association of Manichaean Studies (IAMS). Edited by Johannes van Oort, Otto Wermelinger, and Gregor Wurst. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XLIX. Leiden, 113–36.
- Lampe, G.W.H. 1961: A Patristic Greek Lexicon. Edited by G.W.H. Lampe. Oxford.
- Langerbeck, Hermann 1967: Aufsätze zur Gnosis. Aus dem Nachlaß herausgegeben von Hermann Dörries. Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften Göttingen. Philologisch-historische Klasse, Dritte Folge; 69. Göttingen.
- Layton, Bentley 1989: *Nag Hammadi Codex II,2–7 together with XIII,2, Brit. Lib. Or.4926(1), and P. Oxy. I, 654, 655 with contributions by many scholars edited by Bentley Layton. I Gospel According to Thomas, Gospel According to Philip, Hypostasis of the Archons, and Indexes. Nag Hammadi Studies; XX (The Coptic Gnostic Library). Leiden.
- 1989a: *Nag Hammadi Codex II,2–7 together with XIII,2, Brit. Lib. Or.4926 (1), and P. Oxy. I, 654, 655 with contributions by many scholars edited by Bentley Layton. II: On the Origin of the World, Expository Treatise, On the Soul, Book of Thomas the Contender. Nag Hammadi Studies; XXI (The Coptic Gnostic Library). Leiden.
- Lebreton, Jules 1926: "ΑΓΕΝΝΗΤΟΣ dans la tradition philosophique et dans la littérature chrétienne du II^e siècle." Recherches de Science Religieuse; 16. Paris, 431–43.
- Leconte, René 1957: "L'Asceterium de Diodore." Mélanges bibliques rédigés en l'honneur de André Robert. Travaux de l'Institut Catholique de Paris; 4. Paris, 531–36.
- Lee, Samuel 1842: ܩܘܪܬܐ ܕܩܘܪܬܐ ܕܩܘܪܬܐ ܕܩܘܪܬܐ ܕܩܘܪܬܐ Eusebius Bishop of Caesarea, On The Theophania or Divine Manifestation of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. A Syriac Version, Edited from an Ancient Manuscript recently discovered. By Samuel Lee. London.
- Lehmann, Henning J. 1975: Per piscatores. Studies in the Armenian version of a collection of homilies by Eusebius of Emesa and Severian of Gabala. Aarhus.
- Lehmann, Henning J. 1984: "An Important Text preserved in Ms. Ven. Mekh. no. 873, dated A.D. 1299 (Eusebius of Emesa's Commentary on Historical Writings of the Old Testament)." Medieval Armenian Culture. Proceedings of the Third

- Dr. H. Markarian Conference on Armenian Culture edited by Thomas J. Samuelian and Michael E. Stone. University of Pennsylvania Armenian texts and studies; 6. Chico (California), 142–60.
- Lehmann, Henning J. 1986: “Den jødiske hellige skrift og jødiske traditioner hos en kristen forfatter i 4. årh.” Judendom och kristendom under de första århundradena; 2. Nordiskt patristikerprojekt 1982–85. Stavanger, 220–28.
- 1986a: “Sprog, nation og religion. Nogle oldkirkelige observationer.” Sprogets mesterskab. Festskrift til Johannes Sloks 70-årsdag. Redigeret af Kjeld Holm og Jan Lindhardt. Aarhus, 93–108.
- 1987: “The Syriac Translation of the Old Testament—as Evidenced around the Middle of the Fourth Century (in Eusebius of Emesa).” SJOT Scandinavian Journal of the Old Testament; 1. Aarhus, 66–86.
- 1989: “Evidence of the Syriac Bible Translation in Greek Fathers of the 4th and 5th Centuries.” Studia Patristica; XIX. Papers presented to the Tenth International Conference on Patristic Studies held in Oxford 1987. Historica, Theologica, Gnostica, Biblica et Apocrypha. Edited by Elizabeth A. Livingstone. Louvain, 366–71.
- Leloir, Louis 1953: Saint Éphrem. Commentaire de l'Évangile Concordant. Version arménienne. Éditée par Louis Leloir. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 137. Scriptores Armeniaci; 1. Louvain.
- 1963: Saint Éphrem. Commentaire de l'Évangile Concordant. Texte Syriaque (Manuscrit Chester Beatty 709). Édité et traduit par Louis Leloir. Chester Beatty Monographs; 8. Dublin.
- 1966: Éphrem de Nisibe. Commentaire de l'Évangile Concordant ou Diatessaron. Traduit du syriaque et de l'arménien. Introduction, traduction et notes par Louis Leloir. Sources chrétiennes; 121. Paris.
- 1990: Saint Éphrem. Commentaire de l'Évangile Concordant. Texte Syriaque (Manuscrit Chester Beatty 709). Folios Additionnels. Édités et traduits par Louis Leloir. Chester Beatty Monographs; 8. Louvain and Paris.
- Lemerle, Paul 1973: “L'histoire des pauliciens d'Asie Mineure d'après les sources grecques.” Centre de recherche d'histoire et civilisation byzantines. Travaux et mémoires; 5. Paris, 1–144.
- Lequien, Michael 1712: TOY EN AGIOIS PATPOΣ HMΩN IQANNOY TOY ΔAMA-ΣKHNOY, MONAXOY, KAI ΠPEΣBYTEPOY IEPOCΘAYMΩN, TA EYPIZKOMENA ΠANTA. Sanctis patris nostri Joannis Damasceni, monachi, et presbyteri hierosolymitani, opera omnia que exstant, et ejus nomine circumferuntur. Ex variis editionibus, et codicibus manu exaratis, gallicanis, Italicis & Anglicis, collecta, recensita, Latine versa, atque annotationibus illustrata, cum praevis Dissertationibus, & copiosis indicibus. Opera & studio P. Michaelis Lequien. II. Paris.
- Von Leutsch, Ernst Ludwig 1851: Corpus Paroemiographorum Graecorum. Tomus II. Diogenianus, Plutarchus, Gregorius Cypricus, Macarius, Aesopus, Apostolius et Arsenius, Manithsa Proverbiorum. Edidit E.L. a Leutsch. Göttingen.
- Von Leutsch, Ernst Ludwig and Schneidewin, F.G. 1839: Corpus Paroemiographorum Graecorum. Tomus I. Zenobius, Diogenianus, Plutarchus, Gregorius Cypricus cum appendice proverbium. Ediderunt E.L. a Leutsch et F.G. Schneidewin. Göttingen.
- Lewis, Patricia K.G. 1984: Charles Allberry—A Portrait. Cambridge.
- Leys, Roger 1951: L'Image de Dieu chez Saint Grégoire de Nysse. Esquisse d'une doctrine. Museum Lessianum—Section théologique; 49. Brussels and Paris.
- Liddell, Henry George, Scott, Robert, and Jones, Henry Stuart 1968: A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by Henry George Liddell and Robert Scott. Revised and augmented throughout by Henry Stuart Jones with the assistance of Roderick McKenzie and with the cooperation of many scholars. With a Supplement 1968. Oxford.
- Lieu, Samuel N.C. 1986: “Some Themes in Later Roman Anti-Manichaean Polemics: I.” Bulletin of The John Rylands University Library of Manchester; 68 (1985–1986). Manchester, 434–72. (= Lieu 1994, 156–202).

- 1986a: “Some Themes in Later Roman Anti-Manichaean Polemics: II.” Bulletin of The John Rylands University Library of Manchester; 69 (1986–1987). Manchester, 235–75. (= Lieu 1994, 156–202).
- 1988: “Facts and Fiction in the Acta Archelai.” Manichaean Studies. Proceedings of the First International Conference on Manichaeism. August 5–9, 1987. Department of History of Religions Lund University Sweden. Edited by Peter Bryder. Lund Studies in African and Asian Religions; 1. Lund, 69–88.
- 1992: Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire and Medieval China. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament; 63. Tübingen.
- 1994: Manichaeism in Mesopotamia and the Roman East. Religions in the Graeco-Roman World; 118. Leiden.
- 2001: “Lexicographica Manichaica: Dictionary of Manichaean Texts, Vol. 1, Texts from the Roman Empire (Texts in Syriac, Greek, Coptic and Latin)—an interim report and discussion on methodology.” Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West. Proceedings of the Fribourg-Utrecht Symposium of the International Association of Manichaean Studies (IAMS). Edited by Johannes van Oort, Otto Wermelinger, and Gregor Wurst. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XLIX. Leiden, 137–47.
- Lilla, Salvatore R.C. 1971: Clement of Alexandria. A Study in Christian Platonism and Gnosticism. Oxford Theological Monographs. Oxford.
- Lim, Richard 1992: “Manichaeans and Public Disputation in Late Antiquity.” Recherches augustiniennes; XXVI. Paris, 233–72.
- Lim, Richard 1995: Public Disputation, Power, and Social Order in Late Antiquity. The Transformation of the Classical Heritage, 23. Berkeley, Los Angeles and London.
- Van Lindt, Paul 1992: The Names of Manichaean Mythological Figures. A Comparative Study on Terminology in the Coptic Sources. Studies in Oriental Religions; 26. Wiesbaden.
- Lloyd, Anthony Charles 1955–56: “Neoplatonic logic and Aristotelian logic-I.” Phronesis; 1, Assen, 58–72.
- 1991: The Anatomy of Neoplatonism. Oxford.
- Lloyd-Jones, Hugh 1971: The Justice of Zeus. Sather Classical Lectures; 41. Berkeley, Los Angeles and London.
- Löhr, Winrich Alfried 1992: “Gnostic Determinism Reconsidered.” Vigiliae Christianae. A review of early christian life and language; 46. Leiden, 381–90.
- 1996: Basilides und seine Schule. Eine Studie zur Theologie- und Kirchengeschichte des zweiten Jahrhunderts. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament; 83. Tübingen.
- Long, A.A. 1996: Problems in Stoicism. Edited by A.A. Long. London.
- 1996a: “Language and thought in Stoicism.” In: Long, A.A. 1996, 75–113.
- Loofs, Friedrich 1930: Theophilus von Antiochien Adversus Marcionem und die anderen theologischen Quellen bei Irenaeus. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 4. Reihe, 1. Band, 2 Heft = 46. Band, 2. Heft. Leipzig.
- Lorenz, Rudolf 1980: “[Review of] Pier Franco Beatrice: Tradux peccati.” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte; 91, Vierte Folge XXIX. Stuttgart, 409–12.
- Luria, David 1852: ספר פרקי רבי אליעזר מהתנא רבי אליעזר הגדול בן הורקנוס . עם ביאור הרד"ל מכבוד הרב בו המפורסם מוהר" דוד לוריא נ' , מבואבב ישן , יל"ו Rabi Eliezer. Warsaw.
- MacKenzie, D.N. 1979: “Mani’s Šābuhragān.” Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies; 42. London, 500–34.
- Magris, Aldo 2001: “Augustins Prädestinationslehre und die manichäischen Quellen.” Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West. Proceedings of the Fribourg-Utrecht Symposium of the International Association of Manichaean Studies (IAMS). Edited by Johannes van Oort, Otto Wermelinger, and Gregor Wurst. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XLIX. Leiden, 148–60.
- Malherbe, Abraham J. 1970: “Athenagoras on the Location of God.” Theologische Zeitschrift; 26. Basel, 46–52.
- Mansfeld, Jaap 1988: “Philosophy in the Service of Scripture: Philo’s Exegetical

- Strategies." The Question of "Eclecticism". Studies in Later Greek Philosophy. Edited by John M. Dillon and A.A. Long. Hellenistic Culture and Society; III. Berkeley, Los Angeles and London, 70–102.
- Mansfeld, Jaap and Van der Horst, P.W. 1974: An Alexandrian Platonist against Dualism. Alexander of Lycopolis' Treatise 'Critique of the Doctrines of Manichaeus'. Translated, with an Introduction and Notes. Leiden.
- Mansour, Tanios Bou 1984: "La défense éphrémienne de la liberté contre les doctrines marcionite, bardesanite et manichéenne." Orientalia Christiana Periodica; 50. Rome, 331–46.
- Marcos, Natalio Fernández and Sáenz-Badillos, Angel 1979: Theodoretus Cyrensis Quaestiones in Octateuchum. Editio critica. Textos y estudios "Cardenal Cisneros"; 17. Madrid.
- Marcus, Ralph 1953: Philo in ten volumes (and two supplementary volumes). Supplement I. Questions and Answers on Genesis. Translated from the Ancient Armenian Version of the Original Greek by Ralph Marcus. The Loeb Classical Library; 380. London and Cambridge (Massachusetts).
- Markschies, Christoph 1992: Valentinus Gnosticus? Untersuchungen zur valentinianischen Gnosis mit einem Kommentar zu den Fragmenten Valentins. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament; 65. Tübingen.
- 1995: "Die eine Reformation und die vielen Reformen oder Braucht evangelische Kirchengeschichtsschreibung Dekadenmodelle?" Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, 106. Band, Vierte Folge XLIV. Stuttgart, Berlin and Cologne, 70–97.
- 1997: Zwischen den Welten wandern. Strukturen des antiken Christentums. Europäische Geschichte. Frankfurt am Main.
- 1999: "Christliche Religionsphilosophie oder vorchristliche antike Religion: Was ist Gnosis?" Glaube—Erkenntnis—Freiheit. Herausforderungen der Gnosis in Geschichte und Gegenwart. Herausgegeben von A. Franz. Schöningh Paderborn, Munich, Vienna and Zürich, 47–71.
- 2001: Die Gnosis. C.H. Beck Wissen in der Beck'schen Reihe; 2173. Munich.
- Marrou, Henri-Irénée 1965: Histoire de l'éducation dans l'antiquité. Sixième édition, revue et augmentée. Paris.
- Masaracchia, Emanuela 1990: Giuliano Imperatore. Contra Galilaeos. Introduzione, testo critico e traduzione a cura di Emanuela Masaracchia. Testi e commenti, Texts and Commentaries; 9. Rome.
- May, Gerhard 1978: Schöpfung aus dem Nichts. Die Entstehung der Lehre von der Creatio ex nihilo. Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte; 48. Berlin and New York.
- 1987–88: "Marcion in Contemporary Views: Results and Open Questions." The Second Century. A Journal of Early Christian Studies; 6.3. Abilene (Texas), 129–51.
- McCarthy, Carmel 1993: Saint Ephrem's Commentary on Tatian's Diatessaron. An English Translation of Chester Beatty Syriac MS 709 with Introduction and Notes. Journal of Semitic Studies Supplement; 2. Oxford.
- McLeod, Frederick G. 1999: The Image of God in the Antiochene Tradition. Washington (D.C.).
- Meijering, Eginhard Peter 1974: Orthodoxy and Platonism in Athanasius. Synthesis or Antithesis? Reprint with corrections. Leiden.
- 1975: God Being History. Studies in Patristic Philosophy. Amsterdam.
- 1977: Tertullian contra Marcionem: Gotteslehre in der Polemik. Adversus Marcionem I-II. Philosophia Patrum. Interpretations of Patristic Texts; III. Leiden.
- 1984: Athanasius: Contra gentes. Introduction, Translation and Commentary. Philosophia Patrum. Interpretations of Patristic Texts; VII. Leiden.
- 1989: Athanasius: De Incarnatione Verbi. Einleitung, Übersetzung, Kommentar. Von E.P. Meijering (in enger Zusammenarbeit mit J.C.M. van Winden). Amsterdam.

- Mercier, Charles 1979: Philon d'Alexandrie, Quaestiones et solutiones in Genesim I et II, e versione armeniaca. Introduction, traduction et notes par Charles Mercier. Les œuvres de Philon d'Alexandrie; 34A. Paris.
- Merkelbach, R. 1984: "Manichaica 3. Addâs = Adeimantos." Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik; 56. Bonn, 51–53.
- 1985: "Nachtrag zu Manichaica (3). Addas = Adeimantos." Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik; 58. Bonn, 57–58.
- Merki, Hubert 1952: ὈΜΟΙΩΣΙΣ ΩΕΩ. Von der platonischen Angleichung an Gott zur Göttlichkeit bei Gregor von Nyssa. Paradosis; VII. Freiburg.
- Merlan, Philip 1968: From Platonism to Neoplatonism, Third edition, revised. The Hague.
- Metzger, Bruce M. 1977: The Early Versions of the New Testament. Their Origin, Transmission, and Limitations. Oxford.
- Michel, Otto 1954: "οἰκονομία." Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament herausgegeben von Gerhard Kittel. V. Stuttgart, 154–55.
- 1978: Der Brief an die Römer. Übersetzt und erklärt von Otto Michel. 14. Auflage. Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neue Testament. IV. Göttingen.
- Mikkelsen, Gunner B. 1997: Bibliographia Manichaica. A Comprehensive Bibliography of Manichaeism through 1996. Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum. Subsidia; I. Turnhout.
- Milobenski, Ernst 1964: Der Neid in der griechischen Philosophie. Klassisch-Philologische Studien; 29. Wiesbaden.
- Mirecki, Paul Allan 1988: "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Descriptive Catalogue of Synaxis Chapter Titles." Manichaean Studies. Proceedings of the First International Conference on Manichaeism. August 5–9, 1987. Department of History of Religions Lund University Sweden. Edited by Peter Bryder. Lund Studies in African and Asian Religions; 1. Lund, 135–45.
- 1994: "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex. Codicology and Intertextuality." Gnosisforschung und Religionsgeschichte. Festschrift für Kurt Rudolph zum 65. Geburtstag. Herausgegeben von Holger Preißler und Hubert Seiwert unter Mitarbeit von Heinz Mürmel. Marburg, 199–207.
- Mitchell, C.W. 1912: S. Ephraim's Prose Refutations of Mani, Marcion, and Bardaisan of which the Greater Part has been Transcribed from the Palimpsest B.M. Add. 14623 and is Now First Published by C.W. Mitchell. I: The Discourses addressed to Hypatius. London.
- 1921: S. Ephraim's Prose Refutations of Mani, Marcion, and Bardaisan Transcribed from the Palimpsest B.M. Add. 14623 by C.W. Mitchell and completed by A.A. Bevan and F.C. Burkitt. II: The Discourse called 'Of Domnus' and Six Other Writings. London.
- Molland, Einar 1936: "Clement of Alexandria on the Origin of Greek Philosophy." Symbolae Osloenses; fasc. XV–XVI. Oslo, 57–85.
- Mommsen, Theodor 1905: Theodosiani libri XVI cum Constitutionibus Sirmondianis et Leges novellae ad Theodosianum pertinentes. Ediderunt Th. Mommsen et Paulus M. Meyer accedunt tabulae sex; Vol. I, pars posterior. Theodosiani libri XVI cum Constitutionibus Sirmondianis edidit adsumpto apparatu P. Kruegeri Th. Mommsen. Textus cum apparatu. Berlin.
- Morani, Moreno 1987: Nemesii Emeseni: De natura hominis edidit Moreno Morani (Bibliotheca scriptorum graecorum et romanorum teubneriana). Leipzig.
- Moreau, J. 1966: "Eusebius von Caesarea." Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum. Sachwörterbuch zur Auseinandersetzung des Christentums mit der antiken Welt; VI. Stuttgart, 1052–88.
- Von Mosheim, Johann Lorenz 1753: Ioh. Lavrent. Moshemii De rebus christianorum ante Constantinum Magnum commentarii. Helmstadt.
- Moshammer, Alden A. 1979: The Chronicle of Eusebius and Greek Chronographic Tradition. Lewisburg and London.

- Mras, Karl 1956: Eusebius. Werke. VIII. Die Praeparatio Evangelica. Herausgegeben von Karl Mras. Zweiter Teil. Die Bücher XI bis XV, Register. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 43,2. Berlin.
- Mühlenberg, Ekkehard 1979: "Marcion's Jealous God." Disciplina nostra. Essays in Memory of Robert F. Evans. Edited by Donald F. Winslow. Patristic Monograph Series; 6. Cambridge (Massachusetts), 93–113, 203–5.
- Murray, Charles 1977: "Art and the Early Church." The Journal of Theological Studies; N.S. XXVIII. Oxford, 303–45.
- Mutschmann, Hermann 1914: Sexti Empirici opera. Recensuit Hermannus Mutschmann. II. Adversus Dogmaticos. Libros quinque (Adv. Mathem. VII–XI) continens. Bibliotheca scriptorum graecorum et romanorum teubneriana. Leipzig.
- 1958: Sexti Empirici opera. Recensuit Hermannus Mutschmann. I. ΠΥΡΡΩΝΕΙΩΝ ΥΠΟΤΥΠΩΣΕΩΝ. Libros tres continens. Editionem stereotypam emendatam curavit, addenda et corrigenda adiecit I. Mau. Bibliotheca scriptorum graecorum et romanorum teubneriana. Leipzig.
- Mutzenbecher, Almut 1984: Sancti Aurelii Augustini Retractationum libri II. Edidit Almut Mutzenbecher. Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina; LVII. Turnhout.
- Nagel, Peter 1966: "Die Paradieserzählung bei Titus von Bostra. Ein Beitrag zur Frühgeschichte der christlich-manichäischen Polemik." Studia Byzantina. Folge I. Beiträge aus der byzantinistischen Forschung der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik zum XIII. Internationalen Byzantinistenkongress in Oxford 1966. Wissenschaftliche Beiträge der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg; 1966/23 (K1). Halle, 211–19.
- 1967: Die antimanichäischen Schriften des Titus von Bostra. Habilitationsschrift. Halle (unpublished).
- 1973: "Neues griechisches Material zu Titus von Bostra (Adversus Manichaeos III 7–29)." Studia Byzantina. Folge II. Beiträge aus der byzantinistischen Forschung der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik zum XIV. Internationalen Byzantinistenkongress Bukarest 1971. Herausgegeben von Johannes Irmscher und Peter Nagel. Mit 39 Tafeln. Berliner byzantinistische Arbeiten; 44. Berlin, 285–350.
- 1973a: "Die apokryphen Apostelakten des 2. und 3. Jahrhunderts in der manichäischen Literatur. Ein Beitrag zur Frage nach den christlichen Elementen im Manichäismus." Gnosis und Neues Testament. Studien aus Religionswissenschaft und Theologie herausgegeben von Karl-Wolfgang Tröger. Berlin, 149–82.
- 1974: "Der Parakletenspruch des Mani (Keph. 14,7–11) und die altsyrische Evangelienübersetzung." Festschrift Ägyptisches Museum Berlin (Staatliche Museen zu Berlin. Mitteilungen aus der Ägyptischen Sammlung; VIII). Berlin, 303–13.
- 1977: "Mani-Forschung und Patristik." Das Korpus der griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller. Historie, Gegenwart, Zukunft. Eine Aufsatzsammlung. Herausgegeben von Johannes Irmscher und Kurt Treu. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 120. Berlin, 147–50.
- 1980: "Die Auslegung der Paradieserzählung in der Gnosis." Altes Testament—Frühjudentum—Gnosis. Neue Studien zu "Gnosis und Bibel" herausgegeben von Karl-Wolfgang Tröger. Berlin, 49–70.
- Nau, F. 1913: "Documents pour servir a l'histoire de l'eglise nestorienne. La Seconde Partie de l'Histoire de Barhadbešabba Arbaia et Controverse de Théodore de Mopsueste avec les macédoniens. Texte syriaque édité et traduit par F. Nau." Patrologia Orientalis; 9. Paris, 489–677.
- 1932: "La Première Partie de l'Histoire de Barhadbešabba Arbaia. Texte syriaque édité et traduit par F. Nau." Patrologia Orientalis; 23. Paris, 177–344.
- Naumann, Victor 1934: "Das Problem des Bösen in Tertullians zweitem Buch gegen Marcion. Ein Beitrag zur Theodizee Tertullians." Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie; 58. Innsbruck, 311–63, 533–51.
- Nautin, Pierre 1976: Didyme l'Aveugle, Sur la Genèse. Texte inédit d'après un papyrus de Toura. Introduction, édition, traduction et notes par Pierre Nautin avec la collaboration de Louis Doutreleau. I. Sources chrétiennes; 233. Paris.

- 1977: Origène. Sa vie et son œuvre. Christianisme antique; I. Paris.
- Nautin, Pierre and Husson, Pierre 1977: Origène: Homélies sur Jérémie. Traduction par Pierre Husson, Pierre Nautin. Édition, introduction et notes par Pierre Nautin. II. Homélies XII–XX et Homélies latines. Sources chrétiennes; 238. Paris.
- Neumann, Karl Johannes 1880: Iuliani Imperatoris Librorum Contra Christianos quae supersunt. Collegit recensuit prolegomenis instruxit Carolus Ioannes Neumann, insunt Cyrilli Alexandrini fragmenta syriaca ab Eberhardo Nestle edita (Scriptorum graecorum qui christianam impugnaverunt religionem quae supersunt. Collegit recensuit prolegomenis instruxit Carolus Ioannes Neumann; fasc. III). Leipzig.
- 1880a: Kaiser Julians Bücher gegen die Christen. Nach ihrer Wiederherstellung übersetzt von Karl Johannes Neumann. Leipzig.
- Neuschäfer, Bernhard 1987: Origenes als Philologe. Teil I: Text. Teil II: Anmerkungen. Schweizerische Beiträge zur Altertumswissenschaft; Heft 18 (1–2). Basel.
- Nilsson, Martin P. 1967: Geschichte der griechischen Religion. 1. Die Religion Griechenlands bis auf die griechische Weltherrschaft. 3. Auflage. Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft; 5. Abteilung, 2 Teil, 1. Band. Munich.
- Norris, R.A. 1963: Manhood and Christ. A Study in the Christology of Theodore of Mopsuestia. Oxford.
- Nyberg, H.S. 1935: “Forschungen über den Manichäismus.” Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche; XXXIV. Berlin and New York, 70–91.
- Nygren, Gotthard 1956: Das Prädestinationsproblem in der Theologie Augustins. Studia Theologica Lundensia; 12. Lund.
- Oehler, Klaus 1969: “Der Consensus omnium als Kriterium der Wahrheit in der antiken Philosophie und der Patristik.” Antike Philosophie und Byzantinisches Mittelalter. Aufsätze zur Geschichte des griechischen Denkens. Munich, 234–271.
- Omont, H. 1890: “Notes sur les manuscrits grecs des villes hanséatiques Hambourg, Brême et Lübeck.” Centralblatt für Bibliothekswesen; Siebenter Jahrgang. Leipzig; 351–77.
- Van Oort, Johannes 1987: “Augustine and Mani on concupiscentia sexualis.” Augustiniana Traiectina. Communications présentées au Colloque International d’Utrecht 13–14 novembre 1986 éditées par J. den Boeft et J. van Oort. Paris, 137–52.
- 1989: “Augustine on Sexual Concupiscence and Original Sin.” Studia Patristica; XXII. Papers presented to the Tenth International Conference on Patristic Studies held in Oxford 1987. Cappadocian Fathers, Chrysostom and his Greek Contemporaries, Augustine, Donatism and Pelagianism. Edited by Elizabeth A. Livingstone. Louvain, 382–86.
- 1995: “Augustinus und der Manichäismus.” The Manichaean Noûç. Proceedings of the International Symposium Organized in Louvain from 31 July to 3 August 1991. Edited by Alois van Tongerloo in collaboration with Johannes van Oort. Manichaean Studies; II. Louvain, 289–307.
- 2000: “Mani and Manichaeism in Augustine’s De haeresibus. An Analysis of haer. 46,1.” Studia Manichaica. IV. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus, Berlin, 14.–18. Juli 1997. Herausgegeben von Ronald E. Emmerick, Werner Sundermann und Peter Zieme. Berichte und Abhandlungen. Herausgegeben von der Berlin-Brandenburgischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Sonderband 4. Berlin, 451–63.
- 2000a: “Würdigung Isaac de Beausobres (1659–1738).” Studia Manichaica. IV. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus, Berlin, 14.–18. Juli 1997. Herausgegeben von Ronald E. Emmerick, Werner Sundermann und Peter Zieme. Berichte und Abhandlungen. Herausgegeben von der Berlin-Brandenburgischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Sonderband 4. Berlin, 658–66.
- 2001: Mani, Manichaeism & Augustine. The Rediscovery of Manichaeism & Its Influence on Western Christianity. Lectures delivered at the State University of Tbilisi & the K. Kekelidze Institute of Manuscripts of the Georgian Academy of Sciences, Tbilisi, Georgia, 26–29 September, 1995. Fourth edition. Tbilisi.
- Van Oort, Johannes, Wermelinger, Otto and Wurst, Gregor 2001: Augustine and

- Manichaeism in the Latin West. Proceedings of the Fribourg-Utrecht Symposium of the International Association of Manichaean Studies (IAMS)*. Edited by Johannes van Oort, Otto Wermelinger, and Gregor Wurst. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XLIX. Leiden.
- Opelt, I. and Speyer, W. 1967: "Barbar." (Nachträge zum Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum [RAC]). Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum; Jahrgang 10. Münster, 251–91.
- Owen, G.E.L. 1968: "TIΘENAI TA ΦAINOMENA." Aristotle: A Collection of Critical Essays. Edited by J. Moravcsik. London, Melbourne, 167–90.
- Palau, Annaclara Cataldi 1996: Catalogo dei manoscritti greci della Biblioteca Franzoniana (Genova) (Urbani 21–40). Bollettino dei Classici, Supplemento; 17. Rome.
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart 1988: Systematische Theologie. I. Göttingen.
- 1993: Systematische Theologie. III. Göttingen.
- 1996: Theologie und Philosophie. Ihr Verhältnis im Lichte ihrer gemeinsamen Geschichte (UTB für Wissenschaft: Uni-Taschenbücher; 1925). Göttingen.
- Parente, Margherita Isnardi 1982: Senocrate—Ermodoro: Frammenti. Edizione, traduzione e commento a cura di Margherita Isnardi Parente. Istituto Italiano per gli studi filosofici. La scuola di Platone; III. Naples.
- Pearson, Birger Albert 1972: "Jewish Haggadic Traditions in 'The Testimony of Truth' from Nag Hammadi (CG IX, 3)." J. Bergman et al., eds., Ex Orbe Religionum: Studia Geo Widengren; I. Leiden, 457–70.
- 1981: Nag Hammadi Codices IX and X. Contributors Birger A. Pearson—Søren Giversen. Volume Editor Birger A. Pearson. The Coptic Gnostic Library. Nag Hammadi Studies; XV. Leiden.
- 1996: Nag Hammadi Codex VII. Volume Editor Birger A. Pearson. The Coptic Gnostic Library. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XXX. Leiden.
- Pease, Arthur Stanley 1968: M. Tulli Ciceronis De natura deorum. Libri III. Edited by Arthur Stanley Pease. Liber primus. Reprint of the 1st edition 1955. Darmstadt.
- 1968a: M. Tulli Ciceronis De natura deorum. Libri III. Edited by Arthur Stanley Pease. Liber secundus et tertius. Reprint of the 1st edition 1958. Darmstadt.
- Pedersen, Nils Arne 1988: "Early Manichaean Christology, primarily in Western sources." Manichaean Studies. Proceedings of the First International Conference on Manichaeism. August 5–9, 1987. Department of History of Religions Lund University Sweden. Edited by Peter Bryder. Lund Studies in African and Asian Religions; 1. Lund, 157–90.
- 1990: "Between Essence and Existence, A Paradox of the Manichaean System in the Coptic Texts." Rivista degli Studi Orientali; LXIII, fasc. 1–3 (1989). Rome, 45–64.
- 1993: "Some Comments on the Relationship between Marcionism and Manichaeism." Apocryphon Severini presented to Søren Giversen. Editors Per Bilde, Helge Kjær Nielsen and Jørgen Podemann Sørensen. Aarhus, 166–77.
- 1996: Studies in The Sermon on the Great War. Investigations of a Manichaean-Coptic text from the fourth century. Aarhus.
- 1996a: "Det onde som evigt princip eller som produkt af menneskets frie valg. Om Titus af Bostras traktat Fire bøger mod manikæerne." Dansk Teologisk Tidsskrift; 59. årg. Copenhagen, 241–65.
- Perrone, Lorenzo 1992: "La parrhêsia di Mosè: l'argomentazione di Origene nel Trattato sul libero arbitrio e il metodo delle 'questiones et responsiones.'" Il cuore indurito del Faraone. Origene e il problema del libero arbitrio a cura di Lorenzo Perrone. Origini; 3, Testi e Studi del CISEC. Genoa, 31–64.
- Peterson, Erik 1951: "Der Monotheismus als politisches Problem." Erik Peterson, Theologische Traktate. Munich, 45–148.
- Petit, Françoise 1977: Catena graecae in Genesim et in Exodum. I. Catena Sinaitica. Edita a Françoise Petit. Corpus Christianorum. Series Graeca; 2. Turnhout.

- 1978: Philon d'Alexandrie, Quaestiones in Genesim et in Exodum, fragmenta graeca. Introduction, texte critique et notes par Françoise Petit. Les œuvres de Philon d'Alexandrie; 33. Paris.
- 1979: "La tradition de Théodoret de Cyr dans les chaînes sur la Genèse." Le Muséon; 92. Louvain, 1–21.
- 1986: Catena graecae in Genesim et in Exodum. II. Collectio Coisliniana in Genesim. Edita a Françoise Petit. Corpus Christianorum. Series Graeca; 15. Turnhout.
- 1987: "L'homme créé 'à l'image' de Dieu. Quelques fragments grecs inédits de Théodore de Mopsueste." Le Muséon; 100. Louvain, 269–81.
- 1991: La chaîne sur la Genèse. Édition intégrale. I. Chapitres 1 à 3. Texte établi par Françoise Petit. Traditio Exegetica Graeca; 1. Louvain.
- 1993: La chaîne sur la Genèse. Édition intégrale. II. Chapitres 4 à 11. Texte établi par Françoise Petit. Traditio Exegetica Graeca; 2. Louvain.
- 1995: La chaîne sur la Genèse. Édition intégrale. III. Chapitres 12 à 28. Texte établi par Françoise Petit. Traditio Exegetica Graeca; 3. Louvain.
- 1996: La chaîne sur la Genèse. Édition intégrale. IV. Chapitres 29 à 50. Texte établi par Françoise Petit. Traditio Exegetica Graeca; 4. Louvain.
- 1996a: "La chaîne grecque sur la Genèse, miroir de l'exégèse ancienne." Stimuli. Exegese und ihre Hermeneutik in Antike und Christentum. Festschrift für Ernst Dassmann. Herausgegeben von Georg Schöllgen und Clemens Scholten. Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum. Ergänzungsband; 23. Münster, 243–53.
- Petitdidier, Mathieu 1692: Remarques sur la bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques de M. du Pin, tome II, Contenant les Remarques sur le Second Volume de cet ouvrage, avec Une Préface, dans laquelle on réplique à la réponse de M. Du Pin, sur le 1^{er} Tome de ces Remarques. Paris.
- Petitmengin, Pierre 1988: "Deux 'Bibliothèques' de la Contre-Réforme: la Panoplie du Père Torres et la Bibliotheca Sanctorum Patrum." The Uses of Greek and Latin. Historical Essays. Edited by A.C. Dionisotti, Anthony Grafton and Jill Kraye. Warburg Institute Surveys and Texts; XVI. London, 127–53.
- Pharr, Clyde 1952: The Theodosian Code and Novels and the Sirmundian Constitutions. A Translation with Commentary, Glossary, and Bibliography by Clyde Pharr in Collaboration with Theresa Sherrer Davidson and Mary Brown Pharr. With an Introduction by C. Dickerman Williams. The Corpus of Roman Law (Corpus juris romani). A Translation, with commentary, of all the Source Material of Roman Law; I. Princeton.
- Picard, Ch. 1935: "La jalousie des dieux et le droit criminel à Athènes." Revue de l'histoire des religions; 111. Paris, 222–53.
- Du Pin, Louis Ellies 1687: Nouvelle bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques, contenant l'histoire de leur vie, le catalogue, la critique, et la chronologie de leurs Ouvrages, le sommaire de ce qu'ils contiennent, un jugement sur leur stile, et sur leur doctrine, et le de'nombrement des différentes éditions de leurs œuvres. II. Des Auteurs du quatrième Siecle de l'Eglise. Paris.
- 1702: Nouvelle bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques, contenant l'histoire de leur vie, le catalogue, la critique, et la chronologie de leurs ouvrages, le sommaire de ce qu'ils contiennent, un jugement sur leur stile, et sur leur doctrine, et le de'nombrement des différentes éditions de leurs œuvres. II. Des Auteurs du quatrième siecle de l'Eglise. Première partie. Paris. [Troisième Edition, revuë, corrigée & augmentée]
- Pitra, Jean-Baptiste-François 1852: Spicilegium Solesmense complectens Sanctorum patrum scriptorumque ecclesiasticorum anecdota hactenus opera selecta e graecis orientalibusque et latinis codicibus, publici juris facta curante domno J.B. Pitra. I. Paris.
- 1888: Analecta sacra et classica; V. Spicilegio Solesmensi parata. Edidit Joannes Baptista Cardinalis Pitra. Paris and Rome.
- Des Places, Édouard 1983: Eusèbe de Césarée, La préparation évangélique. Livres XII–XIII. Introduction, texte grec, traduction et annotation par Édouard des Places. Sources chrétiennes; 307. Paris.

- Plaetse, Roel Vander and Beukers, Clemens 1979: Sancti Aurelii Augustini De haeresibus ad Quodvultdeum liber unus. Cura et studio R. Vander Plaetse et C. Beukers. Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina; XLVI. Aurelii Augustini opera, pars XIII,2. Sancti Aurelii Augustini De fide rerum invisibilium, Enchiridion ad Laurentium de fide et spe et caritate, De catechizandis rudibus, Sermo ad catechumenos de symbolo, Sermo de disciplina christiana, Sermo de utilitate ieiunii, Sermo de excidio urbis Romae, De haeresibus. Turnhout, 263–358.
- Pohlenz, Max 1937: Herodot. Der erste Geschichtschreiber des Abendlandes. Neue Wege zur Antike; II. Reihe, Heft 7–8. Leipzig and Berlin.
- 1948: Die Stoa: Geschichte einer geistigen Bewegung. I. Göttingen.
- 1949: Die Stoa: Geschichte einer geistigen Bewegung. II. Göttingen.
- Poirier, Paul-Hubert 1989–1990: “Le Contra Manichaeos de Titus de Bostra.” École pratique des hautes études. Section des sciences religieuses. Annuaire. Résumé des conférences et travaux; XCVIII 1989–1990. Paris, 366–68.
- 1990–1991: “Le Contra Manichaeos de Titus de Bostra.” École pratique des hautes études. Section des sciences religieuses. Annuaire. Résumé des conférences et travaux; XCIX 1990–1991. Paris, 325–26.
- Poirier, Paul-Hubert and Sensal, Catherine 1990: Titi Bostreni Contra Manichaeos Libri IV (syriace). Livres I (2^e édition) & II. Traduction française (version provisoire) par Paul-Hubert Poirier et Catherine Sensal. Université Laval, Quebec (unpublished).
- 1990a: “Du grec au syriaque: Quelques réflexions sur la version syriaque du Contra Manichaeos de Titus de Bostra.” V Symposium Syriacum 1988. Katholieke Universiteit, Leuven, 29–31 août 1988. Edited by René Lavenant, S.J. Orientalia Christiana Analecta; 236. Rome, 307–19.
- Polotsky, Hans Jakob 1934: Manichäische Homilien. Manichäische Handschriften der Sammlung A. Chester Beatty. I. Stuttgart.
- 1935: “Manichäismus.” Pauly-Wissowa: Real-Encyclopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaften. Supplementband VI. Stuttgart, cols. 240–72.
- Pouderon, Bernard 1992: Athénagore, Supplique au sujet des chrétiens et Sur la résurrection des morts. Introduction, texte et traduction par Bernard Pouderon. Sources chrétiennes; 379. Paris.
- Prestige, G.L. 1952: God in Patristic Thought. London.
- Preuschen, Erwin 1900: Die apokryphen gnostischen Adamschriften aus dem Armenischen übersetzt und untersucht (Sonderabdruck aus der Festschrift für Bernhard Stade). Giessen.
- Prümm, Karl 1937: “Glaube und Erkenntnis im zweiten Buch der Stromata des Klemens von Alexandrien.” Scholastik; 12. Freiburg, 17–57.
- Puech, Aimé 1930: Histoire de la littérature grecque chrétienne depuis les origines jusqu'à la fin de IV^e siècle. III: Le IV^e siècle. Collection d'études anciennes publiée sous le patronage de l'Association Guillaume Budé. Paris.
- Puech, Henri-Charles 1949: Le manichéisme. Son fondateur—Sa doctrine. Publications du Musée Guimet. Bibliothèque de diffusion; LVI. Paris.
- 1977: “Der Begriff der Erlösung im Manichäismus.” Der Manichäismus. Herausgegeben von Geo Widengren. Wege der Forschung; 168. Darmstadt, 145–213.
- Quasten, Johannes 1963: Patrology. III. The Golden Age of Greek Patristic Literature From the Council of Nicaea to the Council of Chalcedon. Utrecht, Antwerp and Westminster (Maryland).
- Quispel, Gilles 1943: De bronnen van Tertullianus' Adversus Marcionem. Utrecht.
- Rahlf's, Alfred 1928: Paul de Lagardes wissenschaftliches Lebenswerk im Rahmen einer Geschichte seines Lebens dargestellt. Mitteilungen des Septuaginta-Unternehmens der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen; 4,1. Berlin.
- Ranulf, Svend 1933: The Jealousy of the Gods and Criminal Law at Athens. A Contribution to the Sociology of Moral Indignation. I. London and Copenhagen.

- 1934: The Jealousy of the Gods and Criminal Law at Athens. A Contribution to the Sociology of Moral Indignation. II. London and Copenhagen.
- Raveaux, Thomas 1987: Augustinus, Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum. Analyse des Inhalts und Untersuchung des geistesgeschichtlichen Hintergrunds. Cassiciacum; XXXVII. Würzburg.
- Reeves, John C. 1992: Jewish Lore in Manichaean Cosmogony. Studies in the Book of Giants Traditions. Monographs of the Hebrew Union College; No. 14. Cincinnati.
- Refoulé, R.F. 1954: Q.S.Fl. Tertulliani De praescriptione haereticorum. Cura et studio R.F. Refoulé. Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina; I. Quinti Septimi Florentis Tertulliani Opera. Pars I. Opera catholica. Adversus Marcionem. Turnhout, 185–224.
- Rehm, Bernhard 1953: Die Pseudoklementinen. I. Homilien. Herausgegeben von Bernhard Rehm. Zum Druck besorgt durch Johannes Irmscher. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte; 42. Berlin and Leipzig.
- Reichardt, Walter 1897: Joannis Philoponi De officio mundi. Libri VII. Recensuit Gualterus Reichardt. Scriptores sacri et profani; fasc. I. Bibl. Teubneriana; 910. Leipzig.
- Reinhardt, Karl 1921: Poseidonios. Munich.
- 1926: Kosmos und Sympathie. Neue Untersuchungen über Poseidonios. Munich.
- Reischl, W.C. 1848: ΤΟΥ ΕΝ ΑΓΙΟΙΣ ΠΑΤΡΟΣ ΗΜΩΝ ΚΥΡΙΑΛΛΟΥ ΙΕΡΟΣΟΛΥΜΩΝ ΑΡΧΙΕΠΙΣΚΟΠΟΥ ΤΑ ΣΩΖΟΜΕΝΑ. S. Patris nostri Cyrilli Hierosolymorum Archiepiscopi opera quae supersunt omnia. Ad libros mss. et impressos recensuit notis criticis commentariis indicibusque locupletissimis illustravit Guilielmus Carolus Reischl. I. Munich.
- Reitzenstein, R. 1917: Die Göttin Psyche in der hellenistischen und frühchristlichen Literatur. Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philosophisch-historische Klasse; Jahrgang 1917. 10. Abhandlung. Heidelberg.
- 1931: "Eine wertlose und eine wertvolle Überlieferung über den Manichäismus." Nachrichten von der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen; 1931, Philologisch-historische Klasse. Göttingen, 28–58.
- 1931a: "Alexander von Lykopolis." Philologus. Zeitschrift für das klassische Altertum; LXXXVI (N.F., Band XL). Leipzig, 185–98.
- Renoux, Charles 1979: "Hippolyte de Bostra? Le dossier du Galata 54." Le Muséon. Revue d'études orientales; 92. Louvain, 133–58.
- Reuss, Joseph 1976: "Bemerkungen zu den Lukas-Homilien des Titus von Bostra." Biblica; 57. Rome, 538–41.
- Richard, Marcel 1977: Iohannis Caesariensis presbyteri et grammatici Opera quae supersunt edidit Marcellus Richard, appendicem suppeditante Michaelae Aubineau. Corpus Christianorum. Series Graeca; 1. Turnhout.
- Richardson, Ernest Cushing 1896: Hieronymus liber de viris illustribus. Gennadius liber de viris illustribus. Herausgegeben von Ernest Cushing Richardson. Der sogenannte Sophronius. Herausgegeben von Oscar von Gebhardt. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; XIV. Band, 1. Heft. Leipzig.
- Ries, Julien 1988: Les études manichéennes des controverses de la Réforme aux découvertes du XX^e siècle. Collection Cerfaux-Lefort; 1. Louvain.
- Rist, John M. 1969: Stoic Philosophy. Cambridge.
- 1981: "The Importance of Stoic Logic in the Contra Celsum." Neoplatonism and Early Christian Thought. Essays in honour of A.H. Armstrong edited by H.J. Blumenthal and R.A. Marcus. London, 64–78.
- Ritter, Adolf Martin 1993: Charisma und Caritas. Aufsätze zur Geschichte der Alten Kirche. Göttingen.
- Roberts, A. and Donaldson, J. 1989 [Reprint]: "Justin Martyr." The Ante-Nicene Fathers. Translations of The Writings of the Fathers down to A.D. 325. Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson, editors. American Reprint of the Edinburgh

- Edition. Revised and Chronologically Arranged, with Brief Prefaces and Occasional Notes, by A. Cleveland Coxe. I. The Apostolic Fathers—Justin Martyr—Irenæus. Grand Rapids (Michigan), 157–306.
- 1989a [Reprint]: “Irenæus, Against Heresies.” The Ante-Nicene Fathers. Translations of The Writings of the Fathers down to A.D. 325. Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson, editors. American Reprint of the Edinburgh Edition. Revised and Chronologically Arranged, with Brief Prefaces and Occasional Notes, by A. Cleveland Coxe. I. The Apostolic Fathers—Justin Martyr—Irenæus. Grand Rapids (Michigan), 307–602.
- 1993 [Reprint]: “Tertullian. The Prescription against Heretics.” Translated by Peter Holmes. The Ante-Nicene Fathers. Translations of The Writings of the Fathers down to A.D. 325. Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson, editors. American Reprint of the Edinburgh Edition. Revised and Chronologically Arranged, with Brief Prefaces and Occasional Notes, by A. Cleveland Coxe. III. Latin Christianity: Its Founder, Tertullian. I. Apologetic; II. Anti-Marcion; III. Ethical. Authorized Edition. Grand Rapids (Michigan), 243–67.
- 1993a [Reprint]: “Archelaus. The Acts of the Disputation with the Heresiarch Manes.” The Ante-Nicene Fathers. Translations of The Writings of the Fathers down to A.D. 325. Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson, editors. American Reprint of the Edinburgh Edition. Revised and Chronologically Arranged, with Brief Prefaces and Occasional Notes, by A. Cleveland Coxe. VI. Gregory Thaumaturgos, Dionysius the Great, Julius Africanus, Anatolius and Minor Writers, Methodius, Amobius. Authorized Edition. Grand Rapids (Michigan), 173–236.
- 1993b [Reprint]: “Alexander, Bishop of Lycopolis. Of the Manichæans.” The Ante-Nicene Fathers. Translations of The Writings of the Fathers down to A.D. 325. Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson, editors. American Reprint of the Edinburgh Edition. Revised and Chronologically Arranged, with Brief Prefaces and Occasional Notes, by A. Cleveland Coxe. VI. Gregory Thaumaturgos, Dionysius the Great, Julius Africanus, Anatolius and Minor Writers, Methodius, Amobius. Authorized Edition. Grand Rapids (Michigan), 237–53.
- 1994 [Reprint]: “Clement of Alexandria. The Stromata, or Miscellanies.” The Ante-Nicene Fathers. Translations of The Writings of the Fathers down to A.D. 325. Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson, editors. American Reprint of the Edinburgh Edition. Revised and Chronologically Arranged, with Brief Prefaces and Occasional Notes, by A. Cleveland Coxe. II. Fathers of the Second Century: Hermas, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus, and Clement of Alexandria (entire). Authorized Edition. Grand Rapids (Michigan), 299–567.
- Roberts, C.H. 1938: “469. Epistle Against the Manichees.” Catalogue of the Greek and Latin Papyri in the John Rylands Library Manchester. III. Theological and Literary Texts (Nos. 457–551). Edited by C.H. Roberts. Manchester, 38–46.
- Van Roey, A. 1984: “Un traité cononite contre la doctrine de Jean Philopon sur la résurrection.” ANTIΔΩPON. Hulde aan Maurits Geerard bij de voltooiing van de Clavis Patrum Graecorum. Hommage à Maurits Geerard pour célébrer l’achèvement de la Clavis Patrum Graecorum. I. Wetteren, 123–39.
- Roldanus, J. 1968: Le Christ et l’homme dans la théologie d’Athanasie d’Alexandrie. Étude de la conjonction de sa conception de l’homme avec sa christologie. Studies in the History of Christian Thought; IV. Leiden.
- Romeny, R.B. ter Haar 1997: “Eusebius of Emesa’s Commentary on Genesis and the Origins of the Antiochene School.” The Book of Genesis in Jewish and Oriental Christian Interpretation. A Collection of Essays. Edited by Judith Frishman and Lucas van Rompay. Traditio Exegetica Graeca; 5. Louvain, 125–42.
- 1997a: A Syrian in Greek Dress. The Use of Greek, Hebrew, and Syriac Biblical Texts in Eusebius of Emesa’s Commentary on Genesis. Traditio Exegetica Graeca; 6. Louvain.

- Rondet, Henri 1967: Le Pêché originel dans la tradition patristique et théologique. Le signe. Paris.
- Rose, Eugen 1979: Die manichäische Christologie. Studies in Oriental Religions; 5. Wiesbaden.
- Rottenwöhler, Gerhard 1986: Unde malum? Herkunft und Gestalt des Bösen nach heterodoxer Lehre von Markion bis zu den Katharern. Karlsruhe.
- Rousseau, Adelin 1965: Irénée de Lyon, Contre les hérésies. Livre IV. Édition critique sous la direction de Adelin Rousseau avec la collaboration de Bertrand Hemmerdinger, Louis Doutreleau, Charles Mercier. II. Texte et traduction. Sources chrétiennes; 100. Paris.
- Rousseau, Adelin and Doutreleau, Louis 1974: Irénée de Lyon, Contre les hérésies. Livre III. Édition critique par Adelin Rousseau et Louis Doutreleau. II. Texte et traduction. Sources chrétiennes; 211. Paris.
- 1979: Irénée de Lyon, Contre les hérésies. Livre I. Édition critique par Adelin Rousseau et Louis Doutreleau. II. Texte et traduction. Sources chrétiennes; 264. Paris.
- 1982: Irénée de Lyon, Contre les hérésies. Livre II. Édition critique par Adelin Rousseau et Louis Doutreleau. II. Texte et traduction. Sources chrétiennes; 294. Paris.
- Rousseau, Adelin, Doutreleau, Louis and Mercier, Charles 1969: Irénée de Lyon, Contre les hérésies. Livre V. Édition critique par Adelin Rousseau, Louis Doutreleau, Charles Mercier. II. Texte et traduction. Sources chrétiennes; 153. Paris.
- Rucker, Ignaz 1933: Florilegium Edessenum anonymum (syriace ante 562). Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philosophisch-historische Abteilung; Jahrgang 1933, Heft 5. Munich.
- Rudolph, Kurt 1967: "Randerscheinungen des Judentums und das Problem der Entstehung des Gnostizismus." Kairos. Zeitschrift für Religionswissenschaft und Theologie; 9. Salzburg, 105–22.
- 1968: "Der gnostische 'Dialog' als literarisches Genus." Probleme der koptischen Literatur. Herausgegeben vom Institut für Byzantinistik der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg. Bearbeitet von Peter Nagel. Wissenschaftliche Beiträge der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg; 1968/1 (K2). Halle, 85–107.
- 1980: Die Gnosis. Wesen und Geschichte einer spätantiken Religion. Zweite, durchgesehene und ergänzte Auflage. Göttingen.
- Runia, David T. 1986: Philo of Alexandria and the Timaeus of Plato. Philosophia antiqua; 44. Leiden.
- 1989: "Festugière revisited; Aristotle in the Greek Patres." Vigiliae Christianae; 43. Amsterdam, 1–34.
- Sachau, C. Edward 1869: Theodori Mopsuesteni Fragmenta Syriaca. E codicibus Musei Britannici nitriaci edidit atque in latinum sermonem vertit Ed. Sachau. Leipzig.
- 1879: The Chronology of Ancient Nations. An English Version of the Arabic Text of the Athâr-ul-bâkiya of Albirûnî, or "Vestiges of the Past," Collected and Reduced to Writing by the Author in A.H. 390–1, A.D. 1000. Translated and Edited, with Notes and Index, by Dr. C. Edward Sachau. Published for the Oriental Translation Fund of Great Britain & Ireland. London.
- Salemann, Carl 1912: "Manichaica III." Bulletin de l'Académie Impériale des Sciences de St.-Petersbourg; VI série, tom. VI. St. Petersburg, 1–32.
- Sandbach, F.H. 1996: "Ennoia and Prolipsis in the Stoic Theory of Knowledge." In: Long, A.A. 1996, 22–37.
- Sartre, Maurice 1982: Trois études sur l'Arabie romaine et byzantine. Publié avec le concours du Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique. Collection Latomus; 178. Brussels.
- 1982a: Inscriptions grecques et latines de la Syrie; tom. XIII, fasc. 1. Bostra. Nos

- 9001 à 9472. Institut Français d'Archéologie du Proche-Orient. Beyrouth—Damas—Amman. Bibliothèque Archéologique et Historique; CXIII. Paris.
- 1985: Bostra. Des origines à l'Islam. Institut Français d'Archéologie du Proche-Orient. Beyrouth—Damas—Amman. Bibliothèque Archéologique et Historique; CXVII. Paris.
- Savage, John J. 1985: Saint Ambrose, Hexameron, Paradise, and Cain and Abel. Translated by John J. Savage. The Fathers of the Church. A New Translation; 42. Washington (D.C.).
- Schaefer, Hans Heinrich 1927: "Urform und Fortbildungen des manichäischen Systems." Vorträge der Bibliothek Warburg. IV. Vorträge 1924–25. Leipzig, 65–157.
- Schäferdiek, Knut 1980: "Zu Verfasserschaft und Situation der epistula ad Constantiam de imagine Christi." Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, 91. Band, Vierte Folge XXIX. Stuttgart, 177–86.
- Schäublin, Christoph 1974: Untersuchungen zu Methode und Herkunft der antiochenischen Exegese. Theophaneia. Beiträge zur Religions- und Kirchengeschichte des Altertums; 23. Cologne and Bonn.
- Schaff, Philip 1887: "St. Augustin: Reply to Faustus the Manichæan. [Contra Faustum manichæum]. A.D. 400. Translated by Richard Stothert." A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers. Edited by Philip Schaff in connection with a number of Patristic scholars of Europe and America. IV. St. Augustin: The Writings Against the Manichæans and Against the Donatists. Buffalo, 151–346.
- Scheffczyk, Leo 1982: Urstand, Fall und Erbsünde. Von der Schrift bis Augustinus. Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte II,3a (1. Teil). Freiburg, Basel and Vienna.
- Scheinhardt, Hartwig 1968: "Zitate aus drei verlorenen Schriften des Theodor von Mopsuestia." Paul de Lagarde und die syrische Kirchengeschichte, mit einem Geleitwort von Hermann Dörries herausgegeben vom Göttinger Arbeitskreis für syrische Kirchengeschichte. Göttingen, 185–198.
- Schelkle, Karl Hermann 1959: Paulus. Lehrer der Väter. Die altkirchliche Auslegung von Römer 1–11. Düsseldorf.
- Schemann, Ludwig 1920: Paul de Lagarde. Ein Lebens- und Erinnerungsbild. Mit drei Bildnissen und einem Faksimile. Zweite Auflage. Leipzig.
- Schenkl, Karl 1896: Sancti Ambrosii Opera. Pars prima qua continentur libri Hexameron, De paradiso, De Cain et Abel, De Noe, De Abraham, De Isaac, De bono mortis. Recensuit Carolus Schenkl. Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum; XXXII. Vienna.
- Scher, Addai 1910: "Histoire nestorienne (Chronique de Séert). Première partie (II). Publiée par Addai Scher. Traduite par Pierre Dib." Patrologia Orientalis; 5. Paris, 217–344.
- 1912: Theodorus bar Kōnī: Liber Scholiorum. Pars Posterior. Edidit Addai Scher. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; Scriptorum Syri. Textus. Series secunda; LXVI. Paris.
- Scherer, Jean 1957: Le Commentaire d'Origène sur Rom. III.5–V.7, d'après les extraits du Papyrus n° 88748 de Musée du Caire et les fragments de la Philocalie et du Vaticanus gr. 762. Essai de reconstitution du texte et de la pensée des tomes V et VI du "Commentaire sur l'Épître aux Romains". Cairo.
- 1960: Entretien d'Origène avec Héraclide. Introduction, texte, traduction et notes par Jean Scherer. Sources chrétiennes; 67. Paris.
- Schindler, Alfred 1978: Monotheismus als politisches Problem? Erik Peterson und die Kritik der politischen Theologie von Alfred Schindler (Herausgeber), Jan Badewien, Ernst L. Fellechner, Michael Gertges, Rudolf Hartmann, Hans-Ulrich Perels und Frithard Scholz. Studien zur evangelischen Ethik; 14. Gütersloh.
- 1985: "Häresie II. Kirchengeschichtlich." Theologische Realenzyklopädie; XIV. Berlin and New York, 318–41.

- 1986–94: “Catholicus, a-” Augustinus-Lexikon. Herausgegeben von Cornelius Mayer. I. Basel, cols. 815–20.
- Schmidt, Carl and Polotsky, Hans Jakob 1933: “Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten. Originalschriften des Mani und seiner Schüler. Mit einem Beitrag von H. Ibscher.” Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philologisch-historische Klasse; 1933. Berlin, 4–90.
- Schmidt, Carl, Polotsky, Hans Jakob and Böhlig, Alexander 1940: Kephalaia. Band I, 1. Hälfte (Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin). Stuttgart.
- Schmidt, K.L. 1954: “ὀπίζω.” Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament herausgegeben von Gerhard Kittel. V. Stuttgart, 453–54.
- 1954a: “πρροπίζω.” Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament herausgegeben von Gerhard Kittel. V. Stuttgart, 457.
- Schoeck, Helmut 1966: Der Neid. Eine Theorie der Gesellschaft. Freiburg.
- Schoedel, William R. 1959: “Philosophy and Rhetoric in the Adversus Haereses of Irenaeus.” Vigiliae Christianae; 13. Amsterdam, 22–32.
- Schöne, Alfred 1900: Die Weltchronik des Eusebius in ihrer Bearbeitung durch Hieronymus. Berlin.
- Schürer, Emil 1909: Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi. Vierte Auflage. III. Das Judentum in der Zerstreuung und die jüdische Literatur. Leipzig.
- Schwartz, Eduard 1909: Eusebius. Werke. II. Die Kirchengeschichte. Herausgegeben von Eduard Schwartz. Die lateinische Übersetzung des Rufinus. Bearbeitet von Theodor Mommsen. Dritter Teil. Einleitung, Übersichten und Register. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 9,3. Leipzig.
- 1924–26: Concilium Universale Ephesenum. Edidit Eduardus Schwartz. Vol. V, Part 1. Collectio Palatina sive qui fertur Marius Mercator. Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum iussu atque mandato Societatis Scientiarum Argentoratensis. Edidit Eduardus Schwartz. Tom. I, Vol. V. Berlin and Leipzig.
- Schweizer, Eduard 1942: “Diodor von Tarsus als Exeget.” Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche; 40 (1941). Berlin, 33–75.
- Scopello, Madeleine 2000: “Hégémonius, les Acta Archelai et l’histoire de la controverse anti-manichéenne.” Studia Manichaica. IV. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus, Berlin, 14.–18. Juli 1997. Herausgegeben von Ronald E. Emmerick, Werner Sundermann und Peter Zieme. Berichte und Abhandlungen. Herausgegeben von der Berlin-Brandenburgischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Sonderband 4. Berlin, 528–45.
- 2001: “L’Epistula Fundamenti à la lumière des sources manichéennes du Fayoum.” Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West. Proceedings of the Fribourg-Utrecht Symposium of the International Association of Manichaean Studies (IAMS). Edited by Johannes van Oort, Otto Wermelinger, and Gregor Wurst. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XLIX. Leiden, 205–29.
- Seeck, Otto 1906: Die Briefe des Libanius, zeitlich geordnet. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; XXX, NF XV, Heft 1/2. Leipzig.
- Seyfarth, Wolfgang 1978: Ammiani Marcellini Rerum gestarum, libri qui supersunt. Edidit Wolfgang Seyfarth adiuvantibus Liselotte Jacob-Karau et Ilse Ulmann. I. Libri XIV–XXV. Bibliotheca scriptorum graecorum et romanorum teubneriana. Leipzig.
- Sfameni Gasparro, Giulia 2000: “Addas–Adimantus unus ex discipulis Manichaei: for the History of Manichaeism in the West.” Studia Manichaica. IV. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus, Berlin, 14.–18. Juli 1997. Herausgegeben von Ronald E. Emmerick, Werner Sundermann und Peter Zieme. Berichte und Abhandlungen. Herausgegeben von der Berlin-Brandenburgischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Sonderband 4. Berlin, 546–59.
- Sickenberger, Joseph 1898: “Aus römischen Handschriften über die Lukaskatene

- des Niketas." Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Alterthumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte, XII. Rome, 55–84.
- 1901: Titus von Bostra, Studien zu dessen Lukashomilien. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 21, 1 (NF VI, 1). Leipzig.
- 1903: "Über griechische Evangelienkommentare." Biblische Zeitschrift; 1. Paderborn and Freiburg, 182–93.
- Simon, Marcel 1996: Verus Israel. A Study of the Relations between Christians and Jews in the Roman Empire (AD 135–425). Translated from the French by H. McKeating. The Littman Library of Jewish Civilization. London.
- De Simone, Russell J. 1980: "Modern Research on the Sources of Saint Augustine's Doctrine of Original Sin." Augustinian Studies. Annual publication of the Augustinian Institute; 11. Villanova (Pennsylvania), 205–27.
- Skard, Eiliv 1936: "Nemesiosstudien. I." Symbolae Osloenses. Auspicis societatis graecolatinae; fasc. XV–XVI. Oslo, 23–43.
- Skjærø, P.O. 1995: "The Manichaean Polemical Hymns in M 28 I. A Review Article." Bulletin of the Asia Institute; N.S. Vol. 9. Detroit, 239–55.
- Slomkowski, Antoine 1928: L'État primitif de l'homme dans la tradition de l'Église avant saint Augustin. Paris and Strasbourg.
- Smith, J. Payne 1903: A Compendious Syriac Dictionary. Founded upon the Thesaurus Syriacus of R. Payne Smith. Edited by J. Payne Smith (Mrs. Margoliouth). Oxford.
- Smith, R. Payne 1879–1901: Thesaurus Syriacus collegerunt Stephanus M. Quatremere, Georgius Henricus Bernstein. Auxit, digessit, exposuit, edidit R. Payne Smith. I ܬܗܫܘܒܝܢܐܘܪܝܢܐ Oxford 1879. II ܕܘܢܬܘܢܐܘܪܝܢܐ Oxford 1901.
- Smyth, Herbert Weir 1984: Greek Grammar. Cambridge (Massachusetts).
- Snell, Bruno 1928: Aischylos und das Handeln im Drama. Philologus. Supplementband XX, Heft I. Leipzig.
- Von Soden, Hermann Freiherr 1911: Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments in ihrer ältesten erreichbaren Textgestalt hergestellt auf Grund ihrer Textgeschichte. I. Teil: Untersuchungen. I. Abteilung: Die Textzeugen. Zweite unveränderte Ausgabe. Göttingen.
- Sourdell, Dominique 1952: Les cultes du Hauran à l'époque romaine. Institut Français d'Archéologie de Beyrouth. Bibliothèque Archéologique et Historique; LIII. Paris.
- Spanneut, Michel 1957: Le Stoïcisme des Pères de l'Église, de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Alexandrie. Paris.
- Staab, Karl 1933: Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche. Aus Kettenhandschriften gesammelt und herausgegeben. Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen; XV. Münster.
- Stählin, Otto 1905: Clemens Alexandrinus. I. Protrepticus und Paedagogus. Herausgegeben von Otto Stählin. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 12. Leipzig.
- 1906: Clemens Alexandrinus. II. Stromata Buch I–VI. Herausgegeben von Otto Stählin. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 15. Leipzig.
- 1909: Clemens Alexandrinus. III. Stromata Buch VII und VIII—Excerpta ex Theodoto—Eclogae propheticae—Quis Dives salvetur—Fragmente. Herausgegeben von Otto Stählin. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 17. Leipzig.
- Stead, G. Christopher 1963: "Divine Substance in Tertullian." The Journal of Theological Studies; N.S. XIV. Oxford, 46–66. Also as no. II in: Stead, G. Christopher 1985.
- 1976: "Rhetorical Method in Athanasius." Vigiliae Christianae; 30. Amsterdam, 121–137. Also as no. VIII in: Stead, G. Christopher 1985.
- 1976a: "Ontology and Terminology in Gregory of Nyssa." Gregor von Nyssa und die Philosophie. Zweites internationales Kolloquium über Gregor von Nyssa. Freckenhorst bei Münster 18.–23. September 1972. Herausgegeben von Heinrich Dörrie, Margaret

- Altenburger, Uta Schramm. Leiden, 107–27. Also as no. IX in: Stead, G. Christopher 1985.
- 1977: Divine Substance. Oxford.
- 1980: “Athanasius’ De incarnatione: An Edition reviewed.” The Journal of Theological Studies; N.S. XXXI. Oxford, 378–90. Also as no. XI in: Stead, G. Christopher 1985.
- 1982: “The Concept of Mind and the Concept of God in the Christian Fathers.” The Philosophical Frontiers of Christian Theology. Ed. B. Hebblethwaite and S.R. Sutherland. Cambridge, 39–54. Also as no. XIV in: Stead, G. Christopher 1985.
- 1985: Substance and Illusion in the Christian Fathers. London.
- Stegmann, Anton 1925: Des heiligen Kirchenlehrers Basilius des Großen Bischofs von Cäsarea ausgewählte Homilien und Predigten. Aus dem griechischen Urtext übersetzt und mit Anmerkungen versehen von Anton Stegmann. II. Bibliothek der Kirchenväter. Munich.
- Stewart, Columba 1991: ‘Working the Earth of the Heart’: The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts, and Language to AD 431. Oxford Theological Monographs. Oxford.
- Strack, Hermann L. and Billerbeck, Paul 1974: Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch. I. Das Evangelium nach Matthäus erläutert aus Talmud und Midrasch. Munich.
- Strange, Steven K. 1992: Porphyry On Aristotle Categories. Translated by Steven K. Strange (Ancient Commentators on Aristotle). London.
- Straub, Johannes 1970: Concilium Universale Constantinopolitanum sub Iustiniano habitum. Vol. I. Concilii Actiones VIII—Appendices graecae—Indices. Edidit Johannes Straub. Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum iussu atque mandato Societatis Scientiarum Argentoratensis. Edenda instituit Edvardus Schwartz. Continuavit Johannes Straub. Tom. IV, Vol. 1. Berlin.
- Stroumsa, Sarah and Stroumsa, Gedaliahu G. 1988: “Aspects of Anti-Manichaean Polemics in Late Antiquity and under Early Islam.” Harvard Theological Review; 81. Cambridge (Massachusetts), 37–58.
- Stroumsa, Gedaliahu G. 1992: “Titus of Bostra and Alexander of Lycopolis: A Christian and a Platonic Refutation of Manichaean Dualism.” Neoplatonism and Gnosticism. Richard T. Wallis, Jay Bregman, editors. Studies in Neoplatonism: Ancient and Modern; 6. Albany (New York), 337–49.
- 1992a: Savoir et salut. Patrimoines. Paris.
- 2000: “Isaac de Beausobre Revisited: The Birth of Manichaean Studies.” Studia Manichaica. IV. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus, Berlin, 14.–18. Juli 1997. Herausgegeben von Ronald E. Emmerick, Werner Sundermann und Peter Zieme. Berichte und Abhandlungen. Herausgegeben von der Berlin-Brandenburgischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Sonderband 4. Berlin, 601–12.
- Strucker, Arnold 1913: Die Gottebenbildlichkeit des Menschen in der christlichen Literatur der ersten zwei Jahrhunderte. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Exegese von Genesis 1, 26. Münster.
- Strutwolf, Holger 1993: Gnosis als System. Zur Rezeption der valentinianischen Gnosis bei Origenes. Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte; 56. Göttingen.
- Sullivan, Francis A. 1956: The Christology of Theodore of Mopsuestia. Analecta Gregoriana; LXXXII. Series Facultatis Theologicae; Sectio B (no. 29). Rome.
- Sullivan, John Edward 1963: The Image of God. The Doctrine of St. Augustine and its Influence. Dubuque (Iowa).
- Sundermann, Werner 1979: “Namen von Göttern, Dämonen und Menschen in iranischen Versionen des manichäischen Mythos.” Altorientalische Forschungen; 6. Berlin. 95–133.
- 1981: Mitteliranische manichäische Texte kirchengeschichtlichen Inhalts, mit einem Appendix von Nicholas Sims-Williams. Schriften zur Geschichte und Kultur des Alten Orients. Berliner Turfantexte; XI. Berlin.

- 1987: "Studien zur kirchengeschichtlichen Literatur der iranischen Manichäer, III." Altorientalische Forschungen; 14. Berlin, 41–107.
- 1992: Der Sermon vom Licht-Nous. Eine Lehrschrift des östlichen Manichäismus. Edition der parthischen und soghdischen Version. Berliner Turfantexte; XVII. Berlin.
- 1994: "Eva illuminatrix." Gnosisforschung und Religionsgeschichte. Festschrift für Kurt Rudolph zum 65. Geburtstag. Herausgegeben von Holger Preißler und Hubert Seiwert unter Mitarbeit von Heinz Mürmel. Marburg, 317–27.
- 1997: Der Sermon von der Seele. Eine Lehrschrift des östlichen Manichäismus. Edition der parthischen und soghdischen Version mit einem Anhang von Peter Zieme: Die türkischen Fragmente des "Sermons von der Seele". Berliner Turfantexte; XIX. Turnhout.
- 1997a: "How Zoroastrian is Mani's Dualism?" Atti del Terzo Congresso Internazionale di studi "Manicheismo e oriente cristiano antico." Arcavacata di Rende—Amantea 31 agosto—5 settembre 1993. A cura di Luigi Cirillo & Alois van Tongerloo. Manichaean Studies; III. Louvain and Naples, 343–60.
- Swete, H.B. 1880: Theodori episcopi Mopsuesteni in epistolas b. Pauli Commentarii. The Latin Version with the Greek Fragments, with an Introduction Notes and Indices by H.B. Swete; I. Introduction. Galatians—Colossians. Cambridge.
- 1882: Theodori episcopi Mopsuesteni in epistolas b. Pauli Commentarii. The Latin Version with the Greek Fragments, with an Introduction Notes and Indices by H.B. Swete; II. I. Thessalonians—Philemon. Appendices. Indices. Cambridge.
- Taràn, Leonardo 1981: Speusippus of Athens. A Critical Study with a Collection of Related Texts and Commentary. Philosophia Antiqua. A Series of Ancient Philosophy; XXXIX. Leiden.
- Tardieu, Michel 1984: Écrits gnostiques. Codex de Berlin. Centre d'Études des Religions du Livre. L.A. C.N.R.S.; 152. Sources Gnostiques et Manichéennes; 1. Paris.
- 1987: "Principes de l'exégèse manichéenne du Nouveau Testament." In: Tardieu, Michel 1987a, 123–46.
- 1987a: Les règles de l'interprétation. Édité par Michel Tardieu. Paris.
- Telfer, William 1955: Cyril of Jerusalem and Nemesius of Emesa. Edited by William Telfer. The Library of Christian Classics. IV. London and Philadelphia.
- Tennant, F.R. 1968: The Sources of the Doctrines of the Fall and Original Sin. Introductory by Mary Frances Thelen. New York.
- Testa, Emmanuele 1970: Il Peccato di Adamo nella Patristica (Gen. III). Studii Biblici Franciscani Analecta; 3. Jerusalem.
- Theiler, Willy 1966: Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus. Quellen und Studien zur Geschichte der Philosophie; X. Berlin.
- Thomson, Robert W. 1971: Athanasius Contra Gentes and De Incarnatione. Edited and translated by Robert W. Thomson. Oxford Early Christian Texts. Oxford.
- Thümmel, Hans Georg 1984: "Eusebios' Brief an Kaiserin Konstantia." Klio. Beiträge zur alten Geschichte; 66. Leipzig, 210–22.
- Till, Walter 1955: Die gnostischen Schriften des koptischen Papyrus Berolinensis 8502. Herausgegeben, übersetzt und bearbeitet von Walter Till. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur; 60 (= V. Reihe, Band 5). Berlin.
- Von Tischendorf, Konstantin 1966: Apocalypses Apocryphae Mosis, Esdrae, Pauli, Iohannis, item Mariae dormitio, additis Evangeliorum et actuum Apocryphorum supplementis. Reprografischer Nachdruck der Ausgabe Leipzig 1866. Hildesheim.
- Todd, Robert B. 1973: "The Stoic Common Notions: A Re-Examination and Reinterpretation." Symbolae Osloenses. Auspiciis societatis graeco-latinae; fasc. XLVIII. Oslo, 47–75.
- Tonneau, Raymond M. 1949: Les homélies catéchétiques de Théodore de Mopsueste. Reproduction phototypique du Ms. Mingana Syr. 561 (Selly Oak Colleges' Library, Birmingham). Traduction, introduction, index par Raymond Tonneau en collaboration avec Robert Devresse. Vatican City.

- 1953: "Théodore de Mopsueste. Interprétation (du Livre) de la Genèse (Vat. Syr. 120, ff. I–V)." Le Muséon. Revue d'études orientales; LXVI. Louvain, 45–64.
- 1955: Sancti Ephraem Syri In Genesim et In Exodum Commentarii edidit R.M. Tonneau. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 152. Scriptores Syri; 71. Louvain.
- Traube, Ludwig 1903: "Acta Archelai. Vorbemerkung zu einer neuen Ausgabe." Sitzungsberichte der königlichen bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu München; Phil.-Hist. Klasse 1903. Munich, 533–49.
- Trimingham, J. Spencer 1979: Christianity Among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times. Arab background series. London and Beirut.
- Trombley, Frank R. 1993: Hellenic Religion and Christianization. C. 370–529. 1. Religions in the Graeco-Roman World; 115/1. Leiden.
- 1994: Hellenic Religion and Christianization. C. 370–529. 2. Religions in the Graeco-Roman World; 115/2. Leiden.
- Trumbower, Jeffrey A. 1989: "Origen's Exegesis of John 8:19–53: The Struggle with Heracleon over the Idea of Fixed Natures." Vigiliae Christianae. A review of early christian life and language; 43. Leiden, 138–54.
- 1992: Born from Above. The Anthropology of the Gospel of John. Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie; 29. Tübingen.
- Tubach, Jürgen 1995: "Nochmals Addas-Adeimantos." Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik; 106. Bonn, 170–74.
- Turmel, Joseph 1931: Histoire des dogmes; I. Le péché originel. La rédemption. Paris.
- Turner, C.H. 1915: "Notes on the Apostolic Constitutions. I. The Compiler an Arian." The Journal of Theological Studies; XVI. Oxford, 54–61.
- Van Unnik, Willem Cornelis 1971: "ΑΦΘΟΝΩΣ ΜΕΤΑΔΙΔΩΜΙ." Mededelingen van de Koninklijke Vlaamse Academie voor Wetenschappen, Letteren en Schone Kunsten van België. Klasse der Letteren; Jaargang XXXIII, Nr. 4. Brussels.
- 1972: "Der Neid in der Paradiesgeschichte nach einigen gnostischen Texten." Essays on the Nag Hammadi Texts in Honour of Alexander Böhlig. Edited by Martin Krause. Nag Hammadi Studies; III. Leiden, 120–32.
- 1973: "De ἀφθονία van God in de oudchristelijke literatuur." Mededelingen der Koninklijke Nederlandse Akademie van Wetenschappen, Afd. Letterkunde; Nieuwe Reeks; Deel 36, No. 2. Amsterdam, 15–71.
- Vailhé, Siméon 1898–99: "La province ecclésiastique d'Arabie." Échos d'Orient; 2. Paris, 166–79.
- Vallée, Gérard 1981: A Study in Anti-Gnostic Polemics: Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius. Studies in Christianity and Judaism/Etudes sur le christianisme et le judaïsme; 1. Waterloo and Ontario.
- Verheijen, Lucas 1981: Sancti Augustini Confessionum libri XIII. Edidit Lucas Verheijen. Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina; XXVII. Sancti Augustini Opera. Pars I, I. Turnhout.
- Vermes, Mark 2001: Hegemonius Acta Archelai (The Acts of Archelaus). Translated by Mark Vermes with introduction and commentary by Samuel N.C. Lieu with the assistance of Kevin Kaatz. Manichaean Studies; IV. Louvain.
- Viciano, Alberto 1992: "Theodoret von Kyros und der Manichäismus in seinem Kommentar zu den Paulusbriefen." Studia Manichaica. II. Internationaler Kongress zum Manichäismus. 6.–10. August 1989 St. Augustin/Bonn. Herausgegeben von Gernot Wießner und Hans-Joachim Klimkeit. Studies in Oriental Religions; 23. Wiesbaden, 198–212.
- 1996: "Das formale Verfahren der antiochenischen Schriftauslegung. Ein Forschungsüberblick." Stimuli. Exegese und ihre Hermeneutik in Antike und Christentum. Festschrift für Ernst Dassmann. Herausgegeben von Georg Schöllgen und Clemens Scholten. Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum. Ergänzungsband; 23. Münster, 370–405.

- Villey, André 1985: Alexandre de Lycopolis. Contre la doctrine de Mani. Sources Gnostiques et Manichéennes; 2. Paris.
- Vööbus, Arthur 1964: "Regarding the Theological Anthropology of Theodore of Mopsuestia." Church History; 33. Chicago, 115–24.
- 1965: History of the School of Nisibis. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium; 266. Subsidia; 26. Louvain.
- Vogt, Hermann J. 1990: Origenes, Der Kommentar zum Evangelium nach Mattäus. Eingeleitet, übersetzt und mit Anmerkungen versehen von Hermann J. Vogt. Zweiter Teil. Bibliothek der griechischen Literatur; 30. Stuttgart.
- Vosté, J.M. 1925: "La chronologie de l'activité littéraire de Théodore de Mopsueste." Revue biblique; 34. Paris, 54–81.
- Vramming, Ylva 1983: Anathema. En vändpunkt i den manikeisk-kristna troskonfrontationen. Bollnäs.
- Walch, Christian Wilhelm Franz 1762: Entwurf einer vollständigen Historie der Ketzereien, Spaltungen und Religionsstreitigkeiten, bis auf die Zeiten der Reformation. Erster Theil. Leipzig.
- Waldschmidt, Ernst and Lentz, Wolfgang 1926: "Die Stellung Jesu im Manichäismus." Abhandlungen der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften; Jahrgang 1926, Philosophisch-historische Klasse, Nr. 4. Berlin.
- Waldstein, Michael and Wisse, Frederik 1995: The Apocryphon of John. Synopsis of Nag Hammadi Codices II,1; III,1; and IV,1 with BG 8502,2. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XXXIII. Leiden.
- Wallace-Hadrill, D.S. 1982: Christian Antioch. A study of early Christian thought in the East. Cambridge.
- Walsh, James and Walsh, P.G. 1985: Divine Providence & Human Suffering. Message of the Fathers of the Church; 17. Wilmington (Delaware).
- Ware, Kallistos T. 1989: "The Meaning of 'Pathos' in Abba Isaias and Theodoret of Cyrus." Studia Patristica; XX. Papers presented to the Tenth International Conference on Patristic Studies held in Oxford 1987. Critica, Classica, Orientalia, Ascetica, Liturgica. Edited by Elizabeth A. Livingstone. Louvain, 315–22.
- Warren, Edward W. 1975: Porphyry the Phoenician: Isagoge. Translation, Introduction and Notes by Edward W. Warren. Mediaeval sources in translation; 16. Toronto.
- Waszink, Jan Hendrik 1947: Quinti Septimi Florentis Tertulliani, De Anima. Edited with Introduction and Commentary by J.H. Waszink. Amsterdam.
- 1963: "Some Observations on the Appreciation of 'The Philosophy of the Barbarians' in Early Christian Literature." Mélanges offerts à Mademoiselle Christine Mohrmann. Utrecht and Antwerp, 41–56.
- Weber, Dorothea 1998: Sancti Augustini opera. De Genesi contra Manichaeos. Edited Dorothea Weber. Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum; XCI. Vienna.
- 2001: "Augustinus, De Genesi contra Manichaeos. Zu Augustins Darstellung und Widerlegung der manichäischen Kritik am biblischen Schöpfungsbericht." Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West. Proceedings of the Fribourg-Utrecht Symposium of the International Association of Manichaean Studies (IAMS). Edited by Johannes van Oort, Otto Wermelinger, and Gregor Wurst. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XLIX. Leiden, 298–306.
- Webster, T.B.L. 1933: "[Review of] The Jealousy of the Gods and Criminal Law at Athens. I. By Svend Ranulf. London and Copenhagen 1933." The Journal of Hellenic Studies; 53. London, 327.
- 1934: "[Review of] The Jealousy of the Gods and Criminal Law at Athens. II. By Svend Ranulf. London and Copenhagen 1933." The Journal of Hellenic Studies; 54. London, 223.
- Weis, Bertold K. 1973: Julian. Briefe. Griechisch-deutsch ed. Bertold K. Weis. Munich.
- Weis, Heinz-Gerhard 1968: "Diodor von Tarsus, Περὶ προνοίας." Paul de Lagarde und die syrische Kirchengeschichte, mit einem Geleitwort von Hermann Dörries herausgegeben vom Göttinger Arbeitskreis für syrische Kirchengeschichte. Göttingen, 217–30.

- Wendland, Paul 1916: Hippolytus. Werke. III. Refutatio omnium haeresium. Herausgegeben von Paul Wendland. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte; 26. Leipzig.
- Wendt, H.H. 1882: Die christliche Lehre von der menschlichen Vollkommenheit. Göttingen.
- Whittaker, John 1969: “Ἐπέκεινα νοῦ καὶ οὐσίας.” Vigiliae Christianae; 23. Amsterdam, 91–104.
- Whittaker, John and Louis, Pierre 1990: Alcinoos, Enseignement des doctrines de Platon. Introduction, texte établi et commenté par John Whittaker, et traduit par Pierre Louis. Collection des universités de France. Publiée sous le patronage de l'Association Guillaume Budé. Paris.
- Wickert, Ulrich 1962: Studien zu den Pauluskommentaren Theodors von Mopsuestia als Beitrag zum Verständnis der antiochenischen Theologie. Beiheft zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche; 27. Berlin.
- Widengren, Geo 1961: Mani und der Manichäismus. Urban-Bücher. Die wissenschaftliche Taschenbuchreihe; 57. Stuttgart.
- 1978: “Der Manichäismus. Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Problemforschung.” Gnosis. Festschrift für Hans Jonas. Herausgegeben von Barbara Aland. Göttingen, 278–315.
- Widmann, Martin 1957: “Irenäus und seine theologischen Väter.” Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche; 54. Jahrgang. Tübingen, 156–73.
- Wiles, M.F. 1989: “The Theology of Eusebius of Emesa.” Studia Patristica; XIX. Papers presented to the Tenth International Conference on Patristic Studies held in Oxford 1987. Historica, Theologica, Gnostica, Biblica et Apocrypha. Edited by Elizabeth A. Livingstone. Louvain, 267–80.
- Willems, R. 1954: Carmen adversus Marcionem. Cura et studio R. Willems. Quinti Septimi Florentis Tertulliani Opera. Pars II. Opera montanistica. Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina; II. Turnhout, 1417–54.
- Williams, Frank 1987: The Panarion of Epiphanius of Salamis. Translated by Frank Williams. Book I (Sects 1–46). Nag Hammadi Studies; 35. Leiden.
- 1994: The Panarion of Epiphanius of Salamis. Translated by Frank Williams. Books II and III (Sects 47–80, De Fide). Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; 36. Leiden.
- Williams, Michael Allen 1996: Rethinking “Gnosticism”. An Argument for dismantling a Dubious Category. Princeton.
- Williams, Norman Powell 1927: The Ideas of the Fall and of Original Sin. A historical and critical study being eight lectures delivered before the University of Oxford, in the year 1924, on the foundation of the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury. London.
- Williams, Rowan 1989: “Does it make sense to speak of pre-Nicene orthodoxy?” The making of orthodoxy. Essays in honour of Henry Chadwick. Edited by Rowan Williams. Cambridge, 1–23.
- Van Winden, J.C.M. 1971: An Early Christian Philosopher. Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho Chapters one to nine. Philosophia patrum. Interpretations of Patristic Texts; I. Leiden.
- Wingren, Gustaf 1947: Människan och inkarnationen enligt Irenaeus. Lund.
- Witt, R.E. 1971: Albinus and the History of Middle Platonism. Cambridge Classical Studies. (Unchanged Reprint of the Edition of 1937). Amsterdam.
- Woltmann, Jörg 1971: “Der geschichtliche Hintergrund der Lehre Markions vom ‘fremden Gott.’” Wegzeichen. Festgabe zum 60. Geburtstag von Prof. Dr. Hermenegild M. Biedermann herausgegeben von Ernst Chr. Suttner und Coelestin Patock. Das östliche Christentum; NF, Heft 25. Würzburg, 15–42.
- Wright, W. 1871: Catalogue of the Syriac manuscripts in the British Museum acquired since the year 1838. Part II. London.
- Wright, Wilmer Cave 1923: The Works of the Emperor Julian with an English Translation

- by Wilmer Cave Wright. III. The Loeb Classical Library; 157. London and Cambridge (Massachusetts).
- Wurst, Gregor 1995: Das Bemafest der ägyptischen Manichäer. Arbeiten zum spätantiken und koptischen Ägypten; 8. Altenberge.
- 1996: Die Bema-Psalmen. Psalm Book Part II, fasc. 1. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum. Series Coptica; I. Liber Psalmorum. Part II, fasc. 1. Turnhout.
- 2001: “Bemerkungen zu Struktur und genus litterarium der Capitula des Faustus von Mileve.” Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West. Proceedings of the Fribourg-Utrecht Symposium of the International Association of Manichaean Studies (IAMS). Edited by Johannes van Oort, Otto Wermelinger, and Gregor Wurst. Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies; XLIX. Leiden, 307–24.
- Wyrwa, Dietmar 1983: Die christliche Platonaneignung in den Stromateis des Clemens von Alexandrien. Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte; 53. Berlin.
- Zacher, A. 1961: De Genesi contra Manichaeos, libri duo. Ein Versuch Augustins, die ersten drei Kapitel von Genesis zu erklären und zu verteidigen. Dissertatio ad lauream in Facultate theologica, Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana. Rome (unpublished).
- Zahn, Theodor 1892: Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Kanons. Zweiter Band: Urkunden und Belege zum ersten und dritten Band. Zweite Hälfte. Erlangen and Leipzig.
- Von Zittwitz, Heinrich 1873: “Acta disputationis Archelai et Manetis, nach ihrem Umfang, ihren Quellen und ihrem Werthe untersucht.” Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie. Hamburg, 467–528.
- Zycha, Joseph 1891: Sancti Aureli Augustini De utilitate credendi, De duabus animabus, Contra Fortunatum, Contra Adimantum, Contra Epistulam Fundamenti, Contra Faustum. Recensuit Iosephus Zycha. Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum; XXV (Sect. VI Pars 1). Vienna.
- 1892: Sancti Aureli Augustini Contra Felicem, De natura boni, Epistula Secundini, Contra Secundinum, accedunt Euodii De fide contra Manichaeos, et Commonitorium Augustini quod fertur praefatione utriusque partis praemissa. Recensuit Iosephus Zycha. Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum; XXV (Sect. VI Pars 2). Vienna.

Further titles arranged alphabetically

Die Handschriften in Göttingen, Universitäts-Bibliothek (Verzeichniss der Handschriften im preussischen Staate; I. Hannover, 3. Göttingen 3). Berlin 1894.

Patrologiæ cursus completus omnium SS. patrum, doctorum scriptorumque ecclesiasticorum. Series Graeca. Accurante J.-P. Migne. Turnhout (Paris): PG.

PG 18, 1857:

Titus Bostrensis episcopus,

Notitia 1065B–1068D

Adversus Manichaeos 1069A–1258C

Supplementa e Parallellis Damascenicis

Rupefucaldinis 1257D–1264A

Oratio in ramos palmarum 1263B–1278B

PG 25, 1884:

Athanasius Alexandrinus archiepiscopus (tom. 1),

Epistola de Decretis Nicæne Synodi 415A–476C

Epistola ad Episcopos Ægypti et Libyæ 537A–594A

PG 26, 1887:

Athanasius Alexandrinus archiepiscopus (tom. 2),

Oratio I contra Arianos 11A–146C

Oratio II contra Arianos 145D–322A

Oratio III contra Arianos 321B–468A

- Epistola de Synodis* 681A–794A
Epistola ad Afros Episcopos 1029A–1048C
 PG 28, 1887:
 Athanasius Alexandrinus archiepiscopus (tom. 4), spuria,
Sermo contra omnes hereses 501A–524C
 PG 31, 1885:
 Sanctus Basilius Magnus, Cæsariensis archiepiscopus (tom. 2),
De jejuniis. Homilia I 163A–184D
Homilia. Quod Deus non est auctor malorum 329A–354A
 PG 39, 1858:
 Didymus Alexandrinus,
Contra Manichæos 1085C–1110A
 PG 45, 1863:
 S. Gregorius, Nyssenus episcopus (tom. 2),
Oratio catechetica magna 10A–106C
 PG 53, 1862:
 S. Ioannes Chrysostomus (tom. 7),
Homiliae in Genesim,
In cap. II. Genes. Homilia XVI 125–134
 PG 58, 1862:
 S. Ioannes Chrysostomus (tom. 12),
In Mattheum. Homilia LX 573–584
 PG 60, 1862:
 S. Ioannes Chrysostomus (tom. 14 sive 9),
Commentarius in Epistolam ad Romanos. Homilia X 473–484
Commentarius in Epistolam ad Romanos. Homilia XII 493–508
 PG 66, 1869:
 Theodorus Mopsuestenus haereticus
Fragmenta in Genesim 633A–646D
 PG 80, 1864:
 Theodoretus Cyrensis episcopus (tom. 1),
Questiones in Octateuchum 75A–858 (in Genesim 75A–226B)
 PG 83, 1864:
 Theodoretus Cyrensis episcopus (tom. 4),
Hereticarum fabularum compendium 339C–556A
 PG 87,1, 1860:
 Procopius Gazæus,
Commentarii in Genesim 21A–511C
 PG 96, 1891:
 S. Ioannes Damascenus,
Excerpta ex Paralleliis Rupefucaldinis 441A–544D
 PG 126, 1866 igne destructus,
 Pseudo-Titus Bostrensis episcopus,
Commentarius in Lucan 777–895
 Cf. also indices to PG: Cavallera 1912, Hopfner 1936
- Patrologiæ cursus completus omnium SS. patrum, doctorum scriptorumque ecclesiasticorum. Series Latina. Accurante J.-P. Migne. Turnhout (Paris): PL.
 PL 23,
 S. Eusebius Hieronymus, Stridonensis presbyter (tom. 2), Dialogus contra Pelagianos 517A–618B
- Pauly—Wissowa XI,2: Pauly's Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaften. Neue Bearbeitung begonnen von Georg Wissowa. Unter Mitwirkung zahlreicher Fachgenossen herausgegeben von Wilhelm Kroll; XI,2. Stuttgart 1922.

Pauly—Wissowa Suppl. IV: Paulys Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaften. Neue Bearbeitung begonnen von Georg Wissowa. Unter Mitwirkung zahlreicher Fachgenossen herausgegeben von Wilhelm Kroll; Suppl. IV. Stuttgart 1924.

Philologica hamburgensia. Für die Mitglieder der 48. Versammlung deutscher Philologen und Schulmänner ausgestellt von der Stadtbibliothek zu Hamburg. Hamburg 1905.

The Oxford English Dictionary. Second Edition. I. Oxford 1989.

The Oxford English Dictionary. Second Edition. V. Oxford 1989.

The Oxford English Dictionary. Second Edition. VI. Oxford 1989.

The Oxford English Dictionary. Second Edition. VIII. Oxford 1989.

Τίτος Βόστρων—Θεόδωρος Ἡρακλείας—Ἀλέξανδρος Λυκοπόλεως—Εὐσέβιος Καισαρείας (μέρος Α'). Βιβλιοθήκη Ἑλλήνων Πατέρων καὶ Ἐκκλησιαστικῶν Συγγραφέων; XIX. Ἔκδοσις τῆς Ἀποστολικῆς Διακονίας τῆς Ἐκκλησίας τῆς Ἑλλάδος. Athens 1959.

GENERAL INDEX

- Academy, Old 269, 270, 314
sceptical Academy 218
- accident (συμβεβηκός), accidental 28,
101, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268,
269, 276, 279, 297, 298, 302, 304,
312, 340, 429, 430
separable and inseparable accident
(and quality) 266, 268, 279, 430
- accusations (against Creator or Creation) 25, 27, 28, 30, 32, 33,
41, 42, 44, 63, 172, 175, 202, 207,
225, 229, 244, 248, 249, 250, 294,
314, 389, 404
- activities (of the soul) 301, 302, 306, 314, 438, 446
- adamantine wall 19, 152
- Adversus Marcionem*, lost writing by Theophilus 218, 219, 356
- aeon(s) 11, 242
- Ages, two (κατάστασεις) (or “states”)
97, 101, 392, 394, 395, 396, 404,
405, 406, 411, 412
- Albigenses, Cathars 72, 73, 78
- Alexandrian School 92, 96, 97, 145,
285, 289, 336, 348, 418–19
- allegory, allegorical 62, 76, 92, 153,
209–10, 212, 213, 214, 237, 240,
241, 336, 337
- allowance, permission (of God or Providence) 26, 27, 30, 32, 33, 37,
38, 41, 42, 45, 48, 49, 52, 58, 59,
62, 152, 222, 228, 238, 252, 274,
320, 332, 344, 347, 352, 377, 386,
413, 448, 451, 452
- angels 20, 54, 200, 221, 267, 273,
308, 386, 434
Angel of Fire (acc. to Apelles) 221
Satan as fallen angel 163–64, 233 serpent as angel of goodness, see serpent
- anger (of God) 27, 35, 43, 338, 401, 412
- anthropomorphic, anthropomorphisms
212, 248, 260, 268
- anti-Arian, see Arian(s)
- Antidicomarians 127
- Antitheses*, lost writing by Marcion 182, 218, 253, 254
- Antioch 3, 122, 123, 125, 137, 250, 346, 418, 419
see also synod(s)
- Antiochene School 6, 14, 16, 92,
93, 94, 97, 100, 120, 141, 143–45,
153, 158, 257, 331, 336, 366–419,
423
- Arabia (Roman province) 2, 14, 15,
120–27, 158, 161, 162, 216, 248,
250, 255, 420, 423
- archon(s) (of matter) 19, 32, 35, 36,
43, 50, 51, 55, 168, 189, 190, 194,
195, 196, 207, 230, 232, 330, 459, 460
- Archontics 233
- Arian(s), Arianism 13, 130, 134, 137, 140, 143, 264, 415, 417, 418
anti-Arian 275
Arian or Trinitarian controversies
14, 47, 90, 142, 143
Neo-Arians 418
- Aristotelian, Aristotelianism 92, 93,
94, 97, 101, 108, 255, 262, 263,
266, 267, 269, 270, 274, 276, 277,
278, 279, 283, 306, 365, 398, 421, 443
- Ašaq̄lon 195
- ascetic(s), asceticism 39, 55, 175, 205, 323, 351
- astrology, astrological 94, 173, 175
- Atlas 19, 168
- Audians 127
- auditor (Manichaean) 173
- Augustus theology, see political theology
- Āz 192
- Baptist, baptising sect, see Elchasaites
- barbarian(s), barbarism 4, 15, 46, 53,
57, 131, 149, 160, 166, 167, 168,
169, 170, 171, 177, 188, 204, 256,
257, 421, 426, 428, 469
- Bardesanites 7, 102, 140, 142, 144,
165, 239

- beautiful (καλός) (as used by Titus)
24, 60, 302–4, 441–42
- begrudge, see jealousy
- Bible, see Scriptures
- body (human) 19, 21, 26, 28, 32, 37,
43, 46, 53, 54, 55, 62, 91, 93, 174,
175, 189, 195, 235, 298, 300, 302,
309, 311, 315–17, 343, 344, 346,
348, 350, 351, 357, 360, 361, 362,
371, 381, 382, 389, 395, 396, 397,
413, 414, 432, 434, 435, 438, 451,
470, 471, 471, 472, 473
as instrument (ἔργαλειον, ὄργανον) 53, 54, 63, 315 body of death 62, 346, 470 body of sin 382, 389
of Christ 52, 54, 55, 134, 200
see also incarnation resurrected body 63, 298, 316–17, 351, 405, 471, 472
flesh 63, 64
flesh (of man) 19, 22, 40, 42, 63, 80, 181, 184, 311, 316, 337, 351,
356, 362, 376, 381, 382, 390,
400, 432, 471, 472, 473 flesh (of Christ) 59, 62, 65, 115
- Bogomils 68
- Bostra (Βουστρά, Βοστρορα) 3–4, 82,
120–27, 160, 172, 251, 258, 318,
346
- The Bushel* (Μόδιος), lost writing by Adda 138, 179, 379
- Calvinists 71, 73
see also Reformed
- canon law 284
- Cappadocians 96, 97 256
- Cathars, see Albigenses
- Catholic(s), Catholic Church,
Catholicism 2–4, 6, 10–11, 12–13,
17, 46, 47, 129–30, 155, 159, 162,
427
Roman Catholic 13, 66, 69, 73, 74, 99
see also great Church, majority Church, orthodox
- choice(s) 21, 24, 28, 57, 60, 62, 265,
302, 303, 308, 309, 313, 317, 328,
338, 347, 370, 390, 402, 422, 438, 442, 445, 446, 449, 455 freedom of (ἀντεξούσιον and similar terms) 37, 60, 140,
144, 173, 175, 288, 303, 325,
326, 328, 335, 338, 339, 350,
373, 377, 383, 390, 391, 402, 403, 422
see also will
- Christ, Christology, see Jesus Christ
- Church history, Church historian(s),
Church historiography 2, 13, 73,
74, 76, 77, 78
ancient 418 history of theology 2
- circumcised, circumcision (of Christ)
54, 202
- Collyridians 127
- Column of Glory 195
- commanding (organ of the soul)
(τὸ ἡγεμονικόν), governing (element)
21–22, 282, 306–7
- common concepts (κοινὰ ἔννοιαι), natural concepts 2, 3, 15, 17, 18, 42, 61, 104, 159, 167, 190, 261,
280–97, 311, 318, 421, 427, 428, 431, 458, 470
common opinion (κοινὴ δόξα) 281,
290, 295, 296, 345, 452
- composed, composition, see mix
- compound, compounded, see mix
- concupiscentia 96–97, 98, 175
- consequence (logical) (ἀκολουθία) 290, 291, 292, 294, 295, 296, 297, 428
- contemplation 308, 370, 397
- Contra Chald.*, lost writing by Diodore of Tarsus 140
- contrary (-ies), contrariety 33, 264,
266, 269, 300, 301, 311, 312, 313,
429, 430, 436, 437, 438, 446, 454 opposite(s) 18, 19, 20, 21, 24, 25, 29, 52, 60, 64, 236, 262, 265,
269, 290, 291, 305, 316, 329,
372, 373, 427, 428
- Counter-Reformation, see Reformation
- creatio ex nihilo 275–76, 298–99
- Creation, created or originated
(γένητος) things 2, 17, 18, 19, 23,
25, 28, 30, 31, 33, 35, 36, 52, 54,
55, 56, 57, 60, 61, 135, 136, 172,
202, 227, 260, 266, 267, 268,
273–76, 277, 284, 285, 293, 294,
297, 298, 312, 314, 322, 324, 327,
328, 330, 349, 386, 392, 397, 398,
421, 462, 470
- Creator 5, 23, 24, 25, 29, 30, 32, 33,
36, 41, 54, 57, 84, 159, 172, 207,
215, 216, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223,
224, 225, 226, 228, 229, 230, 231,
232, 233, 234, 236, 243, 244, 246,

- 248, 249, 250, 251, 255, 267, 270, 272, 276, 280, 302, 320, 323, 335, 336, 340, 342, 349, 350, 353, 354, 359, 382, 458, 463, 466
- Manichaean Creator of the world
19, 21, 22, 33, 36, 187, 207, 208, 432–33
- See also Demiurge, Living Spirit
- Manichaean creator(s) of man 22, 35, 36, 55, 80, 84, 85, 181, 190, 192, 197, 206, 207, 208, 225, 241, 242, 322, 461
- See also archon(s)
- Cross of Light 239
- death (natural, physical) 26, 27, 28, 30, 38, 39, 42, 62, 96, 98, 99, 141, 222, 231, 232, 296, 298, 314, 323, 328, 331, 332, 335, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 363, 371, 372, 373, 376, 377, 378, 379, 382, 386, 387, 389, 390, 391, 392, 394, 395, 396, 401, 402, 405, 409, 410, 412, 413, 414, 422, 447, 448–49, 451–52, 453, 453–54, 454, 464, 465, 466, 470
- body of death, see body
- “dead to life”, death to sin, mortification 347, 348, 357, 448–49
- death as benefaction 27, 28, 30, 38, 42, 91, 162, 296, 335, 343, 344, 345, 346, 349, 351, 352, 355, 356, 358, 363, 366, 378, 388, 389, 391, 402, 405, 422, 451–52, 453–54, 465
- death as purification 355, 356, 357, 358, 371, 375, 378, 382, 389
- death in baptism 389, 391
- death of condemnation 62, 346, 347, 349, 470
- death of the soul 99, 330, 348, 349, 361
- Death personified in Gnostic mythology 231
- mortality 15, 37, 40, 305, 327, 347, 350, 351, 352, 357, 358, 359, 360, 378, 381, 382, 383, 388, 389, 390, 392, 394, 395, 400, 402, 406, 411, 412, 448, 464, 468, 473
- Tree of Death, see tree
- De censu animae*, lost writing by Hermogenes 219
- definition (ὄρος, ὀρισμός) 93, 262, 263, 266
- deification 31, 397
- Demiurge (δημιουργός) 105, 226, 227, 270, 276
- Gnostic 214
- Manichaean 187
- demon(s), demonic, evil spirits 20, 43, 44, 52, 55, 57, 58, 72, 85, 192, 195, 198, 285, 310, 312
- demonic forces in body 174
- see also archon(s), Devil
- description (ὑπογραφή) 262, 263, 279, 290, 427–28
- determinism, determinist(s) 141, 144, 145, 309, 352
- about Bardesanites 144
- about Manichaeans 15, 91, 140, 142, 171–76, 199, 260, 307–8, 330, 421, 422
- about Stoics 173, 174
- about Valentinians 140, 145, 173
- fate, fatalism 26, 53, 91, 96, 140, 144, 173, 174, 221
- necessity (ἀνάγκη) (of nature) 17, 19, 20, 29, 36, 56, 57, 62, 63, 276, 325, 328, 338, 340, 398
- see also astrology
- develop, see education
- Devil, Satan 41, 44, 52, 57, 58, 59, 60, 63, 64, 115, 163–64, 228, 231, 232, 233, 235, 241, 242, 246, 303, 304, 309, 312, 314, 346, 348, 350, 354, 357, 374, 375, 377, 378, 380, 403, 412, 457, 458
- Diatessaron* 83, 143
- difference (διαφορά) 263
- dispensation(s), economy (οἰκονομία) (of God) 26, 34, 38, 41, 49, 64, 321, 327, 328, 337, 338, 340, 465, 466
- governance (of God) 25
- plan(s) (of God) 58, 320, 327, 328, 329, 331, 334, 336, 337, 338, 342, 377, 394, 401, 417, 419, 421, 422
- disposition (διάθεσις and similar terms) 26, 46, 265, 344, 374
- divorce 48
- docetic, docetism 136, 200, 408
- see also body and flesh (of Christ), incarnation

- Donatists 13
doxographical 107, 147, 257, 258, 278 dualism, dualistic 7, 12, 55, 74, 84, 96, 98, 103, 104, 130, 141, 148, 149, 160, 171, 199, 202, 205, 252, 257, 292, 338, 369, 397 earth (of goodness) 19, 20, 21, 23, 64
Ebionites 122, 127
eclecticism, eclectic 102, 106, 107, 108, 220 economy, see dispensation(s)
Edessa 112
 School of Edessa 112 education, educational, educative 29, 33, 71, 334, 390, 396, 400, 402, 414, 421, 446 develop, development, (ethical) 5, 287, 293, 294, 329, 331, 332, 333, 336, 337, 342, 359, 360, 370, 371, 392, 393, 404, 422 growth 41, 48, 333, 337, 359, 370, 388, 392 progress 15, 50, 96, 326, 334, 360, 377, 402, 406, 422 train, training 21, 24, 25, 32, 48, 126, 317, 318, 323, 373, 374, 383, 390, 399, 402, 441
Elchasaites, Elkesaites, Baptists 122, 127 baptising sect, Baptist 7, 129 Elect (Manichaean) 60, 175 election (of God) 60, 402 element(s) 31, 33, 65, 102, 174, 239, 305, 414
Elkesaites, see Elchasaites
Encratite(s) 98, 99, 330, 408
Enlightenment 71, 73, 74, 90, 125 envy, envious, see jealousy
Epicurean(s) 219, 220, 260, 287, 354, 389
“Erbübellehre”, see sin
“Erbunheil”, see sin
“Erbverderbnislehre”, see sin eschatology, eschatological 60, 81, 320, 356, 357, 400, 402, 405
 Manichaean 22, 198, 218
essence (Aristotelian concept) 303, 441–43 fable(s), fabulate, fabrication 23, 52, 55, 63, 167, 168, 169, 188, 192, 221, 249, 289, 292 faculty (-ies) (δύναμις and similar terms) (of the soul) 236, 305, 306, 307, 325, 332, 311, 397, 445, 446 faculty to discriminate 374, 380, 398, 399, 406 reasoning (faculty) (τὸ λογιστικόν and similar terms) 310, 337, 438, 439, 442 faith 45, 61, 62, 64, 286, 293–94, 297, 364–65, 470 fast 32, 136, 323
fate, fatalism, see determinism
Fall (of Man) 3, 5, 15, 76, 91, 98, 99, 215, 243, 321, 329, 330, 331, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 341, 342, 358, 360, 361, 363, 370, 371, 375, 378, 379, 381, 390, 392, 393, 394, 406, 409, 412, 416, 421, 422
Father of Greatness 11, 187, 197, 242
First Man, see Primal Man flesh, see body foreknowledge (πρόγνωσις), anticipate 4, 35, 37, 38, 41, 49, 51, 58, 64, 197, 208, 212, 216, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 241, 242, 244, 245, 251, 326, 327, 328, 330, 331, 332, 334, 335, 336, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 351, 352, 357, 366, 376, 377, 382, 389, 390, 391, 396, 401, 402, 403, 417, 419, 421, 464, 465 fusion, see mix futura contingētia 403
gentiles, see pagans genus (γένος) 263, 264, 429, 435
‘globe’ (βῶλος) 22–23
Gnosis, Gnostic(s), Gnosticism 6, 7, 8, 10, 15, 76, 81, 84, 91, 96, 105, 106, 135, 137, 147, 148, 173, 190, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 217, 225, 231, 232, 233, 234, 236, 238, 239, 240, 243, 244, 248, 249, 251, 254, 286, 320, 325, 339, 409, 422 gospel(s) 34, 53, 54, 55, 56, 62, 66, 82, 183, 184, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 205, 468 governance (of God), see dispensation(s) governing (element), see commanding (organ of the soul) grace, “Gnade” 27, 29, 61, 62, 70, 71, 95, 100, 347, 361, 364, 365, 376, 448 great Church (“Großkirche”) 12

- Greek(s), Hellenes, Greekness 46, 50, 53, 124, 125, 160, 161, 162, 169, 226–28, 458 growth, see education grudge, see jealousy
- habit(s), state (ἔξις) 5, 25, 29, 61, 62, 264–65, 269, 279, 298, 302, 317, 318, 351, 364, 429, 444
- Ḥawrān 120, 121, 123
- heart 62, 307
- Hellenes, see Greek(s)
- heresiology, heresiological, heresiologists, heresiographers 67, 69, 72, 120, 129, 130, 135, 136, 139, 140, 141, 146, 147, 153, 157, 158, 165, 168, 171, 173, 178, 179, 184, 200, 204, 209, 210, 215, 223, 232, 234, 235, 251, 262, 289, 354, 408, 409, 420
- heresy (-ies), heretics, heretical 2, 5, 6, 8, 12, 13, 17, 34, 46, 47, 48, 50, 51, 53, 54, 59, 68, 69, 71, 72, 73, 74, 90, 98, 122, 127, 129, 130, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 140, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 153, 156, 165, 167, 184, 197, 200, 206, 209, 214, 220, 223, 224, 235, 239, 248, 251, 252, 253, 260, 289, 290, 309, 353, 354, 364, 369, 374, 376, 380, 381, 397, 403, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 422, 423
- History of Religions, Comparative Religions 76, 105
- History of Religions School 6, 76, 81
- history of theology, see Church history
- Holy Spirit 51, 52, 53, 60, 64, 143, 168, 286
- homogeneous (μονοειδής) 21, 31, 300, 305, 435, 438
- homonym(s) 262, 263, 278
- Huguenot 72, 73
- idea(s) (Platonic) 226, 269–70, 271, 272, 273
- idealism, German 74
- idols, idolaters, idolatry (-ies) 52, 57, 64, 126, 162, 163, 188, 273
- ignorance (ἄγνοια) (of Creator), ignorant (Creator) 5, 24, 84, 196, 206, 208, 213, 216, 223, 224, 232, 243, 244, 249, 250, 326, 330, 335, 342, 350, 381, 397, 461
- image (εἰκόν) of God (in man), κατ' εἰκόνα 24, 36, 40, 100, 160, 219, 284, 286, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 341, 346, 369, 370, 371, 372, 379, 393, 397, 443, 463
 in Manichaeism 192
- immutability, immutable (of God) 24, 60, 325, 326, 329, 337, 340, 342, 357, 376, 381, 419, 422 of Creation 57
 of soul 299, 302, 438
 eschatological 386, 393, 394, 402
- immortality, immortal 228, 345, 351, 355, 356, 357, 382, 405, 453 immortality of God 268 immortality of soul 55, 93, 268, 298, 299, 348, 350, 360, 370, 397, 400, 405 immortality in relation to sin 348 original immortality of Adam 3, 5, 35, 206, 228, 232, 250, 327, 331, 334, 342, 343, 359, 360, 361, 363, 371, 372, 375, 376, 378, 381, 382, 385, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 397, 401, 406, 407, 411, 412, 413, 414, 461, 462, 465, 467, 468
 eschatological 346, 355, 357, 379, 386, 393, 400, 402, 412
- impassibility, impassible 386, 402
 of Christ 134, 136
 of God 337, 376, 381
 of soul 305
- incarnation 51, 54, 181, 186, 204, 205, 285, 320, 341, 342, 407, 422
 see also body and flesh (of Christ)
- incorruptibility, incorruptible 334, 343, 346, 361, 375, 376, 386, 402, 473
 (of God) 287
 incorruption, incorruptible 292, 431
- incorporeal 21, 32, 45, 59, 267, 277, 314, 435 incorporeal generation of Christ 53
 of God 104, 267, 277
 of soul 299, 301, 438
- inseparable (accident and quality), see accident
- intention (πρόθεσις and similar terms) 21, 24, 29, 39, 44, 57, 265, 307, 313, 325, 407, 413, 446, 451, 454, 467 see also purpose, will
- intercessor, see Paraclete
- intermingling, see mix

- invidia, invidus, see jealousy invisible 32, 267, 272, 277, 397, 435 involuntarily, see will
Iranian (religion) 81, 261
 Iranian religion and Manichaeism
 6, 7, 74, 81
 Iranian Manichaean texts 180, 183
 see also Persia, Persian(s), Zoroastrian, Zurvanist irrational part(s), see part(s)
 (of the soul)
Ismant el-Kharab or Kellis 12, 240
- Jansenism 71
jealousy, jealous, begrudge, grudge (βασκανία, βάσκανος, invidia, invidus, φθονερία, φθονερός, φθονέω, φθόνος) 4, 24, 25, 35, 40, 84, 206,
 208, 213, 217, 218, 225, 226, 227,
 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234,
 235, 236, 241, 242, 244, 246, 247,
 249, 250, 251, 253, 332, 349, 350,
 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 373,
 374, 375, 378, 380, 389, 404, 462, 467 ἀφθονία 228, 233, 349, 350, 353, 354, 404
 jealousy (ζήλος, zelus, ζηλωτής, κω2)
 213, 226, 232, 233, 244, 248, 250, 353
 envy, envious (invidia, κω2, φθονερία, φθονερός, φθονέω,
 φθόνος) 39, 42, 57, 58, 59, 64,
 212, 225, 226, 231, 232, 233,
 242, 244, 346, 353, 354, 356, 361
- Jesus Christ 7, 41, 46, 47, 48, 50,
51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 58, 59, 60,
62, 64, 65, 70, 94, 99, 115, 134,
153, 155, 163, 184, 200, 202, 205,
213, 220, 221, 234, 235, 267, 285,
307, 333, 334, 337, 346, 347, 389,
393, 394, 400, 405, 407, 412, 413,
414, 418
Jesus in Manichaeism 7, 9, 10, 11,
34, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 59, 65,
84, 134, 136, 152, 153, 155, 172,
179, 185, 200, 202, 204, 205,
237, 238, 239, 240, 243, 245,
246, 247, 248, 458
Jesus the Luminous 84, 210,
237–38
Jesus the Splendour 9, 11, 238, 240
Christology, christological 101, 144, 326
- Messiah 50
Xradešahr 237
Jew(s), Jewish, Judaism 11, 44, 46, 48,
51, 53, 58, 60, 61, 62, 81, 106, 121,
164, 182, 183, 201, 212, 213, 214,
216, 221, 223, 228, 229, 231, 232,
237, 261, 325, 360, 362
 Jewish-Christian 122
 judaising Christians, Judaists 164, 200
- Kellis, see Ismant el-Kharab
Kingdom of Darkness 152, 193, 240
Kingdom of Light 20, 152, 193, 194, 195, 240
- Law (Mosaic) 34, 45, 48, 50, 60, 61,
62, 181, 182, 183, 184, 287, 293, 398 natural law, lex naturalis, law of nature, lex naturae 30, 32, 284,
 286, 287, 311, 314, 343, 344,
 370, 380, 414
 lex talionis 48
Legion, see Third Legion of Cyrenaica lex, see law
Living Spirit 187
 see also Demiurge logic (Aristotelian) 92, 93, 94, 101,
262, 277, 278
Logos (Λόγος) (Christian) 271, 273,
285, 286, 287, 334, 341, 370
Lutheran(s) 71, 91
- mad, madness (μανία) (about Manichaeism) 23, 49, 55, 130, 131,
 132, 168, 202, 204, 426
 madman (μανεΐς) (about Mani) 131,
 132, 137, 159, 163, 168, 428,
 432, 433, 439, 446, 454, 458, 467 majority Church (“Mehrheitskirche”) 12 Manichaean(s), Manichaeism passim
Marcionism, Marcionite(s) 7, 9, 15,
46, 102, 106, 135, 136, 142, 149,
182, 186, 199, 200, 204, 205, 216,
217, 219, 220, 221, 223, 224, 230,
231, 232, 233, 239, 243, 244, 248,
251, 320, 335, 338, 353, 389 martyr(s), martyrdom 58, 59, 65, 112, 124 matter (ὕλη) 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 30, 32, 34, 35, 43, 44,
48, 49, 50, 52, 54, 55, 58, 61, 63,

- 64, 73, 74–75, 88, 91, 103, 104,
105, 168, 170, 171, 172, 174, 176,
187, 195, 199, 203, 207, 208, 227,
228, 242, 256, 257, 258, 262, 275,
276, 277, 279, 296, 299, 300, 310,
345, 421, 432, 435, 437, 439, 452,
453, 454, 459, 460, 469
material 22, 82, 174, 195, 200, 205, 267, 272, 273, 275, 300,
306, 310
Medinet Madi 82
merger, see mix
Messalian(s), Messalianism 98, 99,
299, 330, 408, 409
Messiah, see Jesus Christ metropolis(es) 121, 122, 138
Middle Ages 10. 66, 68, 263 mind (νοῦς and similar terms) 3, 34,
56, 59, 60, 61, 62, 159, 163, 172,
213, 236, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272,
273, 274, 276, 280, 286, 289, 295,
300, 303, 306, 307, 308, 309, 311,
313, 314, 317, 443, 444, 446, 456, 458 see also commanding (organ of the soul), faculty (reasoning) mingle, see mix
mix, mixture, composed, composition, compound, (un-)compounded, fusion, merger, mingle, (inter)mingling 18,
19, 21, 31, 51, 60, 199, 203, 207,
260, 267, 268, 269, 287, 299, 300,
301, 305, 311, 328, 360, 430, 432,
435, 438, 468
Monarchianism 121
monotheism 130, 259, 293
mortality, see death
mortification, see death
mutability, mutable 302, 386, 392, 394, 395, 400, 402, 406
myth(s), mythology, mythological
(Manichaean) 4, 15, 18, 19, 20,
22, 35, 75, 81, 85, 87, 88, 103,
130, 149, 152, 161, 164, 168,
170, 172, 174, 187, 188, 189, 190,
192, 193, 194, 195, 197, 198, 199,
207, 210, 213, 237, 238, 240, 242,
243, 248, 252, 263, 292, 310,
380–81
barbarian myth in Acta Archelai 149
Gnostic mythology 210, 251
Greek mythology 161, 169, 209, 210, 214
myth in Protagoras 258, 259
Nabataean(s) 82, 120, 121
Nag Hammadi 84, 209, 210, 212,
215, 223, 224, 229, 231, 232, 233, 235, 236
natural concepts, see common concepts natural theology, theologia naturalis 284, 285
necessity (of nature), see determinism
Nemrael 195
Neopythagorean 310
Ōhrmīzd, see Primal Man
Ophites, Ophitic 230, 235, 241, 246, 380, 381
opposite(s), see contrary (-ies) Origenists 362
original sin, see sin originated, see Creation orthodox, orthodoxy 8, 10, 11, 12,
68, 99, 121, 130, 206, 207, 209,
252, 253, 330, 353
Greek Orthodox 66
Ossaeans 127
pagan(s), paganism 3, 4, 14, 15, 34,
46, 47, 50, 53, 55, 60, 70, 90, 107,
120, 122, 123, 125, 126, 127, 130,
145, 146, 158, 161, 162, 165, 166,
167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 175, 177,
178, 188, 189, 205, 206, 216, 218,
249, 250, 251, 253, 255, 256, 258,
259, 261, 273, 280, 286, 318, 324, 420, 421, 422, 423 gentiles 452
see also Greek(s)
Paraclete, intercessor 34, 50, 51, 52, 151, 152, 155, 204, 241
paronym 262
part(s) (of the soul) 21, 22, 103, 173,
299–302, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309,
311, 313, 437, 438, 439, 446 irrational part(s) (ἀλόγιστον and similar terms) 173, 299, 302,
305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 311,
313, 438, 439
passion(s) 27, 29, 42, 56, 59, 61, 62,
63, 227, 233, 294, 295, 296, 297,
306, 309, 314, 316, 317, 346, 348,
353, 364, 376, 381, 386, 402, 444,
470, 471, 472, 473
Paulicians 68
Pelagian(s), Pelagianism 13, 90, 91, 92, 96, 98, 175, 363, 364, 407, 408, 411
semi-Pelagian 403

- penance, penitence 37, 173, 310, 335, 338, 342, 401, 405
- Peripatetic(s) 93, 94, 283
- Persia, Persian(s) 52, 125, 131, 167, 168, 169, 256, 257, 469
- Middle Persian 87, 192, 240, 241, Pešitta 83
- pietist 71
- plan(s) (of God), see dispensation(s)
- Platonic, Platonising, Platonism, Platonist(s) 68, 81, 92, 93, 94, 95, 103, 104, 108, 131, 167, 173, 220, 228, 255, 257, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 275, 276, 277, 298, 299, 300, 301, 309, 310, 313, 318, 340, 353, 354, 365, 370, 395, 396, 419, 421
- Middle-Platonic, Middle Platonism, Middle-Platonists 107, 261, 262, 269, 270, 283, 305
- Neo-Platonic, Neo-Platonism, Neo-Platonist(s) 67, 81, 93, 101, 103, 104–5, 106, 131, 278, 279, 305, 339, 340
- Socratic-Platonic 324
- see also Academy
- political theology (and Augustus theology) 145, 171–72
- Praeses Arabiae 123
- predestination 116, 338, 339, 390, 391, 400, 402, 403
- predicable(s) 263
- pre-existence (of soul) 298, 336, 360
- Primal Man 187, 240
- Prince of Darkness 85, 88, 187, 192, 197
- principle(s) (ἀρχή) (first) 5, 17, 18, 19, 20, 23, 25, 26, 27, 29, 31, 33, 34, 35, 43, 44, 47, 52, 54, 55, 56, 58, 59, 60, 63, 64, 73, 80, 82, 98, 144, 147, 148, 149, 169, 175, 187, 197, 198, 199, 202, 206, 227, 239, 256, 257, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 267, 269, 270, 271, 276, 279, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 300, 310, 322, 326, 427, 454, 461, 469
- progress, see education
- property (ἴδιον) 263
- protest exegesis 211, 212, 243, 248, 251, 320, 330
- Protestant(s) 13, 69, 71, 73, 74
- Providence 17, 18, 19, 26, 29, 30, 42, 44, 52, 104, 105, 169, 171, 217, 218, 220, 221, 222, 227, 260, 320, 331, 334, 344, 414, 422, 425, 426, 452
- psychology (philosophical) 15, 92, 282, 297, 299, 306
- purpose 58, 308, 328
- see also intention
- quality (-ies) (ποιότης and similar terms) 21, 24, 31, 39, 40, 63, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 274, 276, 279, 298, 302, 306, 309, 312, 322, 373, 429, 430, 438, 439, 440, 467
- see also accident (separable and inseparable)
- quaestiones-literature 175, 192, 221, 253, 254, 368, 387
- recapitulation, (doctrine of) 333
- Reformation 69, 72, 73
- Counter-Reformation 69
- Reformed 72
- see also Calvinists
- regula fidei, rule of faith 11, 320
- relatives 264
- resurrection, resurrected 53, 54, 63, 98, 184, 298, 316, 351, 355, 375, 381, 389, 405, 415, 471, 472, 473
- see also body
- Roman Catholic, see Catholic(s)
- Sabaoth 231
- Safaites 121
- Sampsaeans 127
- sanctification 397
- Sceptical, Sceptics 218, 219, 220, 260, 290, 389
- scholasticism 280
- School, see Edessa, History of Religions
- Scripture(s), Bible 2, 3, 17, 34, 38, 41, 42, 46, 47, 49, 51, 54, 59, 61, 63, 64, 93, 94, 96, 108, 151, 158, 159, 160, 162, 169, 180, 182, 183, 184, 185, 189, 199, 201, 205, 211, 214, 221, 222, 247, 252, 253, 256, 267, 271, 280, 286, 288, 289, 295, 303, 304, 318, 322, 324, 331, 340, 346, 348, 378, 379, 394, 417, 421, 422, 427, 458
- semi-Pelagian, see Pelagian(s)
- separable (accident and quality), see accident
- serpent(s) 35, 40, 41, 84, 197, 198, 206, 208, 210, 211, 213, 227, 229,

- 230, 231, 232, 234, 235, 236, 238,
239, 243, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249,
250, 309, 321, 324, 332, 342, 374,
377, 380, 403, 461
as angel of goodness 35, 84, 206, 208, 245, 461
sexual, sexuality 32, 98, 99, 175, 192,
194, 195, 314, 330, 403, 408
Shadow (Gnostic mythology) 231 ships, i.e. sun and moon in Manichaeism 195
signs, small (apparently παράγραφου)
177 simple (ἀπλοῦς) (about God) 267, 268, 269, 272, 274, 276, 287, 328, 430
sin(s), sinful, sinner(s) 5, 15, 17, 18, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29,
30, 32, 38, 39, 40, 45, 48, 49, 50,
53, 55, 56, 57, 58, 60, 61, 62, 63,
96, 99, 104, 126, 155, 159, 169,
173, 174, 175, 213, 215, 220, 245,
260, 261, 264, 285, 295, 300, 302,
307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 313, 314,
315, 317, 320, 324, 329, 330, 335,
336, 337, 339, 341, 342, 344, 345,
346, 348, 350, 351, 352, 355, 356,
357, 358, 361, 363, 364, 371, 375,
378, 379, 382, 386, 389, 390, 391,
392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398,
400, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408,
409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 421,
422, 425, 426, 437, 438, 439, 441,
451, 452, 453, 454, 465, 467, 470 original sin 69, 70, 71, 89, 90, 91,
95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 108,
142, 321, 327, 329, 330, 337,
369, 392, 395, 407, 408, 410
“Erbübellehre” 96, 97, 100, 363
“Erbunheil” 99, 321, 327, 329
“Erbverderbnislehre” 96, 97, 100, 363 body of sin, see body
Socinians 71
Socratic, see Platonic
Sophists 282
soul(s) 3, 19, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 35, 36, 37, 53, 54, 55, 58, 63,
92, 93, 99, 103, 116, 141, 172, 173,
174, 187, 189, 194, 195, 219, 228,
235, 236, 238, 256, 257, 258, 262,
264, 265, 282, 294, 295, 296, 298,
299, 300, 301, 302, 304, 305, 306,
307, 308, 309, 311, 313, 314, 315,
316, 317, 318, 336, 337, 338, 343,
344, 345, 348, 349, 350, 351, 360,
361, 362, 364, 370, 371, 379, 395,
397, 402, 405, 421, 423, 429, 430,
432, 435, 437, 438, 439, 444, 446,
447, 451, 452, 454, 459, 460, 469, 473 soul of the universe 22, 32, 33 two souls 256, 257, 299, 300
see also psychology species (εἶδος) 93, 263, 264, 265, 430, 435
state (ἔξις), see habit(s)
Stoic(s), Stoicism, Stoicising 93, 94,
95, 97, 102, 103, 104, 108, 173,
174, 209, 217, 218, 220, 255, 261,
265, 277, 280, 282, 283, 284, 286,
287, 291, 304, 306, 307, 309, 312,
313, 314, 315, 317, 318, 345, 348,
365, 409, 421
Middle Stoicism 282
Old Stoic, Stoicism 282
substance(s) (οὐσία) 5, 11, 19, 20, 21,
22, 23, 25, 28, 29, 31, 60, 101, 262,
263, 264, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270,
271, 272, 273, 274, 276, 277, 291,
300, 301, 302, 303, 305, 306, 328,
426, 428, 429, 430, 434, 435, 438, 442 synergism, synergistic 321, 403 synod(s) 122, 408
in Antioch, 264 and 268 122 in Antioch, 363 125, 142, 143 in Bostra 121
in Serdica, 343 122
first ecumenical, in Nicaea, 325
122, 133
fifth ecumenical, in Constantinople,
553 368, 385, 386, 387, 393, 401, 404, 411
synonym(s) 262, 263, 278, 279
Syntagma against all heresies, lost writing by Justin Martyr 129
Talmud 121
third heaven 362, 372
Third Legion of Cyrenaica 121
Third Messenger 187, 194
train, see education transmigration of souls 53, 92, 256, 257, 258, 469 tree(s) 32, 240, 269, 398, 465 tree of darkness 240
Tree of Death 193, 240
Tree of Knowledge/Tree for

- knowing good and bad 36, 39,
 40, 41, 84, 211, 212, 215, 216,
 222, 223, 228, 229, 230, 232,
 234, 235, 236, 238, 240, 241,
 242, 243, 246, 247, 323, 328,
 332, 354, 355, 362, 372, 373,
 374, 376, 380, 398, 399, 404,
 406, 467
 Tree of Life 35, 40, 193, 206, 208,
 209, 211, 212, 221, 223, 225,
 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232,
 233, 236, 238, 240, 241, 242,
 244, 246, 250, 343, 350, 354,
 355, 356, 357, 358, 372, 374,
 380, 398, 400, 401, 462, 467 two trees in Luke (good and bad tree) 56, 152, 240
 Trinity 133, 397
 Trinitarian controversies, see Arian(s)
 Turfan 81, 237
 uncircumscribed (ἀπερίληπτος) 18, 261, 293, 297
 uncompounded, see mix
 uncreated or unoriginated (ἀγέννητος)
 17, 18, 19, 22, 260, 261, 262, 266,
 269, 273–76, 277, 298, 328, 324, 426, 428
 unoriginated, see uncreated
 Valentinian(s), Valentinianism 11, 46,
 91, 135, 140, 145, 149, 150, 165,
 168, 173, 233, 289, 325, 409
 Valesians 127
 value reversals, revaluation 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 215, 234, 236, 251 vice, see virtue virgin birth 53, 54, 134, 135, 202 virtue(s) 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 32, 37, 38, 48, 51, 55, 57, 58, 59,
 60, 61, 63, 71, 91, 94, 264, 265,
 303, 304, 310, 311, 312, 313,
 315, 316, 317, 318, 322, 323,
 324, 336, 344, 345, 347, 348,
 350, 351, 358, 370, 391, 401,
 402, 406, 422, 438, 439, 440,
 441, 442, 443, 445, 447, 448,
 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 465,
 466, 473
 virtue(s) and vice(s) 21, 24, 41, 46,
 51, 60, 61, 62, 171, 232, 264,
 265, 266, 268, 269, 279, 293,
 298, 302, 311, 312, 313, 314,
 317, 324, 350, 429, 430, 442,
 446, 455, 464, 470
 vice(s) 24, 25, 30, 57, 232, 304,
 309, 312, 317, 322, 348, 402, 440
 Waldenses 72
 war(s) 26, 27, 296, 343, 344, 345, 450, 451, 452, 454
 will, volition (προαίρεσις, προαιρετικός and many similar terms) 24, 41,
 44, 58, 60, 103, 196, 221, 308, 317,
 318, 328, 335, 336, 337, 340, 350,
 395, 402, 409, 443, 459, 460
 freedom of will 24, 56, 58, 63, 64,
 91, 100, 104, 116, 134, 135, 173,
 174, 175, 307, 321, 324, 325,
 335, 340, 352, 376, 412, 443 voluntary, involuntary 61, 63, 195, 313, 370, 446
 see also choice, intention, purpose wisdom (of God) 23, 25, 26, 28, 30, 32, 41, 42, 219, 274, 342, 344, 401,
 452, 456, 462
 Xradešahr, see Jesus Christ
 Yaldabaoth, Yaltabaoth, Ialdabaoth
 231, 232, 235
 Zoe-Eve 239
 Zoroastrian, Zoroastrianism 11, 103,
 141
 Zurvanist 141
- Greek words
- ἀγέννητος, see uncreated ἄγνοια, see ignorance ἀκολουθία, see consequence ἀλόγιστον, see part(s) of the soul ἀνάγκη, see determinism ἀρχή, see principle(s) αὐτεξούσιον, see choice ἀφθονία, see jealousy βασκανία, see jealousy βάσκανος, see jealousy
 Βοσորρα, see Bostra
 βῶλος, see 'globe'
 γέννητος, created or originated,
 see Creation

- γένος, see genus
 δημιουργός, see Demiurge διάθεσις, see disposition διαφορά, see difference δύναμις, see faculty εἶδος, see species εἰκών, see image
 ἔξις, state, see habit(s) ἐργαλεῖον, see body ζῆλος, see jealousy
 ζηλωτής, see jealousy ἡγεμονικόν, see commanding (organ of the soul) ἴδιον, see property
 καλός, see beautiful κατάστασεις, see Ages
 κατ' εἰκόνα, see image κοιναὶ ἔννοιαι, see common concepts κοινὴ δόξα, see common concepts λογιστικόν, see faculty (reasoning)
 Λόγος, see Logos μανεῖς, see mad
 μανία, see mad
 Μόδιος, see Bushel
 μονοειδής, see homogeneous νοῦς, see mind οἰκονομία, see dispensation(s) ὄργανον, see body ὀρισμός, see definition
 ὅρος, see definition παράγραφοι, see signs, small ποιότης, see quality (-ies) προαίρεσις, see will προαιρετικός, see will πρόγνωσις, see foreknowledge πρόθεσις, see intention συμβεβηκός, see accident ὕλη, see matter
 ὑπογραφή, see description φθονερία, see jealousy φθονερός, see jealousy φθονέω, see jealousy φθόνος, see jealousy

INDEX OF SOURCES

I. Biblical and Jewish Texts

A. Bible a. Old Testament Gen. 1-2 189 1-3 35, 41, 213 1.2 64, 203 1.4 244 1.26 36, 38, 322, 379 1.26-27 223, 324, 383 1.27 248 1.28 38 1.29 38 1.29-30 327 1.29-31 399 1.31 303 2 190 2-3 35, 206, 217, 223, 229, 237, 249, 349 2.7 36, 223 2.8 355, 372 2.9 241, 372, 373, 378, 398 2.15 355, 399 2.16 376 2.16-17 372, 383 2.17 227, 250, 351 2.18 249 2.19-20 235 2.21ff. 239 2.23 40 2.25 375 3 222, 224, 229, 234, 235, 320, 349, 361 3.1 380 3.1-7 383 3.2-3 40 3.3 241 3.4 41 3.4-5 227, 228 3.5 227, 230, 238, 377, 387, 400 3.6 39 3.6-7 337 3.7 39, 40, 235, 238, 241,	337, 374, 380, 381, 397, 403, 404 3.8-9 398, 404 3.9 223, 244, 250 3.13 397 3.14-15 41 3.16ff. 350 3.17-20 400 3.21 357, 376, 381 3.22 40, 223, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 250, 253, 324, 349, 353, 355, 358, 374, 375, 378, 404 3.22-23 374 4.1-16 35, 42, 89, 206, 232 6-9 35, 42, 206, 221 6.3 42, 56 6.5 56 6.6 381 9.24-25 391 11.1-9 42, 168 11.4-7 227 15.8 203 18-19 35, 42, 206, 248 18 54, 200 22.11-12 381 Ex. 3.14 271 5.2 43 7-11 35, 43-44, 206 8.19 43 11.2 35, 44, 206 12.35-36 35, 44, 206 15 44 19 35, 45, 206 20.1-17 44 20.5 50, 232, 243, 248, 250 21.24 184 25.2-8 184 34.7 50 34.14 248 Lev. 19.12 185
---	--

Num.		13.1	371
14.18	50
		Sir.
Deut.		17.1ff.	325
4.24	35, 45, 152, 232, 250	1 Macc.
		5.26	121
5.6-21	44	5.28	121
5.9	50	5.45	121
		c. New Testament
2. Sam.		Mt.
11-12	49	3.10	56
1 Kings		4.1-11	58
18.20-40	45	4.9	59
		4.10	59
Job	377	5.15	179
1	58	5.17	48
		5.27-28	47
Ps.		5.33-37	47, 185
8	325	5.34-35	184
40.7 (LXX 39.7)	45	5.38-40	184
50.7-14 (LXX 49.7-14)	45	5.38-39	48
51.18-19 (LXX 50.18-19)	45	5.45	248
58.5f. (LXX 57.5f.)	198	6.24	55, 56, 202, 294
143.10 (LXX 142.10)	143		201, 202
Isa.		6.45	240
1.11-13	44		58
7.14	53	7.17-20	307
11.1	53	8.29	158
43.22-24	44	12.35	158
66.3	44	13.1-9	52, 64
		13.18-23	52
Jer.		13.25	64
7.21-23	44	13.30	248
31.33	62	16.18	60, 143
		18.22	60, 202
Hos.		19.17	59
6.5-6	44	20.16
		23.12
Am.		Mk.
5.22	44	1.24	58
5.25	44	4.1-9	158
Mic.		4.13-20	158
6.6-8	44	10.18	143
		Lk.
b. Apocrypha of the Old Testament		3.1-2	156
Wis.		3.9	56
2.23-24	346	3.23	156
2.24	231, 361	4.34	58, 240
		6.43-44	240

- | | | | |
|----------|----------|----------|--------------------|
| 6.43-45 | 56, 202 | 7.8 | 389 |
| 6.45 | 56, 307 | 7.14-17 | 61 |
| 8.4-8 | 158 | 7.17 | 61 |
| 8.11-15 | 158 | 7.22 | 61, 62 |
| 10.18 | 58 | 7.23 | 60, 62, 299 |
| 18.19 | 143 | 7.24 | 62, 346 |
| 18.20ff. | 94 | 8.2 | 62 |
| 20.34 | 327 | 8.3 | 62, 185 |
| 24.37-39 | 55 | 8.29f. | 339 |
| | | 8.29 | 326, 403 |
| | | 16.25-26 | 331 |
| Jn. | 12, 54 | | |
| 1.3 | 56, 202 | 1 Cor. | |
| 1.5 | 158 | 2.7 | 331 |
| 1.14 | 54, 202 | 2.8 | 41, 321 |
| 1.29 | 57 | 3.1-3 | 45 |
| 2.1-12 | 54 | 8.6 | 56, 202 |
| 2.13 | 156 | 9.19 | 51, 203 |
| 5.23 | 47 | 9.22 | 51, 60, 202, 203 |
| 6.4 | 156 | 9.25-26 | 158, 344 |
| 7.7 | 56 | 9.25 | 344 |
| 11.55 | 156 | 11.19 | 52 |
| 12.31 | 57 | 13.9-10 | 60, 150, 151 |
| 14.6 | 158 | 13.9 | 52 |
| 14.26 | 52 | 15 | 63 |
| 14.27 | 55 | 15.45-49 | 326 |
| 14.30 | 7 | 15.48-49 | 412 |
| 15.18-19 | 56, 202 | 15.50 | 63, 184 |
| 15.20 | 56 | 15.51-53 | 184 |
| 15.26 | 52 | 15.51 | 63, 185 |
| 16.7 | 52 | 15.53 | 351, 375, 412, 473 |
| 17.14 | 56, 202 | | |
| 17.15 | 57 | 2 Cor. | |
| 17.25 | 248 | 3.18-4.6 | 326 |
| Acts | | 4.4 | 64, 197, 243 |
| 17.22-31 | 284 | 12.2-4 | 326 |
| 17.28 | 60 | | |
| Rom. | | Gal. | |
| 1.19ff. | 284 | 4.25-26 | 49 |
| 2.14-15 | 284 | 5.17 | 311 |
| 2.14 | 287, 380 | 6.14 | 347 |
| 2.29 | 49 | | |
| 5.15-21 | 346 | Eph. | |
| 5.16 | 346 | 1.9-10 | 331 |
| 5.18 | 346 | 1.21 | 271 |
| 5.20 | 61 | 2.1-2 | 63 |
| 6.1ff. | 389 | 2.2-3 | 63 |
| 6.2 | 347 | 2.2 | 63 |
| 6.6 | 389 | 3.9 | 331 |
| 6.7 | 356 | 3.20 | 272 |
| 6.10-11 | 347 | 5.6-8 | 63 |
| 6.12 | 295 | 5.8 | 63, 64 |
| 6.23 | 345 | 6.11 | 64 |
| 7 | 61 | 6.12 | 64 |

Phil.		d. Other Jewish Texts
2.9	271	Pirke Rabbi Eliezer (ed. Luria 1852)
3.14	158, 344	13	229
3.19	64	Vita Ad. et Ev. (Apoc. Mosis)
4.7	158, 272	Greek text (ed. Von Tischendorf 1966)
Col.		18,4	228, 229
1.15	326	Armenian version (transl. Preuschen
1.26	331	1900)
3.3	347	I.18	228, 229
3.10	326	Philo Judaeus
1 Tim.		De Abr.
4.1–5	64, 163	36 (203–4)	228
4.4	303	De op. mund.
4.7	158, 168	5 (21–22)	228
6.10	158	25 (77)	228
6.12	158, 344	46 (134–135)	360
6.16	158, 185, 268	47 (136)	303
2 Tim.		De plant.
2.5	158, 344	21 (91)	228
4.7	158, 344	De spec. leg.
Tit.		2.45 (249)	228
1.12	60	Leg. all.
3.10–11	62, 64	1.26 (80)	228
Heb.		1.33 (105–108)	348
5.14	337	3.17 (51ff.)	223, 224
9.22	49	3.72 (203)	228
12.1	158, 344	Quaestiones in Exodum	253
Jas.		Quaest. in Gen. (transl.
1.12	158, 344	Marcus 1953; Mercier
1 Pet.		1979)	253, 356
1.20	331	I.39	235
4.1	356	I.40	236
5.4	158, 344	I.45	223
		I.55	355
Jude		Quod Deus sit immutabilis
13	458	23 (107–8)	228
Rev.		Quod omnis probus liber sit
2.11	346	2 (13)	228
11.17	271
20.6	346
20.14	346

II. Graeco-Christian texts

- Adamantius
- Dial. Adamant.*
(ed. Bakhuyzen 1901) 154, 262
I.17 (815c) 224
II.1 (822ab) 261
- Athanasius Alexandrinus
- Contra Ar.* (PG 26)
I,2-3 146
I,14 264, 269
I,20 269
I,36 269
II 340
II,54 341
II,75-77 341
II,75 341
II,76 341
II,77 341
III,65 263-64, 269
- Contra gent.* (ed. Thomson 1971)
2.4 273
2.6-7 273
3.23 273
35.3 273
40.12 273
41 353
- De inc.* (ed. Thomson 1971)
3 169, 353
4-6 361
4f. 341
6-8 341
7 335
8 341
11f. 341
42 353
- De decr.* (PG 25)
12 264, 269
22 268
- De syn.* (PG 26)
52 264, 269
- Ep. ad Aeg. et Lib.* (PG 25)
16 264, 268, 269
- Ep. ad Afr.* (PG 26)
8 268
- Pseudo-Athanasius
- Sermo contra omnes haer.*
(PG 28) 134, 140, 142
- Athenagoras
- De res.* (ed. Pouderon 1992)
XIII 285
XIV 285
XIV,1-2 291
XXIV 285
- Legatio pro Christianos* (ed. Pouderon 1992)
8 261
- Basilius Magnus Caesariensis
- De ieiun.* (PG 31)
hom. I,4 323
- Quod Deus non est auctor
malorum* (PG 31)
7 323
9 323
- Clemens Alexandrinus
- Paed.* (ed. Stählin 1905)
I.8 (71.1) 271
I.8 (71.2) 271
III.7 (40.3) 353
- Protr.* (ed. Stählin 1905)
X (95.3) 286
X (98.4) 271
- Strom.* (ed. Stählin 1906)
I.7 (37.6) 106
I.19 (94.1-7) 286
I.19 (94.2) 286
I.28 (177.1) 271
I.29 (182.1) 286
II.2 (6.1) 272
II.7 (34.2) 343, 348
II.18 (86.1) 353
II.19 (98.3-4) 336
III.9 (64.1) 348
III.9 (64.2) 343
III.13ff. (91ff.) 98
IV.25 (155.2) 271
IV.25 (162.5) 271
V.3 (16.3) 271
V.4 (24.2) 353
V.6 (38.6) 271
V.10 (63.7) 353
V.10 (65.2) 272
V.11 (71.1-5) 267
V.11 (71.2-5) 261
V.11 (73.1-3) 271

V.11 (74.4–5)	261	LVIII,68	385
V.12 (81.5–82.4)	267	LX,69	385
V.12 (81.5–6)	267	LXI,70	401, 402
V.12 (82.1–2)	272	LXII,71	385
VI.12 (96.1ff.)	336
VI.12 (96.1)	223	Concilium Universale Nicaenum Primum,
V.13 (87.2ff.)	286	canones (Joannou 1962)
V.13 (87.4)	286	4th canon	122
V.13 (88.2)	286	5th canon	122
V.14 (94.4–5)	286	6th canon	122
V.14 (133.7–9)	286
V.14 (134.3)	286	Cyrillus Alexandrinus
V.14 (141.3)	339
VI.8 (64.5–6)	286	Contra Jul.	249
VI.11 (90.1)	353
VI.12 (96.1ff.)	336	Cyrillus Hierosolymitanus
VI.16 (137.3)	271	Catech. (ed. Reischl 1848)
(ed. Stählin 1909)		VI	133
VII.1 (2.2–3)	271	VI.20–36	133
VII.2 (5.5)	268	VI.27	152, 208
VII.2 (7.1–2)	353
VII.7 (37.6)	268	Constitutiones Apostolorum
VII.12 (71.3)	343, 348	(ed. Funk 1905)	98, 99,
VII.16 (95.9)	286		414, 415,
VII.16 (101.4)	278		416, 418
VIII.1 (2.4)	286	V.VII	99, 415
VIII.3 (7.5)	286	V.VII,8	414
VIII.6 (17.1ff.)	278	V.VII,9	414
		VII.XLIII,4	414
Clemens Romanus		VIII.IX,8	414
1 Clem.		VIII.XII,16–20	414
3.4	232	VIII.XII,17	414
		VIII.XII,18	414
Pseudo-Clemens		VIII.XII,19	415
Hom. (ed. Rehm 1953)		VIII.XLI,4	415
III.38,2	224
III.39,3	230	Didymus Alexandrinus
Rec.	112	Contra Manich.
II.54	218	(PG 39)	133, 134,
			142
Cod. Theod. (ed. Mommsen 1905)		I	279–80
XVI,10,4–6	123	II	292
		XII	241
Concil. Univ. Const. (ed. Straub 1970)		In Gen. (ed. Nautin 1976)
(Theodorus Mopsuestenus, In Gen. ;		3A (also in Catena in fragments)		Gen. 15, ed. Petit 1991)	203
(Latin)		33.9–17	304
Actio quarta		52.25ff.	304
LVII,66–LXII,71	385	72.20–25	304
LVII,66	385,	81.4ff.	230, 235
	386–87,	81.19ff.	337
	393	82.12–14	235
LVIII,67	385, 402	83.1ff.	337

85.2-5	285	(ed. Holl 1933)
87.21	285	66	140-41,
90.9-91.11	224		142
110.24-26	358	66.1,1	155
111.1ff.	358	66.2,9	80
In Hi. (Tura) (ed. Henrichs 1968)		66.13-14	73
2,11-15	304	66.13,6	178
		66.14,1	73
Diodorus Tarsensis		66.19,9	155
In Oct. (Collectio Coisluniana,		66.20,3	155
ed. Petit 1986)	254,	66.21,3	67, 132,
	367-68,		135, 137,
	379, 387,	66.29,1	154
	388, 417	66.78,1	240
p. 88, no. 86	372	70	155
p. 67-68, no. 70	379	73.12,1-73.22,8	127
p. 107-9, no. 106	380	78	418
p. 108, no. 106.12	387	79	127
p. 113-15, no. 109	380, 381		127
p. 113, no. 109.1-8	380	Eusebius Pamphili Caesariensis et
p. 113, no. 109.8-9	404	Pamphilus Martyr
p. 120-21, no. 118	381	Apologia pro Origene 156
p. 145-47, no. 145	381
p. 161-62, no. 164.1-13	391	Chron.	145, 147,
p. 199-200, no. 204.8ff.	381		148, 156,
In Rom. (catena fragments, ed. Staab		Latin version by Jerome (ed. Helm	157
1933)		1956)
p. 85.11-17	389	p. 174-218	156
p. 87.5-20	380	p. 174.14ff.	156
p. 95.11-19	391	p. 201.1-2 (a)	147
		p. 201.3ff.	148
Diagn.		p. 202.8-9	148
12.2-8	215	p. 202.20-21	148
		p. 223.21-22 (i)	132
Epiphanius Constantiensis		p. 223.23-24 (k)	132
Anaceph. (ed. Holl 1922)		p. 223.25-26 (l)	132, 155
T.3, 53	127	Armenian version (transl. Karst 1911)
Ancoratus	116	p. 213-26	156
		p. 213	156
Haer. (ed. Holl 1915)	67, 68,	p. 220	147, 148
	120,	p. 221	148
	127	p. 227	132, 155
19.1,2	127	Dem. ev. (ed. Heikel 1913)
19.2,10	127	II.3,38	353
30.2,9	127	III.4,21	353
30.18,1	127	IV.1,8	353
(ed. Holl 1922)		VII.3,18	254
34.13,1	168	De martyribus Palaestinae	112
37	235	(Syriac)
40.4,8	233	Encomium martyrorum	112
52.1,1	127	(Syriac)
58	127

Ep. ad Const. (fragments, ed. Pitra 1852)		Eusebius Emesenus
p. 386.25–27	132	Adv. Sab. (ed. Buytaert 1953)
Hist. eccl.	145, 157, 367	(Latin)
(ed. Bardy 1952)		[7]	136
I.2,17–19	371	De apost. et fide (ed. Buytaert 1953)
I.2,18	371	(Latin)
I.2,19	371	[19]	136
I.10	156	De arb. fici (ed. Buytaert 1953)
II.18,1	253	(Latin)
II.18,5	253	[10–15]	136
IV.7	148	De arbitr. (ed. Buytaert 1953)
IV.11	148	(Latin)
IV.18	148	[13]	134, 135,
IV.24	218	[14–17]	136, 137,
(ed. Bardy 1955)		[38]	140
V.13,8	253	Greek fragments preserved
VI.8	156	in Theodoret of Cyrus's
VI.19,15–16	121	Eranistes (ed. Buytaert 1949)
VI.20,2	121	p. 15* (II 4)	134
VI.23	156	De cal. (ed. Buytaert 1953)	136
VI.33,1–4	121–22	(Latin)
VI.37	122	De fide (ed. Buytaert 1953)
VI.39	156	(Latin)
VII.1	156	[5]	137
VII.28,1	122	De Fil. (ed. Buytaert 1953)
VII.30,2	122	(Latin)
VII.31,1–2	131, 132, 133, 156, 167	[I 3]	136
VII.32,6ff.	132	De hom. assumpt. II (ed. Buytaert 1953)
Praep. ev. (ed. Mras 1956)		(Latin)
XI.21.2	353	[4–6]	136, 335
XIII.17	305	De incorp. (ed. Buytaert 1957)
XIII.17,2	305	(Latin)
XIII.17,4	305	[5]	136
XIII.17,5	305	De incorp. et invisib. Deo (ed. Buytaert 1957)
XIII.17,6	306	(Latin)
XV.5.2	353	[5]	137
Theoph. (ed. Lee 1842)	112, 367	[32]	137
(Syriac)		passim	136
I.40	370	De mart. (ed. Buytaert 1953)
I.42	370	(Latin)
I.44–45	370	[9]	136
I.48	370	[20]	136
I.68	370
II.69	371
IV.30	132
IV.34	132

- De quinque pan.* (ed. Buytaert 1953)
(Latin)
[9] 136
- In Oct.* 137, 254,
367, 368,
371, 376,
380
- Catena in Gen.* (ed. Petit 1991)
p. 167–68, no. 237 372
p. 169–70, no. 241 372
p. 169–70, no. 241.3–7 378
p. 170, no. 241.18 373
p. 171, no. 243 373
p. 171, no. 243.1–7 373
p. 171–72, no. 243.7–19 373
p. 217–18, no. 320 377
p. 288–89, no. 449.15–16 378
p. 289–90, no. 450.10–15 375
p. 290–91, no. 452.1–2 378
p. 299–300, no. 466 378
(ed. Petit 1995)
p. 48–49, no. 952 379
p. 50–51, no. 954 379
- Greek fragments in Procopius of Gaza,
In Gen. (PG 87,1)
161B–164A 373
177C8–180A8 376
180C2–181B3 377
337D5–340B11 379
- Armenian version (ed. Hovhannessian 1980)
18,72–19,94 372
19,113–21,159 372
19–20 378
21,159–22,188 373
24,252–25,291 376
25,292–28,384 377
29 374
29–30 377
30 378
31 374
31–32 374
32,513–33,548 378
34 374–75
34,579–35,588 375
36 372
39 335
58,260–59,303 379
- Fragments in Romeny 1997a
Fr. V 372
Fr. VIII 378
Fr. IX 376
Fr. XXII 140
- Gregorius Nyssenus
Oratio catechetica magna (PG 45)
37b–c 342
- Hegemonius
Acta Arch. (ed. Beeson 1906) 72, 85,
97, 105,
132–33,
152, 154,
156, 168,
182, 193,
200, 203,
204
- Latin (partly Greek)
V 152
V.1 205
VII–XI 193
XI.1 76, 240
XIV.3 167
XV 150, 151,
152
150
XV.3 152
XXXVI 152
XXXI.6–8 154–55
XXXI.8 154
XXXII.1 154
XL.5–6 168
XL.5 167
XL.7 167
XLI 150, 151
XLI.2f. 151
XLI.2 151
XLI.8 149–50
XLII.1 150
XLIV.9 184
XLV.4 184
XLVII.1 184
LXII.6 80
LXIV.5 168
LXVII 257
LXVII.4–LXVIII.4 149
LXVII.4 149, 257
LXVII.11 149
LXVII.12 149
- Hippolytus Romanus
Ref. (ed. Wendland 1916) 154, 157, 165, 200
I.14,1 268
I.19 258
V.16–17 235

- VII.15ff. 278
 VII.21,1 268
- Irenaeus Lugdunensis
Adv. haer.
 Latin (partly Greek)
 (ed. Rousseau and Doutreleau 1979)
- I.Praef. 165
 I.V.5 325
 I.12,2 268
 I.16,3 168, 289
 I.27,4 146
 I.28,2 148
 I.29,1 148
 I.29,4 232
 I.30,5 235
 I.30,7 232, 235, 380
 I.30,15 235
 I.31,3 289
 (ed. Rousseau and Doutreleau 1982)
- II.1,2 261
 II.3,1 261
 II.6,1 290
 II.13,3 268
 II.13,8 148, 268
 II.14 146
 II.26,3 289
 II.27,1 289
 II.28,4 268
 II.31,1 148
 (ed. Rousseau and Doutreleau 1974)
- III, Praef. 354
 III.20,1 334
 III.22,3 334
 III.23,5 335
 III.23,6 230, 231, 354–55,
 356
 III.24,2 220
 III.25,5 354
 III.38,4 334
 (ed. Rousseau 1965)
- IV.1,2 354
 IV.4,3 325
 IV.6,4 148
 IV.11,2 268
 IV.13,4 276
 IV.14,1 276
 IV.14,2 354
 IV.16,5 354
 IV.37–39 218, 219, 325
 IV.37ff. 329
 IV.38 219
- IV.38,3 354
 IV.38,4 333
 IV.38,8 219
 IV.39,1 373
 IV.40,3 233, 333
 (ed. Rousseau, Doutreleau and Mercier 1969)
- V.4,1 219, 354
 V.5,1 362
 V.6,1 325
 V.9,1 184
 V.16,2 325
 V.21,3 334
 V.24,4 232, 354
 V.36,1 334
- Dem.*
 (Armenian)
- 3 273
 11 325
 12 334
 15 334
 16 232
- Johannes Caesariensis
Adv. Manich. hom. (ed. Richard 1977)
 1,9–12 203
- Disp.* (ed. Aubineau in Richard 1977)
 27 (1325C–D) 218
- Johannes Chrysostomus
 Constantinopolitanus
Hom. in Gen. (PG 7)
 XVI,2–4 232
- In Matth. Hom.* (PG 12)
 LX,1 339
- In Rom. Hom.* (PG 60)
 X,3 405
 XII,6 264
- Johannes Damascenus
Dial. contra Manich.
 (ed. Kotter 1981)
 67, 193
- 34 242
 70 242
 73 242
- Sacr. Par.* 67
- Codex Rupefucaldinus
 (PG 18) 115, 424

Fr. I, 1257D–1260C (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. IV.99–101)	115, 316, 351, 471–73	I.7,3 I.26,6 I.26,8 I.28,3 I.43,8 I.46,4–5	146 146 129 325 325 285
Fr. II, 1260D–1261A (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. II.15)	115	II.8,1 II.8,4 II.10,8	285 285 285
Fr. III, 1261AB (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. II.27)	115	II.13,3 II.13,5–6 II.14,2	285 285 285
Fr. IV, 1261C–1264A (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. II.48–49)	115, 455–56	Dial. (ed. Archambault 1909–1909a) II,1 IV,1 XXXV,6 XLVII,2 XCIII,1 XCIX	146 273 146 285 285 224
Fr. V, 1264A (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. IV.91)	116, 293, 470
Codex Coislinianus 276 (Pitra 1888 with Casey 1928)	115, 424	Long Abjuration Formula (Lieu 1994) 1464B/C 1466D 1468B	240 181 181
Fr. I, p. 51 (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. I.18)	116
Fr. II, p. 51–52 (= Serapion Thmuitanus, Adv. Manich.)	116	Marcus diaconus Vita Porph. (ed. Grégoire and Kugener 1930) 85–91	161
Fr. III, p. 52–54 (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. IV.99–101)	115, 116, 316, 351, 471–73	Macarius Chrysocephalus Philadelphius Rhod. (ed. Von Leutsch 1851) VIII,42	426
Fr. IV, pp. 54–56 (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. II.21)	116	Methodius
Fr. V, p. 56 (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. II.43)	116	De autex. (ed. Bonwetsch 1917) XVII.4–5	232
Fr. VI, p. 57 (= Titus Bostrensis, Contra Manich. II.16)	116, 447	De res. (ed. Bonwetsch 1917) I.38,1 I.38,2 I.38,5 I.39,5 I.39,6 I.40,4–6 I.41,1 I.42,3 I.43,2–44,2 I.45,5–6	343 357 357 357 357 357 357 357 357 357
Johannes Philoponus De op. mund. (ed. Reichardt 1897)	368
In De an. (ed. Hayduck 1897) p. 33.7–12	305
Justinus Martyr Apol. (ed. Krüger 1915) I.4,8	146	Symp. (ed. Bonwetsch 1917) IX.2	357

Michael Apostolius		II.9,2	268
Coll. par. (ed. Von Leutsch 1851)		III.1	288
IX,59a	426	III.1,1	288
XVI,93	426	III.1,2-5	288
		III.1,3	287
		III.1,5	288
Nemesius Emesenus		III.1,6-24	288
De nat. hom. (ed. Morani 1987)		III.1,6	288
1	360, 361	III.1,7-23	288
		III.1,24	288
Origenes		III.4	299-300
		IV.1,1	288
Contra Cels.		IV.3,15	267
(ed. Borret 1967)		IV.4,1	267
I.4	287, 288	IV.4,8	268
(ed. Borret 1968)		IV.4,10	268
III.40	287
IV.14	268, 287, 293	Dial. cum Heracl. (ed.
IV.36	168	Scherer 1960)	122
IV.84	288	24.18-27.8	348
(ed. Borret 1969)		24.23ff.	348
V.20	168	Hom. in Gen. (ed. Baehrens 1920)
V.37	287	(Latin)
VI.33	241	XV.2	361
VI.44	268	Hom. in Jer. (ed. Nautin and Husson
VI.64	272-73	1977)
(ed. Borret 1969a)		XIV.10	287
VII.38	273	XVI.4	336
VII.39	337	Hom. in Luc. (ed. Crouzel, Fournier
VII.46	287	and Périchon 1962)
VIII.21	353	(Latin)
VIII.52	287	XXXV.1	287
De orat. (ed. Koetschau 1899)		Hom. in Num. (ed. Baehrens 1921)
XXIII.3	224	(Latin)
De princ. (ed. Koetschau 1913)		X.3	287
(Latin, partly Greek)		XVII.3	337
I.Praef.	289	In Cant. cant. (ed. Baehrens 1925)
I.Praef.,9	267	(Latin)
I.Praef.,10	289	I	287
I.1,5	272	In Jo.
I.1,6	261, 268, 272	(ed. Blanc 1966)
I.1,8	267	I.20 (121)	361
I.2,2-3	272	I.37 (269-75)	287
I.2,4	268	I.37 (273)	287
I.2,10	268	II.2 (13)-3 (33)	287
I.2,13	268	II.2 (17)	353
I.3,6	287	II.18 (124-25)	268
I.5,3	268	(ed. Blanc 1975)
I.5,5	268	XIII.23 (140)	343
I.6,2	268	XIII.34 (224)	361
I.8,3	268	XIII.37 (236-43)	337
II.3,6	267	XIII.37 (241)	337
II.4,4	338

- XIII.61 (427ff.) 348
 (ed. Blanc 1982)
 XIX.6 (37) 273
 XX.25 (220–30) 361
- In Matth.*
 (ed. Klostermann 1933)
 (Latin)
 ser. 59 287
 ser. 138 343
 (ed. Klostermann 1935)
 (Greek)
 XIII.9 343, 348, 349
 XIII.16 287
 XV.10 269
- In Rom.*
 (ed. Hammond Bammel 1990 [Latin]; Scherer 1957 [Greek])
 II.6–7 287
 III.2 287
 III.3–4 287
 (ed. Hammond Bammel 1997
 [Latin])
 V.1 361
 VI.6 348, 361
 VI.6.36f. 232
 VI.8 287
 (ed. Hammond Bammel 1998
 [Latin])
 VII.5–6 339
 VII.6 339
 See also Philoc.
- Philoc.*
 (ed. Harl and De Lange 1983)
 Probably excerpts from Origen's
In Rom.
 9 287
 9,2–3 287
 9,2.11–14 287
 (ed. Junod 1976)
 Excerpts from Origen's In Gen. III
 23,8 339
 23,9 287
 23,20 273
 Excerpts from Origen's In Rom.
 25,1–3 339
- Photius Constantinopolitanus
- Bibl.*
 (ed. Henry 1959)
 cod. 38 (8a15) 386
 cod. 38 (8a22–25) 368
 cod. 43 (9a13–17) 368
- cod. 81 (63b23–64a9) 141
 (ed. Henry 1960)
 cod. 85 (65a36–65b38) 67, 137,
 138–40,
 178
 cod. 118 (92b14–19) 156
 cod. 118 (92b19–24) 156
 cod. 177 (121b–123a) 407
 cod. 177 (121b) 407
 cod. 177 (121b–122a) 408
 cod. 177 (122a) 409
 cod. 177 (122a5–15) 409
 (ed. Henry 1965)
 cod. 223 (208b–222a) 140
 cod. 223 (218b) 140
 (ed. Henry 1967)
 cod. 231 (287a25–27) 138
 cod. 232 67
 cod. 232 (288b24–30)
 (= Titus Bostrensis,
Contra Manich. I.15,
 Gr. 8.31–35) 114–15,
 118, 430–31
 cod. 232 (288b27) 431
 cod. 232 (288b28) 431
 cod. 232 (288b28–29) 431
 cod. 232 (288b29) 431
 cod. 232 (288b29–30) 431
 cod. 232, Bibl.A (288b25–26) 430–31
 cod. 232, Bibl.M (288b25–26) 431
 cod. 232 (289a17–18) 115
 cod. 232 (291b18–21) 153
 cod. 240 (322b27–30) 368
- De Manich. rec. rep.* (ed.
 Astruc, Conus-Wolska,
 Gouillard, Lemerle,
 Papachryssanthou, and Paramelle 1970) 68
 37 68
- Procopius Gazaetus
- In Gen.* (PG 87,1) 367
 41C3–4 203
 161B–164A 373
 177C8–180A8 376
 180C2–181B3 377
 184A10–12 381
 337D5–340B11 379
 Cf. Eusebius Emesenus, In Oct.

- Serapion Thmuitanus
Adv. Manich. (ed. Casey 1931) 23, 68, 105, 111, 116, 131–32, 138, 142, 152, 182
- Severianus Gabalensis
In Cent. et contra Manich. et Apoll. (ed. Aubineau 1983) 141, 142
- Severus Antiochenus
Hom. cath. (ed. Brière 1960) (Syriac) 79–80, 83, 85–86, 193
 152.14 240
 152.16 240
 152.22–154.24 239
 154.9 240
 156.1 240
 156.5–6 240
 158.28 240
 162.6 240
 162.9 240
 162.11 240
 164.13 240
 164.25–26 240
 166.9 240
- Hom. epithron.* (Syriac) 116
- Short Abjuration Formula* (ed. Vramming 1983) p. 15 181
- Socrates Scholasticus
Hist. eccl. (ed. Hansen 1995) 418
 III.25 143
 VI.3,1–7 141
- Salmaninius Hermias Sozomenus
Hist. eccl. (ed. Bidez 1960a) 418
 III.14,42 66
 V.15,11–12 66, 123
 VI.4 143
 VIII.2,6–8 141
- Suidas Lexicon* (ed. Adler 1967) Δ 1149 94, 139, 140
- Theodorus Mopsuestenus
Against the Magians 141 fragment (Syriac) 405
Against those who say that men sin by nature and not by intention see Coll. Pal.
- Coll. Pal.* (ed. Schwartz 1924–26) 410, 411 (Latin) 51.1 413
 51.4 412
 51.7 412, 413
 51.8 412
- Hom. cat.* (ed. Tonneau 1949) (Syriac) 410
 V.8 141, 200
 XII.8 393
 XIII.8 141
 XIV.13 389
 XIV,14 393
- In Cor. I* (catena fragments, ed. Staab 1933) p. 195.6–20 412
 p. 195.21–29 412
- In Gal.* (ed. Swete 1880) (Latin) 402
 1.3–5 393
 1.4–5 141
 2.15–16 393, 401
 5.13 141
 5.19–21 141
 6.14 347
 7.5–10 393
- In Gen.* 368, 385–86, 387, 392, 397, 400, 402, 409–10, 413
- Syriac fragments (ed. Sachau 1869) 28.14–29.10 (= Petit 1991, 126–27, no. 176) 399
- Syriac fagments (ed. Tonneau 1953) p. 52–53 (= Petit 1991, 288–89, no. 449.4–14) 404

- p. 63 (= Concil. Univ. Const. LXII,71) 385
- Collectio Coisliniana* (ed. Petit 1986)
- p. 99–100, no. 96 398, 404
- p. 115–16, no. 110 404
- p. 115, no. 110.1–7 397, 403
- p. 116, no. 110.25–28 404
- Catena in Gen.* (ed. Petit 1991)
- p. 126–27, no. 176 399
- p. 158–59, no. 228 272
- p. 159, no. 229 272
- p. 159–60, no. 230 272
- p. 160–61, no. 231 272
- p. 173–74, no. 246 398
- p. 176–77, no. 252 272
- p. 181–82, no. 261 399
- p. 227–28, no. 336 387
- p. 227–28, no. 336.1–6 401
- p. 235–35, no. 348 404
- p. 239, no. 353 404
- p. 254–55, no. 381 397
- p. 273, no. 418 393, 400
- p. 288–89, no. 449.4–14 404
- See also Concil. Univ. Const. and Vigilius, Constitutum
- In Rom.* (catena fragments, ed. Staab 1933) 387
- p. 127.26–28 398
- p. 141.27–142.11 403
- p. 141.29–142.2 404
- p. 143.18–144.8 141
- p. 163.3 399
- In Tim. I* (ed. Swete 1882) (Latin)
- 4.1–3 141
- Theodoretus Cyrensis
- Eranistes*
- containing fragment of Eusebius Emesenus, see De arbitr.
- Haeret. fabul. comp.* (PG 83) 67, 136, 141
- 340A 135, 137, 138
- I.24–25 (372D–377A) 135
- I.25 (376C) 135
- I.25 (377A) 135
- I.26 (378B) 80
- I.26 (381B) 135, 137–38, 416, 417, 419
- Quaest. in Oct.* (ed. PG 80; Marcos and Sáenz-Badillos 1979) 254, 367
- Theonas Alexandrinus (?)
- P. Rylands 469 (Pastoral letter) (ed. Roberts 1938) 130
- line 26–30 130
- Theophilus Antiochenus
- Ad Autol.* (Grant 1970) 218
- II.17 304
- II.24–25 359
- II.24 359
- II.25 215, 230, 231, 323, 332, 354, 355
- II.26 224, 335, 355–56
- II.27 359–60
- II.28 332
- II.29 232
- Titus Bostrensis
- Contra Manich.*
- Gr. (ed. De Lagarde 1859; Nagel 1973; Ch. XI)
- title 179
- I.1–13 259
- I.1–5 18
- I.1 17, 162, 169
- p. 1.1–16 (Ch. XI.1) 12, 118, 424–26
- p. 1.1–2 260
- p. 1.2 260
- p. 1.3–8 260
- p. 1.8–15 260
- p. 1.8 166
- p. 1.13 197
- p. 1.17 303
- p. 1.20–21 260
- p. 1.22–30 (Ch. XI.2) 1, 118, 158–59, 280, 291, 426–27
- p. 1.22–24 260
- p. 1.24 12
- p. 1.27–28 158
- p. 1.28 17, 281
- p. 1.30 17, 260
- p. 2.3–6 260

I.2	17-18	(Ch. XI.4)	427-28
p. 2.15-38	260	p. 6.25-29	167
p. 2.15	166	p. 6.27	167, 262
p. 2.16	167	p. 6.28-29	281, 290
p. 2.25-26	167	p. 6.29	291
p. 2.35	307	I.13	67, 263,
I.3	18		277, 279,
p. 2.38-3.24	260		298, 325
p. 2.39-3.1	79	p. 6.32-7.4	269
I.4	18	p. 6.37-7.4	267
p. 3.24-31	260	p. 6.37	267
p. 3.26	251, 260	p. 7.1	263
p. 3.28	267	p. 7.2	263
p. 3.32	267	p. 7.3	263
p. 3.33	267	p. 7.3-4	263
p. 3.34	267	p. 7.4-36
p. 3.35-36	267	(Ch. XI.5)	263, 428-30
I.5-13	74	p. 7.4-5	264
I.5	18, 290	p. 7.4	266-67
p. 3.38-39	18	p. 7.5-10	264
p. 4.11-14 (Ch. XI.3)	118, 261,	p. 7.11-12	264
	291, 427	p. 7.12-13	264
p. 4.12-13	18, 281,	p. 7.12	264
	290	p. 7.13-17	264
p. 4.12	291	p. 7.13	263
p. 4.14	291	p. 7.14	263
I.6ff.	67	p. 7.14-15	264
I.6	18	p. 7.17-25	266
p. 4.15	79, 191	p. 7.17	263
p. 4.16ff.	73	p. 7.26	263
p. 4.16	187	p. 7.31-8.16	269
I.7-16	18	p. 7.32-33	266
I.7	18, 293	p. 7.32	267
p. 4.18-28	261	p. 7.33-35	267
p. 4.26-27	281	p. 7.35-36	267
I.8	18-19	p. 7.35	267
p. 4.28-5.3	261	p. 7.36-8.3	269
I.9	19	p. 8.15-16	269
p. 5.8	167	I.14-15	19
p. 5.9	152	I.15	114, 167,
I.10	19		281, 292,
p. 5.37	168		430-31
I.11ff.	290	p. 8.27-35
I.11-13	19	(Ch. XI.6)	292, 430-31
I.11-12	262	p. 8.31-35	114
I.11	86, 291	p. 8.31	167
p. 6.8	166-67	p. 8.34-35	281, 292
p. 6.17-32	262	I.16	19
p. 6.17	281, 290,	p. 9.1-4 (Ch. XI.7)	431-32
	291	p. 9.3-4	251
p. 6.23-25	262	I.17	18, 19, 32,
p. 6.24	262		83, 169
I.12	291	p. 9.13-31	177
p. 6.25-32	290, 291,	p. 9.13-22	177

p. 9.18	187	I.29-30	300
p. 9.23	198	I.29	21
p. 9.25-38 (Ch. XI.8)	118, 432-33	p. 17.36-18.6 (Ch. XI.12)	118, 299, 435-36
p. 9.25-27	207	p. 17.38	198
p. 9.28-29	207-8	p. 18.2-5	299
p. 9.31ff.	187	p. 18.3-4	300
p. 9.34-38	208	p. 18.5	300
p. 9.34	198	p. 18.22	208
p. 9.35-36	187	p. 18.34-35	158
p. 10.12-17	168	I.30	21
p. 10.12	158	I.31	21, 208
p. 10.13	82, 168	I.32	21
p. 10.14	167-68	p. 20.10-21.20 (Ch. XI.13)	299, 436-39
p. 10.17	204	p. 20.11-16	299, 300
p. 10.25-27	292	p. 20.12-13	300
p. 10.25-26	281	p. 20.14-15	300
I.18-37	19	p. 20.14	300
I.18	19-20	p. 20.16-18	301
p. 10.35-11.4	116	p. 20.17	299
p. 10.36-11.4	110	p. 20.18-22	301
p. 10.36	110, 208	p. 20.22-31	299
p. 11.4	109	p. 20.22-24	302
I.19	20	p. 20.24	299
I.20	20	p. 20.29-31	300
I.21ff.	83	p. 20.30	302
I.21	20, 310	p. 20.31-21.3	306, 308
p. 12.22	79, 81, 190	p. 20.31-21.2	311
p. 13.2 (Ch. XI.10)	81, 84, 191, 433	p. 20.31-33	302
I.22	20	p. 21.2-6	302
p. 13.6-9	197	p. 21.8-11	308-9
p. 13.6-7	190	p. 21.11-16	310
p. 13.6	79	p. 21.14	311
I.23-25	310	I.33	21
I.23	20	p. 21.20-23	317
p. 14.5-6	158	p. 21.25-29	317
p. 14.10-11	267	I.34	21, 308
p. 14.21	267	p. 21.29-30	313
p. 14.24-25	167	p. 21.37-22.1	308
I.24	20	p. 21.39-22.1	308
p. 15.19-37 (Ch. XI.11)	118, 433-35	p. 22.1	308
p. 15.19-25	267	p. 22.3	308
p. 15.22-23	308, 370	p. 22.11	308
p. 15.26-16.4	263	p. 22.13	307
p. 15.32-33	267	p. 22.18	308
I.25	21	p. 22.21	306
p. 16.21-22	101	p. 22.23	311
I.26	21	p. 22.26	308
p. 16.23	167	p. 22.27	308
p. 16.32	167	p. 22.29	308
p. 16.35	167	p. 22.31	306
I.27	21	I.35	21-22
I.28	21	p. 22.34	308

- p. 22.36-37 306-7
 p. 22.38-39 306-7
 p. 23.1 302
 I.36 22
 p. 23.8-9 187
 I.37 22
 I.38 18, 22, 35,
 189, 190
 I.39-40 18
 I.39 22
 p. 24.9ff. 208
 I.40 18, 22-23
 p. 24.31-25.1 218
 p. 25.1 167
 I.41 23
 I.42 18, 23
 I.42-II.1 169
 II.1 23
 p. 25.36-26.1 168
 p. 26.3-5 303
 p. 26.4 158
 p. 26.5 79
 p. 26.8-9 177, 251
 II.2 23
 p. 26.10-11 158
 p. 26.11-12 303
 p. 26.16-17 274
 II.3-14 23
 II.3 23-24, 314
 p. 26.31-27.2
 (Ch. XI.14) 118, 439-40
 p. 26.31-34 208
 p. 26.34-27.2 322
 p. 26.34-39 322
 p. 26.38-39 312
 p. 27.6-16
 (Ch. XI.15) 440-41
 p. 27.6-9 309
 p. 27.9 314
 p. 27.9-12 314
 p. 27.12-16 317-18
 II.4 24
 p. 27.20-28.18 312
 p. 28.4f. 94
 p. 28.12-15 312
 II.5 24
 II.6 24
 p. 27.18-20 318
 II.7-8 302, 304
 II.7 24, 303, 325
 p. 29.9-28
 (Ch. XI.16) 325, 441-43
 p. 29.9-18 302-3
 p. 29.11ff. 312
 p. 29.14 158
 p. 29.18-20 303
 p. 29.18-19 158
 p. 29.20-28 306
 p. 29.20-22 312
 p. 29.23 440
 p. 29.26 306
 II.8-10 325
 II.8 24
 p. 29.28-34 302-3
 p. 29.30 308
 p. 29.31 263
 p. 29.32 308
 p. 29.36 349
 p. 30.6f. 94
 II.9 24
 p. 30.21-24 312
 II.10 24
 p. 30.38 303
 II.11 24, 160, 325
 p. 31.3-7
 (Ch. XI.17) 324, 443
 p. 31.3-4 158
 p. 31.7-17 317
 p. 31.13 313
 II.12 24-25,
 295-96
 p. 31.17-23
 (Ch. XI.18) 118, 444
 p. 31.17-19 317
 p. 31.19-23 317
 p. 31.22-23 364
 p. 31.23-29 317
 p. 31.31 281
 II.13 25
 p. 31.33-32.22
 (Ch. XI.19) 118, 444-46
 p. 31.33 79
 p. 31.34 299, 311
 p. 31.34-35 311
 p. 31.35-38 313
 p. 31.39-32.4 313
 p. 32.3 313
 p. 32.4 313
 p. 32.4-5 313-14
 p. 32.5-9 313
 p. 32.8-11 313
 p. 32.16-17 318
 p. 32.17-19 318
 p. 32.19-22 311
 II.14 25, 350
 p. 32.25 350
 p. 32.28 303
 II.15-21 25
 II.15 25, 27
 p. 32.30-33.12 114

p. 32.37-33.2	115	II.25	27
II.16	25-26	II.26	27
p. 34.7-14		II.27	27-28
(Ch. XI.20)	70-71, 100,	p. 43.18-32	115
	118, 447	II.28	28, 162
p. 34.7-10	315	p. 43.34-37	126-27
p. 34.10-14	116	p. 43.37-38	345
p. 34.10-12	364	p. 44.1-15	345
II.17	26	p. 44.6-9
p. 35.34-38		(Ch. XI.26)	454
(Ch. XI.21)	345,	p. 44.7	345
	447-48	II.29	28
II.18	26	II.30	28
II.19	26	II.31	28
p. 36.15-28		p. 45.14	263, 303
(Ch. XI.22)	345, 347-49,	p. 45.15	263
	448-49	p. 45.16	303
II.20	26	II.32	28
p. 37.4	158	II.33	28
II.21	26	II.34	28
p. 37.15-38.26	116	p. 46.30	263
II.22	26-27, 28,	p. 46.31	263
	343-44, 345,	II.35	28
	350	II.36	28
p. 38.30-40.5		p. 47.2-32	312
(Ch. XI.23)	118, 298,	p. 47.5-6	315
	449-52	p. 47.10	303
p. 39.1-11	343-44	p. 47.26-27	158
p. 39.7-10	158	II.37	28-29,
p. 39.11-16	344		274
p. 39.15	343	p. 48.22-24	325
p. 39.16-26	344	p. 47.33	263
p. 39.22-23	310	p. 48.4	158
p. 39.26-40.5	344	p. 48.5-7	158
p. 39.34-35	158	II.38-41	294
p. 40.3-5	345	II.38	29
II.23	27, 296, 345	II.39	29, 295
p. 40.5	79	p. 49.19-50.10	312-13
p. 40.7	303	p. 49.20-21	314
p. 40.10-14		p. 49.35-37
(Ch. XI.24)	296, 452	(Ch. XI.27)	118, 312-13,
p. 40.10-12	345		454
p. 40.11-12	345	p. 50.5-6	295
p. 40.12-14	345	p. 50.9-10	281, 295
p. 40.12-13	281	II.40	29
p. 40.19-37		p. 50.10-22	312
(Ch. XI.25)	453-54	p. 50.15-18
p. 40.19-32	345	(Ch. XI.28)	455
p. 40.32-35	345	p. 50.17-18	312
p. 40.32-33	345	II.41-42	114
p. 40.34	345	p. 50.22-51.16	114
II.24	27	II.41	29
p. 41.4-42.14	114	II.42	29
p. 41.9	307	p. 51.4-5	158
p. 41.14	307	II.43	29

- p. 52.7-23 116
 p. 52.25-26 158
 II.44 29-30, 258, 294
 p. 52.33 281
 p. 53.7-12 258
 p. 53.14-18 258
 p. 53.18-21 258
 p. 53.21ff. 259
 p. 53.22 349
 II.45-46 314
 II.45 30
 p. 54.36 349
 p. 55.9-14 345
 II.46 30, 309
 p. 55.18-37 314
 p. 55.24 309
 p. 55.27 309
 p. 55.32-33 310
 p. 55.37 309
 II.47 30
 p. 55.37-56.17 345
 p. 56.6-9
 (Ch. XI.29) 455
 p. 56.7-9 345-46
 II.48-49 115
 p. 56.23-57.2 115
 II.48 30
 p. 56.20 274
 p. 56.23-28
 (Ch. XI.30) 116, 455-56
 p. 56.24-25 274
 p. 56.36-37
 (Ch. XI.31) 116, 274, 456
 p. 56.36 158
 II.49 30-31
 II.50-54 102
 II.50 31
 p. 57.27-28 303
 II.51 31
 II.52 31
 p. 58.22 167
 II.53 31
 II.54 31-32
 p. 59.39-60.5 267
 p. 60.2-3 267
 II.55 32
 II.56 32, 171
 p. 60.29 349
 p. 60.38-61.5 78
 II.57 32
 II.58 32, 314-15
 p. 61.37-62.13 314
 p. 62.6-7 315
 II.59 32
 p. 62.14 79
 II.60 32-33
 II.61 33
 II.62 3, 290,
 294
 p. 63.35-38 294
 p. 63.38-39 294
 p. 63.39-64.2 294
 p. 63.39-64.1 281
 p. 64.2-3 294
 II.63-65 95
 II.63-64 33
 II.65 33
 II.66 33
 III.1-7 80
 III.1 34, 70, 162
 p. 66.28-67.9
 (Ch. XI.32) 118, 280, 291,
 456-58
 p. 66.28-37 159-60
 p. 66.29 281
 p. 66.31-37 162
 p. 66.32 459
 p. 66.39-67.4 160
 p. 67.8 163
 p. 67.15-17 204
 p. 67.16-17 167
 p. 67.17 307
 III.2 34, 199
 III.3 34, 199
 p. 67.35-68.10 162
 III.4-47 34
 III.4-9 34
 III.4-6 207, 208, 322
 III.4-5 43, 82, 85,
 189, 190, 191,
 192, 196, 199,
 205
 III.4 35, 189, 199
 p. 68.10-12 81-83
 p. 68.10-11 79, 191
 III.5 35, 189, 190
 p. 68.12-27 177
 p. 68.12 35
 p. 68.18-24
 (Ch. XI.33) 194-96,
 459-60
 p. 68.20-21 187
 p. 68.22 196, 303
 III.6 35, 322
 p. 69.2-3 322
 III.7-30 84, 111-12
 III.7-29 91, 101
 III.735 41, 42, 43, 44,
 80, 85, 89, 190,
 199, 205, 216,

	221, 222,	III.10,4-15	276
	223, 224,	III.10,4	274
	226, 233,	III.10,8-9	276
	234, 237,	III.10,13	274
	241, 242,	III.10,15	275
	243, 244,	III.11-12	36
	245, 246,	III.11,1-2	274
	247, 249,	III.11,1	275
	250, 251,	III.11,3-5	275
	328, 380	III.11,3	274
III.7,1-9	206, 247,	ed.N p. 304.18-20
	321	(Ch. XI.36)	462
	p. 69.5-25 (= ed.N	ed.N p. 304.18-19	274
	p. 296.1-298.6)	III.11,6-III.12	322
	(Ch. XI.34)	III.11,11	322
	76, 84, 118,	ed.N 306.14-15	322
	119, 190,	III.13	36
	206, 460-62	III.13,1-2	322
III.7,1	207, 208,	ed.N p. 308.11-15	322
	275, 321-22	III.13,3	322
III.7,2-9	208, 209,	ed.N p. 308.16-19	322
	326	III.13,9	306-7
III.7,2-4	216	ed.N p. 310.7	306-7
III.7,2	208, 225	III.13,10	324
III.7,3-4	247	ed.N p. 310.9-12	324
III.7,3	326	III.14	36, 323
	p. 69.8	III.14,3-6	370
	p. 69.10-11	ed.N p. 310.17-
	p. 69.10	312.6	370
	p. 69.14	ed.N p. 312.3	370
III.7,8-9	349	III.15	36-37, 323
	p. 69.19-22	III.15,5	312
III.7,10-15	206, 209	III.15,7-9	463
III.7,12-13	244	ed.N p. 314.7-10
III.8	35, 199	(Ch. XI.37)	463
	ed.N p. 300.10-12	III.15,7	326
III.8,2	462	ed.N p. 314.7	326
	ed.N p. 300.12-13	III.15,8-10	329
	(Ch. XI.35)	III.15,11	350
	201, 203,	ed.N p. 314.11-12	350
	462	III.15,12	350
III.9	35, 204	III.15,13-18	329
	ed.N p. 300.15-	III.16	37
	302.3	III.16,1-3	329
	ed.N p. 302.4-5	III.16,1	328
	ed.N p. 302.4-9	ed.N p. 316.8-10	328
III.10-29	34, 57, 232,	III.17-18	37
	320, 350	III.17	37
III.10-III.11	349	III.17,3	329, 352
III.10-III.11,5	322	ed.N p. 318.3-5	329
III.10-III.11,2	275	III.17,5-6	329
III.10	35-36, 37	III.17,5	329
III.10,1	207, 275	ed.N p. 318.6-10
	ed.N p. 302.11	(Ch. XI.38)	329, 463-64
III.10,2	207	III.17,7	329, 350, 419
	ed.N p. 302.13
III.10,3	276
	276
	276

ed.N p. 318.14–15	329	III.24,7–11	466–67
III.17,8	352	ed.N p. 334.10–20
III.17,10–11	330	(Ch. XI.43)	466–67
III.17,11	312	III.25	40
III.17,12–13	330, 335	III.26–27	362
III.18	37–38, 162	III.26	40
III.18,1	350	III.26,1–2	362
III.18,2	275, 349,	III.26,1	362
	350	ed.N p. 338.4	362
III.18,3	312, 350	III.27	40, 84
III.18,4–5	464	III.27,7	362
ed.N p. 320.12–14		ed.N p. 340.11–13	362
(Ch. XI.39)	350, 464	III.27,8–9	349
III.18,4	350	ed.N p. 340.13–19
ed.N p. 320.12	350	(Ch. XI.44)	349, 467–68
III.18,5–6	351	III.27,8	225
III.18,7	312, 329,	III.28	40–41, 324
	351	III.28,1–3	312
III.18,9	351	III.28,1	324
III.18,10	351	ed.N p. 342.1–4	324
III.18,11	351	III.28,5	309, 324
ed.N p. 322.1–6		ed.N p. 342.11–12	309, 324
(Ch. XI.40)	351, 464–65	III.29	41, 374
III.19	38	III.29,1–5	323
III.19,1	352	III.29,1–2	312
III.19,2	352	III.29,5	312
III.19,3	352	III.29,6	309
III.19,4	351	ed.N p. 344.18	309
III.20–21	326	III.29,7–8	321
III.20	38	ed.N p. 344.19–
ed.N p. 324.14–15	38	346.5	321
ed.N p. 324.15	38	III.29,8	232
III.20,6–7	326–27	III.29,13	207
III.21	38–39, 100	III.30	41, 111
III.21,3–4	465	Sacr. Par., Codex Rupefucaldinus
ed.N p. 326.6–14		IV.91 (Ch. XI.48)	116, 281,
(Ch. XI.41)	98, 465		293, 365, 470
III.21,3	327	Sacr. Par., Codex Coislinianus	276—
III.21,4	327	Codex Rupefucaldinus
ed.N p. 326.11–14	327	IV.99–101	115, 116,
III.21,6	329		298
III.22	39	IV.99 (Ch. XI.50,II)	115, 116,
III.22,1–2	466		298, 316–17,
ed.N p. 328.5–12			471–72
(Ch. XI.42)	466	IV.100 (Ch. XI.51,I)	115, 116,
III.22,1	328		298, 315,
ed.N p. 328.5–8	328		351, 412,
III.22,2–3	320, 352		472–73
III.23–24	323	IV.101 (Ch. XI.51,I)	115, 116,
III.23	39		298, 472–73
III.23,9	312	Sy (ed. De Lagarde 1859a;
III.23,11–13	312	Ch. XI)
III.23,17	312	(Syriac)
III.24–25	241, 337,	title	112, 179
	403	I.1	425–26
III.24	39–40, 241

p. 2.7	425	p. 26.32	437
p. 2.8-9	425	p. 26.35	437
p. 2.10-11	425	p. 27.1-2	437
p. 2.11	425	p. 27.6	437
p. 2.12-13	197, 425	II.1	307
p. 2.15	425	p. 82.32	307
p. 2.17	303	II.3	440-41
p. 2.22	426	p. 34.4-6	440
p. 2.25	426	p. 34.8-9	440
p. 3.1	281	p. 34.17	441
I.2	307	II.7	442
p. 4.6	307	p. 37.3-8	442
I.5	427	p. 37.22	442
p. 5.30-31	281	II.10	303
p. 5.31	427	p. 39.13	303
I.7	281	II.11	443
p. 6.14	281	p. 39.19	443
I.11	281	II.12	444
p. 8.25	281	p. 40.2-3	444
I.12	428	p. 40.11	281
p. 9.1	428	II.13	445
p. 9.3	428	p. 40.25	313, 445
p. 9.4	428	p. 40.28-29	445
p. 9.5	281, 291,	p. 40.32	445
	428	p. 41.2-6	445
p. 9.6	194	II.14	303
I.13	429	p. 41.19	303
p. 10.8	429	II.16	447
p. 10.14	429	p. 43.10	447
p. 10.17	429	II.17	447
I.15	114-15, 431	p. 45.18	447
p. 11.33-34	431	II.19	448
p. 11.35	431	p. 46.19	448
p. 12.1	431	II.22	450
p. 12.2-3	431	p. 49.6-7	450
p. 12.3	281	p. 49.8-9	450
I.17	432-33	p. 49.33-34	450
p. 12.34	198	II.23	453
p. 13.11	198, 432	p. 50.27	303
p. 13.32-34		p. 50.33	281
(Ch. XI.9)	204, 433	p. 51.10	453
p. 14.8	281	II.24	307
I.21	433	p. 51.35	307
p. 17.8	433	p. 52,6	307
I.24	434	II.31	303
p. 20.25	434	p. 56.30	303
p. 20.32	434	p. 56.32	303
p. 20.34-35	434	II.36	303
I.29	435	p. 59.3	303
p. 23.14	198	II.39	281
p. 23.17	435	p. 62.26	281
I.32	437	II.44	281
p. 26.7	437	p. 65.31	281
p. 26.11-12	437	II.47	455
p. 26.25-26	437	p. 69.30	455

p. 69.32	455	III.32	42
II.48	456	III.33	42
p. 70.11	456	III.34	42
p. 70.12	456	III.35	42, 168
p. 70.13	456	III.36	42-43
p. 70.15	456	III.37	43
p. 70.26	456	III.38	43
II.50	303	p. 103.13-15	189, 191
p. 71.27	303	III.39	43
II.62	281	III.40	43
p. 78.35	281	III.41	43
III.1	457-58	III.42	43
p. 82.5	281, 458	III.43	43-44, 171
p. 82.8	457, 458, 459	III.44	44
p. 82.10	457	III.45	44
p. 82.12-13	457	III.46	44
p. 82.13-14	457	III.47	44
p. 82.21	457	III.48	44
p. 82.22	457	III.49	44
p. 82.23	457	III.50	44
p. 82.24	458	III.51	44
p. 82.32	307	III.52	44
III.5	194-96, 459-60	III.53	44
p. 83.35-84.7		III.54	44
(Ch. XI.33)	194-96, 459-60	III.55	44
p. 84.3-4	459	III.56	44
p. 84.4-5	459	III.57	44
p. 84.5	196, 303, 459	III.58	44-45
p. 84.6-7	196, 459	III.59	45
III.7	460-61	III.60	45
p. 84.28	460	III.61	45
p. 84.29	208	III.62-65	35
p. 84.31-32	196	III.62	45
p. 84.31	196, 461	III.63	45
p. 84.32	461	III.64	45-46
p. 84.34-35	197	III.65	46
p. 85.8	461	III.66	46, 167
p. 85.8-9	461	III.67	46
III.11	462	III.68	46, 146-47, 148, 167, 199
p. 87.9	462	p. 116.20-21	147
III.15	463	p. 116.21-22	147
p. 89.27	463	p. 116.23-24	147
III.17	463-64	p. 116.23	147, 149
p. 90.24-27		p. 116.24	147
(Ch. XI.38)	329, 463-64	III.69-74	162
III.18	350, 464	III.69-72	146
p. 91.14-15	350, 464	p. 116.31-119.5	146
III.22	466	III.69	46
p. 93.21	466	p. 117.16	258
III.24	467	III.70	46
p. 95.17	467	III.71-72	146
III.30-47	34	III.71	46-47, 146
III.30-31	89	III.72	47
III.30	41-42	III.73	47
III.31	42, 320, 352

III.74	47	p. 138.13	257
III.75	47-48, 185	IV.20	53, 167
III.76	48, 184	IV.21	53, 167
III.77	48, 184	p. 139.3-9	188, 203
III.78	48	IV.22-39	53
III.79	48-49	IV.22	53, 202
III.80	49	IV.23	53, 163
III.81	49	p. 139.34-35	163
III.82	49	IV.24	53
III.83	49	IV.25	53
III.84	49	p. 141.23-24	267
III.85	49	p. 141.34-142.1	275
III.86	49-50	IV.26	53
III.87	50, 184	IV.27ff.	53
III.88	50	IV.27-28	315
IV.1	50, 199	p. 142.14-143.24	315
IV.2	50	IV.27	53
p. 129.25-26	161	p. 142.25	315
IV.3	50	p. 142.31-32	315
IV.4	50-51	IV.28	53-54, 298
p. 130.26-27	303	p. 143.11-20	315-16
p. 130.27	274-75	p. 143.16-17	298
IV.5	51	p. 143.22	315
IV.6	51	IV.29	54
IV.7	51	IV.30	54, 298, 318
IV.8	51	p. 143.35-144.1	298
IV.9	51	p. 144.1	318
IV.10	51	IV.31	54
IV.11	51, 202-3	IV.32	54
IV.12-13	199	p. 144.35-145.2	162
IV.12	51, 199	IV.33	54, 199, 202
p. 134.22-135.17	152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157	IV.34	54
p. 134.28-29		IV.35-36	200
(Ch. XI.45)	152, 203, 468	IV.35	54, 202
p. 134.34-35	153	IV.36	54
p. 134.35-135.1	153	IV.37	55
p. 135.1-2	153	IV.38	55
p. 135.2	153	IV.39	55
p. 135.3-4	153	p. 148.4-9	116
p. 135.4-8	153	p. 148.5-6	298
IV.13	51-52	p. 148.7-9	316
IV.14	52	IV.40-43	55, 190
IV.15	52	IV.40	55
IV.16	52	IV.41	55
IV.17-21	146	IV.42	55
IV.17	52	IV.43	55, 167
IV.18-21	162	IV.44	55, 199
IV.18	52	p. 150.33-35	205
IV.19	52-53, 146, 167, 169, 173, 279	IV.45-49	55
p. 138.4-14		IV.45	55-56
(Ch. XI.46)	7, 103, 256, 300, 468-69	p. 151.5-29	294
		p. 151.5-11	294
		p. 151.8	201
		p. 151.8-12	202
		p. 151.11-12	295

- p. 151.12-16 295
 p. 151.16-20 295
 p. 151.20-21 295
 p. 151.22-24 295
 p. 151.23 281
 p. 151.24-26 295
 p. 151.26-29 295
 IV.46 56, 202
 p. 152.4 202
 IV.47 56, 152
 p. 152.21-22 307
 IV.48 56
 IV.49 56
 IV.50 56
 IV.51-55 57
 IV.51 56
 IV.52 56
 IV.53 56
 IV.54 56
 IV.55 56
 IV.56 56-57
 IV.57-85 44, 57, 303
 IV.57 41, 202
 IV.58 57
 IV.59 57
 IV.60-61 232, 309,
 312
 IV.60 57
 p. 159.9 232
 IV.61 57
 p. 159.13 232
 p. 159.16 232
 p. 159.18 232
 IV.62 57-58
 IV.63 58
 IV.64 58, 309, 312
 IV.65 58
 IV.66 58
 IV.67 58
 IV.68 58
 IV.69 58
 IV.70 58
 IV.71 58
 IV.72 58
 IV.73 58-59
 IV.74 59
 p. 164.5-22 314
 IV.75 59
 IV.76 59
 p. 165.20ff. 115
 p. 165.22 115
 IV.77 59
 IV.78 59
 IV.79 59, 202, 246
 p. 166.31-167.2 163-64
 IV.80 59
 IV.81 59
 IV.82 59-60
 p. 167.29-168.7 314
 IV.83 60, 312
 IV.84 60, 303, 304,
 350
 p. 168.18-19 303
 p. 168.19-31 303
 p. 168.23 303
 p. 168.27 350
 p. 168.28 303
 p. 168.29 303
 p. 168.31-34 303
 p. 168.32 303
 p. 168.34-35 307
 p. 168.35 307
 p. 169.1 303
 p. 169.2-3 307
 p. 169.2 303
 p. 169.4 303
 p. 169.12-17 143
 IV.85 60, 202
 IV.86-109 60
 IV.86 60, 63, 203
 p. 169.34-170.3
 (Ch. XI.47) 150, 152,
 469
 IV.87 60, 202
 IV.88 60
 IV.89 60, 202
 IV.90-95 60, 364
 IV.90 60-61, 203,
 299
 IV.91 61, 116, 293
 p. 172.11-12 293
 p. 172.13 281, 470
 p. 172.14 470
 IV.92 61
 IV.93 61-62, 364
 p. 173.20 364
 p. 173.22 364
 p. 173.24 364
 p. 173.25 364
 p. 174.14 364
 IV.94 62 346 364
 p. 175.7-12
 (Ch. XI.49) 346, 470
 p. 175.8 364
 p. 175.21 364
 p. 175.22 364
 p. 175.23 364
 p. 175.25 364
 p. 175.33 364
 IV.95 62, 185

p. 176.19	364–65	subscript	112, 179
IV.96	62–63, 203	p.186.14–15	112, 179
IV.97	63, 184, 203
IV.98	63	Hom. in Luc. (catena
IV.99–101	115, 116, 298	fragments; ed.
IV.99	63, 185	Sickenberger 1901)	66, 78, 90,
p. 178.6ff.	298		128, 143, 145,
p. 178.6–13			153, 164, 172
(Ch. XI.50,I)	298, 316, 471	schol. to 1.80 ¹ , p. 147	315
p. 178.8	316	schol. to 10.21 ¹ ,
p. 178.13ff.	471–72	p. 193–94	218, 275
p. 178.13	316, 471	schol. to 20.34,
p. 178.15	471	p. 234–35	327
IV.100	63	catena fragments, ed.
p. 179.1–11	472	Reuss 1976	128
p. 179.3–4	472	Coptic catena
p. 179.6	472	fragments, ed. De
p. 179.7	315, 472	Lagarde 1886	128
p. 179.8–11	351	See also Catena in Matthaeum (Arabic)
p. 179.8	473
p. 179.11–13 (Ch. XI.51,II)	412, 473	Sermo in epiphaniam (ed.
IV.101	63	De Lagarde 1863;
p. 179.17–19	472	Rucker 1933)	129
p. 179.18–19	473	(Syriac)
IV.102	63	Pseudo-Titus
p. 180.8	208	Interpretation of the
IV.103	63	parables of the
IV.104	63	Unjust Judge and
IV.105	63–64	the Pharisee and the
IV.106	64, 203	Tax Collector	129
IV.107	64
IV.108	64	Oratio in ram. palm.
p. 183.9–11	310–11	(ed. PG 18;
p. 183.26–184.6	197	Aubineau 1980)	110, 129
IV.109	64	(Greek)
IV.110	64	Georgian version (ed.
IV.111	64, 203, 275,	Van Esbroeck 1975)	129
	276	Church-Slavonic
p. 184.18–22	275, 276	version (ed. Hannick
IV.112	64	1981)	129
p. 184.33–185.3	163	Zacharias Mitylenensis rhetor (?)
IV.113	64	Capita (ed. Lieu 1994)	181, 186
IV.114	64–65	2,36	181
IV.115	65	2,45–46	181
IV.116	65	4,112–15	181

III. Latin-Christian texts

Ambrosius Mediolanensis	6,30	221, 223
De parad. (ed. Schenkl	6,31	221, 222
1896)	6,32	221, 222
5,28	7,35	221, 222, 223
	221, 223	221, 222
	8,38	221, 222

- 8,40 221, 223
8,41 221, 222
- Aurelius Augustinus Hipponensis
- Conf.* (ed. Verheijen 1981)
- III 207
III.VII 248
III.VII,12 251
III.VIII 248
IV.XVI,28 263
V.X,18 173
V.XI,21 201
- Contra Adim.* (ed. Zycha 1891)
- 85, 181, 182,
183, 184, 185,
186, 248
- VII,1 248
VIII 184
X 184
XI 248
XII 183
XII,4-5 184
XII,5 185
XV,1 182
XXI 185
- Contra Faust.* (ed. Zycha 1891)
- 182, 191-92,
243
- I.1 165
I.2 181-82, 245
I.3 245
VI.6 182
XIII.6 168
XV.6 150
XV.9 245
XVI.30-31 182
XX.2 11
XXI.1 11, 197
XXII.4 244, 247
XXII.5 244
XXII.9 354
XXII.18 233
XXII.21 233
XXIX.1 200
XXXII.1-2 201
XXXII.7 201
XXXII.17 150
XXXIII.3 201
- Contra Fel.* (ed. Zycha 1892)
- I.IX 150
I.XVII 203
I.XVIII 11
- Contra adv. leg. et proph.*
(ed. Daur 1985)
- II.12,41 (1294-98) 181
II.12,42 (1306-20) 181
II.12,42 (1321-22) 181
II.12,42 (1328-29) 185
II.41 81
- Contra ep. fund.* (ed. Zycha 1891)
- 12 85
25 87
- De civ. Dei*
- IV.27 285
VI.2ff. 285
VI.5 285
- De duab. anim.* (ed. Zycha 1891) 299
- De Gen. contra Manich.*
(ed. Weber 1998) 85, 247, 248
- I.III,5.1-4 203
I.VIII,13.1-4 247
I.VIII,13.3-4 247
II.XXXVI,39.1-7 247
II.XXXVI,39.1-4 246
II.XXXVI,39.4-7 246
II.XXXVI,39.7-9 246
II.XXXVIII,42.1-4 245, 247
II.XXXVIII,42.11 246
II.XXXVIII,42.16 246
II.XXXVIII,42.19 246
II.XXXVIII,42.21-22 246
II.XXXVIII,42.28 246
- De haer.* (ed. Plaetse and Beukers 1979)
- XLVI,15 (151-53) 247-48
247
- De lib. arb.* (ed. Green 1970)
- I.II,4,10-11 251-52
- De mor. eccl.*
XXIX (61) 201
- De nat. boni* (ed. Zycha 1892)
- 42 173
46 85, 192
- Retract.* (ed. Mutzenbecher 1984)
- I,XXXII (XXI) 183
I,XXXII (XXI),1 182, 185
- Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius
- De cons. phil.* (ed. Bieler 1957)
- V,3,15 340

- | | | | |
|--|----------------|---|-----------|
| Coll. Pal. | | II.5,1 | 219 |
| See Theodorus Mopsuestenus | | II.5,3-4 | 335 |
| | | II.5,4 | 335 |
| Eusebius Hieronymus Stridonensis | | II.5,5-7 | 335 |
| | | II.5,5 | 326 |
| Chron. | | II.6,1 | 217, 335 |
| See Eusebius Pamphili Caesariensis, | | II.6,2-4 | 326 |
| Chron. | | II.6,8 | 335 |
| | | II.7 | 336 |
| De vir. illustr. (ed. | | II.9 | 219 |
| Richardson 1896) | 156 | II.9,1 | 219-20 |
| XXI | 147-48 | II.16,2-3 | 220 |
| CII | 126, 128, 179, | II.25,1-3 | 224 |
| | 247 | II.26,1 | 232 |
| CXIX | 137 | III.9 | 200 |
| Dial. contra Pelag. | | IV.15,2 | 220 |
| (PL 23) | 369, 407 | IV.20,8 | 220 |
| III,6 | 220 | IV.27,8 | 232 |
| Ep. LXX (ed. Hilberg | | IV.38,1-2 | 217 |
| 1910) | 256 | IV.41,1 | 217, 219, |
| 4 | 256 | | 220 |
| | | V.19,7 | 220 |
| In Es. (ed. Adriaen 1963) | | V.29,4 | 219 |
| VII,XVIII,1/3 | 220 | | |
| In Hiezzech. (ed. Glorie 1964) | | Adv. Hermog. | |
| I,ii,5 | 339 | 10.2-3 | 219 |
| | | 14 | 219 |
| | | 16 | 219 |
| Lucius Caelius Firmianus Lactantius | | De carne Chr. (ed. Kroymann 1954) | |
| De ira Dei (ed. Ingremeau 1982) | | III.1 | 219 |
| 13,20-21 (102-11) | 217, 227 | III.6-9 | 200 |
| Minucius Felix | | Adv. Prax. | |
| Octavius | | 10.9 | 219 |
| 12.2 | 218 | De an. (ed. Waszink 1947) | |
| Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus | | 3.4 | 219 |
| Adv. Marc. (ed. Evans | | 4 | 219 |
| 1972) | 130, 262 | 11.2 | 219 |
| I.1,4 | 167 | 14ff. | 305 |
| I.2,2 | 252 | 14.1 | 305 |
| I.11,2-3 | 261 | 22.1-2 | 219 |
| I.11,6-7 | 219 | 24.2 | 219 |
| I.15,2-6 | 261 | De praescr. haer. (ed. Refoulé 1954) | |
| I.17,4 | 219 | 7.3 | 220 |
| I.22 | 219 | 7.5 | 252 |
| I.22,8-9 | 217 | 30.1 | 220 |
| I.25,3 | 220 | De ieiun. | |
| I.27,1-2 | 220 | 6.7 | 224 |
| II | 218 | Pseudo-Tertullianus | |
| II.5-6 | 218, 219 | Adv. omn. haer. | |
| II.5 | 218-19 | III.1 | 235 |
| II.5,1-2 | 217, 220 | | |

Carm. adv. Marc. (ed. Willems 1954)	Ch. LVIII	385, 387
I.84	Ch. LIX	385
	Ch. LX	385

Vigilius Papa

Constitutum , ep. 83 (ed. Guenther 1895)	385
---	-----

IV. Syriac-Christian texts

Abdišo Nisibenus	XXI.6	239
Catal. (ed. Assemani 1725)	XXI.8–9	239
XVIII	XXI.10	239
XIX	XLIII.4–6	239
XXIX	Hymni de parad. (ed. Beck 1957b)
	XV	215
Barḥadbešabba	XV.2–3	215
	XV.5–9	215
Hist. eccl. (ed. Nau 1932)	In Gen. (ed. Tonneau 1955)
XVII.3 [139]	II.17	360
XVII.3 [140]
XIX [24]	Immanuel aš-Šahhar
Chron. Seert. (ed. Scher 1910)	Hexaëmeron	140
XLIX [164]
LIII [178]	Od. Sal. (ed. Charlesworth 1977)
Dadišo Qaṭraya	3.6	353
In Isaiam Sket. (ed. Draguet 1972)	7.3	353
XV,16–18	11.6	353
	15.6	353
Ephraem Syrus	17.12	353
Ad Hyp. IV (ed. Mitchell 1912)	20.7	353
p. 118.31ff.	23.4	353
Contra Marc. I (ed. Mitchell 1921)	Theodorus bar Kōnai
p. 57.42–58.8	Liber schol. (ed. Scher 1912)	79
Exp. Ev. conc. (ed. Leloir 1963; 1990)	11	84, 210,
Armenian version (ed. Leloir 1953)		237–38, 240,
XXI.3		380–81
Hymni contra haer. (ed. Beck 1957)	The Book of the Bee (ed. Budge 1886)
XVII.1–3	LX	405
XVIII.3	The Book of Memorials ,
XVIII.9–11	fragment preserved
XXI.3	in The Book of the Bee	405

V. Catena and collections

- Catena fragments in Staab 1933; see Diodorus Tarsensis, In Rom.; Theodorus Mopsuestenus, In Cor. I and In Rom.
- Catena in Daniele* (fragments of Titus Bostrensis, Hom. in Luc., ed. in Sickenberger 1901) 128
- Catena in Gen.* (ed. Petit 1991; 1995) (Petit 1991)
 p. 125–26, no. 175
 (Johannes Chrysostomus?) 327
 p. 216, no. 318 376
 p. 289–90, no. 450.1–9 375
- See also Didymus Alexandrinus, In Gen.; Eusebius Emesenus, In Oct.; Theodorus Mopsuestenus, In Gen.
- Catena in Luc.; fragments of Titus of Bostra, ed. Sickenberger 1901, see Titus Bostrensis, Hom. in Luc.
- Catena in Luc.*; fragments of Titus of Bostra, ed. Reuss 1976, see Titus Bostrensis, Hom. in Luc.
- Catena in Luc.*; fragments of Titus of Bostra, ed. De Lagarde 1886, see Titus Bostrensis, Hom. in Luc. (Coptic)
- Catena in Matthaeum* (ed. Iturbe 1969–70), possible Titus fragments 128 (Arabic)
- Collectio Coisliniana* (ed. Petit 1986)
Csl. 115 382, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 396, 400, 401, 406, 411, 416
- See also Diodorus Tarsensis, In Oct.; Theodorus Mopsuestenus, In Gen.
- Coll. Pal.*
 See Theodorus Mopsuestenus
- In Luc.* (“by Titus of Bostra and other fathers”) 128

VI. Manichaean texts

- a. Mani's Works
- Book of Giants* 80, 82, 85, 86, 138, 178
- Book of Mysteries* 73
- Epistles* 9, 10, 34, 55, 204–5
 (partly preserved in Coptic)
- Epistula fundamenti*
- Latin fragments, see Aurelius Augustinus, Contra ep. fund. and De nat. boni
- Living Gospel* 80, 87, 138, 178, 179, 180, 183, 186, 192, 193, 204, 417
- fragments
 See also CMC
- Pragmateia* 178
- Šābuhragān* 87
 (Middle Persian)
 M 473 (ed. MacKenzie 1979) 237
 M 7980–M7984
 (probably part of Šābuhragān; ed. Andreas and Henning 1932; Hutter 1992) 192
 M 7983 243
- Treasuries* 138, 178
Treasury, Treasury of Life 178, 186, 204
Little Treasury 178, 204
- b. Greco-Manichaean texts
- CMC (On the Origin of His Body)* (ed. Koenen and Römer 1988) 7 65.23–70.10 180

- c. Coptic-Manichaean texts*
- Kephalaia* 80, 82,
150, 191,
192, 254
- (ed. Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig 1940)
- p. 15.12–13 240, 241
p. 20.3–5 240
p. 53.18–54.9 240
p. 53.27 240
p. 56.24–26 239–40
p. 59.27–28 239–240
p. 94.3–4 240
p. 94.8–9 240
- Ch. 40 (p. 104.21–105.14) 174
Ch. 55 (p. 133.4–137.11) 83, 191, 192
p. 133.5–6 83
p. 133.5 83
p. 133.19 192
p. 134.10 192
Ch. 56 (p. 137.12–144.12) 191, 192
p. 137.16–17 192
p. 137.18 192
p. 137.22 192
p. 138.11 192
p. 138.17 192
p. 138.21 192
Ch. 57 (p. 144.13–147.20) 191, 192
p. 144.18 192
p. 144.19 192
Ch. 64 (p. 157.1–158.23) 192
Ch. 69 173–74
Ch. 73 (p. 178.24– 180.26) 242
p. 179.6–8 239, 242
p. 208.19–20 239
Ch. 90 (p. 223.17–228.4) 174
(ed. Böhlig 1966)
- Ch. 105 7, 9
p. 268.2 240
- Ch. 120 (p. 286.24– 288.18) 175, 252
p. 287.7–8 239
(ed. Funk 1999)
p. 302.1–2 239
- Ch. 138 (p. 340.20– 341.24) 174
- Ch. 154 (partly ed.
Schmidt and Polotsky
1933) 8
- Kellis, Text A 2 (ed. Gardner 1993)
40 240
- Man. Hom.* (ed. Polotsky 1934)
p. 68.14 243
p. 76.13 242
p. 91.7 242
- P3B I* (ed. Giversen 1988)
pl. 60.3 240
pl. 60.8 240
pl. 98.16–17 241
pl. 75.25–26 240
pl. 181.21 239
pl. 266.23–25 240
pl. 266.26–31 241
pl. 266.32 240
- P3B II* (ed. Allberry 1938)
p. 25.6–11 241
p. 43.9 (ed. Wurst 1996) 239
p. 56.31ff. 197, 242
p. 57.7–10 242
p. 57.11–14 243
p. 57.11 243
p. 60.18–19 239
p. 79.24 242
p. 116.7 240
p. 121.9 184
p. 149.9 239, 241
p. 149.12–13 239
p. 149.22–25 239
p. 154.22f. 240
p. 154.27f. 240
p. 156.27–30 239
p. 183.1 239
p. 185.10 240
p. 185.21f. 240
p. 192.26 239
p. 217.4 239
- Synaxeis-Codex* 180
- d. Iranian-Manichaean texts*
- M 2/II/ (ed. Andreas and Henning 1934) 174
- M 2 (R I) (ed. Andreas and Henning 1933; Sundermann 1981)
1–33 180
9–11 180
10 180
- M 28 I (ed. Skjærvø 1995)
Ri 19–23 243
Rii 24–28 243

33-37	186	a31-b14 (R)	240
M 129	240	b3-14 (R)	241
M 216c+M 1750 (ed. Sundermann 1981)		e. Chinese-Manichaean texts
R/9/-V//13	180	Traité	80, 181,
V/5/-/8/	180		191
M 18220 (ed. Sundermann 1981)	180	f. Latin-Manichaean texts
13941 + 14285, V/14/-/15/ (ed. Sundermann 1981)		Faustus
V/14/-/15/	180	Capitula	192, 243,
TM 393 (ed. Henning 1944)		fragments, see Aurelius Augustinus,	254
16ff.	243	Contra Faust.
S 9 (ed. Salemann 1912)
a16-18 (R)	241

VII. Nag Hammadi

Apocr. Joh.	210-11,	IV 34.15-21	235
	215, 239	IV 34.21-36.21	239
short version [BG 8502,2]		IV 36.20-37.4	235
(ed. Till 1955) and [NHC III,1] (ed. Krause and Labib 1962)	210, 211	Synopsis (Waldstein and Wisse 1995)	211
BG 44.14-15	232	34.6-7	232
BG 44.18	232	34.12	232
BG 56.10-57.8	236	57.6-58.2	232
BG 57.8-12	234	58.5-7	234
BG 57.20-58.7	235	58.15-59.2	235
BG 58.8-60.16	239	59.3-62.7	239
BG 60.16-61.7	235	62.13-63.2	235
III 27.14-28.6	236	De or. mund. [NHC II,5]
III 28.6-9	234	(ed. Layton 1989a)	210, 211,
III 28.16-23	235	6 (99.2-11)	231
III 28.23-30.14	239	28 (104.13-15)	231
III 30.14-22	235	36 (106.19-24)	231
long version [NHC II,1; NHC IV,1] (ed. Krause and Labib 1962)	210, 211	37 (106.30)	231
II 13.8-9	232	85-86 (115.30-116.8)	239
II 13.13	232	91 (116.28-29)	234
II 21.24-22.2	236	103-4 (118.24-119.19)	234
II 22.3-5	234	103 (118.24-26)	235
II 22.9-15	235	103 (118.26)	229
II 22.15-23.26	239	103 (118.34-119.1)	236
II 23.26-35	235	103 (119.5)	229
IV 20.22-24	232	104 (119.11-13)	236
IV 20.29	232	105 (119.26-27)	224
IV 33.14-34.5	236	105 (119.29-30)	224
IV 34.5-8	234	109 (120.15-16)	232
		111-112 (120.24-
		121.13)	232, 236
		113 (121.13-15)	232

Doctrina Silv. [NHC VII,4]		45.23–49.28	211, 234
101.17–20	353	45.31–46.9	234
		46.6–10	234
Ev. ver. [NHC I,3]		46.7–8	236
18.36–40	233	46.12–13	236
		47.13–48.15	212–13,
Hyp. Arch. [NHC II,4]			225
(ed. Layton 1989)	210, 211,		229
	215, 236	47.15–16	234
8 (89.3–17)	239	47.17–18	224
9 (89.31–90.19)	234	47.19ff.	224
9 (89.31–32)	234	47.21	224
9 (90.6)	234	47.29–30	229
9 (90.8–10)	236	48.2–4	214
9 (90.8)	229	48.5	232
10 (90.19–21)	224	48.13–15	214
23 (94.21–22)	232
26 (95.4–5)	232	Tract. Magni Seth II [NHC VII,2] (ed.
30 (96.3–8)	231	Pearson 1996)
		62.27–65.2	214
Test. ver. [NHC IX,3]		64.18–23	232
(ed. Pearson 1981)	210, 211,
	215, 224,	Tract. Trip. [NHC I,5]
	236,	62.20	233
	249–50	70.26	233
45.23ff.	249

VIII. Classical Greek texts

Aetius		Alkinoos (“Albinus”)
Plac. (ed. Diels 1879; cf. Stobaeus,		Did.	283
Eclog. and Pseudo-Plutarch, Plac.)		Vff.	277
I.7,30	270	X	267, 268
I.9,1–7	257
		Aristoteles
Alexander Lycopolitanus		Anal. post. (ed. Bekker 1831)
Contra Manich. opin. disp.		I,6 (75a18–19)	266
(ed. Brinkmann 1895)	68, 75, 80,	I,6–7 (75a39–75b2)	266
	81, 82, 85,
	87, 88,	Anal. pr. (ed. Bekker 1831)
	103, 104,	II,16 (64b29)	263
	105, 131,	Cat. (ed. Bekker 1831)	263, 277,
	161, 171,		278
	187, 188	I (1a1ff.)	262, 263
II–IV	161	I (1a6–7)	262
II	257	IV (1b29)	264
V	161	V (3b24–29)	264
Vff.	257	V (4a10ff.)	264
VI	262	V (4a10–23)	264
IX	310	VII (6b15–16)	264
X	354	VIII (8b26–28)	265
		VIII (8b27–28)	264
		VIII (8b29–9a13)	265

VIII (8b29)	264	Pseudo-Diogenianus Heracleensis
VIII (10b12–18)	264	Par. (ed. Von Leutsch and Schneidewin 1839)
VIII (10b12)	264	VIII,45	426
VIII (11a20ff.)	264
XI (14a20–22)	264
De an. (ed. Bekker 1831)		Iamblichus
I,1 (402b1ff.)	305	De comm. math. (ed. Festa 1975)
I,4	300	Ch. 4	310
I,4 (407b30ff.)	300
I,5	300, 305	Flavius Claudius Julianus Imperator
I,5 (411b5–10)	305	Augustus
De caelo (ed. Bekker 1831)		Contra Gal. (fragments ed. Masaracchia 1990; Neumann 1880)	4, 84, 216, 232–33, 249, 251
III,8 (306b18–19)	227	Fr. 13 (75AB)	249
De gen. et corr. (ed. Bekker 1831)		Fr. 15 (86A)	249
I,10 (327a30–328b22)	300	Fr. 16 (89AB)	249, 250
I,10 (328a8–9)	300	Fr. 17 (93D)	249, 250
De int. (ed. Bekker 1831)		Fr. 17 (93E)	249, 250
I (16a1–18)	262	Fr. 17 (94A)	249, 250
De orat. (Περὶ εὐχῆς) (ed. Rose in Bekker 1870)		Fr. 29 (152C)	250
(fragment)		Fr. 30 (155C)	250
Fr. 46 (1483a27–28)		Fr. 30 (155D)	250
(= Simplicius, In De Caelo II.12)	270
Eth. Nic. (ed. Bekker 1831a)		Ep. 52 (ed. Bidez 1960)	3–4, 123–25, 171–72
I,6,13 (1096a23–25)	267
I,13,20 (1103a3–10)	264	Libanius
II,5 (1105b19–1106a13)	264	Ep. 763 (ed. Foerster 1921)	123
III,1,1 (1109b30f.)	313	Ep. 819 (ed. Foerster 1921)	123
III,5,7–9
(1113b21–1114a2)	296	Plato
III,5,7 (1113b24–25)	296	Epinomis (ed. Burnet 1900–07)	988b5 226, 227
III,5,13–14		Gorg. (ed. Burnet 1900–07)	467c ff. 309
(1114a12–21)	317	527a	168
X,9,6 (1179b23–26)	318	Leg. (ed. Burnet 1900–07)	IV,715e–716a 354
Met. (ed. Bekker 1831a)		Lysis (ed. Burnet 1900–07)	217b 310
I,2,12–14		Parmenides (ed. Burnet 1900–07)	137c–142a 270
982b28–983a5)	227	Phaed. (ed. Burnet 1900–07)	67d 343
III,1,8 (995b19–20)	266
V,30,4 (1025a30ff.)	266
VII,1,5 (1028a31)	267
XII,6–10
(1071b3–1076a4)	269
XII,7,3–4 (1072a31ff.)	267
XIII,3,10–11
(1078a31–b6)	304
XIV,4 (1092a1–5)	310
XIV,4 (1092a3–5)	310
Top. (ed. Bekker 1831)
I,4 (101b17–23)	263
I,5 (101b38ff.)	263

- Phaedr.* (ed. Burnet 1900-07)
 247a 226, 227, 228, 354, 358
 247c 306-7
- Prot.* (ed. Burnet 1900-07)
 320c-322d 258
 320d8-321a1 258
 321a3-7 258
 321b2-4 259
 321b5-6 258-59
 358b-c 309
- Rep.* (ed. Burnet 1900-07)
 II,379-380 227
 380d 267
 434d-441c 305
 VI,509b9 270, 271, 274
- Symp.* (ed. Burnet 1900-07)
 203e 310
- Theat.* (ed. Burnet 1900-07)
 176a 312
 176b 168
- Tim.* (ed. Burnet 1900-07) 270, 275, 300
 27d 274
 29a-c 324
 29d-e 275
 29e 225, 226, 227, 228, 276, 322, 343, 349, 350, 353, 354, 355
 30a 228, 355
 51a 227
 69c-72d 305
 69c-d 309
 69c 309
 81e-87b 309
 86b ff. 309
 92c 324
- Plotinus
Enn.
 VI.3.8 263
 VI.9 304
- Plutarchus
De virt. mor.
 3, 441Dff. 305
- Pseudo-Plutarchus
Plac. (ed. Diels 1879) 257
 I.8 257-58
- Porphyrius
In Cat. (ed. Busse 1887)
 p. 60.15-16 262
 p. 64.14ff. 263
 p. 114.1ff. 264
 p. 137.39-138.1ff. 265
- Isag.* (ed. Busse 1887) 278, 279
 p. 1.4-5 263
 p. 12.24-25 265
 p. 16.20-17.2 266
 p. 17.12 266
 19.19 266
 p. 21.15-17 266
 p. 21.20-22.3 266
 p. 22.5ff. 266
- Sextus Empiricus
Adv. Math. (ed. Mutschmann 1914)
 VII.281-82 263
 IX.144 268
 IX.371 263
 XI.130 263
- Hyp.* (ed. Mutschmann 1958)
 III.9-11 217-18, 227
- Simplicius
In Cat. (ed. Kalbfleisch 1897) 278
 Ch. 1 263
 Ch. 7 263
 Ch. 8 265
 Ch. 10 265
- In De caelo* (ed. Heiberg 1894)
 II.12 270
- Johannes Stobaeus
Eclog. (ed. Diels 1879) 257
 I.1 (2,29) 270
 I.11,1.3.5 257
- Xenophon
Cyropaed.
 VI.1,41 256-57, 300, 469

Memorabilia
I.4,13–16 282

IX. Classical Latin texts

Ammianus Marcellinus	Gaius Aurelius Valerius Diocletianus Imperator Augustus
Res gestae (ed. Seyfarth 1978) XXII.13,5 126	De mathematicis, maleficis et Manichaeis (Edict against the Manichaeans) (Adam 1969) 130–31, 169
Marcus Tullius Cicero
De nat. deor. (ed. Pease 1968a)
III.25ff. (65ff.) 218
III.31 (76ff.) 218
III.39 (92) 218

X. Arabic texts

al-Bīrūnī	Šahrastānī
Chronology of Ancient Nations (transl. Sachau 1879)	Book of Religious and Philosophical Sects (transl. Gimaret and Monnot 1986)
III 179	II,I,II 87
VIII 179, 204
Ibn an-Nadīm
Fihrist (transl. Flügel 1862)
p. 91 238
p. 92 243

INDEX OF PERSONS

a. Index of Ancient Persons

- Abdišo, Bishop of Nisibis 68, 139,
140, 141, 407
- Acacius, Bishop of Caesarea 143,
153, 254
- Adda, Ato, Adimantus, Addas,
Manichaean 79, 80, 81, 82, 84, 85,
138, 139, 140, 178, 179, 180, 181,
182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 191, 193,
198, 200, 204, 205, 224, 248, 249,
251, 252, 253, 254, 319, 320, 321,
323, 326, 330, 363, 366, 367, 379, 416
- Aetius, Greek author 257, 270
- Aetius, Arian theologian 418
- Agapius, Bishop of Bostra 126
- Albinus, see Alkinoos
- Alexander of Lycopolis, Platonist
philosopher 68, 75, 80, 81, 82, 85,
87, 88, 103, 104, 105, 131, 161,
171, 187, 188, 257, 262, 310, 354
- Alkinoos ("Albinus"), Platonist
philosopher 267, 268, 277, 283
- Ambrose, Bishop of Milan 221
- Ammianus Marcellinus, Roman historian 126
- Amphilochius, Bishop of Iconium 256
- Anatolius, Bishop of Laodicea 132
- Antiochus of Ascalon, Platonist
philosopher 283
- Apelles, Marcionite 135, 221, 222, 223, 224, 253
- Araspes 256, 300
- Aristotle, philosopher 52, 93, 94, 102,
103, 146, 227, 256, 257, 258, 262,
263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 269, 270,
277, 278, 279, 282, 296, 300, 304,
305, 306, 310, 313, 317, 318, 329,
469
- Asterius (the Sophist), Arian 256
- Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria 131,
134, 140, 142, 146, 169, 256, 264,
268, 269, 273, 274, 276, 325, 326,
335, 341, 342, 353, 361
- Athenagoras, Christian apologist 261,
262, 285, 291
- Augustine, Bishop of Hippo Regius
12, 74, 80, 81, 84, 85, 87, 89, 90,
95, 96, 98, 99, 102, 104, 134, 150,
161, 165, 168, 173, 175, 181, 182,
183, 184, 185, 191, 192, 207, 233,
237, 243, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249,
251, 252, 263, 285, 299, 308, 321,
325, 326, 339, 354, 408, 410
- Augustus, Roman Emperor 51, 153, 172, 257
- Aurelian, Roman Emperor 155
- Badagius, Bishop of Bostra 126
- Bardesanes, Christian philosopher 7, 94, 140, 165
- Barḥadbešabba of Bet Arbaye, Syriac author 139, 140, 407
- Basil the Great, Bishop of Caesarea
104, 134, 142, 256, 323
- Basilides, Gnostic 46, 146, 147, 148,
149, 150, 154, 257, 268
- Belaeus, provincial governor of Arabia
123, 125, 162
- Beryllus, Bishop of Bostra 121, 122
- al-Bīrūnī, Arabic author 179, 204
- Boethius, Christian philosopher 340
- Carneades, Sceptical philosopher 173
- Carpocrates, Gnostic 148
- Chrysippus, Stoic philosopher 221,
278, 306, 312, 402
- Cicero, Roman philosopher 218, 283, 284
- Clement of Alexandria, Christian theologian 98, 106, 107, 145, 223,
261, 267, 268, 271, 272, 273, 278,
285, 286, 292, 309, 336, 339, 343,
348, 353
- Clement, Bishop (?) of Rome 112,
218, 224, 230, 232
- Constantine the Great, Roman Emperor 123, 132
- Constantius II, Roman Emperor 3,
123, 124, 420
- Cotta, Roman statesman and orator 218

- Creon, philosopher 258
- Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria 249, 325
- Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem 68, 100, 133, 142, 152, 178, 208
- Dadišo Qatraya, Syriac monk and author 141, 405
- Decius, Roman Emperor 51, 153, 155, 156
- Didymus the Blind, of Alexandria, Christian theologian 98, 116, 133, 134, 142, 203, 224, 230, 235, 241, 279, 280, 285, 292, 304, 337, 358
- Diocletian, Roman Emperor 131, 156, 169
- Diodore, Bishop of Tarsus 80, 92, 93, 94, 97, 134, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 144, 145, 178, 179, 180, 254, 367, 368, 369, 372, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 394, 396, 397, 398, 400, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 415, 416, 417, 418
- Elchasai, founder of Christian baptising sect 129
- Empedocles, philosopher 102
- Ephrem the Syrian, Syriac poet and theologian 83, 102, 142, 165, 200, 215, 220, 239, 360
- Epicurus, philosopher 217, 218, 220, 222, 227
- Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis 67, 68, 72, 73, 80, 100, 116, 120, 127, 132, 135, 137, 140, 142, 153, 154, 155, 165, 168, 178, 233, 235, 240, 418
- Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea 100, 112, 121, 122, 131, 132, 133, 137, 142, 143, 145, 147, 148, 153, 155, 156, 157, 167, 218, 253, 254, 256, 285, 305, 306, 331, 353, 367, 369, 370, 371, 372, 376, 379, 398, 415
- Eusebius, Bishop of Emesa 66, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 153, 224, 254, 256, 335, 367, 368, 369, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 396, 397, 398, 399, 404, 406, 407, 415, 417, 418, 419
- Eusebius, Bishop of Nicomedia 132
- Eustathius, Bishop of Antioch 144, 153, 256, 418
- Faustus of Milevis, Manichaeon
Bishop 165, 181, 182, 186, 191, 200, 201, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 254
- Flavian, Bishop of Antioch 144
- Gallus, Roman Emperor 156
- George, Bishop of Laodicea, Arian 111, 137, 138, 139, 140, 142, 145, 200, 279, 367, 415, 417, 418, 419, 423
- Gordian III, Roman Emperor 121
- Gregory (the Bishop of Nazianzus or of Nyssa?) 256
- Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa 91, 325, 342
- Hadrian, Roman Emperor 147
- Hegemonius, Christian author 97, 100, 132, 138, 141, 142, 149, 151, 152, 155, 168, 200, 203
- Heraclianus, Bishop of Chalcedon 67, 68, 79, 80, 82, 84, 137, 138, 139, 140, 178, 179, 180, 183, 186, 416, 417
- Hermogenes of Carthage, Christian theologian 203, 219, 220
- Herodotus, Greek historian 226
- Hesychius of Jerusalem, Christian exegete 129
- Hippolytus, Bishop of Bostra 122
- Hippolytus of Rome, theologian and antipope 129, 153, 154, 157, 165, 200, 204, 235, 258, 268, 278
- Iamblichus, Platonist philosopher 310
- Immanuel aš-Šahhar, Syriac author 140
- Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyon 99, 107, 129, 145, 146, 148, 153, 165, 168, 184, 218, 219, 220, 230, 231, 232, 233, 235, 261, 268, 273, 276, 289, 290, 304, 325, 326, 329, 333, 334, 335, 341, 342, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 362, 373, 380, 389, 392, 393, 397, 404
- Jerome, Latin Christian author 66, 120, 126, 127, 128, 137, 147, 148, 156, 179, 220, 247, 255, 256, 339, 369, 407, 408, 409, 413
- John Chrysostom, Bishop of Constantinople 92, 97, 141, 144, 232, 264, 327, 339, 390, 405

- John Philoponus, Christian philosopher 305, 368
- John, Bishop of Antioch 144
- John, Bishop (?) of Bostra 122
- John of Caesarea, Christian author 203, 218
- John of Damascus, Christian theologian 67, 115, 193, 242, 293, 316, 351
- John Stobaeus, Greek author 257, 270
- Jovian, Roman Emperor 125, 126, 127, 142
- Judas Maccabaeus, leader of Jewish revolt 121
- Julia, female Manichaean 161
- Julian the Apostate, Roman Emperor 3, 4, 66, 84, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 162, 169, 171, 216, 232, 233, 249, 250, 420
- Julian, Bishop of Eclanum, Pelagian 89, 90, 91, 407
- Julius Cassianus, Christian 98, 408
- Justin Martyr, Christian apologist 129, 145, 146, 148, 224, 273, 285, 311, 325
- Lactantius, Latin Christian author 217, 227
- Libanius, Greek rhetorician 3, 93, 123
- Lucian of Antioch, Christian teacher 144
- Macarius Chrysocephalus 426
- Mani, Manes, Manichaeus, founder of Manichaeism 7, 8, 9, 10, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 59, 60, 62, 63, 64, 70, 72, 73, 74, 75, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 102, 103, 105, 122, 129, 130, 131, 132, 136, 138, 139, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 156, 159, 160, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 173, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 184, 186, 188, 189, 191, 192, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 210, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 248, 256, 257, 260, 275, 294, 295, 299, 302, 310, 311, 321, 322, 323, 417, 425–26, 427, 428, 433, 439, 446, 462, 469
- Mark the Deacon, Christian author 161
- Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra 144
- Marcion, founder of Marcionism 7, 46, 78, 146, 147, 148, 149, 154, 165, 167, 182, 183, 199, 200, 201, 218, 220, 221, 223, 231, 233, 252, 253, 254, 262, 276, 354
- Maximus, Bishop of Bostra 122
- Meletius, Bishop of Antioch 143
- Methodius, Bishop of Olympus 232, 343, 357, 358, 389
- Michael Apostolius, late Byzantine author 426
- Minucius Felix, Christian apologist 218
- Moses bar Kīphā, Bishop of Moṣul and Nineveh 116
- Ibn an-Nadīm, Arabic author 238, 239, 243
- Nemesius, Bishop of Emesa 144, 360, 361, 367
- Nero, Roman Emperor 60
- Nilus of Ancyra, Christian monk and author 178
- Origen, Christian theologian 51, 67, 92, 98, 107, 121, 122, 144, 145, 146, 153, 154, 156, 168, 212, 213, 220, 221, 224, 230, 232, 253, 261, 267, 268, 269, 272, 273, 278, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 292, 293, 298, 299, 304, 309, 311, 325, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 343, 348, 349, 353, 357, 360, 361, 362, 363, 370, 388, 389, 390, 391
- Orio, Christian, provincial governor of Arabia 123, 124
- Pamphilus of Caesarea, Christian librarian 153, 156
- Paul, Apostle 12, 34, 41, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 93, 134, 150, 151, 163, 183, 185, 199, 205, 284, 293, 295, 325, 326, 345, 346, 347, 356, 364, 383, 394, 412, 469
- Paul of Samosata, Bishop of Antioch 99, 122, 134, 144
- Pelagius, Christian ascetic 89, 90, 91, 409
- Philip the Arabian, Roman Emperor 121

- Philo, Jewish author 146, 213, 223, 228, 235, 236, 253, 257, 270, 303, 325, 337, 348, 353, 355, 356, 357, 358, 360, 389
- Photius, Bishop of Constantinople 67, 68, 114, 115, 118, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 153, 156, 178, 179, 368, 386, 407, 408, 409, 410, 413, 431
- Plato, philosopher 53, 92, 94, 168, 225, 226, 227, 234, 255, 256, 257, 258, 267, 269, 270, 274, 276, 277, 300, 304, 305, 306, 309, 310, 312, 324, 343, 348, 354, 402, 469
- Plotinus, Platonist philosopher 263, 270, 278, 304, 340
- Plutarch of Chaeronea, Platonist philosopher 257, 283, 305
- Porphry, Platonist philosopher 93, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 278, 279
- Posidonius of Apamea, Stoic philosopher 95
- Potitus, Marcionite 135
- Prepon, Marcionite 135
- Probus, Roman Emperor 132, 154, 155
- Procopius of Gaza, Christian rhetorician 203, 367, 373, 375, 376, 377, 379, 381
- Rufinus, Christian translator 413
- Šahrastānī, Arabic author 87
- Serapion, Bishop of Thmuis 23, 66, 68, 105, 111, 116, 131, 132, 138, 142, 152, 182, 256
- Severian, Bishop of Gabala 141, 142
- Severus, Platonist philosopher 305, 306
- Severus, Bishop of Antioch 79, 80, 83, 85, 86, 116, 193, 239, 240
- Sextus Empiricus, Septical philosopher 217, 227, 263, 268
- Simon (Magus), Gnostic 148, 224, 230
- Simplicius, Platonist philosopher 68, 101, 131, 263, 265, 270, 278
- Socrates, philosopher 282, 309
- Socrates, Church historian 141, 143, 418
- Sophocles, Greek tragedian 226
- Sophronius, Bishop of Jerusalem 138
- Sozomen, Church historian 66, 123, 141, 143, 418
- Speusippus, Platonist philosopher 310
- Stephanus Gobarus, Christian author, tritheist 67, 114, 115, 153
- Stobaeus, see John Stobaeus
- Tertullian, Latin Christian theologian 129, 130, 167, 199, 200, 217, 218, 219, 220, 224, 232, 233, 235, 252, 261, 305, 326, 335, 336
- Theodore bar Kōnai, Syriac author 79, 84, 210, 237, 238, 240, 380–81
- Theodore, Bishop of Mopsuestia 6, 15, 16, 92, 93, 94, 97, 98, 99, 101, 141, 144, 145, 200, 347, 352, 366, 367, 368, 369, 372, 373, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 423
- Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus 67, 80, 83, 85, 86, 94, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 141, 142, 144, 153, 193, 254, 367, 416, 417, 419
- Theonas, Bishop of Alexandria 130, 142
- Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch 99, 144, 215, 218, 219, 224, 230, 231, 232, 304, 323, 332, 333, 335, 342, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 389, 394, 395
- Tiberius, Roman Emperor 51, 153, 155, 156
- Titus, Bishop of Bostra passim
- Trajan, Roman Emperor 121
- Triphyllius, Bishop of Leucosia 256
- Valens, Roman Emperor 126
- Valentinus, Gnostic 46, 146, 148, 149, 154, 200, 252
- Vigilius, Bishop of Rome 385, 387
- Xenocrates, Platonist philosopher 269, 270
- Xenophanes, philosopher 260, 268
- Xenophon, Greek author 256, 282, 300, 469
- Zacharias of Mitylene, Christian author 181
- Zenon, Stoic philosopher 304

b. Index of Modern Persons (after 1500)

- Abramowski, R. 139, 140, 405
 Adam, A. 90, 131, 132, 180
 Adler, A. 94, 139, 140
 Adriaen, M. 220
 Aigrain, R. 121, 122, 124, 127
 Aland, B. 129, 173, 470
 Alcock, A. 12
 D'Alès, A. 107, 341
 Alexandre, M. 215, 228, 241, 304, 323
 Allard, P. 124
 Allberry, C.R.C. 78, 114, 118, 184, 239, 240, 242, 243, 256
 Alfarcic, P. 67, 80, 81, 82, 138, 141, 178, 179, 180, 181, 191, 243
 Alt, A. 122
 Altermath, F. 341
 Amand, D. 94, 140, 141, 173
 Amann, É. 386, 408, 410, 411
 Andreas, F.C. 174, 180, 192, 243
 Andresen, C. 131
 Arcadios 68, 111
 Archambault, G. 285
 Arndt, W.F. 458
 Von Arnim, H. 265, 285, 312
 Arnold, G. 71, 72
 Arnou, R. 93
 Asmussen, J.P. 9, 173
 Assemani, J.S. 68, 139, 140, 141, 407
 Astruc, C. 68
 Aubineau, M. 129, 141, 218
 Aucher, J.B. 356
 Badger, G.P. 68, 139, 140, 141, 407
 Baehrens, W.A. 287, 337, 361
 Bakhuyzen, W.H. van de Sande 154, 224, 261
 Balty, J. 123
 Balty, J.C. 123
 Bardenhewer, O. 89, 128, 137, 153, 154, 254
 Bardy, G. 115, 122, 131, 153, 254, 278, 371
 Barnard, L.W. 285
 Barnes, T.D. 131, 132, 147, 155
 Barr, J. 284, 285
 Basnage, J. 70, 73, 77, 109, 110, 112, 117
 Bauer, W. 7, 8, 10
 Baumgärtel, F. 307
 Baumstark, A. 66, 83, 86, 114, 139, 143, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 459
 Baur, F.C. 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 79, 81, 85, 87, 152, 170, 173, 187, 189, 208, 240, 243, 299, 310, 345
 Bayle, P. 73
 Beatrice, P.F. 98, 99, 101, 330, 363, 364, 368, 408, 414
 De Beausobre, I. 72, 73, 77, 87
 Beck, E. 102, 103, 106, 142, 172, 197, 215, 239, 262, 280, 299, 300, 301, 310, 437, 439
 Beck, H. 67, 254
 Beck, H.-G. 122
 Beeson, C.H. 80, 133, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 155, 167, 168, 184, 193, 205, 240, 257
 Behm, J. 307, 331
 Bekker, I. 263, 270
 Bellet, P. 128
 Benjamins, H.S. 273, 287, 339, 340
 Bennett, B. 82, 86, 87, 113, 133, 181, 192, 193, 203, 239, 241, 242, 246, 280
 Berkhof, H. 369
 Bernard, R. 325
 Berner, U. 288
 Bethge, H.-G. 214
 Beukers, C. 247
 Beyschlag, K. 225, 231, 232, 233
 Bianchi, U. 299
 Bidez, J. 66, 123, 124, 125, 141, 143
 Bieler, L. 340
 Billerbeck, P. 229
 Birdsall, J.N. 114
 Blanc, C. 268, 273, 287, 337, 343, 348, 353, 361
 De Blois, F. 7
 Blumenthal, H.J. 93, 106, 278, 305, 313, 315
 Den Boeft, J. 99
 Böhlig, A. 7, 8, 9, 83, 88, 114, 174, 175, 180, 191, 192, 235, 239, 240, 241, 242, 252
 Bonhöffer, A. 282
 Bonitz, H. 263
 Bonner, G. 99
 Bonwetsch, N. 232, 343, 357
 Borret, M. 168, 241, 268, 273, 287, 288, 337, 353
 Le Boulluec, A. 8, 129, 146, 147
 Bousset, W. 219

- Bowersock, G.W. 121, 122, 123, 124, 160
 Boyce, M. 192
 Brière, M. 239, 240
 Brinkmann, A. 68, 109, 110, 111, 113, 126, 131, 161, 257, 262, 310, 354
 Brock, S. 316, 360, 431, 468, 470
 Browning, R. 124
 Brox, N. 8, 129, 146, 147, 249, 290
 Bruckner, A. 89, 407
 Budge, E.A.W. 405
 Bultmann, R. 141, 331
 Burghardt, W.J. 325
 Bury, R.G. 225
 Busse, A. 262, 263, 264, 265, 266
 Buytaert, É.M. 134, 135, 136, 137, 335, 371

 Cairns, D. 325
 Calvin, J. 69
 Canisius, H. 69, 73, 110, 112, 126, 424
 Carreyre, J. 70
 Carrozzi, L. 247
 Caryophyllis, J.M. 109
 Casadio, G. 256
 Casey, R.P. 67, 89, 95, 109, 110, 111, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 124, 129, 132, 143, 424
 Cavallera, F. 128
 Cerny, G. 73
 Chadwick, H. 131, 201, 241, 287
 Charles, R.H. 229
 Chatillon, F. 181
 Clackson, S. 83, 114
 Clark, E.A. 89, 90, 154, 175, 411, 413
 Clarke, E.G. 387
 Conus-Wolska, W. 68
 Cornford, F.M. 226
 Cremers, V. 341
 Crouzel, H. 287, 325, 336, 343, 348, 360, 361
 Cumont, F. 67, 73, 79, 80, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 178, 239, 240
 Cureton, W. 77

 Daur, K.-D. 181, 185
 Deconinck, J. 367, 383
 Decret, F. 134, 161, 181, 182, 183, 185, 203, 245
 Deuse, W. 299, 305, 306
 Devreesse, R. 121, 122, 368, 372, 373, 384, 385, 386, 392, 399, 401, 410, 411
 Dewart, J.M. 93, 94, 385, 398
 Diels, H. 257, 258, 268, 270
 Dihle, A. 167, 173, 265, 278, 299, 307, 308, 313, 318, 325, 331
 Dillon, J. 106, 270, 283, 299, 310
 Dodds, E.R. 226
 Dölger, F.J. 267
 Dörrie, H. 146, 221, 227, 254, 267, 331, 353
 Dörries, H. 254, 409
 Donaldson, J. 131, 133, 252, 272, 285, 289, 356
 Donini, P. 106
 Dorner, J.A. 141
 Doutreleau, L. 168, 232, 268, 289, 290, 356
 Dräseke, J. 111
 Draguet, R. 141
 Drewery, B. 144
 Drijvers, H.J.W. 140, 165, 230, 231, 353

 Ehrhard, A. 68, 109
 Ermoni, V. 140
 Van Esbroeck, M. 129
 Eustratiades, S. 68, 111
 Evans, E. 200, 217, 252, 335

 Fantino, J. 325
 Feldmann, E. 85, 190, 192, 237, 238, 240, 243, 245, 247
 Fellechner, E.L. 172
 Festa, N. 310
 Fischer, J.A. 343
 Fitschen, K. 105, 132, 182, 199, 299, 302
 Flügel, G. 73, 238, 243
 Foerster, R. 123
 Forschner, M. 265, 306, 309, 314
 Fournier, F. 287
 Frankenberg, W. 18, 78
 Freund, W.H.C. 13, 182
 Friedlander, G. 229
 Froidevaux, L.-M. 122
 Früchtel, L. 267
 Funk, F.X. 414, 415
 Funk, W.-P. 12, 174, 191, 239

 Gager, J.G. 218, 220
 Gallandi, A. 110, 115, 129
 Gardner, I. 9, 10, 12, 152, 240, 241
 Gero, S. 132

- Giannelli, C. 109
 Gimaret, D. 87
 Gingrich, F.W. 458
 Giversen, S. 114, 211, 213, 225, 239, 240, 241
 Glenthoj, J.B. 89
 Glorie, F. 339
 Görgemanns, H. 299
 Gottschalk, H.B. 93, 278
 Gouillard, J. 68
 Graf, D.F. 121
 Grant, R.M. 107, 131, 132, 146, 148, 155, 156, 215, 224, 230, 232, 262, 268, 285, 290, 304, 323, 332, 335, 337, 355, 359, 360
 Green, W.M. 251
 Grégoire, H. 161
 Gressmann, H. 112, 114, 132, 370, 371
 Grillmeier, A. 143
 Gronau, K. 94, 95, 218, 219, 261
 Gross, J. 90, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 141, 304, 323, 335, 360, 363, 364, 366, 368, 369, 370, 371, 381, 382, 384, 385, 392, 393, 394, 395, 401, 402, 404, 405, 407, 408, 411, 413, 414, 416
 Gruber, J. 339
 Guenther, O. 385, 387
 Gunkel, H. 227

 Haase, E. 70, 72, 73
 Hadot, I. 67, 68, 101, 131, 263
 Hæuser, P. 133
 Hamman, A.-G. 325
 Hammond Bammel, C.P. 224, 232, 285, 287, 337, 339, 348, 360, 361, 362
 Hannick, C. 129
 Hansen, G.C. 141, 143
 Hanson, R.P.C. 136, 137, 143, 418
 Harl, M. 287
 Von Harnack, A. 92, 125, 200, 218, 220, 221, 222, 224, 231, 333, 392
 Harrington, D.J. 8
 Hatch, W.H.P. 112
 Hauke, M. 89, 91, 99, 100, 304, 321, 323, 327, 330, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 360, 361, 362
 Hawkins, J.B.H. 131
 Hayduck, M. 305
 Heiberg, I.L. 270
 Heikel, I.A. 254, 353
 Helm, R. 132, 147, 148, 155, 156
 Henning, W.B. 174, 180, 192, 240, 241, 243
 Henrichs, A. 7
 Henry, R. 114, 115, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 153, 156, 178, 368, 386, 407, 408, 409, 424
 Hilberg, I. 256
 Hilgenfeld, A. 149
 Hitchcock, F.R.M. 219, 230
 Hjelde, S. 76
 Holl, K. 67, 73, 80, 115, 127, 132, 135, 137, 140, 154, 155, 168, 178, 233, 235, 240, 418
 Holmes, P. 252
 Holste, L. 109
 Hopfner, T. 128
 Hornby, A.S. 225
 Van der Horst, P.W. 131, 257
 Hovhannessian, V. 335, 367, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379
 Huber, P. 338, 339, 340
 Hunter, E. 83, 114
 Husson, P. 287, 336
 Hutter, M. 192, 243

 Ingremeau, C. 217
 Iturbe, F.J.C. 128

 Jackson, A.V.W. 256, 257, 469
 Jacob, E. 307
 Jacobsen, A.-C.L. 333
 Jaeger, W.W. 169, 260, 282, 285, 360, 361
 Jansma, T. 368
 Jervell, J. 325
 Joannou, P.-P. 122
 Johansen, K.F. 227
 Jonas, H. 81, 88, 209, 210, 212, 214, 237
 Jones, F.S. 173
 Jones, H.S. 207, 225, 229, 433, 443, 458
 Juckel, A. 470
 Jülicher, A. 92, 143, 160, 172
 Jugie, M. 384
 Junod, É. 273, 287, 339

 Kalbfleisch, K. 263, 265
 Kamesar, A. 254, 381
 Karpp, H. 299
 Karst, J. 132, 147, 148, 155, 156
 Kelly, J.N.D. 91, 411
 Kessler, K. 73
 Khosroyev, A. 10, 12, 88, 148, 180

- el-Khoury, N. 397, 405
 Kindler, A. 121
 King, K.L. 180
 Klein, W.W. 67, 105, 106, 130, 131,
 132, 133, 134, 138, 141, 142, 146,
 150, 152, 161, 167, 168, 169, 171,
 173, 203, 218, 241, 242, 262, 292,
 298, 299, 303, 310, 314
 Klingner, F. 339
 Klostermann, E. 269, 287, 343, 348, 349
 Koch, G. 385, 393, 401, 403, 411
 Koch, Hal 227, 269, 283, 287, 288,
 337, 339, 361
 Koch, Hugo 107, 304, 333, 334, 341
 Koenen, L. 7, 9, 180
 Koetschau, P. 224, 261, 267, 268,
 272, 287, 288, 289, 299, 338
 Koschorke, K. 129, 173, 211, 249
 Kotter, B. 67, 242
 Kraft, R.A. 8
 Kranz, W. 268
 Krause, M. 211
 Kretschmar, G. 219
 Kronholm, T. 231, 239, 360
 Kroymann, A. 200
 Krüger, G. 129, 285
 Kugelmann, L. 283, 286
 Kugener, M.-A. 67, 73, 79, 80, 82, 83, 85, 86, 161, 178, 239, 240

 Labib, P. 211, 235
 De Labriolle, P. 254
 De Lagarde, P.A. 1, 17, 23, 69, 76,
 77, 78, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113,
 117, 118, 128, 129, 154, 158, 197,
 424, 470
 Lake, K. 371
 Lamberigts, M. 90, 175, 326
 Lampe, G.W.H. 443, 458
 De Lange, N. 287
 Langerbeck, H. 299, 300, 309
 Layton, B. 211
 Lebreton, J. 274, 425
 Leconte, R. 94, 141
 Lec, S. 132, 370, 371
 Lehmann, H.J. 137, 367, 378
 Leibniz, G.W. 73, 218
 Leloir, L. 200
 Lemerle, P. 68
 Lentz, W. 84, 240
 Lequien, M. 115, 424
 Von Leutsch, E.L. 426
 Lewis, P.K.G. 114

 Leys, R. 325
 Liddell, H.G. 207, 225, 229, 433,
 443, 458
 Lieu, S.N.C. 103, 114, 131, 133, 152,
 154, 169, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182,
 193, 205, 240, 426, 445
 Lilla, S.R.C. 106, 107, 261, 267, 271,
 272, 285, 286
 Lim, R. 133, 183
 Van Lindt, P. 240
 Lloyd, A.C. 262, 263, 278, 282, 283
 Lloyd-Jones, H. 226
 Löhr, W.A. 147, 148, 149, 173, 264, 309
 Lohse, E. 307
 Long, A.A. 106, 291
 Loofs, F. 218, 219, 230
 Lorenz, R. 99
 Louis, P. 283
 Luria, D. 229
 Luther, M. 69

 MacKenzie, D.N. 237
 Magris, A. 173
 Malherbe, A.J. 262
 Mansfeld, J. 131, 146, 257
 Mansour, T.B. 102
 Marcos, N.F. 254
 Marcus, R. 228, 356
 Markschies, C. 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, 173
 Marrou, H.-I. 277
 Masaracchia, E. 249, 250
 May, G. 203, 232, 275, 276
 McCarthy, C. 200
 McLeod, F.G. 94, 368, 379, 397
 Meijering, E.P. 107, 169, 219, 220,
 224, 227, 264, 267, 268, 269, 273,
 276, 277, 313, 326, 335, 340, 341,
 353, 354
 Mercier, C. 228, 356
 Merkelbach, R. 181
 Merki, H. 325
 Merlan, P. 310
 Metzger, B.M. 346
 Michel, O. 284, 331
 Migne, J.-P. 1, 17, 110, 112, 115, 128, 129, 383
 Mikkelsen, G.B. 78
 Milobenski, E. 227
 Mirecki, P.A. 180
 Mitchell, C.W. 142, 220, 239
 Molland, E. 286
 Mommsen, T. 123
 Monnot, G. 87

- Morani, M. 360
 Moreau, J. 132
 Von Mosheim, J.L. 6, 74, 77
 Mras, K. 305, 306, 353
 Mühlberg, E. 219, 232
 Murray, C. 132
 Mutschmann, H. 217, 263, 268
 Mutzenbecher, A. 182, 185
- Nagel, P. 1, 17, 34, 83, 84, 101, 109,
 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 118, 119,
 179, 183, 190, 197, 204, 206, 210,
 211, 214, 215, 234, 237, 238, 239,
 240, 241, 249, 251, 350, 424
 Nau, F. 139, 140, 407
 Naumann, V. 218, 219
 Nautin, P. 156, 203, 224, 235, 285,
 287, 304, 336, 337, 358
 Neumann, K.J. 249, 250
 Neuschäfer, B. 254
 Newman, J.H. 91
 Nilsson, M.P. 226
 Nix, L. 113
 Norris, R.A. 92, 93, 141, 145, 385,
 392, 393, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399,
 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 411
 Nyberg, H.S. 78
 Nygren, G. 339
- Oehler, K. 282, 283, 284
 Omont, H. 109
 Van Oort, J. 9, 72, 90, 102, 247
 Opelt, I. 167
 Owen, G.E.L. 282
- Palau, A.C. 109
 Pannenberg, W. 267, 271, 283, 284,
 285, 339, 340
 Papachryssanthou, D. 68
 Paramelle, J. 68
 Parente, M.I. 270
 Pearson, B.A. 210, 211, 213, 214,
 223, 224, 225, 229, 231, 236, 249
 Pease, A.S. 168, 217, 218
 Pedersen, N.A. 106, 172, 173, 174,
 182, 186, 238, 241, 242, 243, 345
 Périchon, P. 131, 287
 Perrone, L. 254, 288, 292
 Peterson, E. 172
 Petit, F. 137, 140, 203, 228, 327,
 367, 368, 372, 373, 375, 376, 377,
 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 386,
 387, 389, 390, 391, 393, 397, 398,
 399, 400, 401, 403, 404
- Petitdidier, M. 69, 70, 71, 77, 90,
 100, 364, 365
 Petitmengin, P. 69, 73, 109, 110
 Pharr, C. 123
 Picard, C. 226
 Du Pin, L.E. 69, 70, 71, 77, 90, 91
 Pitra, J.-B.-F. 109, 115, 116, 132,
 315, 316, 317, 351, 424, 434
 Plaetse, R.V. 247
 Pohlenz, M. 218, 226, 261, 283, 284,
 285, 287, 288, 304, 306, 307, 309,
 314
 Poirier, P.-H. 18, 109, 111, 113, 114,
 116, 118, 158, 204, 280, 426
 Polotsky, H.J. 8, 81, 82, 83, 88, 174,
 191, 192, 194, 195, 239, 240, 241,
 242, 243
 Pouderon, B. 285, 291
 Prestige, G.L. 337, 338
 Preuschen, E. 229
 Prümm, K. 286
 Puech, A. 89, 95, 123, 124, 132, 166,
 167, 168, 255, 258
 Puech, H.-C. 173, 252
- Quasten, J. 89
 Quispel, G. 218, 219, 224
- Rahlfs, A. 77, 112, 113
 Rambaut, W.H. 289, 356
 Ranulf, S. 225, 226
 Raveaux, T. 181, 185
 Reeves, J.C. 86
 Refoulé, R.F. 252
 Rehm, B. 224, 230
 Reichardt, W. 368
 Reinhardt, K. 95
 Reischl, W.C. 133, 152, 208
 Reitzenstein, R. 6, 81, 82, 83, 87, 88,
 114, 169, 179, 187, 188, 201, 204
 Renoux, C. 122
 Reuss, J. 128
 Richard, M. 203, 218
 Richardson, E.C. 126, 137, 147, 148
 Ries, J. 69, 72, 78, 247
 Rist, J.M. 265, 292
 Ritter, A.M. 8
 Roberts, A. 131, 133, 252, 272, 285,
 289, 356
 Roberts, C.H. 130
 Römer, C. 180
 Van Roey, A. 116
 Roldanus, J. 341
 Romeny, R.B. ter Haar 137, 140,

- 144, 153, 254, 323, 367, 368, 369,
 372, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 381,
 404
 Van Rompay, L. 367, 374, 377
 Rondet, H. 98
 Rose, E. 9, 10, 238, 240, 241, 245
 Rose, V. 270
 Rottenwöhler, G. 78, 182, 244
 Rousseau, A. 168, 232, 233, 268,
 289, 290, 356
 Rucker, I. 129
 Rudolph, K. 211, 254
 Runia, D.T. 227, 228, 278

 Sachau, C.E. 179, 204, 368, 399
 Sáenz-Badillos, A. 254
 De Sainte-Maur, J. 110
 Salemann, C. 240, 241
 Salmond, S.D.F. 133
 Sandbach, F.H. 282, 283
 Sartre, M. 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127
 Savage, J.J. 222
 Schaefer, H.H. 81, 88, 114
 Schäferdiek, K. 132
 Schäublin, C. 94, 140, 254, 379, 387
 Schaff, P. 165, 182, 244, 245
 Scheffczyk, L. 99, 100, 101, 330, 363, 364, 368, 369, 385, 392, 404, 416
 Scheinhardt, H. 141
 Schelke, K.H. 284, 287, 339, 346,
 356, 380, 389, 391, 398, 402, 403
 Schemann, L. 77
 Schenkl, K. 221, 222
 Scher, A. 139, 141, 210, 238, 407
 Scherer, J. 122, 287, 348
 Schindler, A. 11, 12, 13, 172
 Schmidt, C. 8, 82, 83, 174, 191, 192,
 239, 240, 241, 242
 Schmidt, K.L. 331
 Schneidewin, F.G. 426
 Schoeck, H. 226
 Schoedel, W.R. 107, 268, 290
 Schöne, A. 147
 Schürer, E. 254
 Schwartz, E. 131, 410, 412, 413
 Schweizer, E. 94, 307, 371, 380, 381,
 383, 384, 387, 391, 400, 405
 Scopello, M. 133, 168
 Scott, R. 207, 225, 229, 433, 443, 458
 Seeck, O. 123
 Sensal, C. 18, 109, 114, 116, 118,
 158, 204, 280, 426

 Seyfarth, W. 126
 Sfameni Gasparro, G. 84, 85, 138,
 179, 180, 182, 183, 191, 192, 246,
 247
 Sickenberger, J. 66, 68, 70, 78, 79,
 90, 91, 92, 94, 95, 97, 98, 100, 101,
 106, 109, 113, 115, 116, 121, 124,
 126, 128, 129, 138, 143, 153, 160,
 164, 172, 191, 218, 256, 257, 275,
 315, 318, 327, 363
 Simon, M. 164
 De Simone, R.J. 99
 Skard, E. 361
 Skjærvø, P.O. 84, 186, 243
 Slomkowski, A. 91, 99, 394, 414
 Smith, R.P. 258
 Smyth, H.W. 291
 Snell, B. 226
 Von Soden, H. 128
 Sourdel, D. 123
 Spanneut, M. 285, 291
 Speyer, W. 167
 Staab, K. 141, 380, 389, 391, 398,
 399, 403, 404, 412
 Stählin, O. 98, 106, 223, 261, 267,
 268, 271, 272, 278, 286, 336, 339,
 343, 348, 353
 Stead, G.C. 107, 262, 265, 266, 271,
 273, 276, 278, 312
 Stegmann, A. 134
 Stewart, C. 299, 408
 Stothert, R. 165, 182, 244, 245
 Strack, H.L. 229
 Strange, S.K. 262, 263, 265, 278
 Straub, J. 368, 385, 387, 393, 401, 402
 Strecker, G. 8
 Stroumsa, G.G. 104, 105, 108, 131,
 159, 171, 280, 297, 311
 Stroumsa, S. 104, 311
 Strucker, A. 325
 Strutwolf, H. 173
 Sullivan, F.A. 385
 Sullivan, J.E. 325
 Sundermann, W. 7, 88, 180, 181,
 191, 192, 240, 299
 Swete, H.B. 141, 347, 393, 401, 410, 412, 413

 Tarán, L. 304, 310
 Tardieu, M. 146, 191
 Telfer, W. 361
 Tennant, F.R. 95
 Testa, E. 98

- Theiler, W. 221
 Thomasius, G. 91
 Thomson, R.W. 114, 273
 Thümmel, H.G. 132
 Till, W. 211
 Von Tischendorf, K. 229
 Todd, R.B. 282, 283
 Tonneau, R.M. 141, 200, 360, 368,
 385, 389, 393, 404
 Torres, F. 69, 73, 110, 112, 291,
 424, 437, 443, 458
 Traube, L. 149
 Trimmingham, J.S. 124
 Tröger, K.-W. 307
 Trombley, F.R. 123, 125
 Trumbower, J.A. 173
 Tubach, J. 181, 183
 Turmel, J. 98, 99, 414
 Turner, C.H. 415
 Turrianus, F., see Torres, F.
- Van Unnik, W.C. 225, 228, 229,
 230, 231, 232, 233, 250, 353, 354
 Vailhé, S. 122
 Vallée, G. 107, 129, 147, 154, 165,
 168, 204, 251
 Verheijen, L. 173, 201, 248, 251, 263
 Vermes, M. 133, 150, 151, 152, 155, 178
 Viciano, A. 141, 142, 144, 193, 254, 387
 Villey, A. 81, 131, 257, 310
 Vööbus, A. 112, 394
 Vogt, H.J. 269
 De Voltaire, F.-M.A. 125
 Vosté, J.M. 368
 Vramming, Y. 181
- Walch, C.W.F. 73, 74
 Waldschmidt, E. 84, 240
 Waldstein, M. 211, 232, 234, 235,
 236, 239
 Wallace-Hadrill, D.S. 94, 153
- Walsh, J. 114
 Walsh, P.G. 114
 Ware, K.T. 413
 Warren, E.W. 263, 265
 Waszink, J.H. 167, 219, 221, 305
 Weber, D. 203, 245, 246, 247
 Webster, T.B.L. 226
 Weis, B.K. 124
 Weis, H.-G. 406
 Weitenberg, J.J.S. 367, 374, 377
 Wells, L.S.A. 229
 Wendland, P. 268
 Wendt, H.H. 333
 Whittaker, J. 270, 271, 272, 273, 283
 Wickert, U. 93, 141, 387, 398, 399,
 401, 402, 403, 406, 411, 412, 413
 Widengren, G. 6, 7, 75, 78, 81, 88
 Widmann, M. 219
 Wiles, M.F. 137, 143
 Willems, R. 233
 Williams, F. 67, 140
 Williams, M.A. 148, 173, 211, 212,
 213, 214, 215, 224, 228, 236, 252
 Williams, N.P. 91, 95, 337
 Williams, R. 8
 Wilson, W. 272
 Winckler, J.F. 110
 Van Winden, J.C.M. 146, 273, 304
 Wingren, G. 333
 Wisse, F. 211, 232, 234, 235, 236, 239
 Witt, R.E. 283
 Wolmann, J. 218, 220
 Worp, K.A. 152
 Wright, W. 66, 112, 116, 129
 Wright, W.C. 124, 250
 Wurst, G. 102, 191, 197, 239, 254
 Wyrwa, D. 167, 267, 271, 272, 286
- Zacher, A. 247
 Zahn, T. 220
 Von Zittwitz, H. 149, 152, 193
 Zycha, J. 85, 87, 165, 168, 182, 192, 197, 233, 244, 245, 247, 354